

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PREFACE.

SEVEN whole years have passed since the publication of my Commentar über den Psalter (2 vols. 1859–60), and during this period large and important contributions have been made towards the exposition of the Psalms. Of Hupfeld's Commentary the last two volumes (vol. iii., 1860; vol. iv., 1862) have appeared since the completion of my own. Hitzig's (1835–36) has appeared in a new form (2 vols., 1863–65), enriched by the fruit of nearly thirty years' progressive study. And the Commentary of Ewald has taken the field for the third time (1866), with proud words scorning down all fellow-workers, in order that all honour may be given to itself alone. In addition to these, Böttcher's Neue Kritische Aehrenlese, issued by Mühlau after the author's death, has furnished valuable contributions towards the exposition of the Psalms (Abth. 2, 1864); Von Ortenberg in the department of textual criticism (Zur Textkritik der Psalmen, 1861), and Kurtz in that of theology (Zur Theologie der Psalmen, in the Dorpater Zeitschrift, 1864–65), have promoted the interpretation of the Psalms; and side by side with these, Böhl's Zwölf Messianische Psalmen ("Twelve Messianic Psalms," 1862) and Kamphausen's exposition of the Psalms in Bunsen's Bibelwerk (1863) also claim attention.

I had therefore no lack of external inducements for the revision of my own Commentary; but I was also not unconscious of its defects. Despite all this, Hupfeld's inconsiderate and condemnatory judgment caused me pain. In an essay on the faithful representation of the text of the Old Testament according to the Masora (Lutherische Zeitschrift, 1863) I incidentally gave expression to this feeling. On the 20th of October 1863 Hupfeld wrote to me, "I have only just seen your complaint of my judgment at the close of my work on the Psalms. The complaint is so gentle in its tone, it partakes so little of the bitterness of my verdict, and at the same time strikes chords that are not yet deadened within me, and which have not yet forgotten how to bring back the echo of happier times of common research and to revive the feeling of gratitude for faithful companionship, that it has touched my heart and conscience." He closes his letter with the hope that he may one day have an opportunity of expressing publicly how that harsh and untempered judgment is now repugnant to his own feelings. Up to the present time I have made no use whatever of this letter. I regarded it as a private matter between ourselves. Since, however, Riehm has transferred that judgment unaltered to the second edition of the first volume of the Commentary of Hupfeld, I owe it not to myself alone, but also to him who is since deceased, to explain that this has not been done in accordance with his wish.

Hitzig's new Commentary has been of the greatest service to me in the revision and re-working of my own. In it I found mine uniformly taken into account from beginning to end, either with or without direct mention, and subjected to severe but kindly-disposed criticism; and here and there not without a ready recognition of the scientific advance which could not but be observed in it. In comparison with such an unmerciful judgment as that which Hupfeld pronounced upon me, and which Ewald a few years later with very similar language pronounced upon him, I here met with reasonable criticism of the matter, and, notwithstanding the full consciousness of the thoroughly original inquirer, an appreciation of the toil bestowed by others upon their work.

I am the more encouraged to hope that all those who do not hold scientific love of truth and progress to be the exclusive privilege of their own tendencies, will find in this new thoroughly revised edition of my Commentary much that is instructive, and much that is more correctly apprehended. The fact that I have still further pressed the Oriental learning of Fleischer and Wetzstein into the service of Biblical science will not be unwelcome to my readers. But that I have also laid Jewish investigators under contribution is due to my desire to see the partition wall between Synagogue and Church broken down. The exposition of Scripture has not only to serve the Church of the present, but also to help in building up the Church of the future. In this spirit I commend the present work to the grace and blessing of the God of the history of redemption.

DELITZSCH

ERLANGEN, 7th July 1867.

NOTE ON יהוה.

Jahve is (1) the traditional pronunciation, and (2) the pronunciation to be presupposed in accordance with the laws of formation and of vowel sounds. It is the traditional, for Theodoret and Epiphanius transcribe 'Iaβé. The mode of pronunciation 'Aía (not 'Iaβá), on the contrary, is the reproduction of the form of the name יה, and the mode of pronunciation 'Iaô of the form of the name יהו, which although occurring only in the Old Testament in composition, had once, according to traces that can be relied on, an independent existence. Also the testimonies of the Talmud and post-talmudical writings require the final sound to be יה־וּ, and the corresponding name by which God calls Himself, אֲהִיָּהּ, is authentic security for this ending. When it is further considered that יהו (whence יהו) according to analogous contractions has grown out of יהוה, and not out of יהוה, and that the Hebrew language exhibits no proof of any transition from יהוה to יהוה which would not at the same time be a transition from the masculine to the feminine, it must be conceded that the pronunciation Jahve is to be regarded as the original pronunciation. The mode of pronunciation Jehova has only come up within the last three hundred years; our own "Jahavā" [in the first edition] was an innovation. We now acknowledge the patristic 'Iaβé, and hope to have another opportunity of substantiating in detail what is maintained in this prefatory note.

NOTE BY THE TRANSLATOR.

ANY justification of the retention of the exact orthography of the author, explained above, ought to be needless. The J has been retained, inasmuch as this representative of the Hebrew Jod or Yod is become thoroughly naturalized in our Scripture names although wrongly pronounced (compare as an exception to this the y sound of the j in the word "Hallelujah," which may perhaps be accounted for by the Greek form of the word adopted in our version of the New Testament). Although the quiescent final h (He) has been, with Dr. Delitzsch, omitted here, it is still retained in other Scripture names in accordance with the customary orthography.

The Hebrew numbering of the verses is followed in the text of each Psalm, and in the references generally. In a few instances only, where the difference between the Hebrew and the English divisions might prove perplexing to the English reader, both are given; e.g. Lev. vi. 5 [12], Joel iv. [iii.] 3. To the student Baer's critical text of the Psalter (Liber Psalmorum Hebraicus. Textum masorethicum accuratius quam adhuc factum est expressit, brevem de accentibus metricis institutionem præmisit, notas criticas adjecit S. Baer. Præfatus est Fr. Delitzsch. 1861. Lipsiæ, Dörffling et Franke. Cr. 8vo, pp. xiv. 134), often referred to by Dr. Delitzsch, will be found to be a useful companion to this Commentary, and more particularly as illustrating the pointings and accentuation adopted or mentioned in the notes.

It is almost superfluous to say that it has been altogether impracticable to follow Dr. Delitzsch in his acrostic reproduction of the Alphabetical Psalms.

I. POSITION OF THE PSALTER AMONG THE HAGIOGRAPHA, AND MORE ESPECIALLY AMONG THE POETICAL BOOKS.

The Psalter is everywhere regarded as an essential part of the Kethubim or Hagiographa; but its position among these varies. It seems to follow from Luke xxiv. 44 that it opened the Kethubim in the earliest period of the Christian era.* The order of the books in the Hebrew MSS. of the German class, upon which our printed editions in general use are based, is actually this: Psalms, Proverbs, Job, and the five Megilloth. But the Masora and the MSS. of the Spanish class begin the Kethubim with the Chronicles which they awkwardly separate from Ezra and Nehemiah, and then range the Psalms, Job, Proverbs and the five Megilloth next. And according to the Talmud (Baba Bathra 14*b*)

* Also from 2 Macc. ii. 13, where τὰ τοῦ Δαυὶδ appears to be the designation of the כְּתוּבִים according to their beginning; and from Philo, De vita contempl. (Opp. II. 475 ed. Mangey), where he makes the following distinction νόμους καὶ λόγια θεοπνεύθηντα διὰ προφητῶν καὶ ὕμνους καὶ τὰ ἄλλα οἷς ἐπιστήμη καὶ εὐσέβεια συναύξονται καὶ τελειοῦνται.

 In all the Masoretic lists the twenty four books are arranged in the following order: 1) בְּרֵאשִׁית; 2) וְאֵלֶּה שְׁמוֹת; 3) וַיִּקְרָא; 4) וַיְדַבֵּר (also כַּמְדַּבֵּר); 5) מַלְכִּים; 6) וַיְהוֹשֶׁעַ; 7) שׁוֹפְטִים; 8) שְׁמוּאֵל; 9) מְלָכִים; 10) וַיְשֻׁעָה; 11) וַיְרַמְיָה; 12) וַיְחֻקְאֵל; 13) חֲרֵי עֶשֶׂר; 14) דְּבָרֵי הַיָּמִים; 15) קְהֵלָה; 16) אִיוב; 17) מִשְׁלֵי; 18) רֵוֹחַ; 19) שִׁיר הַשִּׁירִים; 20) קְהֵלָה; 21) קִינּוּן; 22) אֲחַשְׁרוּשׁ; 23) דְּנִיָּאֵל; 24) עוֹרָא. The Masoretic abbreviation for the three pre-eminently poetical books is accordingly, not א"מ"כ but (in agreement with their Talmudic order) ז"א"ם (as also in Chajug'), vid. Elia Levita, Masoreth ha-Masoreth p. 19. 73 (ed. Vcn. 1538) [ed. Ginsburg, 1867, p. 120, 248].

the following is the right order: Ruth, Psalms, Job, Proverbs; the Book of Ruth precedes the Psalter as its prologue, for Ruth is the ancestor of him to whom the sacred lyric owes its richest and most flourishing era. It is undoubtedly the most natural order that the Psalter should open the division of the Kethubim, and for this reason: that, according to the stock which forms the basis of it, it represents the time of David, and then afterwards in like manner the Proverbs and Job represent the Chokma-literature of the age of Solomon. But it is at once evident that it could have no other place but among the Kethubim.

The codex of the giving of the Law, which is the foundation of the old covenant and of the nationality of Israel, as also of all its subsequent literature, occupies the first place in the canon. Under the collective title of נביאים, a series of historical writings of a prophetic character, which trace the history of Israel from the occupation of Canaan to the first gleam of light in the gloomy retributive condition of the Babylonish Exile (Prophetæ priores) is first attached to these five books of the Thôra; and then a series of strictly prophetic writings by the prophets themselves which extend to the time of Darius Nothus, and indeed to the time of Nehemiah's second sojourn in Jerusalem under this Persian king (Prophetæ posteriores). Regarded chronologically, the first series would better correspond to the second if the historical books of the Persian period (Chronicles with Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther) were joined to it; but for a very good reason this has not been done. The Israelitish literature has marked out two sharply defined and distinct methods of writing history, viz. the annalistic and the prophetic. The so-called Elohist and so-called Jehovistic form of historical writing in the Pentateuch might serve as general types of these. The historical books of the Persian period are, however, of the annalistic, not of the prophetic character (although the Chronicles have taken up and incorporated many remnants of the prophetic form of historical writing, and the Books of the Kings, vice versa, many remnants of the annalistic): they could not therefore stand among the Prophetæ priores. But with the Book of Ruth it is different. This short book is so like the end of the Book of the Judges (ch. xvii—xxi), that it might very well stand between Judges and Samuel; and it did originally stand after the Book of the Judges, just as the Lamentations of Jeremiah stood after his prophecies. It is only on liturgical grounds that they have both been placed with the so-called Megilloth (Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther, as they are arranged in our ordinary copies according to the calendar of the festivals). All the remaining books could manifestly only be classed under the third division of the canon, which (as could hardly have been otherwise in connection with תורה and נביאים) has been entitled, in the most general way, בתוכים, — a title which, as the grandson of Ben-Sira renders it in his prologue [to Ecclesiasticus], means simply τὰ ἄλλα πάτρια βιβλία, or τὰ λοιπὰ τῶν βιβλίων, and nothing more. For if it were intended to mean writings, written ברוח הקדש, — as the third degree of inspiration which is combined with the greatest spontaneity of spirit, is styled according to the synagogue notion of inspiration, — then the words ברוח הקדש would and ought to stand with it.

II. NAMES OF THE PSALTER.

At the close of the seventy-second Psalm (ver. 20) we find the subscription: "Are ended the prayers of David, the Son of Jesse." The whole of the preceding Psalms are here comprehended under the name תְּפִלוֹת. This strikes one as strange, because with the exception of Ps. xvii (and further on Ps. lxxxvi, xc, cii, cxlii) they are all inscribed otherwise; and because in part, as e. g. Ps. i and ii, they contain no supplicatory address to God and have therefore not the form of prayers. Nevertheless the collective name Tephilloth is suitable to all Psalms. The essence of prayer is a direct and undiverted looking towards God, and the absorption of the mind in the thought of Him. Of this nature of prayer all Psalms partake; even the didactic and laudatory, though containing no supplicatory address, — like Hannah's song of praise which is introduced with וְחַתְּפֵלֶל (1 Sam. ii. 1). The title inscribed on the Psalter is תְּהִלִּים (תְּהִלָּה) for which תְּהִלִּים (apocopated תְּהִלִּי) is also commonly used, as Hippolytus (ed.

de Lagarde p. 188) testifies: 'Εβραῖοι περιέγραψαν τὴν βίβλον Σέφρα θελείμ.* This name may also seem strange, for the Psalms for the most part are hardly hymns in the proper sense: the majority are elegiac or didactic; and only a solitary one, Ps. cxlv, is directly inscribed הללה. But even this collective name of the Psalms is admissible, for they all partake of the nature of the hymn, to wit the purpose of the hymn, the glorifying of God. The narrative Psalms praise the magnalia Dei, the plaintive likewise praise Him, since they are directed to Him as the only helper, and close with grateful confidence that He will hear and answer. The verb הלל includes both the Magnificat and the De profundis.

The language of the Masora gives the preference to the feminine form of the name, instead of הללה, and throughout calls the Psalter ספר תהלה (e. g. on 2 Sam. xxii. 5). In the Syriac it is styled k'tobo d'mazmûre, in the Koran zabûr (not as Golius and Freytag point it, zubbûr), which in the usage of the Arabic language signifies nothing more than "writing" (synon. kitâb: vid. on iii. 1), but is perhaps a corruption of mizmor from which a plural mezâmîr is formed, by a change of vowels, in Jewish-Oriental MSS. In the Old Testament writings a plural of mizamor does not occur. Also in the post-biblical usage mizmorîm or mizmoroth is found only in solitary instances as the name for the Psalms. In Hellenistic Greek the corresponding word ψαλμοί (from ψάλλειν = נָחַן) is the more common; the Psalm collection is called βίβλος ψαλμῶν (Lk. xx. 42, Acts i. 20) or ψαλτήριον, the name of the instrument (psantērîn in the Book of Daniel) being

* In Eusebius, vi. 25: Σέφρη Θιλλήν; Jerome (in the Preface to his translation of the Psalms juxta Hebraicam veritatem) points it still differently: SEPHAR THALLIM quod interpretatur volumen hymnorum. Accordingly at the end of the Psalterium ex Hebræo, Cod. 19 in the Convent Library of St. Gall we find the subscription: Sephar Tallim Quod interpretatur volumen Ymnorum expliciit.

 It is an erroneous opinion of Buxtorf in his Tiberias and also of Jewish Masorettes, that the Masora calls the Psalter הללה (hallêla). It is only the so-called Hallel, Ps. cxiii—cxix, that bears this name, for in the Masora on 2 Sam. xxii. 5, Ps. cxvi. 3 a is called הללה וברוהו (the similar passage in the Hallel) in relation to xviii. 5 a.

 Νάβλα — say Eusebius and others of the Greek Fathers — παρ' Ἑβραίοις λέγεται τὸ ψαλτήριον, ὃ δὴ μόνον τῶν μουσικῶν ὀργάνων ὀρθότατον transferred metaphorically to the songs that are sung with its accompaniment. Psalms are songs for the lyre, and therefore lyric poems in the strictest sense.

III. THE HISTORY OF PSALM COMPOSITION.

Before we can seek to obtain a clear idea of the origin of the Psalm-collection we must take a general survey of the course of the development of psalm writing. The lyric is the earliest kind of poetry in general, and the Hebrew poetry, the oldest example of the poetry of antiquity that has come down to us, is therefore essentially lyric. Neither the Epos nor the Drama, but only the Mashal, has branched off from it and attained an independent form. Even prophecy, which is distinguished from psalmody by a higher impulse which the mind of the writer receives from the power of the divine mind, shares with the latter the common designation of נְבִיא (1 Chron. xxv. 1 — 3), and the psalm-singer, מְשֻׁרֵר, is also as such called חֲזָן (1 Chron. xxv. 5; 2 Chron. xxix. 30, xxxv. 15, cf. 1 Chron. xv. 19 and freq.); for just as the sacred lyric often rises to the height of prophetic vision, so the prophetic epic of the future, because it is not entirely freed from the sub-καὶ μὴ συνεργούμενον εἰς ἤχον ἐκ τῶν κατωτάτω μερῶν, ἀλλ' ἀνωθεν ἔχων τὸν ὀπηγούοντα χαλκόν. Augustine describes this instrument still more clearly in Ps. xlii and elsewhere: Psalterium istud organum dicitur quod de superiore parte habet testudinem, illud scilicet tympanum et concavum lignum cui chordæ innitentes resonant, cithara vero id ipsum lignum cavum et sonorum ex inferiore parte habet. In the cithern the strings pass over the sound-board, in the harp and lyre the vibrating body runs round the strings which are left free (without a bridge) and is either curved or angular as in the case of the harp, or encompasses the strings as in the lyre. Harps with an upper sounding body (whether of metal or wood, viz. lignum concavum i. e. with a hollow and hence sonorous wood, which protects the strings like a testudo and serves as a tympanum) are found both on Egyptian and on Assyrian monuments. By the psalterium described by Augustine, Cassiodorus and Isidorus understand the trigonum, which is in the form of an inverted sharp-cornered triangle; but it cannot be this that is intended because the horizontal strings of this instrument are surrounded by a three-sided sounding body, so that it must be a triangular lyre. Moreover there is also a trigon belonging to the Macedonian era which is formed like a harp (vid. Weiss' Kostümkunde, Fig. 347) and this further tends to support our view.

The time of Moses was the period of Israel's birth as a nation and also of its national lyric. The Israelites brought instruments with them out of Egypt and these were the accompaniments of their first song (Ex. xv.) — the oldest hymn, which re-echoes through all hymns of the following ages and also through the Psalter (comp. ver. 2 with Ps. cxviii. 14; ver. 3 with Ps. xxiv. 8; ver. 4, xiv. 27 with Ps. cxxxvi. 15; ver. 8 with Ps. lxxviii. 13; ver. 11 with Ps. lxxvii. 14, lxxxvi. 8, lxxxix. 7 sq.; ver. 13, 17 with Ps. lxxviii. 54, and other parallels of a similar kind). If we add to these, Ps. xc and Deut. xxxii, we then have the prototypes of all Psalms, the hymnic, elegiac, and prophetic-didactic. All three classes of songs are still wanting in the strophic symmetry which characterises the later art. But even Deborah's song of victory, arranged in hexastichs, — a song of triumph composed eight centuries before Pindar and far outstripping him, — exhibits to us the strophic art approximating to its perfect development. It has been thought strange that the very beginnings of the poesy of Israel are so perfect, but the history of Israel, and also the history of its literature, comes under a different law from that of a constant development from a lower to a higher grade. The redemptive period of Moses, unique in its way, influences as a creative beginning, every future development. There is a constant progression, but of such a kind as only to develop that which had begun in the Mosaic age with all the primal force and fulness of a divine creation. We see, however, how closely the stages of this progress are linked together, from the fact that Hannah the singer of the Old Testament Magnificat, was the mother of him who anointed, as King, the sweet singer of Israel, on whose tongue was the word of the Lord.

In David the sacred lyric attained its full maturity. Many things combined to make the time of David its golden age. Samuel had laid the foundation of this both by his energetic reforms in general, and by founding the schools of the prophets in particular, in which under his guidance (1 Sam. xix. 19 sq.), in conjunction with the awakening and fostering of the prophetic gift, music and song were taught. Through these cænobia, whence sprang a spiritual awakening hitherto unknown in Israel, David also passed. Here his poetic talent, if not awakened, was however cultivated. He was a musician and poet born. Even as a Bethlehemite shepherd he played upon the harp, and with his natural gift he combined a heart deeply imbued with religious feeling. But the Psalter contains as few traces of David's Psalms before his anointing (vid. on Ps. viii, cxliv.) as the New Testament does of the writings of the Apostles before the time of Pentecost. It was only from the time when the Spirit of Jahve came upon him at his anointing as king of Israel, and raised him to the dignity of his calling in connection with the covenant of redemption, that he sang Psalms, which have become an integral part of the canon. They are the fruit not only of his high gifts and the inspiration of the Spirit of God (2 Sam. xxiii. 2), but also of his own experience and of the experience of his people interwoven with his own. David's path from his anointing onwards, lay through affliction to glory. Song however, as a Hindu proverb says, is the offspring of suffering, the çloka springs from the çoka. His life was marked by vicissitudes which at one time prompted him to elegiac strains, at another to praise and thanksgiving; at the same time he was the founder of the kingship of promise, a prophecy of the future Christ, and his life, thus typically moulded, could not express itself otherwise than in typical or even consciously prophetic language. Raised to the throne, he did not forget the harp which had been his companion and solace when he fled before Saul, but rewarded it with all honour. He appointed 4000 Levites, the fourth division of the whole Levitical order, as singers and musicians in connection with the service in the tabernacle on Zion and partly in Gibeon, the place of the Mosaic tabernacle. These he divided into 24 classes under the Precentors, Asaph, Heman, and Ethan—Jeduthun (1 Chron. xxv. comp. xv. 17 sqq.), and multiplied the instruments, particularly the stringed instruments, by his own invention (1 Chron. xxiii. 5, Neh. xii. 36*). In David's time there were three places of sacrifice:

* I tended, says David in the Greek Psalter, at the close of Ps. cl., my father's sheep, my hands made pipes (ὄργανον = עוגב) and my fingers put together (or: tuned) harps (ψαλτήριον = נבל) cf. Numeri Rabba c. xiv (f. 264a) and the Targum on Am. vi. 5.

on Zion beside the ark (2 Sam. vi. 17 sq.), in Gibeon beside the Mosaic tabernacle (1 Chron. xvi. 39 sq.) and later, on the threshing-floor of Ornan, afterwards the Temple-hill (1 Chron. xxi. 28—30). Thus others also were stimulated in many ways to consecrate their offerings to the God of Israel. Beside the 73 Psalms bearing the inscription לְדָוִד, — Psalms the direct Davidic authorship of which is attested, at least in the case of some fifty, by their creative originality, their impassioned and predominantly plaintive strain, their graceful flow and movement, their ancient but clear language, which becomes harsh and obscure only when describing the dissolute conduct of the ungodly, — the collection contains the following which are named after cotemporary singers appointed by David: 12 לְאַתָּה (Ps. l. lxxiii — lxxxiii) of which the contents and spirit are chiefly prophetic, and 12 by the Levite family of singers, the בְּנֵי־קֵרֶה (Ps. xlii — xlix, lxxxiv, lxxxv, lxxxvii, lxxxviii, including Ps. xliii), bearing a predominantly regal and priestly impress. Both the Psalms of the Ezrahites, Ps. lxxxviii by Heman and lxxxix by Ethan, belong to the time of Solomon whose name, with the exception of Ps. lxxii, is borne only by Ps. cxxvii. Under Solomon psalm-poesy began to decline; all the existing productions of the mind of that age bear the mark of thoughtful contemplation rather than of direct conception, for restless eagerness had yielded to enjoyable contentment, national concentration to cosmopolitan expansion. It was the age of the Chokma, which brought the apophthegm to its artistic perfection, and also produced a species of drama. Solomon himself is the perfecter of the Mashal, that form of poetic composition belonging strictly to the Chokma. Certainly according to 1 Kings v. 12 [Hebr.; iv. 32, Engl.] he was also the author of 1005 songs, but in the canon we only find two Psalms by him and the dramatic Song of Songs. This may perhaps be explained by the fact that he spake of trees from the cedar to the hyssop, that his poems, mostly of a worldly character, pertained rather to the realm of nature than to the kingdom of grace.

Only twice after this did psalm-poesy rise to any height and then only for a short period: viz. under Jehoshaphat and under Hezekiah. Under both these kings the glorious services of the Temple rose from the desecration and decay into which they had fallen to the full splendour of their ancient glory. Moreover there were two great and marvellous deliverances which aroused the spirit of poesy during the reigns of these kings: under Jehoshaphat, the overthrow of the neighbouring nations when they had banded together for the extirpation of Judah, predicted by Jahaziel, the Asaphite; under Hezekiah the overthrow of Sennacherib's host foretold by Isaiah. These kings also rendered great service to the cause of social progress. Jehoshaphat by an institution designed to raise the educational status of the people, which reminds one of the Carovingian missi (2 Chron. xvii. 7—9); Hezekiah, whom one may regard as the Pisistratus of Israelitish literature, by the establishment of a commission charged with collecting the relics of the early literature (Prov. xxv. 1); he also revived the ancient sacred music and restored the Psalms of David and Asaph to their liturgical use (2 Chron. xxix. 25 sqq). And he was himself a poet, as his מכתב (מכתם?) (Isa. xxxviii) shews, though certainly a reproductive rather than a creative poet. Both from the time of Jehoshaphat and from the time of Hezekiah we possess in the Psalter not a few Psalms, chiefly Asaphic and Korahitic, which, although bearing no historical heading, unmistakably confront us with the peculiar circumstances of those times.* With the exception of these two periods of revival the latter part of the regal period produced scarcely any psalm writers, but is all the more rich in prophets. When the lyric became mute, prophecy raised its trumpet voice in order to revive the religious life of the nation, which previously had expressed itself in psalms. In the writings of the prophets, which represent the λείμμα χάριτος in Israel, we do indeed find even psalms, as Jon. ch. ii, Isa. xii, Hab. iii, but these are more imitations of the ancient congregational hymns than original compositions. It was not until after the Exile that a time of new creations set in.

As the Reformation gave birth to the German church-hymn, and the Thirty years' war, without which perhaps there might have been no Paul Gerhardt, called it into life afresh, so the Davidic age gave birth to psalm-poesy and the

* With regard to the time of Jehoshaphat even Nic. Nonne has acknowledged this in his Diss. de Tzipor et Deror (Bremen 1741, 4to.) which has reference to Ps. lxxiv. 4.

Exile brought back to life again that which had become dead. The divine chastisement did not fail to produce the effect designed. Even though it should not admit of proof, that many of the Psalms have had portions added to them, from which it would be manifest how constantly they were then used as forms of supplication, still it is placed beyond all doubt, that the Psalter contains many psalms belonging to the time of the Exile, as e. g. Ps. cii. Still far more new psalms were composed after the Return. When those who returned from exile, among whom were many Asaphites,* again felt themselves to be a nation, and after the restoration of the Temple to be also a church, the harps which in Babylon hung upon the willows, were tuned afresh and a rich new flow of song was the fruit of this re-awakened first love. But this did not continue long. A sanctity founded on good works and the service of the letter took the place of that outward, coarse idolatry from which the people, now returned to their fatherland, had been weaned while undergoing punishment in the land of the stranger. Nevertheless in the era of the Seleucidæ the oppressed and injured national feeling revived under the Maccabees in its old life and vigour. Prophecy had then long been dumb, a fact lamented in many passages in the 1st Book of the Maccabees. It cannot be maintained that psalm-poesy flourished again at that time. Hitzig has recently endeavoured to bring forward positive proof, that it is Maccabean psalms, which form the proper groundwork of the Psalter. He regards the Maccabean prince Alexander Jannæus as the writer of Ps. i and ii, refers Ps. xlv. to 1 Macc. v. 56—62, and maintains both in his Commentary of 1835—36 and in the later edition of 1863—65 that from Ps. lxxiii onwards there is not a single pre-Maccabean psalm in the collection and that, from that point, the Psalter mirrors the prominent events of the time of the Maccabees in chronological order. Hitzig has been followed by von Lengerke and Olshausen. They both mark the reign of John Hyrcanus (B. C. 135—107) as the time when the latest psalms were composed and when the collection as we now have it was made: whereas Hitzig going somewhat deeper ascribes Ps. i. ii. cl. with others, and the arrangement of the whole, to Hyrcanus' son, Alexander Jannæus.

On the other hand both the existence and possibility of Maccabean psalms is disputed not only by Hengstenberg, Hävernick, and Keil but also by Gesenius, Hassler, Ewald, Theinius, Böttcher, and Dillmann. For our own part we admit the possibility. It has been said that the ardent enthusiasm of the Maccabean period was more human than divine, more nationally patriotic than theocratically national in its character, but the Book of Daniel exhibits to us, in a prophetic representation of that period, a holy people of the Most High contending with the god-opposing power in the world, and claims for this contest the highest significance in relation to the history of redemption. The history of the canon, also, does not exclude the possibility of there being Maccabean psalms. For although the chronicler by 1 Chron. xvi. 36 brings us to the safe conclusion that in his day the Psalter (comp. τὰ τοῦ Δαυὶδ, 2 Macc. ii. 13*) was already a whole divided into five books (vid. on Ps. xcvi. cv. cvi): it might nevertheless, after having been completely arranged still remain open for later insertions (just as the ספר הישר cited in the Book of Joshua and 2 Sam. i., was an anthology which had grown together in the course of time). When Judas Maccabæus, by gathering together the national literature, followed in the footsteps of Nehemiah (2 Macc. ii. 14: ὡσαύτως δὲ καὶ Ἰούδας τὰ διεσκορπισμένα διὰ τὸν πόλεμον τὸν γεγονότα ἡμῖν ἐπισυνήγαγε πάντα, καὶ ἔστι παρ' ἡμῖν), we might perhaps suppose that the Psalter was at that time enriched by some additions. And when Jewish tradition assigns to the so-called Great Synagogue (כנסת הגדולה) a share in the compilation of the canon, this is not unfavourable to the supposition of Maccabean psalms, since this συναγωγή μεγάλη was still in existence under the domination of the Seleucidæ (1 Macc. xiv. 28).

It is utterly at variance with historical fact to maintain that the Maccabean period was altogether incapable of producing psalms worthy of incorporation in the canon. Although the Maccabean period had no prophets, it is nevertheless to be supposed that many possessed the gift of poesy, and that the Spirit of faith, which is essentially one and the same with the Spirit of prophecy, might sanctify this gift and cause it to bear fruit. An actual proof of this is furnished by the so-called Psalter of Solomon (Ψαλτήριον Σαλομώντος in distinction from the canonical Psalter of David)* consisting of 18 psalms, which certainly come far behind the originality and artistic beauty of the canonical Psalms; but they shew at the same time, that the feelings of believers, even throughout the whole time of the Maccabees, found utterance in expressive spiritual songs. Maccabean psalms are therefore not an absolute impossibility — no doubt they were many; and that some of them were incorporated in the Psalter, cannot be denied à priori. But still the history of the canon does not favour this supposition. And the circumstance of the LXX version of the Psalms (according to which citations are made even in the first Book of the Maccabees), inscribing several Psalms Ἀγγαίου καὶ Ζαχαρίου, while however it does not assign the date of the later period to any, is against it. And if Maccabean psalms be supposed to exist in the Psalter they can at any rate only be few, because they must have been inserted in a collection which was already arranged. And since the Maccabean movement, though beginning with lofty aspirations, gravitated, in its onward course, towards things carnal, we can no longer expect to find psalms relating to it, or at least none belonging to the period after Judas Maccabæus; and from all that we know of the character and disposition of Alexander Jannæus it is morally impossible that this despot should be the author of the first and second Psalms and should have closed the collection.

IV. ORIGIN OF THE COLLECTION.

The Psalter, as we now have it, consists of five books. Τοῦτό σε μὴ παρέλθοι, ᾧ φιλόλογε — says Hippolytus, whose words are afterwards quoted by Epiphanius—ὅτι καὶ τὸ ψαλτήριον εἰς πέντε διεῖλον βιβλία οἱ Ἑβραῖοι, ὥστε εἶναι καὶ αὐτὸ ἄλλον πεντάτευχον. This accords with the Midrash on Ps. i. 1: Moses gave the Israelites the five books of the Thôra and corresponding to these (כְּנָגֵם) David gave them the book of Psalms which consists of five books (סֵפֶר תְּהִלִּים שֶׁשׁ כּוּ חֲמֵשֶׁה סְפָרִים). The division of the Psalter into five parts makes it the copy and echo of the Thôra, which it also resembles in this particular: that as in the Thôra Elohist and Jehovistic sections alternate, so here a group of Elohist Psalms (xlii—lxxxiv) is surrounded on both sides by groups of Jehovistic (i—xli, lxxxv—cl). The five books are as follow:—i—xli, xlii—lxxii, lxxiii—lxxxix, xc—cvi, cvii—cl.* Each of the first four books closes with a doxology, which one might erroneously regard as a part of the preceding Psalm (xli. 14, lxxii. 18sq., lxxxix. 53, cvi. 48), and the place of the fifth doxology is occupied by Ps. cl. as a full toned finale to the whole (like the relation of Ps. cxxxiv to the so-called Songs of degrees). These doxologies very much resemble the language of the liturgical Beracha of the second Temple. The וְאָמֵן וְאָמֵן coupled with י (cf. on the contrary Num. v. 22 and also Neh. viii. 6) is exclusively peculiar to them in Old Testament writings. Even in the time of the writer of the Chronicles the Psalter was a whole divided into five parts, which were indicated by these landmarks. We infer this from 1 Chron. xvi. 36. The chronicler in the free manner which characterises Thucydides or Livy in reporting a speech, there reproduces David's festal hymn that resounded in Israel after the bringing home of the ark; and he does it in such a way that after he has once fallen into the track of Ps. cvi., he also puts into the mouth of David the beracha which follows that Ps. From this we see that the Psalter was already divided into books at that period; the closing doxologies had already become thoroughly grafted upon the body of the Psalms after which they stand. The chronicler however wrote under the pontificate of Johanan, the son of Eliashib, the predecessor of Jaddua, towards the end of the Persian supremacy, but a considerable time before the commencement of the Grecian.

* The Karaite Jefeth ben Eli calls them סֵפֶר אֲשֶׁרִי, סֵפֶר כְּנָאִיל, &c.

Next to this application of the beracha of the Fourth book by the chronicler, Ps. lxxii. 20 is a significant mark for determining the history of the origin of the Psalter. The words: "are ended the prayers of David the son of Jesse", are without doubt the subscription to the oldest psalm-collection, which preceded the present psalm-pentateuch. The collector certainly has removed this subscription from its original place close after lxxii. 17, by the interpolation of the beracha lxxii. 18sq., but left it, at the same time, untouched. The collectors and those who worked up the older documents within the range of the Biblical literature appear to have been extremely conscientious in this respect and they thereby make it easier for us to gain an insight into the origin of their works, — as, e. g. the composer of the Books of Samuel gives intact the list of officers from a later document 2Sam. viii. 16—18 (which closed with that, so far as we at present have it in its incorporated state), as well as the list from an older document (2 Sam. xx. 23—26); or, as not merely the author of the Book of Kings in the middle of the Exile, but also the chronicler towards the end of the Persian period, have transferred unaltered, to their pages, the statement that the staves of the ark are to be found in the rings of the ark "to this day", which has its origin in some annalistic document (1 Kings viii. 8, 2 Chron. v. 9). But unfortunately that subscription, which has been so faithfully preserved, furnishes us less help than we could wish. We only gather from it that the present collection was preceded by a primary collection of very much more limited compass which formed its basis and that this closed with the Salomonic Ps. lxxii; for the collector would surely not have placed the subscription, referring only to the prayers of David, after this Psalm if he had not found it there already. And from this point it becomes natural to suppose that Solomon himself, prompted perhaps by the liturgical requirements of the new Temple, compiled this primary collection, and by the addition of Ps. lxxii may have caused it to be understood that he was the originator of the collection.

But to the question whether the primary collection also contained only Davidic songs properly so called or whether the subscribed designation הַלְלוּת דָּוִד is only intended à priori, the answer is entirely wanting. If we adopt the latter supposition, one is at a loss to understand for what reason only Ps. l. of the Psalms of Asaph was inserted in it. For this psalm is really one of the old Asaphic psalms and might therefore have been an integral part of the primary collection. On the other hand it is altogether impossible for all the Korahitic psalms xlii—xlix to have belonged to it, for some of them, and most undoubtedly xlvii and xlviii were composed in the time of Jehoshaphat, the most remarkable event of which, as the chronicler narrates, was foretold by an Asaphite and celebrated by Korahitic singers. It is therefore, apart from other psalms which bring us down to the Assyrian period (as lxvi, lxvii) and the time of Jeremiah (as lxxi) and bear in themselves traces of the time of the Exile (as lxix, 35 sqq.), absolutely impossible that the primary collection should have consisted of Ps. ii—lxxii, or rather (since Ps. ii appears as though it ought to be assigned to the later time of the kings, perhaps the time of Isaiah) of Ps. iii—lxxii. And if we leave the later insertions out of consideration, there is no arrangement left for the Psalms of David and his cotemporaries, which should in any way bear the impress of the Davidic and Salomonic mind. Even the old Jewish teachers were struck by this, and in the Midrash on Ps. iii we are told, that when Joshua ben Levi was endeavouring to put the Ps. in order, a voice from heaven cried out to him: arouse not the slumberer (אַתָּה פִּיִּדִי אֶת־דָּוִד) i. e. do not disturb David in his grave! Why Ps. iii follows directly upon Ps. ii, or as it is expressed in the Midrash אַתָּה פִּיִּדִי אֶת־דָּוִד follows פִּיִּדִי אֶת־דָּוִד, may certainly be more satisfactorily explained than is done there: but to speak generally the mode of the arrangement of the first two books of the Psalms is of a similar nature to that of the last three, viz., that which in my Symbolæ ad Psalmos illustrandos isagogicæ (1846) is shewn to run through the entire Psalter, more according to external than internal points of contact.*

* The right view has been long since perceived by Eusebius, who in his exposition of Ps. lxiii (LXX. lxii), among other things expresses himself thus: ἐγὼ δὲ ἡγοῦμαι τῆς τῶν ἐγγεγραμμένων διανοίας ἕνεκεν ἐφεξῆς ἀλλήλων τοὺς ψαλμοὺς κεῖσθαι κατὰ τὸ πλεῖστον, οὕτως ἐν πολλοῖς ἐπιτηρήσεις καὶ εὐρών, διὸ καὶ συνῆφθαι αὐτοὺς ὡς αὐτὸς ἐπιτηρῆσας καὶ ἀκολουθίαν πρὸς ἀλλήλους· ἔνθεν μὴ κατὰ τοὺς χρόνους ἐμφέρεσθαι, ἀλλὰ κατὰ τὴν τῆς διανοίας ἀκολουθίαν (in Montfaucon's Collectio Nova, t. i. p. 300). This ἀκολουθία διανοίας is however not always central and deep. The attempts of Luther (Walch, iv. col. 646 sqq.) and especially of So-

On the other side it cannot be denied that the groundwork of the collection that formed the basis of the present Psalter must lie within the limits of Ps. iii—lxxii, for nowhere else do old Davidic psalms stand so closely and numerously together as here. The Third book (Ps. lxxiii—lxxxix) exhibits a marked difference in this respect. We may therefore suppose that the chief bulk of the oldest hymn book of the Israelitish church is contained in Ps. iii—lxxii. But we must at the same time admit, that its contents have been dispersed and newly arranged in later redactions and more especially in the last of all; and yet, amidst these changes the connection of the subscription, lxxii. 20, with the psalm of Solomon was preserved. The two groups iii—lxxii, lxxiii—lxxxix, although not preserved in the original arrangement, and augmented by several kinds of interpolations, at least represent the first two stages of the growth of the Psalter. The primary collection may be Salomonic. The after portion of the second group was, at the earliest, added in the time of Jehoshaphat, at which time probably the book of the Proverbs of Solomon was also compiled. But with a greater probability of being in the right we incline to assign them to the time of Hezekiah, not merely because some of the psalms among them seem as though they ought to be referred to the overthrow of Assyria under Hezekiah rather than to the overthrow of the allied neighbouring nations under Jehoshaphat, but chiefly because just in the same manner "the men of Hezekiah" appended an after gleanings to the older Salomonic book of Proverbs (Prov. xxv. 1), and because of Hezekiah it is recorded, that he brought the Psalms of David and of Asaph (the bulk of which are contained in the Third book of the Psalms) into use again (2 Chron. xxix. 30). In the time of Ezra and Nehemiah the collection was next extended by the songs composed during and (which are still more numerous) after the Exile. But a gleanings of old songs also had been reserved for this time. A psalm of Moses was placed first, in order to give a pleasing relief to the beginning of the new psalter by this glance back into the earliest time. And to the 56 Davidic psalms of the first three books, there are seventeen more added here in the last two. They are certainly not all directly Davidic, but partly the result of the writer throwing himself into David's temper of mind and circumstances. One chief store of such older psalms were perhaps the historical works of an annalistic or even prophetic character, rescued from the age before the Exile. It is from such sources that the historical notes prefixed to the Davidic hymns (and also to one in the Fifth book: Ps. cxlii) come. On the whole there is unmistakably an advance from the earliest to the latest; and we may say, with Ewald, that in Ps. i—xli the real bulk of the Davidic and, in general, of the older songs is contained, in Ps. xlii—lxxxix predominantly songs of the middle period, in Ps. xc—cl the large mass of later and very late songs. But moreover it is with the Psalm-collection as with the collection of the prophecies of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel: the chronological order and the arrangement according to the matter are at variance; and in many places the former is intentionally and significantly disregarded in favour of the latter. We have often already referred to one chief point of view of this arrangement according to matter, viz., the imitation of the Thôra; it was perhaps this which led to the opening of the Fourth book, which corresponds to the Book of Numbers, with a psalm of Moses of this character.

V. ARRANGEMENT AND INSCRIPTIONS.

Among the Fathers, Gregory of Nyssa has attempted to shew that the Psalter in its five books leads upward as by five steps to moral perfection, ἀσὶ πρὸς τὸ ὑψηλότερον τὴν ψυχὴν ὑπερτιθεῖς, ὡς ἂν ἐπὶ τὸ ἀκρότατον ἐφίκηται τῶν ἀγαθῶν;* and down to the most recent times attempts have been made to trace in the five books a gradation of principal thoughts, which influence and run through the whole collection. We fear that in this direction, investigation has set before itself an unattainable end. Nevertheless, as we shall see, the collection bears the impress of one ordering mind. For its opening is formed by a didactic-prophetic couplet of psalms (Ps. i. ii), introductory to the whole Psalter and therefore in the earliest times regarded as one psalm, which opens and closes with אָזְרִי; and its close is formed by four psalms (Ps. cxlvi — cxlix) which begin and end with הַלְלוּ־יְהוָה. We do not include Ps. cl. for this psalm takes the place of the beracha of the Fifth book, exactly as the recurring verse Isa. xlvi. 22 is repeated in lvii. 21 with fuller emphasis, but is omitted at the close of the third part of this address of Isaiah to the exiles, its place being occupied by a terrifying description of the hopeless end of the wicked. The opening of the Psalter celebrates the blessedness of those who walk according to the will of God in redemption, which has been revealed in the law and in history; the close of the Psalter calls upon all creatures to praise this God of redemption, as it were on the ground of the completion of this great work. Bede has already called attention to the fact that the Psalter from Ps. cxlvi ends in a complete strain of praise; the end of the Psalter soars upward to a happy climax. The assumption that there was an evident predilection for attempting to make the number 150 complete, as Ewald supposes, cannot be established; the reckoning 147 (according to a Haggadah book mentioned in Jer. Sabbath xvi, parallel with the years of Jacob's life), and the reckoning 149, which frequently occurs both in Karaitic and Rabbinic MSS., have also been adopted; the numbering of the whole and of particular psalms varies.*

* Opp. ed. Paris, (1636) t. i. p. 288.

There are in the Psalter 73 psalms bearing the inscription לְרָדָה, viz. (reckoning exactly) 37 in book i; 18 in book ii; 1 in book iii; 2 in book iv; 15 in book v. The redaction has designed the pleasing effect of closing the collection with an imposing group of Davidic psalms, just as it begins with the bulk of the Davidic psalms. And the Hallelujahs which begin with Ps. cxlvi (after the 15 Davidic psalms) are the preludes of the closing doxology.

* The LXX, like our Hebrew text, reckons 150 psalms, but with variations in separate instances, by making ix and x, and cxiv and cxv into one, and in place of these, dividing cxvi and cxlvii each into two. The combination of ix and x, of cxiv and cxv into one has also been adopted by others; cxxxiv and cxxxv, but especially i and ii, appear here and there as one psalm. Kimchi reckons 149 by making Ps. cxiv and cxv into one. The ancient Syriac version combines Ps. cxiv and cxv as one, but reckons 150 by dividing Ps. cxlvii.

The Korahitic and Asaphic psalms are found exclusively in the Second and Third books. There are 12 Asaphic psalms: l. lxxiii—lxxxiii, and also 12 Korahitic: xlii. xliii. xliv—xlix. lxxxiv. lxxxv. lxxxvii. lxxxviii, assuming that Ps. xliii is to be regarded as an independent twin psalm to xlii and that Ps. lxxxviii is to be reckoned among the Korahitic psalms. In both of these divisions we find psalms belonging to the time of the Exile and to the time after the Exile (lxxiv. lxxix. lxxxv). The fact of their being found exclusively in the Second and Third books cannot therefore be explained on purely chronological grounds. Korahitic psalms, followed by an Asaphic, open the Second book; Asaphic psalms, followed by four Korahitic, open the Third book.

The way in which Davidic psalms are interspersed clearly sets before us the principle by which the arrangement according to the matter, which the collector has chosen, is governed. It is the principle of homogeneousness, which is the old Semitic mode of arranging things: for in the alphabet, the hand and the hollow of the hand, water and fish, the eye and the mouth, the back and front of the head have been placed together. In like manner also the psalms follow one another according to their relationship as manifested by prominent external and internal marks. The Asaphic psalm, Ps. 1, is followed by the Davidic psalm, li., because they both similarly disparage the material animal sacrifice, as compared with that which is personal and spiritual. And the Davidic psalm lxxxvi is inserted between the Korahitic psalms lxxxv and lxxxvii, because it is related both to Ps. lxxxv. 8 by the prayer: "Shew me Thy way, O Jahve" and "give Thy conquering strength unto Thy servant", and to Ps. lxxxvii by the prospect of the conversion of the heathen to the God of Israel. This phenomenon, that psalms with similar prominent thoughts, or even with only markedly similar passages, especially at the beginning and the end, are thus strung together, may be observed throughout the whole collection. Thus e.g. Ps. lvi with the inscription, "after (the melody): the mute dove among strangers", is placed after Ps. lv on account of the occurrence of the words: "Oh that I had wings like a dove!" &c., in that psalm; thus Ps. xxxiv and xxxv stand together as being the only psalms in which "the Angel of Jahve" occurs; and just so Ps. ix and x which coincide in the expression עתה בצרה.

Closely connected with this principle of arrangement is the circumstance that the Elohimic psalms (i. e., those which, according to a peculiar style of composition as I have shewn in my Symbolæ, not from the caprice of an editor, * almost exclusively call God אלהים, and beside this make use of such compound names of God as יהוה צבאות, יהוה צבאות, and the like) are placed together without any intermixture of Jehovic psalms. In Ps. i—xli the divine name יהוה predominates; it occurs 272 times and אלהים only 15 times, and for the most part under circumstances where יהוה was not admissible. With Ps. xlii the Elohimic style begins; the last psalm of this kind is the Korahitic psalm lxxxiv, which for this very reason is placed after the Elohimic psalms of Asaph. In the Ps. lxxxv — cl יהוה again becomes prominent, with such exclusiveness, that in the psalms of the Fourth and Fifth books יהוה occurs 339 times (not 239 as in Symbolæ p. 5), and אלהים of the true God only once (cxliv. 9). Among the psalms of David 18 are Elohimic, among the Korahitic 9, and the Asaphic are all Elohimic. Including one psalm of Solomon and four anonymous psalms, there are 44 in all (reckoning Ps. xlii and xliii as two). They form the middle portion of the Psalter, and have on their right 41 and on their left 65 Jahve-psalms.

Community in species of composition also belongs to the manifold grounds on which the order according to the subject-matter is determined. Thus the מִשְׁבִּיל (xlii—xliii. xliv. xlv. lii—lv) and מִתְהַלֵּךְ (lvi—lx) stand together among the Elohim-psalms. In like manner we have in the last two books the שִׁיר הַמַּצְלוֹת (cxx—cxxxiv) and, divided into groups, those beginning with הוֹדוּ (cv—cvii) and those beginning and ending with הַלְלוּיָהּ (cxi—cxvii, cxlvi—cl) — whence it follows that these titles to the psalms are older than the final redaction of the collection.

It could not possibly be otherwise than that the inscriptions of the psalms, after the harmless position which the mono-graphs of Sonntag (1687), Celsius (1718), Irhof (1728) take with regard to them, should at length become a subject for criticism; but the custom which has gained ground since the last decade of the past century of rejecting what has been historically handed down, has at present grown into a despicable habit of forming a decision too hastily, which in any other department of literature where the judgment is not so prejudiced by the drift of the enquiry, would be regarded as folly. Instances like Hab. iii. 1 and 2 Sam. i. 18, comp. Ps. lx. 1, shew that David and other psalm-writers might have appended their names to their psalms and the definition of their purport. And the great antiquity of these and similar inscriptions also follows from the fact that the LXX found them already in existence and did not understand them; that they also cannot be explained from the Books of the Chronicles (including the Book of Ezra, which belongs to these) in which much is said about music, and appear in these books, like much besides, as an old treasure of the language revived, so that the key to the understanding of them must have been lost very early, as also appears from the fact that in the last two books of the Psalter they are of more rare, and in the first three of more frequent occurrence.

* This is Ewald's view (which is also supported by Riehm in Stud. u. Krit. 1857 S. 165). A closer insight into the characteristic peculiarity of the Elohim-psalms, which is manifest in other respects also, proves it to be superficial and erroneous.

VI. THE STROPHE-SYSTEM OF THE PSALMS.

The early Hebrew poetry has neither rhyme nor metre, both of which (first rhyme and then afterwards metre) were first adopted by Jewish poesy in the seventh century after Christ. True, attempts at rhyme are not wanting in the poetry and prophecy of the Old Testament, especially in the tephilla style, Ps. cvi. 4—7 cf. Jer. iii. 21—25, where the earnestness of the prayer naturally causes the heaping up of similar flexional endings; but this assonance, in the transition state towards rhyme proper, had not yet assumed such an established form as is found in Syriac.* It is also just as difficult to point out verses of four lines only, which have a uniform or mixed metre running through them. Notwithstanding, Augustine, Ep. cxiii ad Memorium, is perfectly warranted in saying of the Psalms: certis eos constare numeris credo illis qui eam linguam probe callent, and it is not a mere fancy when Philo, Josephus, Eusebius, Jerome and others have detected in the Old Testament songs, and especially in the Psalms, something resembling the Greek and Latin metres. For the Hebrew poetry indeed had a certain syllabic measure, since, — apart from the audible Shebâ and the Chateph, both of which represent the primitive shortenings, — all syllables with a full vowel are intermediate, and in ascending become long, in descending short, or in other words, in one position are strongly accented, in another more or less slurred over. Hence the most manifold rhythms arise, e. g. the anapæstic venashlichâ miménnu abothêmo (ii. 3) or the dactylic âz jedabbêr elêmo beappô (ii. 5). The poetic discourse is freer in its movement than the Syriac poetry with its constant ascending (_ ´) or descending spondees (´ _); it represents all kinds of syllabic movements and thus obtains the appearance of a lively mixture of the Greek and Latin metres. But it is only an appearance — for the forms of verse, which conform to the laws of quantity, are altogether foreign to early Hebrew poetry, as also to the oldest poetry; and these rhythms which vary according to the emotions are not metres, for, as Augustine says in his work De Musica, "Omne metrum rhythmus, non omnis rhythmus etiam metrum est." Yet there is not a single instance of a definite rhythm running through the whole in a shorter or longer poem, but the rhythms always vary according to the thoughts and feelings; as e. g. the evening song Ps. iv towards the end rises to the anapæstic measure: ki-attâ Jahavé lebadâd, in order then quietly to subside in the iambic: lavêtach tôshibêni.* With this alternation of rise and fall, long and short syllables, harmonizing in lively passages with the subject, there is combined, in Hebrew poetry, an expressiveness of accent which is hardly to be found anywhere else to such an extent. Thus e. g. Ps. ii. 5*a* sounds like pealing thunder, and 5*b* corresponds to it as the flashing lightning. And there are a number of dull toned Psalms as xvii. xlix. lviii. lix. lxxiii, in which the description drags heavily on and is hard to be understood, and in which more particularly the suffixes in mo are heaped up, because the indignant mood of the writer impresses itself upon the style and makes itself heard in the very sound of the words. The non plus ultra of such poetry, whose very tones heighten the expression, is the cycle of the prophecies of Jeremiah chap. xxiv—xxvii.

* Bellermann's Versuch über die Metrik der Hebräer (1813) is comparatively the best on this subject even down to the present time; for Saalschütz (Von der Form der hebr. Poesie, 1825, and elsewhere) proceeds on the erroneous assumption that the present system of accentuation does not indicate the actual strong toned syllable of the words — by following the pronunciation of the German and Polish Jews he perceives, almost throughout, a spondee-dactylic rhythm (e. g. Judg. xiv. 18 lûc charâshlem beeglâthi). But the traditional accentuation is proved to be a faithful continuation of the ancient proper pronunciation of the Hebrew; the trochaic pronunciation is more Syrian, and the tendency to draw the accent from the final syllable to the penult, regardless of the conditions originally governing it, is a phenomenon which belongs only

Under the point of view of rhythm the so-called parallelismus membrorum has also been rightly placed: that fundamental law of the higher, especially poetic, style for which this appropriate name has been coined, not very long since.* The relation of the two parallel members does not really differ from that of the two halves on either side of the principal cæsura of the hexameter and pentameter; and this is particularly manifest in the double long line of the cæsural schema (more correctly: the diæretic schema) e. g. Ps. xlvi. 6, 7: They beheld, straightway they marvelled, | bewildered they took to flight. Trembling took hold upon them there | anguish, as a woman in travail. Here the one thought is expanded in the same verse in two parallel members. But from the fact of the rhythmical organization being carried out without reference to the logical requirements of the sentence, as in the same psalm vers. 4, 8: Elohim in her palaces | was known as a refuge. With an east wind Thou breakest | the ships of Tarshish, we to the later period of the language (vid. Hupfeld in the Deutsch. Morgenl. Zeitschr. vi. 187).

* Abenezra calls it כפיל בְּמִלִּים שֶׁנֶּחֱמָה דְּבָרֵי אֶחָד בְּשְׁנֵי מִלִּים, duplicatum, and Kimchi כְּפִלּוּת הַשְּׂבָחִים, duplicatio sententiæ verbis variatis; both regard it as an elegant form of expression (כְּפִלּוּת הַשְּׂבָחִים). Even the punctuation does not proceed from a real understanding of the rhythmical relation of the members of the verse to one another, and when it divides every verse that is marked off by Silluk wherever it is possible into two parts, it must not be inferred that this rhythmical relation is actually always one consisting of two members merely, although (as Hupfeld has shewn in his admirable treatise on the two-fold law of the rhythm and accent, in the D. M. Z. 1852), wherever it exists it always consists of at least two members.

see that the rhythm is not called into existence as a necessity of such expansion of the thought, but vice versâ this mode of expanding the thought results from the requirements of the rhythm. Here is neither synonymous or identical (tautological), nor antithetical, nor synthetical parallelism, but merely that which De Wette calls rhythmical, merely the rhythmical rise and fall, the diastole and systole, which poetry is otherwise (without binding itself) wont to accomplish by two different kinds of ascending and descending logical organization. The ascending and descending rhythm does not usually exist within the compass of one line, but it is distributed over two lines which bear the relation to one another of rhythmical antecedent and consequent, of προφῶδός and ἐπιφῶδός. This distich is the simplest ground-form of the strophe, which is visible in the earliest song, handed down to us, Gen. iv. 23 sq. The whole Ps. cxix is composed in such distichs, which is the usual form of the apophthegm; the acrostic letter stands there at the head of each distich, just as at the head of each line in the likewise distichic pair, Ps. cxi, cxii. The tristich is an outgrowth from the distich, the ascending rhythm being prolonged through two lines and the fall commencing only in the third, e. g. xxv. 7 (the π of this alphabetical Psalm):

Have not the sins of my youth and my transgressions in remembrance,
According to Thy mercy remember Thou me
For Thy goodness' sake, O Jahve!

This at least is the natural origin of the tristich, which moreover in connection with a most varied logical organization still has the inalienable peculiarity, that the full fall is reserved until the third line, e. g. in the first two strophes of the Lamentations of Jeremiah, where each line is a long line in two parts consisting of rise and fall, the principal fall, however, after the cæsura of the third long line, closes the strophe:

Ah! how doth the city sit solitary,	otherwise full of people!
She is become as a widow,	the great one among nations,
The princess among provinces,	she is become tributary.
By night she weepeth sore	and her tears are upon her cheeks;
There is not one to comfort her	of all her lovers,
All her friends have betrayed her,	they are become her enemies.

If we now further enquire, whether Hebrew poesy goes beyond these simplest beginnings of the strophe-formation and even extends the network of the rhythmical period, by combining the two and three line strophe with ascending and descending rhythm into greater strophic wholes rounded off into themselves, the alphabetical Psalm xxxvii furnishes us with a safe answer to the question, for this is almost entirely tetra-stichic, e. g.

About evil-doers fret not thyself,
 About the workers of iniquity be thou not envious.
 For as grass they shall soon be cut down,
 And as the green herb they shall wither, but it admits of the compass of the strophe increasing even to the pentastich, (ver. 25, 26) since the unmistakable landmarks of the order, the letters, allow a freer movement:

Now I, who once was young, am become old,
 Yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken
 And his seed begging bread.
 He ever giveth and lendeth
 And his seed is blessed.

From this point the sure guidance of the alphabetical Psalms* fails us in investigating the Hebrew strophe-system. But in our further confirmatory investigations we will take with us from these Psalms, the important conclusion that the verse bounded by Sôph pasûk, the placing of which harmonizes with the accentuation first mentioned in the post-Talmudic tractate Sofrim, is by no means (as, since Köster, 1831, it has been almost universally supposed) the original form of the strophe but that strophes are a whole consisting of an equal or symmetrical number of stichs. Hupfeld (Ps. iv.

* Even the older critics now and then supposed that we were to make these Ps. the starting point of our enquiries. For instance, Serpilius says: "It may perhaps strike some one whether an opinion as to some of the modes of the Davidic species of verse and poetry might not be formed from his, so-to-speak, alphabetical psalms."

 Even if, and this is what Hupfeld and Riehm (Luth. Zeitschr. 1866, S. 300) advance, the Old Testament books were divided into verses, פסוקים, even before the time of the Masorettes, still the division into verses, as we now have it and especially that of the three poetical books, is Masoretic.

 It was these stichs, of which the Talmud (B. Kiddushin 30 a) counts eight more in the Psalter than in the Thôra, viz. 5996, which were originally called פסוקים. Also in Augustine we find versus thus used like στίχος. With him the words Populus ejus et oves pascuæ ejus are one versus. There is no Hebrew MS. which could have formed the basis of

450) has objected against this, that "this is diametrically opposed to the nature of rhythm = parallelism, which cannot stand on one leg, but needs two, that the distich is therefore the rhythmical unit."

But does it therefore follow, that a strophe is to be measured according to the number of distichs? The distich is itself only the smallest strophe, viz. one consisting of two lines. And it is even forbidden to measure a greater strophe by the number of distichs, because the rhythmical unit, of which the distich is the ground-form, can just as well be tristichic, and consequently these so-called rhythmical units form neither according to time nor space parts of equal value. But this applies still less to the Masoretic verses. True, we have shewn in our larger Commentary on the Psalms, ii. 522sq., in agreement with Hupfeld, and in opposition to Ewald, that the accentuation proceeds upon the law of dichotomy. But the Masoretic division of the verses is not only obliged sometimes to give up the law of dichotomy, because the verse (as e. g. xviii. 2, xxv. 1, xcii. 9,) does not admit of being properly divided into two parts; and it subjects not only verses of three members (as e. g. i. 1, ii. 2) in which the third member is embellishingly or synthetically related to the other two — both are phenomena which in themselves furnish proof in favour of the relative independence of the lines of the verse — but also verses of four members where the sense requires it (as i. 3, xviii. 16) and where it does not require it (as xxii. 15, xl. 6), to the law of dichotomy. And these Masoretic verses of such various compass

the arrangement of the Psalms in stichs; those which we possess only break the Masoretic verse, (if the space of the line admits of it) for ease of writing into the two halves, without even regarding the general injunction in c. xiv of the tractate Sofrim and that of Ben-Bileam in his Horajoth ha-Kore, that the breaks are to be regulated by the beginnings of the verses and the two great pausal accents. Nowhere in the MSS., which divide and break up the words most capriciously, is there to be seen any trace of the recognition of those old דִּקְדֻקָּה being preserved. These were not merely lines determined by the space, as were chiefly also the στίχοι or ἐπη according to the number of which, the compass of Greek works was recorded, but lines determined by the sense, κόλα (Suidas: $\text{κόλον ὁ ἀπὸ τῆς ἐννοίας ἔχων στίχος}$), as Jerome wrote his Latin translation of the Old Testament after the model of the Greek and Roman orators (e. g. the MSS. of Demosthenes), per cola et commata i. e. in lines breaking off according to the sense.

are to be the constituent parts according to which strophes of a like cipher shall be measured! A strophe only becomes a strophe by virtue of its symmetrical relation to others, to the ear it must have the same time, to the eye the same form and it must consequently represent the same number of lines (clauses). The fact of these clauses, according to the special characteristic of Hebrew poetry, moving on with that rising and falling movement which we call parallelism until they come to the close of the strophe where it gently falls to rest, is a thing sui generis, and, within the province of the strophe, somewhat of a substitute for metre; but the strophe itself is a section which comes to thorough repose by this species of rhythmical movement. So far, then, from placing the rhythm on one leg only, we give it its two: but measure the strophe not by the two feet of the Masoretic verses or even couplets of verses, but by the equal, or symmetrically alternating number of the members present, which consist mostly of two feet, often enough however of three, and sometimes even of four feet.

Whether and how a psalm is laid out in strophes, is shewn by seeing first of all what its pauses are, where the flow of thoughts and feelings falls in order to rise anew, and then by trying whether these pauses have a like or symmetrically correspondent number of stichs (e. g. 6. 6. 6. 6 or 6. 7. 6. 7) or, if their compass is too great for them to be at once regarded as one strophe, whether they cannot be divided into smaller wholes of an equal or symmetrical number of stichs. For the peculiarity of the Hebrew strophe does not consist in a run of definite metres closely united to form one harmonious whole (for instance, like the Sapphic strophe, which the four membered verses, Isa. xvi. 9, 10, with their short closing lines corresponding to the Adonic verse, strikingly resemble), but in a closed train of thought which is unrolled after the distichic and tristichic ground-form of the rhythmical period. The strophe-schemata, which are thus evolved, are very diverse. We find not only that all the strophes of a poem are of the same compass (e. g. 4. 4. 4. 4), but also that the poem is made up of symmetrical relations formed of strophes of different compass. The condition laid down by some,* that only a poem that consists of strophes of equal length can be regarded as strophic, is refuted not only by the Syriac* but also by the post-biblical Jewish poetry. We find the following variations: strophes of the same compass followed by those of different compass (e. g. 4. 4. 6. 6); as in the chiasmus, the outer and inner strophes of the same compass (e. g. 4. 6. 6. 4); the first and third, the second and fourth corresponding to one another (e. g. 4. 6. 4. 6); the mingling of the strophes repeated antistrophically, i. e. in the inverted order (e. g. 4. 6. 7. 7. 6. 4); strophes of equal compass surrounding one of much greater compass (e. g. 4. 4. 10. 4. 4.), what Köster calls the pyramidal schema; strophes of equal compass followed by a short closing stanza (e. g. 3. 3. 2); a longer strophe forming the base of the whole (e. g. 5. 3. 3. 7), and these are far from being all the different figures, which the Old Testament songs and more especially the Psalms present to us, when we arrange their contents in stichs.

* For instance Meier in his Geschichte der poetischen Nationallitera-

With regard to the compass of the strophe, we may expect to find it consisting of as many as twelve lines according to the Syrian and the synagogue poetry. The line usually consists of three words, or at least only of three larger words; in this respect the Hebrew exhibits a capacity for short but emphatic expressions, which are inadmissible in German [or English]. This measure is often most uniformly preserved throughout a considerable length, not only in the Psalms but also in the Book of Job. For there is far more reason for saying that the strophe lies at the basis of the arrangement of the Book of Job, than for G. Hermann's observation of strophic arrangement in the Bucolic writers and Köchly's in the older portions of Homer.

VII. TEMPLE MUSIC AND PSALMODY.

The Thôra contains no directions respecting the use of song and music in divine worship except the commands con-

tur der Hebräer, S. 67, who maintains that strophes of unequal length are opposed to the simplest laws of the lyric song and melody. But the demands which melody imposes on the formation of the verse and the strophe were not so stringent among the ancients as now, and moreover — is not the sonnet a lyric poem?

cerning the ritualistic use of silver trumpets to be blown by the priests (Numb. ch. x). David is really the creator of liturgical music, and to his arrangements, as we see from the Chronicles, every thing was afterwards referred, and in times when it had fallen into disuse, restored. So long as David lived, the superintendence of the liturgical music was in his hands (1 Chron. xxv. 2). The instrument by means of which the three choir-masters (Heman, Asaph, and Ethan-Jeduthun) directed the choir was the cymbals (מְצֻלְתִּים or צִלְצְלִים*) which served instead of wands for beating time; the harps (כְּבִיִּים) represented the soprano, and the bass (the male voice in opposition to the female) was represented by the citherns an octave lower (1 Chron. xv. 17—21), which, to infer from the word לְנִצְחָה used there, were used at the practice of the pieces by the נְצִיחִים appointed. In a Psalm where סֶלָה is appended (vid. on Ps. iii), the stringed instruments (which צִלְצְלִים סֶלָה 17 definitely expresses), and the instruments generally, are to join in in such a way as to give intensity to that which is being sung. To these instruments, besides those mentioned in Ps. cl, 2 Sam. vi. 5, belonged also the flute, the liturgical use of which (vid. on v. 1) in the time of the first as of the second Temple is undoubted: it formed the peculiar musical accompaniment of the hallel (vid. Ps. cxiii) and of the nightly torch-light festival on the semi-festival days of the Feast of Tabernacles (Succa 15 a). The trumpets (רַעְצָרוֹת) were blown exclusively by the priests to whom no part was assigned in the singing (as probably also the horn שֹׁפָר lxxx. 4, xcvi. 6, cl. 3), and according to 2 Chron. v. 12 sq. (where the number of the two Mosaic trumpets appears to be raised to 120) took their turn unisono with the singing and the music of the Levites. At the dedication of Solomon's Temple the Levites sing and play and the priests sound trumpets נְגִדִים, 2 Chron. vii. 6, and at the inauguration of the purified Temple under Hezekiah the music of the Levites and priests sound in concert until all the burnt offerings are laid upon the altar fire, and then (probably as the wine is being poured on) began (without any further thought of the priests) the song of the Levites, 2 Chron. xxix. 26—30. In the second Temple it was otherwise: the sounding of the trumpets by the priests and the Levitical song with its accompanying music alternated, they were not simultaneous. The congregation did not usually sing with the choir, but only uttered their Amen; nevertheless they joined in the Hallel and in some psalms after the first clause with its repetition, after the second with hallelujah (Maimonides, Hilchoth Megilla, 3). 1 Chron. xvi. 36 points to a similar arrangement in the time of the first Temple. Just so does Jer. xxxiii. 11 in reference to the "Give thanks unto the Lord, for He is good". Antiphonal singing on the part of the congregation is also to be inferred from Ezra iii. 10 sq. The Psalter itself is moreover acquainted with an allotment of the עלמות, comp. משררות Ezra ii. 65 (whose treble was represented by the Levite boys in the second Temple, vid. on xlvii 1) in choral worship and speaks of a praising of God "in full choirs", xxvi. 12, lxviii. 27. And responsive singing is of ancient date in Israel: even Miriam with the women answered the men (להם Ex. xv. 21) in alternating song, and Nehemiah (ch. xii. 27 sqq.) at the dedication of the city walls placed the Levites in two great companies which are there called הזוירה, in the midst of the procession moving towards the Temple. In the time of the second Temple each day of the week had its psalm. The psalm for Sunday was xxiv, for Monday xlvi, Tuesday lxxxii, Wednesday xciv, Thursday lxxxvi, Friday xciii, the Sabbath xcii. This arrangement is at least as old as the time of the Ptolemies and the Seleucidæ, for the statements of the Talmud are supported by the inscriptions of Ps. xxiv, xlvi, xciv, xciii in the LXX, and as respects the connection of the daily psalms with the drink-offering, by Sir. i. 14—16. The psalms for the days of the week were sung, to wit, at the time of the drink-offering (נסך) which was joined with the morning *Tamid: two priests, who stood on the right and left of the player upon the cymbal (Zelazal) by whom the signal was given, sounded the trumpets at the nine pauses (פְּרָקִים), into which it was divided when sung by the Levites, and the people bowed down and worshipped.* The Levites standing upon the suggestus (רִיבֵן), — i. e. upon a broad staircase consisting of a few steps, which led up from the court of the laity to that of the priests, — who were both singers and musicians, and consequently played only on stringed instruments and instruments of percussion, not wind-instruments, were at least twelve in number, with 9 citherns, 2 harps, and one cymbal: on certain days the flute was added to this number. The usual suggestus on the steps at the side of the altar was changed for another only in a few cases; for it is noticed as something special that the singers had a different position at the festival of water-drawing during the Feast of Tabernacles (vid. introduction to Ps. cxx — cxxxiv), and that the flute-players who accompanied the Hallel stood before the altar, לפני המזבח (Erachin 10 a). The treble was taken

* Talmudic צִלְצְלִים. The usual Levitic orchestra of the temple of Herod consisted of 2 Naba players, 9 Cithern players and one who struck the Zelazal, viz. Ben-Arza (Erachin 10 a, &c.; Tamid vii. 3), who also had the oversight of the duchan (Tosiphla to Shekalim ii).

 Comp. Mattheson's "Erläutertes Selah" 1745: Selah is a word marking a prelude, interlude, or after-piece with instruments, a sign indicating the places where the instruments play alone, in short a so-called ritornello.

 According to B. Erachin 10 a the following were the customary accompaniments of the daily service: 1) 21 trumpet blasts, to as many as 48; 2) 2 nablas, to 6 at most; 2 flutes (חלילין), to 12 at most. Blowing the flute is called striking the flute, הִבֵּהוּ רִחַלִּיל. On 12 days of the year the flute was played before the altar: on the 14th of Nisan at the slaying of the Passover (at which the Hallel was sung), on the 14th of Ijar at the slaying of the little Passover, on the 1st and 7th days of the Passover and on the eight days of the Feast of Tabernacles. The mouth-piece (מַצִּיחַ according to the explanation of Maimonides) was not of metal but a reed (comp. Arab. anbub, the blade of the reed), because it sounds more melodious. And it was never more than one flute (מִכּוּחַ יחיד), playing a solo, which continued at the end of a strain and closed it, because this produces the finest close (חֲלִיקָה). On the 12 days mentioned, the Hallel was sung with flute accompaniment. On other days, the Psalm appointed for the day was accompanied by nablas, cymbals and citherns. This passage of the treatise Erachin also tells who were the flute-players. On the flute-playing at the festival of water-drawing, vid. my Geschichte der jüdischen Poesie S. 195. In the Temple of Herod, according to Erachin 10 b, there was also an organ. This was however not a water-organ (הִדְרוֹלִים, hydraulis), but a wind-organ (מְגִלְתָּה) with a hundred different tones (מֵינֵי אֹמֶר), whose thunder-like sound, according to Jerome (Opp. ed. Mart. v. 191), was heard ab Jerusalem usque ad montem Oliveti et amplius, vid. Saalschütz, Archäol. i. 281—284

by the Levite youths, who stood below the suggestus at the feet of the Levites (vid. on Ps. xlv). The daily שיר הקרבן (i. e. the week-day psalm which concluded the morning sacrifice) was sung in nine (or perhaps more correctly 3*) pauses, and the pauses were indicated by the trumpet-blasts of the priests (vid. on Ps. xxxviii. lxxxi. 4). Beside the seven Psalms which were sung week by week, there were others appointed for the services of the festivals and intervening days (vid. on Ps. lxxxi), and in Biccurim 3, 4 we read that when a procession bearing the firstfruits accompanied by flute playing had reached the hill on which the Temple stood and the firstfruits had been brought up in baskets, at the entrance of the offerers into the Azara, Ps. xxx was struck up by the Levites. This singing was distinct from the mode of delivering the Tefilla (vid. on Ps. xlv ad fin.) and the benediction of the priests (vid. on Ps. lxvii), both of which were unaccompanied by music. Distinct also, as it seems, from the mode of delivering the Hallel, which was more as a recitative, than sung (Pesachim 64a, קָרְאוּ אֶת הַהֶלֶל). It was probably similar to the Arabic, which delights in shrieking, long-winded, trilling, and especially also nasal tones. For it is related of one of the chief singers that in order to multiply the tones, he placed his thumb in his mouth and his fore finger כִּי הַנִּמְיָן (between the hairs, i. e. according to Rashi: on the furrow of the upper lip against the partition of the nostrils), and thus (by forming mouth and nose into a trumpet) produced sounds, before the volume of which the priests started back in astonishment. This mode of psalm-singing in the Temple of Herod was no longer the original mode, and if the present accentuation of the Psalms represents the fixed form of the Temple song, it nevertheless does not convey to us any im-

* This is the view of Maimonides, who distributes the 9 trumpet-blasts by which the morning sacrifice, according to Succa 53b, was accompanied, over the 3 pauses of the song. The hymn Haazinu, Deut. xxxii, which is called שִׁירַת הַלְיִים par excellence, was sung at the Sabbath Musaph-sacrifice — each Sabbath a division of the hymn, which was divided into six parts — so that it began anew on every seventh Sabbath, vid. *J. pression of that before the Exile. It does, however, neither the one nor the other.

