Today we are in the intolerable paradox of a world-cataclysmic collision course. On the one hand, the human mind has proved so superbly capable that it can produce the incredible computer and send men safely to the moon and back, among other marvels.

But on the other hand, the same human mind has proved utterly helpless before our human problems, troubles and evils here on earth. Human leaders for six thousand years have striven in vain to bring about world peace, and yet science, technology and industry has produced nuclear and other weapons capable of blasting from off the earth all life — erasing humanity from this planet.

Does this paradox of human greatness and human impotence make sense?