The accents are only musical, and indirectly interpunctual, signs for the chanting pronunciation of the synagogue. And moreover we no longer possess the key to the accents of the three metrical (i. e. consisting of symmetrical stichs and strophes) books as musical signs. For the so-called Sarkatables (which give the value of the accents as notes, beginning with Zarka, זָרְקָא), e. g. at the end of the second edition of Nägelsbach's Gramm., relate only to the reading of the pentateuchal and prophetic pericope, — consequently to the system of prose accents. In the German synagogue there is no tradition concerning the value of the so-called metrical accents as notes, for the Psalms were not recited according to the accents; but for all the Psalms, there are only two different modes, at least in the German ritual, viz. 1) the customary one according to which verse after verse is recited by the leader and the congregation, as e. g. Ps. xciv — xcix. xxix. every Friday evening; and 2) that peculiar to Ps. cxix in which the first seven verses of the eight are recited alternately by the leader and the congregation, but the eighth as a concluding verse is always closed by the congregation with a cadence. This psalmody does not always follow the accents. We can only by supposition approximately determine how the Psalms were to be recited according to them. For we still possess at least a few statements of Ben-Asher, Shemtob and Moses Provenzalo (in his grammatical didactic poem בְּשֵׁם קְרָמוֹן) concerning the intonation of single metrical accents. Pazer and Shalshéleth have a like intonation, which rises with a trill; though Shalshéleth is more prolonged, about a third longer than that of the prose books. Legarme (in form Mahpach or Azla followed by Psik) has a clear high pitch, before Zinnor, however, a deeper and more broken tone; Rebia magnum a soft tone tending to repose. By Silluk the tone first rises and then diminishes. The tone of Mercha is according to its name andante and sinking into the depths; the tone of Tarcha corresponds to adagio. Further hints cannot be traced: though we may infer with respect to Ole we-jored (Mercha mahpachatum) and Athnach, that their intonation ought to form a cadence, as that Rebia parvum and Zinnor (Zarka) had an intonation hurrying on to the following distinctive accent. Further, if we place Dechi (Tiphcha initiale) and Rebia gereshatum beside the remaining six servi among the notes, we may indeed produce a sarka-table of the metrical accentuation, although we cannot guarantee its exact agreement with the original manner of singing.

Following Gerbert (De musica sacra) and Martini (Storia della musica), the view is at present very general that in the eight Gregorian tones together with the extra tone (tonus peregrinus),* used only for Ps. cxiii (= cxiv—cxv in the Hebrew numeration), we have a remnant of the ancient Temple song; and this in itself is by no means improbable in connection with the Jewish nationality of the primitive church and its gradual severance at the first from the Temple and synagogue. In the convents of Bethlehem, which St. Paula founded, psalms were sung at six hours of prayer from early morn till midnight, and she herself was so well versed in Hebrew, ut Psalmos hebraice caneret et sermonem absque ulla Latinæ linguæ proprietate personaret (Ep. 108 ad Eustoch. c. 26). This points to a connection between the church and synagogue psalm-melodies in the mos orientalium partium, the oriental psalmody, which was introduced by Ambrose into the Milanese church. Nevertheless, at the same time the Jewish element has undergone scarcely any change; it has been developed under the influence of the Greek style, but is, notwithstanding, still recognizable. Pethachja of Ratisbon, the Jewish traveller in the 12th century, when in Bagdad, the ancient seat of the Geonim (גאונים), heard the Psalms sung in a manner altogether peculiar; and Benjamin of Tudela, in the same century, became acquainted in Bagdad with a skilful singer of the Psalms used in divine worship. And eight גנינות are also mentioned elsewhere;* perhaps not without reference to those eight church-tones, which are also found among the Armenians. Moreover the two modes of using the accents in chanting, which are attested in the ancient service-books, may perhaps be not altogether unconnected with the distinction between the festival and the simpler ferial manner in the Gregorian style of church-music.

VIII. TRANSLATIONS OF THE PSALMS.

The earliest translation of the Psalms is the Greek Alexandrine version. When the grandson of the son of Sirach came to Egypt in the year 132 B. C., not only the Law and the Prophets, but also the Hagiographa were already translated into the Greek; of course therefore also the Psalms, by which the Hagiographa are directly named in Luke xxiv. 44. The story of the LXX (LXXII) translators, in its original form, refers only to the Thôra; the translations of the other books are later and by different authors. All these translators used a text consisting only of consonants, and these moreover were here and there more or less indistinct; this text had numerous glosses, and was certainly not yet, as later, settled on the Masoretic basis. This they translated literally, in ignorance of the higher exegetical and artistic functions of the translator, and frequently the translation itself is obscure. From Philo, Josephus and the New Testament we see that we possess the text of this translation substantially in its original form, so that criticism, which since the middle of the last century has acquired many hitherto unknown helps,† more especially also in the province of the Psalms, will not need to reverse its judgment of the character of the work. Nevertheless, this translation, as being the oldest key to the understanding of the language of the Old Testament writings, as being the oldest mirror of the Old Testament text, which is not to be exempted from modest critical investigation, and as an important check upon the interpretation of Scripture handed down in the Talmud, in the Midrash, and in that portion of the national literature in general, not originating in Egypt, — is invaluable.

In one other respect this version claims a still greater significance. Next to the Book of Isaiah, no book is so frequently cited in the New Testament as the Psalter. The Epistle to the Hebrews has grown up entirely from the roots of the language of the Old Testament psalms. The Apocalypse, the only book which does not admit of being referred back to any earlier formula as its basis, is nevertheless not without references to the Psalter: Ps. ii in particular has a significant part in the moulding of the apocalyptic conceptions and language. These New Testament citations, with few exceptions (as John xiii. 18), are based upon the LXX, even where this translation (as. e. g., Ps. xix. 5, li. 6, cxvi. 10), only in a general way, correctly reproduces the original text. The explanation of this New Testament use of the LXX is to be found in the high esteem in which this translation was held among the Jewish people: it was accounted, not only by the Hellenistic, but also by the Palestinian Jews, as a providential and almost miraculous production; and this esteem was justified by the fact, that, although altogether of unequal birth with the canonical writpureum described by Breitingner 1748, Greek Text likewise of the 5th or 6th century (vid. ibid. p. lix sq.); 3) Palmorum Fragmenta papyracea Londinensia (in the British Museum), Ps. x. 2—xviii. 6, xx. 14—xxiv. 6, of the 4th century, given in Tischendorf's Monumenta Sacra Inedita. Nova Collectio t. 1; 4) Fragmenta Psalmorum Tischendorfiana Ps. cxli (ii). 7—8, cxlii (iii). 1—3, cxliv (v). 7—13, of the 5th or 4th century in the Monumenta t. ii. There still remain unused to the present time 1) the Psalterium Græco-Latinum of the library at St. Gall, Cod. 17 in 4to, Greek text in uncial characters with the Latin at the side; 2) Psalterium Gallico-Romano-Hebraico-Græcum of the year 909, Cod. 230 in the public library at Bamberg (vid. a description of this MS. by Schönfelder in the Serapeum, 1865, No. 21) written by Solomon, abbot of St. Gall and bishop of Constance (d. 920), and brought to Bamberg by the emperor Henry II (d. 1024), who had received it as a gift when in St. Gall; as regards the criticism of the text of the LXX it is of like importance with the Veronense which it resembles.

ings, it nevertheless occupies a position in the history of divine revelation which forms a distinct epoch. For it was the first opportunity afforded to the gentile world of becoming acquainted with the Old Testament revelation, and thus the first introduction of Japheth into the tents of Shem. At the same time therewith, a distinct breaking down of the barriers of the Old Testament particularism was effected. The Alexandrine translation was, therefore, an event which prepared the way for that Christianity, in which the appointment of the religion of Israel to be the religion of the world is perfected. This version, at the outset, created for Christianity the language which it was to use; for the New Testament Scriptures are written in the popular Greek dialect (κοινή) with an Alexandrine colouring. And in a general way we may say that Alexandrinism moulded the forms beforehand, which Christianity was afterwards to fill up with the substance of the gospel. As the way of Jesus Christ lay by Egypt (Matth. ii. 15), so the way of Christianity also lay by Egypt, and Alexandria in particular.

Equally worthy of respect on account of its antiquity and independence, though not of the same importance as the LXX from a religio-historical point of view, is the Targum or Chaldee version of the Psalms: a version which only in a few passages assumes the form of a paraphrase with reference to Midrash interpretations. The date of its composition is uncertain. But as there was a written Targum to the Book of Job* even during the time of the Temple, there was also a Targum of the Psalms, though bearing in itself traces of manifold revisions, which probably had its origin during the duration of the Temple. In distinction from the Targums of Onkelos to the Pentateuch and of Jonathan to the minor Prophets the Targum of the Psalms belongs to the so-called Jerusalem group, for the Aramaic idiom in which it is written, — while, as the Jerusalem Talmud shews, it is always distinguished in no small degree from the Palestinian popular dialect as being the language of the literature — abounds in the same manner as the former in Greek words

(as אַנג'לִין ἄγγελοι, אַרְבַּסְרִין ἀράβηται, קִרְיִים κύριος), and like it also closely approximates, in sound and formation, to the Syriac. From this translation which excels the LXX in grammatical accuracy and has at its basis a more settled and stricter text, we learn the meaning of the Psalms as understood in the synagogue, as the interpretation became fixed, under the influence of early tradition, in the first centuries of the Christian era. The text of the Targum itself is at the present day in a very neglected condition. The most correct texts are to be found in Buxtorf and Norzi's Bibles. Critical observations on the Targums of the Hagiographa are given in the treatise עֵשָׂה אֹרַח by Benzion Berkowitz (Wilna, 1843).

The third most important translation of the Psalms is the Peshito, the old version of the Syrian church, which was made not later than in the second century. Its author translated from the original text, which he had without the vowel points, and perhaps also in a rather incorrect form: as is seen from such errors as xvii. 15 (חַמוֹנֶהֶךָ instead of אַמּוֹנֶהֶךָ), lxxxi. 12 (שִׁיהֶמוּ נִרְיָבֶמוּ dele eos et perde eos instead of שִׁרְמוּ וְאַבְרָמִי), cxxxix. 16 (גַּלְמֵי retributionem meam instead of גַּלְמֵי). In other errors he is influenced by the LXX, as lvi. 9 (LXX כִּנְוֶהֶךָ instead of בְּנֹאֲדֶךָ), he follows this version in such departures from the better text sometimes not without additional reason, as xc. 5 (generationes eorum annus erunt, i. e. וְרַעְוֵיהֶן שְׁנֵה יְהוּי, LXX τὰ ἐξουθενώματα αὐτῶν ἔτη ἔσονται), cx. 3 (populus tuus gloriosus, i. e. עַמְּךָ נִרְיָבֶה, Job xxx. 15, nobility, rank, LXX μετὰ σοῦ ἡ ἀρχή). The fact that he had the LXX before him beside the original text is manifest, and cannot be done away by the supposition that the text of the Peshito has been greatly distorted out of the later Hexaplarian translation; although even this is probable, for the LXX won such universal respect in the church that the Syrians were almost ashamed of their ancient version, which disagreed with it in many points, and it was this very circumstance which gave rise in the year 617 A. D. to the preparation of a new Syriac translation from the Hexaplarian LXX-text. It is not however merely between the Peshito and the LXX, but also between the Peshito and the Targum, that a not accidental mutual relation exists, which becomes at once apparent in Ps. i (e. g. in the translation of לְצִיִּים by מִיִּקְוִי and of לִוְרָה by (נִמְצָא) and hardly admits of explanation by the use of the Christian Peshito on the part of the Jewish Targumist.* It may be more readily supposed that the old Syriac translator of the Psalms, of whom we are now speaking, was a Jewish Christian and did not despise the welcome assistance of the Targum, which was already at hand, in whatever form it might be. It is evident that he was a Christian from passages like xix. 5, cx. 3, also from lxxviii. 19 comp. with Ephes. iv. 8, Jer. xxxi. 31 comp. with Hebr. viii. 8; and his knowledge of the Hebrew language, with which, as was then generally the case, the knowledge of Greek was united, shews that he was a Jewish Christian. Moreover the translation has its peculiar Targum characteristics: tropical expressions are rendered literally, and by a remarkable process of reasoning interrogative clauses are turned into express declarations: lxxxviii. 11—13 is an instance of this with a bold inversion of the true meaning to its opposite. In general the author shuns no violence in order to give a pleasing sense to a difficult passage e. g. xii. 6*b*, lx. 6. The musical and historical inscriptions, and consequently also the סִלְהָ (including רִנְיִן סִלְהָ ix. 17) he leaves untranslated, and the division of verses he adopts is not the later Masoretic. All these peculiarities make the Peshito all the more interesting as a memorial in exegetico-historical and critical enquiry: and yet, since Dathe's edition, 1768, who took the text of Erpenius as his ground-work and added valuable notes, scarcely anything has been done in this direction.

In the second century new Greek translations were also made. The high veneration which the LXX had hitherto enjoyed was completely reversed when the rupture between the synagogue and the church took place, so that the day when this translation was completed was no longer compared to the day of the giving of the Law, but to the day of the golden calf. Nor was it possible that it should be otherwise than that its defects should become more and more perceptible. Even the New Testament writers found it requiring correction here and there, or altogether unfit for use, for the Palestinian text of the Old Testament which had been handed down, was not merely as regards the consonants but also as to pronunciation substantially the same as that which has been fixed by the Masoretes since the sixth century. Consequently Aquila of Pontus (a proselyte from heathenism to Judaism) in the first half of the 2nd century, made a Greek translation of the Old Testament, which imitated the original text word for word even at the risk of un-Greek expressions, and in the choice of the Greek words used is determined by the etymology of the Hebrew words. Not to lose any of the weighty words he translates the first sentence of the Thôra thus: '὘ν κεφαλαίῳ ἔκτισεν ὁ Θεὸς σὺν (תא) τὸν οὐρανὸν καὶ σὺν (תא) τῆν γῆν. In the fragments of the translation of the Psalms, one of which has been preserved in the Talmudic literature (vid. on Ps. xlvi. 15), we do not meet with such instances of violence in favour of literalness, although also even there he forces the Greek into the form of the Hebrew, and always renders the words according to their primary meaning (e. g. רביר χρηματιστήριον, מגלה εἰλημα, פתח ἀνοιγμα, ררה δρμημα, אמן πεπιστευμένως), sometimes unhappily and misled by the usage the language had acquired in his time. In some passages he reads the text differently from our present pointing (e. g. x. 4 ὄταν ὄψωθῆ), but he moreover follows the tradition (e. g. מלה ἀεί, שרי ἰκανός, מרחם τοῦ ταπεινόφρονος καὶ ἀπλοῦ = מרחם) and also does not despise whatever the LXX may offer that is of any worth (e. g. כמנים ἐν χορδαῖς), as his translation throughout, although an independent one, relies more or less upon the pioneering work of its predecessor, the LXX. His talent as a translator is un mistakeable. He has perfect command of the Hebrew, and handles the treasures of the Greek with a master-hand. For instance, in the causative forms he is never in difficulty for a corresponding Greek word (הפיל πτωματίξειν, הריר δρομοῦν, השכיל ἐπιστημοῦν and the like). The fact that he translated for the synagogue in opposition to the church is betrayed by passages like ii. 12, xxii. 17, cx. 3 and perhaps also lxxxiv. 10, comp. Dan. ix. 26, where he prefers ἡλασμένον τοῦ Χριστοῦ: nevertheless one must not in this respect charge him with evil intentions throughout. Even Jerome, on calmer reflection, moderated his indignation against Aquila's translation to a less harsh judgment: ut amicæ menti fatear, quæ ad nostram fidem pertinent roborem plura reperio, and praised it even at the expense of the translations of Theodotion and Symmachus: Isti Semichristiani Judaice transtulerunt, et Judæus Aquila interpretatus est ut Christianus.

* Although more recently we are told, Hai Gaon (in Babylonia) when he came upon a difficult passage in his Academical lectures on the Psalms enquired of the patriarch of the Eastern church how he interpreted it, vid. Steinschneider, Jewish Literature, p. 125 sq.

 The fragments of the translation of the Ps., which are cited under the name δ Σόπος, Dathe has also there collected in his preface.

The translation of Theodotion is not an original work. It is based upon the LXX and brings this version, which was still the most widely used, into closer relation to the original text, by making use of Aquila's translation. The fragments that are preserved to us of passages independently translated contain nothing pre-eminently characteristic. Symmachus also takes the LXX as his basis, but in re-moulding it according to the original text he acts far more decidedly and independently than Theodotion, and distinguishes himself from Aquila by endeavouring to unite literalness with clearness and verbal accuracy: his translation of the Psalms has even a poetic inspiration about it. Both Aquila and Symmachus issued their translations twice, so that some passages are extant translated in a twofold form (vid. cx. 3).

Beside the LXX. Aq. Symm. and Theod. there are also a fifth, sixth and seventh Greek translation of the Psalms. The fifth is said to have been found in Jericho under the emperor Caracalla, the sixth in Nicopolis under the emperor Alexander Severus. The former, in its remains, shews a knowledge of the language and tradition, the latter is sometimes (xxxvii. 35, Hab. iii. 13) paraphrastic. A seventh is also mentioned besides, it is most like Theodotion. In the Hexapla of Origen, which properly contains only six columns (the Hebrew text, the Hebr. text in Greek characters, Aq., Symm., LXX, Theod.), in the Ps. and elsewhere a Quinta (E), Sexta (c), and Septima (Z) are added to these six columns: thus the Hexapla (apart from the Seventh) became an Octapla. Of the remains of these old versions as compiled by Origen, after the labours of his predecessors Nobilius and Drusius, the most complete collection is that of Bernard de Montfaucon in his Hexaplorum Origenis quæ supersunt (2 vols. folio, Paris 1713); the rich gleanings since handed down from many different quarters* are unfortunately still scattered and uncollated.

Euthymius Zigadenus mentions beside the LXX, Aq., Symm., Theod., V., and VI., as a Seventh version that of Lucian which attempts to restore the original Septuagint-text by a comparison with the original text. Lucian died as a martyr 311 A. D. in Nicomedia, whither he had been dragged from Antioch. The autograph of this translation was found in Nicomedia, hidden in a small rough-plastered tower. We are as little able to form a conception of this Septuagint-recension of Lucian as of that of the cotemporary Egyptian bishop Hesy-chius, since not a single specimen of either is extant. It would be interesting to know the difference of treatment of the two critics from that of Origen, who corrected the text of the κοινή after the Hebrew original by means of Theodotion's, obelis jugulans quæ abundare videbantur, et quæ deerant sub asteriscis interserens, which produced a confusion that might easily have been foreseen.

From the old Latin translation, the so-called Itala, made from the LXX, we possess the Psalter complete: Blanchini has published this translation of the Psalms (1740) from the Veronese Psalter, and Sabbatier in the second volume of his Latinæ Versiones Antiquæ (1751) from the Psalter of the monastery of St. Germain. The text in Faber Stapulensis' Quincuplex Psalterium (1509) is compiled from Augustine; for Augustine, like Hilary, Ambrose, Prosper, and Cassiodorus, expounds the Psalms according to the old Latin text. Jerome first of all carefully revised this in Rome, and thus originated the Psalterium Romanum, which has been the longest retained

* Thus e. g. Montfaucon was only able to make use of the Psalter-MS. Cod. Vat. 754 for 16 Psalms; Adler has compared it to the end and found in it valuable Hexapla fragments (vid. Repert. für Bibl. u. Morgenl. Lit. xiv. S. 183 f.). The Psalm-commentary of Barhebræus and the Psalterium Mediolanense have also been begun to be worked with this object; but as yet, not the Syriac Psalter of the Medici library mentioned by Montfaucon, Bibliotheca Bibliothecarum i. 240 and supposed to be based upon the Quinta.

 Comp. the Athanasian synopsis in Montfaucon, Hexapla t. 1 p. 59 and the contribution from a Syriac MS in the Repertorium für Bibl. u. Morgenl. Lit. ib. (1784) S. 48 f by the church of Milan and the Basilica of the Vatican. He then in Bethlehem prepared a second more carefully revised edition, according to the Hexaplarian Septuagint-text* with daggers (as a sign of additions in the LXX contrary to the original) and asterisks (a sign of additions in the LXX from Theodotion in accordance with the original), and this second edition which was first adopted by the Gallican churches obtained the name of the Psalterium Gallicanum. It is not essentially different from the Psalter of the Vulgate, and appeared, with its critical signs, from a MS. of Bruno, bishop of Würzburg (died 1045), for the first time in the year 1494 (then edited by Cochleus, 1533): both Psalters, the Romish and the Gallican, are placed opposite one another in Faber's Quincuplex Psalterium, in t. x. p. 1 of the Opp. Hieronymi, ed. Vallarsi and elsewhere.

The Latin Psalters, springing from the common or from the Hexaplarian Septuagint-text, as also the Hexapla-Syriac and the remaining Oriental versions based upon the LXX and the Peshito, have only an indirectly exegetico-historical value. On the contrary Jerome's translation of the Psalter, juxta Hebraicam veritatem, is the first scientific work of translation, and, like the whole of his independent translation of the Old Testament from the original text, a bold act by which he has rendered an invaluable service to the church, without allowing himself to be deterred by the cry raised against such innovations. This independent translation of Jerome has become the Vulgate of the church: but in a text in many ways estranged from its original form, with the simple exception of the Psalter. For the new translation of this book was opposed by the inflexible liturgical use it had attained; the texts of the Psalterium Romanum and Gallicanum maintained their ground and became (with the omission of the critical signs) an essential portion of the Vulgate. On this account it is the more to be desired that Jerome's Latin Psalter ex Hebræo (Opp. ed. Vallarsi t. ix. p. iii) were made mere generally known and accessible by a critical edition published separately. It is not necessary to search far for critical helps for such an undertaking. There is an excellent MS., Cod. 19, in the library of St. Gall, presented by the abbot Hartmot (died 895).

Origen and Jerome learnt the language of the Old Testament from Jewish teachers. All the advantages of Origen's philological learning are lost to us, excepting a few insignificant remains, with his Hexapla: this gigantic bible which would be the oldest direct monument of the Old Testament text if it were but extant. Whereas in Jerome's Old Testament translated from the original text (canon Hebraicæ veritatis) we have the maturest fruit of the philological attainments of this indefatigable, steady investigator inspired with a zeal for knowledge. It is a work of the greatest critical and historical value in reference to language and exegesis. The translation of the Psalter is dedicated to Sophronius who had promised to translate it into Greek: this Greek translation is not preserved to us.

Jerome's translation of the Psalter has not its equal either in the synagogue or the church until the time of Saadia Gaon of Fajum, the Arabian translator of the Psalms. Two MSS. of his translation of the Psalms are to be found at Oxford; but the most important, which also contains his annotations complete, is in Munich. Schnurrer (1791) contributed Ps. xvi, xl and cx to Eichhorn's Biblioth. der Bibl. Lit. iii, from Cod. Pocock. 281, then Haneberg (1840) Ps. lxxviii and several others from the Munich Cod.; the most extensive excerpts from Cod. Pocock. 281 and Cod. Huntingt. 416 (with various readings from Cod. Mon. appended) are given by Ewald in the first vol. of his Beiträge zur ältesten Ausleg. u. Sprach-erklärung des A. T. 1844. The gain which can be drawn from Saadia for the interpretation of the Psalms, according to the requirements of the present day, is very limited; but he promises a more interesting and rich advantage to philology and the history of exegesis. Saadia stands in the midst of the still ever mysterious process of development out of which the finally established and pointed text of the Old Testament came forth. He has written a treatise on the punctuation

The task, which is assigned to the translator of the sacred Scriptures, was recognised by Luther as by no one before him, and he has discharged it as no one up to the present day since his time has done. What Cicero said of his translation of the two controversial speeches of Demosthenes and Æschines holds good also of Luther: Non converti ut interpres, sed ut orator, sentiis iisdem et earum formis tanquam figuris, verbis ad nostram consuetudinem aptis: in quibus non verbum pro verbo necesse habui reddere, sed genus omnium verborum vimque servavi; non enim ea me adnumerare lectori putavi oportere, sed tanquam adpendere — he has lived in thought and feeling in the original text in order not to reproduce it literally with a slavish adherence to its form, but to re-mould it into good and yet spiritually renewed German and at the same time to preserve its spirit free and true to its deepest meaning. This is especially the case with his translation of the Psalms, in which even Moses Mendelssohn has thought it to his advantage to follow him. To deny that here and there it is capable of improvement by a more correct understanding of the sense and in general by greater faithfulness to the original (without departing from the spirit of the German language), would indicate an ungrateful indifference to the advance which has been made in biblical interpretation — an advance not merely promised, but which we see actually achieved.

IX. HISTORY OF THE EXPOSITION OF THE PSALMS.

If we now take a glance over the history of the exposition of the Psalms, we shall see from it how late it was before the proper function of scientific exposition was recognised. We begin with the apostolic exposition. The Old Testament according to its very nature tends towards and centres in Christ. Therefore the innermost truth of the Old Testament has been revealed in the revelation of Jesus Christ. But not all at once: His passion, resurrection, and ascension are three steps of this progressive opening up of the Old Testament, and of the Psalms in particular. Our Lord himself, both before and after His resurrection, unfolded the meaning of the Psalms from His own life and its vicissitudes; He shewed how what was written in the Law of Moses, in the Prophets and in the Psalms was fulfilled in Him; He revealed to His disciples the meaning τοῦ συνέναι τὰς γραφάς Luke xxiv. 44 sq. Jesus Christ's exposition of the Psalms is the beginning and the goal of Christian Psalm-interpretation. This began, as that of the Christian church, and in fact first of all that of the Apostles, at Pentecost when the Spirit, whose instrument David acknowledges himself to have been (2 Sam. xxiii. 2), descended upon the Apostles as the Spirit of Jesus, the fulfiller and fulfilment of prophecy. This Spirit of the glorified Jesus completed what, in His humiliation and after His resurrection, he had begun: He opened up to the disciples the meaning of the Psalms. How strongly they were drawn to the Psalms is seen from the fact that they are quoted about seventy times in the New Testament, which, next to Isaiah, is more frequently than any other Old Testament book. From these interpretations of the Psalms the church will have to draw to the end of time. For only the end will be like the beginning and even surpass it. But we must not seek in the New Testament Scriptures what they are not designed to furnish, viz., an answer to questions belonging to the lower grades of knowledge, to grammar, to cotemporary history and to criticism. The highest and final questions of the spiritual meaning of Scripture find their answer here; the grammatico-historico-critical under-structure, — as it were, the candlestick of the new light, — it was left for succeeding ages to produce.

The post-apostolic, patristic exposition was not capable of this. The interpreters of the early church with the exception of Origen and Jerome possessed no knowledge of the Hebrew tongue, and even these two not sufficient to be able to rise to freedom from a dependence upon the LXX which only led them into frequent error. Of Origen's Commentary and Homilies on the Ps. we possess only fragments translated by Rufinus, and his ὑπόμνημα εἰς τοὺς ψαλμοὺς (edited complete by Kleopas, 1855, from a MS. in the monastery of Mar-Saba). Jerome, contra Rufinum i. § 19, indeed mentions Commentarioli on the Ps. by himself, but the Breviarium in Psalterium (in t. vii. p. ii of his Opp. ed. Vallarsi) bearing his name is allowed not to be genuine, and is worthless as regards the history of the text and the language. The almost complete Commentary (on Ps. i—cxix according to the Hebrew reckoning) of Eusebius, made known by Montfaucon (Collectio nova Patrum et Scriptorum Græc. t. i) is unsuspected. Eusebius, though living in Palestine and having a valuable library at command, is nevertheless so ignorant of the Hebrew, that he considers it is possible Μαριαμ (מַרְיָם) in Ps. cx may refer to Mary. But by contributions from the Hexapla he has preserved many acceptable treasures of historical value in connection with the translation, but of little worth in other respects, for the interpretation is superficial, and capriciously allegorical and forced. Athanasius in his short explanation of the Psalms (in t. i p. ii of the Benedictine edition) is entirely dependent on Philo for the meaning of the Hebrew names and words. His book: πρὸς Μαρκελλῖνον εἰς τὴν ἐρμηνείαν τῶν ψαλμῶν (in the same vol. of the Benedictine edition) is a very beautiful essay. It treats of the riches contained in the Psalms, classifies them according to their different points of view, and gives directions how to use them profitably in the manifold circumstances and moods of the outward and inner life. Johann Reuchlin has translated this little book of Athanasius into Latin, and Jörg Spalatin from the Latin of Reuchlin into German (1516. 4to.). Of a similar kind are the two books of Gregory of Nyssa εἰς τὴν ἐπιγραφὴν τῶν ψαλμῶν (Opp. ed. Paris, t. i), which treat of the arrangement and inscriptions; but in respect of the latter he is so led astray by the LXX, that he sets down the want of titles of 12 Ps. (this is the number according to Gregory), which have titles in the LXX, to Jewish ἀπορία and κακία. Nevertheless there are several valuable observations in this introduction of the great Nyssene. About cotemporaneously with Athanasius, Hilarius Pictaviensis, in the Western church, wrote his allegorizing (after Origen's example) Tractatus in librum Psalmorum with an extensive prologue, which strongly reminds one of Hippolytus'

We still have his exposition of Ps. i. ii. ix. xiii. xiv. li. lii. liii—lxi. xc. cxviii—cl (according to the numbering of the LXX); according to Jerome (Ep. ad Augustin. cxii*) it is transferred from Origen and Eusebius. It is throughout ingenious and pithy, but more useful to the dogmatic theologian than to the exegete (t. xxvii. xxviii of the Collectio Patrum by Caillau and Guillon). Somewhat later, but yet within the last twenty years of the fourth century (about 386—397), come Ambrose's Enarrationes in Ps. i. xxxv—xl. xliii. xlv. xlvii. xlviii. lxi. cxviii (in t. ii of the Benedictine edition). The exposition of Ps. i is likewise an introduction to the whole Psalter, taken partly from Basil. He and Ambrose have pronounced the highest eulogiums on the Psalter. The latter says: Psalmus enim benedictio populi est, Dei laus, plebis laudatio, plausus omnium, sermo universorum, vox Ecclesiæ, fidei canora confessio, auctoritatis plena devotio, libertatis lætitia, clamor jucunditatis, lætitiæ resultatio. Ab iracundia mitigat, a sollicitudine abdicat, a mœrore allevat. Nocturna arma, diurna magisteria; scutum in timore, festum in sanctitate, imago tranquillitatis, pignus pacis atque concordiæ, citharæ modo ex diversis et disparibus vocibus unam exprimens cantilenam. Diei ortus psalmum resultat, psalmum resonat occasus. After such and similar prefatory language we are led to expect from the exposition great fervour and depth of perception: and such are really its characteristics, but not to so large an extent as might have been the case had Ambrose — whose style of writing is as musical as that of Hilary is stiff and angular — worked

* The following Greek expositors of the Psalms are mentioned there: 1) Origen, 2) Eusebius of Cæsarea, 3) Theodore of Heraclea (the Anonymus in Corderius' Catena), 4) Asterius of Scythopolis, 5) Apollinaris (Apolinarius) of Laodicea, 6) Didymus of Alexandria. Then the following Latin expositors: 1) Hilary of Poitiers, who translated or rather remodelled Origen's Homilies on the Psalms (Jerome himself says of him, Ep. lvii ad Pammach.: captivos sensus in suam linguam victoris jure transposuit), 2) Eusebius of Vercelli, translator of the commentary of Eusebius of Cæsarea, and 3) Ambrose, who was partly dependent upon Origen. Of Apollinaris the elder, we have a Μετάφρασις τοῦ ψαλτῆρος διὰ στίχων ἡρωϊκῶν preserved to us. He has also translated the Pentateuch and other Old Testament books into heroic verse.

The most comprehensive work of the early church on the Psalms was that of Chrysostom, which was probably written while at Antioch. We possess only the exposition of 58 Ps. or (including Ps. iii and xli, which in their present form do not belong to this work) 60 Ps. (in t. v of Montfaucon's edition). Photius and Suidas place this commentary on the Psalms in the highest rank among the works of Chrysostom. It is composed in the form of sermons, the style is brilliant, and the contents more ethical than dogmatic. Sometimes the Hebrew text according to the Hexapla is quoted, and the Greek versions which depart from the original are frequently compared, but, unfortunately, generally without any name. There is hardly any trace in it of the renowned philologico-historical tendency of the school of Antioch. Theodoret (in t. ii p. ii of the Halle edition) was the first to set before himself the middle course between an extravagant allegorising and an unspiritual adherence to the literal historical sense (by which he doubtless has reference to Theodore of Mopsuestia), and thus to a certain extent he makes a beginning in distinguishing between the province of exegesis and practical application. But this scientific commencement, with even more of the grammatico-historical tendency, is still defective and wanting in independence. For example, the question whether all the Psalms are by David or not, is briefly decided in the affirmative, with $\kappa\rho\alpha\tau\iota\zeta\iota\tau\omega\ \tau\acute{\omega}\nu\ \pi\lambda\epsilon\iota\sigma\tau\omega\sigma\tau\omega\ \eta\ \psi\acute{\alpha}\lambda\mu\omicron\varsigma$.* The designed, minute comparison of the Greek translators is most thankworthy; in other respects, this expositor, like the Syrians generally, is wanting in the mystic depth which might compensate for the want of scientific insight. All this may be also said of Euthymius Zigadenus (Zigabenus): his commentary on the

* In the Talmud R. Meir, Pesachim 117 a, adopts the view that David is the author of all the Ps.: כל השבחים שבכפר תהלים כולן דוד אמרן, while in Bathra 14 b ten authors are supposed: דוד כהן ספר תהלים על ידי ערשה וקניה, vid. on this, Midrash to Cant. iv. 4 and Eccl. vii. 19. In the former passage להלפיות is explained as an emblematic name of the Psalter: ספר שאמרוהו לו פיות הרבה, the book of David, to which the mouths of many have contributed. And there are two modern commentaries, viz. by Klauss, 1832, and Randegger, 1841, which are written with the design of proving all the Psalms to be Davidic.

Psalms (in Greek in t. iv of the Venetian edition of the Opp. Theophylacti), written at the desire of the emperor Alexius Comnenus, is nothing but a skilful compilation, in the preparation of which he made good use of the Psalm-catena, likewise a compilation, of the somewhat earlier Νικήτας Σερρών*, which is to be found on Mount Athos and is still unprinted.

The Western counterpart to Chrysostom's commentary are Augustine's Enarrationes in Psalmos (in t. iv of the Benedictine edition). The psalm-singing in the Milanese church had contributed greatly to Augustine's conversion. But his love to his Lord was fired still more by the reading of the Psalms when he was preparing himself in solitude for his baptism. His commentary consists of sermons which he wrote down in part himself and in part dictated. Only the thirty-two sermones on Ps. cxviii (cxix), which he ventured upon last of all, were not actually delivered. He does not adopt the text of Jerome as his basis, but makes use of the older Latin version, the original text of which he sought to establish, and here and there to correct, by the LXX; whereas Arnobius, the Semi-Pelagian, in his paraphrastic Africano-Latin commentary on the Psalms (first edition by Erasmus, Basileæ, Froben. 1522, who, as also Trithemius, erroneously regarded the author as one and the same with the Apologist) no longer uses the so-called Itala, but takes Jerome's translation as his basis. The work of Augustine far surpassing that of Chrysostom in richness and depth of thought, has become, in the Western church, the chief mine of all later exposition of the Psalms. Cassiodorus in his Expositiones in omnes Psalmos (in t. ii of the Bened. ed.) draws largely from Augustine, though not devoid of independence.

What the Greek church has done for the exposition of the Psalms has been garnered up many times since Photius in so-called Σεραί, Catenæ. That of Nicetas archbishop of Serra in Macedonia (about 1070), is still unprinted. One, extending only to Ps. 1, appeared at Venice 1569, and a complete one, edited by Corderius, at Antwerp 1643 (3 vols., from Vienna and Munich MSS.). Folckmann (1601) made extracts from the Catena of Nicetas Heracleota, and Aloysius Lippomanus began a Catena from Greek and Latin writers on the largest scale (one folio vol. on Ps. i—x, Romæ 1585). The defects to be found in the ancient exposition of the Psalms are in general the same in the Greek and in the Western expositors. To their want of acquaintance with the text of the original was added their unmethodical, irregular mode of procedure, their arbitrary straining of the prophetic character of the Psalms (as e. g. Tertullian, De spectaculis, takes the whole of Ps. i as a prophecy concerning Joseph of Arimathea), their unhistorical perception, before which all differences between the two Testaments vanish, and their misleading predilection for the allegorical method. In all this, the meaning of the Psalms, as understood by the apostles, remains unused; they appropriate it without rightly apprehending it, and do not place the Psalms in the light of the New Testament fulfilment of them, but at once turn them into New Testament language and thoughts. But the church has never found such rapturous delight in the Psalms, which it was never weary of singing day and night, never used them with richer results even to martyrdom, than at that period. Instead of profane popular songs, as one passed through the country one might hear psalms resounding over the fields and vineyards. Quocunque te verteris, writes Jerome to the widow of Marcellus from the Holy Land, arator stivam tenens Alleluja decantat, sudans messor psalmis se avocet et curva attendens vitem falce vinitor aliquid Davidicum canit. Hæc sunt in hac provincia carmina, hæ (ut vulgo dicitur) amatorix cantiones, hic pastorum sibilus, hæc arma culturæ. The delights of country life he commends to Marcella in the following among other words: Vere ager floribus pingitur et inter querulas aves Psalmi dulcius cantabuntur. In Sidonius Apollinaris we find even psalm-singing in the mouth of the men who tow the boats, and the poet takes from this a beautiful admonition for Christians in their voyage and journey through this life:

*Curvorum hinc chorus helciariorum
 Responsantibus Alleluja ripis
 Ad Christum levat amicum celeusmæ.
 Sic, sic psallite, nauta et viator!*

And how many martyrs have endured every form of martyrdom with psalms upon their lips! That which the church in those days failed to furnish in writing towards the exposition of the Psalms, it more than compensated for by preserving the vitality of the Psalms with its blood. Practice made far more rapid progress than theory.* These patristic works are patterns for every age of the true fervour which should characterise the expositor of the Psalms.

The mediæval church exposition did not make any essential advance upon the patristic. After Cassiodorus, came Haymo (d. 853) and Remigius of Auxerre (d. about 900), still less independent compilers; the commentary of the former, edited by Erasmus, appeared Trib. 1531, of the latter, first Colon. 1536, and then in the Bibl. maxima Lugdunensis. That of Petrus Lombardus (d. about 1160) is a catena taken directly from earlier expositors from Jerome to Alcuin. Of a more independent character are the commentaries of Thomas Aquinas, who however only completed 51 Ps., and Alexander of Hales, if the Commentary which appeared under his name (Venet. 1496) is not rather to be attributed to cardinal Hugo. Besides these, Bonaventura (d. 1274) and Albertus Magnus (d. 1280) stand out prominently in the Middle Ages as expositors of the Psalms; and on the border of the Middle Ages Michael Aygvanus (about 1400) whose commentary has been frequently reprinted since its first appearance, Mediol. 1510. If you know one of these expositors, you know them all. The most that they have to offer us is an echo of the earlier writers. By their dependence on the letter of the Vulgate, and consequently indirectly of the LXX, they only too frequently light upon a false track and miss the meaning. The literalis sensus is completely buried in mysticæ intelligentiæ. Without observing the distinction between the two economies, the conversion of the Psalms into New Testament language and thought, regardless of the intermediate steps of development, is here continued. Thus, for example, Albertus Magnus in his commentary (Opp. t. vii), on the principle: Constat, quod totus liber iste de Christo, at once expounds Beatus vir (Ps. i. 1), and the whole Ps., de Christo et ejus corpore ecclesia. But as we find in the Fathers occasional instances of deep insight into the meaning of passages, and occasional flashes of thought of lasting value, so even here the reading, especially of the mystics, will repay one. — The greatest authority in psalm-exposition for the Middle Ages was Augustine. From Augustine, and perhaps we may add from Cassiodorus, Notker Labeo (d. 1022), the monk of St. Gall, drew the short annotations which, verse by verse, accompany his German translation of the Psalms (vol. ii of H. Hattemer's Denkmahle des Mittelalters). In like manner the Latin Psalter-catena of bishop Bruno of Würzburg (d. 1045), mentioned above, is compiled from Augustine and Cassiodorus, but also from Jerome, Bede and Gregory. And the Syriac annotations to the Psalms of Gregory Barhebræus (d. 1286), — of which Tullberg and Koraen, Upsala 1842, and Schröter, Breslau 1857, have published specimens, — are merely of importance in connection with the history of exposition, and are moreover in no way distinguished from the mediæval method.

The mediæval synagogue exposition is wanting in the recognition of Christ, and consequently in the fundamental condition required for a spiritual understanding of the Psalms. But as we are indebted to the Jews for the transmission of the codex of the Old Testament, we also owe the transmission of the knowledge of Hebrew to them. So far the Jewish interpreters give us what the Christian interpreters of the same period were not able to tender. The interpretations of passages from the Psalms scattered up and down in the Talmud are mostly unsound, arbitrary, and strange. And the Midrash on the Ps., bearing the title שחר טוב (vid. Zunz, Vorträge, §. 266 ff.), and the Midrash-catenæ entitled ילקוט, of which at present only שמעוני ילקוט (by Simeon Kara ha-Darshan) is known, and ילקוט מהרי (by Machir b. Abba-Mari), contain far more that is limitlessly digressive than what is to the point and usable. This class of psalm-exposition was always employed for the thoroughly practical end of stimulating and edifying discourse. It is only since about 900 A. D., when indirectly under Syro-Arabian influence, the study of grammar began to be cultivated among the Jews, that the exposition and the application of Scripture began to be disentangled. At the head of this new era of Jewish exegesis stands Saadia Gaon (d. 941—2), from whose Arabic translation and annotations of the Ps. Haneberg (1840) and Ewald (1844) have published extracts. The Karaites, Salmon b. Jerocham and Jefeth, both of whom have also expounded the Psalms, are warm opponents of Saadia; but Jefeth whose commentary on the Psalms* has been in part made known by Bargès (since 1846), nevertheless already recognises the influence of grammar, which Saadia raised to the dignity of a science, but which Salmon utterly discards. The next great expositor of the Psalms is Rashi (i. e. Rabbi Salomo Isaaki) of Troyes (d. 1105), who has interpreted the whole of the Old Testament (except the Chronicles) and the whole of the Talmud; and he has not only treasured up with pithy brevity the traditional interpretations scattered about in the Talmud and Midrash, but also (especially in the Psalms) made use of every existing grammatico-lexical help. Aben-Ezra of Toledo (d. 1167) and David Kimchi of Narbonne (d. about 1250) are less dependent upon tradition, which for the most part expended itself upon strange interpretations. The former is the more independent and genial, but seldom happy in his characteristic fancies; the latter is less original, but gifted with a keener appreciation of that which is simple and natural, and of all the Jewish expositors he is the pre-eminently grammatico-historical interpreter. Gecatilia's (Mose ha-Cohen Chiquitilla) commentary on the Psalms written in Arabic is only known to us from quotations, principally in Aben-Ezra. In later commentaries, as those of Mose Alshêch (Venice 1601) and Joel Shoëb (Salonica 1569), the simplicity and elegance of the older expositors degenerates into the most repulsive scholasticism. The commentary of Obadia Sforno (d. at Bologna 1550), Reuchlin's teacher, is too much given to philosophising, but is at least withal clear and brief. Their knowledge of the Hebrew gives all these expositors a marked advantage over their Christian cotemporaries, but the veil of Moses over their eyes is thicker in proportion to their conscious opposition to Christianity. Nevertheless the church has not left these preparatory works unused. The Jewish Christians, Nicolaus de Lyra (d. about 1340), the author of the Postillæ perpetuæ, and Archbishop Paul de Santa Maria of Burgos (d. 1435), the author of the Additiones ad Lyram, took the lead in this respect. Independently, like the last mentioned writers, Augustinus Justinianus of Genoa, in his Octaplus Psalterii (Genoa, 1516, folio), drew chiefly from the Midrash and Sohar. The preference however was generally given to the use of Aben-Ezra and Kimchi; e. g. Bucer, who acknowledges his obligation to these, says: neque enim candidi ingenii est dissimulare, per quos profeceris. Justinianus, Pagninus, and Felix were the three highest authorities on the original text at the commencement of the Reformation. The first two had gained their knowledge of the original from Jewish sources and Felix Pratensis, whose Psalterium ex hebreo diligentissime ad verbum fere translatum, 1522, appeared under Leo X., was a proselyte.

We have now reached the threshold of the Reformation exposition. Psalmody in the reigning church had sunk to a lifeless form of service. The exposition of the Psalms lost itself in the dependency of compilation and the chaos of the schools. Et ipsa quamvis frigida tractatione Psalmorum — says Luther in his preface to Bugenhagen's Latin Psalter — aliquis tamen odor vitæ oblatu est plerisque bonæ mentis hominibus, et utcunque ex verbis illis etiam non intellectis semper aliquid consolationis et aurulæ senserunt e Psalmis pii, veluti ex roseto leniter spirantis. Now, however, when a new light dawned upon the church through the Reformation — the light of a grammatical and deeply spiritual understanding of Scripture, represented in Germany by Reuchlin and in France by Vatablus — then the rose-garden of the Psalter began to breathe forth its perfumes as with the renewed freshness of a May day; and born again from the Psalter, German hymns resounded from the shores of the Baltic to the foot of the Alps with all the fervour of a newly quickened first-love. "It is marvellous"—says the Spanish Carmelite Thomas à Jesu,—“how greatly the hymns of Luther helped forward the Lutheran cause. Not only the churches and schools echo with them, but even the private houses, the workshops, the markets, streets, and fields.” For converted into imperishable hymns (by Luther, Albinus, Franck, Gerhardt, Jonas, Musculus, Poliander, Ringwaldt, and many more) the ancient Psalms were transferred anew into the psalmody of the German as of the Scandinavian* Lutheran church. In the French church Clément Marot translated into verse 30 Ps., then 19 more (1541—43) and Theodore Beza added the rest (1562). Calvin introduced the Psalms in Marot’s version as early as 1542 into the service of the Geneva church, and the Psalms have since continued to be the favorite hymns of the Reformed church. Goudimel, the martyr of St. Bartholemew’s night and teacher of Palestrina, composed the melodies and chorales. The English Established church adopted the Psalms direct as they are, as a portion of its liturgy, the Congregational church followed the example of the sister-churches of the Continent. And how industriously the Psalter was moulded into Greek verse, as by Olympia Morata (d. 1555) and under the influence of Melanthon† into Latin! The paraphrases of Helius Eoban Hesse (of whom Martin Herz, 1860, has given a biographical sketch)††, Joh. Major, Jacob Micyllus (whose life Classen has written, 1859), Joh. Stigel (whose memory has been revived by Paulus Cassel 1860), Gre. Bersmann (d. 1611), and also that begun by Geo. Buchanan during his sojourn in a Portuguese monastery, are not only learned performances, but productions of an inward spiritual need; although one must assent to the judgment expressed by Harless, that the best attempts of this kind only satisfy one in proportion as we are able first of all to banish the remembrance of the original from our mind.

But since the time of the Reformation the exegetical functions of psalm-exposition have been more clearly apprehended and more happily discharged than ever before. In Luther, who opened his academical lectures in 1514 with the Ps. (in Latin in Luther's own hand writing in Wolfenbüttel) and began to publish a part of them in 1519 under the title Operationes in duas Psalmorum decades, the depth of experience of the Fathers is united to the Pauline recognition (which he gave back to the church) of the doctrine of free grace. It is true, he is not entirely free from the allegorising which he rejected in thesi, and, in general, from a departure a sensu literæ, and there is also still wanting in Luther the historical insight into the distinctive character of the two Testaments; but with respect to experimental, mystical, and withal sound, understanding he is incomparable. His interpretations of the Psalms, especially of the penitential Ps. and of Ps. xc, excel every thing hitherto produced, and are still a perpetual mine of wealth. Bugenhagen's exposition of the Psalms (Basel 1524, 4to. and freq.) continued the interrupted work of Luther, who in a brief but forcible preface says in its praise, that it is the first worthy of the name of an exposition. Penetration and delicacy of judgment distinguish the interpretation of the five books of the Psalms by Aretius Felinus i. e. Martin Bucer (1529, 4to. and freq.). The Autophyes (= a se et per se Existens), by which throughout he translates יְהוָה, gives it a remarkable appearance. But about the same time, as an exegete, Calvin came forward at the side of the German reformer. His commentary (first published at Geneva 1564) combines with great psychological penetration more discernment of the types and greater freedom of historical perception, but is not without many errors arising from this freedom. Calvin's strict historical method of interpretation becomes a caricature in Esrom Rüdinger, the schoolmaster of the Moravian brethren, who died at Altorf in 1591 without being able, as he had intended, to issue his commentary, which appeared in 1580—81, in a new and revised form. His is an original work which, after trying many conjectures, at last assigns even the first Psalm to the era of the Seleucidæ.

Within the range of the post-Reformation exposition the first that meets us is Reinhard Bakius, the persevering and talented pastor of Magdeburg and Grimma during the Thirty-years' war, whose Comm. exegetico-practicus on the Ps. (in the first edition by his son 1664) is a work of extensive reading and good sense, in many respects a welcome supplement to Luther, crammed full of all kinds of notable things about the Psalms, under which, however, the thread of simple exposition is lost. Martin Geier keeps the work of the exposition most distinctly before him, adhering more closely to it and restraining himself from digression. His lectures on the Psalms delivered at Leipzig extended over a period of eighteen years. Deep piety and extensive learning adorn his commentary (1668), but the free spirit of the men of the Reformation is no longer here. Geier is not capable of turning from dogmatics, and throwing himself into the exegesis: a traditional standard of exegesis had become fixed, to overstep which was accounted as heterodox. In the Reformed church Cocceius stands prominently forward (d. 1669). He was an original and gifted man, but starting from false principles of hermeneutics, too fond of an eschatological literalness of interpretation.

Not only the two Protestant churches, but also the Romish church took part in the advancing work of psalm-exposition. Its most prominent expositors from 1550—1650 are Genebrardus, Agellius, and De Muis, all of whom possessing a knowledge of the Semitic languages, go back to the original, and Bellarmin, who brings to the work not merely uncommon natural talents, but, within the limits of papistical restraint, a deep spiritual penetration. Later on psalm-exposition in the Romish church degenerated into scholasticism. This is at its height in Le Blanc's Psalmorum Davidicorum Analysis and in Joh. Lorinus' Commentaria in Psalmos (6 folio vols. 1665—1676). In the protestant churches, however, a lamentable decline from the spirit of the men of the Reformation in like manner manifested itself. The Annotationes uberiores in Hagiographa (t. i. 1745, 4to: Ps. and Prov.) of Joh. Heinrich Michaelis are a mass of raw materials:

the glossarial annotations groan beneath the burden of numberless unsifted examples and parallel passages. What had been done during the past sixteen hundred years remains almost entirely unnoticed; Luther is not explored, even Calvin within the pale of his own church no longer exerts any influence over the exposition of Scripture. After 1750, the exposition of Scripture lost that spiritual and ecclesiastical character which had gained strength in the seventeenth century, but had also gradually become torpid; whereas in the Romish church, as the Psalm-expositions of De Sacy, Berthier and La Harpe shew, it never sank so low as to deny the existence of revealed religion. That love for the Ps., which produced the evangelical hymn-psalter of that truly Christian poet and minister Christoph Karl Ludwig von Pfeil (1747),* prefaced by Bengel, degenerated to a merely literary, or at most poetical, interest, — exegesis became carnal and unspiritual. The remnant of what was spiritual in this age of decline, is represented by Burk in his Gnomon to the Ps. (1760) which follows the model of Bengel, and by Chr. A. Crusius in the second part of his Hypomnemata ad Theologiam Propheticam (1761), a work which follows the track newly opened up by Bengel, and is rich in germs of progressive knowledge (vid. my Biblisch-prophetische Theologie, 1845). We may see the character of the theology of that age from Joh. Dav. Michaelis' translation of the Old Testament, with notes for the unlearned (1771), and his writings on separate Psalms. From a linguistic and historical point of view we may find something of value here; but besides, only wordy, discursive, tasteless trifling and spiritual deadness. It has been the honour of Herder that he has freed psalm-exposition from this want of taste, and the merit of Hengstenberg (first of all in his Lectures), that he has brought it back out of this want of spirituality to the believing consciousness of the church.

The transition to modern exposition is marked by Rosenmüller's Scholia to the Ps. (first published in 1798—1804), a compilation written in pure clear language with exegetical tact and with a thankworthy use of older expositors who had become unknown, as Rüdinger, Bucer, and Agellius, and also of Jewish writers. De Wette's commentary on the Psalms (first published in 1811, 5th edition by Gustav Baur, 1856) was far more independent and forms an epoch in exegesis. De Wette is precise and clear, and also not without a perception of the beautiful; but his position in relation to the Scripture writers is too much like that of a reviewer, his research too sceptical, and his estimate of the Ps. does not sufficiently recognise their place in the history of redemption. He regards them as national hymns, partly in the most ordinary patriotic sense, and when his theological perception fails him, he helps himself out with sarcasm against the theocratic element, which he carries to the extreme of disgust. Nevertheless, De Wette's commentary opens up a new epoch so far as it has first of all set in order the hitherto existing chaos of psalm-exposition, and introduced into it taste and grammatical accuracy, after the example of Herder and under the influence of Gesenius. He is far more independent than Rosenmüller, who though not wanting in taste and tact, is only a compiler. In investigating the historical circumstances which gave rise to the composition of the different psalms, De Wette is more negative than assumptive. Hitzig in his historical and critical commentary (1835. 36), which has appeared recently in a revised form (Bd. 1, 1863, Bd. 2. Abth. 1, 1864, Abth. 2, 1865), has sought to supplement positively the negative criticism of De Wette, by ascribing to David fourteen Ps. of the seventy three that bear the inscription לְדָוִד, assigning all the Ps. from the lxxiii onwards, together with i. ii. lx (these three, as also cxlii—cxliv, cl, by Alexander Jannæus) to the Maccabean period (e. g. cxxxviii—cxli to Alexander's father, John Hyrcanus), and also inferring the authors (Zechariah, 2 Chron. xxvi. 5; Isaiah, Jeremiah) or at least the date of composition of all the rest.

Von Lengerke, in his commentary compiled half from Hengstenberg, half from Hitzig (1847), has attached himself to this so-called positive criticism, which always arrives at positive results and regards Maccabean psalms as the primary stock of the Psalter. Von Lengerke maintains that not a single Ps. can with certainty be ascribed to David. Olshausen (in his Comment. 1853), who only leaves a few Ps., as ii. xx. xxi, to the time of the kings prior to the Exile, and with a propensity, which he is not able to resist, brings down all the others to the time of the Maccabees, even to the beginning of the reign of John Hyrcanus, also belongs to the positive school. Whereas Hupfeld in his commentary, 1855—1862 (4 vols.), considers it unworthy of earnest investigation, to lower one's self to such "childish trifling with hypotheses" and remains true to De Wette's negative criticism: but he seeks to carry it out in a different way. He also maintains that none of the Ps. admit of being with certainty ascribed to David; and proceeds on the assumption, that although only a part of the inscriptions are false, for that very reason none of them can be used by us.

We stand neither on the side of this scepticism, which everywhere negatives tradition, nor on the side of that self-confidence, which mostly negatives it and places in opposition to it its own positive counter-assumptions; but we do not on this account fail to recognise the great merit which Olshausen, Hupfeld and Hitzig have acquired by their expositions of the Psalms. In Olshausen we prize his prominent talent for critical conjectures; in Hupfeld grammatical thoroughness, and solid study so far as it is carried; in Hitzig the stimulating originality everywhere manifest, his happy perspicacity in tracing out the connection of the thoughts, and the marvellous amount of reading which is displayed in support of the usage of language and of that which is admissible according to syntax. The commentary of Ewald (Poetische Bücher, 1839, 40. 2nd edition 1866), apart from the introductory portion, according to its plan only fragmentarily meets the requirements of exposition, but in the argument which precedes each Ps. gives evidence of a special gift for perceiving the emotions and throbbings of the heart and entering into the changes of feeling.

None of these expositors are in truly spiritual rapport with the spirit of the psalmists. The much abused commentary of Hengstenberg 1842—1847 (4 vols. 2nd edition 1849—1852) consequently opened a new track, in as much as it primarily set the exposition of the Psalms in its right relation to the church once more, and was not confined to the historico-grammatical function of exposition. The kindred spirited works of Umbreit (Christliche Erbauung aus dem Psalter 1835) and Stier (Siebenzig Psalmen 1834.36), which extend only to a selection from the Psalms, may be regarded as its forerunners, and the commentary of Tholuck (1847) who excludes verbal criticism and seeks to present the results of exegetical progress in a practical form for the use of the people, as its counterpart. For the sake of completeness we may also mention the commentary of Köster (1837) which has become of importance for its appreciation of the artistic form of the Psalms, especially the strophe-system, and Vaihinger's (1845). Out of Germany, no work on the Psalms has appeared which could be placed side by side with those of Hengstenberg, Hupfeld and Hitzig. And yet the inexhaustible task demands the combined work of many hands. Would that the examples set by Björk, by Perret-Gentil, Armand de Mestral and J. F. Thrupp, of noble rivalry with German scholarship might find many imitators in the countries of the Scandinavian, Latin, and English tongues! Would that the zealous industry of Bade and Reinke, the noble endeavours of Schegg and König, might set an example to many in the Romish church! Would that also the Greek church on the basis of the criticism of the LXX defended by Pharmakides against Oikonomos, far surpassing the works on the Ps. of Nicodimos and Anthimos, which are drawn from the Fathers, might continue in that rival connection with German scholarship of which the Prolegomena to the Psalm-commentary of the Jerusalem patriarch Anthimos, by Dionysios Kleopas (Jerusalem 1855. 4to.) give evidence! Non plus ultra is the watchword of the church with regard to the word of God, and plus ultra is its watchword with regard to the understanding of that word. Common work upon the Scriptures is the finest union of the severed churches and the surest harbinger of their future unity. The exposition of Scripture will rear the Church of the Future.

X. THEOLOGICAL PRELIMINARY CONSIDERATIONS.

The expositor of the Psalms can place himself on the standpoint of the poet, or the standpoint of the Old Testament church, or the standpoint of the church of the present dispensation — a primary condition of exegetical progress is the keeping of these three standpoints distinct, and, in accordance therewith, the distinguishing between the two

Testaments, and in general, between the different steps in the development of the revelation, and in the perception of the plan, of redemption. For as redemption itself has a progressive history, so has the revelation and growing perception of it a progressive history also, which extends from paradise, through time, on into eternity. Redemption realizes itself in a system of facts, in which the divine purpose of love for the deliverance of sinful humanity unfolds itself, and the revelation of salvation is given in advance of this gradually developing course of events in order to guarantee its divine authorship and as a means by which it may be rightly understood. In the Psalms we have five centuries and more of this progressive realizing, disclosing, and perception of salvation laid open before us. If we add to this the fact that one psalm is by Moses, and that the retrospective portions of the historical psalms refer back even to the patriarchal age, then, from the call of Abraham down to the restoration of Israel's position among the nations after the Exile, there is scarcely a single event of importance in sacred history which does not find some expression in the Psalter. And it is not merely facts external to it, which echo therein in lyric strains, but, because David, — next to Abraham undoubtedly the most significant character of sacred history in the Old Testament, — is its chief composer, it is itself a direct integral part of the history of redemption. And it is also a source of information for the history of the revelation of redemption, in as much as it flowed not from the Spirit of faith merely, but mainly also from the Spirit of prophecy: but, pre-eminently, it is the most important memorial of the progressive recognition of the plan of salvation, since it shews how, between the giving of the Law from Sinai and the proclamation of the Gospel from Sion, the final, great salvation was heralded in the consciousness and life of the Jewish church.

We will consider 1) the relation of the Psalms to the prophecy of the future Christ. When man whom God had created, had corrupted himself by sin, God did not leave him to that doom of wrath which he had chosen for himself, but visited him on the evening of that most unfortunate of all days, in order to make that doom the disciplinary medium of His love. This visitation of Jahve Elohim was the first step in the history of redemption towards the goal of the incarnation, and the so-called protevangelium was the first laying of the foundation of His verbal revelation of law and gospel — a revelation in accordance with the plan of salvation, and preparing the way towards this goal of the incarnation and the recovery of man. The way of this salvation, which opens up its own historical course, and at the same time announces itself in a form adapted to the human consciousness, runs all through Israel, and the Psalms shew us how this seed-corn of words and acts of divine love has expanded with a vital energy in the believing hearts of Israel. They bear the impress of the period, during which the preparation of the way of salvation was centred in Israel and the hope of redemption was a national hope. For after mankind was separated into different nations, salvation was confined within the limits of a chosen nation, that it might mature there, and then bursting its bounds become the property of the human race. At that period the promise of the future Mediator was in its third stage. The hope of overcoming the tendency in mankind to be led astray into evil was attached to the seed of the woman, and the hope of a blessing for all peoples, to the seed of Abraham: but, at this period, when David became the creator of psalm-poetry for the sanctuary service, the promise had assumed a Messianic character and pointed the hope of the believing ones towards the king of Israel, and in fact to David and his seed: the salvation and glory of Israel first, and indirectly of the nations, was looked for from the mediatorship of Jahve's Anointed.

The fact that among all the Davidic psalms there is only a single one, viz. Ps. cx, in which David (as in his last words 2 Sam. xxiii. 1—7) looks forth into the future of his seed and has the Messiah definitely before his mind, can only be explained by the consideration, that he was hitherto himself the object of Messianic hope, and that this hope was first gradually (especially in consequence of his deep fall) separated from himself individually, and transferred to the future. Therefore when Solomon came to the throne the Messianic desires and hopes of Israel were directed towards him, as Ps. lxxii shews; they belonged only to the one final Christ of God, but they clung for a long time enquiringly and with a perfect right (on the ground of 2 Sam. vii) to the direct son of David. Also in Ps. xlv it is a son of David, cotemporary with the Korahite singer, to whom the Messianic promise is applied as a marriage benediction, wishing that the promise may be realized in him.

But it soon became evident that He, in whom the full realization of the idea of the Messiah is to be found, had not yet appeared either in the person of this king or of Solomon. And when in the later time of the kings the Davidic line became more and more inconsistent with its vocation in the sacred history, then the hope of the Messiah was completely weaned of its expectation of immediate fulfilment, and the present became merely the dark ground from which the image of the Messiah, as purely future, stood forth in relief. The בן-דוד, in whom the prophecy of the later time of the kings centres, and whom also Ps. ii sets forth before the kings of the earth that they may render homage to Him, is an eschatological character (although the אחרית was looked for as dawning close upon the border of the present). In the mouth of the congregation Ps. xlv and cxxxii, since their contents referred to the future, have become too prophetically and eschatologically Messianic. But it is remarkable that the number of these psalms which are not merely typically Messianic is so small, and that the church of the period after the Exile has not enriched the Psalter with a single psalm that is Messianic in the stricter sense. In the later portion of the Psalter, in distinction from the strictly Messianic psalms, the theocratic psalms are more numerous represented, i. e. those psalms which do not speak of the kingdom of Jahve's Anointed which shall conquer and bless the world, not of the Christocracy, in which the theocracy reaches the pinnacle of its representation, but of the theocracy as such, which is complete inwardly and outwardly in its own representation of itself, — not of the advent of a human king, but of Jahve Himself, with the kingdom of God manifest in all its glory. For the announcement of salvation in the Old Testament runs on in two parallel lines: the one has as its termination the Anointed of Jahve, who rules all nations out of Zion, the other, the LORD Himself sitting above the Cherubim, to whom all the earth does homage. These two lines do not meet in the Old Testament; it is only the fulfilment that makes it plain, that the advent of the Anointed one and the advent of Jahve is one and the same. And of these two lines the divine is the one that preponderates in the Psalter; the hope of Israel, especially after the kingship had ceased in Israel, is directed generally beyond the human mediation directly towards Jahve, the Author of salvation. The fundamental article of the Old Testament faith runs ישועה ליהוה (Ps. iii. 9, Jon. ii. 10). The Messiah is not yet recognised as a God-man. Consequently the Psalms contain neither prayer to Him, nor prayer in His name. But prayer to Jahve and for Jahve's sake is essentially the same. For Jesus is in Jahve. Jahve is the Saviour. And the Saviour when he shall appear, is nothing but the visible manifestation of the ישועה of this God (Isa. xlix. 6).

In considering the goal of the Old Testament history in its relation to the God-man, we distinguish five classes of psalms which are directed towards this goal. After 2 Sam. vii the Messianic promise is no longer in a general way connected with the tribe of Judah, but with David; and is referred not merely to the endless duration of his kingdom, but also to one scion of his house, in whom that to which God has appointed the seed of David in its relation to Israel first, and from Israel to all the other nations, shall be fully realised, and without whom the kingdom of David is like a headless trunk. Psalms in which the poet, looking beyond his own age, comforts himself with the vision of this king in whom the promise is finally fulfilled, we call eschatological psalms, and in fact directly eschatologically Messianic psalms. These connect themselves not merely with the already existing prophetic utterances, but carry them even further, and are only distinguished from prophecy proper by their lyric form; for prophecy is a discourse and the psalms are spiritual songs.

The Messianic character of the Psalms is, however, not confined to prophecy proper, the subject of which is that which is future. Just as nature exhibits a series of stages of life in which the lower order of existence points to the next order above it and indirectly to the highest, so that, for instance, in the globular form of a drop we read the intimation of the struggle after organism, as it were, in the simplest barest outline: so also the progress of history is typical, and not only as a whole, but also most surprisingly in single traits, the life of David is a vaticinium reale of the life of Him, whom prophecy calls directly עֲבָדֵי יְהוָה Ezek. xxxiv. 23 sq. xxxvii. 24 sq. and מַלְכֶם Hos. iii. 5, Jer. xxx. 9, as the David who is, as it were, raised from the dead in a glorified form. Those psalms in which David himself (or even a poet throwing himself into David's position and mood) gives expression in lyric verse to prominent typical events and features of his life, we call typically Messianic psalms. This class, however, is not confined to those, of which David is directly or indirectly the subject, for the course of suffering of all the Old Testament saints, and especially of the prophets in their calling (vid. on xxxiv. 20 sq. and Ps. lxi), was to a certain extent a τύπος τοῦ μέλλοντος. All these psalms, not less than those of the first class, may be quoted in the New Testament with the words ἵνα πληρωθῆ, with this difference only, that in the former it is the prophetic word, in the latter the prophetic history, that is fulfilled. The older theologians, especially the Lutheran, contended against the supposition of such typological citations of the Old Testament in the New: they were destitute of that perception of the organic element in history granted to our age, and consequently were lacking in the true counterpoise to their rigid notions of inspiration.

But there is also a class of Psalms which we call typico-prophetically Messianic, viz. those in which David, describing his outward and inward experiences, — experiences even in themselves typical, — is carried beyond the limits of his individuality and present condition, and utters concerning himself that which, transcending human experience, is intended to become historically true only in Christ. Such psalms are typical, in as much as their contents is grounded in the individual, but typical, history of David; they are, however, at the same time prophetic, in as much as they express present individual experience in laments, hopes, and descriptions which point far forward beyond the present and are only fully realised in Christ. The psychological possibility of such psalms has been called in question; but they would only be psychologically impossible, if one were obliged to suppose that David's self-consciousness must under such circumstances pass over into that of his antitype; but it is in reality quite otherwise. As the poet in order to describe his experiences in verse, idealises them, i. e. seizes the idea of them at the very root, and, stripping off all that is adventitious and insignificant, rises into the region of the ideal: so David also in these psalms idealises his experiences, which even in itself results in the reduction of them to all that is essential to their continuance as types. This he does, however, not from his own poetic impulse, but under the inspiration of the Spirit of God; and a still further result which follows from this is, that the description of his typical fortunes and their corresponding states of feeling is moulded into the prophetic description of the fortunes and feelings of his antitype.

Beside these three classes of Messianic psalms one may regard psalms like xlv and lxxii as a fourth class of indirectly eschatologically Messianic psalms. They are those in which, according to the time of their composition, Messianic hopes are referred to a cotemporary king, but without having been fulfilled in him; so that, in the mouth of the church, still expecting their final accomplishment, these psalms have become eschatological hymns and their exposition as such, by the side of their chronological interpretation, is fully warranted.

A fifth class is formed by the eschatologically Jehovic psalms, which are taken up with describing the advent of Jahve and the consummation of His kingdom, which is all through brought about by judgment (vid. Ps. xciii). The number of these psalms in the Psalter greatly preponderates. They contain the other premiss to the divine-human end of the history of salvation. There are sudden flashes of light thrown upon this end in the prophets. But it remains reserved to the history itself to draw the inference of the unio personalis from these human and divine premises. The Redeemer, in whom the Old Testament faith reposed, is Jahve. The centre of the hope lay in the divine not in the human king. That the Redeemer, when He should appear, would be God and man in one person was alien to the mind of the Old Testament church. And the perception of the fact that He would be sacrifice and priest in one person, only penetrates in single rays into the Old Testament darkness, the cynosure of which is יהוה, and יהוה only.

Coming now to consider 2) the relation of the Psalms to the legal sacrifice, we shall find this also different from what we might expect from the stand-point of fulfilment. Passages certainly are not wanting where the outward legal sacrifice is acknowledged as an act of worship on the part of the individual and of the congregation (lxvi. 15, li. 21); but those occur more frequently, in which in comparison with the λογική λατρεία it is so lightly esteemed, that without respect to its divine institution it appears as something not at all desired by God, as a shell to be cast away, and as a form to be broken in pieces (xl. 7 sq. l. li. 18 sq.). But it is not this that surprises us. It is just in this respect that the psalms contribute their share towards the progress of sacred history. It is that process of spiritualisation which begins even in Deuteronomy, and which is continued by reason of the memorable words of Samuel, 1 Sam. xv. 22 sq. It is the spirit of the New Testament, growing more and more in strength, which here and in other parts of the Psalter shakes the legal barriers and casts off the στοιχεῖα τοῦ νόμου as a butterfly does its chrysalis shell. But what is substituted for the sacrifice thus criticised and rejected? Contrition, prayer, thanksgiving, yielding one's self to God in the doing of His will, as Prov. xxi. 3 to do justly, Hos. vi. 6 kindness, Mic. vi. 6—8 acting justly, love, and humility, Jer. vii. 21—23 obedience. This it is that surprises one. The disparaged sacrifice is regarded only as a symbol not as a type; it is only considered in its ethical character, not in its relation to the history of redemption. Its nature is unfolded only so far as it is a gift to God (קרִבֵּן), not so far as the offering is appointed for atonement (כִּפּוּרִים); in one word: the mystery of the blood remains undisclosed. Where the New Testament mind is obliged to think of the sprinkling with the blood of Jesus Christ, it is, in Ps. li. 9, the sprinkling of the legal ritual of purification and atonement that is mentioned, and that manifestly figuratively but yet without the significance of the figure. Whence is it? — Because the sacrifice with blood, as such, in the Old Testament remains a question to which Isaiah, in ch. liii, gives almost the only distinct answer in accordance with its historical fulfilment; for passages like Dan. ix. 24 sqq. Zech. xii. 10, xiii. 7 are themselves questionable and enigmatical. The prophetic representation of the passion and sacrifice of Christ is only given in direct prophetic language thus late on, and it is only the evangelic history of the fulfilment that shews, how exactly the Spirit which spoke by David has moulded that which he says concerning himself, the type, into correspondence with the antitype. The confidence of faith under the Old Testament, as it finds expression in the Psalms, rested upon Jahve even in reference to the atonement, as in reference to redemption in general. As He is the Saviour, so is He also the one who makes the atonement (מכפר), from whom expiation is earnestly sought and hoped for (lxxix. 9, lxxv. 4, lxxviii. 38, lxxxv. 3 and other passages). It is Jahve who at the end of His course of the redemptive history is the God-man, and the blood given by Him as the medium of atonement (Lev. xvii. 11) is, in the antitype, His own blood.

Advancing from this point, we come to examine 3) the relation of the Psalms to the New Testament righteousness of faith and to the New Testament morality which flows from the primary command of infinite love. Both with respect to the atonement and to redemption the Psalms undergo a complete metamorphosis in the consciousness of the praying New Testament church—a metamorphosis, rendered possible by the unveiling and particularising of salvation that has since taken place, and to which they can without any reserve be accommodated. There are only two points in which the prayers of the Psalms appear to be difficult of amalgamation with the Christian consciousness. These are the moral self-confidence bordering on self-righteousness, which is frequently maintained before God in the Psalms, and the warmth of feeling against enemies and persecutors which finds vent in fearful cursings. The self-righteousness here is a mere appearance; for the righteousness to which the psalmists appeal is not the merit of works, not a sum of good works, which are reckoned up before God as claiming a reward, but a godly direction of the will and a godly form of life, which has its root in the surrender of one's whole self to God and regards itself as the operation and work of justifying, sanctifying, preserving and ruling grace (lxxiii. 25 sq. xxv. 5—7, xix. 14 and other passages). There is not wanting an acknowledgement of the innate sinfulness of our nature (li. 7), of the man's exposure to punishment before God apart from His grace (cxliii. 2), of the many, and for the most part unperceived, sins of the converted (xix. 13), of the forgiveness of sins as a fundamental condition to the attainment of happiness (xxxii. 1 sq.), of the necessity of a new divinely-created heart (li. 12), in short, of the way of salvation which consists of penitential contrition, pardon, and newness of life.

On the other hand it is not less true, that in the light of the vicarious atonement and of the Spirit of regeneration it becomes possible to form a far more penetrating and subtle moral judgment of one's self; it is not less true, that the tribulation, which the New Testament believer experiences, though it does not produce such a strong and overwhelming sense of divine wrath as that which is often expressed in the psalms, nevertheless sinks deeper into his inmost nature in the presence of the cross on Golgotha and of the heaven that is opened up to him, in as much as it appears to him to be sent by a love that chastens, proves, and prepares him for the future; and it is not less true, that after the righteousness of God — which takes over our unrighteousness and is accounted even in the Old Testament as a gift of grace — lies before us for believing appropriation as a righteousness redemptively wrought out by the active and passive obedience of Jesus, the distinctive as well as the reciprocally conditioned character of righteousness of faith and of righteousness of life is become a more clearly perceived fact of the inner life, and one which exercises a more powerful influence over the conduct of that life.* Nevertheless even such personal testimonies, as Ps. xvii. 1—5, do not

* cf. Kurtz, Zur Theologie der Psalmen, III: The self-righteousness of the psalmists, in the Dorpatser Zeitschrift 1865 S. 352—358: "The Old Testament righteousness of faith, represented by the evangelium visibile of the sacrificial worship, had not as yet the fundamental and primary, helpful position assigned to it, especially by Paul, in the New Testament."

resist conversion into New Testament forms of thought and experience, for they do not hinder the mind from thinking specially, at the same time, of righteousness of faith, of God's acts which are performed through the medium of sacraments, and of that life resulting from the new birth, which maintains itself victorious in the old man; moreover the Christian ought to be himself earnestly warned by them to examine himself whether his faith is really manifest as an energising power of a new life; and the difference between the two Testaments loses its harshness even here, in the presence of the great verities which condemn all moral infirmity, viz. that the church of Christ is a community of the holy, that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin, and that whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin.

But as to the so-called imprecatory psalms,* in the position occupied by the Christian and by the church towards the enemies of Christ, the desire for their removal is certainly outweighed by the desire for their conversion: but assuming, that they will not be converted and will not anticipate their punishment by penitence, the transition from a feeling of love to that of wrath is warranted in the New Testament (e. g. Gal. v. 12), and assuming their absolute Satanic hardness of heart the Christian even may not shrink from praying for their final overthrow. For the kingdom of God comes not only by the way of mercy but also of judgment; and the coming of the kingdom of God is the goal of the Old as well as of the New Testament saint (vid. ix. 21, lix. 14 and other passages), and every wish that judgment may descend upon those who oppose the coming of the kingdom of God is cherished even in the Psalms on the assumption of their lasting impenitence (vid. vii. 13 sq. cix. 17). Where, however, as in Ps. lix and cix, the imprecations go into particulars and extend to the descendents of the unfortunate one but only a more secondary position; justification is conceived not as a condition of the sanctification which is to be striven after, but as a supplementing of that which is wanting in the sanctification thus defectively striven after.

* cf. Kurtz, ibid. IV: The imprecatory Psalms, ibid. S. 359—372 and our discussions in the introductions to Ps. xxxv and cix, which belong to this class.

and even on to eternity, the only justification of them is this, that they flow from the prophetic spirit, and for the Christian they admit of no other adoption, except as, reiterating them, he gives the glory to the justice of God, and commends himself the more earnestly to His favour.

Also 4) the relation of the Psalms to the Last Things is such, that in order to be used as prayers expressive of the New Testament faith they require deepening and adjusting. For what Julius Africanus says of the Old Testament: οὐδέπω δέδοτο ἐλπὶς ἀναστάσεως σαφῆς, holds good at least of the time before Isaiah. For Isaiah is the first to foretell, in one of his latest apocalyptic cycles (ch. xxiv—xxvii), the first resurrection, i. e. the re-quickening of the martyr-church that has succumbed to death (ch. xxvi. 19), just as with an extended vision he foretells the termination of death itself (ch. xxv. 8); and the Book of Daniel — that Old Testament apocalypse, sealed until the time of its fulfilment — first foretells the general resurrection, i. e. the awakening of some to life and others to judgment (ch. xii. 2). Between these two prophecies comes Ezekiel's vision of Israel's return from the Exile under the figure of a creative quickening of a vast field of corpses (ch. xxxvii) — a figure which at least assumes that what is represented is not impossible to the wonder-working power of God, which is true to His promises. But also in the latest psalms the perception of salvation nowhere appears to have made such advance, that these words of prophecy foretelling the resurrection should have been converted into a dogmatic element of the church's belief. The hope, that the bones committed, like seed, to the ground would spring forth again, finds expression first only in a bold, but differently expressed figure (cxli. 7); the hopeless darkness of Sheôl (vi. 6, xxx. 10, lxxxviii. 11—13) remained unilluminated, and where deliverance from death and Hades is spoken of, what is meant is the preservation of the living, either experienced (e. g. lxxxvi. 13) or hoped for (e. g. cxviii. 17) from falling a prey to death and Hades, and we find in connection with it other passages which express the impossibility of escaping this universal final destiny (lxxxix. 49). The hope of eternal life after death is nowhere definitely expressed, as even in the Book of Job the longing for it is never able to expand into a hope, because no light of promise shines into that night, which reigns over Job's mind, — a night, which the conflict of temptation through which he is passing makes darker than it is in itself. The pearl which appears above the waves of temptation is only too quickly swallowed up again by them.

Also in the Psalms we find passages in which the hope of not falling a prey to death is expressed so broadly, that the thought of the final destiny of all men being inevitable is completely swallowed up by the living one's confidence of living in the strength of God (lvi. 14 and esp. xvi. 9—11); passages in which the covenant relation with Jahve is contrasted with this present life and its possession, in such a manner that the opposite of a life extending beyond the present time is implied (xvii. 14 sq., lxiii. 4); passages in which the end of the ungodly is compared with the end of the righteous as death and life, defeat and triumph (xlix. 15), so that the inference forces itself upon one, that the former die although they seem to live for ever, and the latter live for ever although they die at once; and passages in which the psalmist, though only by way of allusion, looks forward to a being borne away to God, like Enoch and Elijah (xlix. 16, lxxiii. 24). Nowhere, however, is there any general creed to be found, but we see how the belief in a future life struggles to be free, at first only, as an individual conclusion of the believing mind from premises which experience has established. And far from the grave being penetrated by a glimpse of heaven, it has, on the contrary, to the ecstasy of the life derived from God, as it were altogether vanished; for life in opposition to death only appears as the lengthening of the line of the present ad infinitum. Hence it is that we no more find in the Psalms than in the Book of Job a perfectly satisfactory theodicy with referenceto that distribution of human fortunes in this world, which is incompatible with God's justice. — Ps. vii. xlix. lxxiii. certainly border on the right solution of the mystery, but it stops short at mere hint and presage, so that the utterances that touch upon it admit of different interpretation.*

But on the other hand, death and life in the mind of the psalmists are such deep-rooted notions (i. e. taken hold of at the very roots, which are grounded in the principles of divine wrath and divine love), that it is easy for the New Testament faith, to which they have become clear even to their back ground of hell and heaven, to adjust and deepen the meaning of all utterances in the Psalms that refer to them. It is by no means contrary to the meaning of the psalmist when, as in passages like Ps. vi. 6, Gehenna is substituted for Hades to adapt it to the New Testament saint; for since the descent of Jesus Christ into Hades there is no longer any limbus patrum, the way of all who die in the Lord is not earthwards but upwards, Hades exists only as the vestibule of hell. The psalmists indeed dread it, but only as the realm of wrath or of seclusion from God's love, which is the true life of man. Nor is it contrary to the idea of the poets to think of the future vision of God's face in all its glory in Ps. xvii. 15 and of the resurrection morn in Ps. xlix. 15; for the hopes expressed there, though to the Old Testament consciousness they referred to this side the grave, are future according to their New Testament fulfilment, which is the only truly satisfying one. There is, as Oetinger says, no essential New Testament truth not contained in the Psalms either voí (according to its unfolded meaning), or at least πνεύματι. The Old Testament barrier encompasses the germinating New Testament life, which at a future time shall burst it. The eschatology of the Old Testament leaves a dark background, which, as is designed, is divided by the New Testament revelation into light and darkness, and is to be illumined into a wide perspective extending into the eternity beyond time. Everywhere, where it begins to dawn in this eschatological darkness of the Old Testament, it is the first morning rays of the New Testament sun-rise which is already announcing itself. The Christian also here cannot refrain from leaping the barrier of the psalmists, and understanding the Psalms according to the mind of the Spirit whose purpose in the midst of the development of salvation and of the perception of it, is directed towards its goal and consummation. Thus understood the Psalms are the hymns of the New Testament Israel as of the Old. The church by using the language of the Psalms in supplication celebrates the unity of the two Testaments, and scholarship in expounding them honours their distinctiveness. Both are in the right; the former in regarding the Psalms in the light of the one great salvation, the latter in carefully distinguishing the eras in the history, and the steps in the perception, of this salvation.

Ps. I.—XLI.

PSALM I.

THE RADICALLY DISTINCT LOT OF THE PIOUS AND THE UNGODLY.

- 1 BLESSED is the man who walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly,
And standeth not in the way of sinners,
And sitteth not in the company of scorners,
2 But his delight is in the Law of Jahve
And in His Law doth he meditate day and night —
3 And he is like a tree planted by the water-courses,
Which bringeth forth its fruit in its season,
And its leaf withereth not,
And whatsoever he doeth, he carrieth through.
4 Not thus are the ungodly,
But they are like the chaff which the wind driveth away.
5 Therefore the ungodly cannot stand in the judgment,
Nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous;
6 For Jahve knoweth the way of the righteous,
But the way of the ungodly perisheth.

The collection of the Psalms and that of the prophecies of Isaiah resemble one another in the fact, that the one begins with a discourse that bears no superscription, and the other with a Psalm of the same character; and these form the prologues to the two collections. From Acts xiii. 33, where the words: Thou art My Son . . . are quoted as being found ἐν τῷ πρώτῳ ψαλμῷ, we see that in early times Ps. i. was regarded as the prologue to the collection. The reading ἐν τῷ ψαλμῷ τῷ δευτέρῳ, rejected by Griesbach, is an old correction. But this way of numbering the Psalms is based upon tradition. A scholium from Origen and Eusebius says of Ps. i. and ii.: ἐν τῷ Ἑβραϊκῷ συνημμένοι, and just so Apollinaris:

Ἐπιγραφῆς ὁ ψαλμὸς εὐρέθη δίχῃ,
Ἠνωμένος δὲ τοῖς παρ' Ἑβραίοις στίχοις.

For it is an old Jewish way of looking at it, as Albertus Magnus observes: Psalmus primus incipit a beatitudine et terminatur a beatitudine, i. e. it begins with וְשָׂא i. 1 and ends with וְשָׂא ii. 12, so that consequently Ps. i. and ii., as is said in B. Berachoth 9*b* (cf. Jer. Taanith ii. 2), form one Psalm (חַדָּשָׁה פְּרָשָׁה). As regards the subject-matter this is certainly not so. It is true Ps. i. and ii. coincide in some respects (in the former יִהְיֶה, in the latter יִהְיֶה; in the former תִּבְרַךְ . . . תִּבְרַךְ, in the latter וְתִבְרַךְ; in the former וְשָׂא at the beginning, in the latter, at the end), but these coincidences of phraseology are not sufficient to justify the conclusion of unity of authorship (Hitz.), much less that the two Psalms are so intimately connected as to form one whole. These two anonymous hymns are only so far related, as that the one is adapted to form the proœmium of the Psalter from its ethical, the other from its prophetic character. The question, however, arises whether this was in the mind of the collector. Perhaps Ps. ii. is only attached to Ps. i. on account of those coincidences; Ps. i. being the proper prologue of the Psalter in its pentateuchal arrangement after the pattern of the Tóra. For the Psalter is the Yea and Amen in the form of hymns to the word of God given in the Tóra. Therefore it begins with a Psalm which contrasts the lot of him who loves the Tóra with the lot of the ungodly, — an echo of that exhortation, Josh. i. 8, in which, after the death of Moses, Jahve charges his successor Joshua to do all that is written in the book of the Tóra. As the New Testament sermon on the Mount, as a sermon on the spiritualized Law, begins with μακάριοι, so the Old Testament Psalter, directed entirely to the application of the Law to the inner life, begins with אֲשֶׁרִי. The First book of the Psalms begins with two אֲשֶׁרִי i. 1, ii. 12, and closes with two אֲשֶׁרִי xl. 5, xli. 2. A number of Psalms begin with אֲשֶׁרִי, Ps. xxxii. xli. cxii. cxix. cxxviii.; but we must not therefore suppose the existence of a special kind of ashrê-psalms; for, e. g., Ps. xxxii. is a מִשְׁבִּיל, Ps. cxii. a Hallelujah, Ps. cxxviii. a שִׁיר הַמַּעֲלוֹת.

As regards the time of the composition of the Psalm, we do not wish to lay any stress on the fact that 2 Chron. xxii. 5 sounds like an allusion to it. But 1st, it is earlier than the time of Jeremiah; for Jeremiah was acquainted with it. The words of curse and blessing, Jer. xvii. 5—8, are like an expository and embellished paraphrase of it. It is customary with Jeremiah to reproduce the prophecies of his predecessors, and more especially the words of the Psalms, in the flow of his discourse and to transform their style to his own. In the present instance the following circumstance also favours the priority of the Psalm: Jeremiah refers the curse corresponding to the blessing to Jehoiakim and thus applies the Psalm to the history of his own times. It is 2ndly, not earlier than the time of Solomon. For לְצִיִּם occurring only here in the whole Psalter, a word which came into use, for the unbelievers, in the time of the Chokma (vid. the definition of the word, Prov. xxi. 24), points us to the time of Solomon and onwards. But since it contains no indications of cotemporary history whatever, we give up the attempt to define more minutely the date of its composition, and say with St. Columba (against the reference of the Psalm to Joash the protegé of Jehoiada, which some incline to): *Non audiendi sunt hi, qui ad excludendam Psalmorum veram expositionem falsas similitudines ab historia petitas conantur inducere.**

Vers. 1—3. The exclamatory אֲשֶׁרִי, as also xxxii. 2, xl. 5, Prov. viii. 34, has Gaja (Metheg) by the Aleph, and in some to the second, דָּרַךְ mode of conduct, action, life; in reference to the third, מֵאֵשֶׁב which like the Arabic meġlis signifies both seat (Job xxix. 7) and assembling (cvii. 32), be it official or social (cf. xxvi. 4 sq., Jer. xv. 17). On דָּרַךְ, in an ethical sense, cf. Mic. vi. 16, Jer. vii. 24. Therefore: Blessed is he who does not walk in the state of mind which the ungodly cherish, much less that he should associate with the vicious life of sinners, or even delight in the company of those who scoff at religion. The description now continues with כִּי אֵי (imo si, Ges. § 155, 2, i): but (if) his delight is, — (substantival instead of the verbal clause:) he delights (רָפֵץ cf. حَفِض f. i. with the primary notion of firmly adhering, vid. on Job xl. 17) in חֻזְרַת ה', the teaching of Jahve, which is become Israel's νόμος, rule of life; in this he meditates profoundly by day and night (two acc. with the old accusative terminations am and ah). The perff. in ver. 1 describe what he all along has never done, the fut. יִהְיֶה, what he is always striving to do; הֶגְהָה of a deep (cf. هَجَّ depressum esse), dull sound, as if vibrating between within and without, here signifies the quiet soliloquy (cf. هَجَسَ missitando secum loqui) of one who is searching and thinking.

With יִהְיֶה,* in ver. 3, the development of the אֲשֶׁרִי now begins; it is the præt. consec.: he becomes in consequence of this, he is thereby, like a tree planted beside the water-courses, which yields its fruit at the proper season and its leaf does not fall off. In distinction from נִטְעַע, according to Jalkut § 614, שָׁחַל means firmly planted, so that no winds that may rage around it are able to remove it from its place (אין מזיזין אהו ממקומו). In פָּלְגֵי מַיִם, both מַיִם and the plur. serve to give intensity to the figure; פָּלַג (Arab. falġ, from פָּלַג to divide, Job xxxviii. 25) means the brook meandering and cleaving its course for itself through the soil and stones; the plur. denotes either one brook regarded from its abundance of water, or even several which from different directions supply the tree with nourishing and refreshing moisture. In the relative clause the whole emphasis does not rest on בְּעֵתוֹ (Calvin: impüi, licet præcoces fructus ostendent, nihil tamen producunt nisi abortivum), but פְּרִי is the first, בְּעֵתוֹ the second tone-word: the fruit which one expects from it, it yields (equivalent to יַעֲשֶׂה it produces, elsewhere), and that at its appointed, proper time (= בְּעֵתוֹ, for עַתָּה is = עֵתָּה or עֵתָּה, like רָדָה, לָרָה, from וָעַר), without ever disappointing that hope in the course of the recurring seasons. The clause וְעֵלְיוֹ לֹא יִבֹּל is the other half of the relative clause: and its foliage does not fall off or wither (נָבַל like the synon. דָּבַל, from the root כַּל).

The green foliage is an emblem of faith, which converts the water of life of the divine word into sap and strength, and the fruit, an emblem of works, which gradually ripen and scatter their blessings around; a tree that has lost its leaves, does not bring its fruit to maturity. It is only with וְכֵן, where the language becomes unemblematic, that the man who loves the Law of God again becomes the direct subject. The accentuation treats this member of the verse as the third member of the relative clause; one may, however, say of a thriving plant וְצִלָּהּ, but not הַצִּלָּהּ. This Hiph. (from צָלַח, صلح, to divide, press forward, press through, vid. xlv. 5) signifies both causative: to cause anything to go through, or prosper (Gen. xxxiv. 23), and transitive: to carry through, and intransitive: to succeed, prosper (Judg. xviii. 5). With the first meaning, Jahve would be the subject; with the third, the project of the righteous; with the middle one, the righteous man himself. This last is the most natural: everything he takes in hand he brings to a successful issue (an expression like 2 Chron. vii. 11, xxxi. 21, Dan. viii. 24). What a richly flowing brook is to the tree that is planted on its bank, such is the word of God to him who devotes himself to it: it makes him, according to his position and calling, ever fruitful in good and well-timed deeds and keeps him fresh in his inner and outward life, and whatsoever such an one undertakes, he brings to a successful issue, for the might of the word and of the blessing of God is in his actions.

Vers. 4—6. The ungodly (הרשעים), with the demonstrative art.) are the opposite of a tree planted by the water-courses: they are כַּמֵּץ, like chaff (from מוץ to press out), which the wind drives away, viz. from the loftily situated threshing-floor (Isa. xvii. 13), i. e. without root below, without fruit above, devoid of all the vigour and freshness of life, lying loose upon the threshing-floor and a prey of the slightest breeze, — thus utterly worthless and unstable. With עַל-כֵּן an inference is drawn from this moral characteristic of the ungodly: just on account of their inner worthlessness and instability they do not stand בְּמִשְׁפָּט. This is the word for the judgment of just recompense to which God brings each individual man and all without exception with all their works (Eccl. xii. 14), — His righteous government, which takes cognisance of the whole life of each individual and the history of nations and recompenses according to desert. In this judgment the ungodly cannot stand (קִים to continue to stand, like עָמַד cxxx. 3 to keep one's self erect), nor sinners בְּעֵצַת צְדִיקִים. The congregation (עֵדָה = 'idah, from יָעַד, יָעַד) of the righteous is the congregation of Jahve (עֵדָה ה'), which, according to its nature which is ordained and inwrought by God, is a congregation of the righteous, to which consequently the unrighteous belong only outwardly and visibly: οὐ γὰρ πάντες οἱ ἐξ Ἰσραήλ, οὗτοι Ἰσραήλ, Rom. ix. 6. God's judgment, when and wheresoever he may hold it, shall trace back this appearance to its nothingness. When the time of the divine decision shall come, which also separates outwardly that which is now inwardly separate, viz. righteous and unrighteous, wheat and chaff, then shall the unrighteous be driven away like chaff before the storm, and their temporary prosperity, which had no divine roots, come to a fearful end. For Jahve knoweth the way of the righteous, יָדַע as in xxxvii. 18, Mat. vii. 23, 2 Tim. ii. 19, and frequently. What is intended is, as the schoolmen say, a nosse con affectu et effectu, a knowledge which is in living, intimate relationship to its subject and at the same time is inclined to it and bound to it by love. The way, i. e. the life's course, of the righteous has God as its goal; God knows this way, which on this very account also unflinchingly reaches its goal. On the contrary, the way of the ungodly רַאֲבָר, perishes, because left to itself, — goes down to אֲבָרָן, loses itself, without reaching the goal set before it, in darkest night. The way of the righteous only is דִּרְךָ עֲלֵם, cxxxix. 24, a way that ends in eternal life. Ps. cxii. which begins with אֲשֶׁרִי ends with the same fearful רַאֲבָר.

PSALM II.

THE KINGDOM OF GOD AND OF HIS CHRIST, TO WHICH EVERYTHING MUST BOW.

- 1 WHY do the people rage,
And the nations imagine a vain thing?!
- 2 The kings of the earth rise in rebellion,
And the rulers take counsel together —
Against Jahve and against His Anointed.
- 3 "Up! let us burst their bands asunder,
And cast away their cords from us!"
- 4 He who is enthroned in the heavens laughs,
The Lord hath them in derision.
- 5 Then shall He speak to them in His wrath,
And thunder them down in His hot displeasure:
- 6 "— And yet have I set My King Upon Zion, My holy hill."

(The Divine King:)

- 7 "I will speak concerning a decree!
Jahve saith unto me: Thou art My Son,
This day have I begotten Thee.
- 8 Demand of Me, and I will give Thee the nations for Thine inheritance,
And the ends of the earth for Thy possession.
- 9 Thou shalt break them with an iron sceptre,
Like a potter's vessel shalt Thou dash them in pieces."

- 10 And now, O ye kings, be wise,
 Be admonished, ye judges of the earth!
- 11 Serve Jahve with fear,
 And rejoice with trembling.
- 12 Kiss the Son, lest He be angry and ye perish,
 For His wrath may kindle suddenly —
 Blessed are all they who hide in Him!

The didactic Ps. i. which began with אֲשֶׁרִי, is now followed by a prophetic Psalm, which closes with אֲשֶׁרִי. It coincides also in other respects with Ps. i., but still more with Psalms of the earlier time of the kings (lix. 9, lxxxiii. 3—9) and with Isaiah's prophetic style. The rising of the confederate nations and their rulers against Jahve and His Anointed will be dashed to pieces against the imperturbable all-conquering power of dominion, which Jahve has entrusted to His King set upon Zion, His Son. This is the fundamental thought, which is worked out with the vivid directness of dramatic representation. The words of the singer and seer begin and end the Psalm. The rebels, Jahve, and His Anointed come forward, and speak for themselves; but the framework is formed by the composer's discourse, which, like the chorus of the Greek drama, expresses the reflexions and feelings which are produced on the spectators and hearers. The poem before us is not purely lyric. The personality of the poet is kept in the back-ground. The Lord's Anointed who speaks in the middle of the Psalm is not the anonymous poet himself. It may, however, be a king of the time, who is here regarded in the light of the Messianic promise, or that King of the future, in whom at a future period the mission of the Davidic kingship in the world shall be fulfilled: at all events this Lord's Anointed comes forward with the divine power and glory, with which the Messiah appears in the prophets.

The Psalm is anonymous. For this very reason we may not assign it to David (Hofm.) nor to Solomon (Ew.); for nothing is to be inferred from Acts iv. 25, since in the New Testament "hymn of David" and "psalm" are co-ordinate ideas, and it is always far more hazardous to ascribe an anonymous Psalm to David or Solomon, than to deny to one inscribed לְדָוִד אוֹ לְשֹׁלֹמֹה direct authorship from David or Solomon. But the subject of the Psalm is neither David (Kurtz) nor Solomon (Bleek). It might be David, for in his reign there is at least one coalition of the peoples like that from which our Psalm takes its rise, vid. 2 Sam. x. 6: on the contrary it cannot be Solomon, because in his reign, though troubled towards its close (1 Kings xi. 14 sqq.), no such event occurs, but would then have to be inferred to have happened from this Psalm. We might rather guess at Uzziah (Meier) or Hezekiah (Maurer), both of whom inherited the kingdom in a weakened condition and found the neighbouring peoples alienated from the house of David. The situation might correspond to these times, for the rebellious peoples, which are brought before us, have been hitherto subject to Jahve and His Anointed. But all historical indications which might support the one supposition or the other are wanting. If the God-anointed one, who speaks in ver. 7, were the psalmist himself, we should at least know the Psalm was composed by a king filled with a lofty Messianic consciousness. But the dramatic movement of the Psalm up to the וְעָרָה (ver. 10) which follows, is opposed to such an identification of the God-anointed one with the poet. But that Alexander Jannæus (Hitz.), that blood-thirsty ruler, so justly hated by his people, who inaugurated his reign by fratricide, may be both at the same time, is a supposition which turns the moral and covenant character of the Psalm into detestable falsehood. The Old Testament knows no kingship to which is promised the dominion of the world and to which sonship is ascribed (2 Sam. vii. 14, Ps. lxxxix. 28), but the Davidic. The events of his own time, which influenced the mind of the poet, are no longer clear to us. But from these he is carried away into those tumults of the peoples which shall end in all kingdoms becoming the kingdom of God and of His Christ (Apoc. xi. 15, xii. 10).

In the New Testament this Psalm is cited more frequently than any other. According to Acts iv. 25—28, vers. 1 and 2 have been fulfilled in the confederate hostility of Israel and the Gentiles against Jesus the holy servant of God and against His confessors. In the Epistle to the Hebrews, Ps. cx. and ii. stand side by side, the former as a witness of the eternal priesthood of Jesus after the order of Melchisedek, the latter as a witness of His sonship, which is superior to that of the angels. Paul teaches us in Acts xiii. 33, comp. Rom. i. 4, how the "to-day" is to be understood. The "to-day" according to its proper fulfilment, is the day of Jesus' resurrection. Born from the dead to the life at the right hand of God, He entered on this day, which the church therefore calls dies regalis, upon His eternal kingship.

The New Testament echo of this Psalm however goes still deeper and further. The two names of the future One in use in the time of Jesus, ὁ Χριστός and ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, John i. 50, Mat. xxvi. 63 (in the mouth of Nathanael and of the High Priest) refer back to this Ps. and Dan. ix. 25, just as ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου incontrovertibly refers to Ps. viii. 5 and Dan. vii. 13. The view maintained by De Wette and Hupfeld, that the Psalm is not applicable to the Christian conceptions of the Messiah, seems almost as though these were to be gauged according to the authoritative utterances of the professorial chair and not according to the language of the Apostles. Even in the Apocalypse, ch. xix. 15, xii. 5, Jesus appears exactly as this Psalm represents Him, as ποιμαίνων τὰ ἔθνη ἐν ῥάβδῳ σιδηρᾷ. The office of the Messiah is not only that of Saviour but also of Judge. Redemption is the beginning and the judgment the end of His work. It is to this end that the Psalm refers. The Lord himself frequently refers in the Gospels to the fact of His bearing side by side with the sceptre of peace and the shepherd's staff, the sceptre of iron also, Mat. xxiv. 50 sq., xxi. 44, Luke xix. 27. The day of His coming is indeed a day of judgment — the great day of the ὄρη τοῦ ἀγίου, Apoc. vi. 17, before which the ultra-spiritual Messianic creations of enlightened exegetes will melt away, just as the carnal Messianic hopes of the Jews did before His first coming.

Vers. 1—3. The Psalm begins with a seven line strophe, ruled by an interrogative Wherefore. The mischievous undertaking condemns itself. It is groundless and fruitless. This certainty is expressed, with a tinge of involuntary astonishment, in the question. לָמָּה followed by a præt. enquires the ground of such lawlessness: wherefore have the peoples banded together so tumultuously (Aquila: ἐθοροβήθησαν)? and followed by a fut., the aim of this ineffectual action: wherefore do they imagine emptiness? רִיק might be adverbial and equivalent to לָרִיק, but it is here, as in iv. 3, a governed accusative; for הִנֵּה which signifies in itself only quiet inward musing and yearning, expressing itself by a dull muttering (here: something deceitful, as in xxxviii. 13), requires an object. By this רִיק the involuntary astonishment of the question justifies itself: to what purpose is this empty affair, i. e. devoid of reason and continuance? For the psalmist, himself a subject and member of the divine kingdom, is too well acquainted with Jahve and His Anointed not to recognise beforehand the unwarrantableness and impotency of such rebellion. That these two things are kept in view, is implied by ver. 2, which further depicts the position of affairs without being subordinated to the לָמָּה. The fut. describes what is going on at the present time: they set themselves in position, they take up a defiant position (הִתְנַחֵם as in 1 Sam. xvii. 16), after which we again (comp. the reverse order in lxxxiii. 6) have a transition to the perf. which is the more uncoloured expression of the actual: נֹסֵר (with יָרֵד as the exponent of reciprocity) prop. to press close and firm upon one another, then (like سَارَدَ, which, according to the correct observation of the Turkish Kamus, in its signification clam cum aliquo locutus est, starts from the very same primary meaning of pressing close to any object): to deliberate confidentially together (as xxxi. 14 and lxxxi. 10). The subjects מְלִכֵי-אֶרֶץ and רוֹנִים (according to the Arabic razuna, to be weighty: the grave, dignitaries, αὐτοί, augusti) are only in accordance with the poetic style without the article. It is a general rising of the people of the earth against Jahve and His מְשִׁיחַ, Χριστός, the king anointed by Him by means of the holy oil and most intimately allied to Him. The psalmist hears (ver. 3) the decision of the deliberating princes. The pathetic suff. émō instead of éhém refers back to Jahve and His Anointed. The cohortatives express the mutual kindling of feeling; the sound and rhythm of the exclamation correspond to the dull murmur of hatred and threatening defiance: the rhythm is iambic, and then anapæstic. First they determine to break asunder the fetters (מִסְרָחָה = מִסְרָחָה) to which the אָז, which is significant in the poetical style, points, then to cast away the cords from them (מִמֶּנִּי a nobis, this is the Palestinian mode of writing, whereas the Babylonians said and wrote מִמֶּנִּי a nobis in distinction from מִמֶּנִּי ab eo, B. Sota 35 a) partly with the vexation of captives, partly with the triumph of freedmen. They are, therefore, at present subjects of Jahve and His Anointed, and not merely because the whole world is Jahve's, but because He has helped His Anointed to obtain dominion over them. It is a battle for freedom, upon which they are entering, but a freedom that is opposed to God.

Vers. 4—6. Above the scene of this wild tumult of battle and imperious arrogance the psalmist in this six line strophe beholds Jahve, and in spirit hears His voice of thunder against the rebels. In contrast to earthly rulers and events Jahve is called יֵשֵׁב בְּשָׁמַיִם : He is enthroned above them in unapproachable majesty and ever-abiding glory; He is called אֲרֵנִי as He who controls whatever takes place below with absolute power according to the plan His wisdom has devised, which brooks no hindrance in execution. The sutt. describe not what He will do, but what He does continually (cf. Isa. xviii. 4 sq.). לָמֶן also belongs, according to lix. 9, xxxvii. 13, to יִשְׂרָאֵל (יִשְׂרָאֵל which is more usual in the post-pentateuchal language — צַחֵק). He laughs at the defiant ones, for between them and Him there is an infinite distance; He derides them by allowing the boundless stupidity of the infinitely little one to come to a climax and then He thrusts him down to the earth undeceived. This climax, the extreme limit of the divine forbearance, is determined by the אָז, as in Deut. xxix. 19, cf. שָׁמַיִם. 5, xxxvi. 13, which is a "then" referring to the future and pointing towards the crisis which then supervenes. Then He begins at once to utter the actual language of His wrath to his foes and confounds them in the heat of His anger, disconcerts them utterly, both outwardly and in spirit. בָּהֵל, בְּהֵל, cogn. בָּלָה, means originally to let loose, let go, then in Hebrew sometimes, externally, to overthrow, sometimes, of the mind, to confound and disconcert.

Ver. 5 a is like a peal of thunder (cf. Isa. x. 33); בְּרָוֶנוּ, 5 b, like the lightning's destructive flash. And as the first strophe closed with the words of the rebels, so this second closes with Jahve's own words. With וְאָנִי begins an adverbial clause like Gen. xv. 2, xviii. 13, Ps. l. 17. The suppressed principal clause (cf. Isa. iii. 14; Ew. § 341, c) is easily supplied: ye are revolting, whilst notwithstanding I . . . With וְאָנִי He opposes His irresistible will to their vain undertaking. It has been shewn by Böttcher, that we must not translate "I have anointed" (Targ., Symm.). נָסַךְ, نَسَك, certainly means to pour out, but not to pour upon, and the meaning of pouring wide and firm (of casting metal, libation, anointing) then, as in וְהִצִּיק, וְהִצִּיק, goes over into the meaning of setting firmly in any place (fundere into fundare, constituere, as LXX., Syr., Jer., and Luther translate), so that consequently נָסַךְ the word for prince cannot be compared with מָשִׁיחַ, but with נָצִיחַ.* The Targum rightly inserts וְמָנִיחָהּ (et præfecit eum) after וְהִצִּיקָהּ (unxi), for the place of the anointing is not עַל-צִיּוֹן. History makes no mention of a king of Israel being anointed on Zion. Zion is mentioned as the royal seat of the Anointed One; there He is installed, that He may reign there, and rule from thence, cx. 2. It is the hill of the city of David (2 Sam. v. 7, 9, 1 Kings viii. 1) including Moriah, that is intended. That hill of holiness, i. e. holy hill, which is the resting-place of the divine presence and therefore excels all the heights of the earth, is assigned to Him as the seat of His throne.

Vers. 7—9. The Anointed One himself now speaks and expresses what he is, and is able to do, by virtue of the divine decree. No transitional word or formula of introduction denotes this sudden transition from the speech of Jahve to that of His Christ. The psalmist is the seer: his Psalm is the mirrored picture of what he saw and the echo of what he heard. As Jahve in opposition to the rebels acknowledges the king upon Zion, so the king on Zion appeals to Him in opposition to the rebels. The name of God, יהוה, has Rebia magnum and, on account of the compass of the full intonation of this accent, a Gaja by the Shebâ (comp. אֱלֹהֵי xxxv. 2, אֱלֹהִים lxviii. 8, אֲרֵנִי xc. 1).* The construction of סָפֵר with אֵל (as lxix. 27, comp. אָמַר Gen. xx. 2, Jer. xxvii. 19, דִּבֶּר 2 Chron. xxxii. 19, הוֹדִיעַ Isa. xxxviii. 19): to narrate or make an announcement with respect to... is minute, and therefore solemn. Self-confident and fearless, he can and will oppose to those, who now renounce their allegiance to him, a חֶק, f. e. an authentic, inviolable appointment, which can neither be changed nor shaken. All the ancient versions, with the exception of the Syriac, read חֶק-יְהוָה together. The line of the strophe becomes thereby more symmetrical, but the expression loses in force. אֵל-חֶק rightly has Olewejored. It is the amplificative use of the noun when it is not more precisely determined, known in Arabic grammar: such a decree! majestic as to its author and its matter. Jahve has declared to Him: בְּנֵי אָתָּה,** and that on the definite day

* We may observe here, in general, that this Gaja (Methey) which draws the Shebâ into the intonation is placed even beside words with the lesser distinctives Zinnor and Rebia parvum only by the Masorete Ben-Naphtali, not by Ben-Asher (both about 950 A. D.). This is a point which has not been observed throughout even in Baer's edition of the Psalter, so that consequently e. g. in v. 11 it is to be written אֱלֹהִים; in vi. 2 on the other hand (with Dechi) יְהוָה, not יהוה.

** Even in pause here אָתָּה remains without a lengthened â (Psalter ii. 468), but the word is become Mitel, while out of pause, according to Ben-Asher, it is Mitra; but even out of pause (as in lxxxix. 10, 12, xc. 2) it is accented on the penult. by Ben-Naphtali. The Athnach of the books אִתָּח (Ps., Job, Prov.), corresponding to the Zakeph of the 21 other books, has only a half pausal power, and as a rule none at all where it follows Olewejored, cf. ix. 7, xiv. 4, xxv. 7, xxvii. 4, xxxi. 14, xxxv. 15, &c. (Baer, Thorath Emeth p. 37).

on which He has begotten or born him into this relationship of son. The verb יָלַד (with the changeable vowel i*) unites in itself, like: γενῶν, the ideas of begetting and bearing (LXX. γενένηκα, Aq. ἔτερον); what is intended is an operation of divine power exalted above both, and indeed, since it refers to a setting up (נָסַח) in the kingship, the begetting into a royal existence, which takes place in and by the act of anointing (מָשַׁח). Whether it be David, or a son of David, or the other David, that is intended, in any case 2 Sam. vii. is to be accounted as the first and oldest proclamation of this decree; for there David, with reference to his own anointing, and at the same time with the promise of everlasting dominion, receives the witness of the eternal sonship to which Jahve has appointed the seed of David in relation to Himself as Father, so that David and his seed can say to Jahve: אָבִי אֲנִי, Thou art my Father, lxxxix. 27, as Jahve can to him: בְּנִי אֲנִי, Thou art My son. From this sonship of the Anointed one to Jahve, the Creator and Possessor of the world, flows His claim to and expectation of the dominion of the world. The cohortative, natural after challenges, follows upon אֲשֶׁל, Ges. § 128, 1. Jahve has appointed the dominion of the world to His Son: on His part therefore it needs only the desire for it, to appropriate to Himself that which is allotted to Him. He needs only to be willing, and that He is willing is shewn by His appealing to the authority delegated to Him by Jahve against the rebels. This authority has a supplement in ver. 9, which is most terrible for the rebellious ones. The suff. refer to the נָחַס, the ἔθνη, sunk in heathenism. For these his sceptre of dominion (cx. 2) becomes a rod of iron, which will shatter them into a thousand pieces like a brittle image of clay (Jer. xix. 11). With נָפַץ alternates רָעַע (= רָעַץ frangere), suff. רָעַע; whereas the LXX. (Syr., Jer.), which renders ποιμανεῖς αὐτοὺς ἐν ῥάβδῳ (as 1 Cor. iv. 21) σιδηρᾶ, points it רָעַע from רָעַע. The staff of iron, according to the Hebrew text the instrument of punitive power, becomes thus with reference to מִשְׁכָּב as the shepherd's staff xxiii. 4, Mic. vii. 14, an instrument of despotism.

Vers. 10—12. The poet closes with a practical application to the great of the earth of that which he has seen and heard. With וַיִּשְׁמַע, καὶ ὤν (1 John ii. 28), itaque, appropriate conclusions are drawn from some general moral matter of fact (e. g. Prov. v. 7) or some fact connected with the history of redemption (e. g. Isa. xxviii. 22). The exhortation is not addressed to those whom he has seen in a state of rebellion, but to kings in general with reference to what he has prophetically seen and heard. וְיִשְׁפֹּט אֶת-הָאָרֶץ are not those who judge the earth, but the judges, i. e. rulers (Amos ii. 3, cf. i. 8), belonging to the earth, throughout its length or breadth. The Hiph. לִישְׁפֹּט signifies to shew intelligence or discernment; the Niph. נִסְכַּח as a so-called Niph. tolerativum, to let one's self be chastened or instructed, like נָתַן Prov. xiii. 10, to allow one's self to be advised, שִׁוְוֵה Ezek. xiv. 3, to allow one's self to be sought, נִמְצָא to allow one's self to be found, 1 Chron. xxviii. 9, and frequently. This general call to reflection is followed, in ver. 11, by a special exhortation in reference to Jahve, and in ver. 12, in reference to the Son. וְיָבִי and יָבִי answer to each other: the latter is not according to Hos. x. 5 in the sense of וְיָבִי xcvi. 9, but, — since "to shake with trembling" (Hitz.) is a tautology, and as an imperative יָבִי everywhere else signifies: rejoice, — according to c. 2, in the sense of rapturous manifestation of joy at the happiness and honour of being permitted to be servants of such a God. The LXX. correctly renders it: ἀγαλλιᾶσθε αὐτῷ ἐν τρόμῳ. Their rejoicing, in order that it may not run to the excess of security and haughtiness, is to be blended with trembling (בָּ as Zeph. iii. 17), viz. with the trembling of reverence and self-control, for God is a consuming fire, Hebr. xii. 28.

The second exhortation, which now follows, having reference to their relationship to the Anointed One, has been missed by all the ancient versions except the Syriac, as though its clearness had blinded the translators, since they render בר, either בָּר purity, chastity, discipline (LXX., Targ., Ital., Vulg.), or בָּר pure, unmixed (Aq., Symm., Jer.:

adore pure). Thus also Hupfeld renders it "yield sincerely", whereas it is rendered by Ewald "receive wholesome warning", and by Hitzig "submit to duty" (כָּר like the Arabic birr — כָּר); Olshausen even thinks, there may be some mistake in כָּר, and Diestel decides for בָּר instead of כָּר. But the context and the usage of the language require osculamini filium. The Piel נִשֵּׂק means to kiss, and never anything else; and while כָּר in Hebrew means purity and nothing more, and כָּר as an adverb, pure, cannot be supported, nothing is more natural here, after Jahve has acknowledged His Anointed One as His Son, than that כָּר (Prov. xxxi. 2, even כָּרִי — כָּרִי) — which has nothing strange about it when found in solemn discourse, and here helps one over the dissonance of כָּן כָּן — should, in a like absolute manner to הֵק, denote the unique son, and in fact the Son of God.* The exhortation to submit to Jahve is followed, as Aben-Ezra has observed, by the exhortation to do homage to Jahve's Son. To kiss is equivalent to to do homage. Samuel kisses Saul (1 Sam. x. 1), saying that thereby he does homage to him.**

The subject to what follows is now, however, not the Son, but Jahve. It is certainly at least quite as natural to the New Testament consciousness to refer "lest He be angry" to the Son (vid. Apoc. vi. 16 sq.), and since the warning against putting trust (חֲסוּרָה) in princes, cxviii. 9, cxlvi. 3, cannot be applied to the Christ of God, the reference of בָּר to Him (Hengst.) cannot be regarded as impossible. But since הִסְתָּרָה is the usual word for taking confiding refuge in Jahve, and * Apart from the fact of כָּר not having the article, its indefiniteness comes under the point of view of that which, because it combines with it the idea of the majestic, great, and terrible, is called by the Arabian grammarians التَّنْكِيرُ or التَّنْكِيرُ or التَّهْوِيلُ; by the boundlessness which lies in it it challenges the imagination to magnify the notion which it thus expresses. An Arabic expositor would here (as is ver. 7 above) render it "Kiss a son and such a son!" (vid. Ibn Hishâm in De Sacy's Anthol. Grammat. p. 100, where it is to be translated hic est vir qualis vir!). Examples which support this doctrine are כָּרִי Isa. xxviii. 3 by a hand, viz. God's almighty hand which is the hand of hands, and Isa. xxxi. 8 מִפְּנֵי הַחֶרֶב before a sword, viz. the divine sword which brooks no opposing weapon.

the future day of wrath is always referred to in the Old Testament (e. g. cx. 5) as the day of the wrath of God, we refer the ne irascatur to Him whose son the Anointed One is; therefore it is to be rendered: lest Jahve be angry and ye perish דָּרָךְ. This דָּרָךְ is the accus. of more exact definition. If the way of any one perish, i. 6, he himself is lost with regard to the way, since this leads him into the abyss. It is questionable whether דָּרָךְ means "for a little" in the sense of brevi or facile. The usus loquendi and position of the words favour the latter (Hupf.). Everywhere else דָּרָךְ means by itself (without such additions as in Ezr. ix. 8, Isa. xxvi. 20, Ezek. xvi. 47) "for a little, nearly, easily." At least this meaning is secured to it when it occurs after hypothetical antecedent clauses as in lxxxi. 15, 2 Sam. xix. 37, Job xxxii. 22. Therefore it is to be rendered: for His wrath might kindle easily, or might kindle suddenly. The poet warns the rulers in their own highest interest not to challenge the wrathful zeal of Jahve for His Christ, which according to ver. 5 is inevitable. Well is it with all those who have nothing to fear from this outburst of wrath, because they hide themselves in Jahve as their refuge. The construct state דָּרָךְ connects בָּ, without a genitive relation, with itself as forming together one notion, Ges. § 116, 1. דָּרָךְ the usual word for fleeing confidently to Jahve, means according to its radical notion not so much refugere, confugere, as se abdere, condere, and is therefore never combined with אָל, but always with בָּ. *

* On old names of towns, which this ancient דָּרָךְ shews, vid. Wetzstein's remark on Job xxiv. 8 [ii. p. 22 n. 2]. The Arabic still has حَسِي in the reference of the primary meaning to water which, sucked in and hidden, flows under the sand and only comes to sight on digging. The rocky bottom on which it collects beneath the surface of the sand and by which it is prevented from oozing away or drying up is called حَسِي hasà or حَسِي hisà a hiding-place or place of protection, and a fountain dug there is called عَيْن الحَسِي.

PSALM III.

MORNING HYMN OF ONE IN DISTRESS, BUT CONFIDENT IN GOD.

- 2 JAHVE, how many are my oppressors!
Many rise up against me,
- 3 Many say of my soul:
"There is no help for him in God". (Sela)
- 4 But Thou, O Jahve, art a shield for me,
My glory and the lifter up of my head.
- 5 I cried unto Jahve with my voice
And He answered me from His holy hill. (Sela)
- 6 I laid me down, and slept;
I awaked, for Jahve sustaineth me.
- 7 I will not be afraid of ten thousands of the people Who have set themselves against me round about.
- 8 Arise, O Jahve, help me, O my God!
For Thou smitest all mine enemies on the cheek,
Thou breakest the teeth of the ungodly.
- 9 To Jahve belongeth salvation —
Upon Thy people be Thy blessing! (Sela)

The two Psalms forming the prologue, which treat of cognate themes, the one ethical, from the standpoint of the הַכְּמָה, and the other related to the history of redemption from the standpoint of the נְבוּאָה, are now followed by a morning prayer; for morning and evening prayers are surely the first that one expects to find in a prayer- and hymn-book. The morning hymn, Ps. iii., which has the mention of the "holy hill" in common with Ps. ii., naturally precedes the evening hymn Ps. iv.; for that Ps. iii. is an evening hymn as some are of opinion, rests on grammatical misconception.

With Ps. iii., begin, as already stated, the hymns arranged for music. By מְנוּחָה לְדָוִד, a Psalm of David, the hymn which follows is marked as one designed for musical accompaniment. Since מְנוּחָה occurs exclusively in the inscriptions of the Psalms, it is no doubt a technical expression coined by David. וַיִּכַּרְ (root וָכַר) is an onomatopoeic word, which in Kal signifies to cut off, and in fact to prune or lop

(the vine) (cf. Arabic زبر to write, from the buzzing noise of the style or reed on the writing material). The signification of singing and playing proper to the Piel are not connected with the signification "to nip". For neither the rhythmic division (Schultens) nor the articulated speaking (Hitz.) furnish a probable explanation, since the cæsura and syllable are not natural but artificial notions, nor also the nipping of the strings (Böttch., Ges.), for which the language has coined the word נָנַן (of like root with נָנַע). Moreover, the earliest passages in which זָמַר and זָמַרְתָּ occur (Gen. xliii. 11, Exod. xv. 2, Judges v. 3), speak rather of song than music and both words frequently denote song in distinction from music, e. g. xcvi. 5, lxxxii. 3, cf. Cant. ii. 12. Also, if זָמַר originally means, like ψάλλειν, carpere (pulsare) fides, such names of instruments as Arab. zenr the hautboy and zummâra the pipe would not be formed. But זָמַר means, as Hupfeld has shewn, as indirect an onomatope as canere, "to make music" in the widest sense; the more accurate usage of the language, however, distinguishes זָמַר and שָׁר as to play and to sing. With קָ of the instrument זָמַר denotes song with musical accompaniment (like the Æthiopic זָמַר instrumento canere) and זָמַרְתָּ (Aram. זָמַר) is sometimes, as in Amos v. 23, absolutely: music. Accordingly מִזְמֹרֹת signifies technically the music and שִׁיר the words. And therefore we translate the former by "Psalm", for ὁ ψαλμός ἐστίν — says Gregory of Nyssa — ἡ διὰ τοῦ ὄργάνου τοῦ μουσικοῦ μελωδία, ὅδι, δὲ ἡ διὰ στόματος γενομένη τοῦ μέλους μετὰ ῥημάτων ἐκφώνησις

That Ps. iii. is a hymn arranged for music is also manifest from the קָלָה which occurs here 3 times. It is found in the Psalter, as Bruno has correctly calculated, 71 times (17 times in the 1st book, 30 in the 2nd, 20 in the 3rd, 4 in the 4th) and, with the exception of the anonymous Ps. lxxvi. lxxvii., always in those that are inscribed by the name of David and of the psalmists famed from the time of David. That it is a marginal note referring to the Davidic Temple-music is clearly seen from the fact, that all the Psalms with קָלָה have the לְמִנְצַח which relates to the musical execution, with the exception of eight (xxxii. xlvi. l. lxxxii. lxxxiii. lxxxvii. lxxxix. cxliii.) which, however, from the designation מִזְמֹרֹת are at least manifestly designed for music. The Tephilla of Habbakuk, ch. iii., the only portion of Scripture in which סלה occurs out of the Psalter, as an exception has the למנצח at the end. Including the three סלה of this tephilla, the word does not occur less than 74 times in the Old Testament.

Now as to the meaning of this musical nota bene, 1st, every explanation as an abbreviation, — the best of which is = למעלה יהוה (turn thyself towards above i. e. towards the front, O Singer! therefore: da capo), — is to be rejected, because such abbreviations fail of any further support in the Old Testament. Also 2ndly, the derivation from שלה = סלה silere, according to which it denotes a pause, or orders the singers to be silent while the music strikes up, is inadmissible, because סלה in this sense is neither Hebrew nor Aramaic and moreover in Hebrew itself the interchange of ש with ס (סריון, שריון) is extremely rare. There is but one verbal stem with which סלה can be combined, viz. סלל or סלק (סלל). The primary notion of this verbal stem is that of lifting up, from which, with reference to the derivatives סלסל a ladder and סלק in the signification an ascent, or steps, 2 Chron. ix. 11, comes the general meaning for סלה, of a musical rise. When the tradition of the Mishna explains the word as a synonym of חצץ and the Targum, the Quinta, and the Sexta (and although variously Aquila and sometimes the Syriac version) render it in accordance therewith “for ever (always)”, — in favour of which Jerome also at last decides, Ep. ad Marcellam “quid sit Sela”), — the original musical signification is converted into a corresponding logical or lexical one. But it is apparent from the διάψαλμα of the LXX. (adopted by Symm., Theod., and the Syr.), that the musical meaning amounts to a strengthening of some kind or other; for διάψαλμα signifies, according to its formation (—μα—μενον), not the pause as Gregory of Nyssa defines it: ἡ μεταξὺ τῆς ψαλμωδίας γενομένη κατὰ τὸ ἀθρόον ἐπηρέμησης πρὸς ὑποδοχὴν τοῦ θεοῦ ἐπικρινομένου νοήματος, but either the interlude, especially of the stringed instruments, (like διαύλιον (διαύλειον), according to Hesychius the interlude of the flutes between the choruses), or an intensified playing (as διαψάλλειν τριγώνοις is found in a fragment of the comedian Eupolis in Athenæus of the strong play of triangular harps).\* According to the pointing of the word as we now have it, it ought apparently to be regarded as a noun סָל with the ah of direction (synonymous with גָּיַה, up! Job xxii. 29); for the omission of the Dagesh beside the ah of direction is not without example (cf. 1 Kings ii. 40 גָּתָה which is the proper reading, instead of גַּתָה, and referred to by Ewald) and the  $\text{---}$ , with Dag. forte implicitum, is usual before liquids instead of  $\text{---}$ , as פָּרְנָה Gen. xxviii. 2, הָרָה Gen. xiv. 10 instead of paddannah, harrah, as also פְּרָמָה 1 Sam. xxv. 5 instead of פְּרָמָה. But the present pointing of this word, which is uniformly included in the accentuation of the Masoretic verse, is scarcely the genuine pointing: it looks like an imitation of נָצָה. The word may originally have been pronounced סָלָה (elevatio after the form בְּתָה, רָלָה). The combination סָלָה הַגִּיּוֹן ix. 17, in which הַגִּיּוֹן refers to the playing of the stringed instruments (xcii. 4) leads one to infer that סָלָה is a note which refers not to the singing but to the instrumental accompaniment. But to understand by this a heaping up of weighty expressive accords and powerful harmonies in general, would be to confound ancient with modern music. What is meant is the joining in of the orchestra, or a reinforcement of the instruments, or even a transition from piano to forte.

Three times in this Psalm we meet with this Hebrew forte. In sixteen Psalms (vii. xx. xxi. xli. xlvii. xlviii. l. liv. lx. lxi. lxxv. lxxxi. lxxxii. lxxxiii. lxxxv. cxliii.) we find it only once; in fifteen Psalms (iv. ix. xxiv. xxxix. xlix. lii. lv. lvii. lix. lxii. lxvii. lxxvi. lxxxiv. lxxxvii. lxxxviii.), twice; in but seven Psalms (iii. xxxii. xlvi. lxvi. lxviii. lxxvii. cxl. and also Hab. iii.), three times; and only in one (lxxxix.), four times. It never stands at the beginning of a Psalm, for the ancient music was not as yet so fully developed, that סָלָה should absolutely correspond to the ritornello. Moreover, it does not always stand at the close of a strophe so as to be the sign of a regular interlude, but it is always placed where the instruments are to join in simultaneously and take up the melody — a thing which frequently happens in the midst of the strophe. In the Psalm before us it stands at the close of the 1st, 2nd, and 4th strophes. The reason of its omission after the third is evident.

Not a few of the Psalms bear the date of the time of the persecution under Saul, but only this and probably Ps. lxxiii. have that of Absolom. The Psalter however contains other Psalms which reflect this second time of persecution. It is therefore all the more easy to accept as tradition the inscription: when he fled before Absolom, his son. And what is there in the contents of the Psalm against this statement? All the leading features of the Psalm accord with it, viz. the mockery of one who is rejected of God 2 Sam. xvi. 7 sq., the danger by night 2 Sam. xvii. 1, the multitudes of the people 2 Sam. xv. 13, xvii. 11, and the high position of honour held by the psalmist. Hitzig prefers to refer this and the following Psalm to the surprize by the Amalekites during David's settlement in Ziklag. But since at that time Zion and Jerusalem were not free some different interpretation of ver. 5 b becomes necessary. And the fact that the Psalm does not contain any reference to Absolom does not militate against the inscription. It is explained by the tone of 2 Sam. xix. 1 [xviii. 33 Engl.]. And if Psalms belonging to the time of Absolom's rebellion required any such reference to make them known, then we should have none at all.

Vers. 2—3. The first strophe contains the lament concerning the existing distress. From its combination with the exclamative כָּה רַבִּי, כָּה רַבִּי is accented on the ultima (and also in civ. 24); the accentuation of the perf. of verbs yý very frequently (even without the Waw consec.) follows the example of the strong verb, Ges. § 67 rem. 12. A declaration then takes the place of the summons and the רָבִים implied in the predicate רַבִּי now becomes the subject of participial predicates, which more minutely describe the continuing condition of affairs. The לֵּ of לְנִפְשִׁי signifies "in the direction of", followed by an address in xi. 1 (= "to"), or, as here and frequently (e. g. Gen. xxi. 7) followed by narration (= "of", concerning).  $\text{לִנְפֹשִׁי}$  instead of  $\text{לִי}$  implies that the words of the adversaries pronounce a judgment upon his inmost life, or upon his personal relationship to God.  $\text{יִשְׁעָרָה}$  is an intensive form for  $\text{יִשְׁעָה}$ , whether it be with a double feminine termination (Ges., Ew., Olsh.), or, with an original (accusative) ah of the direction: we regard this latter view, with Hupfeld, as more in accordance with the usage and analogy of the language (comp. xliv. 27 with lxxx. 3, and  $\text{לִיָּהּ}$  prop.  $\nu\lambda\alpha\tau\alpha$ , then as common Greek  $\eta\ \nu\lambda\alpha\tau\alpha$ ,  $\nu\lambda\chi\theta\alpha$ ). God is the ground of help; to have no more help in Him is equivalent to being rooted out of favour with God. Open enemies as well as disconcerted friends look upon him as one henceforth cast away. David had plunged himself into the deepest abyss of wretchedness by his adultery with Bathsheba, at the beginning of the very year in which, by the renewal of the Syro-Ammonitish war, he had reached the pinnacle of worldly power. The rebellion of Absalom belonged to the series of dire calamities which began to come upon him from that time. Plausible reasons were not wanting for such words as these which give up his cause as lost.

Vers. 4—5. But cleansed by penitence he stands in a totally different relationship to God and God to him from that which men suppose. Every hour he has reason to fear some overwhelming attack but Jahve is the shield which covers him behind and before ( $\text{בְּעָרָה}$  constr. of  $\text{בָּעָרָה}$  =  $\text{بَعْدَ}$  prop. pone, post). His kingdom is taken from him, but Jahve is his glory. With covered head and dejected countenance he ascended the Mount of Olives (2 Sam. xv. 30), but Jahve is the "lifter up of his head", inasmuch as He comforts and helps him. The primary passage of this believing utterance "God is a shield" is Gen. xv. 1 (cf. Deut. xxxiii. 29). Very far from praying in vain, he is assured, that when he prays his prayer will be heard and answered. The rendering "I cried and He answered me" is erroneous here where  $\text{אָקְרָא}$  does not stand in an historical connection. The future of sequence does not require it, as is evident from lv. 17 sq. (comp. on cxx. 1); it is only an expression of confidence in the answer on God's part, which will follow his prayer. In constructions like קוֹלִי אֶקְרָא, Hitzig and Hupfeld regard קוֹלִי as the narrower subject-notion beside the more general one (as xlv. 3, lxix. 11, lxxxiii. 19): my voice — I cried; but the position of the words is not favourable to this in the passage before us and in xvii. 10, xxvii. 7, lvii. 5, lxvi. 17, cxlii. 2, Isa. xxvi. 9, though it may be in lxix. 11, cviii. 2. According to Ew. § 281, c, קוֹלִי is an accusative of more precise definition, as without doubt in Isa. x. 30 cf. Ps. lx. 7, xvii. 13 sq.; the cry is thereby described as a loud cry.\* To this cry, as וַיַּעֲנֵי as being a pure mood of sequence implies, succeeds the answer, or, which better corresponds to the original meaning of עָנָה (comp. עָנָה to meet, stand opposite) reply;\*\* and it it comes from the place whither it was directed: יָמַח קִרְשָׁו. He had removed the ark from Kirjath Jearim to Zion. He had not taken it with him when he left Jerusalem and fled before Absalom, 2 Sam. xv. 25. He was therefore separated by a hostile power from the resting-place of the divine presence. But his prayer urged its way on to the cherubim-throne; and to the answer of Him who is enthroned there, there is no separating barrier of space or created things.

Vers. 6—7. That this God will protect him, His protection during the past night is now a pledge to him in the early morning. It is a violation of the rules of grammar to translate וַיֵּשְׁבֵה: I shall go to sleep, or: I am going to sleep. The 1 pers. fut. consec. which is indicated by the וַי, is fond of taking an ah of direction, which gives subjective intensity to the idea of sequence: "and thus I then fell asleep", cf. vii. 5, cxix. 55, and frequently, Gen. xxxii. 6, and more especially * Böttcher, Collectanea pp. 166 sq., also adopts the view, that וַיַּעֲנֵי, קוֹלִי are each appositum vicarium subjecti and therefore nomin. in such passages. But 1) the fact that וַי never stands beside them is explained by the consideration that it is not suited to an adverbial collateral definition. And 2) that elsewhere the same notions appear as direct subjects, just as 3) that elsewhere they alternate with the verbal subject-notion in the parallel member of the verse (cxxx. 5, Prov. viii. 4) — these last two admit of no inference. The controverted question of the syntax is, moreover, an old one and has been treated of at length by Kimchi in his Book of Roots s. r. וַיַּעֲנֵי.

** vid. Redslob in his treatise: Die Integrität der Stelle Hos. vii. 4—10 in Frage gestellt S. 7.

so in the later style, Ezra ix. 3, Neh. xiii. 21, vid. Ges. § 49, 2, Böttcher, Neue Aehrenlese, No. 412. It is a retrospective glance at the past night. Awaking in health and safety, he feels grateful to Him to whom he owes it: יְהוָה יִסְמְכֵנִי. It is the result of the fact that Jahve supports him, and that God's hand is his pillow.* Because this loving, almighty hand is beneath his head (Cant. ii. 6) he is inaccessible and therefore also devoid of fear. שִׁירָה (שׁוֹרָה) carries its object in itself: to take up one's position, as in Isa. xxii. 7, synon. חָנָה xxviii. 3 and שִׁירָה 1 Kings xx. 12, cf. ἀναστρέφει τινά. David does not put a merely possible case. All Israel, that is to say ten thousands, myriads, were gone over to Absalom. Here, at the close of the third strophe, סִלְהִי is wanting because the לֹא אֶירָא (I will not fear) is not uttered in a tone of triumph, but is only a quiet, meek expression of believing confidence. If the instruments struck up boldly and suddenly here, then a cry for help, urged forth by the difficulties that still continually surrounded him, would not be able to follow.

Vers. 8—9. The bold קוֹמָה is taken from the mouth of Moses, Num. x. 35. God is said to arise when He takes a decisive part in what takes place in this world. Instead of kumah it is accented kumáh as Mitra, in order (since the reading קוֹמָה אֲדַנִּי is assumed) that the final ah may be sharply cut off from the guttural initial of the next word, and thus render a clear, exact pronunciation of the latter possible (Hitz., Ew. § 228, b).** Beside יְהוָה we have יְהוָהי, with the

* Referred to the other David, ver. 6 has become an Easter-morning call, vid. Val. Herberger's Paradies-Blümlein aus dem Lustgarten der Psalmen (Neue Ausg. 1857) S. 25.

** This is the traditional reason of the accentuation shubáh, kumáh, shiháh before יְהוָה: it is intended to prevent the one or other of the two gutturals being swallowed up (שִׁלַּח יְכֹלְעוּ) by too rapid speaking. Hence it is that the same thing takes place even when another word, not the name of God, follows, if it begins with h or the like, and is closely connected with it by meaning and accentuation: e. g. Judges iv. 18 סוֹרָה twice Mitra before h; Ps. lvii. 9 עֵינֶיהָ, Mitra before h; לָמָּה, Mitra before h, Exod. v. 22; נִקְחָה Is. xi. 2, and הִבְרִאתָ Gen. xxvi. 10, Mitra before h; and the following fact favours it, viz. that for a similar reason Pasek is placed were two h would come together, e. g. Gen. xxi. 14 Adonaj jir'eh with the stroke of separation between the two words, cf. Ex. xv. 18, Prov. viii. 21. The fact that in Jer. xl. 5, וְשִׁכְרָה, remains Mitel, is accounted suff. of appropriating faith. The cry for help is then substantiated by כִּי and the retrospective perf. They are not such perff. of prophetically certain hope as in vi. 9, vii. 7, ix. 5 sq., for the logical connection requires an appeal to previous experience in the present passage: they express facts of experience, which are taken from many single events (hence בָּ) down to the present time. The verb הִכָּה is construed with a double accusative, as e. g., Iliad xvi. 597 τὸν μὲν ἄρα Γλαῦκος στῆθος μέσον οὕτως δούρι. The idea of contempt (Job xvi. 10) is combined with that of rendering harmless in this "smiting upon the cheek". What is meant is a striking in of the jaw-bone and therewith a breaking of the teeth in pieces (שָׁבַר). David means, an ignominious end has always come upon the ungodly who rose up against him and against God's order in general, as their punishment. The enemies are conceived of as monsters given to biting, and the picture of their fate is fashioned according to this conception. Jahve has the power and the will to defend His Anointed against their hostility: לָרֵחַ הַיְשׁוּעָה penes Jovam est salus. יְשׁוּעָה (from יָשַׁע, وَجَعَ, amplum esse) signifies breadth as applied to perfect freedom of motion, removal of all straitness and oppression, prosperity without exposure to danger and unobscured. In the לָ of possession lies the idea of the exclusiveness of the possession and of perfect freedom of disposal. At Jahve's free disposal stands הַיְשׁוּעָה, salvation, in all its fulness (just so in Jon. ii. 10, Apoc. vii. 10). In connection therewith David first of all thinks of his own need of deliverance. But as a true king he cannot before God think of himself, without connecting himself with his people. Therefore he closes with the intercessory inference: עַל-עַמְּךָ בְּרַבְּתֶךָ Upon Thy people be Thy blessing! We may supply תְּהִי or בָּרַךְ. Instead of cursing his faithless people he implores a blessing upon for by its being separated from the following מִלֵּילָהּ by Pazer; a real exception, however (Michlol 112 b), — and not as Norzi from misapprehension observes, a controverted one, — is שָׁבַר before הַלְעִיר 2 Sam. xv. 27, but it is by no means sufficient to oppose the purely orthophonic (notrhythmical) ground of this ultima-accentuation. Even the semi-guttural ר sometimes has a like influence over the tone: ribāh ribt xliiii. 1, xxix. 154.

those who have been piteously led astray and deceived. This "upon Thy people be Thy blessing!" has its counterpart in the "Father forgive them" of the other David, whom His people crucified. The one concluding word of the Psalm — observes Ewald — casts a bright light into the very depths of his noble soul.

PSALM IV.

EVENING HYMN OF ONE WHO IS UNMOVED BEFORE BACKBITERS AND MEN OF LITTLE FAITH.

- 2 WHEN I call answer me, O God of my righteousness,
Who hast made space for me in straitness;
Be merciful unto me and hear my prayer!
- 3 Ye sons of men, how long shall my honour become shame,
Since ye love appearance, ye seek after leasing?! (Sela)
- 4 Know then, that Jahve hath marked out the godly man for Himself;
Jahve heareth when I call to Him.
- 5 Be ye angry, yet sin ye not! — Commune with your own heart upon your bed and be still! (Sela.)
- 6 Offer the sacrifices of righteousness,
And put your trust in Jahve!
- 7 Many say: "How can we experience good!?"
O lift up the light of Thy countenance upon us, Jahve!
- 8 Thou hast put gladness into my heart,
More than in the time when their corn and wine abound.
- 9 In peace will I lay me down and forthwith sleep,
For Thou, O Jahve, in seclusion
Makest me to dwell securely.

The Davidic morning hymn is now followed by a Davidic evening hymn. It is evident that they belong together from the mutual relation of iv. 7 with iii. 3, and iii. 6 with iv. 9. They are the only two Psalms in which the direct words of others are taken up into a prayer with the formula "many say", רבים אמרים. The history and chronological position of the one is explained from the inscription of the other. From the quousque iv. 3, and the words of the feeble-faiths iv. 7, it follows that Ps. iv. is the later of the two.

It is at the head of this Psalm that we are first met by לְמַנְצֵהוּ (or לְמַנְצֵחַ with Gafa, Hab. iii. 19), which still calls for investigation. It is found fifty five times in the Psalter, not 54 as is usually reckoned: viz. 19 times in book i., 25 times in book ii., 8 times in book iii., 3 times in book v. Only two of the Psalms, at the head of which it is found, are anonymous: viz. lxvi., lxvii. All the others bear the names of David and of the psalmists celebrated from David's time, viz. 39 of David, 9 of the Korahites, 5 of Asaph. No fewer than 30 of these Psalms are Elohimic. לְמַנְצֵחַ is always the first word of the inscription; only in Ps. lxxxviii., which is easily liable to be overlooked in reckoning, is it otherwise, because there two different inscriptions are put together.

The meaning of the verb נָצַח is evident from the Chronicles and the Book of Ezra, which belongs to them. The predilection of the chronicler for the history of religious worship and antiquarian lore is also of use in reference to this word. He uses it in the history of the time of David, of Solomon, of Josiah, of Zerubbabel and Joshua, and always in connection with the accounts of the Temple-service and the building of single parts of the Temple. To discharge the official duties of the Temple-service is called נָצַח עַל-מְלֶאכֶת בְּיַד-ה' 1 Chron. xxiii. 4 (comp. 28—32), and the expression is used in Ezra iii. 8 sq. of the oversight of the work and workmen for the building of the Temple. The same 3300 (3600) overseers, who are called בְּמֵלָאכֶה הָעֹשִׂים בְּעַם הָרְרִים in 1 Kings v. 30 are described by the chronicler (2 Chron. ii. 1) as מְנַצְּחִים עֲלֵיהֶם. In connection with the repair of the Temple under Josiah we read that Levites were appointed לְנִצְחָה (2 Chron. xxxiv. 12), namely מְלָאכֶה לְבַל עֲשֶׂה (ver. 13), instead of which we find it said in ii. 17 לְהַשְׁבִּיר, to keep the people at their work. The primary notion of נָצַח is that of shining, and in fact of the purest and most dazzling brightness; this then passes over to the notion of shining over or outshining, and in fact both of uninterrupted continuance and of excellence and superiority (vid. Ithpa. Dan. vi. 4, and cf. 1 Chron. xxiii. 4 with ix. 13; 1 Cor. xv. 54 with Isa. xxv. 8).

Thus, therefore, קָנַץ is one who shows eminent ability in any department, and then it gains the general signification of master, director, chief overseer. At the head of the Psalms it is commonly understood of the director of the Temple-music. קָנַץ est dux cantus — Luther says in one place — quem nos dicimus den Kapellenmeister [the band-master], qui orditur et gubernat cantum, ἄρχος (Opp. lat. xvii. 134 ed. Erl.). But 1st, even the Psalms of Asaph have this קָנַץ at the beginning, and he was himself a director of the Temple-music, and in fact the chief-director (שֹׁרֵר) 1 Chron. xvi. 5, or at any rate he was one of the three (Heman, Asaph, Ethan), to whom the 24 classes of the 4000 Levite singers under the Davidico-Salomonic sanctuary were subordinate; 2ndly, the passage of the chronicler (1 Chron. xv. 17—21) which is most prominent in reference to this question, does not accord with this explanation. According to this passage the three directors of the Temple-music managed the cymbals שֹׁרֵר, to sound aloud; eight other musicians of high rank the nablas and six others the citherns קָנַץ. This expression cannot mean “to direct”, for the direction belonged to the three, and the cymbals were also better adapted to it than the citherns. It means “to take the lead in the playing”: the cymbals directed and the citherns, better adapted to take the lead in the playing, were related to them, somewhat as the violins to the clarinets now-a-days. Hence קָנַץ is not the director of the Temple-music but in general the master of song, and קָנַץ addresses the Psalm to him whose duty it is to arrange it and to train the Levite choristers; it therefore defines the Psalm as belonging to the songs of the Temple worship that require musical accompaniment. The translation of the Targum (Luther) also corresponds to this general sense of the expression: אֲבָרָךְ “to be sung liturgically”, and the LXX: εἰς τὸ τέλος, if this signifies “to the execution” and does not on the contrary ascribe an eschatological meaning to the Psalm.*

The בְּנִינֹתָ which is added is not governed by it. This can be seen at once from Hab. iii. 19: to the chief singer, with an accompaniment of my stringed instruments (vid. my Commentary), which Hitzig renders: to the chief singer of my musical pieces; but נִצַּחָה בְּ is not a phrase that can be supported, and נִינְיָה does not mean a piece of music. The Piel, נִגַּן, complete with בָּיָד, signifies to touch the strings (cogn. נָעַע), to play a stringed instrument. Whence comes נִינְיָה (lxxvii. 7, Isa. xxxviii. 20) which is almost always used as a pluralet.: the play of the stringed instruments, and the superscribed בְּנִינֹתָ Ps. iv. vi. liv. lv. lxvii. lxxvi.: with an accompaniment of the stringed instruments; and כֹּ is used as in xlix. 5, Isa. xxx. 29, 32. The hymn is to be sung in company with, probably with the sole accompaniment of, the stringed instruments. The fact of the inscribed words נִינְיָה preceding מִזְמוֹר לְדָוִד probably arises from the fact of their being written originally at the top over the chief title which gave the generic name of the hymn and the author.

Ver. 2. Jahve is אֱלֹהֵי צֶדֶק, the possessor of righteousness, the author of righteousness, and the vindicator of misjudged and persecuted righteousness. This God of righteousness David believingly calls his God (cf. xxiv. 5, lix. 11); for the righteousness he possesses, he possesses in Him, and the righteousness he looks for, he looks for in Him. That this is not in vain, his previous experience assures him: Thou hast made a breadth (space) for me when in a strait. In connection with this confirmatory relation of בָּצַר ה'רַחֲבָה לִי it is more probable that we have before us an attributive clause (Hitz.), than that we have an independent one, and at any rate it is a retrospective clause. ה'רַחֲבָה is not precative (Böttch.), for the perf. of certainty with a precativ colouring is confined to such exclamatory utterances as Job xxi. 16 (which see). He bases his prayer on two things, viz. on his fellowship with God, the righteous God, and on His justifying grace which he has already experienced. He has been many times in a strait already, and God has made a broad place for him. The idea of the expansion of the breathing (of the stream of air) and of space is attached to the ח of רחב, root רח (Deutsch. Morgenl. Zeitschr. xii. 657). What is meant is the expansion of the straitened heart, xxv. 17. Isa. lx. 5, and the widening of a straitened position, xviii. 20, cxviii. 5. On the Dag. in לִי vid. on lxxxiv. 4.

Psalms with לְמַנְצָה and בְּנִינֹתָ refer to the last days. Gregory of Nyssa combines the different translations by rendering: εἰς τέλος, ἕως ἔσθιν ἢ ἄχα. Ewald's view, that τέλος in this formula means consecration, celebration, worship, is improbable; in this signification it is not a Septuagint word.

Vers. 3—4. Righteous in his relation to God he turns rebukingly towards those who contemn him whose honour is God's honour, viz. to the partisans of Absalom. In contrast with בְּנֵי אֱדָם, men who are lost in the multitude, בְּנֵי אֵלִים denotes such as stand prominently forward out of the multitude; passages like xlix. 3, lxii. 10, Prov. viii. 4, Isa. ii. 9, v. 15, shew this distinction. In this and the preceding Psalm David makes as little mention of his degenerate son as he does of the deluded king in the Psalms belonging to the period of his persecution by Saul. The address is directed to the aristocratic party, whose tool Absalom has become. To these he says: till when (עַד-מָה) beside the non-guttural which follows with Segol, without any manifest reason, as in x. 13, Isa. i. 5, Jer. xvi. 10), i. e. how long shall my honour become a mockery, namely to you and by you, just as we can also say in Latin quousque tandem dignitas mea ludibrio? The two following members are circumstantial clauses subordinate to the principal clause with עַד-מָה (similar to Isa. i. 5 a; Ew. § 341, b). The energetic fut. with Nun parag. does not usually stand at the head of independent clauses; it is therefore to be rendered: since ye love רִיק, that which is empty — the proper name for their high rank is hollow appearance — how long will ye pursue after כְּזָב, falsehood? — they seek to find out every possible lying pretext, in order to trail the honour of the legitimate king in the dust. The assertion that the personal honour of David, not his kingly dignity, is meant by בְּבוֹרֵי, separates what is inseparable. They are eager to injure his official at the same time as his personal reputation. Therefore David appeals in opposition to them (ver. 4) not only to the divine choice, but also to his personal relationship to God, on which that choice is based. The ו of וְדַע is, as in 2 Kings iv. 41, the ו of sequence: so know then. The Hiph. הִפְלֵה (from הִפֵּל — הִפֵּל, cogn. לָפַל, prop. to divide) to make a separation, make a distinction Exod. ix. 4, xi. 7, then to distinguish in an extraordinary and remarkable way Exod. viii. 18, and to shew Ps. xvii. 7, cf. xxxi. 22, so that consequently what is meant is not the mere selection (בְּחָר), but the remarkable selection to a remarkable position of honour (LXX., Vulg. mirificavit, Windberg translation of the Psalms gewunderlichet). לוֹ belongs to the verb, as in cxxxv. 4, and the principal accent lies on הַחֲסִיד: he whom Jahve Himself, not men, has thus remarkably distinguished is a חֲסִיד, a pious man, i. e. either, like the Syriac חֲסִידָא — רְחִימָא: God's favourite, or, according to the biblical usage of the language (cf. xii 2 with Isa. lvii. 1), in an active signification like פְּרִיץ, פְּרִיץ, and the like: a lover of God, from חָסַד (root חס חס stringere, whence hassa to curry, mahassa a curry-comb) prop. to feel one's self drawn, i. e. strongly affected (comp. hiss a mental impression), in Hebrew, of a strong ardent affection. As a חֲסִיד he does not call upon God in vain, but finds a ready hearing. Their undertaking consequently runs counter to the miraculously evidenced will of God and must fail by reason of the loving relationship in which the dethroned and debased one stands to God.

Vers. 5—6. The address is continued: they are to repent and cleave to Jahve instead of allowing themselves to be carried away by arrogance and discontent. The LXX. has rendered it correctly: ὀργιζέσθε καὶ μὴ ἀμαρτάνετε (cf. Ephes. iv. 26): if ye will be angry beware of sinning, viz. backbiting and rebellion (cf. the similar paratactic combinations xxviii. 1, Josh. vi. 18, Isa. xii. 1). In connection with the rendering contremiscite we feel to miss any expression of that before which they are to tremble (viz. the sure punishment which God decrees). He warns his adversaries against blind passion, and counsels them to quiet converse with their own hearts, and solitary meditation, in order that they may not imperil their own salvation. To commune with one's own heart, without the addition of the object, is equivalent to to think alone by one's self, and the bed or resting-place, without requiring to be understood literally, points to a condition of mind that is favourable to quiet contemplation. The heart is the seat of the conscience, and the Spirit of God (as Hamann, Werke i. 98, observes on this subject) disguises itself as our own voice that we may see His exhortation, His counsel, and His wisdom well up out of our own stony heart. The second imper. continues the first: and cease, prop. be still (קָמַד from the sound of the closed mouth checking the discourse), i. e. come to your right mind by self-examination, cease your tumult — a warning coming with the semblance of command by reason of the consciousness of innocence on his part; and this impression has to be rendered here by the striking in of the music. The dehortation passes over into exhortation in ver. 6. Of course the sacrifices were continued in the sanctuary while David, with his faithful followers, was a fugitive from Jerusalem. Referring to this, David cries out to the Absolomites: offer זָבַח־צֶדֶק. Here at least these are not offerings consisting of actions which are in accordance with the will of God, instead of slaughtered animals, but sacrifices offered with a right mind, conformed to the will of God, instead of the hypocritical mind with which they consecrate their evil doings and think to flatter God. In li. 21, Deut. xxxiii. 19 also, "the sacrifices of righteousness" are real sacrifices, not merely symbols of moral acts. Not less full of meaning is the exhortation וּבְטַח־אֶל־יהוָה. The verb בָּטַח is construed with אֶל as in xxxi. 7, lvi. 4, lxxxvi. 2, combining with the notion of trusting that of drawing near to, hanging on, attaching one's self to any one. The Arabic word بَطَحَ, expandere, has preserved the primary notion of the word, a notion which, as in the synon. بَسَطَ, when referred to the effect which is produced on the heart, countenance and whole nature of the man by a joyous cheerful state of mind, passes over to the notion of this state of mind itself, so that بָטַח (like the Arab. inbasata to be cheerful, fearless, bold, lit. expanded (cf. Isa. lxi. 5) — unstraitened) consequently signifies to be courageous, confident. They are to renounce the self-trust which blinds them in their opposition to the king who is deprived of all human assistance. If they will trustingly submit themselves to God, then at the same time the murmuring and rancorous discontent, from which the rebellion has sprung, will be stilled. Thus far the address to the rebellious magnates goes.

Vers. 7—8. Looking into his own small camp David is conscious of a disheartened feeling which is gaining power over him. The words: who will make us see, i. e. (as in xxxiv. 13) experience any good? can be taken as expressive of a wish according to 2 Sam. xxiii. 15, Isa. xlii. 23; but the situation gives it the character of a despondent question arising from a disheartened view of the future. The gloom has now lasted so long with David's companions in tribulation that their faith is turned to fear, their hope to despair. David therefore prays as he looks upon them: Oh lift upon us (נָסֵה-עֲלֵינוּ)* the light of Thy countenance. The form of the petition reminds one of the priestly benediction in Num. vi. There it is: יָאֵר ה' פָּנָיו in the second portion, in the third יִשָּׂא פָּנָיו, here these two wishes are blended into one prayer; and moreover in נָסֵה there is an allusion to נָס a banner, for the imper. of נִשָּׂא, the regular form of which is שָׂא, will also admit of the form נִשָּׂה (x. 12), but the mode of writing נָסֵה (without example elsewhere, for נָסֵה Job iv. 2 signifies "to be attempted") is only explained by the mingling of the verbs נִשָּׂא and נָסַם, نَصَّ, extollere (lx. 6); ה' נָסִי (cf. lx. 6) is, moreover, a primeval word of the Tôra (Ex. xvii. 15). If we may suppose that this mingling is not merely a mingling of forms in writing, but also a mingling of the ideas in those forms, then we have three thoughts in this prayer which are brought before the eye and ear in the briefest possible expression:

* The Methey which stands in the second syllable before the tone stands by the Shebâ, in the metrical books, if this syllable is the first in a word marked with a greater distinctive without any conjunctive preceding it, and beginning with Shebâ; it is, therefore, not נָסֵה-עֲלֵינוּ but נָסֵה-עֲלֵינוּ, cf. li. 2 פָּכֹחַ, lxix. 28 נִתְנָה, lxxxi. 3 שָׂאָר, cxvi. 17 לָד, cxix. 175 יִחַר. The reason and object are the same as stated in note p. 84 supra.

may Jahve cause His face to shine upon them; may He lift upon them the light of His countenance so that they may have it above them like the sun in the sky, and may that light be a banner promising them the victory, around which they shall rally.

David, however, despite the hopelessness of the present, is even now at peace in His God. The joy which Jahve has put into his heart in the midst of outward trial and adversity is  $\text{מִעַתָּה דִּנְנִים וְחִירוֹשָׁם יְרָבִי}$ . The expression is as concise as possible: (1) gaudium præ equivalent to gaudium magnum præ = majus quam; then (2)  $\text{מִעַתָּה}$  after the analogy of the comparatio decurtata (e. g. xviii. 34 my feet are like hinds, i. e. like the feet of hinds) is equivalent to  $\text{מִשְׁמַחַת עַר}$ ; (3)  $\text{אֲשֶׁר}$  is omitted after  $\text{עַר}$  according to Ges. § 123, 3, for  $\text{עַר}$  is the construct state, and what follows is the second member of the genitival relation, dependent upon it (cf. xc. 15, Isa. xxix. 1); the plurality of things: corn and new wine, inasmuch as it is the stores of both that are specially meant, is exceptionally joined with the plur. instead of the sing., and the chief word rābbu stands at the end by way of emphasis. The suff. does not refer to the people of the land in general (as in lxxv. 10), but, in accordance with the contrast, to the Absolomites, to those of the nation who have fallen away from David. When David came to Mahanaim, while the rebels were encamped in Gilead, the country round about him was hostile, so that he had to receive provisions by stealth, 2 Sam. xvii. 26—29. Perhaps it was at the time of the feast of tabernacles. The harvest and the vintage were over. A rich harvest of corn and new wine was garnered. The followers of Absolom had, in these rich stores which were at their disposal, a powerful reserve upon which to fall back. David and his host were like a band of beggars or marauders. But the king brought down from the sceptre to the beggar's staff is nevertheless happier than they, the rebels against him. What he possesses in his heart is a richer treasure than all that they have in their barns and cellars.

Ver. 9. Thus then he lies down to sleep, cheerfully and peacefully. The hymn closes as it began with a three line verse.  $\text{יְקַדְדִי}$  (lit. in its unions = collectively, Olshausen, § 135, c, like כלו altogether, בְּעֵתוֹ at the right time) is by no means unemphatic; nor is it so in xix. 10 where it means "all together, without exception". With synonymous verbs it denotes the combination of that which they imply, as Isa. xlii. 14. It is similar in cxli. 10 where it expresses the coincidence of the fall of his enemies and the escape of the persecuted one. So here: he wishes to go to sleep and also at once he falls asleep (וַיִּשָׁן in a likewise cohortative sense — וַיִּשְׁכַּב). His God makes him to dwell in seclusion free of care. לְבַרְדָּךְ is a first definition of condition, and בְּבֵטְחֶךָ a second. The former is not, after Deut. xxxii. 12, equivalent to לְבַרְדָּךְ, an addition which would be without any implied antithesis and consequently meaningless. One must therefore, as is indeed required by the situation, understand לְבַרְדָּךְ according to Num. xxiii. 9, Mic. vii, 14, Deut. xxxiii. 28, Jer. xlix. 31. He needs no guards for he is guarded round about by Jahve and kept in safety. The seclusion, בְּרֵדָה, in which he is, is security, בְּבֵטָחָה, because Jahve is near him. Under what a many phases and how sweetly the nature of faith is expressed in this and the foregoing Psalm: his righteousness, exaltation, joy, peace, contentment in God! And how delicately conceived is the rhythm! In the last line the evening hymn itself sinks to rest. The iambs with which it closes are like the last strains of a lullaby which die away softly and as though falling asleep themselves. Dante is right when he says in his Convito, that the sweetness of the music and harmony of the Hebrew Psalter is lost in the Greek and Latin translations.

PSALM V.

MORNING PRAYER BEFORE GOING TO THE HOUSE OF GOD.

- 2 GIVE ear to my words, O Jahve,
Consider my meditation!
- 3 Hearken unto my loud cry, my King and my God,
For unto Thee do I pray.
- 4 Jahve, in the morning shalt Thou hear my voice
In the morning will I prepare an offering for Thee and look forth.

- 5 For Thou art not a God that hath pleasure in wickedness,
An evil man cannot dwell with Thee.
- 6 Boasters cannot stand in Thy sight,
Thou hatest all workers of iniquity;
- 7 Thou destroyest them that speak lies,
The man of blood-guiltiness and malice Jahve abhorreth.
- 8 Yet I, through Thy rich grace, may enter Thy house,
I may worship towards Thy holy Temple in Thy fear.
- 9 Jahve, lead me by Thy righteousness, because of them that lie in wait for me,
Make Thy way even before my face —
- 10 For in his mouth is nothing certain, their inward part is an abyss,
An open sepulchre is their throat,
with a smooth tongue.
- 11 Punish them, Elohim, let them fall from their counsels,
In the multitude of their transgressions cast them away,
who defy Thee;
- 12 That all they who trust in Thee may rejoice,
may ever shout for joy;
And defend Thou them that they may exult in Thee, who love Thy name.
- 13 For Thou, even Thou, dost bless the righteous — Jahve! with favour dost Thou compass him as with a shield.

The evening prayer is now followed by a second morning prayer, which like the former draws to a close with כִּי-אָחֳזָה (iv. 9, v. 13). The situation is different from that in Ps. iii. In that Psalm David is fleeing, here he is in Jerusalem and anticipates going up to the Temple service. If this Psalm also belongs to the time of the rebellion of Absalom, it must have been written when the fire which afterwards broke forth was already smouldering in secret.

The inscription אֶל-הַנְּחִילֹת is certainly not a motto indicative of its contents (LXX., Vulg., Luther, Hengstenberg). As such it would stand after מִזְמֹר. Whatever is connected with לְמִנְצָה, always has reference to the music. If נְחִילֹת came from נחל it might according to the biblical use of this verb signify "inheritances", or according to its use in the Talmud "swarms", and in fact swarms of bees (נחל); and נחליות ought then to be the beginning of a popular melody to which the Psalm is adapted. Hai Gaon understands it to denote a melody resembling the hum of bees; Reggio a song that sings of bees. Or is נחליות equivalent to נחליות (excavate) and this a special name for the flutes (נחלים)? The use of the flute in the service of the sanctuary is attested by Isa. xxx. 29, cf. 1 Sam. x. 5, 1 Kings i. 40.* The præp. אָל was, then, more appropriate than עַל; because, as Redslob has observed, the singer cannot play the flute at the same time, but can only sing to the playing of another.

The Psalm consists of four six line strophes. The lines of the strophes here and there approximate to the cæsura-schema. They consist of a rising and a sudden lowering. The German language, which uses so many more words, is not adapted to this cæsura-schema [and the same may be said of the English].

Vers. 2—4. The introit: Prayer to be heard. The thoughts are simple but the language is carefully chosen. אָמַרִים is the plur. of אָמַר (אָמַר), one of the words peculiar to the poetic prophetic style. The denominative הִאָּזֵן (like audire — aus, אָז, dare) belongs more to poetry than prose. הִגִּי (like אָבִיב) or הִגִּי (like מְחִיר) occurs only in two Psalms לְרֹד, viz. here and xxxix. 4. It is derived from הִגָּה — הִגָּה (vid. i. 2) and signifies that which is spoken meditatively, here praying in rapt devotion. Beginning thus the prayer gradually rises to a vox clamoris. שָׁעִי from שָׁעוּ, to be distinguished from שָׁעִי (inf. Pi.) xxviii. 2, xxxi. 23, is one word with the Aram. Æthiop. צוּע (to call). On הִקְשִׁיב used of intent listening, vid. x. 17. The invocation וְאֵלֶיךָ, when it is a king who utters it, is all the more significant. David, and in general the theocratic king, is only the representative of the Invisible One, whom he with all Israel adores as his King. Prayer to Him is his first work as he begins the day. In the morning, בִּקֵּר (as in lv. 18 for בִּבְקֵר, lxxxviii. 14), shalt Thou hear my cry, is equivalent to my cry which goes forth with the early morn. Hupfeld considers the mention of the morning as only a "poetical expression" and when getting rid of the meaning prima luce, he also gets rid of the beautiful and obvious reference to the daily sacrifice. The verb עָרַךְ is the word used of laying the wood in order for the sacrifice, Lev. i. 7, and the pieces of the sacrifice, Lev. i. 8, 12, vi. 5, of putting the sacred lamps in order, Ex. xxvii. 21, Lev. xxiv. 3 sq., and of setting the shew-bread in order, Ex. xl. 23, Lev. xxiv. 8. The laying of the wood in order for the morning offering of a lamb (Lev. vi. 5 [12], cf. Num. xxviii. 4) was one of the first duties of the priest, as soon as the day began to dawn; the lamb was slain before sun-rise and when the sun appeared above the horizon laid piece by piece upon the altar. The morning prayer is compared to this morning sacrifice. This is in its way also a sacrifice. The object which David has in his mind in connection with אָעָרַךְ is תְּפִלָּתִי. As the priests, with the early morning, lay the wood and pieces of the sacrifices of the Tanid upon the altar, so he brings his prayer before God as a spiritual sacrifice and looks out for an answer (צָפַר speculari as in Hab. ii. 1), perhaps as the priest looks out for fire from heaven to consume the sacrifice, or looks to the smoke to see that it rises up straight towards heaven.

Vers. 5—7: The basing of the prayer on God's holiness. The verbal adjective חָפֵץ (coming from the primitive signification of adhering firmly which is still preserved in خَفِض fut. i.) is in the sing. always (xxxiv. 13, xxxv. 27) joined with the accusative. רָע is conceived as a person, for although נֹגֵר may have a material object, it cannot well have a material subject. יִנְגֵר is used for brevity of expression instead of עָמַד (Ges. § 121, 4). The verb נֹגֵר (to turn in, to take up one's abode with or near any one) frequently has an accusative object, cxx. 5, Judges v. 17, and Isa. xxxiii. 14 according to which the light of the divine holiness is to sinners a consuming fire, which they cannot endure. Now there follow specific designations of the wicked. הוֹלְלִים part. Kal — hōl'im, or even Poal — hōl'im (— מְהוֹלְלִים),* are the foolish, and more especially foolish boasters; the primary notion of the verb is not that of being hollow, but that of sounding, then of loud boisterous, non-sensical behaviour. Of such it is said, that they are not able to maintain their position when they become manifest before the eye of God (לִנְגַד as in ci. 7 manifest before any one, from נָגַד to come forward, be visible far off, be distinctly visible). אֲנִי אֶעֱשֶׂה are those who work (οἱ ἐργαζόμενοι Mat. vii. 23) iniquity; אֲנִי אֶנְדָּב (ἀνεμος) is sometimes trouble, in connection with which one pants, sometimes wickedness, in which there is not even a trace of any thing noble, true, or pure. Such men Jahve hates; for if He did not hate evil (xi. 5), His love would not be a holy love. In דַּבְּרֵי בָנָב is the usual form in combination when the plur. is used, instead of מְדַבְּרֵי. It is the same in lviii. 4. The style of expression is also Davidic in other respects, viz. אִישׁ דְּמִים וּמְרֻמָּה as in lv. 24, and אֶבֶר as in ix. 6, cf. xxi. 11. תַּעֲב (in Amos, ch. vi. 8 תַּאֲב) appears to be a secondary formation from עוֹב, like תַּאֲב to desire, from אָבָה, and therefore to be of a cognate root with the Aram. עֲבָ to despise, treat with indignity, and the Arabic 'aib a stain (cf. on Lam. ii. 1). The fact that, as Hengstenberg has observed, wickedness and the wicked are described in a sevenfold manner is perhaps merely accidental.

Vers. 8—10. Since the Psalm is a morning hymn, the futt. in ver. 8 state what he, on the contrary, may and will do (lxvi. 13). By the greatness and fulness of divine favour (lxix. 14) he has access (εἰσόδον, for בָּוֵא means, according to its root, "to enter") to the sanctuary, and he will accordingly repair thither to-day. It is the tabernacle on Zion in which was the ark of the covenant that is meant here. That daily liturgical service was celebrated there must be assumed, since the ark of the covenant is the sign and pledge of Jahve's presence; and it is, moreover, attested by 1 Chron. xvi. 37 sq. It is also to be supposed that sacrifice was offered daily before the tabernacle. For it is not to be inferred from 1 Chron. xvi, 39 sqq. that sacrifice was only offered regularly on the Bama (high place) in Gibeon before the Mosaic tabernacle.* It is true sacrifice was offered in Gibeon, where the old tabernacle and the old altars (or at least the altar of burnt-offering) were, and also that after the removal of the ark to Zion both David (1 Chron. xxi. 29 sq.) and Solomon (1 Kings iii. 4, 2 Chron. i. 2—6) worshipped and sacrificed in Gibeon. But it is self-evident sacrifices might have been offered where the ark was, and that even with greater right than in Gibeon; and since both David, upon its arrival (2 Sam. vi. 17 sq.), and Solomon after his accession (1 Kings iii. 15), offered sacrifices through the priests who were placed there, it is probable, — and by a comparison of the Davidic Psalms not to be doubted,—that there was a daily service, in conjunction with sacrifices, before the ark on Zion.

But, moreover, is it really the אֱהֶל on Zion which is meant here in ver. 8 by the house of God? It is still maintained by renowned critics that the tabernacle pitched by David over the sacred ark is never called הַבַּיִת or הַיְכָל or הַמִּשְׁכָּן or מִקְדָּשׁ or קֹדֶשׁ. But why could it not have all these names? We will not appeal to the fact that the house of God at Shilo (1 Sam. i. 9, iii. 3) is called בַּיִת and הַיְכָל, since it may be objected that it was really more of a temple than a tabernacle,** although in the same book, ch. ii. 22 it is called אֱהֶל מוֹעֵד, and in connection with the other appellations the poetic colouring of the historical style of 1 Sam.

i.—iii. is to be taken into consideration. Moreover, we put aside passages like Ex. xxiii. 19, xxxiv. 26, since it may be said that the future Temple was present to the mind of the Lawgiver. But in Josh. vi. 24, 2 Sam. xii. 20, the sanctuary is called בית ה' without being conceived of as a temple. Why then cannot the tabernacle, which David pitched for the ark of the covenant when removed to Zion (2 Sam. vi. 17), be called בית ה'? It is only when אהל and בית are placed in opposition to one another that the latter has the notion of a dwelling built of more solid materials; but in itself beit (bêt) in Semitic is the generic term for housing of every kind whether it be made of wool, felt, and hair-cloth, or of earth, stone, and wood; consequently it is just as much a tent as a house (in the stricter sense of the word), whether the latter be a hut built of wood and clay or a palace.* If a dwelling-house is frequently called אהל, then a tent that any one dwells in may the more naturally be called his בית. And this we find is actually the case with the dwellings of the patriarchs, which, although they were not generally solid houses (Gen. xxxiii. 17), are called בית (Gen. xxvii. 15). Moreover, היכל (from יכל = כול to hold, capacem esse), although it signifies a palace does not necessarily signify one of stone, for the heavens are also called Jahve's היכל, e. g. xviii. 7, and not necessarily one of gigantic proportions, for even the Holy of holies of Solomon's Temple, and this par excellence, is called היכל, and once, 1 Kings vi. 3, היכל הבית. Of the spaciousness and general character of the Davidic tabernacle we know indeed nothing: it certainly had its splendour, and was not so much a substitute for the original tabernacle, which according to the testimony of the chronicler remained in Gibeon, as a substitute for the Temple that was still to be built. But, however insignificant it may have been, Jahve had His throne there, and it was therefore the הֵיבֵל of a great king, just as the wall-less place in the open field where God manifested Himself with His angels to the homeless Jacob was בֵּית אֱלֹהִים (Gen. xxviii. 17).

Into this tabernacle of God, i. e. into its front court, will David enter (בָּיָא with acc. as in lxvi. 13) this morning, there will he prostrate himself in worship, προσκυνεῖν (הִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה) reflexive of the Pilel שָׁחָה, Ges. § 75, rem. 18), towards (אֶל as in xxviii. 2, 1 Kings viii. 29, 35, cf. לְ xcix. 5, 9) Jahve's קָדֵשׁ הַיְיָבֵל, i. e. the קָדִיִּשׁ, the Holy of holies xxviii. 2, and that "in Thy fear", i. e. in reverence before Thee (genit. objectivus). The going into the Temple which David purposes, leads his thoughts on to his way through life, and the special δέησις, which only begins here, moulds itself accordingly: he prays for God's gracious guidance as in xxvii. 11, lxxxvi. 11, and frequently. The direction of God, by which he wishes to be guided he calls צִדְקָה. Such is the general expression for the determination of conduct by an ethical rule. The rule, acting in accordance with which, God is called par excellence צְדִיק, is the order of salvation which opens up the way of mercy to sinners. When God forgives those who walk in this way their sins, and stands near to bless and protect them, He shews Himself not less צְדִיק (just), than when He destroys those who despise Him, in the heat of His rejected love. By this righteousness, which accords with the counsel and order of mercy, David prays to be led לְמַעַן שׁוֹרְרֵי, in order that the malicious desire of those who lie in wait for him may not be fulfilled, but put to shame, and that the honour of God may not be sullied by him. שׁוֹרֵר is equivalent to מְשׁוֹרֵר (Aquila ἐφοδεύω, Jerome insidiator) from the Pilel שׁוֹרֵר to fix one's eyes sharply upon, especially of hostile observation. David further prays that God will make his way (i. e. the way in which a man must walk according to God's will) even and straight before him, the praying one, in order that he may walk therein without going astray and unimpeded. The adj. יָשָׁר signifies both the straightness of a line and the evenness of a surface. The fut. of the Hiph. הַיִּשִׁיר is יִישִׁיר in Prov. iv. 25, and accordingly the Keri substitutes for the imper. הוֹשִׁיר the corresponding form הַיִּשִׁיר, just as in Isa. xlv. 2 it removes the Hiphil form אֹשֶׁר (cf. Gen. viii. 17 הוֹצֵא Keri הוֹצֵא), without any grammatical, but certainly not without some traditional ground.

כִּי in ver. 10 is closely connected with לִמְעַן שׁוֹרְרֵי: on account of my way-layers, for the following are their characteristics. אֵין is separated by בְּפִירוֹ (- בְּפִי - lxii. 5) from נִבְזָה the word it governs; this was the more easily possible as the usage of the language almost entirely lost sight of the fact that אֵין is the construct of אֵין, Ges. § 152, 1. In his mouth is nothing that should stand firm, keep its ground, remain the same (cf. Job xlii. 7 sq.). The singular suffix of בְּפִירוֹ has a distributive meaning: in ore uniuscujusque eorum. Hence the sing. at once passes over into the plur.: קִרְבָּם הוֹרֵת: their inward part, i. e. that towards which it goes forth and in which it has its rise (vid. xlix. 12) is הוֹרֵת corruption, from הוֹרָה which comes from הוֹרָה = هَوَى to yawn, gape, χαίρειν, hiare, a yawning abyss and a gaping vacuum, and then, inasmuch as, starting from the primary idea of an empty space, the verbal significations libere ferri (especially from below upwards) and more particularly animo ad or in aliquid ferri are developed, it obtains the pathological sense of strong desire, passion, just as it does also the intellectual sense of a loose way of thinking proceeding from a self-willed tendency (vid. Fleischer on Job xxxvii. 6). In Hebrew the prevalent meaning of the word is corruption, lvii. 2, which is a metaphor for the abyss, barathrum, (so far, but only so far Schultens on Prov. x. 3 is right), and proceeding from this meaning it denotes both that which is physically corruptible (Job. vi. 30) and, as in the present passage and frequently, that which is corruptible from an ethical point of view. The meaning strong desire, in which הוֹרָה looks as though it only differed from אֵין in one letter, occurs only in lii. 9, Prov. x. 3, Mic. vii. 3. The substance of their inward part is that which is corruptible in every way, and their throat, as the organ of speech, as in cxv. 7, cxlix. 6, cf. lxix. 4, is (perhaps a figure connected with the primary meaning of רֹחוֹת) a grave, which yawns like the jaws, which open and snatch and swallow down whatever comes in their way. To this "they make smooth their tongue" is added as a circumstantial clause. Their throat is thus formed and adapted, while they make smooth their tongue (cf. Prov. ii. 16), in order to conceal their real design beneath flattering language. From this meaning, קָהַלֵּק directly signifies to flatter in xxxvi. 3, Prov. xxix. 5. The last two lines of the strophe are formed according to the cæsura schema. This schema is also continued in the concluding strophe.

Vers. 11—13. The verb אָשָׁם or אָשָׁם unites in itself the three closely allied meanings of becoming guilty (e. g. Lev. v. 19), of a feeling of guilt (Lev. v. 4 sq.), and of expiation (Ps. xxxiv. 22 sq.); just as the verbal adj. אָשָׁם also signifies both liable to punishment and expiating, and the substantive אָשָׁם both the guilt to be expiated and the expiation. The Hiph. הִאֲשִׁימֵם signifies to cause any one to render the expiation due to his fault, to make him do penance. As an exception God is here, in the midst of the Jehovic Psalms, called אֱלֹהִים, perhaps not altogether unintentionally as being God the Judge. The מֶן of מִפְּעוֹתֵיהֶם (with Gaja by the מֶן and a transition of the counter-tone Metheg into Galgal, as in Hos. xi. 6 into Meajla, vid. Psalter ii. 526) is certainly that of the cause in Hos. xi. 6, but here it is to be explained with Olsh. and Hitz. according to Sir. xiv. 2, Judith xi. 6 (cf. Hos. x. 6): may they fall from their own counsels, i. e. founder in the execution of them. Therefore מֶן in the sense of "down from, away", a sense which the parallel בְּהִדְחֵם, thrust them away (cf. הָרוּ from דָּחָה xxxvi. 13), presupposes. The ב of בָּרַב is to be understood according to John viii. 21, 24 "ye shall die ἐν ταῖς ἀμαρτίαις ὑμῶν". The multitude of their transgressions shall remain unforgiven and in this state God is to cast them into hades. The ground of this terrible prayer is set forth by כִּי מָרוּ בָּךְ. The tone of מָרוּ for a well-known reason (cf. e. g., xxxvii. 40, lxiv. 11, lxxii. 17) has retreated to the penult. מָרָה, root מָר, prop. to be or hold one's self stiff towards any one, compare תִּמָּז, to press and stiffen against one another in wrestling, תִּמָּרִי, to struggle against anything, whether with outward or mental and moral opposition: Their obstinacy is not obstinacy against a man, but against God Himself; their sin is, therefore, Satanic and on that account unpardonable. All the prayers of this character are based upon the assumption expressed in vii. 13, that those against whom they are directed do not wish for mercy. Accordingly their removal is prayed for. Their removal will make the ecclesia pressa free and therefore joyous. From this point of view the prayer in ver. 12 is inspired by the prospect of the result of their removal. The futt. do not express a wish, but a consequence. The division of the verse is, however, incorrect. The rise of the first half of the verse closes with בָּךְ (the pausal form by Pazer), its fall is לְעוֹלָם יִרְנְנוּ; then the rise begins anew in the second half, extending to בָּךְ which ought likewise to be pointed בְּךָ, and אֶרְבִּי שְׂמֵחָה is its fall. וְהִסְתַּחֲפַתְנוּ עֲלֵימוֹ (from הִסְתַּחֲפַתְנוּ Hiph. of אֶרְבִּי xcii. 4) is awkward in this sequence of thoughts. Hupfeld and Hitzig render it: "they shall rejoice for ever whom Thou defendest"; but then it ought not only to be pointed יִרְנְנוּ, but the וְ must also be removed, and yet there is nothing to characterise עֲלֵימוֹ as being virtually a subject. On the other hand it does not harmonise with the other consecutive futures.

 It must therefore, like יִפְלֵי, be the optative: "And do Thou defend them, then shall those who love Thy name rejoice in Thee". And then upon this joy of those who love the name of Jahve (i. e. God in His revelation of Himself in redemption) lxix. 37, cxix. 132, is based by כִּרְאֲפָה from a fact of universal experience which is the sum of all His historical self-attestations. עֲלֵימוֹ is used instead of עֲלֵיהֶם as a graver form of expression, just like הִדְיָחְמוּ for הִדְיָחֶם as an indignant one. The form וְיַעֲלִצֵנוּ (Ges. § 63, 3) is chosen instead of the יַעֲלִצֵנוּ found in xxv. 2, lxxviii. 4, in order to assist the rhythm. The futt. are continuative. הִעֲמַרְנוּ, cinges eum, is not a contracted Hiph. according to 1 Sam. xvii. 25, but Kal as in 1 Sam. xxiii. 26; here it is used like the Piel in viii. 6 with a double accusative. The צָנָה (from صَانٍ med. Waw, Æthiop. צון to hedge round, guard) is a shield of a largest dimensions; larger than מִן 1 Kings x. 16 sq. (cf. 1 Sam. xvii. 7, where Goliath has his צָנָה borne by a shield-bearer). כְּצִנָּה "like a shield" is equivalent to: as with a shield (Ges. § 118, 3, rem.). The name of God, יְהוָה, is correctly drawn to the second member of the verse by the accentuation, in order to balance it with the first; and for this reason the first clause does not begin with כִּי־אֶתֶּה יְהוָה here as it does elsewhere (iv. 9, xii. 8). רִצּוֹן delight, goodwill, is also a synonym for the divine blessing in Deut. xxxiii. 23.

PSALM VI.

A CRY FOR MERCY UNDER JUDGMENT.

- 2 JAHVE, not in Thy wrath rebuke me,
And not in Thy hot displeasure chasten me!
- 3 Be gracious unto me, for I am fading away;
Oh heal me, Jahve, for my bones are affrighted,
- 4 And my soul is affrighted exceedingly —
And Thou, O Jahve, how long?!
- 5 Return, Jahve, rescue my soul,
Save me for Thy mercy's sake.
- 6 For in death there is no remembrance of Thee,
In Sheôl who can give Thee thanks?
- 7 I am exhausted with my groaning,
Every night make I my bed to swim —
With my tears I flood my couch.
- 8 Sunken is mine eye with grief,
It is grown old because of all mine oppressors.
- 9 Depart from me all ye who deal wickedly!
For Jahve hath heard my loud weeping,
- 10 Jahve hath heard my supplication:
Jahve will accept my prayer.
- 11 All mine enemies shall be ashamed and affrighted exceedingly,
They shall turn away ashamed suddenly.

The morning prayer, Ps. v., is followed by a "Psalm of David", which, even if not composed in the morning, looks back upon a sleepless, tearful night. It consists of three strophes. In the middle one, which is a third longer than the other two, the poet, by means of a calmer outpouring of his heart, struggles on from the cry of distress in the first strophe to the believing confidence of the last. The hostility of men seems to him as a punishment of divine wrath, and consequently (but this is not so clearly expressed as in Ps. xxxviii., which is its counterpart) as the result of his sin; and this persecution, which to him has God's wrath behind it and sin as the sting of its bitterness, makes him sorrowful and sick even unto death. Because the Psalm contains no confession of sin, one might be inclined to think that the church has wrongly reckoned it as the first of the seven (probably selected with reference to the seven days of the week) Psalmi pœnitentiales (vi. xxxii. xxxviii. li. cii. cxxx. cxliii.). A. H. Francke in his Introductio in Psalterium says, it is rather Psalmus precatorius hominis gravissimi tentati pœnitente probe distinguendi. But this is a mistake. The man who is tempted is distinguished from a penitent man by this, that the feeling of wrath is with the one perfectly groundless and with the other well-grounded. Job was one who was tempted thus. Our psalmist, however, is a penitent, who accordingly seeks that the punitive chastisement of God, as the just God, may for him be changed into the loving chastisement of God, as the merciful One.

We recognise here the language of penitently believing prayer, which has been coined by David. Compare ver. 2 with xxxviii. 2; 3 with xli. 5; 5 with cix. 26; 6 with xxx. 10; 7 with lxix. 4; 8 with xxxi. 10; 11 with xxxv. 4. 26. The language of Heman's Psalm is perceptibly different, comp. ver. 6 with lxxxvii. 11—13; 8 with lxxxviii. 10. And the corresponding strains in Jeremiah (comp. ver. 2, xxxviii. 2 with Jer. x. 24; 3 and 5 with Jer. xvii. 14; 7 with Jer. xlv. 3) are echoes, which to us prove that the Psalm belongs to an earlier age, not that it was composed by the prophet (Hitzig). It is at once probable, from the almost anthological relationship in which Jeremiah stands to the earlier literature, that in the present instance also he is the reproducer. And this idea is confirmed by the fact that in ch. x. 25, after language resembling the Psalm before us, he continues in words taken from Ps. lxxix. 6 sq. When Hitzig maintains that David could no more have composed this disconcertedly despondent Psalm than Isaiah could the words in Isa. xxi. 3, 4, we refer, in answer to him, to Isa. xxii. 4 and to the many attestations that David did weep, 2 Sam. i. 12, iii. 32, xii. 21, xv. 30, xix. 1.

The accompanying musical direction runs: To the Precantor, with accompaniment of stringed instruments, upon the Octave. The LXX. translates ὑπὲρ τῆς ὀγδόης, and the Fathers associate with it the thought of the octave of eternal happiness, ἡ ὀγδόη ἐξείνη, as Gregory of Nyssa says, ἥτις ἐστὶν ὁ ἐφεξῆς αἰών. But there is no doubt whatever that על-הַשְּׁמִינִי has reference to music. It is also found by Ps. xii., and besides in 1 Chron. xv. 21. From this latter passage it is at least clear that it is not the name of an instrument. An instrument with eight strings could not have been called an octave instead of an octachord. In that passage they played upon nabras על-עֲלָמוֹת, and with citherns על-הַשְּׁמִינִי. If עֲלָמוֹת denotes maidens = maidens' voices i. e. soprano, then, as it seems, הַשְּׁמִינִי is a designation of the bass, and על-הַשְּׁמִינִי equivalent to all' ottava bassa. The fact that Ps. xlvi., which is accompanied by the direction על-עֲלָמוֹת, is a joyous song, whereas Ps. vi. is a plaintive one and Ps. xii. not less gloomy and sad, accords with this. These two were to be played in the lower octave, that one in the higher.

Vers. 2—4. There is a chastisement which proceeds from God's love to the man as being pardoned and which is designed to purify or to prove him, and a chastisement which proceeds from God's wrath against the man as striving obstinately against, or as fallen away from, favour, and which satisfies divine justice. Ps. xciv. 12, cxviii. 17, Prov. iii. 11 sq. speak of this loving chastisement. The man who should decline it, would act against his own salvation. Accordingly David, like Jeremiah (ch. x. 24), does not pray for the removal of the chastisement but of the chastisement in wrath, or what is the same thing, of the judgment proceeding from wrath [Zorngericht]. כָּאַף and בְּחַמְדָּךָ stand in the middle, between אַף and the verbs, for the sake of emphasis. Hengstenberg indeed finds a different antithesis here. He says: "The contrast is not that of chastisement in love with chastisement in wrath, but that of loving rescue in contrast with chastisement, which always proceeds from the principle of wrath". If what is here meant is, that always when God chastens a man his wrath is the true and proper motive, it is an error, for the refutation of which one whole book of the Bible, viz. the Book of Job, has been written. For there the friends think that God is angry with Job; but we know from the prologue that, so far from being angry with him, he on the contrary glories in him. Here, in this Psalm, assuming David to be its author, and his adultery the occasion of it, it is certainly quite otherwise. The chastisement under which David is brought low, has God's wrath as its motive: it is punitive chastisement and remains such, so long as David remains fallen from favour. But if in sincere penitence he again struggles through to favour, then the punitive becomes a loving chastisement: God's relationship to him becomes an essentially different relationship. The evil, which is the result of his sin and as such indeed originates in the principle of wrath, becomes the means of discipline and purifying which love employs, and this it is that he here implores for himself. And thus Dante Alighieri* correctly and beautifully paraphrases the verse:

*Signor, non mi riprender con furore,
E non voler correggermi con ira,
Ma con dolcezza e con perfetto amore.*

In וְיִנֵּי David prays God to let him experience His loving-kindness and tender mercy in place of the punishment He has a right to inflict; for anguish of soul has already reduced him to the extreme even of bodily sickness: he is withered up and weary. לַפְּתָח has Pathach, and consequently seems to be the 3 pers. Pul. as in Joel i. 10, Nah. i. 4; but this cannot be according to the rules of grammar. It is an adjective, like רָעַנְךָ, שָׁאֲנִי, with the passive pointing. The formation אִמְלַל (from אָמַל אִמַּל with the primary meaning to stretch out lengthwise) is analogous to the IX. and XI. forms of the Arabic verb which serve especially to express colours and defects (Caspari § 59). The two words אִמְלַל אֲנִי have the double accent Mercha-Mahpach together, and according to the exact mode of writing (vid. Baer in my Psalter ii. 492) the Mahpach, (the sign resembling Mahpach or rather Jethib), ought to stand between the two words, since it at the same time represents the Makkeph. The principal tone of the united pair, therefore, lies on āni; and accordingly the adj. אִמְלַל is shortened to אִמְלַל (cf. אֲרַמְדָּה, הַפְּקָדָה, מְרַמֵּם, and the like)—a contraction which proves that אִמְלַל is not treated as part. Pul. (= מְאִמְלַל), for its characteristic ā is unchangeable. The prayer for healing is based upon the plea that his bones (Job iv. 14, Isa. xxxviii. 13) are affrighted. We have no German word exactly corresponding to this נִבְהַל which (from the radical notion “to let go”, cogn. בָּלָה) expresses a condition of outward overthrow and inward consternation, and is therefore the effect of fright which disconcerts one and of excitement that deprives one of self-control.* His soul is still more shaken than his body. The affliction is therefore not a merely bodily ailment in which only a timorous man loses heart. God’s love is hidden from him. God’s wrath seems as though it would wear him completely away. It is an affliction beyond all other afflictions. Hence he enquires: And Thou, O Jahve, how long?! Instead of אָחָה it is written אַח, which the Keri says is to be read אָחָה, while in three passages (Num. xi. 15, Deut. v. 24, Ezek. xxviii. 14) אַח is admitted as masc.

Vers. 5—8. God has turned away from him, hence the prayer שׁוּבָה, viz. אֱלֹהֵי. The tone of שׁוּבָה is on the ult., because it is assumed to be read שׁוּבָה אֲדֹנָי. The ultima accentuation is intended to secure its distinct pronunciation to the final syllable of שׁוּבָה, which is liable to be drowned and escape notice in connection with the coming together of the two aspirates (vid. on iii. 8). May God turn to him again, rescue (חָלַץ from חָלַץ, which is transitive in Hebr. and Aram., to free, expedire, exuere, Arab. خَلَّصَ to be pure, prop. to be loose, free) his soul, in which his affliction has taken deep root, from this affliction, and extend to him salvation on the ground of His mercy towards sinners. He finds this cry for help upon his yearning to be able still longer to praise God, — a happy employ, the possibility of which would be cut off from him if he should die. זָכַר, as frequently זָכַרְתִּי, is used of remembering one with reverence and honour; הוֹדָה (from הָדָה) has the dat. honoris after it. שָׁאוֹל, ver. 6*b*, אֲדֵהָא (Apoc. xx. 13), alternates with מְוִתָּה. Such is the name of the underground abode of the dead, the gate of which is the grave, the yawning abyss, into which everything mortal descends (from שָׁאוֹל = שָׁאָל שׁוּל, to be loose, relaxed, to hang down, sink down: a sinking in, that which is sunken in*, a depth). The writers of the Psalms all (which is no small objection against Maccabean Psalms) know only of one single gathering-place of the dead in the depth of the earth, where they indeed live, but it is only a quasi life, because they are secluded from the light of this world and, what is the most lamentable, from the light of God's presence. Hence the Christian can only join in the prayer of ver. 6 of this Psalm and similar passages (xxx. 10, lxxxviii. 11—13, cxv. 17, Isa. xxxviii. 18 sq.) so far as he transfers the notion of hades to that of gehenna.** In hell there is really no remembrance and no praising of God. David's fear of death as something in itself unhappy, is also, according to its ultimate ground, nothing but the fear of an unhappy death. In these "pains of hell" he is wearied with (כָּ as in lxix. 4) groaning, and bedews his couch every night with a river of tears. Just as the Hiph. הִשְׁחָה signifies to cause to swim from שָׁחָה to swim, so the Hiph. הִמָּסָה signifies to dissolve, cause to melt, from מָסָה (cogn. מָסַם) to melt. דָּמְעָה, in Arabic a nom. unit. a tear, is in Hebrew a flood of tears.

* The form corresponds to the Arabic form فَعَالٌ, which, though originally a verbal abstract, has carried over the passive meaning into the province of the concrete, e. g. kitāb = maktūb and ilāh, إِلَهِئِي = ma'lūh = mā'bud (the feared, revered One).

** An adumbration of this relationship of Christianity to the religion of the Old Testament is the relationship of Islam to the religion of the Arab wandering tribes, which is called the "religion of Abraham" (Din Ibrāhīm), and knows no life after death; while Islam has taken from the later Judaism and from Christianity the hope of a resurrection and heavenly blessedness.

In ver. 8 עֵינַי does not signify my "appearance" (Num. xi. 7), but, as becomes clear from xxxi. 10, lxxxviii. 10, Job xvii. 7, "my eye"; the eye reflects the whole state of a man's health. The verb עָשָׂשׁ appears to be a denominative from עָשָׂ: to be moth-eaten.* The signification senescere for the verb עָתַק is more certain. The closing words בְּכָל-צַרֹּתַי (cf. Num. x. 9 הַצַּר הַצַּר the oppressing oppressor, from the root צָר *to press, squeeze, and especially to bind together, constringere, coartare***), in which the writer indicates, partially at least, the cause of his grief (בָּעַם, in Job xviii. 7 בָּעַשׂ), are as it were the socket into which the following strophe is inserted.

Vers. 9—11. Even before his plaintive prayer is ended the divine light and comfort come quickly into his heart, as Frisch says in his "Neuklingende Harfe Davids". His enemies mock him as one forsaken of God, but even in the face of his enemies he becomes conscious that this is not his condition. Thrice in vers. 9, 10 his confidence that God will answer him flashes forth: He hears his loud sobbing, the voice of his weeping that rises towards heaven, He hears his supplication, and He graciously accepts his prayer. The two-fold שָׁמַע expresses the fact and יָקָה its consequence. That which he seems to have to suffer, shall in reality be the lot of his enemies, viz. the end of those who are rejected of God:

they shall be put to shame. The בּוֹשׁ, Syr. عَمِل, Chald. בְּהוּ, בְּהוּ, which we meet with here for the first time, is not connected with the Arab. بهت but (since the Old Arabic as a rule has ت as a mediating vowel between ש and ל, ה) with בּוֹשׁ which signifies "to turn up and scatter about things that lie together (either beside or upon each other)" erueret et diruere, disturbare,—a root which also appears in the reduplicated form בּוֹשׁ: to root up and disperse, whence בְּשׁ sorrow and anxiety, according to which therefore בּוֹשׁ (= בּוֹשׁ as בָּאֵת — בֹּרֵת) prop. signifies disturbare, to be perplexed, lose one's self-control, and denotes shame according to a similar, but somewhat differently applied conception to confundi, συγχέεσθαι, συγχύεσθαι. וַיִּבְהוּ points back to vers. 2, 3: the lot at which the malicious have rejoiced, shall come upon themselves. As is implied in יִשְׁבוּ יִבְשׁוּ, a higher power turns back the assailants filled with shame (ix. 4, xxxv. 4).

What an impressive finish we have here in these three Milels jashûbu jebôshu rāga', in relation to the tripping measure of the preceding words addressed to his enemies! And, if not intentional, yet how remarkable is the coincidence, that shame follows the involuntary reverse of the foes, and that יִבְשׁוּ in its letters and sound is the reverse of יִשְׁבוּ! What music there is in the Psalter! If composers could but understand it!!

PSALM VII.

APPEAL TO THE JUDGE OF THE WHOLE EARTH AGAINST SLANDER AND REQUITING GOOD WITH EVIL.

- 2 JAHVE, my God, in Thee do I hide myself;
Save me from all my persecutors, and deliver me!
- 3 Lest he tear my soul like a lion,
Rending it in pieces while there is none to deliver.
- 4 Jahve, my God, if I have done this,
If iniquity cling to my hands,
- 5 If I have rewarded evil to him that was at peace with me
And plundered mine enemy without cause:

- 6 Then let the enemy persecute my soul and take [it],
 And tread down my life to the earth,
 And lay my dignity in the dust. (Sela.)
- 7 Arise, Jahve, in Thine anger,
 Lift up Thyself against the rage of mine oppressors,
 And awake for me, Thou hast indeed arranged justice!
- 8 And let the host of the nations stand round about Thee
 And over it do Thou return again on high!
- 9 Jahve shall judge the peoples — Jahve, judge me according to my righteousness and my innocence in me!
- 10 Oh let the wickedness of the wicked come to an end,
 establish the righteous,
 Thou art He who trieth the hearts and reins, a just God.
- 11 My shield is borne by Elohim,
 The Saviour of the upright in heart.
- 12 Elohim is a righteous Judge
 And a God threatening day by day.
- 13 If a man will not repent, He whetteth His sword,
 He hath bent His bow and made it ready,
- 14 And against him He directeth the weapon of death,
 His arrows He maketh burning arrows.
- 15 Behold, he travaileth with evil: he conceiveth trouble and bringeth forth falsehood.
- 16 He hath digged a pit and hollowed it out,
 And falleth into the hollow that he is making.
- 17 His trouble cometh back upon his own head,
 And his violent dealing cometh down upon his own pate.
- 18 I will give thanks to Jahve according to His righteousness,
 And will sing praise to the name of Jahve, the Most High.

In the second part of Ps. vi. David meets his enemies with strong self-confidence in God. Ps. vii., which even Hitzig ascribes to David, continues this theme and exhibits to us, in a prominent example taken from the time of persecution under Saul, his purity of conscience and joyousness of faith. One need only read 1 Sam. xxiv.—xxvi. to see how this Psalm abounds in unmistakable references to this portion of David's life. The superscribed statement of the events that gave rise to its composition point to this. Such statements are found exclusively only by the Davidic Psalms.* The inscription runs: Shiggajon of David, which he sang to Jahve on account of the sayings of Cush a Benjamite. עַל־דְּבָרֵי is intentionally chosen instead of עַל which has other functions in these superscriptions. Although דְּבָרֵי and דְּבָר can mean a thing, business, affairs (Ex. xxii. 8, 1 Sam. x. 2, and freq.) and עַל־דְּבָרֵי "in reference to" (Deut. iv. 21, Jer. vii. 22) or "on occasion of" (Jer. xiv. 1), still we must here keep to the most natural signification: "on account of the words (speeches)". Cûsh (LXX. falsely Χουσί — כּוּשִׁי; Luther, likewise under misapprehension, "the Moor") must have been one of the many servants of Saul, his kinsman, one of the tale-bearers like Doeg and the Ziphites, who shamefully slandered David before Saul, and roused him against David. The epithet בְּרַמְיָנִי (as in 1 Sam. ix. 1, 21, cf. אִישׁ־רַמְיָנִי 2 Sam. xx. 1) describes him as "a Benjamite" and does not assume any knowledge of him, as would be the case if it were הַבְּנֵי־רַמְיָנִי, or rather (in accordance with biblical usage) בְּן־רַמְיָנִי. And this accords with the actual fact, for there is no mention of him elsewhere in Scripture history. The statement עַל־דְּבָרֵי וְגו' is hardly from David's hand, but written by some one else, whether from tradition or from the דְּבָרֵי הַיָּמִים of David, where this Psalm may have been interwoven with the history of its occasion. Whereas there is nothing against our regarding לְרֹדֵר שְׁגִיּוֹן, or at least שְׁגִיּוֹן, as a note appended by David himself.

Since שְׁגִיּוֹן (after the form רְוִיּוֹן a vision) belongs to the same class as superscribed appellations like מְזוֹמָר and מְזֻבָּל, and the Tephilla of Habakkuk, ch. iii. 1 (vid. my Commentary), has the addition עַל־שְׁגִיטָה must be the name of a kind of lyric composition, and in fact a kind described according to the rhythm of its language or melody. Now since שְׁגָה means to go astray, wander, reel, and is cognate with שָׁנַע (whence comes שְׁגָעוֹן madness, a word formed in the same manner)

* Viz. vii. lix. lvi. xxxiv. lii. lvii. cxlii. liv. (belonging to the time of the persecution under Saul), iii. lxiii (to the persecution under Absalom), li. (David's adultery), ix. (the Syro-Ammonitish war).

לְרִיקֹן may mean in the language of prosody a reeling poem, i. e. one composed in a most excited movement and with a rapid change of the strongest emotions, therefore a dithyrambic poem, and לְרִיקֹן דִּיתִירָמְבִּיקִים dithyrambic rhythms, variously and violently mixed together. Thus Ewald and Rödiger understand it, and thus even Tarnov, Geier, and other old expositors who translate it cantio erratica. What we therefore look for is that this Psalm shall consist, as Ainsworth expresses it (1627), "of sundry variable and wandering verses", that it shall wander through the most diverse rhythms as in a state of intoxication — an expectation which is in fact realized. The musical accompaniment also had its part in the general effect produced. Moreover, the contents of the Psalm corresponds to this poetic musical style. It is the most solemn pathos of exalted self-consciousness which is expressed in it. And in common with Hab. iii. it gives expression to the joy which arises from zealous anger against the enemies of God and from the contemplation of their speedy overthrow. Painful unrest, defiant self-confidence, triumphant ecstasy, calm trust, prophetic certainty — all these states of mind find expression in the irregular arrangement of the strophes of this Davidic dithyramb, the ancient customary Psalm for the feast of Purim (Sofrim xviii. § 2).

Vers. 2—3. With this word of faith, love, and hope יְיָ חַסְדֵּי (as in cxli. 8), this holy captatio benevolentiae, David also begins in xi. 1, xvi. 1, xxxi. 2, cf. lxxi. 1. The perf. is inchoative: in Thee have I taken my refuge, equivalent to: in Thee do I trust. The transition from the multitude of his persecutors to the sing. in ver. 3 is explained most naturally, as one looks at the inscription, thus: that of the many the one who is just at the time the worst of all comes prominently before his mind. The verb טָרַף from the primary signification carpere (which corresponds still more exactly to חָרַף) means both to tear off and to tear in pieces (whence מְטָרֵף that which is torn in pieces); and פָּרַק from its primary signification frangere means both to break loose and to break in pieces, therefore to liberate, e. g. in cxxxvi. 24. and to break in small pieces, 1 Kings xix. 11. The persecutors are conceived of as wild animals, as lions which rend their prey and craunch its bones. Thus blood-thirsty are they for his soul, i. e. his life. After the painful unrest of this first strophe, the second begins the tone of defiant self-consciousness.

Vers. 4—6. According to the inscription זָמַר points to the substance of those slanderous sayings of the Benjamite. With אֶם-יִשְׁעוּל בְּסָפִי one may compare David's words to Saul אֵין בְּיָדֵי רָעָה 1 Sam. xxiv. 12, xxvi. 18; and from this comparison one will at once see in a small compass the difference between poetical and prose expression. שְׁלָמִי (Targ. לְרַעַל שְׁלָמִי) is the name he gives (with reference to Saul) to him who stands on a peaceful, friendly footing with him, cf. the adjct. שְׁלוֹם, lv. 21, and אִישׁ שְׁלוֹם, xli. 10. The verb גָּמַל, cogn. גָּמַר, signifies originally to finish, complete, (root גַּם, כֹּם, cf. כִּימָהּ to be or to make full, to gather into a heap). One says גָּמַל מִוֶּכֶס and גָּמַל רָע, and also without a material object גָּמַל עָלַי or גָּמַלְנִי benefecit or malefecit mihi. But we join גָּמַלְתִּי with רָע according to the Targum and contrary to the accentuation, and not with שְׁלָמִי (Olsh., Böttch., Hitz.), although שָׁלַם beside מְשָׁלַם, as e. g. מְרַבֵּר beside מְרַבֵּר might mean "requiting". The poet would then have written: אֶם שְׁלַמְתִּי גָמְלִי רָע i. e. if I have retaliated upon him that hath done evil to me. In ver. 5 we do not render it according the meaning of הִלַּץ which is usual elsewhere: but rather I rescued . . . (Louis de Dieu, Ewald § 345, a, and Hupfeld). Why cannot הִלַּץ in accordance with its primary signification expedire, exuere (according to which even the signification of rescuing, taken exactly, does not proceed from the idea of drawing out, but of making loose, exuere vinculis) signify here exuere = spoliare, as it does in Aramaic? And how extremely appropriate it is as an allusion to the incident in the cave, when David did not rescue Saul, but, without indeed designing to take הַלְיָצָה, exuvia, cut off the hem of his garment! As Hengstenberg observes, "He affirms his innocence in the most general terms, thereby shewing that his conduct towards Saul was not anything exceptional, but sprang from his whole disposition and mode of action". On the 1 pers. fut. conv. with ah, vid. on iii. 6. צִוְרִי belongs to צִוְרִי, like xxv. 3, lxix. 5.

In the apodosis, ver. 6, the fut. Kal of יִרְדֶּה is made into three syllables, in a way altogether without example, since, by first making the Shebā audible, from יִרְדֶּה it is become יִרְדֶּה (like יִצְחָק Gen. xxi. 6, תִּתְּלֶךְ Ps. lxxiii. 9, Ex. ix. 23, שִׁמְעֶה xxxix. 13), and this is then sharpened by an euphonic Dag. forte.* Other ways of explaining it, as that by Chajug = יִתְרַדֶּה, or by Kimchi as a mixed form from Kal and Piel,** have been already refuted by Baer, Thorath Emeth, p. 33. This dactylic jussive form of Kal is followed by the regular jussives of Hiph. יִשְׁעַן and יִשְׁכֵּן. The rhythm is similar so that in the primary passage Ex. xv. 9, which also finds its echo in Ps. xviii. 38, — viz. iambic with anapæsts interspersed. By its parallelism with נַפְשִׁי and רְוֵי כְבוֹדִי, רְוֵי acquires the signification “my soul”, as Saadia, Gecatilia and Aben-Ezra have rendered it — a signification which is secured to it by xvi. 9, xxx. 13, lvii. 9, cviii. 2, Gen. xlix. 6. Man’s soul is his doxa, and this it is as being the copy of the divine doxa (Bibl. Psychol. S. 98, [tr.p. 119], and frequently). Moreover, “let him lay in the dust” is at least quite as favourable to this sense of כְבוֹדִי as to the sense of personal and official dignity (iii. 4, iv. 3). To lay down in the dust is equivalent to: to lay in the dust of death, xxii. 16. שְׁכַנֵי עֶפְרַיִם, Isa. xxvi. 19, are the dead. According to the biblical conception the soul is capable of being killed (Num. xxxv. 11), and mortal (Num. xxiii. 10). It binds spirit and body together and this bond is cut asunder by death. David will submit willingly to death in case he has ever acted dishonourably.

Here the music is to strike up, in order to give intensity to the expression of this courageous confession. In the next strophe his affirmation of innocence rises to a challenging appeal to the judgment-seat of God and a prophetic certainty that that judgment is near at hand.

** Pinsker's view, that the pointing יִרְדֶּה is designed to leave the reader at liberty to choose between the reading יִרְדֶּה and יִרְדֶּה, cannot be supported. There are no safe examples for the supposition that the variations of tradition found expression in this way.

Vers. 7—9. In the consciousness of his own innocence he calls upon Jahve to sit in judgment and to do justice to His own. His vision widens and extends from the enemies immediately around to the whole world in its hostility towards Jahve and His anointed one. In the very same way special judgments and the judgment of the world are portrayed side by side, as it were on one canvas, in the prophets. The truth of this combination lies in the fact of the final judgment being only the finale of that judgment which is in constant execution in the world itself. The language here takes the highest and most majestic flight conceivable. By קוֹמָה (Mitra, as in iii. 8), which is one of David's words of prayer that he has taken from the lips of Moses (ix. 20, x. 12), he calls upon Jahve to interpose. The parallel is הִנָּשָׂא lift Thyself up, shew Thyself in Thy majesty, xciv. 2, Isa. xxxiii. 10. The anger, in which He is to arise, is the principle of His judicial righteousness. With this His anger He is to gird Himself (lxxvi. 11) against the ragings of the oppressors of God's anointed one, i. e. taking vengeance on their many and manifold manifestations of hostility. עָבְרוֹת is a shorter form of the construct (instead of עָבְרוֹת Job xl. 11, cf. xxi. 31) of עָבָרָה which describes the anger as running over, breaking forth from within and passing over into words and deeds (cf. Arab.

فَش used of water: it overflows the dam, of wrath: it breaks forth). It is contrary to the usage of the language to make מְשַׁפֵּט the object to עִיָּרָה in opposition to the accents, and it is unnatural to regard it as the accus. of direction = לְמִשְׁפֵּט (xxxv. 23), as Hitzig does. The accents rightly unite עִיָּרָה לְמִשְׁפֵּט: awake (stir thyself) for me i. e. to help me (אֲלֵי like לְקִלְאוֹתֵי, lix. 5). The view, that צִוְיָה is then precative and equivalent to צִוָּה: command judgment, is one that cannot be established according to syntax either here, or in lxxi. 3. It ought at least to have been וְצִוָּה with Waw consec. On the other hand the relative rendering: Thou who hast ordered judgment (Maurer, Hengst.), is admissible, but unnecessary. We take it by itself in a confirmatory sense, not as a circumstantial clause: having commanded judgment (Ewald), but as a co-ordinate clause: Thou hast indeed enjoined the maintaining of right (Hupfeld).

The psalmist now, so to speak, arranges the judgment scene: the assembly of the nations is to form a circle round about Jahve, in the midst of which He will sit in judgment, and after the judgment He is to soar away (Gen. xvii. 22) aloft over it and return to the heights of heaven like a victor after the battle (see lxviii. 19). Although it strikes one as strange that the termination of the judgment itself is not definitely expressed, yet the rendering of Hupfeld and others: sit Thou again upon Thy heavenly judgment-seat to judge, is to be rejected on account of the שׁוֹבָה (cf. on the other hand xxi. 14) which is not suited to it; שׁוֹב לְמָרוֹם can only mean Jahve's return to His rest after the execution of judgment. That which vers. 7 and 8 in the boldness of faith desire, the beginning of ver. 9 expresses as a prophetic hope, from which proceeds the prayer, that the Judge of the earth may also do justice to him (שְׁפָחֵנִי vindica me, as in xxvi. 1, xxxv. 24) according to his righteousness and the purity of which he is conscious, as dwelling in him. עָלֵי is to be closely connected with הַמֵּי, just as one says עָלַי נִפְשֵׁי עָלַי (Psychol. S. 152 [tr. p. 180]). That which the individual as ego, distinguishes from itself as being in it, as subject, it denotes by עָלֵי. In explaining it elliptically: "come upon me" (Ew., Olsh., Hupf.) this psychologically intelligible usage of the language is not recognised. On הָם vid. on xxv. 21, xxvi. 1.

Vers. 10—11. In this strophe we hear the calm language of courageous trust, to which the rising and calmly subsiding cæsural schema is particularly adapted. He is now concerned about the cessation of evil: Oh let it come to an end (נָמַר intransitive as in xii. 2, lxxvii. 9). . . His prayer is therefore not directed against the individuals as such but against the wickedness that is in them. This Psalm is the key to all Psalms which contain prayers against one's enemies. Just in the same manner הִרְכֵּנִי is intended to express a wish; it is one of the comparatively rare voluntatives of the 2 pers. (Ew. § 229): and mayst Thou be pleased to establish. . . . To the termination of evil which is desired corresponds, in a positive form of expression, the desired security and establishment of the righteous, whom it had injured and whose continuance was endangered by it. יִבְרַח is the beginning of a circumstantial clause, introduced by ו, but without the personal pronoun, which is not unfrequently omitted both in the leading participial clause, as in Isa. xxix. 8 (which see), and in the minor participial clause as here (cf. lv. 20): cum sis — quoniam es. The reins are the seat of the emotions, just as the heart is the seat of the thoughts and feelings. Reins and heart lie naked before God — a description of the only καρδιογνώστης, which is repeated in Jer. xi. 20, xx. 12, Apoc. ii. 23. In the thesis the adjective is used with אלהים in the sing. as in lxxviii. 56, cf. lviii. 12. God is the righteous God, and by his knowledge of the inmost part He is fully capable of always shewing Himself both righteous in anger and righteous in mercy according to the requirements and necessity of the case. Therefore David can courageously add אלהים עמי, my shield doth God carry; ה' (lxxxix. 19) would signify: He has it, it (my shield) belongs to Him, על (1 Chron. xviii. 7) signifies: He bears it, or it one takes shield in the sense of protection: He has taken my protection upon Himself, has undertaken it (as in lxii. 8, cf. Judges xix. 20), as He is in general the Saviour of all who are devoted to Him with an upright heart, i. e. a heart sincere, guileless (cf. xxxii. with ver. 2). צדיק is intentionally repeated at the end of the first two lines — the favourite palindrome, found more especially in Isa. xl.—lxvi. And to the mixed character of this Psalm belongs the fact of its being both Elohimic and Jehovic. From the calm language of heartfelt trust in God the next strophe passes over into the language of earnest warning, which is again more excited and somewhat after the style of didactic poetry.

Vers. 12—14. If God will in the end let His wrath break forth, He will not do it without having previously given threatenings thereof every day, viz. to the ungodly, cf. Isa. lxvi. 14, Mal. i. 4. He makes these feel His צעק beforehand in order to strike a wholesome terror into them. The subject of the conditional clause אדם לֹא יִשׁוּב is any ungodly person whatever; and the subject of the principal clause, as its continuation in ver. 14 shews, is God. If a man (any one) does not repent, then Jahve will whet His sword (cf. Deut. xxxii. 41). This sense of the words accords with the connection; whereas with the rendering: "forsooth He (Elohim) will again whet His sword" (Böttch., Ew., Hupf.) יָשׁוּב, which would moreover stand close by יִלְטָשׁ (cf. e. g. Gen. xxx. 31), is meaningless; and the אֶם-לֹא of asseveration is devoid of purpose. Judgment is being gradually prepared, as the fut. implies; but, as the perff. imply, it is also on the other hand like a bow that is already strung against the sinner with the arrow pointed towards him, so that it can be executed at any moment. כּוֹנֵן of the making ready, and הֹכֵן of the aiming, are used alternately. לוֹ, referring to the sinner, stands first by way of emphasis as in Gen. xlix. 10, 1 Sam. ii. 3, and is equivalent to אֵלָיו, Ezek. iv. 3. "Burning" arrows are fire-arrows (וִיקוֹחַ, וִיקוֹחַ, malleoli); and God's fire-arrows are the lightnings sent forth by Him, xviii. 15, Zech. ix. 14. The fut. יִתְעַל denotes the simultaneous charging of the arrows aimed at the sinner, with the fire of His wrath. The case illustrated by Cush is generalised: by the sword and arrow the manifold energy of the divine anger is symbolised, and it is only the divine forbearance that prevents it from immediately breaking forth. The conception is not coarsely material, but the vividness of the idea of itself suggests the form of its embodiment.

Vers. 15—18. This closing strophe foretells to the enemy of God, as if dictated by the judge, what awaits him; and concludes with a prospect of thanksgiving and praise. Man brings forth what he has conceived, he reaps what he has sown. Starting from this primary passage, we find the punishment which sin brings with it frequently represented under these figures of הָרָה and יָלַד (הוֹלִיד, הִזְבֵּל, הוֹלִיד), קָצַר and זָרַע, and first of all in Job xv. 35. The act, guilt, and punishment of sin appear in general as notions that run into one another. David sees in the sin of his enemies their self-destruction. It is singular, that travail is first spoken of, and then only afterwards pregnancy. For הִזְבֵּל signifies, as in Cant. viii. 5, ὠδίνειν, not: to conceive (Hitz.). The Arab. habila (synonym of hamala) is not to conceive in distinction from being pregnant, but it is both: to be and to become pregnant. The accentuation indicates the correct relationship of the three members of the sentence. First of all comes the general statement: Behold he shall travail with, i. e. bring forth with writhing as in the pains of labour,  $\eta\alpha$ , evil, as the result which proceeds from his wickedness. Then, by this thought being divided into its two factors (Hupf.) it goes on to say: that is, he shall conceive (concipere)  $\eta\epsilon$ , and bear  $\eta\zeta$ . The former signifies trouble, molestia, just as  $\kappa\omicron\nu\eta\rho\iota\alpha$  signifies that which makes  $\kappa\acute{o}\nu\omicron\nu$ ; the latter falsehood, viz. self-deception, delusion, vanity, inasmuch as the burden prepared for others, returns as a heavy and oppressive burden upon the sinner himself, as is said in ver. 17; cf. Isa. lix. 4, where  $\eta\eta$  instead of  $\eta\zeta$  denotes the accursed wages of sin which consist in the unmasking of its nothingness, and in the undeceiving of its self-delusion. He diggeth a pit for himself, is another turn of the same thought, lvii. 7, Eccl. x. 8. Ver. 16*a* mentions the digging, and 16*b* the subsequent falling into the pit; the aorist  $\eta\iota\epsilon\lambda$  is, for instance, like ver. 13*b*, xvi. 9, xxix. 10. The attributive  $\eta\iota\epsilon\lambda$  is virtually a genitive to  $\eta\zeta$ , and is rightly taken by Ges. § 123, 3, a as present: in the midst of the execution of the work of destruction prepared for others it becomes his own. The trouble,  $\eta\mu\lambda$ , prepared for others returns upon his own head ( $\eta\mu\lambda$ , clinging to it, just as  $\eta\mu\lambda$  signifies descending and resting upon it), and the violence,  $\eta\mu\mu$ , done to others, being turned back by the Judge who dwells above (Mic. i. 12), descends upon his own pate ( $\eta\mu\mu$  with  $\delta$  by q, as e. g. in Gen. ii. 23). Thus is the righteousness of God revealed in wrath upon the oppressor and in mercy upon him who is innocently oppressed. Then will the rescued one, then will David, give thanks unto Jahve, as is due to Him after the revelation of His righteousness, and will sing of the name of Jahve the Most High ( $\eta\mu\mu$  as an appended name of God is always used without the art., e. g., lvii. 3). In the revelation of Himself He has made Himself a name. He has, however, revealed Himself as the almighty Judge and Deliverer, as the God of salvation, who rules over everything that takes place here below. It is this name, which He has made by His acts, that David will then echo back to Him in his song of thanksgiving.

P S A L M VIII.

THE PRAISE OF THE CREATOR'S GLORY SUNG BY THE STARRY HEAVENS TO PUNY MAN.

- 2 JAHVE, our Lord,
How excellent is Thy name in all the earth,
Who hast covered the heavens with Thy glory!
- 3 Out of the mouth of children and sucklings hast Thou founded a power,
Because of Thine adversaries,
To still the enemy and the revengeful.
- 4 When I see Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers,
The moon and the stars which Thou hast ordained:
- 5 What is mortal man, that Thou art mindful of him,
And the son of man that Thou carest for him!
- 6 And hast made him a little less than divine,
And crowned him with glory and honour.
- 7 Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of Thy hands,
Thou hast put all things under his feet:
- 8 Sheep and oxen all together,
And also the beasts of the field,
- 9 The fowls of heaven and the fishes of the sea,
Whatsoever passeth through the paths of the sea.
- 10 Jahve, our Lord,
How excellent is Thy name in all the earth!

Ps. vii. closed with a similar prospect of his enemies being undeceived by the execution of the divine judgments to Ps. vi. The former is the pendant or companion to the latter, and enters into detail, illustrating it by examples. Now if at the same time we call to mind the fact, that Ps. vi., if it be not a morning hymn, at any rate looks back upon sleepless nights of weeping, then the idea of the arrangement becomes at once clear, when we find a hymn of the night following Ps. vi. with its pendant, Ps. vii. David composes even at night; Jahve's song, as a Korahite psalmist says of himself in xlii. 9, was his companionship even in the loneliness of the night. The omission of any reference to the sun in ver. 4 shews that Ps. viii. is a hymn of this kind composed in the night, or at least one in which the writer transfers himself in thought to the night season. The poet has the starry heavens before him, he begins with the glorious revelation of Jahve's power on earth and in the heavens, and then pauses at man, comparatively puny man, to whom Jahve condescends in love and whom He has made lord over His creation. This Psalm, like Ps. civ. and others, is a lyric echo of the Mosaic account of the creation. Ewald calls it a flash of lightning cast into the darkness of the creation.

Even Hitzig acknowledges David's authorship here; whereas Hupfeld is silent, and Olshausen says that nothing can be said about it. The idea, that David composed it when a shepherd boy on the plains of Judah, is rightly rejected again by Hitzig after he has been at the pains to support it. (This thought is pleasingly worked out by Nachtigal, Psalmen gesungen vor David's Thronbesteigung, 1797, after the opinion of E. G. von Bengel, cum magna veri specie.) For, just as the Gospels do not contain any discourses of our Lord belonging to the time prior to His baptism, and just as the New Testament canon does not contain any writings of the Apostles from the time prior to Pentecost, so the Old Testament canon contains no Psalms of David belonging to the time prior to his anointing. It is only from that time, when he is the anointed one of the God of Jacob, that he becomes the sweet singer of Israel, on whose tongue is the word of Jahve, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1 sq.

The inscription runs: To the Precentor, on the Gittith, a Psalm of David. The Targum translates it super cithara, quam David de Gath attulit. According to which it is a Philistine cithern, just as there was (according to Athenæus and Pollux) a peculiar Phœnician and Carian flute played at the festivals of Adonis, called γίγγρας, and also an Egyptian flute and a Doric lyre. All the Psalms bearing the inscription עַל־הַגִּיטִּית (viii. lxxxv. lxxxiv.) are of a laudatory character. The gittith was, therefore, an instrument giving forth a joyous sound, or (what better accords with its occurring exclusively in the inscriptions of the Psalms), a joyous me-

Kurtz makes this Psalm into four tetrastichic strophes, by taking ver. 2 a b and ver. 10 by themselves as the opening and close of the hymn, and putting ver. 2 c (Thou whose majesty . . .) to the first strophe. But אֱשֶׁר is not rightly adapted to begin a strophe; the poet, we think, would in this case have written אֲזַמְּרָה אֲשֶׁר תִּנְהַל הוֹדוֹ.

Vers. 2—3. Here, for the first time, the subject speaking in the Psalm is not one individual, but a number of persons; and who should they be but the church of Jahve, which (as in Neh. x. 30) can call Jahve its Lord (אֲדֹנָי, like אֲדֹנָי, from אֲדָנִים plur. excellentiæ, Ges. § 108, 2); but knowing also at the same time that what it has become by grace it is called to be for the good of the whole earth? The שֵׁם of God is the impress (cognate Arabic wasam, a sign, Greek σῆμα) of His nature, which we see in His works of creation and His acts of salvation, a nature which can only be known from this visible and comprehensible representation (nomen = gnomen).* This name of God is certainly not yet so known and praised everywhere, as the church to which it has been made known by a positive revelation can know and praise it; but, nevertheless, it, viz. the divine name uttered in creation and its works, by which God has made Himself known and capable of being recognised and named, is אֲדִיר amplum et gloriosum, everywhere through out the earth, even if it were entirely without any echo. The clause with אֲשֶׁר must not be rendered: Who, do Thou be pleased to put Thy glory upon the heavens (Gesenius even: quam tuam magnificentiam pone in cælis), for such a use of the imperat. after אֲשֶׁר is unheard of; and, moreover, although it is true a thought admissible in its connection with the redemptive history (lvii. 6, 12) is thus obtained, it is here, however, one that runs counter to the fundamental tone, and to the circumstances, of the Psalm. For the primary thought of the Psalm is this, that the God, whose glory the heavens reflect, has also glorified Himself in the earth and in man; and the situation of the poet is this, that he has the moon and stars before his eyes: how then could he wish that heaven to be made glorious whose glory is shining into his eyes! It is just as impracticable to take תָּהָה as a contraction of תְּהַנֶּה, like תָּהָה 2 Sam. xxii. 41, — נְהַתָּה, as Ammonius and others, and last of all Böhl, have done, or with Thenius (Stud. u. Krit. 1860 S. 712 f.) to read it so at once. For even if the thought: "which (the earth) gives (announces) Thy glory all over the heavens" is not contrary to the connection, and if נָתַן עַל lxviii. 34, and נָתַן כְּבוֹד, Jer. xiii. 16, can be compared with this נָתַן הוֹד, still the phrase נָתַן הוֹד עַל means nothing but to lay majesty on any one, to clothe him with it, Num. xxvii. 20, 1 Chron. xxix. 25, Dan. xi. 21, cf. Ps. xxi. 6; and this is just the thought one looks for, viz., that the name of the God, who has put His glory upon the heavens (cxlviii. 13) is also glorious here below. We must, therefore, take תְּהַנֶּה, although it is always the form of the imper. elsewhere, as infin., just as יָדָה occurs once in Gen. xlvi. 3 as infin. (like the Arab. rida a giving to drink, lida a bringing forth — forms to which לָדָה and the like in Hebrew certainly more exactly correspond). תְּהַנֶּה הוֹדֶךָ signifies the setting of Thy glory (prop. τὸ ἐθέλειν ἡδὲ δόξαν σου) just like יָדָה יְהוָה the knowledge of Jahve, and Obad. ver. 5, שִׁים קִנְיָךְ, probably the setting of thy nest, Ges. § 133. 1. It may be interpreted: O Thou whose laying of Thy glory is upon the heavens, i. e. Thou who hast chosen this as the place on which Thou hast laid Thy glory (Hengst.). In accordance with this Jerome translates it: qui posuisti gloriam tuam super caelos. Thus also the Syriac version with the Targum: d'jabt (ריהבת) shubhoch 'al sh'majo, and Symmachus: ὁς ἔταξας τὸν ἔκαινόν σου ὑπεράνω τῶν οὐρανῶν. This use of the nomen verbale and the genitival relation of אֱשֶׁר to הוֹדֶךָ, which is taken as one notion, is still remarkable. Hitzig considers that no reasonable man would think and write thus; but thereby at the same time utterly condemns his own conjecture מִן הוֹדֶךָ (whose extending of glory over the heavens). This, moreover, goes beyond the limits of the language, which is only acquainted with תֵּן as the name of an animal. All difficulty would vanish if one might, with Hupfeld, read נִתְחַזַּק. But תֵּן has not the slightest appearance of being a corruption of נִתְחַזַּק. It might be more readily supposed that תֵּן is an erroneous pointing for תִּנֶּה (to stretch or extend, cf. Hos. viii. 10 to stretch forth, distribute): Thou whose glory stretches over the heavens, — an interpretation which is more probable than that it is, with Paulus and Kurtz, to be read תִּנֶּה: Thou whose glory is praised (pass. of the תִּנֶּה in Judges v. 11, xi. 40, which belongs to the dialect of Northern Palestine), instead of which one would more readily expect תִּנֶּה. The verbal notion, which is tacitly implied in cxiii. 4, cxlviii. 13, would then be expressed here. But perhaps the author wrote תֵּן הוֹדֵד instead of תִּנֶּה הוֹדֵד, because he wishes to describe the setting out of the heavens with divine splendour* as being constantly repeated and not as done once for all.

There now follows, in ver. 3, the confirmation of ver. 2 a: also all over the earth, despite its distance from the heavens above, Jahve's name is glorious; for even children, yea even sucklings glorify him there, and in fact not mutely and passively by their mere existence, but with their mouth. עוֹלֵל (— מְעוֹלֵל) or עוֹלֵל is a child that is more mature and capable of spontaneous action, from עוֹלֵל (Poel of עוֹלֵל ludere),** according to 1 Sam. xxii. 19, xv. 3, distinct from יוֹנֵק, i. e. a suckling, not, however, infans, but, — since the Hebrew

* In the first Sidonian inscription מְחַזֵּק occurs as a by-name of the heavens (שחם אדרם).

** According to this derivation עוֹלֵל (cf. Beduin עאלול, 'alil a young ox) is related to עוֹלֵל; whereas עוֹלֵל as a synonym of יוֹנֵק signifies one who is supported, sustained. For the radical signification of עוֹלֵל according to the Arabic عَال ful. o. is "to weigh heavy, to be heavy, to lie upon; to have anything incumbent upon one's self, to carry, support, preserve", whence 'ajjil the maintained child of the house, and 'ajjila (Damascene 'ela) he who is dependent upon one for support and the family depending upon the paterfamilias for sustenance. Neither عَال ful. o., nor عَال ful. i. usually applied to a pregnant woman who still suckles, has the direct signification to suckle. Moreover, the demon Ghul does not receive its name from swallowing up or sucking out (Ges.), but from destroying (عَال ful. o.)

women were accustomed to suckle their children for a long period, — a little child which is able to lisp and speak (vid. 2 Macc. vii. 27). Out of the mouth of beings such as these Jahve has founded for Himself נַי. The LXX. translates it the utterance of praise, αἶνον; and נַי certainly sometimes has the meaning of power ascribed to God in praise, and so a laudatory acknowledgment of His might; but this is only when connected with verbs of giving, xxix. 1, lxxviii. 35, xcvi. 7. In itself, when standing alone, it cannot mean this. It is in this passage: might, or victorious power, which God creates for Himself out of the mouths of children that confess Him. This offensive and defensive power, as Luther has observed on this passage, is conceived of as a strong building, נַי as מְעוֹן (Jer. xvi. 19) i. e. a fortress, refuge, bulwark, fortification, for the foundation of which He has taken the mouth, i. e. the stammering of children; and this He has done because of His enemies, to restrain (הַשְׁבִּיחַ) to cause any one to sit or lie down, rest, to put him to silence, e. g. Isa. xvi. 10, Ezek. vii. 24) such as are enraged against Him and His, and are inspired with a thirst for vengeance which expresses itself in curses (the same combination is found in xlv. 17). Those meant, are the fierce and calumniating opponents of revelation. Jahve has placed the mouth of children in opposition to these, as a strong defensive controversive power. He has chosen that which is foolish and weak in the eyes of the world to put to shame the wise and that which is strong (1 Cor. i. 27). It is by obscure and naturally feeble instruments that He makes His name glorious here below, and overcomes whatsoever is opposed to this glorifying.

Vers. 4—6. Stier wrongly translates: For I shall behold. The principal thought towards which the rest tends is ver. 5 (parallel are vers. 2*a*, 3), and consequently ver. 4 is the protasis (par., ver. 2*b*), and כִּי accordingly is = quum, quando, in the sense of quoties. As often as he gazes at the heavens which bear upon themselves the name of God in characters of light (wherefore he says שֶׁמַּיִךְ), the heavens with their boundless spaces (an idea which lies in the plur. שָׁמַיִם) extending beyond the reach of mortal eye, the moon (יָרֵחַ), dialectic וְרָחַ, perhaps, as Maurer derives it, from יָרַח = יָרַק, subflavum

esse), and beyond this the innumerable stars which are lost in infinite space (כּוֹכָבִים = כְּדָבָרִים prop. round, ball-shaped, spherical bodies) to which Jahvè appointed their fixed place on the vault of heaven which He has formed with all the skill of His creative wisdom (כּוֹנֵן to place and set up, in the sense of existence and duration): so often does the thought "what is mortal man . . . ?" increase in power and intensity. The most natural thought would be: frail, puny man is as nothing before all this; but this thought is passed over in order to celebrate, with grateful emotion and astonished adoration, the divine love which appears in all the more glorious light, — a love which condescends to poor man, the dust of earth. Even if אָנָשׁ does not come from אָנַשׁ to be fragile, nevertheless, according to the usage of the language, it describes man from the side of his impotence, frailty, and mortality (vid. ciii. 15, Isa. li. 12, and on Gen. iv. 26). בְּרֵאשִׁית, also, is not without a similar collateral reference. With retrospective reference to עוֹלָלִים וְיִנְקִיבָה בְּרֵאשִׁית, is equivalent to יְלִיד־אִשָּׁה in Job xiv. 1: man, who is not, like the stars, God's directly creative work, but comes into being through human agency, born of woman. From both designations it follows that it is the existing generation of man that is spoken of. Man, as we see him in ourselves and others, this weak and dependent being is, nevertheless, not forgotten by God, God remembers him and looks about after him (פָּקֵד of observing attentively, especially visitation, and with the accus. it is generally used of lovingly provident visitation, e. g. Jer. xv. 15). He does not leave him to himself, but enters into personal intercourse with him, he is the special and favoured object whither His eye turns (cf. cxliv. 3, and the parody of the tempted one in Job vii. 17 sq.)

It is not until ver. 6 that the writer glances back at creation. וַחֲסִפְרוּהוּ (differing from the fut. consec. Job vii. 18) describes that which happened formerly. מֵן signifies to cause to be short of, wanting in something, to deprive any one of something (cf. Eccl. iv. 8). מֵן is here neither comparative (paullo inferiorem eum fecisti Deo), nor negative (paulum derogasti ei, ne esset Deus), but partitive (paulum derogasti ei divinæ naturæ); and, without אֱלֹהִים being on that account an abstract plural, paullum Deorum, = Dei (vid. Genesis S. 66 sq.), is equivalent to paullum numinis Deorum. According to Gen. i. 27 man is created אֱלֹהִים בְּצַלְמוֹ, he is a being in the image of God, and, therefore, nearly a divine being. But when God says: "let us make man in our image after our likeness", He there connects Himself with the angels. The translation of the LXX. ἡλάττωσα; αὐτὸν βραχὺ τι παρ' ἀγγέλους, with which the Targum and the prevailing Jewish interpretations also harmonize, is, therefore, not unwarranted. Because in the biblical mode of conception the angels are so closely connected with God as the nearest creaturely effulgence of His nature, it is really possible that in אֱלֹהִים David may have thought of God including the angels. Since man is in the image of God, he is at the same time in the likeness of an angel, and since he is only a little less than divine, he is also only a little less than angelic. The position, somewhat exalted above the angels, which he occupies by being the bond between all created things, in so far as mind and matter are united in him, is here left out of consideration. The writer has only this one thing in his mind, that man is inferior to God, who is אֱלֹהִים, and to the angels who are רִחוּם (Isa. xxxi. 3, Heb. i. 14) in this respect, that he is a material being, and on this very account a finite and mortal being; as Theodoret well and briefly observes: τῷ θνητῷ τῶν ἀγγέλων ἡλάττωται. This is the מַעַמַּת in which whatever is wanting to him to make him a divine being is concentrated. But it is nothing more than מַעַמַּת. The assertion in ver. 6 a refers to the fact of the nature of man being in the image of God, and especially to the spirit breathed into him from God; ver. 6 b, to his god-like position as ruler in accordance with this his participation in the divine nature: honore ac decore coronasti eum. כְּבוֹד is the manifestation of glory described from the side of its weightiness and fulness; הוֹד (cf. הִידֵר, הֵד) from the side of its far resounding announcement of itself (vid. on Job xxxix. 20); הִדְר from the side of its brilliancy, majesty, and beauty. הוֹד וְהִדְר, xcvi. 6, or also הִדְר כְּבוֹד הוֹד ה', cxlv. 5, is the appellation of the divine doxa, with the image of which man is adorned as with a regal crown. The preceding fut. consec. also stamps הַמְשִׁילָהוּ and הַעֲטִירָהוּ as historical retrospects. The next strophe unfolds the regal glory of man: he is the lord of all things, the lord of all earthly creatures.

Vers. 7—9. Man is a king, and not a king without territory; the world around, with the works of creative wisdom which fill it, is his kingdom. The words "put under his feet" sound like a paraphrase of the רָרָה in Gen. i. 26, 28. כָּל is unlimited, as in Job xiii. 1, xlii. 2, Isa. xlv. 24. But the expansion of the expression in vers. 8, 9 extends only to the earth, and is limited even there to the different classes of creatures in the regions of land, air, and water. The poet is enthusiastic in his survey of this province of man's dominion. And his lofty poetic language corresponds to this enthusiasm. The enumeration begins with the domestic animals and passes on from these to the wild beasts — together the creatures that dwell on terra firma. צִנְוָה (צִנְוָה Num. xxxii. 24) from צִנְוָה (צִנְוָה צִנְוָה), as also צִנְוָה fut. o., proliferum esse is, in poetry, equivalent to צִנְוָה, which is otherwise the usual name for small cattle. צִנְוָה (in Aramaic, as the name of the letter shews, a prose word) is in Hebrew poetically equivalent to בִּקְרָה; the oxen which willingly accommodate themselves to the service of man, especially of the husbandman, are so called from אָלָף to yield to. Wild animals, which in prose are called הַיָּחִי הַרְאֵרֵץ (הַיָּחִי) here bear the poetical name שָׂרִי, as in Joel ii. 22, cf. i. 20, 1 Sam. xvii. 44. שָׂרִי (in pause שָׂרִי) is the primitive form of שָׂרִי, which is not declined, and has thereby obtained a collective signification. From the land animals the description passes on to the fowls of the air and the fishes of the water. צִפּוֹר is the softer word, instead of עוֹף; and שָׂמַיִם is used without the art. according to poetical usage, whereas הַיָּם without the art. would have sounded too scanty and not sufficiently measured. In connection with שָׂמַיִם the article may be again omitted, just as with שָׂמַיִם. עֵבֶר is a collective participle. If the following were intended: he (or: since he), viz. מַן, passes through the paths of the sea (Böttcher, Cassel, and even Aben-Ezra and Kimchi), then it would not have been expressed in such a monostich, and in a form so liable to lead one astray. The words may be a comprehensive designation of that portion of the animal kingdom which is found in the sea; and this also intended to include all from the smallest worm to the giganticleviathan: ὀππῶσα ποντοπόρους παρεπιστεῖβουσι κελσούθους (Apollinaris). If man thus rules over every living thing that is round about him from the nearest to the most remote, even that which is apparently the most untameable: then it is clear that every lifeless created thing in his vicinity must serve him as its king. The poet regards man in the light of the purpose for which he was created.

Ver. 10. He has now demonstrated what he expressed in ver. 2, that the name of Jahve whose glory is reflected by the heavens, is also glorious on earth. Thus, then, he can as a conclusion repeat the thought with which he began, in a wider and more comprehensive meaning, and weave his Psalm together, as it were, into a wreath.

It is just this Psalm, of which one would have least expected it, that is frequently quoted in the New Testament and applied to the Messiah. Indeed Jesus' designation of Himself by ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, however far it may refer back to the Old Testament Scriptures, leans no less upon this Psalm than upon Dan. vii. 13. The use the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (ch. ii. 6—8) makes of vers. 5—7 of this Psalm shews us how the New Testament application to the Messiah is effected. The psalmist regards man as one who glorifies God and as a prince created of God. The deformation of this position by sin he leaves unheeded. But both sides of the mode of regarding it are warranted. On the one hand, we see that which man has become by creation still in operation even in his present state; on the other hand, we see it distorted and stunted. If we compare what the Psalm says with this shady side of the reality, from which side it is incongruous with the end of man's creation, then the song which treats of the man of the present becomes a prophecy of the man of the future. The Psalm undergoes this metamorphosis in the New Testament consciousness, which looks more to the loss than to that which remains of the original. In fact, the centre of the New Testament consciousness is Jesus the Restorer of that which is lost. The dominion of the world lost to fallen man, and only retained by him in a ruined condition, is allotted to mankind, when redeemed by Him, in fuller and more perfect reality. This dominion is not yet in the actual possession of mankind, but in the person of Jesus it now sits enthroned at the right hand of God. In Him the idea of humanity is transcendently realised, i. e. according to a very much higher standard than that laid down when the world was founded. He has entered into the state — only a little (βραχύ τι) beneath the angels — of created humanity for a little while (βραχύ τι), in order to raise redeemed humanity above the angels. Everything (ἅ) is really put under Him with just as little limitation as is expressed in this Psalm: not merely the animal kindom, not merely the world itself, but the universe with all the ruling powers in it, whether they be in subjection or in hostility to God, yea even the power of death (1 Cor. xv. 27, cf. Ephes. i. 22). Moreover, by redemption, more than heretofore, the confession which comes from the mouth of little children is become a bulwark founded of God, in order that against it the resistance of the opponents of revelation may be broken. We have an example of this in Mat. xxi. 16, where our Lord points the pharisees and scribes, who are enraged at the Hosanna of the children, to Ps. viii. 3. Redemption demands of man, before everything else, that he should become as a little child, and reveals its mysteries to infants, which are hidden from the wise and intelligent. Thus, therefore, it is μικροὶ καὶ νήπιοι, whose tongue is loosed by the Spirit of God, who are to put to shame the unbelieving; and all that this Psalm says of the man of the present becomes in the light of the New Testament in its relation to the history of redemption, a prophecy of the Son of man κατ' ἐξοχήν, and of the new humanity.

PSALM IX.

HYMN TO THE RIGHTEOUS JUDGE AFTER A DEFEAT OF HOSTILE PEOPLES.

- 2 ⌘ I WILL give thanks to Jahve with my whole heart, ⌘ I will recount all Thy marvellous works —
- 3 ⌘ I will be glad and rejoice in Thee,
 ⌘ I will sing praise to Thy name, O Most High!
- 4 ⌘ When mine enemies turned back,
 When they fell and perished before Thine angry face.
- 5 For Thou hast maintained my right and my cause,
 Thou hast sat down on the throne, a righteous Judge.
- 6 ⌘ Thou didst rebuke peoples, Thou didst destroy the wicked,
 Their name didst Thou blot out for ever and ever.
- 7 ⌘ The enemy are perished, perpetual ruins;
 And cities hast Thou rooted out, effaced is their very memory.
- 8 ⌘ But Jahve sits enthroned for ever,
 He hath set His throne for judgment.
- 9 And He shall judge the earth in righteousness,
 He shall minister judgment to the nations in uprightness.
- 10 ⌘ So will Jahve be a stronghold to the oppressed,
 A stronghold in times of trouble;
- 11 Thus shall they trust in Thee who know Thy name, Because Thou hast not forsaken them who ask after Thee, Jahve!
- 12 ⌘ Sing praises to Jahve, who dwelleth in Zion, Declare among the peoples His deeds;
- 13 That the Avenger of blood hath remembered them,
 He hath not forgotten the cry of the sufferer.
- 14 ⌘ "Have mercy upon me, O Jahve; behold mine affliction from them that hate me,
 "My lifter-up from the gates of death,

- 15 "That I may tell all Thy praise,
"That in the gates of the daughter of Zion I may rejoice in Thy salvation!"
- 16 ם The peoples have sunk down in the pit they have made,
In the net, that they hid, were their own feet taken.
- 17 Jahve hath made Himself known: He hath executed judgment,
Snaring the wicked in the work of his own hands.
(Stringed Instruments, Sela.)
- 18 ך Yea back to Hades must the wicked return,
All the heathen, that forget God.
- 19 For the poor shall not always be forgotten,
The hope of the afflicted is (not) perished for ever.
- 20 ן Arise, Jahve, let not mortal man be defiant,
Let the heathen be judged in Thy sight!
- 21 Put them in fear, O Jahve,
Let the heathen know they are mortals! (Sela).

Just as Ps. vii. is placed after Ps. vi. as exemplifying it, so Ps. ix. follows Ps. viii. as an illustration of the glorifying of the divine name on earth. And what a beautiful idea it is that Ps. viii., the Psalm which celebrates Jahve's name as being glorious in the earth, is introduced between a Psalm that closes with the words "I will sing of the name of Jahve, the Most High" (vii. 18) and one which begins: "I will sing of Thy name, O Most High!" (ix. 3).

The LXX. translates the inscription לְבָן עַל-מֹחַ by ὁπὲρ τῶν κρυφίων τοῦ υἱοῦ (Vulg. pro occultis fili) as though it were עַל-עֲלָמוֹת. Luther's rendering is still bolder: of beautiful (perhaps properly: lily-white) youth. Both renderings are opposed to the text, in which לַע occurs only once. The Targum understands בן of the duellist Goliath (אִישׁ הַבְּנִים); and some of the Rabbis regard לְבָן even as a transposition of נָבַל: on the death of Nabal. Hengstenberg has revived this view, regarding נָבַל as a collective designation of all Nabal-like fools. All these and other curious conceits arise from the erroneous idea that these words are an inscription referring to the contents of the Psalm. But, on the contrary, they indicate the tune or melody, and that by means of the familiar words of the song, — perhaps some popular song, — with which this air had become most intimately associated. At the end of Ps. xlviii. this indication of the air is simply expressed by על־מִוֶּרֶךְ. The view of the Jewish expositors, who refer לְבַן to the musician בֵּן mentioned in 1 Chron. xv. 18, has, therefore, some probability in its favour. But this name excites critical suspicion. Why may not a well-known song have begun מוֹת לְבַן “dying (is) to the son” . . ., or (if one is inclined to depart from the pointing, although there is nothing to render this suspicious) מוֹת לְבַן “Death makes white”?

Even Hitzig does not allow himself to be misled as to the ancient Davidic origin of Ps. ix. and x. by the fact of their having an alphabetical arrangement. These two Psalms have the honour of being ranked among the thirteen Psalms which are acknowledged by him to be genuine Davidic Psalms. Thus, therefore, the alphabetical arrangement found in other Psalms cannot, in itself, bring us down to “the times of poetic trifling and degenerated taste.” Nor can the freedom, with which the alphabetical arrangement is handled in Ps. ix. and x. be regarded as an indication of an earlier antiquity than these times. For the Old Testament poets, even in other instances, do not allow themselves to be fettered by forms of this character (vid. on Ps. cxlv., cf. on xlii. 2); and the fact, that in Ps. ix. x. the alphabetical arrangement is not fully carried out, is accounted for otherwise than by the license in which David, in distinction from later poets, indulged. In reality this pair of Psalms shews, that even David was given to acrostic composition. And why should he not be? Even among the Romans, Ennius (Cicero, De Divin. ii. 54 § 111), who belongs not to the leaden, but to the iron age, out of which the golden age first developed itself, composed in acrostics. And our oldest Germanic epics are clothed in the garb of alliteration, which Vilmar calls the most characteristic and most elevated style that the poetic spirit of our nation has created. Moreover, the alphabetical form is adapted to the common people, as is evident from Augustine's Retract. i. 20. It is not a paltry substitute for the departed poetic spirit, not merely an accessory to please the eye, an outward embellishment — it is in itself indicative of mental power. The didactic poet regards the array of the linguistic elements as the steps by which he leads his pupils up into the sanctuary of wisdom, or as the many-celled casket in which he stores the pearls of the teachings of his wisdom. The lyric writer regards it as the keys on which he strikes every note, in order to give the fullest expression to his feelings. Even the prophet does not disdain to allow the order of the letters to exert an influence over the course of his thoughts, as we see from Nah. i. 3—7.* Therefore, when among the nine** alphabetical Psalms (ix. x. xxv. xxxiv. xxxvii. cxi. cxii. cxix. cxlv.) four bear the inscription לְרֹדֶד (ix. xxv. xxxiv. cxlv.), we shall not at once regard them as non-Davidic just because they indicate an alphabetical plan which is more or less fully carried out.

This is not the place to speak of the relation of the anonymous Ps. x. to Ps. ix., since Ps. ix. is not in any way wanting in internal roundness and finish. It is thoroughly hymnic. The idea that ver. 14 passes from thanksgiving into supplication rests on a misinterpretation, as we shall presently see. This Psalm is a thoroughly national song of thanksgiving for victory by David, belonging to the time when Jahve was already enthroned on Zion, and therefore, to the time after the ark was brought home. Was it composed after the triumphant termination of the Syro-Ammonitish war? — The judgment of extermination already executed, ix. 8 sq., harmonises with what is recorded in 2 Sam. xii. 31; and the גֵּימִי, who are actually living within the borders of Israel, appear to be Philistines according to the annalistic passage about the Philistine feuds, 2 Sam. xxi. 15 sqq., cf. viii. 1 in connection with 1 Sam. xiii. 6.

Vers. 2—3. In this first strophe of the Psalm, which is laid out in tetrastichs, — the normative strophe, — the alphabetical form is carried out in the fullest possible way: we have four lines, each of which begins with א. It is the prelude of the song. The poet rouses himself up to a joyful utterance of Jahve's praise. With his whole heart (cxxxviii. 1), i. e. all his powers of mind and soul as centred in his heart taking part in the act, will he thankfully and intelligently confess God, and declare His wondrous acts which exceed human desire and comprehension (xxvi. 7); he will rejoice and be glad in Jahve, as the ground of his rejoicing and as the sphere of his joy; and with voice and with harp he will sing of the name of the Most High. עֲלִיּוֹן is not an attributive of the name of God (Hitz.: Thine exalted name), but, as it is everywhere from Gen. xiv. 18—22 onward (e. g. xcvii. 9), an attributive name of God. As an attributive to אֱלֹהִים one would expect to find אֱלֹהֵי עֲלִיּוֹן.

Vers. 4—5. The call upon himself to thanksgiving sounds forth, and the ב-strophe continues it by expressing the ground of it. The preposition ב in this instance expresses both the time and the reason together (as in lxxvi. 10, 2 Chron. xxviii. 6); in Latin it is recedentibus hostibus meis retro. אָחֲזֵר serves to strengthen the notion of being driven back, as in lvi. 10, cf. xlv. 11; and just as, in Latin, verbs compounded of re are strengthened by retro. In ver. 4b finite verbs take the place of the infinitive construct; here we have futt. with a present signification, just as in 2 Chron. xvi. 7 we find a præt. intended as perfect. For the rendering which Hitzig adopts: When mine enemies retreat backwards, they stumble . . . is opposed both by the absence of any syntactic indication in ver. 4b of an apodosis (cf. xxvii. 2); and also by the fact that יִכְשְׁלֵי is well adapted to be a continuation of the description of שׁוֹב אָחֲזֵר (cf. John xviii. 6), but is tame as a principal clause to the definitive clause בְּשׁוֹב אֹיְבֵי אֲחֹזֵר. Moreover, אָחֲזֵר does not signify backwards (which would rather be אָחֲזֵרָה [Gen. ix. 23, 1 Sam. iv. 18]), but back, or into the rear. The מִן of מִכְּפִינֶיךָ is the מִן of the cause, whence the action proceeds. What is intended is God's angry countenance, the look of which sets his enemies on fire as if they were fuel (xxi. 10), in antithesis to God's countenance as beaming with the light of His love. Now, while this is taking place, and because of its taking place, will he sing praise to God. From ver. 2 we see that the Psalm is composed directly after the victory and while the destructive consequences of it to the vanquished are still in operation. David sees in it all an act of Jahve's judicial power. To execute any one's right, מִשְׁפָּט (Mic. vii. 9), to bring to an issue any one's suit or lawful demand, יָן (cxl. 13), is equivalent to: to assist him and his good cause in securing their right. The phrases are also used in a judicial sense without the suffix. The genitive object after these principal words never denotes the person against whom, but the person on whose behalf, the third party steps forward with his judicial authority. Jahve has seated Himself upon His judgment-seat as a judge of righteousness (as in Jer. xi. 20), i. e. as a judge whose judicial mode of procedure is righteousness, justice,* and has decided in his favour. In יָשַׁב (as in cxxxii. 11), which is distinguished in this respect from יָשַׁב לָ (xlvi. 9), the idea of motion, considère, comes prominently forward.

Vers. 6—7. The strophe with ג, which is perhaps intended to represent ג and ה as well, continues the confirmation of the cause for thanksgiving laid down in ver. 4. He does not celebrate the judicial act of God on his behalf, which he has just experienced, alone, but in connection with, and, as it were, as the sum of many others which have preceded it. If this is the case, then in ver. 6 beside the Ammonites one may at the same time (with Hengstenb.) think of the Amalekites (1 Sam. viii. 12), who had been threatened since the time of Moses with a "blotting out of their remembrance" (Ex. xvii. 14, Deut. xxv. 19, cf. Num. xxiv. 20). The divine threatening is the word of omnipotence which detroys in distinction from the word of omnipotence that creates. רָשַׁע in close connection with גֵּוִים is individualising, cf. ver. 18 with vers. 16, 17. וְעַר is a sharpened pausal form for עָר, the Pathach going into a Segol (פַּחַח קָמוֹן); perhaps it is in order to avoid the threefold a-sound in עוֹלָם עוֹר (Nägelsbach § 8 extr.). In ver. 7 הָאֵיִב (with Azla legarme) appears to be a vocative. In that case הָאֵיִבָּהּ ought also to be addressed to the enemy. But if it be interpreted: "Thou hast destroyed thine own cities, their memorial is perished", destroyed, viz. at the challenge of Israel, then the thought is forced; and if we render it: "the cities, which thou hast destroyed, perished is the remembrance of them", i. e. one no longer thinks of thine acts of conquest, then we have a thought that is in itself awkward and one that finds no support in any of the numerous parallels which speak of a blotting out and leaving no trace behind. But, moreover, in both these interpretations the fact that וְזָכְרָם is strengthened by הַמָּה is lost sight of, and the twofold masculine הַמָּה וְזָכְרָם is referred to עָרִים (which is carelessly done by most expositors), whereas עֵיר, with but few exceptions, is feminine; consequently וזָכְרָם הַמָּה, so far as this is not absolutely impossible, must be referred to the enemies themselves (cf. xxxiv. 17, cix. 15). הָאֵיִב might more readily be nom. absol.: "the enemy — it is at end for ever with his destructions", but חָרְבָהּ never has an active but always only a neuter signification; or: "the enemy — ruins are finished for ever", but the signification to be destroyed is more natural for הַמָּה than to be completed, when it is used of ruinæ. Moreover, in connection with both these renderings the retrospective pronoun (חָרְבוֹתָיו) is wanting, and this is also the case with the reading חָרְבוֹתָ (LXX., Vulg., Syr.), which leaves it uncertain whose swords are meant. But why may we not rather connect הָאֵיִב at once with הַמָּה as subject? In other instances הַמָּה is also joined to a singular collective subject, e. g. Isa. xvi. 4; here it precedes, like הָאֵיִב in Judg. xx. 37. חָרְבוֹתָ לְנֶצַח is a nominative of the product, corresponding to the factitive object with verbs of making: the enemies are destroyed as ruins for ever, i. e. so that they are become ruins; or, more in accordance with the accentuation: the enemy, destroyed as ruins are they for ever. With respect to what follows the accentuation also contains hints worthy of our attention. It does not take נְהַשֵּׁה (with the regular Pathach by Athnach after Olewejored, vid. on ii. 7) as a relative clause, and consequently does not require המה זכרם to be referred back to ערים.

We interpret the passage thus: and cities (viz. such as were hostile) thou hast destroyed (נְהַשֵּׁה evellere, exstirpare), perished is their (the enemies') memorial. Thus it also now becomes intelligible, why זְכָרָם, according to the rule Ges. § 121, 3, is so remarkably strengthened by the addition of הַמָּה (cf. Num. xiv. 32, 1 Sam. xx. 42, Prov. xxii. 19, xxiii. 15, Ezek. xxxiv. 11). Hupfeld, whose interpretation is exactly the same as ours, thinks it might perhaps be the enemies themselves and the cities set over against one another. But the contrast follows in ver. 8: their, even their memorial is perished, while on the contrary Jahve endures for ever and is enthroned as judge. This contrast also retrospectively gives support to the explanation, that זכרם refers not to the cities, but to האויב as a collective. With this interpretation of ver. 7 we have no occasion to read זְכָרָם מִהֶמָּה (Targ.), nor זְכָר מִהֶמָּה (Paul., Hitz.). The latter is strongly commended by Job xi. 20, cf. Jer. x. 2; but still it is not quite admissible, since זְכָר here is not subjective (their own remembrance) but objective (remembrance of them). But may not ערים perhaps here, as in cxxxix. 20, mean zealots = adversaries (from עיר fervere, zelare)? We reply in the negative, because the Psalm bears neither an Aramaising nor a North Palestinian impress. Even in connection with this meaning, the harshness of the ערים without any suffix would still remain. But, that the cities that are, as it were, plucked up by the root are cities of the enemy, is evident from the context.

Vers. 8—9. Without a trace even of the remembrance of them the enemies are destroyed, while on the other hand Jahve endureth for ever. This strophe is the continuation of the preceding with the most intimate connection of contrast (just as the ב-strophe expresses the ground for what is said in the preceding strophe). The verb יָשַׁב has not the general signification "to remain" here (like עָמַד to endure), but just the same meaning as in xxix. 10. Everything that is opposed to Him comes to a terrible end, whereas He sits, or (which the fut. implies) abides, enthroned for ever, and that as Judge: He hath prepared His throne for the purpose of judgment. This same God, who has just given proof that He lives and reigns, will by and bye judge the nations still more comprehensively, strictly, and impartially. תִּבֵּל, a word exclusively poetic and always without the article, signifies first (in distinction from אֶרֶץ the body of the earth and אֲדָמָה the covering or soil of the earth) the fertile (from בָּל) surface of the globe, the οἰκουμένη. It is the last Judgment, of which all preceding judgments are harbingers and pledges, that is intended. In later Psalms this Davidic utterance concerning the future is repeated.

Vers. 10—11. Thus judging the nations Jahve shews Himself to be, as a second v-strophe says, the refuge and help of His own. The voluntative with Waw of sequence expresses that which the poet desires for his own sake and for the sake of the result mentioned in ver. 11. מִשְׁנַב, a high, steep place, where one is removed from danger, is a figure familiar to David from the experiences of his time of persecution. דָּהַ (in pause דָּהַ) is properly one who is crushed (from דָּכָה = דָּכָא, דָּכָה to crush, break in pieces, דָּקַק to pulverize), therefore one who is overwhelmed to the extreme, even to being completely crushed. The parallel is לְעֵתוֹת בְּצָרָה with the datival לְ (as probably also in x. 1). עֵתוֹת from עָתָה (time, and then both continuance, lxxx. 16, and condition) signifies the public relations of the time, or even the vicissitudes of private life, xxxi. 16; and בְּצָרָה is not רַצְרָה with צָר (Böttch.), which gives an expression that is meaninglessly minute ("for times in the need"), but one word, formed from בָּצַר (to cut off, Arab. to see, prop. to discern keenly), just like בָּקַשׁ from בָּקַשׁ, prop. a cutting off, or being cut off, i. e. either restraint, especially motionlessness (= בְּצִרָה, Jer. xvii. 8, plur. בְּצִרוֹת Jer. xiv. 1), or distress, in which the prospect of deliverance is cut off. Since God is a final refuge for such circumstances of hopelessness in life, i. e. for those who are in such circumstances, the confidence of His people is strengthened, refreshed, and quickened. They who know His name, to them He has now revealed its character fully, and that by His acts; and they who inquire after Him, or trouble and concern themselves about Him (this is what שׂרָרָה signifies in distinction from שׂבַּח), have now experienced that He also does not forget them, but makes Himself known to them in the fulness of His power and mercy.

Vers. 12—13. Thus then the 1-strophe summons to the praise of this God who has done, and will still do, such things. The summons contains a moral claim, and therefore applies to all, and to each one individually. Jahve, who is to be praised everywhere and by every one, is called יֹשֵׁב צִיּוֹן, which does not mean: He who sits enthroned in Zion, but He who inhabiteth Zion, Ges. § 138, 1. Such is the name by which He is called since the time when His earthly throne, the ark, was fixed on the castle hill of Jerusalem, lxxvi. 3. It is the epithet applied to Him during the period of the typical kingship of promise. That Jahve's salvation shall be proclaimed from Zion to all the world, even outside Israel, for their salvation, is, as we see here and elsewhere, an idea which throbs with life even in the Davidic Psalms; later prophecy beholds its realisation in its wider connections with the history of the future. That which shall be proclaimed to the nations is called עֲלֵילֹתָיו, a designation which the magnalia Dei have obtained in the Psalms and the prophets since the time of Hannah's song, 1 Sam. ii. 3 (from עָלָה, root על, to come over or upon anything, to influence a person or a thing, as it were, from above, to subject them to one's energy, to act upon them).

With כִּי, quod, in ver. 13, the subject of the proclamation of salvation is unfolded as to its substance. The prætt. state that which is really past; for that which God has done is the assumption that forms the basis of the discourse in praise of God on account of His mighty acts. They consist in avenging and rescuing His persecuted church, — persecuted even to martyrdom. The אֲחֵרֵי, standing by way of emphasis before its verb, refers to those who are mentioned afterwards (cf. ver. 21): the Chethib calls them עֲנִיִּים, the Keri עֲנִיִּים. Both words alternate elsewhere also, the Keri at one time placing the latter, at another the former, in the place of the one that stands in the text. They are both referable to עָנָה to bend (to bring low, Isa. xxv. 5). The neuter signification of the verb עָנָה = עָנָה ful. o., underlies the noun עָנָה (cf. שָׁלוּ), for which in Num. xii. 3 there is a Keri עָנָה with an incorrect Jod (like שָׁלוּ Job xxi. 23). This is manifest from the substantive עָנָה, which does not signify affliction, but passiveness, i. e. humility and gentleness; and the noun עָנָה is passive, and therefore does not, like עָנָה, signify one who is lowly-minded, in a state of עָנָה, but one who is bowed down by afflictions, עָנָה. But because the twin virtues denoted by עָנָה are acquired in the school of affliction, there comes to be connected with עָנָה — but only secondarily — the notion of that moral and spiritual condition which is aimed at by dispensations of affliction, and is joined with a suffering life, rather than with one of worldly happiness and prosperity, — a condition which, as Num. xii. 3 shews, is properly described by עָנָה (ταπεινός and πραύς). It shall be proclaimed beyond Israel, even among the nations, that the Avenger of blood, דָּרַשׁ דָּמִים, thinks of them (His דָּרַשׁים), and has been as earnest in His concern for them as they in theirs for Him. דָּמִים always signifies human blood that is shed by violence and unnaturally; the plur. is the plural of the product discussed by Dietrich, Abhandl. S. 40. דָּרַשׁ to demand back from any one that which he has destroyed, and therefore to demand a reckoning, indemnification, satisfaction for it, Gen. ix. 5, then absolutely to punish, 2 Chron. xxiv. 22.

Vers. 14—15. To take this strophe as a prayer of David at the present time, is to destroy the unity and hymnic character of the Psalm, since that which is here put in the form of prayer appears in what has preceded and in what follows as something he has experienced. The strophe represents to us how the עָנָה (עָנָה) cried to Jahve before the deliverance now experienced. Instead of the form דָּרַשׁ used everywhere else the resolved, and as it were tremulous, form דָּרַשׁ is designedly chosen. According to a better attested reading it is דָּרַשׁ (Pathach with Gaja in the first syllable), which is regarded by Chajug and others as the imper. Piel, but more correctly (Ewald § 251, c) as the imper. Kal from the intransitive imperative form דָּרַשׁ. דָּרַשׁ is the vocative, cf. xvii. 7. The gates of death, i. e. the gates of the realm of the dead (שָׁאוֹל, Isa. xxxviii. 10), are in the deep; he who is in peril of death is said to have sunk down to them; he who is snatched from peril of death is lifted up, so that they do not swallow him up and close behind him. The church, already very near to the gates of death, cried to the God who can snatch from death. Its final purpose in connection with such deliverance is that it may glorify God. The form תְּהַלְלֶיךָ is sing. with a plural suffix just like שְׁנֵאֲרֶיךָ Ezek. xxxv. 11, אֲשַׁמְחֶינִי Ezra ix. 15. The punctuists maintained (as עֲצֵרֶיךָ in Isa. xlvi. 13 shews) the possibility of a plural inflexion of a collective singular. In antithesis to the gates of death, which are represented as beneath the ground, we have the gates of the daughter of Zion standing on high. זֶן is gen. appositionis (Ges. § 116, 5). The daughter of Zion (Zion itself) is the church in its childlike, bride-like, and conjugal relation to Jahve. In the gates of the daughter of Zion is equivalent to: before all God's people, cxvi. 14. For the gates are the places of public resort and business. At this period the Old Testament mind knew nothing of the songs of praise of the redeemed in heaven. On the other side of the grave is the silence of death. If the church desires to praise God, it must continue in life and not die.

Vers. 16—17. And, as this ח-strophe says, the church is able to praise God; for it is rescued from death, and those who desired that death might overtake it, have fallen a prey to death themselves. Having interpreted the ה-strophe as the representation of the earlier עָצְרָה עֲנִיִּים we have no need to supply dicendo or dicturus, as Seb. Schmidt does, before this strophe, but it continues the prætt. preceding the ה-strophe, which celebrate that which has just been experienced. The verb טָבַע (root טב, whence also טָבַל) signifies originally to press upon anything with anything flat, to be pressed into, then, as here and in lxix. 3, 15, to sink in. הוּ טָבַע (pausal form in connection with Mugrash) in the parallel member of the verse corresponds to the attributive עָשָׂה (cf. יַפְעַל, vii. 16). The union of the epicene הוּ with רָשָׁתָהּ by Makkeph proceeds from the view, that הוּ is demonstrative as in xii. 8: the net there (which they have hidden). The punctuation, it is true, recognises a relative הוּ, xvii. 9, lxviii. 29, but it mostly takes it as demonstrative, inasmuch as it connects it closely with the preceding noun, either by Makkeph (xxxii. 8, lxii. 12, cxlii. 4, cxliii. 8) or by marking the noun with a conjunctive accent (x. 2, xxxi. 5, cxxxii. 12). The verb לָקַח (Arabic to hang on, adhere to, IV. to hold fast to) has the signification of seizing and catching in Hebrew.

In ver. 17 Ben Naphtali points נִדְרָךְ with  $\bar{a}$ : Jahve is known (part. Niph.); Ben Asher נִדְרָךְ, Jahve has made Himself known (3 pers. præt. Niph. in a reflexive signification, as in Ezek. xxxviii. 23). The readings of Ben Asher have become the textus receptus. That by which Jahve has made Himself known is stated immediately: He has executed judgment or right, by ensnaring the evil-doer (עֲשֵׂרָךְ, as in ver. 6) in his own craftily planned work designed for the destruction of Israel. Thus Gussetius has already interpreted it. עֲשֵׂרָךְ is part. Kal from עֲשֵׂרָךְ. If it were part. Niph. from עֲשֵׂרָךְ the  $\bar{e}$ , which occurs elsewhere only in a few  $\text{עָו}$  verbs, as לִיקֵף liquefactus, would be without an example. But it is not to be translated, with Ges. and Hengst.: "the wicked is snared in the work of his own hands", in which case it would have to be pointed עֲשֵׂרָךְ (3 præt. Niph.), as in the old versions. Jahve is the subject, and the suffix refers to the evil-doer. The thought is the same as in Job xxxiv. 11, Isa. i. 31. This figure of the net, רֶשֶׁת (from יָרַשׁ capere), is peculiar to the Psalms that are inscribed לְרוֹד. The music, and in fact, as the combination רִנְיִן סֶלָה indicates, the playing of the stringed instruments (xcii. 4), increases here; or the music is increased after a solo of the stringed instruments. The song here soars aloft to the climax of triumph.

Vers. 18—19. Just as in vers. 8 sqq. the prospect of a final universal judgment was opened up by Jahve's act of judgment experienced in the present, so here the grateful retrospect of what has just happened passes over into a confident contemplation of the future, which is thereby guaranteed. The LXX. translates יִשׁוּבוּ by ἀποστραφήτωσαν, Jer. convertantur, a meaning which it may have (cf. e. g. 2 Chron. xviii. 25); but why should it not be ἀναστραφήτωσαν, or rather: ἀναστραφήσονται, since ver. 19 shews that ver. 18 is not a wish but a prospect of that which is sure to come to pass? To be resolved into dust again, to sink away into nothing (reductio in pulverem, in nihilum) is man's return to his original condition, — man who was formed from the dust, who was called into being out of nothing. To die is to return to the dust, civ. 29, cf. Gen. iii. 19, and here it is called the return to Sheôl, as in Job xxx. 23 to death, and in xc. 3 to atoms, inasmuch as the state of shadowy existence in Hades, the condition of worn out life, the state of decay is to a certain extent the renewal (Repristination) of that which man was before he came into being. As to outward form לְשִׂאוֹלָה may be compared with לְשִׂעֲתָהּ in lxxx. 3; the ל in both instances is that of the direction or aim, and might very well come before שִׂאוֹלָה, because this form of the word may signify both ἐν ᾧδου and εἰς ᾧδου (cf. מְבַבְּלָהּ Jer. xxvii. 16). R. Abba ben Zabda, in Genesis Rabba cap. 50, explains the double sign of the direction as giving intensity to it: in inum ambitum orci. The heathen receive the epithet of שְׂכַחֵי אֱלֹהִים (which is more neuter than שְׂכַחֵי, l. 22); for God has not left them without a witness of Himself, that they could not know of Him, their alienation from God is a forgetfulness of Him, the guilt of which they have incurred themselves, and from which they are to turn to God (Isa. xix. 22). But because they do not do this, and even rise up in hostility against the nation and the God of the revelation that unfolds the plan of redemption, they will be obliged to return to the earth, and in fact to Hades, in order that the persecuted church may obtain its longed for peace and its promised dominion. Jahve will at last acknowledge this ecclesia pressa; and although its hope seems likely to perish, inasmuch as it remains again and again unfulfilled, nevertheless it will not always continue thus. The strongly accented לֵא rules both members of ver. 19, as in xxxv. 19, xxxviii. 2, and also frequently elsewhere (Ewald § 351, a). אֶבְיֹן, from אָבָה to wish, is one eager to obtain anything = a needy person. The Arabic اَبْسِي, which means the very opposite, and according to which it would mean "one who restrains himself", viz. because he is obliged to, must be left out of consideration.

Vers. 20—21. By reason of the act of judgment already witnessed the prayer now becomes all the more confident in respect of the state of things which is still continually threatened. From  $\text{י}$  the poet takes a leap to  $\text{ק}$  which, however, seems to be a substitute for the  $\text{כ}$  which one would expect to find, since the following Psalm begins with  $\text{ל}$ . David's  $\text{קִיָּמָה}$  (iii. 8, vii. 7) is taken from the lips of Moses, Num. x. 35. "Jahve arises, comes, appears" are kindred expressions in the Old Testament, all of which point to a final personal appearing of God to take part in human history from which He has now, as it were, retired into a state of repose becoming invisible to human eyes. Hupfeld and others wrongly translate "let not man become strong". The verb  $\text{יָצַח}$  does not only mean to be or become strong, but also to feel strong, powerful, possessed of power, and to act accordingly, therefore: to defy, lii. 9, like  $\text{עָצָב}$  defiant, impudent (post-biblical  $\text{עָצָב}$  shamelessness).  $\text{אָנָשׁ}$ , as in 2 Chron. xiv. 10, is man, impotent in comparison with God, and frail in himself. The enemies of the church of God are not unfrequently designated by this name, which indicates the impotence of their pretended power (Isa. li. 7, 12). David prays that God may repress the arrogance of these defiant ones, by arising and manifesting Himself in all the greatness of His omnipotence, after His forbearance with them so long has seemed to them to be the result of impotence. He is to arise as the Judge of the world, judging the heathen, while they are compelled to appear before Him, and, as it were, defile before Him ( $\text{עַל־פָּנָי}$ ), He is to lay  $\text{מִזְרָה}$  on them. If "razor" be the meaning it is equivocally expressed; and if, according to Isa. vii. 20, we associate with it the idea of an ignominious rasure, or of throat-cutting, it is a figure unworthy of the passage. The signification master (LXX., Syr., Vulg., and Luther) rests upon the reading  $\text{מִזְרָה}$ , which we do not with Thenius and others prefer to the traditional reading (even Jerome translates: pone, Domine, terrorem eis); for  $\text{מִזְרָה}$ , which according to the Masora is instead of  $\text{מִזְרָא}$  (like  $\text{מִזְלָה}$  Hab. iii. 17 for  $\text{מִזְלָא}$ ), is perfectly appropriate. Hitzig objects that fear is not a thing which one lays upon any one; but  $\text{מִזְרָא}$  means not merely fear, but an object, or as Hitzig himself explains it in Mal. ii. 5 a "lever", of fear. It is not meant that God is to cause them to be overcome with terror (על), nor that He is to put terror into them (פַּחַד), but that He is to make them (לְ) in no way differing from xxi. 4, cxi. 6, Job xiv. 13) an object of terror, from which to their dismay, as the wish is further expressed in ver. 21*b*, they shall come to know (Hos. ix. 7) that they are mortal men. As in x. 12, xlix. 12, l. 21, lxiv. 6, Gen. xii. 13, Job xxxv. 14, Amos v. 12, Hos. vii. 2, יִדְעוּ is followed by an only half indirect speech, without כִּי or אֲשֶׁר. אֲפֹלָה has Dag. forte conj. according to the rule of the אֲתֵי מַרְדִּיק (concerning which vid. on lii. 5), because it is erroneously regarded as an essential part of the text.

PSALM X.

PLAINTIVE AND SUPPLICATORY PRAYER UNDER THE PRESSURE OF HEATHENISH FOES AT HOME AND ABROAD.

- 1 WHY, Jahve, standest Thou afar off,
Why hidest Thou Thyself in times of trouble!
- 2 Through the pride of the evil-doer the afflicted burneth with fear,
They are taken in the plots which they have devised.
- 3 For the evil-doer boasteth of his soul's desire,
And the covetous renounceth [and] despiseth Jahve.
- 4 The evil-doer in his scornfulness — : "With nothing will He punish!
There is no God!" is the sum of his thoughts.
- 5 Sure are his ways at all times;
Far above are Thy judgments, out of his sight;
All his adversaries, he puffeth at them.
- 6 He saith in his heart: with nothing shall I be moved,
From one generation to another I am he to whom no misfortune comes.
- 7 Of cursing is his mouth full, and of deceit and oppression,
Under his tongue is trouble and evil.

- 8 He sitteth in the lurking-places of the villages,
In the secret corners doth he slay the innocent;
His eyes, they lie in wait for the weak.
- 9 He lieth in wait in the secret corner as a lion in his lair,
He lieth in wait to carry off the afflicted,
He carrieth off the afflicted, drawing him away in his net.
- 10 He croucheth, he cowereth and there fall into his claws
— the weak.
- 11 He saith in his heart: "God hath forgotten,
He hath hidden His face, He hath never seen."
- 12 פ Arise, Jahve; O God lift up Thine hand, Forget not the sufferer!
- 13 Wherefore should the evil-doer blaspheme the Deity, Saying in his heart: Thou dost not punish?!
- 14 ג Thou dost indeed see it; for Thou beholdest trouble and grief, to lay it in Thy hand;
The weak committeth himself to Thee,
Thou art the helper of the orphan.
- 15 ש Break Thou the arm of the evil-doer;
And the wicked man — punish his evil-doing, that it may vanish before Thee!
- 16 Jahve is King for ever and ever,
The heathen are perished out of His land.
- 17 נ The desire of the sufferers hast Thou heard, Jahve, Thou didst establish their heart, didst cause Thine ear to hear,
- 18 To obtain justice for the orphan and the oppressed,
That man of the earth may no more terrify.

This Psalm and Ps. xxxiii. are the only ones that are anonymous in the First book of the Psalms. But Ps. x. has something peculiar about it. The LXX. gives it with Ps. ix. as one Psalm, and not without a certain amount of warrant for so doing. Both are laid out in tetrastichs; only in the middle portion of Ps. x. some three line strophes are mixed with the four line. And assuming that the  $\rho$ -strophe, with which Ps. ix. closes, stands in the place of a  $\sigma$ -strophe which one would look for after the  $\gamma$ -strophe, then Ps. x., beginning with  $\lambda$ , continues the order of the letters. At any rate it begins in the middle of the alphabet, whereas Ps. ix. begins at the beginning. It is true the  $\lambda$ -strophe is then followed by strophes without the letters that come next in order; but their number exactly corresponds to the letters between  $\lambda$  and  $\rho$ ,  $\gamma$ ,  $\psi$ ,  $\tau$  with which the last four strophes of the Psalm begin, viz. six, corresponding to the letters  $\nu$ ,  $\eta$ ,  $\epsilon$ ,  $\delta$ ,  $\zeta$ , which are not introduced acrostically. In addition to this it is to be remarked that Ps. ix. and x. are most intimately related to one another by the occurrence of rare expressions, as  $\text{לְעִזּוֹת בְּצַרְרָה}$  and  $\text{דָּךְ}$ ; by the use of words in the same sense, as  $\text{אֲנֹשׁ}$  and  $\text{גֹּיִם}$ ; by striking thoughts, as "Jahve doth not forget" and "Arise"; and by similarities of style, as the use of the oratio directa instead of obliqua, ix. 21, x. 13. And yet it is impossible that the two Psalms should be only one. Notwithstanding all their community of character they are also radically different. Ps. ix. is a thanksgiving Psalm, Ps. x. is a supplicatory Psalm. In the latter the personality of the psalmist, which is prominent in the former, keeps entirely in the background. The enemies whose defeat Ps. ix. celebrates with thanksgiving and towards whose final removal it looks forward are  $\text{גֹּיִם}$ , therefore foreign foes; whereas in Ps. x. apostates and persecutors of his own nation stand in the foreground, and the  $\text{גֹּיִם}$  are only mentioned in the last two strophes. In their form also the two Psalms differ insofar as Ps. x. has no musical mark defining its use, and the tetrastich strophe structure of Ps. ix., as we have already observed, it not carried out with the same consistency in Ps. x. And is anything really wanting to the perfect unity of Ps. ix.? If it is connected with Ps. x. and they are read together uno tenore, then the latter becomes a tail-piece which disfigures the whole. There are only two things possible: Ps. x. is a pendant to Ps. ix. composed either by David himself, or by some other poet, and closely allied to it by its continuance of the alphabetical order. But the possibility of the latter becomes very slight when we consider that Ps. x. is not inferior to Ps. ix. in the antiquity of the language and the characteristic nature of the thoughts. Accordingly the mutual coincidences point to the same author, and the two Psalms must be regarded as "two co-ordinate halves of one whole, which make a higher unity" (Hitz.). That hard, dull, and tersely laconic language of deep-seated indignation at moral abominations for which the language has, as it were, no one word, we detect also elsewhere in some Psalms of David and of his time, those Psalms, which we are accustomed to designate as Psalms written in the indignant style (in grollendem Stil).

Vers. 1—2. The Psalm opens with the plaintive inquiry, why Jahve tarries in the deliverance of His oppressed people. It is not a complaining murmuring at the delay that is expressed by the question, but an ardent desire that God may not delay to act as it becomes His nature and His promise. לָמָּה, which belongs to both members of the sentence, has the accent on the ultima, as e. g. before עֲוֹנֹתַי in xxii. 2, and before הִרְעַתָּה in Ex. v. 22, in order that neither of the two gutturals, pointed with a, should be lost to the ear in rapid speaking (vid. on iii. 8, and Luzzatto on Isa. xi. 2, נָחַה עָלָיו).\* For according to the primitive pronunciation (even before the Masoretic) it is to be read: lamáh Adonaj; so that consequently ה and א are coincident. The poet asks why in the present hopeless condition of affairs (on בְּצָרָה vid. on ix. 10) Jahve stands in the distance (בְּרָחוֹק, only here, instead of מְרָחוֹק), as an idle spectator, and why does He cover (אֶעֱלִים) with orthophonic Dagesh, in order that it may not be pronounced (העליל), viz. His eyes, so as not to see the desperate condition of His people, or also His ears (Lam. iii. 56) so as not to hear their supplication. For by the insolent treatment of the ungodly the poor burns with fear (Ges., Stier, Hupf.), not vexation (Hengst.). The assault is a  $\pi\acute{\upsilon}\rho\omega\sigma\iota\varsigma$ , 1 Pet. iv, 12. The verb דלֵק which calls to mind דלֵקָה,  $\pi\alpha\rho\epsilon\tau\acute{o}\varsigma$ , is perhaps chosen with reference to the heat of feeling under oppression, which is the result of the persecution, of the (בו) דלֵק אֲזַרְיוֹ of the ungodly. There is no harshness in the transition from the singular to the plural, because וְעַי and וְשַׁע are individualising designations of two different classes of men. The subject to יִהְיֶה־שׁוֹ is the עֲנִיִּים, and the subject to הִשְׁבּוֹ is the רְשָׁעִים. The futures describe what usually takes place. Those who, apart from this, are afflicted are held ensnared in the crafty and malicious devices which the ungodly have contrived and plotted against them, without being able to disentangle themselves. The punctuation, which places Tarcha by ו, mistakes the relative and interprets it: "in the plots there, which they have devised".

Vers. 3—4. The prominent features of the situation are supported by a detailed description. The prætt. express those features of their character that have become a matter of actual experience. דָּלֵל, to praise aloud, generally with the accus., is here used with עַל of the thing which calls forth praise. Far from hiding the shameful desire or passion (cxii. 10) of his soul, he makes it an object and ground of high and sounding praise, imagining himself to be above all restraint human or divine. Hupfeld translates wrongly: "and he blesses the plunderer, he blasphemes Jahve". But the רָשָׁע who persecutes the godly, is himself a בַּעֲצָה, a covetous or rapacious person; for such is the designation (elsewhere with בַּעֲצָה Prov. i. 19, or בַּעֲצָה רָע Hab. ii. 9) not merely of one who "cuts off" (بضع), i. e. obtains unjust gain, by trading, but also by plunder,  $\pi\lambda\epsilon\sigma\acute{o}\nu\epsilon\alpha\tau\eta\varsigma$ . The verb בָּרַךְ (here in connection with Mugrash, as in Num. xxiii. 20 with Tiphcha בָּרַךְ) never directly signifies maledicere in biblical Hebrew as it does in the later Talmudic (whence בָּרַכְתָּ הַשֵּׁם blasphemy, B. Sanhedrin 56a, and frequently), but to take leave of any one with a benediction, and then to bid farewell, to dismiss, to decline and abandon generally, Job i. 5, and frequently (cf. the word remercier, abdanken; and the phrase "das Zeitliche segnen" — to depart this life). The declaration without a conjunction is climactic, like Isa. i. 4, Amos iv. 5, Jer. xv. 7. נָאץ, properly to prick, sting, is used of utter rejection by word and deed.\* In ver. 4, "the evil-doer according to his haughtiness" (cf. Prov. xvi. 18) is nom. absol., and בְּלִי-יְרֵשׁ אֵין אֱלֹהִים (contrary to the accentuation) is virtually the predicate to בְּלִי-מְמוֹתָיו. This word, which denotes the intrigues of the ungodly, in ver. 2, has in this verse, the general meaning: thoughts (from וּמַם, מָ, to join, combine), but not without being easily associated with the secondary idea of that which is subtly devised. The whole texture of his thoughts is, i. e. proceeds from and tends towards the thought, that he (viz. Jahve, whom he does not like to name) will punish with nothing (בְּלִי the strongest form of subjective negation), that in fact there is no God at all. This second follows from the first; for to deny the existence of a living, acting, all-punishing (in one word: a personal) God, is equivalent to denying the existence of any real and true God whatever (Ewald).

Ver. 5. This strophe, consisting of only three lines, describes his happiness which he allows nothing to disturb. The signification: to be lasting (prop. stiff, strong) is secured to the verb חָיַל (whence חָיִל) by Job xx. 21. He takes whatever ways he chooses, they always lead to the desired end; he stands fast, he neither stumbles nor goes astray, cf. Jer. xii. 1. The Chethib דָּרְכוּ (דָּרְכוּ) has no other meaning than that given to it by the Keri (cf. xxiv. 6, lviii. 8). Whatever might cast a cloud over his happiness does not trouble him: neither the judgments of God, which are removed high as the heavens out of his sight, and consequently do not disturb his conscience (cf. xxviii. 5, Isa. v. 12; and the opposite, xviii. 23), nor his adversaries whom he bloweth upon contemptuously. מָרוֹם is the predicate: altissime remota. And הִפִּיחַ בָּ, to breathe upon, does not in any case signify: actually to blow away or down (to express which  $\text{נָשַׁף}$  or  $\text{נָשַׁח}$  would be used), but either to "snub", or, what is more appropriate to ver. 5*b*, to blow upon them disdainfully, to puff at them, like  $\text{הִשִּׁיחַ}$  in Mal. i. 13, and flare rosas (to despise the roses) in Prudentius. The meaning is not that he drives his enemies away without much difficulty, but that by his proud and haughty bearing he gives them to understand how little they interfere with him.

Vers. 6—7. Then in his boundless carnal security he gives free course to his wicked tongue. That which the believer can say by reason of his fellowship with God,  $\text{בְּלֹא־אִמּוּנָה}$  (xxx. 7, xvi. 8), is said by him in godless self-confidence. He looks upon himself in age after age, i. e. in the endless future, as  $\text{אֲשֶׁר לֹא בָרַע}$ , i. e. as one who ( $\text{אֲשֶׁר}$  as in Isa. viii. 20) will never be in evil case ( $\text{בָּרַע}$  as in Ex. v. 19, 2 Sam. xvi. 8). It might perhaps also be interpreted according to Zech. viii. 20, 23 (vid. Köhler, in loc.): in all time to come (it will come to pass) that I am not in misfortune. But then the personal pronoun ( $\text{אֲנִי}$  or  $\text{הוּא}$ ) ought not be omitted; whereas with our interpretation it is supplied from  $\text{אִמּוּנָה}$ , and there is no need to supply anything if the clause is taken as an apposition: in all time to come he who... In connection with such unbounded self-confidence his mouth is full of  $\text{אִלָּה}$ , cursing, execratio (not perjury, perjurium, a meaning the word never has),  $\text{מְרִמָּה}$ , deceit and craft of every kind, and  $\text{הַרְףָּה}$ , oppression, violence. And that which he has under his tongue, and consequently always in readiness for being put forth (cxl. 4, cf. lxvi. 17), is trouble for others, and in itself matured wickedness. Paul has made use of this ver. 7 in his contemplative description of the corruptness of mankind, Rom. iii. 14.

Ver. 8. The ungodly is described as a liar in wait; and one is reminded by it of such a state of anarchy, as that described in Hos. vi. 9 for instance. The picture fixes upon one simple feature in which the meanness of the ungodly culminates; and it is possible that it is intended to be taken as emblematical rather than literally.  $\text{הַיִּצֵּר}$  (from  $\text{הִצִּיר}$  to surround, cf.  $\text{حظر}$ ,  $\text{حصر}$ , and especially  $\text{حضر}$ ) is a farm premises walled in (Arab. ḥadar, ḥadâr, ḥadâra), then losing the special characteristic of being walled round it comes to mean generally a settled abode (with a house of clay or stone) in opposition to a roaming life in tents (cf. Lev. xxv. 31, Gen. xxv. 16). In such a place where men are more sure of falling into his hands than in the open plain, he lies in wait (יִשָּׁב, like قعد له subsedit = insidiatus est ei), murders unobserved him who had never provoked his vengeance, and his eyes יִצְפְּנוּ לְהִלָּכָה יִצְפְּנוּ to spie, xxxvii. 32, might have been used instead of יִצְפֵּן; but יִצְפֵּן also obtains the meaning, to lie in ambush (lvi. 7, Prov. i. 11, 18) from the primary notion of restraining one's self (ضغن fut. i. in Beduin Arabic: to keep still, to be immoveably lost in thought, vid. on Job xxiv. 1), which takes a transitive turn in יִצְפֵּן "to conceal". הַלִּלְכָה, the dative of the object, is pointed just as though it came from הָיִל: Thy host, i. e. Thy church, O Jahve. The pausal form accordingly is הַלִּלְכָה with Segol, in ver. 14, not with Tsere as in incorrect editions. And the appeal against this interpretation, which is found in the plur. חִלְצָיִם ver. 10, is set aside by the fact that this plural is taken as a double word: host (חַל = חָיִל = חָיִל as in Obad. ver. 20) of the troubled ones (חִצְאִים, not as Ben-Labrat supposes, for חִצְאִים, but from חִצְאָה weary, and mellow and decayed), as the Keri (which is followed by the Syriac version) and the Masora direct, and accordingly it is pointed חִלְצָיִם with Tsere. The punctuation therefore sets aside a word which was unintelligible to it, and cannot be binding on us. There is a verb חִלַּךְ, which, it is true, does not occur in the Old Testament, but in the Arabic, from the root حك firmus fuit, firmum fecit (whence also حکل intrans. to be firm, fermé, i. e. closed), it gains the signification in reference to colour: to be dark (cognate with חָבֵל, whence חִבְלִילִי) and is also transferred to the gloom and blackness of misfortune.\* From this an abstract is formed חִלְךָ or חִלְךָ (like חִפְשׁ):

* Cf. Samachshari's Golden Necklaces, Proverb 67, which Fleischer translates: "Which is blacker: the plumage of the raven, which is black as coal, or thy life, O stranger among strangers?" The word "blacker" is here expressed by أَحْلَكُ, just as the verb حَلَكَ with its infinitives حَلَكَ or حَلَكَةٌ and its derivatives is applied to sorrow and misery.

blackness, misfortune, or also of a defective development of the senses: imbecility; and from this an adjective חִלְכָּה = חִלְכִּי, or also (cf. חִפְּשֵׁי עֵלְפָה, Ezek. xxxi. 15 = one in a condition of languishing, עֵלְפָה) חִלְכָּה = חִלְכִּי, plur. חִלְכָּאִים, after the form הִדְרָאִים, from הִדְרִי, Ew. § 189, g.

Ver. 9. The picture of the רֶשַׁע, who is become as it were a beast of prey, is now worked out further. The lustrum of the lion is called סִבָּה Jer. xxv. 38, or סִבָּה Job xxxviii. 40: a thicket, from סָבַב, which means both to interweave and to plait over = to cover (without any connection with שָׁבַב a thorn, Arab. shôk, a thistle). The figure of the lion is reversed in the second line, the עָנִי himself being compared to the beast of prey and the רֶשַׁע to a hunter who drives him into the pit-fall and when he has fallen in hastens to drag him away (מִשָּׁדָה, as in xxviii. 3, Job xxiv. 22) in, or by means of (Hos. xi. 4, Job xl. 25), his net, in which he has become entangled.

Vers. 10—11. The comparison to the lion is still in force here and the description recurs to its commencement in the second strophe, by tracing back the persecution of the ungodly to its final cause. Instead of the Chethib וְדָבָה (perf. consec.), the Keri reads וְדָבָה more in accordance with the Hebrew use of the tenses. Job xxxviii. 40 is the rule for the interpretation. The two futures depict the settled and familiar lying in wait of the plunderer. True, the Kal דָּבָה in the signification "to crouch down" finds no support elsewhere; but the Arab. dakka to make even (cf. مصد fir-miter inhæsit loco, of the crouching down of beasts of prey, of hunters, and of foes) and the Arab. dagga, compared by Hitzig, to move stealthily along, to creep, and dujgeh a hunter's hiding-place exhibit synonymous significations. The ταπεινώσει αὐτόν of the LXX. is not far out of the way. And one can still discern in it the assumption that the text is to be read וְדָבָה יִשָּׁח: and crushed he sinks (Aquila: ὁ δὲ λαθεῖς καμφοθήσεται); but even דָּבָה is not found elsewhere, and if the poet meant that, why could he not have written נִדְבָה? (cf. moreover Judges v. 27). If דָּבָה is taken in the sense of a position in which one is the least likely to be seen, then the first two verbs refer to the sculker, but the third according to the usual schema (as e. g. cxxiv. 5) is the predicate to הַלֹּסְאִים (הַלֹּכְאִים) going before it. Crouching down as low as possible he lies on the watch, and the feeble and defenceless fall into his strong ones, עֲצוּמָיו, i. e. claws. Thus the ungodly slays the righteous, thinking within himself: God has forgotten, He has hidden His face, i. e. He does not concern Himself about these poor creatures and does not wish to know anything about them (the denial of the truth expressed in ix. 13, 19.); He has in fact never been one who sees, and never will be. These two thoughts are blended; לֵךְ with the perf. as in xxi. 3, and the addition of חַיָּה (cf. xciv. 7) denies the possibility of God seeing now any more than formerly, as being an absolute absurdity. The thought of a personal God would disturb the ungodly in his doings, he therefore prefers to deny His existence, and thinks: there is only fate and fate is blind, only an absolute and it has no eyes, only a notion and that cannot interfere in the affairs of men.

Vers. 12—13. The six strophes, in which the consecutive letters from מ to צ are wanting, are completed, and now the acrostic strophes begin again with ק. In contrast to those who have no God, or only a lifeless idol, the psalmist calls upon his God, the living God, to destroy the appearance that He is not an omniscient Being, by arising to action. We have more than one name of God used here; אֱלֹהִים is a vocative just as in xvi. 1, lxxxiii. 2, cxxxix. 17, 23. He is to lift up His hand in order to help and to punish (יָשׂוּא יְדִי, whence comes the imperat. יָשׂוּא = שׂוּא, cf. נִסְחָה iv. 7, like יָדִי שִׁלְהָ cxxxviii. 7 and יָדִי נִסְחָה Ex. vii. 5 elsewhere). Forget not is equivalent to: fulfil the לֹא שִׁבְחָה of ix. 13, put to shame the אֵל שִׁבְחָה of the ungodly, ver. 11! Our translation follows the Keri עֲנִיּוּם. That which is complained of in vers. 3, 4 is put in the form of a question to God in ver. 13: wherefore (עַל-מָה, instead of which we find עַל-מָה in Num. xxii. 32, Jer. ix. 11, because the following words begin with letters of a different class) does it come to pass, i. e. is it permitted to come to pass? On the perf. in this interrogative clause vid. xi. 3. עַד מַדּוּעַ inquires the cause, לְמָה the aim, and עַל-מָה the motive, or in general the reason: on what ground, since God's holiness can suffer no injury to His honour?

On לֹא תִדְרֹשׁ with כִּי, the oratio directa instead of obliqua, vid. on ix. 21.

Ver. 14. Now comes the confirmation of his cry to God: It is with Him entirely different from what the ungodly imagine. They think that He will not punish; but He does see (cf. 2 Chron. xxiv. 22), and the psalmist knows and confesses it: רָאִיתָהּ (defective — רָאִיתָהּ xxxv. 22), Thou hast seen and dost see what is done to Thine own, what is done to the innocent. This he supports by a conclusion a genere ad speciem thus: the trouble which is prepared for others, and the sorrow (כָּעַם, as in Eccl. vii. 3) which they cause them, does not escape the all-seeing eye of God, He notes it all, to give it into (lay it in) His hand. "To give anything into any one's hand" is equivalent to, into his power (1 Kings xx. 28, and frequently), or into any one's care (Gen. xxxii. 17, and frequently); but here God gives (lays) the things which are not to be administered, but requited, into His own hand. The expression is meant to be understood according to lvi. 9, cf. Isa. xlix. 16: He is observant of the afflictions of His saints, laying them up in His hand and preserving them there in order, in His own time, to restore them to His saints in joy, and to their enemies in punishment. Thus, therefore, the feeble and helpless (read חֲלִיבָהּ or חֲלִיבָהּ; according to the Masoretic text חֲלִיבָהּ) Thy host, not חֲלִיבָהּ, which is contrary to the character of the form, as pausal form for חֲלִיבָהּ can leave to Him, viz. all his burden (יָהֲבוּ, lv. 23), everything that vexes and disquiets him. Jahve has been and will be the Helper of the fatherless. יָהוָה stands prominent by way of emphasis, like יָהוָה ix. 13, and Bakius rightly remarks in voce pupilli synecdoche est, complectens omnes illos, qui humanis præsidiis destituuntur.

Vers. 15—16. The desire for Jahve's interposition now rises again with fresh earnestness. It is a mistake to regard שׁוֹרֵשׁ and מַצָּא as correlative notions. In the phrase to seek and not find, when used of that which has totally disappeared, we never have דָּרַשׁ, but always בָּקַשׁ, xxxvii. 36, Isa. xli. 12, Jer. l. 20, and frequently. The verb דָּרַשׁ signifies here exactly the same as in vers. 4, 13, and ix. 13: "and the wicked (nom. absol. as in ver. 4) — mayst Thou punish his wickedness, mayst Thou find nothing more of it". It is not without a meaning that, instead of the form of expression usual elsewhere (xxxvii. 36, Job xx. 8), the address to Jahve is retained: that which is no longer visible to the eye of God, not merely of man, has absolutely vanished out of existence. This absolute conquest of evil is to be as surely looked for, as that Jahve's universal kingship, which has been an element of the creed of God's people ever since the call and redemption of Israel (Ex. xv. 18), cannot remain without being perfectly and visibly realised. His absolute and eternal kingship must at length be realised, even in all the universality and endless duration foretold in Zech. xiv. 9, Dan. vii. 14, Apoc. xi. 15. Losing himself in the contemplation of this kingship, and beholding the kingdom of God, the kingdom of good, as realised, the psalmist's vision stretches beyond the foes of the church at home to its foes in general; and, inasmuch as the heathen in Israel and the heathen world outside of Israel are blended together into one to his mind, he comprehends them all in the collective name of אֲנִי, and sees the land of Jahve (Lev. xxv. 23), the holy land, purified of all oppressors hostile to the church and its God. It is the same that is foretold by Isaiah (lii. 1), Nahum (ii. 1), and in other passages, which, by the anticipation of faith, here stands before the mind of the suppliant as an accomplished fact — viz. the consummation of the judgment, which has been celebrated in the hymnic half (Ps. ix.) of this double Psalm as a judgment already executed in part.

Vers. 17—18. Still standing on this eminence from which he seems to behold the end, the poet basks in the realisation of that which has been obtained in answer to prayer. The ardent longing of the meek and lowly sufferers for the arising, the parusia of Jahve (Isa. xxvi. 8), has now been heard by Him, and that under circumstances which find expression in the following futt., which have a past signification: God has given and preserved to their hearts the right disposition towards Himself (רָחֵן), as in lxxviii. 8, Job xi. 13, Sir. ii. 17 ἐτοιμάσει καρδίας, post-biblical כִּן* and to be understood according to 1 Sam. vii. 3, 2 Chron. xx. 33, cf. לֵב נְכוֹן li. 12, lxxviii. 37; it is equivalent to "the single eye" in the language of the New Testament), just as, on the other hand, He has set His ear in the attitude of close attention to their prayer, and even to their most secret sighings (הִקְשִׁיב) with אָזְנוֹ, as in Prov. ii. 2; to stiffen the ear, from קָשַׁב, קָשַׁב, root קָשׁ to be hard, rigid, firm, from which we also have קָשַׁח, קָשַׁח, קָשַׁח, cf. on Isa. xxi. 7). It was a mutual relation, the design of which was finally and speedily to obtain justice for the fatherless and oppressed, yea crushed, few, in order that mortal man of the earth may no longer (בָּל, as in Isa. xiv. 21, and in post-biblical Hebrew בָּל and לְבָל instead of פָּן) terrify. From the parallel conclusion, ix. 20, 21, it is to be inferred that אֲנֹשׁ does not refer to the oppressed but to the oppressor, and is therefore intended as the subject; and then the phrase מִן־הָאָרֶץ also belongs to it, as in xvii. 14, people of the world, lxxx. 14 boar of the woods, whereas in Prov. xxx. 14 מִן־הָאָרֶץ belongs to the verb (to devour from off the earth). It is only in this combination that אֲנֹשׁ מִן־הָאָרֶץ forms with לְעָרֵץ a significant paronomasia, by contrasting the conduct of the tyrant with his true nature: a mortal of the earth, i. e. a being who, far removed from any possibility of vying with the God who is in heaven, has the earth as his birth-place. It is not מִן־הָאָרֶץ, for the earth is not referred to as the material out of which man is formed, but as his ancestral house, his home, his bound, just as in the expression of John ὁ θεὸς ἐκ τῆς γῆς, iii. 31 (Lat. ut non amplius terreat homo terrenus). A similar play of words was attempted before in ix. 20 אֲלֵ-יָעֵן אֲנֹשׁ. The Hebrew verb עָרַץ signifies both to give way to fear, Deut. vii. 21, and to put in fear, Isa. ii. 19, 21, xlvi. 12. It does mean "to defy, rebel against", although it might have this meaning according to the Arabic عَرَض (to come in the way, withstand, according to which Wetzstein explains עָרַץ Job xxx. 6, like عَرَض, "a valley that runs slantwise across a district, a gorge that blocks up the traveller's way".*). It is related to عَرَص to vibrate, tremble (e.g. of lightning).

PSALM XI.

REFUSAL TO FLEE WHEN IN A PERILOUS SITUATION.

- 1 IN Jahve put I my trust — how say ye to my soul:
“Flee to your mountain [as] a bird!
- 2 “For, lo, the wicked have bent the bow,
“They have made ready their arrow upon the string,
“To shoot the upright in heart in the dark.
- 3 “When the pillars are pulled down,
“The righteous — what will he do?!”
- 4 Jahve in His holy temple,
Jahve, who hath His throne in heaven —
His eyes behold, His eyelids try the children of men.
- 5 Jahve, He trieth the righteous,
And the wicked and him that loveth violence His soul hateth.
- 6 Upon the wicked He shall rain snares; Fire, brimstone, and burning wind is the portion of their cup.
- 7 For Jahve is righteous, loving righteousness:
The upright shall behold His countenance.

Ps. xi., which likewise confidently sets the all-seeing eye of Jahve before the ungodly who carry out their murderous designs under cover of the darkness, is placed after Ps. x. The life of David (to whom even Hitzig and Ewald ascribe this Psalm) is threatened, the pillars of the state are shaken, they counsel the king to flee to the mountains. These are indications of the time when the rebellion of Absalom was secretly preparing, but still clearly discernible. Although hurrying on with a swift measure and clear in the principal thoughts, still this Psalm is not free from difficult points, just as it is with all the Psalms which contain similar dark passages from the internal condition of Israel. The gloomy condition of the nation seems to be reflected in the very language. The strophic plan is not easily discernible; nevertheless we cannot go far wrong in dividing the Psalm into two seven line strophes with a two line epiphonema.

Vers. 1—3. David rejects the advice of his friends to save his life by flight. Hidden in Jahve (xvi. 1, xxxvi. 8) he needs no other refuge. However well-meant and well-grounded the advice, he considers it too full of fear and is himself too confident in God, to follow it. David also introduces his friends as speaking in other passages in the Psalms belonging to the period of the Absalom persecution, iii. 3, iv. 7. Their want of courage, which he afterwards had to reprove and endeavour to restore, shewed itself even before the storm had burst, as we see here. With the words "how can you say" he rejects their proposal as unreasonable, and turns it as a reproach against them. If the Chethib, נָרוּ, is adopted, then those who are well-disposed, say to David, including with him his nearest subjects who are faithful to him: retreat to your mountain, (ye) birds (צִפּוֹר collective as in viii. 9, cxlviii. 10); or, since this address sounds too derisive to be appropriate to the lips of those who are supposed to be speaking here: like birds (comparatio decurtata as in xxii. 14, lviii. 9, Job xxiv. 5, Isa. xxi. 8). הַרְרָם which seems more natural in connection with the vocative rendering of צִפּוֹר (cf. Isa. xviii. 6 with Ezek. xxxix. 4) may also be explained, with the comparative rendering, without any need for the conjecture הַר כְּמוֹ צִפּוֹר (cf. Deut. xxxiii. 19), as a retrospective glance at the time of the persecution under Saul: to the mountains, which formerly so effectually protected you (cf. 1 Sam. xxvi. 20, xxiii. 14). But the Keri, which is followed by the ancient versions, exchanges נָרוּ for נוֹרֵי, cf. נוֹרֵי Isa. li. 23. Even reading it thus we should not take צִפּוֹר, which certainly is epicœne, as vocative: flee to your mountain, O bird (Hitz.); and for this reason, that this form of address is not appropriate to the idea of those who proffer their counsel. But we should take it as an equation instead of a comparison: fly to your mountain (which gave you shelter formerly), a bird, i. e. after the manner of a bird that flies away to its mountain home when it is chased in the plain. But this Keri appears to be a needless correction, which removes the difficulty of נָרוּ coming after לְפָנַי, by putting another in the place of this synallage numeri.*

In ver. 2 the faint-hearted ones give as the ground of their advice, the fearful peril which threatens from the side of crafty and malicious foes. As הִנֵּה implies, this danger is imminent. The perfect overrides the future: they are not only already in the act of bending the bow, they have made ready their arrow, i. e. their deadly weapon, upon the string (יָרָה = מִיָּרָה, xxi. 13, Arab. watar, from יָרָה, watara, to stretch tight, extend, so that the thing is continued in one straight line) and even taken aim, in order to discharge it (יָרָה with לְ of the aim, as in lxiv. 5, with acc. of the object) in the dark (i. e. secretly, like an assassin) at the upright (those who by their character are opposed to them). In ver. 3 the faint-hearted still further support their advice from the present total subversion of justice. הַשְּׂחוֹת are either the highest ranks, who support the edifice of the state, according to Isa. xix. 10, or, according to lxxxii. 5, Ezek. xxx. 4, the foundations of the state, upon whom the existence and well-being of the land depends. We prefer the latter, since the king and those who are loyal to him, who are associated in thought with צַדִּיק, are compared to the שְׂחוֹת. The construction of the clause beginning with כִּי is like Job xxxviii. 41. The fut. has a present signification. The perf. in the principal clause, as it frequently does elsewhere (e. g. xxxix. 8, lx. 11, Gen. xxi. 7, Num. xxiii. 10, Job xii. 9, 2 Kings xx. 9) in interrogative sentences, corresponds to the Latin conjunctive (here quid fecerit), and is to be expressed in English by the auxiliary verbs: when the bases of the state are shattered, what can the righteous do? he can do nothing. And all counter-effort is so useless that it is well to be as far from danger as possible.

Vers. 4—6. The words of David's counsellors who fear for him are now ended. And David justifies his confidence in God with which he began his song. Jahve sits enthroned a bird" it would require to be accented נֹדוּ הַרְכָּם צִפּוֹר (as a transformation from נֹדוּ הַרְכָּם צִפּוֹר, vid. Baer's Accentsystem XVIII. 2). The interpunction as we have it, נֹדוּ הַרְכָּם צִפּוֹר, harmonises with the interpretation of Varenius as of Löb Spira (Pentateuch-Comm. 1815): Fugite (o socii Davidis), mons vester (h. e. presidium vestrum, Ps. xxx. 8, cui inimicini) est avis errans.

above all that takes place on earth that disheartens those of little faith. At an infinite distance above the earth, and also above Jerusalem, now in rebellion, is a הִיכַל קָדֵשׁ, xviii. 7, xxix. 9, and in this holy temple is Jahve, the Holy One. Above the earth are the heavens, and in heaven is the throne of Jahve, the King of kings. And this temple, this palace in the heavens, is the place whence issues the final decision of all earthly matters, Hab. ii. 20, Mic. i. 2. For His throne above is also the super-terrestrial judgment-seat, ix. 8, ciii. 19. Jahve who sits thereon is the all-seeing and omniscient One. הִזָּה prop. to split, cf. cernere, is used here according to its radical meaning, of a sharp piercing glance. בִּרְחַן prop. to try metals by fire, of a fixed and penetrating look that sees into a thing to the foundation of its inmost nature. The mention of the eyelids is intentional. When we observe a thing closely or ponder over it, we draw the eyelids together, in order that our vision may be more concentrated and direct, and become, as it were, one ray piercing through the object. Thus are men open to the all-seeing eyes, the all-searching looks of Jahve: the just and the unjust alike. He tries the righteous, i. e. He knows that in the depth of his soul there is an upright nature that will abide all testing (xvii. 3, Job xxiii. 10), so that He lovingly protects him, just as the righteous lovingly depends upon Him. And His soul hates (i. e. He hates him with all the energy of His perfectly and essentially holy nature) the evil-doer and him that delights in the violence of the strong towards the weak. And the more intense this hatred, the more fearful will be the judgments in which it bursts forth.

Ver. 7, which assumes a declaration of something that is near at hand, is opposed to our rendering the voluntative form of the fut., יִסְמַךְ, as expressive of a wish. The shorter form of the future is frequently indicative in the sense of the future, e. g. lxxii. 13, or of the present, e. g. lviii. 5, or of the past, xviii. 12. Thus it here affirms a fact of the future which follows as a necessity from vers. 4, 5. Assuming that פָּחִים might be equivalent to פְּחָמִים, even then the Hebrew פָּחִים, according to the general usage of the language, in distinction from גִּחְלִים, does not denote burning, but black coals. It ought therefore to have been פְּחָמֵי אֵשׁ. Hitzig reads פְּרִיִם from פְּרִיִם ashes; but a rain of ashes is no medium of punishment. Böttcher translates it "lumps" according to Ex. xxxix. 3, Num. xvii. 3; but in these passages the word means thin plates. We adhere to the signification snares, Job xxii. 10, cf. xxi. 17, Prov. xxii. 5; and following the accentuation, we understand it to be a means of punishment by itself. First of all descends a whole discharge of missiles which render all attempt at flight impossible, viz. lightnings; for the lightning striking out its course and travelling from one point in the distance, bending itself like a serpent, may really be compared to a snare, or noose, thrown down from above. In addition to fire and brimstone (Gen. xix. 24) we have also רִיחַ וְלַעֲבוֹרָה. The LXX. renders it πνεῦμα καταγίδου, and the Targum וְעַפְסָא עֲלֵעוּלָא, procella turbinea. The root is not לָעַף, which cannot be sustained as a cognate form of לָרַב, לָאֵב, to burn, but וָעַף, which (as Sam. v. 10 shews) exactly corresponds to the Latin æstuarē which combines in itself the characteristics of heat and violent motion, therefore perhaps: a wind of flames, i. e. the deadly simoom, which, according to the present division of the verse is represented in connection with אֵשׁ וְנִפְרִיתָי, as the breath of the divine wrath pouring itself forth like a stream of brimstone, Isa. xxx. 33. It thus also becomes clear how this can be called the portion of their cup, i. e. what is adjudged to them as the contents of their cup which they must drain off. מְנַת (only found in the Davidic Psalms, with the exception of 2 Chron. xxxi. 4) is both absolutivus and constructivus according to Olshausen (§§ 108, c, 165, i), and is derived from manawath, or manawath, with the original feminine termination ath, the final weak radical being blended with it. According to Hupfeld it is constr., springing from מְנִיתָי, like מְנַתָּ (in Dan. and Neh.) from מְנִיתָי. But probably it is best to regard it as = מְנִיתָי or מְנִיתָי, like גְּלוּתָי = גְּלוּתָי.

Ver. 7. Thus then Jahve is in covenant with David. Even though he cannot defend himself against his enemies, still, when Jahve gives free course to His hatred in judgment, they will then have to do with the powers of wrath and death, which they will not be able to escape. When the closing distich bases this different relation of God towards the righteous and the unrighteous and this judgment of the latter on the righteousness of God, we at once perceive what a totally different and blessed end awaits the righteous. As Jahve Himself is righteous, so also on His part (1 Sam. xii 7, Mic. vi. 5, and frequently) and on the part of man (Isa. xxxiii. 15) He loves צדקות, the works of righteousness. The object of אָרָב (= אֲרָב) stands at the head of the sentence, as in xcix. 4, cf. x. 14. In ver. 7b אֲשֶׁר designates the upright as a class, hence it is the more natural for the predicate to follow in the plur. (cf. ix. 7, Job viii. 19) than to precede as elsewhere (Prov. xxviii. 1, Isa. xvi. 4). The rendering: "His countenance looks upon the upright man" (Hengst. and others) is not a probable one, just because one expects to find something respecting the end of the upright in contrast to that of the ungodly. This rendering is also contrary to the general usage of the language, according to which פָּנִים is always used only as that which is to be seen, not as that which itself sees. It ought to have been עֵינָיו, xxxiii. 18, xxxiv. 16, Job xxxvi. 7. It must therefore be translated according to xvii. 15, cxl. 13: the upright (quisquis probus est) shall behold His countenance. The pathetic form פָּנִים instead of עֵינָיו was specially admissible here, where God is spoken of (as in Deut. xxxiii. 2, cf. Isa. xlv. 15). It ought not to be denied any longer that mo is sometimes (e. g. Job xx. 23, cf. xxii. 2, xxvii. 23) a dignified singular suffix. To behold the face of God is in itself impossible to mortals without dying. But when God reveals Himself in love, then He makes His countenance bearable to the creature. And to enjoy this vision of God softened by love is the highest honour God in His mercy can confer on a man; it is the blessedness itself that is reserved for the upright, cxl. 14. It is not possible to say that what is intended is a future vision of God; but it is just as little possible to say that it is exclusively a vision in this world. To the Old Testament conception the future עוֹלָם is certainly lost in the night of Sheōl. But faith broke through this night, and consoled itself with a future beholding of God, Job xix. 26. The redemption of the New Testament has realised this aspiration of faith, since the Redeemer has broken through the night of the realm of the dead, has borne on high with Him the Old Testament saints, and translated them into the sphere of the divine love revealed in heaven.

PSALM XII.

LAMENT AND CONSOLATION IN THE MIDST OF PREVAILING FALSEHOOD.

- 2 HELP, Jahve, for the godly man ceaseth,
For the faithful have vanished from among the children of men!
- 3 They speak falsehood one with another,
Flattering lips with a double heart, they speak.
- 4 May Jahve root out all flattering lips,
The tongue that speaketh great swelling words,
- 5 Which say: to our tongue we impart strength,
Our lips are with us, who is lord over us?!
- 6 "Because of the desolation of the afflicted, the sighing of the poor,
"Will I now arise — saith Jahve —
"In safety will I set him who languisheth for it." —
- 7 The words of Jahve are pure words,
Silver melted down in the furnace, to the earth,
Purified seven times.
- 8 Thou, O Jahve, wilt defend them,
Thou wilt preserve him from this generation for ever;
- 9 The wicked strut about on every side,
When vileness among the children of men is exalted.

Ps. xi. is appropriately followed by Ps. xii., which is of a kindred character: a prayer for the deliverance of the poor and miserable in a time of universal moral corruption, and more particularly of prevailing faithlessness and boasting. The inscription: To the Precentor, on the Octave, a Psalm of David points us to the time when the Temple music was being established, i. e. the time of David — incomparably the best age in the history of Israel, and yet, viewed in the light of the spirit of holiness, an age so radically corrupt. The true people of Jahve were even then, as ever, a church of confessors and martyrs, and the sighing for the coming of Jahve was then not less deep than the cry "Come, Lord Jesus!" at the present time.

This Ps. xii. together with Ps. ii. is a second example of the way in which the psalmist, when under great excitement of spirit, passes over into the tone of one who directly hears God's words, and therefore into the tone of an inspired prophet. Just as lyric poetry in general, as being a direct and solemn expression of strong inward feeling, is the earliest form of poetry: so psalm-poetry contains in itself not only the mashal, the epos, and the drama in their pre-formative stages, but prophecy also, as we have it in the prophetic writings of its most flourishing period, has, as it were, sprung from the bosom of psalm-poetry. It is throughout a blending of prophetic epic and subjective lyric elements, and is in many respects the echo of earlier psalms, and even in some instances (as e. g. Isa. xii., Hab. iii.) transforms itself into the strain of a psalm. Hence Asaph is called הַחֲזִינִי in 2 Chron. xxix. 30, not from the special character of his Psalms, but from his being a psalmist in general; for Jeduthun has the same name given to him in 2 Chron. xxxv. 15, and נָבִי in 1 Chron. xxv. 2 sq. (cf. προφητεύειν, Luke i. 67) is used directly as an epithet for psalm-singing with accompaniment — a clear proof that in prophecy the co-operation of a human element is no less to be acknowledged, than the influence of a divine element in psalm-poesy.

The direct words of Jahve, and the psalmist's Amen to them, form the middle portion of this Psalm — a six line strophe, which is surrounded by four line strophes.

Vers. 2—3. The sigh of supplication, הֲאֵשְׁרָה, has its object within itself: work deliverance, give help; and the motive is expressed by the complaint which follows. The verb נָתַתְּ to complete, means here, as in vii. 10, to have an end; and the ἀπ. λεγ. עַד is equivalent to עַד in lxxvii. 9, to come to the extremity, to cease. It is at once clear from the predicate being placed first in the plur., that אֲמוֹתַי in this passage is not an abstractum, as e. g. in Prov. xiii. 17.; moreover the parallelism is against it, just as in xxxi. 24.

יִדְוֶה is the pious man, as one who practises דְּוָה towards God and man. יָמֵן, primary form יָמֵן (plur. יָמֵימֵן; whereas from יָמֵן we should expect יָמֵימֵן), — used as an adjective (cf. on the contrary Deut. xxxii. 20) here just as in xxxi. 24, 2 Sam. xx. 19, — is the reliable, faithful, conscientious man, literally one who is firm, i. e. whose word and meaning is firm, so that one can rely upon it and be certain in relation to it.* We find similar complaints of the universal prevalence of wickedness in Mic. vii. 2, Isa. lvii. 1, Jer. vii. 28, and elsewhere. They contain their own limitation. For although those who complain thus without pharisaic self-righteousness would convict themselves of being affected by the prevailing corruption, they are still, in their penitence, in their sufferings for righteousness' sake, and in their cry for help, a standing proof that humanity has not yet, without exception, become a massa perditā. That which the writer especially laments, is the prevailing untruthfulness. Men speak נֶשֶׁף (= נֶשֶׁף from נֶשֶׁף), desolation and emptiness under a disguise that conceals its true nature, falsehood (xli. 7), and hypocrisy (Job xxxv. 13), ἕκαστος πρὸς τὸν πλησίον αὐτοῦ (LXX., cf. Ephes. iv. 25, where the greatness of the sin finds its confirmation according to the teaching of the New Testament: οὗτι ἐσμὲν ἀλλήλων μέλη). They speak lips of smoothnesses (רִקְרִקְתָּ, plural from רִקְרִקְתָּ, levitates, or from רִקְרִקְתָּ, lævia), i. e. the smoothest, most deceitful language (accusative of the object as in Isa. xix. 18) with a double heart, inasmuch, namely, as the meaning they deceitfully express to others, and even to themselves, differs from the purpose they actually cherish, or even (cf. 1 Chron. xii. 33 לֵב אֶל לֵב, and James i. 8 δίσυχος, wavering) inasmuch as the purpose they now so flatteringly put forth quickly changes to the very opposite.

Vers. 4—5. In this instance the voluntative has its own proper signification: may He root out (cf. cix. 15, and the oppositive xi. 6). Flattering lips and a vaunting tongue are one, insofar as the braggart becomes a flatterer when it serves his own selfish interest.  $\text{שָׁפָּר}$  refers to lips and tongue, which are put for their possessors. The Hiph.  $\text{הִנְבִּיר}$  may mean either to impart strength, or to give proof of strength. The combination with  $\text{ל}$ , not  $\text{ב}$ , favours the former: we will give emphasis to our tongue (this is their self-confident declaration). Hupfeld renders it, contrary to the meaning of the Hiph.: over our tongue we have power, and Ewald and Olshausen, on the ground of an erroneous interpretation of Dan. ix. 27, render: we make or have a firm covenant with our tongue. They describe their lips as being their confederates ( $\text{רָאָה}$  as in 2 Kings ix. 32), and by the expression "who is lord over us" they declare themselves to be absolutely free, and exalted above all authority. If any authority were to assert itself over them, their mouth would put it down and their tongue would thrash it into submission. But Jahve, whom this making of themselves into gods challenges, will not always suffer His own people to be thus enslaved.

*The Aryan root man to remain, abide (Neo-Persic mānden), also takes a similar course, signifying usually "to continue in any course, wait, hope." So the old Persic man, Zend upaman, cf. μένειν with its derivatives which are applied in several ways in the New Testament to characterise πῆστις.

Vers. 6—7. In ver. 6 the psalmist hears Jahve Himself speak; and in ver. 7 he adds his Amen. The two  $\text{מָן}$  in ver. 6 denote the motive,  $\text{עָתָה}$  the decisive turning-point from forbearance to the execution of judgment, and  $\text{יֵאמֶר}$  the divine determination, which has just now made itself audible; cf. Isaiah's echo of it, Isa. xxxiii. 10. Jahve has hitherto looked on with seeming inactivity and indifference, now He will arise and place in  $\text{לְשָׁעָה}$ , i. e. a condition of safety (cf.  $\text{שִׁים בְּרָיִים}$ , lxi. 9), him who languishes for deliverance. It is not to be explained: him whom he, i. e. the boaster, blows upon, which would be expressed by  $\text{בִּזְיָתָהּ בּוֹ}$ , cf. x. 5; but, with Ewald, Hengstenberg, Olshausen, and Böttcher, according to Hab. ii. 3, where  $\text{לְיָפִיתָ לֵּךְ}$  occurs in the sense of panting after an object: him who longs for it.  $\text{יָפִיתָ}$  is, however, not a participial adjective =  $\text{יָפָח}$ , but the fut., and  $\text{לְיָפִיתָ לֵּךְ}$  is therefore a relative clause occupying the place of the object, just as we find the same thing occurring in Job xxiv. 19, Isa. xli. 2, 25, and frequently. Hupfeld's rendering: "in order that he may gain breath (respiret)" leaves  $\text{אֲשִׁיתָ}$  without an object, and accords more with Aramaic and Arabic than with Hebrew usage, which would express this idea by לֹא יִתְּנוּ לוֹ קִירוֹה לֹא.

In ver. 7 the announcement of Jahve is followed by its echo in the heart of the seer: the words אִמְרוֹת instead of אִמְרוֹת by changing the Shedd which closes the syllable into an audible one, as e.g. in אִשְׁרֵי of Jahve are pure words, i. e. intended, and to be fulfilled, absolutely as they run without any admixture whatever of untruthfulness. The poetical אִמְרָה (after the form אִמְרָה) serves pre-eminently as the designation of the divine power-words of promise. The figure, which is indicated in other instances, when God's word is said to be צְרִיפָה (xviii. 31, cxix. 140, Prov. xxx. 5), is here worked out: silver melted and thus purified בְּעֵלִיל עַל, עֵלִיל signifies either a smelting-pot from עַל, עֵלִיל, immittere, whence also עַל (Hitz.); or, what is more probable since the language has the epithets כּוּר and מַצְרֶף for this: a workshop, from עַל, עֵלִיל, operari (prop. to set about a thing), first that which is wrought at (after the form מַעֲשֵׂי, מַעֲשֵׂי, מַעֲשֵׂי), then the place where the work is carried on. From this also comes the Talm. בְּעֵלִיל = בְּגֹלִי manifeste, occurring in the Mishna Rosh ha-Shana i. 5 and elsewhere, and which in its first meaning corresponds to the French en effet.* According to this, the ל in לְאָרֶץ is not the ל of property: in a fining-pot built into the earth, for which לְאָרֶץ without anything further would be an inadequate and colourless expression. But in accordance with the usual meaning of לְאָרֶץ as a collateral definition it is: smelted (purified) down to the earth. As Olshausen observes on this subject, "Silver that is purified in the furnace and flows down to the ground can be seen in every smelting hut; the pure liquid silver flows down out of the smelting furnace, in which the ore is piled up." For it cannot be ל of reference: "purified with respect to the earth", since אָרֶץ does not denote the earth as a material and cannot therefore mean an earthy element. We ought then to read לְאִבְרָץ, which would not mean "to a white brilliancy", i. e. to a pure bright mass (Böttch.), but "with respect to the stannum, lead* (vid. on Isa. i. 25). The verb פָּרַף to strain, filter, cause to ooze through, corresponds to the German seihen, seigen, old High German sihan, Greek σακκῆν (σακκίζειν), to clean by passing through a cloth as a strainer, πῦ. God's word is solid silver smelted and leaving all impurity behind, and, as it were, having passed seven times through the smelting furnace, i. e. the purest silver, entirely purged from dross. Silver is the emblem of everything precious and pure (vid. Bähr, Symbol. i, 284); and seven is the number indicating the completion of any process (Bibl. Psychol. S. 57., transl. p. 71).

Vers. 8—9. The supplicatory complaint contained in the first strophe has passed into an ardent wish in the second; and now in the fourth there arises a consolatory hope based upon the divine utterance which was heard in the third strophe. The suffix ēm in ver. 8*a* refers to the miserable and poor; the suffix ennu in ver. 8*b* (him, not: us, which would be pointed הַצַּרְנִי, and more especially since it is not preceded by הַשְּׂמֵרָנִי) refers back to the man who yearns for deliverance mentioned in the divine utterance, ver. 6. The "preserving for ever" is so constant, that neither now nor at any future time will they succumb to this generation. The oppression shall not become a thorough depression, the trial shall not exceed their power of endurance. What follows in ver. 9 is a more minute description of this depraved generation. דֹּרֵךְ is the generation whole and entire bearing one general character and doing homage to the one spirit of the age (cf. e. g. Prov. xxx. 11—14, where the characteristics of a corrupt age are portrayed). וְיָ (always without the article, Ew. § 293, a) points to the present and the character it has assumed, which is again described here finally in a few outlines of a more general kind than in vers. 3—5. The wicked march about on every side (הִתְהַלְּקוּ) used of going about unopposed with an arrogant and vaunting mien), when (while) vileness among (ל) the children of men rises to eminence (רום) as in Prov. xi. 11, cf. מִשַּׁל Prov. xxix. 2), so that they come to be under its dominion. Vileness is called לֵוָה from לָל (cogn. דָּלַל) to be supple and lax, narrow, low, weak and worthless. The form is passive just as is the Talm. וְלֵוָה (from לָל = דָּלַל), and it is the epithet applied to that which is depreciated, despised, and to be despised; here it is the opposite of the disposition and conduct of the noble man, נָרִיב, Isa. xxxii. 8, — a baseness which is utterly devoid not only of all nobler principles and motives, but also of all nobler feelings and impulses. The קָ of כָּרַם is not the expression of simultaneousness (as e. g. in Prov. x. 25): immediately it is exalted — for then ver. 9 would give expression to a general observation, instead of being descriptive — but כָּרַם is equivalent to בָּרַם, only it is intentionally used instead of the latter, to express a coincidence that is based upon an intimate relation of cause and effect, and is not merely accidental. The wicked are puffed up on all sides, and encompass the better disposed on every side as their enemies. Such is the state of things, and it cannot be otherwise at a time when men allow meanness to gain the ascendancy among and over them, as is the case at the present moment. Thus even at last the depressing view of the present prevails in the amidst of the confession of a more consolatory hope. The present is gloomy. But in the central hexastich the future is lighted up as a consolation against this gloominess. The Psalm is a ring and this central oracle is its jewel.

P S A L M XIII.

SUPLIANT CRY OF ONE WHO IS UTTERLY UNDONE.

- 2 HOW long, Jahve, wilt Thou forget me,
How long wilt Thou veil Thy face from me?!
- 3 How long shall I cherish cares in my soul,
Sorrow in my heart by day?!
- How long shall mine enemy be exalted over me?!
- 4 Look, answer me, Jahve, my God,
Lighten mine eyes, that I fall not asleep in death,
- 5 That mine enemy may not say: "I have prevailed against him",
That mine oppressors may not rejoice, when I stumble.

6 And as for me, in Thy mercy do I trust,
 My heart shall rejoice at Thy salvation;
 I will sing of Jahve, because He hath dealt bountifully with me.

The יָרִים of the personal cry with which David opens Ps. xiii. harmonizes with קָרַם of the general lament which he introduces into Ps. xii.; and for this reason the collector has coupled these two Psalms together. Hitzig assigns Ps. xiii. to the time when Saul posted watchers to hunt David from place to place, and when, having been long and unceasingly persecuted, David dared to cherish a hope of escaping death only by indefatigable vigilance and endurance. Perhaps this view is correct. The Psalm consists of three strophes, or if it be preferred, three groups of decreasing magnitude. A long deep sigh is followed, as from a relieved breast, by an already much more gentle and half calm prayer; and this again by the believing joy which anticipates the certainty of being answered. This song as it were casts up constantly lessening waves, until it becomes still as the sea when smooth as a mirror, and the only motion discernible at last is that of the joyous ripple of calm repose.

Vers. 2—3. The complicated question: till when, how long . . . for ever (as in lxxiv. 10, lxxix. 5, lxxxix. 47), is the expression of a complicated condition of soul, in which, as Luther briefly and forcibly describes it, amidst the feeling of anguish under divine wrath "hope itself despairs and despair nevertheless begins to hope". The self-contradiction of the question is to be explained by the conflict which is going on within between the flesh and the spirit. The dejected heart thinks: God has forgotten me for ever. But the spirit, which thrusts away this thought, changes it into a question which sets upon it the mark of a mere appearance not a reality: how long shall it seem as though Thou forgettest me for ever? It is in the nature of the divine wrath, that the feeling of it is always accompanied by an impression that it will last for ever; and consequently it becomes a foretaste of hell itself. But faith holds fast the love that is behind the wrath; it sees in the display of anger only a self-masking of the loving countenance of the God of love, and longs for the time when this loving countenance shall be again unveiled to it. Thrice does David send forth this cry of faith out of the inmost depths of his spirit. To place or set up contrivances, plans, or proposals in his soul, viz. as to the means by which he may be able to escape from this painful condition, is equivalent to, to make the soul the place of such thoughts, or the place where such thoughts are fabricated (cf. Prov. xxvi. 24). One such עצה chases the other in his soul, because he recognises the vanity of one after another as soon as they spring up. With respect to the יָמָם which follows, we must think of these cares as taking possession of his soul in the night time; for the night leaves a man alone with his affliction and makes it doubly felt by him. It cannot be proved from Ezek. xxx. 16 (cf. Zeph. ii. 4 בַּצְרָהִים), that יָמָם like יוֹם (Jer. vii. 25, short for יוֹם יוֹם) may mean "daily" (Ew. § 313, a). יוֹמָם does not mean this here, but is the antithesis to לַיְלָה which is to be supplied in thought in ver. 3a. By night he proposes plan after plan, each one as worthless as the other; and by day, or all the day through, when he sees his distress with open eyes, sorrow (יָגוֹן) is in his heart, as it were, as the feeling the night leaves behind it and as the direct reflex of his helpless and hopeless condition. He is persecuted, and his foe is in the ascendant. רוּם is both to be exalted and to rise, raise one's self, i. e. to rise to position and arrogantly to assume dignity to one's self (sich brüsten). The strophe closes with 'ad-āns which is used for the fourth time.

Vers. 4—5. In contrast to God's seeming to have forgotten him and to wish neither to see nor know anything of his need, he prays: רַב־מַחְסָה (cf. Isa. lxiii. 15). In contrast to his being in perplexity what course to take and unable to help himself, he prays: עֲנֵנִי, answer me, who cry for help, viz. by the fulfilment of my prayer as a real, actual answer. In contrast to the triumphing of his foe: רַחֲמֵי עֵינַי, in order that the triumph of his enemy may not be made complete by his dying. To lighten the eyes that are dimmed with sorrow and ready to break, is equivalent to, to impart new life (Ezra ix. 8), which is reflected in the fresh clear brightness of the eye (1 Sam. xiv. 27, 29). The lightening light, to which הַאֵר points, is the light of love beaming from the divine countenance, xxxi. 17. Light, love, and life are closely allied notions in the Scriptures. He, upon whom God looks down in love, continues in life, new powers of life are imparted to him, it is not his lot to sleep the death, i. e. the sleep of death, Jer. li. 39, 57, cf. Ps. lxxvi. 6. רָמַח is the accusative of effect or sequence: to sleep so that the sleep becomes death (LXX. εἰς θάνατον), Ew. § 281, e. Such is the light of life for which he prays, in order that his foe may not be able at last to say יִלְחָח (with accusative object, as in Jer. xxxviii. 5) — יִלְחָחֵי לִי, cxxix. 2, Gen. xxxii. 26, I am able for him, a match for him, I am superior to him, have gained the mastery over him. בִּי, on account of the future which follows, had better be taken as temporal (quum) than as expressing the reason (quod), cf. בְּמַטְ רַגְלֵי, xxxviii. 17.

Ver. 6. Three lines of joyous anticipation now follow the five of lament and four of prayer. By אֶנְכִּי he sets himself in opposition to his foes. The latter desire his death, but he trusts in the mercy of God, who will turn and terminate his affliction. בְּצִמְחָה denotes faith as clinging fast to God, just as בְּחֶסֶד denotes it as confidence which hides itself in Him. The voluntative יִגַּל pre-supposes the sure realisation of the hope. The perfect in ver. 6c is to be properly understood thus: the celebration follows the fact that inspires him to song. עַל לַעֲשׂוֹת טוֹב to do good to any one, as in cxvi. 7, cxix. 17, cf. the radically cognate (עַל) לַעֲשׂוֹת lvii. 3. With the two iambs gamal'aldj the song sinks to rest. In the storm-tossed soul of the suppliant all has now become calm. Though it rage without as much now as ever — peace reigns in the depth of his heart.

PSALM XIV.

THE PREVAILING CORRUPTION AND THE REDEMPTION DESIRED

- 1 THE fool hath said in his heart: "There is no God";
 Corrupt, abominable are their doings,
 There is none that doeth good.

- 2 Jahve looketh down from heaven upon the children of men
To see if there be any that have understanding,
If any that seek after God.
- 3 They are all fallen away, altogether they are corrupt,
There is none that doeth good,
Not even one.
- 4 "Are they so utterly devoid of understanding, all the workers of iniquity,
Who eating up my people, eat up bread,
They call not on Jahve?"
- 5 Then were they in great fear,
For God is in the righteous generation.
- 6 Would ye bring to shame the counsel of the afflicted,
For Jahve is indeed his refuge!
- 7 Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion!
When Jahve turneth the captivity of His people,
Jacob shall rejoice, Israel shall be glad.

Just as the general lamentation of Ps. xii. assumes a personal character in Ps. xiii., so in Ps. xiv. it becomes again general; and the personal desire  $\text{יְהוָה לִי}$ , xiii. 6, so full of hope, corresponds to  $\text{יְהוָה עִמָּךְ}$ , which is extended to the whole people of God in xiv. 7. Moreover, Ps. xiv., as being a gloomy picture of the times in which the dawn of the divine day is discernible in the background, is more closely allied to Ps. xii. than to Ps. xiii., although this latter is not inserted between them without some recognised reason. In the reprobation of the moral and religious character of the men of the age, which Ps. xiv. has in common with Ps. xii., we at once have a confirmation of the  $\text{לְרוּךְ}$ . But xiv. 7 does not necessitate our coming down to the time of the Exile.

In Ps. liii. we find this Psalm which is Jehovic, occurring again as Elohimic. The position of Ps. xiv. in the primary collection favours the presumption, that it is the earlier and more original composition. And since this presumption will bear the test of a critical comparison of the two Psalms, we may leave the treatment of Ps. liii. to its proper place, without bringing it forward here. It is not as though Ps. xiv. were intact. It is marked out as seven three-line verses, but vers. 5 and 6, which ought to be the fifth and sixth three lines, are only two; and the original form appears to be destroyed by some deficiency. The difficulty is got over in Ps. liii., by making the two two-line verses into one three-line verse, so that it consists only of six three-line verses. And in that Psalm the announcement of judgment is applied to foreign enemies, a circumstance which has influenced some critics and led them astray in the interpretation of Ps. xiv.

Ver. 1. The perfect אָמַר, as in i. 1, x. 3, is the so-called abstract present (Ges. § 126, 3), expressing a fact of universal experience, inferred from a number of single instances. The Old Testament language is unusually rich in epithets for the unwise. The simple, פְּתוּי, and the silly, בְּבִסִּיל, for the lowest branches of this scale; the fool, אָוִיל, and the madman, הוֹלֵל, the uppermost. In the middle comes the notion of the simpleton or maniac, נָבֵל, — a word from the verbal stem נָבַל which, according as that which forms the centre of the group of consonants lies either in נב (Genesis S. 636), or in בל (comp. אַבַּל, אֵוִל, אַמַּל, אַמַּל), signifies either to be extended, to relax, to become frail, to wither, or to be prominent, eminere, Arab. nabula; so that consequently נָבַל means the relaxed, powerless, expressed in New Testament language: ἀσθενῶν αὐτὸ ἔχοντα. Thus Isaiah (ch. xxxii. 6) describes the נָבֵל: "a simpleton speaks simpleness and his heart does godless things, to practice tricks and to say foolish things against Jahve, to leave the soul of the hungry empty, and to refuse drink to the thirsty." Accordingly נָבַל is the synonym of לָצֵץ the scoffer (vid. the definition in Prov. xxi. 24). A free spirit of this class is reckoned according to the Scriptures among the empty, hollow, and devoid of mind. The thought, אֵין אֱלֹהִים, which is the root of the thought and action of such a man, is the climax of imbecility. It is not merely practical atheism, that is intended by this maxim of the נָבֵל. The heart according to Scripture language is not only the seat of volition, but also of thought. The נָבַל is not content with acting as though there were no God, but directly denies that there is a God, i. e. a personal God. The psalmist makes this prominent as the very extreme and depth of human depravity, that there can be among men those who deny the existence of a God. The subject of what follows are, then, not these atheists but men in general, among whom such characters are to be found: they make the mode of action, (their) doings, corrupt, they make it abominable. עָלִילָהּ, a poetical brevity of expression for עָלִילוּתָהּ, belongs to both verbs, which have Tarcha and Mercha (the two usual conjunctives of Mugrash) in correct texts; and is in fact not used as an adverbial accusative (Hengstenberg and others), but as an object, since הִשְׁחִיתָהּ is just the word that is generally used in this combination with עָלִילָהּ Zeph. iii. 7 or, what is the same thing, דָּרַךְ Gen. vi. 12; and הִתְעַיֵּב (cf. 1 Kings xxi. 26) is only added to give a superlative intensity to the expression. The negative: "there is none that doeth good" is just as unrestricted as in xii. 2. But further on the psalmist distinguishes between a דוֹר צָרִיק, which experiences this corruption in the form of persecution, and the corrupt mass of mankind. He means what he says of mankind as κόσμος, in which, at first the few rescued by grace from the mass of corruption are lost sight of by him, just as in the words of God, Gen. vi. 5, 12. Since it is only grace that frees any from the general corruption, it may also be said, that men are described just as they are by nature; although, be it admitted, it is not hereditary sin but actual sin, which springs up from it, and grows apace if grace do not interpose, that is here spoken of.

Ver. 2. The second tristich appeals to the infallible decision of God Himself. The verb הִשְׁקִיף means to look forth, by bending one's self forward. It is the proper word for looking out of a window, 2 Kings ix. 30 (cf. Niph. Judges v. 28, and frequently), and for God's looking down from heaven upon the earth, cii. 20, and frequently; and it is cognate and synonymous with הִשְׁגִּיחַ xxxiii. 13, 14; cf., moreover, Cant. ii. 9. The perf. is used in the sense of the perfect only insofar as the divine survey is antecedent to its result as given in ver. 3. Just as הִשְׁחִיתוּהוּ reminds one of the history of the Flood, so does לְרִאשֹׁתָהּ of the history of the building of the tower of Babel, Gen. xi. 5, cf. xviii. 21. God's judgment rests upon a knowledge of the matter of fact, which is represented in such passages after the manner of men. God's all-seeing, all-piercing eyes scrutinise the whole human race. Is there one who shews discernment in thought and act, one to whom fellowship with God is the highest good, and consequently that after which he strives? — this is God's question, and He delights in such persons, and certainly none such would escape His longing search. On  $\text{הִיָּלֵךְ-טָא, τὸν θεόν, vid., Ges. § 117. 2.}$

Ver. 3. The third tristich bewails the condition in which He finds humanity. The universality of corruption is expressed in as strong terms as possible.  $\text{לְכֹל} they all (lit. the totality); וְיָחַד with one another (lit. in its or their unions, i. e., universi); וְאֶחָד־מִן אֲנִי not a single one who might form an exception. רָחַץ (probably not 3 præt. but partic., which passes at once into the finite verb) signifies to depart, viz. from the ways of God, therefore to fall away (ἀποστάτης).  $\text{מִן הַלֵּחַ, as in Job xv. 16, denotes the moral corruptness as a becoming sour, putrefaction, and suppuration. Instead of וְאֶחָד־מִן אֲנִי, the LXX. translates οὐκ ἔστιν ἕως ἑνός (as though it were וְאֶחָד־עַד, which is the more familiar form of expression). Paul quotes the first three verses of this Psalm (Rom. iii. 10—12) in order to shew how the assertion, that Jews and heathen all are included under sin, is in accordance with the teaching of Scripture. What the psalmist says, applies primarily to Israel, his immediate neighbours, but at the same time to the heathen, as is self-evident. What is lamented is neither the pseudo-Israelitish corruption in particular, nor that of the heathen, but the universal corruption of man which prevails not less in Israel than in the heathen world. The citations of the apostle which follow his quotation of the Psalm, from τάφος ἀνεφγμένοσ to ἀπέναντι τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν αὐτῶν were early incorporated in the Psalm in the Κοινή of the LXX. They appear as an integral part of it in the Cod. Alex., in the Greco-Latin Psalterium Veronense, and in the Syriac Psalterium Mediolanense. They are also found in Apollinarius' paraphrase of the Psalms as a later interpolation; the Cod. Vat. has them in the margin; and the words σύντριμμα καὶ ταλαιπωρία ἐν ταῖς ὁδοῖς αὐτῶν have found admit-$$ tance in the translation, which is more Rabbinical than Old Hebrew, מִלְּרַע וְיִפְנֹעַ רַע בְּדַרְכֵיהֶם, even in a Hebrew codex (Kennicott 649). Origen rightly excluded this apostolic Mosaic work of Old Testament testimonies from his text of the Psalm; and the true representation of the matter is to be found in Jerome, in the preface to the xvi. book of his commentary on Isaiah.\*

Ver. 4. Thus utterly cheerless is the issue of the divine scrutiny. It ought at least to have been different in Israel, the nation of the positive revelation. But even there wickedness prevails and makes God's purpose of mercy of none effect. The divine outburst of indignation which the psalmist hears here, is applicable to the sinners in Israel. Also in Isa. iii. 13 — 15 the Judge of the world addresses Himself to the heads of Israel in particular. This one feature of the Psalm before us is raised to the consistency of a special prophetic picture in the Psalm of Asaph, lxxii. That which is here clothed in the form of a question, הֲלֹא יִרְעִי, is reversed into an assertion in ver. 5 of that Psalm. It is not to be translated: will they not have to feel (which ought to be יִרְעִי); but also not as Hupfeld renders it: have they not experienced. "Not to know" is intended to be used as absolutely in the signification non sapere, and consequently insipientem esse, as it is in lxxxii. 5, lxxxiii. 22, xcii. 7, Isa. xlv. 18, cf. 9, xlv. 20, and frequently. The perfect is to be judged after the analogy of novisse (Ges. § 126, 3), therefore it is to be rendered: have they attained to no knowledge, are they devoid of all knowledge, and therefore like the brutes, yea, according to Isa. i. 2, 3 even worse than the brutes, all the workers of iniquity? The two clauses which follow are, logically at least, attributive clauses. The subordination of אֲכָלוּ לֶחֶם to the participle as a circumstantial clause in the sense of כֹּאֲכָלוּ לֶחֶם is syntactically inadmissible; neither can אֲכָלוּ לֶחֶם, with Hupfeld, be understood of a brutish and secure passing away of life; for, as Olshausen, rightly observes אֲכָלוּ לֶחֶם does not signify to feast and carouse, but simply to eat, take a meal. Hengstenberg correctly translates it

„who eating my people, eat bread”, i. e. who think that they are not doing anything more sinful, — indeed rather what is justifiable, irreproachable and lawful to them, — than when they are eating bread; cf. the further carrying out of this thought in Mic. iii. 1—3 (especially ver. 3 extr.: “just as in the pot and as flesh within the caldron.”). Instead of וְלֹא יִקְרָא Jeremiah says in ch. x. 21 (cf., however, x. 25): וְלֹא יִדְשָׁו. The meaning is like that in Hos. vii. 7. They do not pray as it becomes man who is endowed with mind, therefore they are like cattle, and act like beasts of prey.

Ver. 5. When Jahve thus bursts forth in scorn His word, which never fails in its working, smites down these brutish men, who are without knowledge and conscience. The local demonstrative שָׁם is used as temporal in this passage just as in lxvi, 6, Hos. ii. 17, Zeph. i. 14, Job xxiii. 7, xxxv. 12, and is joined with the perfect of certainty, as in xxxvi. 13, where it has not so much a temporal as a local sense. It does not mean “there = at a future time”, as pointing into the indefinite future, but “there = then”, when God shall thus speak to them in His anger. Intensity is here given to the verb פָּקַד by the addition of a substantival object of the same root, just as is frequently the case in the more elevated style, e. g. Hab. iii. 9; and as is done in other cases by the addition of the adverbial infinitive. Then, when God’s long-suffering changes into wrath, terror at His judgment seizes them and they tremble through and through. This judgment of wrath, however, is on the other hand a revelation of love. Jahve avenges and thus delivers those whom He calls עַמִּי (My people); and who are here called דֹּר צְדִיקִים, the generation of the righteous, in opposition to the corrupted humanity of the time (xii. 8), as being conformed to the will of God and held together by a superior spirit to the prevailing spirit of the age. They are so called inasmuch as דֹּר passes over from the signification generatio to that of genus hominum here and also elsewhere, when it is not merely a temporal, but a moral notion; cf. xxiv. 6, lxxiii. 15, cxii. 2, where it uniformly denotes the whole of the children of God who are in bondage in the world and longing for deliverance, not Israel collectively in antithesis to the Scythians and the heathen in general (Hitzig).

Ver. 6. The psalmist himself meets the oppressed full of joyous confidence, by reason of the self-manifestation of God in judgment, of which he is now become so confident and which so fills him with comfort. Instead of the sixth tristich, which we expected, we have another distich. The Hiph. הִבִּיֵּשׁ with a personal object signifies: to put any one to shame, i. e. to bring it about that any one must be ashamed, e. g. xlv. 8 (cf. liii. 6, where the accusative of the person has to be supplied), or absolutely: to act shamefully, as in the phrase used in Proverbs, בֶּן מִיָּשׁ (a prodigal son). It appears only here with a neuter accusative of the object, not in the signification to defame (Hitz.), — a meaning it never has (not even in Prov. xiii. 5, where it is blended with הִבְזִיז to make stinking, i. e. a reproach, Gen. xxxiv. 30), — but to confound, put to shame = to frustrate (Hupf.), which is at once the most natural meaning in connection with עָצָה. But it is not to be rendered: ye put to shame, because . . ., for to what purpose is this statement with this inapplicable reason in support of it? The fut. הִבִּיֵּשׁ is used with a like shade of meaning as in Lev. xix. 17, and the imperative elsewhere; and כִּי gives the reason for the tacitly implied clause, or if a line is really lost from the strophe, the lost clause (cf. Isa. viii. 9 sq.): ye will not accomplish it. עָצָה is whatsoever the pious man, who as such suffers reproach, plans to do for the glory of his God, or even in accordance with the will of his God. All this the children of the world, who are in possession of worldly power, seek to frustrate; but viewed in the light of the final decision their attempt is futile: Jahve is his refuge, or, literally the place whither he flees to hide himself and finds a hiding or concealment (צִלָּהּ, סִתְרָהּ, Arabic also ذَرَى). מִצְפֵּיהָ has an orthophonic Dag., which obviates the necessity for the reading מִצְפֵּיהָ (cf. הַעֲלִים x. 1, מִצְפֵּי xxxiv. 1, לְאַחַר cv. 22, and similar instances).

Ver. 7. This tristich sounds like a liturgical addition belonging to the time of the Exile, unless one is disposed to assign the whole Psalm to this period on account of it. For elsewhere in a similar connection, as e. g. in Ps. cxxvi., שָׁבוּת שְׁבוּת means to turn the captivity, or to bring back the captives. שׁוֹב has here, — as in cxxvi. 4, Nah. ii. 3 (followed by אָוֶן), cf. Ezek xlvi. 7, the Kal being preferred to the Hiph. הִשְׁבִּיחַ (Jer. xxxii. 44, xxxiii. 11) in favour of the alliteration with שְׁבוּתָא (from שָׁבַח to make any one a prisoner of war), — a transitive signification, which Hengstenberg (who interprets it: to turn back, to turn to the captivity, of God's merciful visitation), vainly hesitates to admit. But Isa. lxi. 6, for instance, shews that the exiles also never looked for redemption anywhere but from Zion. Not as though they had thought, that Jahve still dwelt among the ruins of His habitation, which indeed on the contrary was become a ruin because He had forsaken it (as we read in Ezekiel); but the moment of His return to His people is also the moment when He entered again upon the occupation of His sanctuary, and His sanctuary, again appropriated by Jahve even before it was actually reared, is the spot whence issues the kindling of the divine judgment on the enemies of Israel, as well as the spot whence issues the brightness of the reverse side of this judgment, viz. the final deliverance, hence even during the Exile, Jerusalem is the point (the kibla) whither the eye of the praying captive was directed, Dan. vi. 11. There would therefore be nothing strange if a psalm-writer belonging to the Exile should express his longing for deliverance in these words: who gives = oh that one would give = oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion! But since שׁוֹב שְׁבוּתָא also signifies metaphorically to turn misfortune, as in Job xlii. 10, Ezek. xvi. 53 (perhaps also in Ps. lxxxv. 2, cf. ver. 5), inasmuch as the idea of שְׁבוּתָא has been generalised exactly like the German "Elend", exile (Old High German elenti = sojourn in another country, banishment, homelessness), therefore the inscribed לָרוּךְ cannot be called in question from this quarter. Even Hitzig renders: "if Jahve would but turn the misfortune of His people", regarding this Psalm as composed by Jeremiah during the time the Scythians were in the land. If this rendering is possible, and that it is is undeniable, then we retain the inscription לָרוּךְ. And we do so the more readily, as Jeremiah's supposed authorship rests upon a non-recognition of his reproductive character, and the history of the prophet's times makes no allusion to any incursion by the Scythians.

The condition of the true people of God in the time of Absalom was really a שְׁבוּיָהוּ in more than a figurative sense. But we require no such comparison with cotemporary history, since in these closing words we have only the gathering up into a brief form of the view which prevails in other parts of the Psalm, viz. that the "righteous generation" in the midst of the world, and even of the so-called Israel, finds itself in a state of oppression, imprisonment, and bondage. If God will turn this condition of His people, who are His people indeed and of a truth, then shall Jacob rejoice and Israel be glad. It is the grateful duty of the redeemed to rejoice. — And how could they do otherwise!

PSALM XV.

THE CONDITIONS OF ACCESS TO GOD.

- 1 JAHVE, who may sojourn in Thy tabernacle,
Who may dwell on Thy holy mountain?
- 2 He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness,
And speaketh truth in his heart.
- 3 That taketh not slander upon his tongue,
Nor doeth evil to his companion,
Nor bringeth a reproach upon his neighbour;
- 4 That is displeasing in his own eyes, to be despised,
But those who fear Jahve he honoureth;
He sweareth to [his own] hurt — he changeth not.
- 5 He putteth not out his money to usury,
And taketh not a bribe against the innocent —
He that doeth these things shall never be moved.

The preceding Psalm distinguished דָּוִד צַדִּיק, a righteous generation, from the mass of the universal corruption, and closed with a longing for the salvation out of Zion. Ps. xv. answers the question: who belongs to this דָּוִד צַדִּיק, and whom shall the future salvation avail? Ps. xxiv., composed in connection with the removal of the Ark to Zion, is very similar. The state of mind expressed in this Psalm exactly corresponds to the unhypocritical piety and genuine lowliness which were manifest in David in their most beautiful light on that occasion; cf. ver. 4*b* with 2 Sam. vi. 19; ver. 4*a* with 2 Sam. vi. 21 sq. The fact, however, that Zion (Moriah) is called simply הַר הַקֹּדֶשׁ in ver. 1, rather favours the time of the Absolomic exile, when David was cut off from the sanctuary of his God, whilst it was in the possession of men the very opposite of those described in this Psalm (vid. iv. 6). Nothing can be maintained with any certainty except that the Psalm assumes the elevation of Zion to the special designation of "the holy mountain" and the removal of the Ark to the אֹהֶל erected there (2 Sam. vi. 17). Isa. xxxiii. 13—16 is a fine variation of this Psalm.

Vers. 1—2. That which is expanded in the tristichic portion of the Psalm, is all contained in this distichic portion in nuce. The address to God is not merely a favourite form (Hupfeld), but the question is really, as its words imply, directed to God. The answer, however, is not therefore to be taken as a direct answer from God, as it might be in a prophetic connection: the psalmist addresses himself to God in prayer, he as it were reads the heart of God, and answers to himself the question just asked, in accordance with the mind of God. נָרַךְ and שָׁכַן which are usually distinguished from each other like κατοικεῖν and κατοικεῖν in Hellenistic Greek, are alike in meaning in this instance. It is not a merely temporary נָרַךְ (lxi. 5), but for ever, that is intended. The only difference between the two interchangeable notions is this, the one denotes the finding of an abiding place of rest starting from the idea of a wandering life, the other the possession of an abiding place of rest starting from the idea of settled family life.* The holy tabernacle and the holy mountain are here thought of in their spiritual character as the places of the divine presence and of the church of God assembled round the symbol of it; and accordingly the sojourning and dwelling there is not to be understood literally, but in a spiritual sense. This spiritual depth of view, first of all with local limitations, is also to be found in xxvii. 4, 5, lxi. 5. This is present even where the idea of earnestness and regularity in attending the sanctuary rises in intensity to that of constantly dwelling therein, lxxv. 5, lxxxiv. 4—5; while elsewhere, as in xxiv. 3, the outward materiality of the Old Testament is not exceeded. Thus we see the idea of the sanctuary at one time contracting itself within the Old Testament limits, and at another expanding more in accordance with the spirit of the New Testament; since in this matter, as in the matter of sacrifice, the spirit of the New Testament already shews signs of life, and works powerfully through its cosmical veil, without that veil being as yet rent. The answer to the question, so like the spirit of the New Testament in its intention, is also itself no less New Testament in its character: Not every one who saith Lord, Lord, but they who do the will of God, shall enjoy the rights of friendship with Him. But His will concerns the very substance of the Law, viz. our duties towards all men, and the inward state of the heart towards God.

In the expression הוֹלֵךְ הַמֵּיִם (here and in Prov. xxviii. 18), הַמֵּיִם is either a closer definition of the subject: one walking as an upright man, like הוֹלֵךְ רַבִּיל one going about as a slanderer, cf. הַיֹּשֵׁר הוֹלֵךְ Mic. ii. 7 "the upright as one walking"; or it is an accusative of the object, as in הוֹלֵךְ צְדָקוֹת Isa. xxxiii. 15: one who walks uprightness, i. e. one who makes uprightness his way, his mode of action; since הַמֵּיִם may mean integrum = integritas, and this is strongly favoured by הוֹלְכִים בְּהַמֵּיִם, which is used interchangeably with it in Ps. lxxxiv. 12 (those who walk in uprightness). Instead of הוֹלֵךְ צְדָקָה we have the poetical form of expression פָּעַל צְדָקָה. The characterising of the outward walk and action is followed in ver. 2b by the characterising of the inward nature: speaking truth in his heart, not: with his heart (not merely with his mouth); for in the phrase אָמַר בְּלִבִּי, אֵין is always the Beth of the place, not of the instrument — the meaning therefore is: it is not falsehood and deceit that he thinks and plans inwardly, but truth (Hitz.). We have three characteristics here: a spotless walk, conduct ordered according to God's will, and a truth-loving mode of thought.

Vers. 3—5. The distich which contains the question and that containing the general answer are now followed by three tristichs, which work the answer out in detail. The description is continued in independent clauses, which, however, have logically the value of relative clauses. The perff. have the signification of abstract presents, for they are the expression of tried qualities, of the habitual mode of action, of that which the man, who is the subject of the question, never did and what consequently it is not his wont to do. רָגַל means to go about, whether in order to spie out (which is its usual meaning), or to gossip and slander (here, and the Piel in 2 Sam. xix. 28; cf. רָכַל, רָכַל). Instead of בְּלִשְׁנוֹ we have עַל־לִשְׁנוֹ (with Dag. in the second ל, in order that it may be read with emphasis and not slurred over*), because a word lies upon the tongue ere it is uttered, the speaker brings it up as it were from within on to his tongue or lips, xvi. 4, 1. 16, Ezek. xxxvi. 3. The assonance of לַרְעוּדֵי רָעָה is well conceived. To do evil to him who is bound to us by the ties of kindred and friendship, is a sin which will bring its own punishment. קָרוֹב is also the parallel word to רָע in Exod. xxxii. 27. Both are here intended to refer not merely to persons of the same nation; for whatever is sinful in itself and under any circumstances whatever, is also sinful in relation to every man according to the morality of the Old Testament. The assertion of Hupfeld and others that נָשָׂא in conjunction with הִרְפָּה means efferre = effari, is opposed by its combination with עַל and its use elsewhere in the phrase נָשָׂא הִרְפָּה "to bear reproach" (lxi. 8). It means (since נָשָׂא is just as much tollere as ferre) to bring reproach on any one, or load any one with reproach. Reproach is a burden which is more easily put on than cast off; audacter calumniare, semper aliquid hæret.

In ver. 4a the interpretation "he is little in his own eyes, despised," of which Hupfeld, rejecting it, says that Hitzig has picked it up out of the dust, is to be retained. Even the Targ., Saad., Aben-Ezra, Kimchi, Urbino (in his Grammar, אהל מועד) take נבזה בעיניו together, even though explaining it differently, and it is accordingly accented by Baer נְבוֹזָה בְּעֵינָיו וְנִמְאָם (Mahpach, Asla Legarme, Rebia magnum).* God exalts him who is קָמָן בְּעֵינָיו, 1 Sam. xv. 17. David, when he brought up the ark of his God, could not sufficiently degrade himself (נָקַל), and appeared אֶפְסַל בְּעֵינָיו, 2 Sam. vi. 22. This lowliness, which David also confesses in Ps. cxxxi., is noted here and throughout the whole of the Old Testament, e. g., Isa. lvii. 15, as a condition of being well-pleasing before God; just as it is in reality the chief of all virtues. On the other hand, it is mostly translated either, according to the usual accentuation, with which the Beth of בעיניו is dageshed: the reprobate is despised in his eyes (Rashi, Hupf.), or in accordance with the above accentuation: despised in his eyes is the reprobate (Maurer, Hengst., Olsh., Luzzatto); but this would say but little, and be badly expressed. For the placing together of two participles without an article, and moreover of similar meaning, with the design of the one being taken as subject and the other as predicate, is to be repudiated simply on the ground of style; and the difference among expositors shews how equivocal the expression is.

On the other hand, when we translate it: "despicable is he in his own eyes, worthy to be despised" (Ges. § 134, 1), we can appeal to xiv. 1, where הַשְׁחִירוֹ is intensified just in the same way by הַתְּעִיבוֹ, as נְבוֹזָה is here by נִמְאָם; cf. also Gen. xxx. 31, Job xxxi. 23, Isa. xliii. 4. The antithesis of ver. 4b to ver. 4a is also thus fully met: he himself seems to himself unworthy of any respect, whereas he constantly shews respect to others; and the standard by which he judges is the fear of God. His own fear of Jahve is manifest from the self-denying strictness with which he performs his vows. This sense of  $\text{לְרַע לְרַע}$  is entirely misapprehended when it is rendered: he swears to his neighbour (רַע = רַע), which ought to be לְרַעֵה, or: he swears to the wicked (and keeps to what he has thus solemnly promised), which ought to be לְרַע; for to what purpose would be the omission of the elision of the article, which is extremely rarely (xxxvi. 6) not attended to in the classic style of the period before the Exile? The words have reference to Lev. v. 4: if any one swear, thoughtlessly pronouncing  $\text{לְרַע אִו לְרַעֵב}$ , to do evil or to do good, etc. The subject spoken of is oaths which are forgotten, and the forgetting of which must be atoned for by an asham, whether the nature of the oath be something unpleasant and injurious, or agreeable and profitable, to the person making the vow. The retrospective reference of  $\text{לְרַע}$  to the subject is self-evident; for to injure another is indeed a sin, the vowing and performance of which, not its omission, would require to be expiated. On  $\text{לְרַע} = \text{לְרַעֵב}$  vid. Ges. § 67, rem. 6. The hypothetical antecedent (cf. e. g., 2 Kings v. 13) is followed by  $\text{לֹא יִמַר}$  as an apodosis. The verb  $\text{יִמַר}$  is native to the law of vows, which, if any one has vowed an animal in sacrifice, forbids both changing it for its money value ( $\text{הַחֲלִיף}$ ) and exchanging it for another, be it  $\text{טֹב בָּרֶע אִו־רַע בְּטֹב}$ , Lev. xxvii. 10, 33. The psalmist of course does not use these words in the technical sense in which they are used in the Law. Swearing includes making a vow, and  $\text{לֹא יִמַר}$  disavows not merely any exchanging of that which was solemnly promised, but also any alteration of that which was sworn: he does not misuse the name of God in anywise,  $\text{לֹא יִשָּׂא}$ .

In ver. 5a the psalmist also has a passage of the Tôrâ before his mind, viz. Lev. xxv. 37, cf. Exod. xxii. 24, Deut. xxiii. 20, Ezek. xviii. 8.  $\text{נָתַן בְּנִשְׁךְ}$  signifies to give a thing away in order to take usury ( $\text{נִשְׁךְ}$  from  $\text{נָשָׂה}$  to bite,  $\delta\acute{\alpha}\chi\upsilon\epsilon\upsilon$ ) for it. The receiver or demander of interest is  $\text{מִנִּשְׁךְ}$ , the one who pays interest נָשַׁךְ, the interest itself לְשֹׁךְ. The trait of character described in ver. 5*b* also recalls the language of the Mosaic law: שָׁרֵךְ לֹא לֵקַח, the prohibition Exod. xxiii. 8, Deut. xvi. 19; and עַל-נַפְקֵי, the curse Deut. xxvii. 25: on account of the innocent, i. e. against him, to condemn him. Whether it be as a loan or as a gift, he gives without conditions, and if he attain the dignity of a judge he is proof against bribery, especially with reference to the destruction of the innocent. And now instead of closing in conformity with the description of character already given: such a man shall dwell, etc., the concluding sentence takes a different form, moulded in accordance with the spiritual meaning of the opening question: he who doeth these things shall never be moved (עָמַד fut. Niph.), he stands fast, being upheld by Jahve, hidden in His fellowship; nothing from without, no misfortune, can cause his overthrow.

PSALM XVI.

REFUGE IN GOD, THE HIGHEST GOOD, IN THE PRESENCE OF DISTRESS AND OF DEATH.

- 1 PRESERVE me, O God, for in Thee do I hide myself
- 2 I say unto Jahve: "Thou art my Lord, Besides Thee I have no good",
- 3 And to the saints who are in the earth:
"These are the excellent, in whom is all my delight".
- 4 Their sorrows shall be multiplied who have bartered for an idol —
I will not pour out their drink-offerings of blood,
Nor take their names upon my lips.
- 5 Jahve is the portion of my land and of my cup,
Thou makest my lot illustrious.
- 6 The lines have fallen unto me in pleasant places,
Yea, the heritage appears fair to me.
- 7 I will bless Jahve, who hath given me counsel;
In the night-seasons also my reins instruct me.

- 8 I have set Jahve always before me,
For He is at my right hand — therefore I shall not be moved.
- 9 Therefore my heart is glad, and my glory exulteth,
My flesh also shall dwell free of care.
- 10 For Thou wilt not abandon my soul to Hades,
Nor give up Thy Holy One to see the pit;
- 11 Thou wilt make me know the path of life —
Fulness of joy is in Thy countenance,
Pleasures are in Thy right hand for evermore.

The preceding Psalm closed with the words לֹא יָנֹחַ; this word of promise is repeated in xvi. 8 as an utterance of faith in the mouth of David. We are here confronted by a pattern of the unchangeable believing confidence of a friend of God; for the writer of Ps. xvi. is in danger of death, as is to be inferred from the prayer expressed in ver. 1 and the expectation in ver. 10. But there is no trace of anything like bitter complaint, gloomy conflict, or hard struggle: the cry for help is immediately swallowed up by an overpowering and blessed consciousness and a bright hope. There reigns in the whole Psalm, a settled calm, an inward joy, and a joyous confidence, which is certain that everything that it can desire for the present and for the future it possesses in its God.

The Psalm is inscribed לְדָוִד; and Hitzig also confesses that "David may be inferred from its language". Whatever can mark a Psalm as Davidic we find combined in this Psalm: thoughts crowding together in compressed language, which becomes in ver. 4 bold even to harshness, but then becomes clear and moves more rapidly; an antiquated, peculiar, and highly poetic impress (יְהוָה אֱלֹהֵי, my Lord, מִנְחָה, נְחֻלָּה, שָׁפָר, וְצִדְקָה); and a well-devised grouping of the strophes. In addition to all these, there are manifold points of contact with indisputably genuine Davidic Psalms (comp. e. g., ver. 5 with xi. 6; ver. 10 with iv. 4; ver. 11 with xvii. 15), and with indisputably ancient portions of the Pentateuch (Exod. xxiii. 13, xix. 6, Gen. xlix. 6). Scarcely any other Psalm shews so clearly as this, what deep roots psalm-poetry has struck into the Tôra, both as it regards the matter and the language. Concerning the circumstances of its composition, vid. on Ps. xxx.

The superscription וְיִלְךְ עַד־מָוֶת, Ps. xvi. has in common with Ps. lvi.—lx. After the analogy of the other superscriptions, it must have a technical meaning. This at once militates against Hitzig's explanation, that it is a poem hitherto unknown, an ἀνέκδοτον, according to the Arabic mâktum, hidden, secret, just as also against the meaning κειμήλιον, which says nothing further to help us. The LXX. translates it στυλογραφία (εἰς στυλογραφίαν), instead of which the Old Latin version has tituli inscriptio (Hesychius τίτλος· πτυχίον ἐπίγραμμα ἔχον). That this translation accords with the tradition is shewn by that of the Targum אֲרִיזָה יְרֵאָה לְיִשְׂרָאֵל sculptura recta (not erecta as Hupfeld renders it). Both versions give the verb the meaning כָּתַב insculpere, which is supported both by a comparison with כָּתַב, cogn. רָצַב, עָצַב, and by חָתַם imprimere (sigillum). Moreover, the sin of Israel is called נִכְחַם in Jer. ii. 22 (cf. xvii. 1) as being a deeply impressed spot, not to be wiped out. If we now look more closely into the Michtam Psalms as a whole, we find they have two prevailing features in common. Sometimes significant and remarkable words are introduced by וְיִלְךְ עַד־מָוֶת, וְיִלְךְ עַד־מָוֶת, xvi. 2, lviii. 12, lx. 8, cf. Isa. xxxviii. 10, 11 (in Hezekiah's psalm, which is inscribed מִכְתָּב — מִכְתָּב as it is perhaps to be read); sometimes words of this character are repeated after the manner of a refrain, as in Ps. lvi.: I will not fear, what can man do to me! in Ps. lvii.: Be Thou exalted, Elohim, above the heavens, Thy glory above all the earth! and in Ps. lix.: For Elohim is my high tower, my merciful God. Hezekiah's psalm unites this characteristic with the other. Accordingly מִכְתָּב, like ἐπίγραμμα,* appears to mean first of all an inscription and then to be equivalent to an inscription-poem or epigram, a poem containing pithy sayings; since in the Psalms of this order some expressive sentence, after the style of an inscription or a motto on a monument, is brought prominently forward, by being either specially introduced or repeated as a refrain.

The strophe-schema is 5. 5. 6. 7. The last strophe, which has grown to seven lines, is an expression of joyous hopes in the face of death, which extend onward even into eternity.

Vers. 1—3. The Psalm begins with a prayer that is based upon faith, the special meaning of which becomes clear from ver. 10: May God preserve him (which He is able to do as being אֱלֹהִים, the Almighty, able to do all things), who has no other refuge in which he has hidden and will hide but Him. This short introit is excepted from the parallelism; so far therefore it is monostichic, — a sigh expressing everything in few words. And the emphatic pronunciation אֲמַרְנִי shām'reni harmonises with it; for it is to be read thus, just as in lxxxvi. 2, cxix. 167 shām'rah (cf. on Isa. xxxviii. 14 עֲשֶׂהָ), according to the express testimony of the Masora.*

The text of the next two verses (so it appears) needs to be improved in two respects. The reading אֲמַרְתָּ as addressed to the soul (Targ.), cf. Lam. iii. 24 sq., is opposed by the absence of any mention of the thing addressed. It rests upon a misconception of the defective form of writing, אֲמַרְתָּ (Ges. § 44, rem. 4). Hitzig and Ewald (§ 190, d) suppose that in such cases a rejection of the final vowel, which really occurs in the language of the people, after the manner of the Aramaic (אֲמַרְתָּ or אֲמַרְתָּ), lies at the bottom of the form. And it does really seem as though the frequent occurrence of this defective form (יִרְעָתִי = יִרְעָתִי cxi. 13, Job xlii. 2, בְּנִיתָ = בְּנִיתִי 1 Kings viii. 48, עֲשִׂיתָ = עֲשִׂיתִי Ezek. xvi. 59, cf. 2 Kings xviii. 20, אֲמַרְתָּ now pointed אֲמַרְתָּ, with Isa. xxxvi. 5) has its occasion at least in some such cutting away of the î, peculiar to the language of the common people; although,

if David wrote it so, אֲמַרְךָ is not intended to be read otherwise than it is in xxxi. 15, cxl. 7.*

First of all David gives expression to his confession of Jahve, to whom he submits himself unconditionally, and whom he sets above everything else without exception. Since the suffix of אֲרֵנִי (properly domini mei = domine mi, Gen. xviii. 3, cf. xix. 2), which has become mostly lost sight of in the usage of the language, now and then retains its original meaning, as it does indisputably in xxxv. 23, it is certainly to be rendered also here: "Thou art my Lord" and not "Thou art the Lord". The emphasis lies expressly on the "my". It is the unreserved and joyous feeling of dependence (more that of the little child, than of the servant), which is expressed in this first confession. For, as the second clause of the confession says: Jahve, who is his Lord, is also his benefactor, yea even his highest good. The preposition לְּ frequently introduces that which extends beyond something else, Gen. xlviii. 22 (cf. lxxxix. 8, xc. 3), and to this passage may be added Gen. xxxi. 50, xxxii. 12, Exod. xxxv. 22, Num. xxxi. 8, Deut. xix. 9, xxii. 6, the one thing being above, or co-ordinate with, the other. So also here: "my good, i. e. whatever makes me truly happy, is not above Thee", i. e. in addition to Thee, beside Thee; according to the sense it is equivalent to out of Thee or without Thee (as the Targ., Symm., and Jerome render it), Thou alone, without exception, art my good. In connection with this rendering of the לְּ, the בָּל (poetic, and contracted from בְּלֵי), which is unknown to the literature before David's time, presents no difficulty. As in Prov. xxiii. 7 it is short for בְּלֵי-תְהִיָּה. Hengstenberg remarks, "Just as Thou art the Lord! is the response of the soul to the words I am the Lord thy God (Exod. xx. 2), so Thou only art my salvation! is the response to Thou shalt have no other gods beside Me (עַל-פְּנֵי)". The psalmist knows no fountain of true happiness but Jahve, in Him he possesses all, his treasure is in Heaven.

* Pinsker's view (Einleit. S. 100—102), who considers אֲרֵנִי to have sprung from אֲרֵנִי as the primary form of the 1. pers. sing., from which then came אֲרֵנִי and later still אֲרֵנִי, is untenable according to the history of the language.

Such is his confession to Jahve. But he also has those on earth to whom he makes confession. Transposing the  $\nu$  we read:

לְקַדְּשִׁים אֲשֶׁר בְּאֶרֶץ
הַמָּה אֲדִירֵי כָּל־הַפְּצִיבִים :

While Diestel's alteration: "to the saints, who are in his land, he makes himself glorious, and all his delight is in them,"* is altogether strange to this verse: the above transfer of the Waw* suffices to remove its difficulties, and that in a way quite in accordance with the connection. Now it is clear, that לְקַדְּשִׁים, as has been supposed by some, is the dative governed by אֲמַרְתִּי, the influence of which is thus carried forward; it is clear what is meant by the addition אֲשֶׁר בְּאֶרֶץ, which distinguishes the object of his affection here below from the One above, who is incomparably the highest; it is clear, as to what הַמָּה defines, whereas otherwise this purely descriptive relative clause אֲשֶׁר בְּאֶרֶץ הַמָּה (which von Ortenberg transposes into הַמָּה אֲשֶׁר אֲרִצָּה בְּהַמָּה) appears to be useless and surprises one both on account of its redundancy (since הַמָּה is superfluous, cf. e. g. 2 Sam. vii. 9, ii. 18) and on account of its arrangement of the words (an arrangement, which is usual in connection with a negative construction, Deut. xx. 15, 2 Chron. viii. 7, cf. Gen. ix. 3, Ezek. xii. 10); it is clear, in what sense אֲדִירֵי alternates with קַדְּשִׁים, since it is not those who are accounted by the world as אֲדִירִים on account of their worldly power and possessions (cxxxvi. 18, 2 Chron. xxiii. 20), but the holy, prized by him as being also glorious, partakers of higher glory and worthy of higher honour; and moreover, this corrected arrangement of the verse harmonises with the Michtam character of the Psalm. The thought thus obtained, is the thought one expected (love to God and love to His saints), and the one which one is also obliged to wring from the text as we have it, either by translating with De Welte, Maurer, Dietrich and others:

“the saints who are in the land, they are the excellent in whom I have all my delight”, — a Waw apodoseos, with which one could only be satisfied if it were וְיִהְיֶה (cf. 2 Sam. xv. 34) — or: “the saints who are in the land and the glorious — all my delight is in them”. By both these interpretations, לְ would be the exponent of the nom. absol. which is elsewhere detached and placed at the beginning of a sentence, and this לְ of reference (Ew. § 310, a) is really common to every style (Num. xviii. 8, Isa. xxxii. 1, Eccl. ix. 4); whereas the לְ understood of the fellowship in which he stands when thus making confession to Jahve: associating myself with the saints (Hengst.), with (von Lengerke), among the saints (Hupf., Thenius), would be a preposition most liable to be misapprehended, and makes ver. 3 a cumbersome appendage of ver. 2. But if לְ be taken as the Lamed of reference then the elliptical construct וְאֲדִירֵי, to which הָאָרֶץ ought to be supplied, remains a stumbling-block not to be easily set aside. For such an isolation of the connecting form from its genitive cannot be shown to be syntactically possible in Hebrew (vid. on 2 Kings ix. 17, Thenius, and Keil); nor are we compelled to suppose in this instance what cannot be proved elsewhere, since כֹּל-הַפְּצִירְכֶם is, without any harshness, subordinate to וְאֲדִירֵי as a genitival notion (Ges. § 116, 3). And still in connection with the reading וְאֲדִירֵי, both the formation of the sentence which, beginning with לְ, leads one to expect an apodosis, and the relation of ver. 3 to ver. 2, according to which the central point of the declaration must lie just within כֹּל-הַפְּצִירְכֶם, are opposed to this rendering of the words וְאֲדִירֵי כֹל-הַפְּצִירְכֶם.

Thus, therefore, we come back to the above easy improvement of the text. קְרוֹיִשִׁים are those in whom the will of Jahve concerning Israel, that it should be a holy nation (Exod. xix. 6, Deut. vii. 6), has been fulfilled, viz. the living members of the ecclesia sanctorum in this world (for there is also one in the other world, lxxxix. 6). Glory, δόξα, is the outward manifestation of holiness. It is ordained of God for the sanctified (cf. Rom. viii. 30), whose moral nobility is now for the present veiled under the menial form of the עַי; and in the eyes of David they already possess it. His spiritual vision pierces through the outward form of the servant. His verdict is like the verdict of God, who is his all in all. The saints, and they only, are the excellent to him. His whole delight is centred in them, all his respect and affection is given to them. The congregation of the saints is his Chephzibah, Isa. lxii. 4 (cf. 2 Kings xxi. 1).

Vers. 4—5. As he loves the saints so, on the other hand, he abhors the apostates and their idols. אָחַר מְהָרָו is to be construed as an appositional relative clause to the preceding: multi sunt cruciatus (cf. xxxii. 10) eorum, eorum scil. qui alium permutant. The expression would flow on more smoothly if it were יִרְבוּ: they multiply, or increase their pains, who . . ., so that אָחַר מְהָרָו would be the subject, for instance like ה' אֲהַבֵּנוּ (he whom Jahve loves), Isa. xlvi. 14. This ver. 4 forms a perfect antithesis to ver. 3. In David's eyes the saints are already the glorified, in whom his delight centres; while, as he knows, a future full of anguish is in store for the idolatrous, and their worship, yea, their very names are an abomination to him. The suffixes of נִהְבִּיחָם and שְׁמוֹתָם might be referred to the idols according to Exod. xxiii. 13, Hos. ii. 19, if אָחַר be taken collectively as equivalent to אֲחֵרִים, as in Job viii. 19. But it is more natural to assign the same reference to them as to the suffix of עֲצֻבוֹתָם, which does not signify "their idols" (for idols are עֲצָבִים), but their torments, pains (from עֲצָבָה derived from עָצַב), cxlvii. 3, Job ix. 28. The thought is similar to 1 Tim. vi. 10, ἐαυτοὺς περιέπειραν δδύνας ποικίλαις. אָחַר is a general designation of the broadest kind for everything that is not God, but which man makes his idol beside God and in opposition to God (cf. Isa. xlii. 8, xlvi. 11). אָחַרִי cannot mean festinant, for in this signification it is only found in Piel מְהָרָו, and that once with a local, but not a personal, accusative of the direction, Nah. ii. 6. It is therefore to be rendered (and the perf. is also better adapted to this meaning): they have taken in exchange that which is not God (like מְהָרָו, הִמְיָר, cvi. 20, Jer. ii. 11). Perhaps (cf. the phrase וְנָה אֲחֵרִי) the secondary meaning of wooing and fondling is connected with it; for מְהָרָו is the proper word for acquiring a wife by paying down the price asked by her father, Exod. xxii. 15. With such persons, who may seem to be אֲדִירִים in the eyes of the world, but for whom a future full of anguish is in store, David has nothing whatever to do: he will not pour out drink-offerings as they pour them out. גַּם־זֵיֶהֱם has the Dag. lene, as it always has. They are not called קָדִים as actually consisting of blood, or of wine actually mingled with blood; but consisting as it were of blood, because they are offered with blood-stained hands and blood-guilty consciences. מִן is the min of derivation; in this instance (as in Amos iv. 5, cf. Hos. vi. 8) of the material, and is used in other instances also for similar virtually adjectival expressions, x. 18, xvii. 14, lxxx. 14.

In ver. 4c the expression of his abhorrence attains its climax: even their names, i. e. the names of their false gods, which they call out, he shuns taking upon his lips, just as is actually forbidden in the Tóra, Exod. xxiii. 13 (cf. Const. Apost. V. 10 εἰδωλον μυημονεῦειν ὀνόματα δαιμονικά). He takes the side of Jahve. Whatever he may wish for, he possesses in Him; and whatever he has in Him, is always secured to him by Him. חֶלֶק does not here mean food (Böttch.), for in this sense חֶלֶק (Lev. vi. 10) and מְנָה (1 Sam. i. 4) are identical; and parallel passages like cxlii. 6 shew what חֶלֶק means when applied to Jahve. According to xi. 6, כּוֹסֵי is also a genitive just like חֶלֶק; מְנַח חֶלֶק is the share of landed property assigned to any one; מְנַח כּוֹס the share of the cup according to paternal apportionment. The tribe of Levi received no territory in the distribution of the country, from which they might have maintained themselves; Jahve was to be their חֶלֶק, Num. xviii. 20, and the gifts consecrated to Jahve were to be their food, Deut. x. 9, xviii. 1 sq. But nevertheless all Israel is βασιλειον ἱεράτευμα, Exod. xix. 6, towards which even קְדוּשִׁים and אֲדָרִים in ver. 3 pointed; so that, therefore, the very thing represented by the tribe of Levi in outward relation to the nation, holds good, in all its deep spiritual significance, of every believer. It is not anything earthly, visible, created, and material, that is allotted to him as his possession and his sustenance, but Jahve and Him only; but in Him is perfect contentment.

In ver. 5b, רֹמֵךְ, as it stands, looks at first sight as though it were the Hiph. of a verb יָמַךְ (יָמַךְ). But such a verb is not to be found anywhere else, we must therefore seek some other explanation of the word. It cannot be a substantive in the signification of possession (Maurer, Ewald), for such a substantival form does not exist. It might more readily be explained as a participle — רֹמֵךְ, somewhat like יֹסִיף, Isa. xxix. 4, xxxviii. 5, Eccl. i. 18, — יֹסֵף, — a comparison which has been made by Aben-Ezra (Sefath Jether No. 421) and Kimchi (Michlol 11a), — a form of the participle to which, in writing at least, סֹמֵךְ, 2 Kings viii. 21, forms a transition; but there is good reason to doubt the existence of such a form. Had the poet intended to use the part. of חָמַךְ, it is more probable he would have written אֶתְּהָ רֹמֵךְ גִּרְלִי, just as the LXX. translators might have had it before them, taking the Chirek compaginis as a suffix: σὺ εἶ ὁ ἀποκαθιστῶν τὴν κληρονομίαν μου ἐμοί (Böttcher). For the conjecture of Olshausen and Thenius, רֹמֵךְ in the sense: "thou art continually my portion" halts both in thought and expression. Hitzig's conjecture רֹמֵךְ "thou, thy Tummim are my lot", is more successful and tempting. But the fact that the רֹמֵךְ are never found (not even in Deut. xxxiii. 8) without the אֵימֵךְ, is against it. Nevertheless, we should prefer this conjecture to the other explanations, if the word would not admit of being explained as Hiph. from יָמַךְ (יָמַךְ), which is the most natural explanation. Schultens has compared the Arabic wamika, to be broad, from which there is a Hiphil form أَوْمَكَ, to make broad, in Syro-Arabic, that is in use even in the present day among the common people.* And since we must at any rate come down to the supposition of something unusual about this רֹמֵךְ, it is surely not too bold to regard it as a ἀπαξ γεγραμμ.: Thou makest broad my lot, i. e. ensurest for me a spacious habitation, a broad place, as the possession that falleth to me,* — a thought, that is expanded in ver. 6.

* The Arabic Lexicographers are only acquainted with a noun wamka, breadth (amplitudo), but not with the verb. And even the noun does not belong to the universal and classical language. But at the present day الرِّمَك (pronounced wumk), breadth, and wamik are in common use in Damascus; and it is only the verb that is shunned in the better conversational style. — Wetzstein.

Vers. 6—8. The measuring lines (חֲבָלִים) are cast (Mic. ii. 5) and fall to any one just where and as far as his property is assigned to him; so that נָפַל חֲבָל (Josh. xvii. 5) is also said of the falling to any one of his allotted portion of land. נְעֻמִים (according to the Masora defective as also in ver. 11 נְעֻמָּה) is a pluralet., the plural that is used to denote a unity in the circumstances, and a similarity in the relations of time and space, Ges. § 108, 2, a; and it signifies both pleasant circumstances, Job xxxvi. 11, and, as here, a pleasant locality, Lat. amœna (to which נְעֻמָּה in ver. 11, more strictly corresponds). The lines have fallen to him in a charming district, viz. in the pleasurable fellowship of God, this most blessed domain of love has become his paradisaic possession. With הָאֵל he rises from the fact to the perfect contentment which it secures to him: such a heritage seems to him to be fair, he finds a source of inward pleasure and satisfaction in it. נְחֻלָּה — according to Ew. § 173, d, lengthened from the construct form נְחֻלָּה (like נִינְיָה lxi. 1); according to Hupfeld, springing from נְחֻלָּהִי (by the same apocope that is so common in Syriac, perhaps like אֲמָרָה ver. 1 from אֲמָרָהִי) just like וְמָרָה Exod. xv. 2 — is rather, since in the former view there is no law for the change of vowel and such an application of the form as we find in lx. 13 (cviii. 13) is opposed to the latter, a stunted form of נְחִלָּה: the heritage — such a heritage pleases me, lit. seems fair to me (שָׁפַר, cognate root שָׁפַר, צָפַר, cognate in meaning בָּשַׁר, بَشَر, to rub, polish, make shining, intr. שָׁפַר to be shining, beautiful). עֲלֵי of beauty known and felt by him (cf. Esth. iii. 9 with 1 Sam. xxv. 36 טוב עליו, and the later way of expressing it Dan. iii. 32). But since the giver and the gift are one and the same, the joy he has in the inheritance becomes of itself a constant thanksgiving to and blessing of the Giver, that He (אֲשֶׁר quippe qui) has counselled him (lxxiii. 24) to chose the one thing needful, the good part. Even in the night-seasons his heart keeps watch, even then his reins admonish him (יָסַר, here of moral incitement, as in Isa. viii. 11, to warn). The reins are conceived of as the seat of the blessed feeling that Jahve is his possession (vid. Psychol. S. 268; tr. p. 316). He is impelled from within to offer heart-felt thanks to his merciful and faithful God. He has Jahve always before him, Jahve is the point towards which he constantly directs his undiverted gaze; and it is easy for him to have Him thus ever present, for He is מִיְמֵינִי (supply הוּא, as in xxii. 29, lv. 20, cxii. 4), at my right hand (i. e. where my right hand begins, close beside me), so that he has no need to draw upon his power of imagination. The words בְּלֹא אֲפִיִּם, without any conjunction, express the natural effect of this, both in consciousness and in reality: he will not and cannot totter, he will not yield and be overthrown.

Vers. 9—11. Thus then, as this concluding strophe, as it were like seven rays of light, affirms, he has the most blessed prospect before him, without any need to fear death. Because Jahve is thus near at hand to help him, his heart becomes joyful (שָׂמַח) and his glory, i. e. his soul (vid. on vii. 6) rejoices, the joy breaking forth in rejoicing, as the fut. consec. affirms. There is no passage of Scripture that so closely resembles this as 1 Thess. v. 23. לֵב is πνεῦμα (νοῦς), נְבוֹר, ψυχή (vid. Psychol. S. 98; tr. p. 119), בְּשָׁר (according to its primary meaning, attractabile, that which is frail), σῶμα. The ἀμέμπτως τηρηθῆναι which the apostle in the above passage desires for his readers in respect of all three parts of their being, David here expresses as a confident expectation; for תָּא implies that he also hopes for his body that which he hopes for his spirit-life centred in the heart, and for his soul raised to dignity both by the work of creation and of grace. He looks death calmly and triumphantly in the face, even his flesh shall dwell or lie securely, viz. without being seized with trembling at its approaching corruption. David's hope rests on this conclusion: it is impossible for the man, who, in appropriating faith and actual experience, calls God his own, to fall into the hands of death. For ver. 10 shews, that what is here thought of in connection with שָׁכַן לְבֵטָח, dwelling in safety under the divine protection (Deut. xxxiii. 12, 28, cf. Prov. iii. 24), is preservation from death. שָׁחָה is rendered by the LXX. διαφθορά, as though it came from שָׁחָה διαφθείρειν, as perhaps it may do in Job xvii. 14. But in vii. 16 the LXX. has βόθρος, which is the more correct: prop. a sinking in, from שָׁחָה to sink, to be sunk, like נָחַת from נָחַת from נָחַת. To leave to the unseen world (עָזַב prop. to loosen, let go) is equivalent to abandoning one to it, so that he becomes its prey. Ver. 10b — where to see the grave (xlix. 10), equivalent to, to succumb to the state of the grave, i. e. death (lxxxix. 49, Lk. ii. 26, John viii. 51) is the opposite of "seeing life", i. e. experiencing and enjoying it (Eccl. ix. 9, John iii. 36), the sense of sight being used as the noblest of the senses to denote the sensus communis, i. e. the common sense lying at the basis of all feeling and perception, and figuratively of all active and passive experience (Psychol. S. 234; tr. p. 276) — shews, that what is said here is not intended of an abandonment by which, having once come under the power of death, there is no coming forth again (Böttcher). It is therefore the hope of not dying, that is expressed by David in ver. 10. For by חַסְדֵיךָ David means himself. According to Norzi, the Spanish MSS. have חַסְדֵיךָ with the Masoretic note יָדִיר יָדִיר, and the LXX., Targ., and Syriac translate, and the Talmud and Midrash interpret it, in accordance with this Keri. There is no ground for the reading חַסְדֵיךָ, and it is also opposed by the personal form of expression surrounding it.*

* Most MSS. and the best, which have no distinction of Keri and Chetib here, read חַסְדֵיךָ, as also the Biblia Ven. 1521, the Spanish

The positive expression of hope in ver. 11 comes as a companion to the negative just expressed: Thou wilt grant me to experience (הוֹרִיעַ, is used, as usual, of the presentation of a knowledge, which concerns the whole man and not his understanding merely) אֶרְחַח הַיִּים, the path of life, i. e. the path to life (cf. Prov. v. 6, ii. 19 with ib. x. 17, Mat. vii. 14); but not so that it is conceived of as at the final goal, but as leading slowly and gradually onwards to life; חַיִּים in the most manifold sense, as, e. g., in xxxvi. 10, Deut. xxx. 15: life from God, with God, and in God, the living God; the opposite of death, as the manifestation of God's wrath and banishment from Him. That his body shall not die is only the external and visible phase of that which David hopes for himself; on its inward, unseen side it is a living, inwrought of God in the whole man, which in its continuance is a walking in the divine life. The second part of ver. 11, which consists of two members, describes this life with which he solaces himself. According to the accentuation, — which marks חַיִּים with Olewejored not with Rebia magnum or Pazer, — שְׂבַע שְׂמֵחוֹת is not a second object dependent upon הוֹרִיעֵנִי, but the subject of a substantial clause: a satisfying fulness of joy is אֶת-פְּנֵיךָ, with Thy countenance, i. e. connected with and naturally produced by beholding Thy face (אֶת preposition of fellowship, as in xxi. 7, cxi. 14); for joy is light, and God's countenance, or doxa, is the light of lights. And every kind of pleasurable things, נָעֻמוֹת, He holds in His right hand, extending them to His saints — a gift which lasts for ever; נָעַץ equivalent to לְנֶעֱצָה, נָעַץ, from the primary notion of conspicuous brightness, is duration extending beyond all else — an expression for לְעוֹלָם, which David has probably coined, for it appears for the first time in the Davidic Psalms. Pleasures are in Thy right hand continually — God's right hand is never empty, His fulness is inexhaustible.

The apostolic application of this Psalm (Acts ii. 29—32, xiii. 35—37) is based on the considerations that David's hope of not coming under the power of death was not realised in David himself, as is at once clear, to the unlimited extent in which it is expressed in the Psalm; but that it is fulfilled in Jesus, who has not been left to Hades and whose flesh did not see corruption; and that consequently the words of the Psalm are a prophecy of David concerning Jesus, the Christ, who was promised as the heir to his throne, and whom, by reason of the promise, he had prophetically before his mind. If we look into the Psalm, we see that David, in his mode of expression, bases that hope simply upon his relation to Jahve, the ever-living One. That it has been granted to him in particular, to express this hope which is based upon the mystic relation of the קַדְוֵיךָ to Jahve in such language, — a hope which the issue of Jesus' life has sealed by an historical fulfilment, — is to be explained from the relation, according to the promise, in which David stands to his seed, the Christ and Holy One of God, who appeared in the person of Jesus. David, the anointed of God, looking upon himself as in Jahve, the God who has given the promise, becomes the prophet of Christ; but this is only indirectly, for he speaks of himself, and what he says has also been fulfilled in his own person. But this fulfilment is not limited to the condition, that he did not succumb to any peril that threatened his life so long as the kingship would have perished with him, and that, when he died, the kingship nevertheless remained (Hofmann); nor, that he was secured against all danger of death until he had accomplished his life's mission, until he had fulfilled the vocation assigned to him in the history of the plan of redemption (Kurtz) — the hope which he cherishes for himself personally has found a fulfilment which far exceeds this. After his hope has found in Christ its full realisation in accordance with the history of the plan of redemption, it receives through Christ its personal realisation for himself also. For what he says, extends on the one hand far beyond himself, and therefore refers prophetically to Christ: in decachordo Psalterio — as Jerome boldly expresses it — ab inferis suscitatur resurgentem. But on the other hand that which is predicted comes back upon himself, to raise him also from death and Hades to the beholding of God. Verus justitiæ sol — says Sonntag in his Tituli Psalmorum, 1687 — e sepulcro resurrexit, στήλη seu lapis sepulcralis a monumento devolutus, arcus triumphalis erectus, victoria ab hominibus reportata. En vobis Michtam! En Evangelium! —

PSALM XVII.

FLIGHT OF AN INNOCENT AND PERSECUTED MAN FOR REFUGE IN THE LORD, WHO KNOWETH THEM THAT ARE HIS.

- 1 HEAR, O Jahve, righteousness, hearken to my cry, Give ear to my prayer with undeceitful lips!
- 2 From Thy presence let my right go forth,
Thine eyes behold rightly.
- 3 Thou hast proved my heart, Thou hast visited(me)
by night,
Thou hast tried me — Thou findest nothing:
If I think evil, it doth not pass my mouth.
- 4 In connection with the doings of men, by the words of Thy lips
I have guarded myself against the paths of the destroyer;
- 5 My steps held fast to Thy paths,
My footsteps have not slipped.
- 6 As such an one I call upon Thee, for Thou hearest me,
O God!
Incline Thine ear unto me, hear my speech.
- 7 Shew Thy marvellous lovingkindness, Helper of those who seek refuge
From those that rise up [against them], at Thy right hand.
- 8 Keep me as the apple — the pupil — of the eye;
Hide me in the shadow of Thy wings
- 9 From the wicked, who would destroy me,
From my deadly enemies, who compass me about.
- 10 They have shut up their fat,
They speak proudly with their mouth;
- 11 At every step they have surrounded me,
Their purpose is to smite down to the earth.
- 12 He is like a lion that is greedy to ravin,
And like a young lion lurking in the lair.

- 13 Arise, Jahve, go forth to meet him, cast him down, Deliver my soul from the wicked, with Thy sword, 14 From men, with Thy hand, Jahve — from men of this world,
 Whose portion is in life, and with Thy treasures Thou fillest their belly,
 They have plenty of children and leave their abundance to their young ones.
 15 As for me — in righteousness shall I behold Thy face,
 I will satisfy myself, when I awake, with Thine image.

Ps. xvii. is placed after Ps. xvi., because just like the latter (cf. xi. 7) it closes with the hope of a blessed and satisfying vision of God. In other respects also the two Psalms have many prominent features in common: as, for instance, the the petition שְׁמַרְנִי, xvi. 1, xvii. 8; the retrospect on nightly fellowship with God, xvi. 7, xvii. 3; the form of address in prayer אֵל, xvi. 1, xvii. 6; the verb תָּמַח, xvi. 5, xvii. 5, &c. (vid. Symbolæ p. 49), notwithstanding a great dissimilarity in their tone. For Ps. xvi. is the first of those which we call Psalms written in the indignant style, in the series of the Davidic Psalms. The language of the Psalms of David, which is in other instances so flowing and clear, becomes more harsh and, in accordance with the subject and mood, as it were, full of unresolved dissonances (Ps. xvii. cxl. lviii. xxxvi. 2 sq., cf. x. 2—11) when describing the dissonant conduct of his enemies, and of the ungodly in general. The language is then more rough and unmanageable, and wanting in the clearness and transparency we find elsewhere. The tone of the language also becomes more dull and, as it were, a dull murmur. It rolls on like the rumble of distant thunder, by piling up the suffixes mo, āmo, ēmo, as in xvii. 10, xxxv. 16, lxiv. 6, 9, where David speaks of his enemies and describes them in a tone suggested by the indignation, which is working within his breast; or in lix. 12—14, lvi. 8, xxi. 10—13, cxl. 10, lviii. 7., where, as in prophetic language, he announces to them of the judgment of God. The more vehement and less orderly flow of the language which we find here, is the result of the inward tumult of his feelings.

There are so many parallels in the thought and expression of thought of this Psalm in other Davidic Psalms (among those we have already commented on we may instance more especially Ps. vii. and xi., and also iv. and x.), that even Hitzig admits the לָרֹדֵד. The author of the Psalm is persecuted, and others with him; foes, among whom one, their leader, stands prominently forward, plot against his life, and have encompassed him about in the most threatening manner, eager for his death. All this corresponds, line for line, with the situation of David in the wilderness of Maon (about three hours and three quarters S.S.E. of Hebron), as narrated in 1 Sam. xxiii. 25 sq., when Saul and his men were so close upon the heels of David and his men, that he only escaped capture by a most fortunate incident.

The only name inscribed on this Psalm is תְּפִלָּה (a prayer), the most comprehensive name for the Psalms, and the oldest (lxxii. 20); for שִׁיר and מְזִמֹּר were only given to them when they were sung in the liturgy and with musical accompaniment. As the title of a Psalm it is found five times (xvii. lxxxvi. xc. cii. cxlii) in the Psalter, and besides that once, in Hab. iii. Habakkuk's תְּפִלָּה is a hymn composed for music. But in the Psalter we do not find any indication of the Psalms thus inscribed being arranged for music. The strophe schema is 4. 7; 4. 4. 6. 7.

Vers. 1—2. צַדִּיק is the accusative of the object: the righteousness, intended by the suppliant, is his own (ver. 15a). He knows that he is not merely righteous in his relation to man, but also in his relation to God. In all such assertions of pious self-consciousness, that which is intended is a righteousness of life which has its ground in the righteousness of faith. True, Hupfeld is of opinion, that under the Old Testament nothing was known either of righteousness which is by faith or of a righteousness belonging to another and imputed. But if this were true, then Paul was in gross error and Christianity is built upon the sand. But the truth, that faith is the ultimate ground of righteousness, is expressed in Gen. xv. 6, and at other turning-points in the course of the history of redemption; and the truth, that the righteousness which avails before God is a gift of grace is for instance, a thought distinctly marked out in the expression of Jeremiah יהוה צדקני, "the Lord our righteousness." The Old Testament conception, it is true, looks more to the phenomena than to the root of the matter (ist mehr phänomenell als wurzelhaft), is (so to speak) more Jacobic than Pauline; but the righteousness of life of the Old Testament and that of the New have one and the same basis, viz. in the grace of God, the Redeemer, towards sinful man, who in himself is altogether wanting in righteousness before God (cxliii. 2). Thus there is no self-righteousness, in David's praying that the righteousness, which in him is persecuted and cries for help, may be heard. For, on the one hand, in his personal relation to Saul, he knows himself to be free from any ungrateful thoughts of usurpation, and on the other, in his personal relation to God free from מרמה, i. e. self-delusion and hypocrisy. The shrill cry for help, רנה, which he raises, is such as may be heard and answered, because they are not lips of deceit with which he prays. The actual fact is manifest לפני יהוה, therefore may his right go forth מלפניו, — just what does happen, by its being publicly proclaimed and openly maintained — from Him, for His eyes, the eyes of Him who knoweth the hearts (xi. 4), behold מישרים (as in lviii. 2, lxxv. 3 = במישרים, ix. 9, and many other passages), in uprightness, i. e. in accordance with the facts of the case and without partiality. מישרים might also be an accusative of the object (cf. 1 Chron. xxix. 17), but the usage of the language much more strongly favours the adverbial rendering, which is made still more natural by the confirmatory relation in which ver. 2*b* stands to 2*a*.

Vers. 3—5. David refers to the divine testing and illumination of the inward parts, which he has experienced in himself, in support of his sincerity. The preterites in ver. 3 express the divine acts that preceded the result בל-המציא, viz. the testing He has instituted, which is referred to in צרפתי and also בחנתה as a trying of gold by fire, and in פקד as an investigation (Job vii. 18). The result of the close scrutiny to which God has subjected him in the night, when the bottom of a man's heart is at once made manifest, whether it be in his thoughts when awake or in the dream and fancies of the sleeper, was and is this, that He does not find, viz. anything whatever to punish in him, anything that is separated as dross from the gold. To the mind of the New Testament believer with his deep, and as it were microscopically penetrating, insight into the depth of sin, such a confession concerning himself would be more difficult than to the mind of an Old Testament saint. For a separation and disunion of flesh and spirit, which was unknown in the same degree to the Old Testament, has been accomplished in the New Testament consciousness by the facts and operations of redemption revealed in the New Testament; although at the same time it must be remembered that in such confessions the Old Testament consciousness does not claim to be clear from sins, but only from a conscious love of sin, and from a self-love that is hostile to God.

With וְמוֹתִי David begins his confession of how Jahve found him to be, instead of finding anything punishable in him. This word is either an infinitive like חֲנֹן (lxxvii. 10) with the regular ultima accentuation, formed after the manner of the לִי verbs, — in accordance with which Hitzig renders it: my thinking does not overstep my mouth, — or even 1 pers. præt., which is properly Milel, but does also occur as Milra, e. g. Deut. xxxii. 41, Isa. xlv. 16 (vid. on Job xix. 17), — according to which Böttcher translates: should I think anything evil, it dare not pass beyond my mouth, — or (since וְמוֹתִי may denote the determination that precedes the act, e. g. Jer. iv. 28, Lam. ii. 17): I have determined my mouth shall not transgress. This last rendering is opposed by the fact, that עָבַר by itself in the ethical signification "to transgress" (cf. post-biblical עָבַרְתָּ אֶת־הַבְּרִיתָא παράβασαι) is not the usage of the biblical Hebrew, and that when עָבַר־פִּי stand close together, פִּי is presumptively the object. We therefore give the preference to Böttcher's explanation, which renders וְמוֹתִי as a hypothetical perfect and is favoured by Prov. xxx. 32 (which is to be translated: and if thou thinkest evil, (lay) thy hand on thy mouth!). Nevertheless בִּלְעֵבֶר־פִּי is not the expression of a fact, but of a purpose, as the combination of בִּלְ with the future requires it to be taken. The psalmist is able to testify of himself that he so keeps evil thoughts in subjection within him, even when they may arise, that they do not pass beyond his mouth, much less that he should put them into action. But perhaps the psalmist wrote פִּקֵּד originally, "my reflecting does not go beyond Thy commandment" (according to Num. xxii. 18, 1 Sam. xv. 24, Prov. viii. 29), — a meaning better suited, as a result of the search, to the nightly investigation. The ל of לִפְעֻלֹת need not be the ל of reference (as to); it is that of the state or condition, as in xxxii. 6, lxix. 22. אָרָם, as perhaps also in Job xxxi. 33, Hos. vi. 7 (if אָרָם is not there the name of the first man), means, men as they are by nature and habit. בְּדַבַּר שִׁפְחָתִי does not admit of being connected with לִפְעֻלֹת: at the doings of the world contrary to Thy revealed will (Hofmann and others); for פָּעַל לֹא can not mean: to act contrary to any one, but only: to work upon any one, Job xxxv. 6. These words must therefore be regarded as a closer definition, placed first, of the שְׁמֵרָתִי which follows: in connection with the doings of men, by virtue of the divine commandment, he has taken care of the paths of the oppressor, viz. not to go in them; 1 Sam. xxv. 21 is an instance in support of this rendering, where שְׁמֵרָתִי, as in Job ii. 6, means: I have kept (Nabal's possession), not seizing upon it myself. Jerome correctly translates vias latronis; for פָּרִיעַי signifies one who breaks in, i. e. one who does damage intentionally and by violence. The confession concerning himself is still continued in ver. 5, for the inf. absol. תִּמְנֶה, if taken as imperative would express a prayer for constancy, that is alien to the circumstances described. The perfect after כֹּל is also against such a rendering. It must therefore be taken as inf. historicus, and explained according to Job xxiii. 11, cf. Ps. xli. 13. The noun following the inf. absol., which is usually the object, is the subject in this instance, as, e. g. in Job xl. 2, Prov. xvii. 12, Eccl. iv. 2, and frequently. It is אֲשֻׁרֵי, and not אֲשֻׁרֵי, אֲשֹׁר (a step) never having the שׁ dageshed, except in ver. 11 and Job xxxi. 7.

Vers. 6—7. It is only now, after his inward parts and his walk have been laid open to Jahve, that he resumes his petition, which is so well justified and so soundly based, and enters into detail. The אֲנִי\* found beside קָרָאתִיךָ (the perfect referring to that which has just now been put into execution) is meant to imply: such an one as he has described himself to be according to the testimony of his conscience, may call upon God, for God hears such and will therefore also hear him.  $\text{הַטְּ אֶזְנוֹךָ}$  exactly corresponds to the Latin au-di (aus-cul-ta). The Hiph.  $\text{הִפְלִיָּה$  ( $\text{הִפְלִיָּה}$ , xxxi. 22, cf. iv. 4) signifies here to work in an extraordinary and marvellous manner. The danger of him who thus prays is great, but the mercies of God, who is ready and able to help, are still greater. Oh that He may, then, exhibit all its fulness on his behalf. The form of the address resembles the Greek, which is so fond of participles. If it is translated as Luther translates it: "Shew Thy marvellous loving-kindness, Thou Saviour of those who trust in Thee, Against those who so set themselves against Thy right hand", then  $\text{חֹסֵי$  is used just as absolutely as in Prov. xiv. 32, and the right hand of God is conceived of as that which arranges and makes firm. But "to rebel against God's right (not statuta, but dexteram)" is a strange expression. There are still two other constructions from which to choose, viz. "Thou Deliverer of those seeking protection from adversaries, with Thy right hand" (Hitz.), or: "Thou Helper of those seeking protection from adversaries, at Thy right hand" (Aben-Ezra, Tremell.). This last rendering is to be preferred to the two others. Since, on the one hand, one says  $\text{מִחֹסֶה מִן}$ , refuge from . . . , and on the other,  $\text{כִּי חָסָה}$  to hide one's self in any one, or in any place, this determining of the verbal notion by the preposition (on this, see above on ii. 12) must be possible in both directions.  $\text{מִמְתַּקְמִים}$  is equivalent to  $\text{מִמְתַּקְמִיהֶם}$  Job. xxvii. 7; and  $\text{חֹסִים בְּיַמִּינְךָ}$ , those seeking protection at the strong hand of Jahve. The force of the  $\text{כִּי}$  is just the same as in connection with  $\text{הִסְתַּפֵּר}$ , 1 Sam. xxiii. 19. In Damascus and throughout Syria — Wetzstein observes on this passage — the weak make use of these words when they surrender themselves to the strong:

it has Munach and Decht follows, e. g. also cxvi. 16. This Gaja demands an emphatic intonation of the secondary word in its relation to the principal word (which here is  $\text{קְרָאֲחִיד}$ ).

انا بقبضة يدك "I am in the grasp of thy hand (in thy closed hand) i. e. I give myself up entirely to thee".*

Vers. 8—9. The covenant relationship towards Himself in which Jahve has placed David, and the relationship of love in which David stands to Jahve, fully justified the oppressed one in his extreme request. The apple of the eye, which is surrounded by the iris, is called אֵישׁוֹן, the man (Arabic insân), or in the diminutive and endearing sense of the termination on: the little man of the eye, because a picture in miniature of one's self is seen, as in a glass, when looking into another person's eye. אֵישׁוֹן either because it is as if born out of the eye and the eye has, as it were, concentrated itself in it, or rather because the little image which is mirrored in it is, as it were, the little daughter of the eye (here and Lam. ii. 18). To the Latin pupilla (pupula), Greek κόρη, corresponds most closely עֵין זָכָה, Zech. ii. 12, which does not signify the gate, aperture, sight, but, as זָכָה shews, the little boy, or more strictly, the little girl of the eye. It is singular that אֵישׁוֹן here has the feminine אֵישׁוֹנָה as the expression in apposition to it. The construction might be genitival: "as the little man of the apple of the eye", inasmuch as the saint knows himself to be so near to God, that, as it were, his image in miniature is mirrored in the great eye of God. But (1) the more ordinary name for the pupil of the eye is not עֵין זָכָה, but אֵישׁוֹן; and (2) with that construction the proper point of the comparison, that the apple of the eye is an object of the most careful self-preservation, is missed. There is, consequently, a combination of two names of the pupil or apple of the eye, the usual one and one more select, without reference to the gender of the former, in order to give greater definition and emphasis to the figure. The primary passage for this bold figure, which is the utterance of loving entreaty, is Deut. xxxii. 10, where the dazzling anthropomorphism is effaced by the LXX. and other ancient versions;* cf. also Sir. xvii. 22. Then follows another figure, taken from the eagle, which hides its young under its wings, likewise from Deut. xxxii, viz. ver. 11, for the figure of the hen (Mat. xxiii. 37) is alien to the Old Testament. In that passage, Moses, in his great song, speaks of the wings of God; but the double figure of the shadow of God's wings (here and in xxxvi. 8, lvii. 2, lxiii. 8) is coined by David. "God's wings" are the spreadings out, i. e. the manifestations of His love, taking the creature under the protection of its intimate fellowship, and the "shadow" of these wings is the refreshing rest and security which the fellowship of this love affords to those, who hide themselves beneath it, from the heat of outward or inward conflict.

From ver. 9 we learn more definitely the position in which the psalmist is placed. שָׂרַר signifies to use violence, to destroy the life, continuance, or possession of any one. According to the accentuation בְּנַפְשׁוֹ is to be connected with אֵיבֵי, not with יִקְיִפוּ, and to be understood according to Ez. xxv. 6: "enemies with the soul" are those whose enmity is not merely superficial, but most deep-seated (cf. ἐκ ψυχῆς, Eph. vi. 6, Col. iii. 23). The soul (viz. the hating and eagerly longing soul, xxvii. 12, xli. 3) is just the same as if בְּנַפְשׁוֹ is combined with the verb, viz. the soul of the enemies; and אֵיבֵי נַפְשִׁי would therefore not be more correct, as Hitzig thinks, than אֵיבֵי בְנַפְשׁוֹ, but would have a different meaning. They are eager to destroy him (perf. conatus), and form a circle round about him, as ravenous ones, in order to swallow him up.

Vers. 10—12 tell what sort of people these persecutors are. Their heart is called fat, adeps, not as though חֶלֶב could in itself be equivalent to לֶב, more especially as both words are radically distinct (חֶלֶב from the root לֶב, לב, λεπ; לֶב from the root לֶב, לה to envelope: that which is enveloped, the kernel, the inside), but (without any need for von Ortenberg's conjecture הִלֵּכ לִבָּמוֹ סָגְרוּ "they close their heart with fat") because it is, as it were, entirely fat (cxix. 70, cf. lxxiii. 7), and because it is inaccessible to any feeling of compassion, and in general incapable of the nobler emotions. To shut up the fat — the heart (cf. κλείειν τὰ σπλάγχνα 1 John iii. 17), is equivalent to: to fortify one's self wilfully in indifference to sympathy, tender feeling, and all noble feelings (cf. הִשְׁמִין לֵב — to harden, Isa. vi. 10). The construction of פִּימוֹ (which agrees in sound with הִמָּהַם, Job xv. 27) is just the same as that of קָוְלִי, iii. 5. On the other hand, אֶשְׁוֹרְנֵי (after the form עָפְרוּ and written plene) is neither such an accusative of the means or instrument, nor the second accusative, beside the accusative of the object, of that by which the object is surrounded, that is usually found with verbs of surrounding (e. g. v. 13, xxxii. 7); for "they have surrounded me (us) with our step" is unintelligible. But אֶשְׁוֹרְנֵי can be the accusative of the member, as in iii. 8, cf. xxii. 17, Gen. iii. 15, for "it is true the step is not a member" (Hitz.), but since "step" and "foot" are interchangeable notions, lxxiii. 2, the σχημα καθ' ἑλόν και μέρος is applicable to the former, and as, e. g. Homer says, Iliad vii. 355: σὲ μάλιστα πόνος φρένας ἀμφιβέβηκεν, the Hebrew poet can also say: they have encompassed us (and in fact) our steps, each of our steps (so that we cannot go forwards or backwards with our feet). The Keri כִּכְבוֹנֵי gets rid of the change in number which we have with the Chethib כִּכְבוֹנֵי; the latter, however, is admissible according to parallels like lxii. 5, and corresponds to David's position, who is hunted by Saul and at the present time driven into a strait at the head of a small company of faithful followers. Their eyes — he goes on to say in ver. 11b — have they set to fell, viz. us, who are encompassed, to the earth, i. e. so that we shall be cast to the ground. נָמְהָ is transitive, as in xviii. 10, lxii. 4, in the transitively applied sense of lxxiii. 2 (cf. xxxvii. 31): to incline to fall (whereas in xlv. 19, Job xxxi. 7, it means to turn away from); and בְּאַרְץ (without any need for the conjecture בְּאַרְחָ) expresses the final issue, instead of לְאַרְץ, vii. 6. By the expression דְּמִיתוֹ one is prominently singled out from the host of the enemy, viz. its chief, the words being: his likeness is as a lion, according to the peculiarity of the poetical style, of changing verbal into substantial clauses, instead of דָּמָה כְּאַרְיֵה. Since in Old Testament Hebrew, as also in Syriac and Arabic, כ is only a preposition, not a connective conjunction, it cannot be rendered: as a lion longs to prey, but: as a lion that is greedy or hungry (cf. كسف used of sinking away, decline, obscuring or eclipsing, growing pale, and خسف more especially of enfeebling, hunger, distinct from הִשָּׁף = كشف to peel off, make bare) to ravin. In the parallel member of the verse the participle alternates with the attributive clause. כְּפִיר is (according to Meier) the young lion as being covered with thicker hair.

Vers. 13—15. The phrase קָדַם פָּנַי, antevertere faciem alicujus, means both to appear before any one with reverence, xcv. 2 (post-biblical: to pay one's respects to any one) and to meet any one as an enemy, rush on him. The foe springs like a lion upon David, may Jahve — so he prays — as his defence cross the path of the lion and intercept him, and cast him down so that he, being rendered harmless, shall lie there with bowed knees (כָּרַע, of the lion, Gen. xlix. 9, Num. xxiv. 9). He is to rescue his soul from the ungodly חֲרֹבָה. This חֲרֹבָה, and also the יָדָה which follows, can be regarded as a permutative of the subject (Böttcher, Hupfeld, and Hitzig), an explanation which is commended by xliv. 3 and other passages. But it is much more probably that more exact definitions of this kind are treated as accusatives, vid. on iii. 5. At any rate "sword" and "hand" are meant as the instruments by which the פָּלַט, rescuing, is effected. The force of פָּלַטָה extends into ver. 14, and מִמָּחִים (with a Chateph under the letter that is freed from reduplication, like מִמָּכֹן, xxxiii. 14) corresponds to מְרִשָּׁע, as יָדָה to חֲרֹבָה. The word מִמָּחִים (plural of מַח, men, Deut. ii. 34, whence מָחָם, each and every one), which of itself gives no complete sense, is repeated and made complete after the interruption caused by the insertion of יָדָה ה' — a remarkable manner of obstructing and then resuming the thought, which Hofmann (Schriftbeweis ii. 2. 495) seeks to get over by a change in the division of the verse and in the interpunction. חָלַד, either from חָלַד Syriac to creep, glide, slip away (whence הַלְדָה a weasel, a mole) or from חָלַד Talmudic to cover, hide, signifies: this temporal life which glides by unnoticed (distinct from the Arabic chald, chuld, an abiding stay, endless duration); and consequently חַדְל, limited existence, from חָדַל to have an end, alternates with חָלַךְ as a play upon the letters, comp. xlix. 2 with Isa. xxxviii. 11. The combination מַחֲלֵךְ מַחֲלֵךְ resembles x. 18, xvi. 4. What is meant, is: men who have no other home but the world, which passeth away with the lust thereof, men ἀπὸ τοῦ αἰῶνος τοῦ αἰῶνος, or ἀπὸ τοῦ αἰῶνος τοῦ αἰῶνος. The meaning of the further description בְּחַיִּים הֶלְקֶם (cf. Eccl. ix. 9) becomes clear from the converse in xvi. 5. Jahve is the הֶלֶךְ of the godly man; and the sphere within which the worldling claims his הֶלֶךְ is בְּחַיִּים, this temporal, visible, and material life. This is everything to him; whereas the godly man says: מִנֹּכַח חַיֵּיךָ בְּחַיִּים, lxiii. 4. The contrast is not so much between this life and the life to come, as between the world (life) and God. Here we see into the inmost nature of the Old Testament faith. To the Old Testament believer, all the blessedness and glory of the future life, which the New Testament unfolds, is shut up in Jahve. Jahve is his highest good, and possessing Him he is raised above heaven and earth, above life and death. To yield implicitly to Him, without any explicit knowledge of a blessed future life, to be satisfied with Him, to rest in Him, to hide in Him in the face of death, is the characteristic of the Old Testament faith. בְּחַיִּים הֶלְקֶם expresses both the state of mind and the lot of the men of the world. Material things which are their highest good, fall also in abundance to their share. The words "whose belly Thou fillest with Thy treasure" (Chethib: וַיִּצְפְּתֶךָ the usual participial form, but as a participle an Aramaising form) do not sound as though the poet meant to say that God leads them to repentance by the riches of His goodness, but on the contrary that God, by satisfying their desires which are confined to the outward and sensuous only, absolutely deprives them of all claim to possessions that extend beyond the world and this present temporal life. Thus, then, וַיִּצְפֵּן in this passage is used exactly as וַיִּצְפֵּן is used in Job xx. 26 (from וַיִּצְפֵּן to hold anything close to one, to hold back, to keep by one). Moreover, there is not the slightest alloy of murmur or envy in the words. The godly man who lacks these good things out of the treasury of God, has higher delights; he can exclaim, xxxi. 20: "how great is Thy goodness which Thou hast laid up (צִפְנֵתָ) for those who fear Thee!" Among the good things with which God fills the belly and house of the ungodly (Job xxii. 17 sq.) are also children in abundance; these are elsewhere a blessing upon piety (cxxvii. 3 sq., cxxviii. 3 sq.), but to those who do not acknowledge the Giver they are a snare to self-glorifying, Job xxi. 11 (cf. Wisdom iv. 1). כְּנִים is not the subject, but an accusative, and has been so understood by all the old translators from the original text, just as in the phrase יָמִים שָׂבַע to be satisfied with, or weary of, life. On עֹלָלִים vid. on viii. 3. יָתַר (from יָתַר to stretch out in length, then to be overhanging, towering above, projecting, superfluous, redundant) signifies here, as in Job xxii. 20, riches and the abundance of things possessed.

Ver. 15. With אֲנִי he contrasts his incomparably greater prosperity with that of his enemies. He, the despised and persecuted of men, will behold God's face בְּצִדְקָה, in righteousness, which will then find its reward (Mat. v. 8, Hebr. xii. 14), and will, when this hope is realised by him, thoroughly refresh himself with the form of God. It is not sufficient to explain the vision of the divine countenance here as meaning the experience of the gracious influences which proceed from the divine countenance again unveiled and turned towards him. The parallel of the next clause requires an actual vision, as in Num. xii. 8, according to which Jahve appeared to Moses in the true form of His being, without the intervention of any self-manifestation of an accommodative and visionary kind; but at the same time, as in Exod. xxxiii. 20, where the vision of the divine countenance is denied to Moses, according to which, consequently, the self-manifestation of Jahve in His intercourse with Moses is not to be thought of without some veiling of Himself which might render the vision tolerable to him. Here, however, where David gives expression to a hope which is the final goal and the very climax of all his hopes, one has no right in any way to limit the vision of God, who in love permits him to behold Him (vid. on xi. 7), and to limit the being satisfied with His רְמוּנָה (LXX. ἡ δόξα σου, vid. Psychol

S. 49; transl. p. 61). If this is correct, then וַיִּשְׁכַּב cannot mean "when I wake up from this night's sleep" as Ewald, Hupfeld and others explain it; for supposing the Psalm were composed just before falling asleep what would be the meaning of the postponement of so transcendent a hope to the end of his natural sleep? Nor can the meaning be to "awake to a new life of blessedness and peace through the sunlight of divine favour which again arises after the night of darkness and distress in which the poet is now to be found" (Kurtz); for to awake from a night of affliction is an unsuitable idea and for this very reason cannot be supported. The only remaining explanation, therefore, is the waking up from the sleep of death (cf. Böttcher, De inferis § 365—367). The fact that all who are now in their graves shall one day hear the voice of Him that wakes the dead, as it is taught in the age after the Exile (Dan. xii. 2), was surely not known to David, for it was not yet revealed to him. But why may not this truth of revelation, towards which prophecy advances with such giant strides (Isa. xxvi. 19. Ezek. xxxvii. 1—14), be already heard even in the Psalms of David as a bold demand of faith and as a hope that has struggled forth to freedom out of the comfortless conception of Sheôl possessed in that age, just as it is heard a few decades later in the master-work of a cotemporary of Solomon, the Book of Job? The morning in Ps. xlix. 15 is also not any morning whatever following upon the night, but that final morning which brings deliverance to the upright and inaugurates their dominion. A sure knowledge of the fact of the resurrection such as, according to Hofmann (Schriftbeweis ii. 2, 490), has existed in the Old Testament from the beginning, is not expressed in such passages. For laments like vi. 6, xxx. 10, lxxxviii. 11—13, shew that no such certain knowledge was then in existence; and when the Old Testament literature which we now possess allows us elsewhere an insight into the history of the perception of redemption, it does not warrant us in concluding anything more than that the perception of the future resurrection of the dead did not pass from the prophetic word into the believing mind of Israel until about the time of the Exile, and that up to that period faith made bold to hope for a redemption from death, but only by means of an inference drawn from that which was conceived and existed within itself, without having an express word of promise in its favour.* Thus it is here also. David certainly gives full expression to the hope of a vision of God, which, as righteous before God, will be vouchsafed to him; and vouchsafed to him, even though he should fall asleep in death in the present extremity (xiii. 4), as one again awakened from the sleep of death, and, therefore (although this idea does not directly coincide with the former), as one raised from the dead. But this hope is not a believing appropriation of a "certain knowledge", but a view that, by reason of the already existing revelation of God, lights up out of his consciousness of fellowship with Him.

PSALM XVIII.

DAVID'S HYMNIC RETROSPECT OF A LIFE CROWNED WITH MANY MERCIES.

- 2 FERVENTLY do I love Thee, Jahve, my strength,
 3 Jahve, my rock, and my fortress, and my Deliverer,
 My God, my fastness wherein I hide myself,
 My shield, and the horn of my salvation, my high tower!
 4 As worthy to be praised do I call upon Jahve,
 And against mine enemies shall I be helped.
- 5 The bands of death had compassed me
 And the floods of the abyss came upon me.
 6 The bands of hades had surrounded me,
 The snares of death assaulted me.

* To this Hofmann, loc. cit. S. 496, replies as follows: "We do not find that faith indulges in such boldness elsewhere, or that the believing ones cherish hopes which are based on such insecure grounds." But the word of God is surely no insecure ground, and to draw bold conclusions from that which is intimated only from afar, was indeed, even in many other respects (for instance, respecting the incarnation, and respecting the abrogation of the ceremonial law), the province of the Old Testament faith.

- 7 In my distress I called upon Jahve,
 And unto my God did I cry;
 He heard my call out of His temple,
 And my cry before Him came into His ears.
- 8 The earth shook and quaked,
 And the foundations of the mountains trembled,
 And they swung to and fro, for He was wroth.
- 9 There went up a smoke in His nostrils,
 And fire out of His mouth devoured,
 Coals were kindled by it.
- 10 Then He bowed the heavens and came down,
 And thick darkness was under His feet
- 11 And He rode upon a cherub and did fly,
 And floated upon the wings of the wind;
- 12 He made darkness His covering, His pavilion round about Him
 Darkness of waters, thick clouds of the skies.
- 13 Out of the brightness before Him there broke through His clouds
 Hail-stones and coals of fire.
- 14 Then Jahve thundered in the heavens,
 And the Highest made His voice to sound forth.
 [Hail-stones and coals of fire.]
- 15 And He sent forth His arrows and scattered them,
 And lightnings in abundance and discomfited them.
- 16 And the channels of the waters became visible,
 And the foundations of the earth were laid bare,
 At Thy threatening, Jahve,
 At the snorting of the breath of Thy wrath.
- 17 He reached from the height, He seized me,
 He drew me up out of great waters;
- 18 He delivered me from my grim foe,
 And from them that hated me, because they were too strong for me.
- 19 They came upon me in the day of my calamity,
 Then Jahve was a stay to me,

- 20 And brought me forth into a large place;
He delivered me, for He delighted in me.
- 21 Jahve rewarded me according to my righteousness,
According to the cleanness of my hands did He recompense me.
- 22 For I have kept the ways of Jahve,
And have not wickedly departed from my God.
- 23 Far from this, all His judgments are my aim,
And His statutes I do not put away from me.
- 24 And I was spotless towards Him,
And I have kept myself from mine iniquity.
- 25 Therefore Jahve recompensed me according to any righteousness,
According to the cleanness of my hands, which was manifest in His eyes.
- 26 Towards the good Thou shewest Thyself good Towards the man of perfect submission Thou shewest Thyself yielding.
- 27 Towards him who sanctifies himself Thou shewest Thyself pure,
And towards the perverse Thou shewest Thyself forward.
- 28 For Thou, Thou savest the afflicted people,
And high looks Thou bringest down.
- 29 For Thou makest my lamp light;
Jahve, my God, enlighteneth my darkness.
- 30 For by Thee do I scatter a troop,
And by my God do I leap walls.
- 31 As for God — spotless is His way,
The word of Jahve is tried;
A shield is He to all who hide in Him.
- 32 For who is a divine being, but Jahve alone.
And who is a rock save our God?
- 33 The God, who girded me with strength,
And made my way perfect,

- 34 Making my feet like hinds' feet,
And who set me upon my high places,
35 Training my hands for war,
And mine arms bent a bow of brass.
- 36 And Thou gavest me also the shield of Thy salvation,
And Thy right hand upheld me,
And Thy lowliness made me great.
- 37 Thou madest room for my footsteps under me,
And mine ankles have not slipped.
- 38 I pursued mine enemies and overtook them,
And turned not back, till they were consumed.
- 39 I smote them, so that they could not rise,
They fell under my feet
- 40 And Thou didst gird me with strength for the battle, Thou madest my foes to bow down under me,
- 41 Thou gavest me the necks of mine enemies,
And those that hated me, I utterly destroyed.
- 42 They cried, but there was no helper,
Even to Jahve, but He answered them not.
- 43 And I crushed them as dust before the wind,
Like the dirt of the streets I emptied them out.
- 44 Thou didst deliver me from the strivings of the people,
Thou didst make me Head of the nations;
A people that I knew not, served me.
- 45 At the hearing of the ear, they obeyed me,
Strangers submitted to me,
- 46 Strangers faded away,
And came forth trembling from their strongholds.
- 47 Jahve liveth, and blessed be my Rock,
And let the God of my salvation be exalted;
- 48 The God, who gave me revenges
And bent back peoples under me,
- 49 My Deliverer from mine enemies,
Yea, Thou who liftest me up above my foes,
Who rescuest me from the violent man.

- 50 Therefore will I praise Thee among the nations, O Jahve,
And I will sing praises unto Thy name,
51 As He, who giveth great deliverance to His king
And sheweth favour to His anointed,
To David and his seed for ever.

Next to a תְּפִלָּה of David comes a שִׁירָה (nom. unitatis from שִׁיר), which is in many ways both in words and thoughts (Symbolae p. 49) interwoven with the former. It is the longest of all the hymnic Psalms, and bears the inscription: To the Precentor, by the servant of Jahve, by David, who spake unto Jahve the words of this song in the day that Jahve had delivered him out of the hand of all his enemies and out of the hand of Saül: then he said. The original inscription of the Psalm in the primary collection was probably only לְמַנְצֵחַ לְדָוִד לְעֹבֵר ה' לְדָוִד, like the inscription of Ps. xxxvi. The rest of the inscription resembles the language with which songs of this class are wont to be introduced in their connection in the historical narrative, Ex. xv. 1, Num. xxi. 17, and more especially Deut. xxxi. 30. And the Psalm before us is found again in 2 Sam. xxii., introduced by words, the manifestly unaccidental agreement of which with the inscription in the Psalter, is explained by its having been incorporated in one of the histories from which the Books of Samuel are extracted, — probably the Annals (Dibre ha-Jamim) of David. From this source the writer of the Books of Samuel has taken the Psalm, together with that introduction; and from this source also springs the historical portion of the inscription in the Psalter, which is connected with the preceding by אֲשֶׁר.

David may have styled himself in the inscription עֹבֵר ה', just as the apostles call themselves δοῦλοι Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. He also in other instances, in prayer, calls himself "the servant of Jahve", xix. 12, 14, cxliv. 10, 2 Sam. vii. 20, as every Israelite might do; but David, who is the first after Moses and Joshua to bear this designation or by-name, could do so in an especial sense. For he, with whom the kingship of promise began, marks an epoch in his service of the work of God no less than did Moses, through whose mediation Israel received the Law, and Joshua, through whose instrumentality they obtained the Land of promise.

The terminology of psalm-poesy does not include the word שִׁירָה, but only שִׁיר. This at once shews that the historical portion of the inscription comes from some other source. בַּיּוֹם is followed, not by the infin. הַיּוֹם: on the day of deliverance, but by the more exactly plusquamperf. הַיּוֹם: on the day (בַּיּוֹם — at the time, as in Gen. ii. 4, and frequently) when he had delivered — a genitival (Ges. § 116, 3) relative clause, like cxxxviii. 3, Ex. vi. 28, Num. iii. 1, cf. Ps. lvi. 10. מָרָה alternates with מִכַּף in this text without any other design than that of varying the expression. The deliverance out of the hand of Saul is made specially prominent, because the most prominent portion of the Psalm, vers. 5—20, treats of it. The danger in which David then was placed, was of the most personal, the most perilous, and the most protracted kind. This prominence was of great service to the collector, because the preceding Psalm bears the features of this time, the lamentations over which are heard there and further back, and now all find expression in this more extended song of praise.

Only a fondness for doubt can lead any one to doubt the Davidic origin of this Psalm, attested as it is in two works, which are independent of one another. The twofold testimony of tradition is supported by the fact that the Psalm contains nothing that militates against David being the author; even the mention of his own name at the close, is not against it (cf. 1 Kings ii. 45). We have before us an Israelitish counterpart to the cuneiform monumental inscriptions, in which the kings of worldly monarchies recapitulate the deeds they have done by the help of their gods. The speaker is a king; the author of the Books of Samuel found the song already in existence as a Davidic song; the difference of his text from that which lies before us in the Psalter, shews that at that time it had been transmitted from some earlier period; writers of the later time of the kings here and there use language which is borrowed from it or are echoes of it (comp. Prov. xxx. 5 with ver. 31; Hab. iii. 19 with ver. 34); it bears throughout the mark of the classic age of the language and poetry, and "if it be not David's, it must have been written in his name and by some one imbued with his spirit, and who could have been this contemporary poet and twin-genius?" (Hitzig). All this irresistibly points us to David himself, to whom really belong also all the other songs in the Second Book of Samuel, which are introduced as Davidic (over Saul and Jonathan, over Abner, &c.). This, the greatest of all, springs entirely from the new self-consciousness to which he was raised by the promises recorded in 2 Sam. vii.; and towards the end, it closes with express retrospective reference to these promises; for David's certainty of the everlasting duration of his house, and God's covenant of mercy with his house, rests upon the announcement made by Nathan.

The Psalm divides into two halves; for the strain of praise begins anew with ver. 32, after having run its first course and come to a beautiful close in ver. 31. The two halves are also distinct in respect of their artificial form. The strophe schema of the first is: 6. 8. 8. 6. 8 (not 9). 8. 8. 8. 7. The mixture of six and eight line strophes is symmetrical, and the seven of the last strophe is nothing strange. The mixture in the second half on the contrary is varied. The art of the strophe system appears here, as is also seen in other instances in the Psalms, to be relaxed; and the striving after form at the commencement has given way to the pressure and crowding of the thoughts.

The traditional mode of writing out this Psalm, as also the Cantica, 2 Sam. xxii. and Judges v., is "a half-brick upon a brick, and a brick upon a half-brick" (אִירַח עַל גְּבִי לְבִנָּה) : i. e. one line consisting of two, and one of three parts of a verse, and the line consisting of the three parts has only one word on the right and on the left; the whole consequently forms three columns. On the other hand, the song in Deut. xxxii. (as also Josh. xii. 9 sqq., Esth. ix. 7—10) is to be written "a half-brick upon a half-brick and a brick upon a brick", i. e. in only two columns, cf. infra p. 269.

Vers. 2—4. The poet opens with a number of endearing names for God, in which he gratefully comprehends the results of long and varied experience. So far as regards the parallelism of the members, a monostich forms the beginning of this Psalm, as in Ps. xvi. xxiii. xxv. and many others. Nevertheless the matter assumes a somewhat different aspect, if ver. 3 is not, with Maurer, Hengstenberg and Hupfeld, taken as two predicate clauses (Jahve is . . ., my God is . . .), but as a simple vocative — a rendering which alone corresponds to the intensity with which this greatest of the Davidic hymns opens — God being invoked by יה, יהי, אֱלֹהֵי, and each of these names being followed by a predicative expansion of itself, which increases in fulness of tone and emphasis. The אֶרְחַמְךָ (with ā, according to Ew. § 251, b), which carries the three series of the names of God, makes up in depth of meaning what is wanting in compass. Elsewhere we find only the Piel רַחַם of tender sympathising love, but here the Kal is used as an Aramaism. Hence the Jalkut on this passage explains it by רַחֵמַי יְיָךְ “I love thee”, of ardent, heartfelt love and attachment. The primary signification of softness (root רַח, רַח, יִרַח, to be soft, lax, loose), whence רַחֵם, uterus, is transferred in both cases to tenderness of feeling or sentiment. The most general predicate רַחֵמֵי (from רַחֵם according to a similar inflexion to אָמַר, בָּסַר, עָמַק, plur. עָמָקִי Prov. ix. 18) is followed by those which describe Jahve as a protector and deliverer in persecution on the one hand, and on the other as a defender and the giver of victory in battle. They are all typical names symbolising what Jahve is in Himself; hence instead of וּמְפִלְטִי it would perhaps have been more correct to point וּמְפִלְטִי (and my refuge). God had already called Himself a shield to Abram, Gen. xv. 1; and He is called צֹרֵךְ (cf. אָבְרָם Gen. xlix. 24) in the great Mosaic song, Deut. xxxii. 4, 37 (the latter verse is distinctly echoed here). סִלַּע from סָלַע, findere, means properly a cleft in a rock (Arabic سَلَعٌ*), then a cleft

* Neshwān defines thus: السَّلْعُ is a cutting in a mountain after the manner of a gorge; and Jākūt, who cites a number of places that are so called: a wide plain (فضاء) enclosed by steep rocks, which is reached through a narrow pass (شعب), but can only be descended on foot. Accordingly, in סִלַּעִי the idea of a safe (and comfortable) hiding-place preponderates; in צֹרֵךְ that of firm ground and inaccessibility. The one figure calls to mind the (well-watered) Edomitic place surrounded with precipitous rocks, Isa. xvi. 1, xlii. 11, the Πέτρα rock, and צור, like the Arabic صخر, a great and hard mass of rock (Aramaic טור, a mountain). The figures of the מצודה (מצודה, מצוד, מצוד) and the מצוד are related; the former signifies properly specula, a watch-tower*, and the latter, a steep height. The horn, which is an ancient figure of victorious and defiant power in Deut. xxxiii. 17, 1 Sam. ii. 1, is found here applied to Jahve Himself: "horn of my salvation" is that which interposes on the side of my feebleness, conquers, and saves me. All these epithets applied to God are the fruits of the affliction out of which David's song has sprung, viz. his persecution by Saul, when, in a country abounding in rugged rocks and deficient in forest, he betook himself to the rocks for safety, and the mountains served him as his fortresses. In the shelter which the mountains, by their natural conformations, afforded him at described by Strabo, xvi. 4, 21; the other calls to mind the Phœnician rocky island ציר, Ṣūr (Tyre), the refuge in the sea.

* In Arabic مَصَادٌ signifies (1) a high hill (a signification that is wanting in Freytag), (2) the summit of a mountain, and according to the original lexicons it belongs to the root مَصَدٌ, which in outward appearance is supported by the synonymous forms مَصَدٌ and مَصَدٌ, as also by their plurals أَمَصِدَةٌ and مُصَدَانٌ, since these can only be properly formed from those singulars on the assumption of the m being part of the root. Nevertheless, since the meanings of مَصَدٌ all distinctly point to its being formed from the root مَص contained in the reduplicated stem مَصَصٌ to suck, but the meanings of مَصَادٌ, مَصَدٌ, and مَصَدٌ do not admit of their being referred to it, and moreover there are instances in which original nn. loci from vv. med. و and ی admit of the prefixed m being treated as the first radical through forgetfulness or disregard of their derivation, and with the retention of its form secondary roots (as مَكَنٌ, مَدَنٌ, مَصَرٌ), it is highly probable that in maṣād, maṣad and maṣd we have an original מַצֵּדָה, מַצֵּדָה, מַצֵּדָה. These Hebrew words, however, are to be referred to a צַד in the signification to look out, therefore properly specula. — Fleischer that time, and in the fortunate accidents, which sometimes brought him deliverance when in extreme peril, David recognises only marvellous phenomena of which Jahve Himself was to him the final cause. The confession of the God tried and known in many ways is continued in ver. 4 by a general expression of his experience. מְהִלֵּל is a predicate accusative to יְהוָה: As one praised (worthy to be praised) do I call upon Jahve, — a rendering that is better suited to the following clause, which expresses confidence in the answer coinciding with the invocation, which is to be thought of as a cry for help, than Olshausen's, "Worthy of praise, do I cry, is Jahve", though this latter certainly is possible so far as the style is concerned (vid. on Isa. xlv. 24, cf. also Gen. iii. 3, Mic. ii. 6). The proof of this fact, viz. that calling upon Him who is worthy to be praised, who, as the history of Israel shews, is able and willing to help, is immediately followed by actual help, as events that are coincident, forms the further matter of the Psalm.

Vers. 5—7. In these verses David gathers into one collective figure all the fearful dangers to which he had been exposed during his persecution by Saul, together with the marvellous answers and deliverances he experienced, that which is unseen, which stands in the relation to that which is visible of cause and effect, rendering itself visible to him. David here appears as passive throughout; the hand from out of the clouds seizes him and draws him out of mighty waters: while in the second part of the Psalm, in fellowship with God and under His blessing, he comes forward as a free actor.

The description begins in vers. 5—7 with the danger and the cry for help which is not in vain. The verb אָפַף according to a tradition not to be doubted (cf. אָפַף a wheel) signifies to go round, surround, as a poetical synonym of סָבַב, הִקִּיף, בָּרַחַר, and not, as one might after the Arabic have thought: to drive, urge. Instead of "the bands of death," the LXX. (cf. Acts ii. 24) renders it ὀδῶνες (constrictive pains) θανάτου; but ver. 6b. favours the meaning bands, cords, cf. cxix. 61 (where it is likewise הִקִּילִי instead of the הִבִּילִי, which one might have expected, Josh. xvii. 5, Job xxxvi. 8), death is therefore represented as a hunter with a cord and net, xci. 3.  $\text{בְּלֹעַל}$ , compounded of  $\text{לֹעַל}$  and  $\text{עַל}$  (from  $\text{עָלָה}$ ,  $\text{עָל}$ , root  $\text{עַל}$ ), signifies unprofitableness, worthlessness, and in fact both deep-rooted moral corruption and also abysmal destruction (cf. 2 Cor. vi. 15,  $\text{Βελίαρ} = \text{Βελίαλ}$  as a name of Satan and his kingdom). Rivers of destruction are those, whose engulfing floods lead down to the abyss of destruction (Jon. ii. 7). Death, Beljidal, and Sheöl are the names of the weird powers, which make use of David's persecutors as their instruments. Futt. in the sense of imperfects alternate with prætt.  $\text{פָּעַר}$  (=  $\text{بغت}$ ) signifies to come suddenly upon any one (but compare also  $\text{بعت}$ , to startle, excitare, to alarm), and  $\text{קָרַח}$ , to rush upon; the two words are distinguished from one another like überfallen and ansfallen. The  $\text{קַיִל}$  out of which Jahve hears is His heavenly dwelling-place, which is both palace and temple, inasmuch as He sits enthroned there, being worshipped by blessed spirits.  $\text{לִפְנֵי$  belongs to  $\text{שִׁוְעָתִי}$ : my cry which is poured forth before Him (as e. g. in cii. 1), for it is tautological if joined with  $\text{בְּפָנָיו}$  beside  $\text{בְּפָנָיו}$ . Before Jahve's face he made supplication and his prayer urged its way into His ears.

Vers. 8—10. As these verses go on to describe, the being heard became manifest in the form of deliverance. All nature stands to man in a sympathetic relationship, sharing his curse and blessing, his destruction and glory, and to God in a (so to speak) synergetic relationship, furnishing the harbingers and instruments of His mighty deeds. Accordingly in this instance Jahve's interposition on behalf of David is accompanied by terrible manifestations in nature. Like the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, Ps. lxxviii. lxxviii., and the giving of the Law on Sinai, Exod. xix., and like the final appearing of Jahve and of Jesus Christ according the words of prophet and apostle (Hab. iii., 2 Thess. i. 7 sq.), the appearing of Jahve for the help of David has also extraordinary natural phenomena in its train. It is true we find no express record of any incident in David's life of the kind recorded in 1 Sam. vii. 10, but it must be some real experience which David here idealises (i. e. seizes at its very roots, and generalises and works up into a grand majestic picture of his miraculous deliverance). Amidst earthquake, a black thunderstorm gathers, the charging of which is heralded by the lightning's flash, and its thick clouds descend nearer and nearer to the earth. The aorists in ver. 8 introduce the event, for the introduction of which, from ver. 4 onwards, the way has been prepared and towards which all is directed. The inward excitement of the Judge, who appears to His servant for his deliverance, sets the earth in violent oscillation. The foundations of the mountains (Isa. xxiv. 18) are that upon which they are supported beneath and within, as it were, the pillars which support the vast mass. געש (rhyming with רעש) is followed by the Hithpa. of the same verb: the first impulse having been given they, viz. the earth and the pillars of the mountains, continue to shake of themselves. These convulsions occur, because "it is kindled with respect to God"; it is unnecessary to supply אפו לו, אַפּוֹ לֹו is a synonym of לוֹ חַם. When God is wrath, according to Old Testament conception, the power of wrath which is present in Him is kindled and blazes up and breaks forth. The panting of rage may accordingly also be called the smoke of the fire of wrath (lxxiv. 1, lxxx. 5). The smoking is as the breathing out of the fire, and the vehement hot breath which is inhaled and exhaled through the nose of one who is angry (cf. Job xli. 12), is like smoke rising from the internal fire of anger. The fire of anger itself "devours out of the mouth", i. e. flames forth out of the mouth, consuming whatever it lays hold of, — in men in the form of angry words, with God in the fiery forces of nature, which are of a like kind with, and subservient to, His anger, and more especially in the lightning's flash. It is the lightning chiefly, that is compared here to the blazing up of burning coals. The power of wrath in God, becoming manifest in action, breaks forth into a glow, and before it entirely discharges its fire, it gives warning of action like the lightning's flash heralding the outburst of the storm. Thus enraged and breathing forth His wrath, Jahve bowed the heavens, i. e. caused them to bend towards the earth, and came down, and darkness of clouds (עָרַפְלִי similar in meaning to ὄφρυγ, cf. ἔρπελος) was under His feet: black, low-hanging clouds announced the coming of Him who in His wrath was already on His way downwards towards the earth.

Vers. 11—13. The storm, announcing the approaching outburst of the thunderstorm, was also the forerunner of the Avenger and Deliverer. If we compare ver. 11 with civ. 3, it is natural to regard כְּרוֹב as a transposition of רְכוֹב (a chariot, Ew. § 153, a). But assuming a relationship between the biblical Cherub and (according to Ctesias) the Indo-Per-sian griffin, the word (from the Zend grab, garew, garefsh, to seize) signifies a creature seizing and holding irrecoverably fast whatever it seizes upon; perhaps in Semitic language the strong creature, from כְּרַב = כֶּבֶב torquere, constringere, (whence mukrab, tight, strong). It is a passive form like נִבְּלָה, וְיָסַר, לְבַשׁ. The cherubim are mentioned in Gen. iii. 24 as the guards of Paradise (this alone is enough to refute the interpretation recently revived in the Evang. Kirchen-Zeit., 1866, No. 46, that they are a symbol of the unity of the living One, כְּרוֹב = כְּרוֹב "like a multitude"), and elsewhere, as it were, as the living mighty rampart and vehicle of the approach of the inaccessible majesty of God; and they are not merely in general the medium of God's personal presence in the world, but more especially of the presence of God as turning the fiery side of His doxa towards the world. As in the Prometheus of Æschylus, Oceanus comes flying τὸν πτερυγαῶνα τὸν ὀλοῦν γυμνὸν σπομίωσ ἀτρὺ ἐθόσων, so in the present passage Jahve rides upon the cherub, of which the heathenish griffin is a distortion; or, if by a comparison of passages like civ. 3, Isa. lxvi. 15, we understand David according to Ezekiel, He rides upon the cherub as upon His living throne-chariot (מֶרְכָּבָה). The throne floats upon the cherubim, and this cherub-throne flies upon the wings of the wind; or, as we can also say: the cherub is the celestial spirit working in this vehicle formed of the spirit-like elements. The Manager of the chariot is Himself hidden behind the thick thunder-clouds. יָשָׁה is an aorist without the consecutive ו (cf. יָהַד Hos. vi. 1). הַשָּׁה is the accusative of the object to it; and the accusative of the predicate is doubled: His covering, His pavilion round about Him. In Job xxxvi. 29 also the thunder-clouds are called God's סִבָּה, and also in xcvi. 2 they are סִבְּיָיו, concealing Him on all sides and announcing only His presence when He is wroth. In ver. 12b the accusative of the object, הַשָּׁה, is expanded into "darkness of waters", i. e. swelling with waters* and billows of thick vapour, thick, and therefore dark, masses (עַב in its primary meaning of denseness, or a thicket, Exod. xix. 9, cf. Jer. iv. 29) of שְׁחָקִים, which is here a poetical name for fleecy clouds. The dispersion and discharge, according to ver. 13, proceeded from נָגַה נְגַדָּה. Such is the expression for the doxa of God as being a mirroring forth of His nature, as it were, over against Him, as being therefore His brightness, or the reflection of His glory. The doxa is fire and light. On this occasion the forces of wrath issue from it, and therefore it is the fiery forces: heavy and destructive hail (cf. Exod. ix. 23 sq., Isa. xxx. 30) and fiery glowing coals, i. e. flashing and kindling lightning. The object עָבִי stands first, because the idea of clouds, behind which, according to ver. 11, the doxa is concealed, is prominently connected with the doxa. It might be rendered: before His brightness His clouds turn into hail . . . , a rendering which would be more in accordance with the structure of the stichs, and is possible according to Ges. § 138, rem. 2. Nevertheless, in connection with the combination of עָבִי with clouds, the idea of breaking through (Lam. iii. 44) is very natural. If עָבִי is removed, then עָבִי signifies "thence came forth hail . . ." But the mention of the clouds as the medium, is both natural and appropriate.

Vers. 14—16. Amidst thunder, Jahve hurled lightnings as arrows upon David's enemies, and the breath of His anger laid bare the beds of the flood to the very centre of the earth, in order to rescue the sunken one. Thunder is the rumble of God, and as it were the hollow murmur of His mouth, Job xxxvii. 2. עֲלִיוֹן, the Most High, is the name of God as the inapproachable Judge, who governs all things. The third line of ver. 14 is erroneously repeated from the preceding strophe. It cannot be supported on grammatical grounds by Ex. ix. 23, since נָתַן קוֹל, edere vocem, has a different meaning from the נָתַן קוֹלָהּ, dare tonitrua, of that passage. The symmetry of the strophe structure is also against it; and it is wanting both in 2 Sam. and in the LXX. כִּי, which, as the opposite of מְעַט Neh. ii. 12, Isa. x. 7, means adverbially "in abundance", is the parallel to הִשְׁלַח. It is generally taken, after the analogy of Gen. xlix. 23, in the sense of בָּרַק, cxliv. 6: רַב in pause = רַב (the ō passing over into the broader ā like ן instead of נ in Gen. xlix. 3) = רַב, cognate with רָבָה, רָמָה; but the forms רַב, רַב, here, and in every other instance, have but a very questionable existence, as e. g. רַב, Isa. liv. 13; is more probably an adjective than the third person præt. (cf. Böttcher, Neue Aehrenlese No. 635, 1066). The suffixes em do not refer to the arrows, i. e. lightnings, but to David's foes. הִמָּם means both to put in commotion and to destroy by confounding, Exod. xiv. 24, xxiii. 27. In addition to the thunder, the voice of Jahve, comes the stormwind, which is the snorting of the breath of His nostrils. This makes the channels of the waters visible and lays bare the foundations of the earth. פִּיֵּן (collateral form to פִּיֵּן) is the bed of the river and then the river or brook itself, a continendo aquas (Ges.), and exactly like the Arabic mesik, mesāk, mesek (from مسك, the VI. form of which, tamāsaka, corresponds to פִּיֵּן), means a place that does not admit of the water soaking in, but on account of the firmness of the soil preserves it standing or flowing. What are here meant are the water-courses or river beds that hold the water. It is only needful for Jahve to threaten (ἐπιτιμᾶν Mat. viii. 26) and the floods, in which he, whose rescue is undertaken here, is sunk, flee (civ. 7) and dry up (cvi. 9, Nah. i. 4). But he is already half engulfed in the abyss of Hades, hence not merely the bed of the flood is opened up, but the earth is rent to its very centre. From the language being here so thoroughly allegorical, it is clear that we were quite correct in interpreting the description as ideal. He, who is nearly overpowered by his foes, is represented as one engulfed in deep waters and almost drowning.

Vers. 17—20. Then Jahve stretches out His hand from above into the deep chasm and draws up the sinking one. The verb הִשְׁלַח occurs also in prose (2 Sam. vi. 6) without הִ (lvii. 4, cf. on the other hand the borrowed passage, cxliv. 7) in the signification to reach (after anything). The verb הִשְׁלַח, however, is only found in one other instance, viz.

Exod. ii. 10, as the root (transferred from the Egyptian into the Hebrew) of the name of Moses, and even Luther saw in it an historical allusion, "He hath made a Moses of me", He hath drawn me out of great (many) waters, which had well nigh swallowed me up, as He did Moses out of the waters of the Nile, in which he would have perished. This figurative language is followed, in ver. 18, by its interpretation, just as in cxliv. 7 the "great waters" are explained by מִיַּד בְּנֵי נֶקֶר, which, however, is not suitable here, or at least is too limited.

With ver. 17 the hymn has reached the climax of epic description, from which it now descends in a tone that becomes more and more lyrical. In the combination אֲבִי נָע, נָע is not an adverbial accusative, but an adjective, like רִחֵק מִיָּבֶה cxliii. 10, and ὁ ἀνὴρ ἀγαθός (Hebräerbrief S. 353). בִּי introduces the reason for the interposition of the divine omnipotence, viz. the superior strength of the foe and the weakness of the oppressed one. On the day of his אָוֶד, i. e. (vid. on xxxi. 12) his load or calamity, when he was altogether a homeless and almost defenceless fugitive, they came upon him (קָדַם xvii. 13), cutting off all possible means of delivering himself, but Jahve became the fugitive's staff (xxiii. 4) upon which he leaned and kept himself erect. By the hand of God, out of straits and difficulties he reached a broad place, out of the dungeon of oppression to freedom, for Jahve had delighted in him, he was His chosen and beloved one. הִפְּץ has the accent on the penult here, and Metheg as a sign of the lengthening (הִפְּצָה) beside the ē, that it may not be read ē.* The following strophe tells the reason of his pleasing God and of His not allowing him to perish. This בִּי הִפְּץ בִּי (for He delighted in me) now becomes the primary thought of the song.

Vers. 21—24. On נִגַּל (like שָׁלַם with the accusative not merely of the thing, but also of the person, e. g. 1 Sam. xxiv. 18), εὖ or κακῶς παραττεν τινά, vid. on vii. 5. שָׁמַר, to observe = to keep, is used in the same way in Job xxii. 15.

* In like manner Metheg is placed beside the ē of the final closed syllable that has lost the tone in הִפְּץ xii. 9, וְהִחַזְלִיל xc. 2., vid. Isaiah S. 594 note.

רָשַׁע מִן is a pregnant expression of the malitiosa desertio. "From God's side", i. e. in His judgment, would be contrary to the general usage of the language (for the מִן in Job iv. 17 has a different meaning) and would be but a chilling addition. On the poetical form מָנִי, in pause מְנִי, vid. Ew. § 263, b. The fut. in ver. 23*b*, close after the substantival clause ver. 23*a*, is not intended of the habit in the past, but at the present time: he has not wickedly forsaken God, but (כִּי = imo, sed) always has God's commandments present before him as his rule of conduct, and has not put them far away out of his sight, in order to be able to sin with less compunction; and thus then (fut. consec.) in relation (עִם, as in Deut. xviii. 13, cf. 2 Sam. xxiii. 5) to God he was הִמָּצִי, with his whole soul undividedly devoted to Him, and he guarded himself against his iniquity (עָוֹן, from עָוָה, עָוִי, to twist, pervert, cf. غَوَى of error, delusion, self-enlightenment), i. e. not: against acquiescence in his in-dwelling sin, but: against iniquity becoming in any way his own; מַעֲוִי equivalent to מַעֲוִי (Dan. ix. 5), cf. מַחֲוִי = than that I should live, Jon. iv. 8. In this strophe, this Psalm strikes a cord that harmonises with Ps. xvii., after which it is therefore placed. We may compare David's own testimony concerning himself in 1 Sam. xxvi. 23 sq., the testimony of God in 1 Kings xiv. 8, and the testimony of history in 1 Kings xv. 5, xi. 4.

Vers. 25.—28. What was said in ver. 21 is again expressed here as a result of the foregoing, and substantiated in vers. 26, 27. הַחֵיֶר is a friend of God and man, just as pius is used of behaviour to men as well as towards God. נָבֵר הָמִים the man (construct of נָבֵר) of moral and religious completeness (integri = integritatis, cf. xv. 2), i. e. of undivided devotion to God. נָבֵר (instead of which we find בָּר לָבֵב elsewhere, xxiv. 4, lxxiii. 1) not one who is purified, but, in accordance with the reflexive primary meaning of Niph., one who is purifying himself, ἀγλιζων εαυτόν, 1 John iii. 3. עָקָשׁ (the opposite of אֲשֶׁר) one who is morally distorted, perverse. Freely formed Hithpaels are used with these attributive words to give expression to the corresponding self-manifestation: הִתְחַסֵּד, הִתְחַמֵּם (Ges. § 54, 2, b), הִתְחַבֵּר, and הִתְחַלֵּל (to shew one's self נִפְתָּח or שִׁתְּחַלֵּל). The fervent love of the godly man God requites with confiding love, the entire submission of the upright with a full measure 'of grace, the endeavour after purity by an unobscured charity (cf. lxxiii. 1), moral perverseness by paradoxical judgments, giving the perverse over to his perverseness (Rom. i. 28) and leading him by strange ways to final condemnation (Isa. xxix. 14, cf. Lev. xxvi. 23 sq.). The truth, which is here enunciated, is not that the conception which man forms of God is the reflected image of his own mind and heart, but that God's conduct to man is the reflection of the relation in which man has placed himself to God; cf. 1 Sam. ii. 30, xv. 23. This universal truth is illustrated and substantiated in ver. 28. The people who are bowed down by affliction experience God's condescension, to their salvation; and their haughty oppressors, God's exaltation, to their humiliation. Lofty, proud eyes are among the seven things that Jahve hateth, according to Prov. vi. 17. The judgment of God compels them to humble themselves with shame, Isa. ii. 11.

Vers. 29—31. The confirmation of what has been asserted is continued by David's application of it to himself. Hitzig translates the futures in vers. 29 sq. as imperfects; but the sequence of the tenses, which would bring this rendering with it, is in this instance interrupted, as it has been even in ver. 28, by נִרְאֶה. The lamp, נֵר (contracted from nawer), is an image of life, which as it were burns on and on, including the idea of prosperity and high rank; in the form נֵרִי (from nivr, nijr) it is the usual figurative word for the continuance of the house of David, 1 Kings xi. 36, and frequently. David's life and dominion, as the covenant king, is the lamp which God's favour has lighted for the well-being of Israel, and His power will not allow this lamp (2 Sam. xxi. 17) to be quenched. The darkness which breaks in upon David and his house is always lighted up again by Jahve. For His strength is mighty in the weak; in, with, and by Him he can do all things. The fut. נִרְאֶה may be all the more surely derived from נִרְאֶה (= אִרְאֶה), inasmuch as this verb has the changeable u in the future also in Isa. xlii. 4, Eccl. xii. 6. The text of 2 Sam. xxii., however, certainly seems to put "rushing upon" in the stead of "breaking down". With ver. 31 the first half of the hymn closes epiphonematically. הָאֱלֹהִים is a nom. absol., like הַצִּיּוֹר, Deut. xxxii. 4. This old Mosaic utterance is re-echoed here, as in 2 Sam. vii. 22, in the mouth of David. The article of הָאֱלֹהִים points to God as being manifest in past history. His way is faultless and blameless. His word is צִרְיָה, not slaggy ore, but purified solid gold, xii. 7. Whoever retreats into Him, the God of the promise, is shielded from every danger. Prov. xxx. 5 is borrowed from this passage.

Vers. 32—35. The grateful description of the tokens of favour he has experienced takes a new flight, and is continued in the second half of the Psalm in a more varied and less artificial mixture of the strophes. What is said in ver. 31 of the way and word of Jahve and of Jahve Himself, is confirmed in ver. 32 by the fact that He alone is אֱלֹהִים, a divine being to be revered, and He alone is צִיּוֹר, a rock, i. e. a ground of confidence that cannot be shaken. What is said in ver. 31 consequently can be said only of Him. מִבְּלֵעֵי and זִלְתֵּי alternate; the former (with a negative intensive מִן) signifies "without reference to" and then absolutely "without" or besides, and the latter (with י as a connecting vowel, which elsewhere has also the function of a suffix), from זִלְתָּ (זִלְתָּה), "exception". The verses immediately following are attached descriptively to אֱלֹהֵינוּ, our God (i. e. the God of Israel), the God, who girded me with strength; and accordingly (fut. consec.) made my way רַמְיָם, "perfect", i. e. absolutely smooth, free from stumblings and errors, leading straight forward to a divine goal. The idea is no other than that in ver. 31, cf. Job xxii. 3, except that the freedom from error here is intended to be understood in accordance with its reference to the way of a man, of a king, and of a warrior; cf., moreover, the other text. The verb שָׁוֶה signifies, like سَوَّى, to make equal (æquare), to arrange, to set right; the dependent passage Hab. iii. 19 has, instead of this verb, the more uncoloured שָׁוֶה. The hind, אֵילָה or אֵילָהּ, is the perfection of swiftness (cf. ἔλαφος and ἐλαφρός) and also of gracefulness among animals. "Like the hinds" is equivalent to like hinds' feet; the Hebrew style leaves it to the reader to infer the appropriate point of comparison from the figure. It is not swiftness in flight (De Wette), but in attack and pursuit that is meant, — the latter being a prominent characteristic of warriors, according to 2 Sam. i. 23, ii. 18, 1 Chron. xii. 8. David does not call the high places of the enemy, which he has made his own by conquest “my high places”, but those heights of the Holy Land which belong to him as king of Israel: upon these Jahve preserves him a firm position, so that from them he may rule the land far and wide, and hold them victoriously (cf. passages like Deut. xxxii. 13, Isa. lviii. 14). The verb לָמַד, which has a double accusative in other instances, is here combined with לֵ of the subject taught, as the aim of the teaching. The verb נָחַת (to press down — to bend a bow) precedes the subject “my arms” in the singular; this inequality is admissible even when the subject stands first (e. g. Gen. xlix. 22, Joel i. 20, Zech. vi. 14). קֶשֶׁת נְחוּשֶׁת a bow of brazen = of brass, as in Job xx. 24. It is also the manner of heroes in Homer and in the Ramâjana to press down and bend with their hand a brazen bow, one end of which rests on the ground.

Vers. 36—37. Yet it is not the brazen bow in itself that makes him victorious, but the helpful strength of his God. “Shield of Thy salvation” is that consisting of Thy salvation. מִגִּן has an unchangeable â, as it has always. The salvation of Jahve covered him as a shield, from which every stroke of the foe rebounded; the right hand of Jahve supported him that his hands might not become feeble in the conflict. In its ultimate cause it is the divine עֲנִיּוּהוּ, to which he must trace back his greatness, i. e. God’s lowliness, by virtue of which His eyes look down upon that which is on the earth (cxiii. 6), and the poor and contrite ones are His favourite dwelling-place (Isa. lvii. 15, lxvi. 1 sq.); cf. B. Megilla 31a, “wherever Scripture testifies of the נְבוֹרָה of the Holy One, blessed be He, it gives prominence also, in connection with it, to His condescension, עֲנִיּוּתוֹ, as in Deut. x. 17 and in connection with it ver. 18, Isa. lvii. 15a and 15b, Ps. lxxviii. 5 and 6”. The rendering of Luther, who follows the LXX. and Vulgate, “When Thou humblest me, Thou makest me great” is opposed by the fact that עֲנִיּוּהוּ means the bending of one’s self, and not of another. What is intended is, that condescension of God to mankind, and especially to the house of David, which was in operation, with an ultimate view to the incarnation, in the life of the son of Jesse from the time of his anointing to his death, viz. the divine χρηστότης καὶ φιλανθρωπία (Tit. iii. 4), which elected the shepherd boy to be king, and did not cast him off even when he fell into sin and his infirmities became manifest. To enlarge his steps under any one is equivalent to securing him room for freedom of motion (cf. the opposite form of expression in Prov. iv. 12). Jahve removed the obstacles of his course out of the way, and steeled his ankles so that he stood firm in fight and endured till he came off victorious. The præf. מַעַרְוֹ substantiates what, without any other indication of it, is required by the consecutio temporum, viz. that everything here has a retrospective meaning.

Vers. 38—41. Thus in God's strength, with the armour of God, and by God's assistance in fight, he smote, cast down, and utterly destroyed all his foes in foreign and in civil wars. According to the Hebrew syntax the whole of this passage is a retrospect. The imperfect signification of the futures in vers. 38, 39 is made clear from the aorist which appears in ver. 40, and from the perfects and futures in what follows it. The strophe begins with an echo of Exod. xv. 9 (cf. supra vii. 6). The poet calls his opponents קָמִי, as in ver. 49, xlv. 6, lxxiv. 23, cf. קִימָנִי Job xxii. 20, inasmuch as קָם by itself has the sense of rising up in hostility and consequently one can say קָמִי instead of יָלִי קָמִים (קָמִים 2 Kings xvi. 7).* The frequent use of this phrase (e. g. xxxvi. 13, Lam. i. 14) shews that קָם in ver. 39a does not mean "to stand (resist)", but "to rise (again)." The phrase הִעָרַף, however, which in other passages has those fleeing as its subject (2 Chron. xxix. 6), is here differently applied: Thou gavest, or madest me mine enemies &

* In the language of the Beduins kôm is war, feud, and kômānt (denominative from kôm) my enemy (hostis); kôm also has the signification of a collective of kômānt, and one can equally well say: entum wa-tjānā kôm, you and we are enemies, and: bēnātū kôm, there is war between us.

back, i. e. those who turn back, as in Exod. xxiii. 27. From xxi. 13 (שָׁבוּ אֲחֵינוּ, Symm. τάξεισ ἀποστρέφους) it becomes clear that עָרָךְ is not an accusative of the member beside the accusative of the person (as e. g. in Deut. xxxiii. 11), but an accusative of the factitive object according to Ges. § 139, 2.

Vers. 42—43. Their prayer to their gods, wrung from them by their distress, and even to Jahve, was in vain, because it was for their cause, and too late put up to Him. עַל — אֵל; in xlii. 2 the two prepositions are interchanged. Since we do not pulverize dust, but to dust, כָּפַר is to be taken as describing the result: so that they became as dust (cf. Job xxxviii. 30, כָּאֲבָן, so that it is become like stone, and the extreme of such pregnant brevity of expression in Isa. xli. 2) before the wind (עַל-פָּנָיו as in 2 Chron. iii. 17, before the front). The second figure is to be explained differently: I emptied them out (אֲרִיקָם from הֲרִיק) like the dirt of the streets, i. e. not merely: so that they became such, but as one empties it out, — thus contemptuously, ignominiously and completely (cf. Isa. x. 6, Zech. x. 5). The LXX. renders it λεανῶ from הֲרַק (root רַק to stretch, make thin, cf. tendo tenuis, dehnen dünn); and the text of 2 Sam. xxii. presents the same idea in אֲרִיקָם.

Vers. 44—46. Thus victorious in God, David became what he now is, viz. the ruler of a great kingdom firmly establish both in home and foreign relations. With respect to the נַיִם and the verb הִפְלִטָנִי which follows, רִיבֵי עָם can only be understood of the conflicts among his own people, in which David was involved by the persecution of Saul and the rebellions of Absalom and Sheba the son of Bichri and from which Jahve delivered him, in order to preserve him for his calling of world-wide dominion in accordance with the promise. We therefore interpret the passage according to עַם בְּרִיחַ in Isa. xlix. 8., and קָנְאוּ-עָם in Isa. xxvi. 11; whereas the following עַם comes to have a foreign application by reason of the attributive clause לֹא-יִדְעוּהָ (Ges. § 123, 3). The Niph. נִשְׁמַע in ver. 45 is the reflexive of שָׁמַע, to obey (e. g. Ex. xxiv. 7), and is therefore to be rendered: shew themselves obedient (= Ithpa. in Dan. vii. 27). אֲנִי לְשִׁמְעָאֵן implies more than that they obeyed at the word; שָׁמַע אָזְנוֹ means information, rumour, and שָׁמַע אָזְנוֹ is the opposite of personal observation (Job xlii. 5), it is therefore to be rendered: they submitted even at the tidings of my victories; and 2 Sam. viii. 9 sq. is an example of this. כָּבַד to lie, disown, feign, and flatter, is used here, as it is frequently, of the extorted humility which the vanquished shew towards the conqueror. Ver. 46 completes the picture of the reason of the sons of a foreign country "putting a good face on a bad game". They faded away, i. e. they became weak and faint-hearted (Ex xviii. 18), incapable of holding out against or breaking through any siege by David, and trembled, surrendering at discretion, out of their close places, i. e. out of their strongholds behind which they had shut themselves in (cf. cxlii. 8). The signification of being alarmed, which in this instance, being found in combination with a local מִן, is confined to the sense of terrified flight, is secured to the verb חָרַג by the Arabic خَرَجَ (root ح ر ج, of audible pressure, crowding, and the like) to be pressed, crowded, tight, or narrow, to get in a strait, and the Targumic חָרַגָּא רְמוּחָא — אִמְחָא רְמוּחָא (vid. the Targums on Deut. xxxii. 25). חָלַל to limp, halt, which is compared by Hitzig, is far removed as to the sound; and the most natural, but colourless خَرَجَ, to go out of (according to its radical meaning — cf. خَرَقَ, خَرَعَ &c. —: to break forth, erumpere), cannot be supported in Hebrew or Aramaic. The יָרָגוּ found in the borrowed passage in Micah, ch. vii. 17, favours our rendering.

Vers. 47—49. The hymn now draws towards the end with praise and thanksgiving for the multitude of God's mighty deeds, which have just been displayed. Like the (צוּרֵי) כָּרוּךְ which is always doxological, חַי ה' (vivus Jahve) is meant as a predicate clause, but is read with the accent of an exclamation just as in the formula of an oath, which is the same expression; and in the present instance it has a doxological meaning. Accordingly וַיָּרֹם also signifies "exalted be," in which sense it is written וַיָּרֹם — וַיָּרֹם in the other text. There are three doxological utterances drawn from the events which have just been celebrated in song. That which follows, from הַאֵל onwards, describes Jahve once more as the living, blessed (εὐλογητός), and exalted One, which He has shewn Himself to be. From הַדָּבָר we see that הַנְּוֹרָן is to be resolved as an imperfect. The proofs of vengeance, הַנְּקָמָה, are called God's gift, insofar as He has rendered it possible to him to punish the attacks upon his own dignity and the dignity of his people, or to witness the punishment of such insults (e. g. in the case of Nabal); for divine vengeance is a securing by punishment (vindicatio) of the inviolability of the right. It is questionable whether הַדְּבִיר (synonym הַדָּבָר, cxliv. 2) here and in xlvi. 4 means "to bring to reason" as an intensive of הַדָּבָר, to drive (Ges.); the more natural meaning is "to turn the back" according to the Arabic adbara (Hitzig), cf. dabar, dabre, flight, retreat; dabira to be wounded behind; medbûr, wounded in the back. The idea from which הַדְּבִיר gains the meaning "to subdue" is that of flight, in which hostile nations, overtaken from behind, sank down under him (xl. 6); but the idea that is fully worked out in cxxix. 3, Isa. li. 23, is by no means remote. With מִפְּלִטִי the assertion takes the form of an address. הַנְּוֹרָם מִן does not differ from ix. 14: Thou liftest me up away from mine enemies, so that I hover above them and triumph over them. The climactic אֵף, of which poetry is fond, here unites two thoughts of a like import to give intensity of expression to the one idea. The participle is followed by futures: his manifold experience is concentrated in one general ideal expression.

Vers. 50—51. The praise of so blessed a God, who acts towards David as He has promised him, shall not be confined within the narrow limits of Israel. When God's anointed makes war with the sword upon the heathen, it is, in the end, the blessing of the knowledge of Jahve for which he opens up the way, and the salvation of Jahve, which he thus mediatorially helps on. Paul has a perfect right to quote ver. 50 of this Psalm (Rom. xv. 9), together with Deut. xxxii. 43 and Ps. cxvii. 1, as proof that salvation belongs to the Gentiles also, according to the divine purpose of mercy. What is said in ver. 51 as the reason and matter of the praise that shall go forth beyond Israel, is an echo of the Messianic promises in 2 Sam. vii. 12—16 which is perfectly reconcileable with the Davidic authorship of the Psalm, as Hitzig acknowledges. And Theodoret does not wrongly appeal to the closing words עַל־עֹלָם against the Jews. In whom, but in Christ, the son of David, has the fallen throne of David any lasting continuance, and in whom, but in Christ, has all that has been promised to the seed of David eternal truth and reality? The praise of Jahve, the God of David, His anointed, is, according to its ultimate import, a praising of the Father of Jesus Christ.

PSALM XVIII. ACCORDING TO THE TEXT OF 2 SAM. XXII.

On the differences of the introductory superscription, see on xviii. 1. The relation of the prose accentuation of the Psalm in 2 Sam. xxii. to the poetical accentuation in the Psalter is instructive. Thus, for example, instead of Mercha mahpach. (Olewejored) in the Psalter we here find Athnach; instead of the Athnach following upon Mercha mahpach., here is Zakeph (cf. xviii. 7, 16, 31 with 2 Sam. xxii. 7, 16, 31); instead of Rebia mugrash, here Tiphcha (cf. xviii. 4 with 2 Sam. xxii. 4); instead of Pazer at the beginning of a verse, here Athnach (cf. Ps. xviii. 2 with 2 Sam. xxii. 2).* The peculiar mode of writing the stichs, in which we find this song in our editions, is the old traditional mode. If a half-line is placed above a half-line, so that they form two columns, it is called אַרְיָה עַל־גִּבִּי לְבָנָה אַרְיָה עַל־גִּבִּי אַרְיָה, brick upon brick, a half-brick upon a half-brick, as the song Haazinu in Deut. xxxii. is set out in our editions. On the other hand if the half-lines appear as they do here divided and placed in layers one over another, it is called אַרְיָה עַל־גִּבִּי לְבָנָה וּלְבָנָה עַל־גִּבִּי אַרְיָה. According to Megilla 16*b* all the cantica in the Scriptures are to be written thus; and according to Sofrim xiii., Ps. xviii. has this form in common with 2 Sam. xxii.

Vers. 2—4. This strophe is stunted by the falling away of its monostichic introit, xviii. 2. In consequence of this, the vocatives in vers. 2 sq. are deprived of their support and lowered to substantival clauses: Jahve is my Rock, &c., which form no proper beginning for a hymn. Instead of וּמִפְּלִי we have, as in cxliv. 2, וּמִפְּלִי לִי; and instead of וְאֵלֵי צוּרֵי we find אֵלֵהֶי צוּרֵי, which is contrary to the usual manner of arranging these emblematical names. The loss the strophe sustains is compensated by the addition: and my Refuge, my Saviour, who savest me from violence. In ver. 4b as in ver. 49b the non-assimilated מִן (cf. ver. 14, xxx. 4, lxxiii. 19) is shortened into an assimilated one. May לִי perhaps be the remains of the obliterated אֵלֵי, and אֵלֵהֶי, as it were, the clothing of the צוּרֵי which was then left too bare?

Vers. 5—7. The connection of this strophe with the preceding by כִּי accords with the sense, but is tame. On the other hand, the reading מִשְׁבְּרֵי instead of חֲבָלֵי (even though the author of cxvi. 3 may have thus read it) is commended by the parallelism, and by the fact, that now the latter figure is not repeated in vers. 5, 6. מִשְׁבְּרֵי are not necessarily waves that break upon the shore, but may also be such as break one upon another, and consequently אֶתְפַּנִּי is not inadmissible. The ו of וְנִחַלִי of ו, which is not wanted, is omitted. Instead of the fuller toned form מִקְבֻנֵי, which is also more commensurate with the closing cadence of the verse, we have here the usual syncopated סִבְנֵי (cf. cxviii. 11). The repetition of the אֶקְרָא (instead of אֲשַׁעֵ) is even more unpoetical than the repetition of חֲבָלֵי would be. On the other hand, it might originally have been וְיִשְׁמַע instead of יִשְׁמַע; without ו it is an expression (intended retrospectively) of what takes place simultaneously, with ו it expresses the principal fact. The concluding line וְשִׁנְעָתִי בְּאֹזְנֵי is stunted: the brief substantival clause is not meaningless (cf. Job xv. 21, Isa. v. 9), but is only a fragment of the more copious, fuller toned conclusion of the strophe which we find in the Psalter.

Vers. 8—10. The Keri here obliterates the significant alternation of the Kal and Hithpa. of נָעַשׂ. Instead of וּמִצְדֵי we have the feminine form of the plural מוֹסְדוֹת (as in both texts in ver. 16) without ו. Instead of the genitive הַרִים, by an extension of the figure, we have הַשָּׁמַיִם (cf. the pillars, Job xxvi. 11), which is not intended of the mountains as of Atlases, as it were, supporting the heavens, but of the points of support and central points of the heavens themselves: the whole universe trembles.

Vers. 11—13. Instead of the pictorial וַיִּרְאֵהוּ (Deut. xxviii. 49, and hence in Jeremiah), which is generally used of the flight of the eagle, we have the plain, uncoloured וַיִּרְאֵהוּ He appeared. Instead of יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה, which is intended as an aorist, we meet the more strictly regular, but here, where so many aorists with ו come together, less poetical וַיִּשְׁתַּחֲוֶה. In ver. 12a the rise and fall of the parallel members has grown over till it forms one heavy clumsy line: And made darkness round about Him a pavilion (סִבּוֹת). But the ἀπ. λεγ. הַשְׂרָרָה, to which the signification of a "massive gathering together" is secured by the Arabic, is perhaps original. The word حشر, frequently used in the Koran of assembling to judgment, with the radical signification stipare, cogere (to crowd together, compress) which is also present in حاش, حاشی, حشد, is here used like ἀγείρειν in the Homeric νεφέληγερέτα (the cloud-gatherer).* Ver. 13 is terribly mutilated. Of וַיִּרְאֵהוּ עָרְרוּ בָרָד of the other text there are only the four letters בָּעָרְרוּ (as in ver. 9c) left.

Vers. 14—16. Instead of וַיִּרְעַם we find יִרְעַם, which is less admissible here, where a principal fact is related and the description is drawing nearer and nearer to its goal. Instead of מִן־שָׁמַיִם the other text has בְּשָׁמַיִם; in xxx. 4 also, מן is retained without being assimilated before ש. But the fact, however, that the line וַיִּנְחַל־אֵשׁ בָּרָד is wanting, is a proof, which we welcome, that it is accidentally repeated from the preceding strophe, in the other text. On the other hand, הַצִּיּוֹן is inferior to הַצִּיּוֹן רָב; וַיִּבְרְקוּ רָב is corrupted into a tame בָּרָק; and the Keri וַיִּהָרְגוּ erroneously assumes that the suffix of וַיִּפְצְצוּ refers to the arrows, i. e. lightnings. Again on the other hand, אֲפִיקַי יָם, channels of the sea, is perhaps original; מים in this connection expresses too little, and, as being the customary word in combination with אפיקי (xlii. 2, Joel i. 20), may easily have been substituted after it. At any rate ים and הַבַּל form a more exact antithesis. תָּלוּ instead of וַיִּגְלוּ is the same in meaning. The close of the strophe is here also weakened by the obliteration of the address to God: by (בְּ instead of the מְ of the other text) the threatening of Jahve, at the snorting of His breath of anger. The change of the preposition in this surge (so-to-speak) of the members of the verse is rather interruptive than pleasing.

Vers. 17—20. The variant מְשַׁנְּאֵי instead of וּמְשַׁנְּאֵי is unimportant; but מְשַׁעֵן instead of לְמַשְׁעֵן, for a support, is less pleasing both as it regards language and rhythm. The resolution of וּוּצִיאֵנִי into אֲחִי . . . וַיִּצֵּא is a clumsy and needless emphasising of the me.

Vers. 21—24. Instead of בְּצַדִּיקִי, we find בְּצַדִּיקָתִי here and in ver. 25, contrary to usage of the language of the Psalms (cf. vii. 9 with 1 King viii. 32). Instead of the poetical אָסִיר מִנִּי (Job xxvii. 5, xxiii. 12) we have אָסִיר מִפְּנֵה (with the fem. used as a neuter), according to the common phrase in 2 Kings iii. 3, and frequently (cf. Deut. v. 32). Instead of וְאֵהִי, the not less (e. g. cii. 8) usual וְאֵהְיֶה; and instead of וְאִשְׁתַּמֵּר, the form with ah of direction which occurs very frequently with the first person of the fut. con-vers. in the later Hebrew, although it does also occur even in the older Hebrew (iii. 6, vii. 5, Gen. xxxii. 6, Job xix. 20). And instead of עָמַן we find לוֹ, which does not commend itself, either as a point of language or of rhythm; and by comparison with vers. 26, 27, it certainly is not original.

Vers. 25—28. On בְּצַדִּיקָתִי see ver. 21. בְּבָרִי is without example, since elsewhere בַּר יָדַיִם (בְּפִיָּים) is the only expression for innocence. In the equally remarkable expression גְּבוּרַת הַמַּיִם (the upright "man of valour"), גְּבוּרַת is used just as in the expression גְּבוּרַת הַיָּם. The form הַתְּבַר, has only the sound of an assimilated Hithpa. like תְּחַמֵּם (= חַחַמֵּם), and is rather a reflexive of the Hiph. הִבֵּר after the manner of the Aramaic Ittaphal (therefore — הַתְּבַר); and the form תְּחַפֵּל sounds altogether like a Hithpa. from תְּחַל (thou shewest thyself insipid, absurd, foolish), but — since תְּחַלֵּה cannot be ascribed to God (Job i. 22), and is even unseemly as an expression — appears to be treated likewise as an Ittaphal with a kind of inverted assimilation — הִתְהַפְּתָל (Böttcher). They are contractions such as are sometimes allowed by the dialect of the common people, though contrary to all rules. וַיֵּאָחַ instead of כִּי at the beginning of ver. 28 changes what is confirmatory into a mere continuation of the foregoing. One of the most sensible variations is the change of וְעֵינַיִם רְמוֹת וְעֵינַיִךְ עַל־רָמִים to וְעֵינַיִךְ עַל־רָמִים. The rendering: And Thine eyes (are directed down) upon the haughty that Thou mayst bring (them) low (Stier, Hengst., and others), violates the accentuation and is harsh so far as the language is concerned (לְהַשְׁפִּילִים for הַשְׁפִּיל). Hitzig renders it, according to the accents: And Thou lowerest Thine eyes against the proud, הַשְׁפִּיל עֵינַיִם = הַפִּיל פְּנִים (Jer. iii. 12). But one would expect כִּי instead of עַל, if this were the meaning. It is better to render it according to Ps. cxiii. 6: And Thou dost cast down Thine eyes upon the haughty, in which rendering the haughty are represented as being far beneath Jahve notwithstanding their haughtiness, and the “casting down or depressing of the eyes” is an expression of the utmost contempt (despectus).

Vers. 29—31. Here in ver. 29a תֵּאָוִיר has been lost, for Jahve is called, and really is, אֵוִיר in xxvii. 1, but not נִיר. The form of writing נִיר is an incorrect wavering between נִיר and נִיר. The repetition וַיְהוּה וַיְהוּה, by which the loss of תֵּאָוִיר, and of אֵלֶיךָ in ver. 29b, is covered, is inelegant. We have הִבָּה here instead of בָּהֶךָ, as twice besides in the Old Testament. The form of writing אָרוֹץ, as Isa. xlii. 4 shews, does not absolutely require that we should derive it from רוֹץ; nevertheless רוֹץ can be joined with the accusative just as well as דָּלַג, in the sense of running against, rushing upon; therefore, since the parallelism is favourable, it is to be rendered: by Thee I rush upon a troop. The omission of the ו before בְּאֵלֶיךָ is no improvement to the rhythm.

Vers. 32—35. The variety of expression in ver. 32 which has been preserved in the other text is lost here. Instead of הַמְּאֹרְנֵי חַיִל we find, as if from a faded MS., מְעוֹן חַיִל (according to Norzi מְעוֹןי) my refuge (lit. hiding) of strength, i. e. my strong refuge, according to a syntactically more elegant style of expression (= מעוזו קעז חיל), like lxxi. 7, Lev. vi. 3, xxvi. 42; vid. Nägelsbach § 63, g, where it is correctly shewn, that this mode of expression is a matter of necessity in certain instances.* The form of writing, קעזי, seems here to recognise a קעז, a hiding-place, refuge, = معاذ, which is different from קעז a fortress (from קעז); but just as in every other case the punctuation confuses the two substantives (vid. on xxxi. 3), so it does even here, since קעז, from קעז, ought to be inflected מעוזי, like מניסי, and not קעזי. Nevertheless the plena scriptio may avail to indicate to us, that here קעז is intended to be a synonym of מרחסה. Instead of ויחן (חמים ררבי) we have ויחן here; perhaps it is He let, or caused, my way to be spotless, i. e. made it such. Thus Ewald renders it by referring to the modern Arabic حلى to let, cause [Germ. lassen, French faire] = to make, effect; even the classic ancient Arabic language uses ترك (lassen) in the sense of جعل (to make), e. g. "I have made (تركت) the sword my camp-companion", i. e. my inseparable attendant (lit. I have caused it to be such), as it is to be translated in Nöldecke's Beiträge zur Kenntniss der Poesie der alten Araber, S. 131.** Or does החיר retain its full and

* In the present instance מעוזו חילי, like מעוזו עזי in lxxi. 7 (cf. Ezek. xvi. 27, xviii. 7, and perhaps Hab. iii. 8) would not be inadmissible, although in the other mode of expression greater prominence is given to the fact of its being provided and granted by God. But in cases like the following it would be absolutely inadmissible to append the suffix to the nom. rectum, viz. שניאי שקר xxxviii. 20; בריתי יעקב; my covenant with Jacob, Lev. xxvi. 42; מדי בר; his garment of linen, Lev. vi. 3; פתחיהם הפתחיהם; their ancestral register, Ezra ii. 62; and it is probable that this transference of the pronominal suffix to the nom. regens originated in instances like these, where it was a logical necessary and then became transferred to the syntax ornata. At the same time it is clear from this, that in cases like שניאי שקר, and consequently also שניאי חנם, the second notion is not conceived as an accusative of more precise definition, but as a governed genitive.

** Ibid. S. 133, Z. 13 is, with Fleischer, to be rendered: ye have made (تركتم) my milk camels restless, i. e. caused them to be such, by having stolen them and driven them away so that they now yearn after home and their young ones.

proper meaning "to unfetter"? This is more probable, since the usage of Hebrew shews no example of הִתִּיר in the post-biblical signification "to allow, permit", which ought to form the transition to "to cause to be = to effect". Therefore we may compare on the contrary Koran ix. 15, challu seb-lahum loose their way, i. e. let them go forth free, and render it: He unfettered, unbound, left to itself, let my way go on as faultless (unobstructed). Hitzig, following the Chethib דרכו, renders it differently: "and made the upright skip on his way." But חמים beside דרכו is to be regarded at the outset as its predicate, and הִתִּיר means "to cause to jump up", Hab. iii. 6, not "to skip along". Nevertheless, the Chethib דרכו, which, from the following Chethib רגליו, bears the appearance of being designed, at any rate seems to have understood חמים personally: He unfettered (expedit) the upright his way, making his feet like &c. The reading וְנָחָה instead of וְנָחָה, although admissible so far as the syntax is concerned (Ges. § 147, a), injures the flow of the rhythm.

Vers. 36—37. The pentastich is stunted here by the falling away of the middle line of ver. 36: and Thy right hand supported me. Instead of the expressive וְעִנְיָהֶךָ (and Thy condescension) we find here וְעִנְיָהֶךָ which, in accordance with the usage of the language, does not mean Thy being low (Hengst.), but rather: Thy labour (Böttch.), or more securely: Thine answering, LXX. ὑπακοή (i. e. the actual help, where-with Thou didst answer my prayer). Instead of הִתְחַיֵּי we find, as also in vers. 40, 48, הִתְחַיֵּי with a verbal suffix, like וְעָרַר in cxxxix. 11; it is perhaps an inaccuracy of the common dialect, which confused the genitive and accusative suffix. But instances of this are not wanting even in the written language, Ges. § 103, rem. 3.

Vers. 38—41. The cohortative אֲרִדְפָהּ, as frequently, has the sense of a hypothetical antecedent, whether it refers to the present, as in cxxxix. 8, or to the past as in lxxiii. 16 and here: in case I pursued. In the text in the Psalter it is וְאֲשִׁיבֵם, here it is וְאֲשִׁיבֵם, by which the echo of Exod. xv. is obliterated. And after עַד-כְּלוֹחֵם how tautological is the וְאֲכַלֵּם which is designed to compensate for the shortening of the verse! The verse, to wit, is shortened at the end, וְלֹא יִקְמוּן וְלֹא יִכְלוּ קוּם being transformed into וְלֹא יִקְמוּן. Instead of

Vers. 42—43. Instead of וַיִּשְׁעוּ we have וַיִּשְׁעוּ, a substitution which is just tolerable: they look forth for help, or even: they look up expectantly to their gods, Isa. xvii. 8, xxxi. 1. The two figurative expressions in ver. 43, however, appear here, in contrast with the other text, in a distorted form: And I pulverised them as the dust of the earth, as the mire of the street did I crush them, I trampled them down. The lively and expressive figure כַּעֲפָר עַל-פְּנֵי רֹחַ is weakened into כַּעֲפָר-אָרֶץ. Instead of אָרִיקָם, we have the overloaded glossarial אָרִיקָם אָרִיקָם. The former (root רָק, רָךְ, to break in pieces) is a word that is interchanged with the אָרִיקָם of the other text in the misapprehended sense of אָרִיקָם. The latter (root רָק, to stretch, to make broad, thin, and compact) looks like a gloss of this אָרִיקָם. Since one does not intentionally either crush or trample upon the dirt of the street nor tread it out thin or broad, we must in this instance take not merely כַּעֲפָר-אָרֶץ but also כְּמִיטְחֻצוֹת as expressing the issue or result.

Vers. 44—46. The various reading עָמִי רִיבֵי proceeds from the correct understanding, that רִיבֵי refers to David's contentions within his kingdom. The supposition that עָמִי is a plur. apoc. and equivalent to עָמִים, as it is to all appearance in cxliv. 2, and like מְנִי = מְנִים xlvi. 9, has no ground here. The reasonable variation תִּשְׁמְרֵנִי harmonises with עָמִי: Thou hast kept me (preserved me) for a head of the nations, viz. by not allowing David to become deprived of the throne by civil foes. The two lines of ver. 45 are reversed, and not without advantage. The Hithpa. יִתְבַּהֲשִׁי instead of the Piel יִבְהֲשִׁי (cf. lxvi. 3, lxxxii. 16) is the reflexive of the latter: they made themselves flatterers (cf. the Niph. Deut. xxxiii. 29: to shew themselves flattering, like the ישמעו which follows here, audientes se præstabant = obediebant). Instead of (און) לשמע we have here, in a similar signification, but less elegant, (און) לשמוע according to the hearing of the ear, i. e. hearsay. Instead of וידרנו we find וידרנו, which is either a transposition of the letters as a solecism (cf. פריץ 2 Sam. xiii. 27 for פצר), or used in a peculiar signification. "They gird (accincti prodeunt)" does not give any suitable meaning to this picture of voluntary submission. But הגר (whence Talmudic הגר lame) may have signified "to limp" in the dialect of the people, which may be understood of those who drag themselves along with difficulty and reluctance (Hitz.). "Out of their closed places (castles)", here with the suff. ām instead of ēhēm.

Vers. 47—49. The צור thrust into ver. 47*b* is troublesome. וירם (without any necessity for correcting it to וירם) is optative, cf. Gen. xxvii. 31, Prov. ix. 4, 16. Instead of וידבר we have ומריר and who subdueth, which is less significant and so far as the syntax is concerned less elegant. Also here consequently תרחני for תרחני. Instead of מפלי we find ומוציא and who bringeth me forth out of my enemies, who surround me — a peculiar form of expression and without support elsewhere (for it is different in ver. 20). The poetical אף is exchanged for the prose מקמי for מקמי, and הים (איש) for המים (איש); the last being a plur. (cxl. 2, 5, Prov. iv. 17), which is foreign to the genuine Davidic Psalms.

Vers. 50—51. The change of position of יהוה in ver. 50*a*, as well as אומר for אומרה, is against the rhythm; the latter, moreover, is contrary to custom, lvii. 10, cviii. 4. While מגדל of the other text is not pointed מגדל, but מגדל, it is corrected in this text from מגדל into מגדול tower of salvation — a figure that recalls lxi. 4, Prov. xviii. 10, but is obscure and somewhat strange in this connection; moreover, migdol for migdal, a tower, only occurs elsewhere in the Old Testament as a proper name.

If we now take one more glance over the mutual relationship of the two texts, we cannot say that both texts equally partake of the original. With the exception of the correct omission of ver. 14*c* and the readings חשרת, משברי and אפיקי there is scarcely anything in the text of 2 Sam.

xxii. that specially commends itself to us. That this text is a designed, and perhaps a Davidic, revision of the other text (Hengst.), is an assumption that is devoid of reason and appearance; for in 2 Sam. xxii. we have only a text that varies in some instances, but not a substantially new form of the text. The text in 2 Sam. xxii., as it has shewn us, is founded upon careless written and oral transmission. The rather decided tendency towards a defective form of writing leads one to conjecture the greater antiquity of the copy from which it is taken. It is easy to understand how poetical passages inserted in historical works were less carefully dealt with. It is characteristic of the form of the text of the Psalm in 2 Sam. xxii., that in not a few instances the licences of popular expression have crept into it. There is some truth in what Böttcher says, when he calls the text in the Psalter the recension of the priests and that in the Second Book of Samuel the recension of the laity.

PSALM XIX.

PRAYER TO GOD, WHOSE REVELATION OF HIMSELF IS TWOFOLD.

- 2 THE heavens are telling the glory of God,
And the work of His hands doth the firmament declare.
- 3 Day unto day poureth forth speech,
And night unto night sheweth knowledge —
- 4 There is no speech and there are no words,
Whose voice is inaudible.
- 5 Into all lands is their line gone forth,
And to the end of the world their utterances:
To the sun hath He appointed a tabernacle there.
- 6 And he is like a bridegroom coming out of his chamber,
He rejoiceth as a strong man to run his course.
- 7 From the end of the heaven is his going forth
And his circuit unto the end of it,
And nothing can hide itself from his heat.

- 8 The Law of Jahve is spotless, restoring the soul;
The testimony of Jahve is sure,
making wise the simple.
- 9 The statutes of Jahve are right,
rejoicing the heart;
The commandment of Jahve is pure,
enlightening the eyes;
- 10 The fear of Jahve is clean enduring for ever;
The decisions of Jahve are truth, righteous altogether.
- 11 More to be desired are they than gold,
and much fine gold,
And sweeter than honey
and honey-comb.
- 12 Moreover Thy servant is instructed by them,
in keeping them there is great reward.
- 13 As for errors who observeth them?! From hidden sins do Thou pronounce me clear!
- 14 Also from presumptuous sins keep Thy servant back, that they may not have dominion over me!
Then shall I be guiltless and clean from great transgression.
- 15 Thus let be acceptable the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart Before Thy face, O Jahve, my rock and my Redeemer!!

In the inscription of Ps. xviii. David is called עֶבֶר יְהוָה, and in Ps. xix. he gives himself this name. In both Psalms, in the former at the beginning, in the latter at the close, he calls upon Jahve by the name צוּרִי, my rock. These and other points of contact (Symbolæ p. 49) have concurred to lead the collector to append Ps. xix., which celebrates God's revelation of Himself in nature and in the Law, to Ps. xviii., which celebrates God's revelation of Himself in the history of David. The view, that in Ps. xix. we have before us two torsi blown together from some quarter or other, is founded upon a defective insight into the relationship, which accords with a definite plan, of the two halves vers. 2—7, 8—15, as Hitzig has recently shewn in opposition to that view. The poet begins with the praise of the glory of God the Creator, and rises from this to the praise of the mercy of God the Lawgiver; and thus through the praise, springing from wondering and loving adoration, he clears the way to the prayer for justification and sanctification. This prayer grows out of the praise of the mercy of the God who has revealed Himself in His word, without coming back to the first part, vers. 2—7. For, as Lord Bacon says, the heavens indeed tell of the glory of God, but not of His will, according to which the poet prays to be pardoned and sanctified. Moreover, if we suppose the Psalm to be called forth by the aspect of the heavens by day, just as Ps. viii. was by the aspect of the heavens by night, then the unity of this praise of the two revelations of God becomes still more clear. It is morning, and the psalmist rejoices on the one hand at the dawning light of day, and on the other he prepares himself for the day's work lying before him, in the light of the Tôra. The second part, just like the first part, consists of fourteen lines, and each of them is naturally divided into a six and an eight line strophe. But in the second part, in the place of the short lines comes the cæsural schema, which as it were bounds higher, draws deeper breaths and surges as the rise and fall of the waves, for the Tôra inspires the psalmist more than does the sun. And it is also a significant fact, that in the first part God is called אֱלֹהִים according to his relationship of power to the world, and is only mentioned once; whereas in the second part, He is called by His covenant name יְהוָה, and mentioned seven times, and the last time by a threefold name, which brings the Psalm to a close with a full toned יְהוָה צוּרֵי וְנֹאֲלֵי. What a depth of meaning there is in this distinction of the revelation of God, the Redeemer, from the revelation of God, the Creator!

The last strophe presents us with a sharply sketched soteriology in nuce. If we add Ps. xxxii., then we have the whole of the way of salvation in almost Pauline clearness and definiteness. Paul, moreover, quotes both Psalms; they were surely his favourites.

Vers. 2—4. The heavens, i. e. the superterrestrial spheres, which, so far as human vision is concerned, are lost in infinite space, declare how glorious is God, and indeed לַאֲ, as the Almighty; and what His hands have made, i. e. what He has produced with a superior power to which everything is possible, the firmament, i. e. vault of heaven stretched out far and wide and as a transparency above the earth (Græco-Veneta τάμα = ἔκταμα, from רָקַע, root רָק, to stretch, טֵלַעַי), distinctly expresses. The sky and firmament are not conceived of as conscious beings which the middle ages, in dependence upon Aristotle (vid. Maimonides, More Nebuchim ii. 5), believed could be proved from this passage, cf. Neh. ix. 6, Job xxxviii. 7. Moreover, Scripture knows nothing of the "music of the spheres" of the Pythagoreans. What is meant is, as the old expositors correctly say, objectivum vocis non articulatae præconium. The doxa, which God has conferred upon the creature as the reflection of His own, is reflected back from it, and given back to God as it were in acknowledgment of its origin. The idea of perpetuity, which lies even in the participle, is expanded in ver. 3. The words of this discourse of praise are carried forward in an uninterrupted line of transmission. רָבִיעַ (fr. נָבַע, root נָב, to gush forth, nearly allied to which, however, is also the root בָּע, to spring up) points to the richness with which, as from an inexhaustible spring, the testimony passes on from one day to the next. The parallel word רָבִיעַ is an unpictorial, but poetic, word that is more Aramaic than Hebrew (= רָבִיעַ). אֲמִרָה also belongs to the more elevated style; the γλωσσὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ deposited in the creature, although not reflected, is here called דְּעִרָה. The poet does not say that the tidings proclaimed by the day, if they gradually die away as the day declines, are taken up by the night, and the tidings of the night by the day; but (since the knowledge proclaimed by the day concerns the visible works of God by day, and that proclaimed by the night, His works by night), that each dawning day continues the speech of that which has declined, and each approaching night takes up the tale of that which has passed away (Psychol. S. 347, tr. p. 408). If ver. 4 were to be rendered

“there is no speech and there are no words, their voice is inaudible”, i. e. they are silent, speechless witnesses, uttering no sound, but yet speaking aloud (Hengst.), only inwardly audible but yet intelligible everywhere (Then.): then, ver. 5 ought at least to begin with a Waw adversativum, and, moreover, the poet would then needlessly check his fervour, producing a tame thought and one that interrupts the flow of the hymn. To take ver. 4 as a circumstantial clause to ver. 5, and made to precede it, as Ewald does, “without loud speech . . . their sound has resounded through all the earth” (§ 341, d), is impossible, even apart from the fact of אָמַר not meaning “loud speech” and קָנָה hardly “their sound”. Ver. 4 is in the form of an independent sentence, and there is nothing whatever in it to betray any designed subordination to ver. 5. But if it be made independent in the sense “there is no loud, no articulate speech, no audible voice, which proceeds from the heavens”, then ver. 5 would form an antithesis to it; and this, in like manner, there is nothing to indicate, and it would at least require that the verb יָצָא should be placed first. Luther’s rendering is better: There is no language nor speech, where their voice is not heard, i. e., as Calvin also renders it, the testimony of the heavens to God is understood by the peoples of every language and tongue. But this ought to be אֵין לְשׁוֹן or אֵין שְׂפָה (Gen. xi. 1). Hofmann’s rendering is similar, but more untenable: “There is no speech and there are no words, that their cry is not heard, i. e. the language of the heavens goes forth side by side with all other languages; and men may discourse ever so, still the speech or sound of the heavens is heard therewith, it sounds above them all.” But the words are not כְּלֵי נִשְׁמָע (after the analogy of Gen. xxxi. 20), or rather כְּלֵי יִשְׁמָע (as in Job xli. 18, Hos. viii. 7). כְּלֵי with the part. is a poetical expression for the Alpha privat. (2 Sam. i. 21), consequently כְּלֵי נִשְׁמָע is “unheard” or “inaudible”, and the opposite of נִשְׁמָע, audible, Jer. xxxi. 15. Thus, therefore, the only rendering that remains is that of the LXX, Vitranga, and Hitzig: There is no language and no words, whose voice is unheard, i. e. inaudible. Hupfeld’s assertion that this rendering destroys the parallelism is unfounded. The structure of the distich resembles cxxxix.

4. The discourse of the heavens and the firmament, of the day (of the sky by day) and of the night (of the sky by night), is not a discourse uttered in a corner, it is a discourse in speech that is everywhere audible, and in words that are understood by all, a φανερόν, Rom. i. 19.

Vers. 5—7. Since אָמַר and דְּבָרִים are the speech and words of the heavens, which form the ruling principal notion, comprehending within itself both יוֹם and לַיְלָה, the suffixes of קוֹם and מְלִירָם must unmistakably refer to הַשָּׁמַיִם in spite of its being necessary to assign another reference to קוֹלִם in ver. 4. Jer. xxxi. 39 shews how we are to understand קוֹ in connection with מִצָּן. The measuring line of the heavens is gone forth into all the earth, i. e. has taken entire possession of the earth. Ver. 5*b* tells us what kind of measuring line is intended, viz. that of their heraldship: their words (from מְלִירָם, which is more Aramaic than Hebrew, and consequently more poetic) reach to the end of the world, they fill it completely, from its extreme boundary inwards. Isaiah's קוֹ, ch. xxviii. 10, is inapplicable here, because it does not mean commandment, but rule, and is there used as a word of derision, rhyming with צוֹ. The ὁ φθόγγος αὐτῶν of the LXX. (ὁ ἤχος αὐτῶν Symm.) might more readily be justified, inasmuch as קוֹ might mean a harpstring, as being a cord in tension, and then, like τόνος (cf. τοναία), a tone or sound (Gesenius in his Lex., and Ewald), if the reading קוֹלִם does not perhaps lie at the foundation of that rendering. But the usage of the language presents the signification of a measuring line for קוֹ when used with מִצָּן (Aq. κανών, cf. 2 Cor. x. 13); and this gives a new thought, whereas in the other case we should merely have a repetition of what has been already expressed in ver. 4. Paul makes use of these first two lines of the strophe in order, with its very words, to testify to the spread of the apostolic message over the whole earth. Hence most of the older expositors have taken the first half of the Psalm to be an allegorical prediction, the heavens being a figure of the church and the sun a figure of the gospel. The apostle does not, however, make a formal citation in the passage referred to, he merely gives a New Testament application to Old Testament language, by taking the all-penetrating præconium calorum as figure of the all-penetrating præconium evangelii; and he is fully justified in so doing by the parallel which the psalmist himself draws between the revelation of God in nature and in the written word.

The reference of בְּרָהַם to הַשָּׁמַיִם is at once opposed by the tameness of the thought so obtained. The tent, viz. the retreat (אָהֶל, according to its radical meaning a dwelling, from אָהַל, cogn. אָוַל, to retire from the open country) of the sun is indeed in the sky, but it is more naturally at the spot where the sky and the קֶצֶר הַכֹּל meet. Accordingly בְּרָהַם has the neuter signification "there" (cf. Isa. xxx. 6); and there is so little ground for reading שָׁם instead of שָׁמַיִם, as Ewald does, that the poet on the contrary has written בְּרָהַם and not שָׁם, because he has just used שָׁמַיִם (Hitzig). The name of the sun, which is always feminine in Arabic, is predominantly masculine in Hebrew and Aramaic (cf. on the other hand Gen. xv. 17, Nah. iii. 17, Isa. xlv. 6, Mal. iii. 20); just as the Sabians and heathen Arabs had a sun-god (masc.). Accordingly in ver. 6 the sun is compared to a bridegroom, who comes forth in the morning out of his חֶפְזָה. Joel ii. 16 shews that this word means a bride-chamber; properly (from חָפַף to cover) it means a canopy (Isa. iv. 5), whence in later Hebrew the bridal or portable canopy (Talmud. בֵּית גַּנָּא), which is supported by four poles and borne by four boys, at the consecration of the bridal pair, and then also the marriage itself, is called chuppa. The morning light has in it a freshness and cheerfulness, as it were a renewed youth. Therefore the morning sun is compared to a bridegroom, the desire of whose heart is satisfied, who stands as it were at the beginning of a new life, and in whose youthful countenance the joy of the wedding-day still shines. And as at its rising it is like a bridegroom, so in its rapid course (Sir. xliii. 5) it is like a hero (vid. on xviii. 34), inasmuch as it marches on its way ever anew, light-giving and triumphant, as often as it comes forth, with גְּבוּרָה (Judges v. 31). From one end of heaven, the extreme east of the horizon, is its going forth, i. e. rising (cf. Hos. vi. 3; the opposite is מָבִיא going in = setting), and its circuit (חֲקִיפָה, from חָקַף = נָקַף, Isa. xxix. 1, to revolve) עַל-קְצוֹתָם, to their (the heavens') end (= עַד Deut. iv. 32), cf.

1 Esdr. iv. 34: ταχὺς τῷ δρόμῳ ὁ ἥλιος, ὅτι στρέφεται ἐν τῷ κύκλῳ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ καὶ πάλιν ἀποτρέχει εἰς τὸν ἑαυτοῦ τόπον ἐν μιᾷ ἡμέρᾳ. On this open way there is not  $\text{הָסֵת}$ , anything hidden, i. e. anything that remains hidden, before its heat.  $\text{הַשִּׁיחַ$  is the enlightening and warming influence of the sun, which is also itself called  $\text{הַשִּׁיחַ}$  in poetry.

Vers. 8—10. No sign is made use of to mark the transition from the one part to the other, but it is indicated by the introduction of the divine name  $\text{יְהוָה}$  instead of  $\text{לֵא}.$  The word of nature declares  $\text{לֵא}$  (God) to us, the word of Scripture  $\text{יְהוָה}$  (Jahve); the former God's power and glory, the latter also His counsel and will. Now follow twelve encomiums of the Law, of which every two are related as antecedent and consequent, rising and falling according to the cæsural schema, after the manner of waves. One can discern how now the heart of the poet begins to beat with redoubled joy as he comes to speak of God's word, the revelation of His will.  $\text{הַשִּׁיחַ}$  does not in itself mean the law, but a pointing out, instruction, doctrine or teaching, and more particularly such as is divine, and therefore positive; whence it is also used of prophecy, Isa. i. 10, viii. 16, and prophetically of the New Testament gospel, Isa. ii. 3. But here no other divine revelation is meant than that given by the mediation of Moses, which is become the law, i. e. the rule of live ( $\nu\acute{o}\mu\omicron\varsigma$ ), of Israel; and this law, too, as a whole not merely as to its hortatory and disciplinary character, but also including the promises contained in it. The praises which the poet pronounces upon the Law, are accurate even from the standpoint of the New Testament. Even Paul says, Rom. vii. 12, 14, "The Law is holy and spiritual, and the commandment holy, and just, and good." The Law merits these praises in itself; and to him who is in a state of favour, it is indeed no longer a law bringing a curse with it, but a mirror of the God merciful in holiness, into which he can look without slavish fear, and is a rule for the direction of his free and willing obedience. And how totally different is the affection of the psalmists and prophets for the Law, — an affection based upon the essence and universal morality of the commandments, and upon a spiritual realisation of the letter, and the consolation of the promises, — from the pharisaical rabbinical service of the letter and the ceremonial in the period after the Exile!

The divine Law is called הַמִּימָה, "perfect", i. e. spotless and harmless, as being absolutely well-meaning, and altogether directed towards the well-being of man. And מְשִׁיבָה נִפְשׁ restoring, bringing back, i. e. imparting newness of life, quickening the soul (cf. Ps. שׁוּבָה, xxiii. 3), to him, viz., who obeys the will of God graciously declared therein, and enters upon the divine way or rule of salvation. Then in the place of the word חֹרֶה we find עֲדוּת, — as the tables of the Ten Commandments (לְחוֹת הָעֲדוּת) are called, — from עָד (הָעָד), which signifies not merely a corroborative, but also a warning and instructive testimony or attestation. The testimony of Jahve is נֶאֱמָנָה, made firm, sure, faithful, i. e. raised above all doubt in its declarations, and verifying itself in its threatenings and promises; and hence מִחֻבְיַת פְּתִי, making wise simplicity, or the simple, lit. openness, the open (root פָּח to spread out, open, Indo-Germ. prat, πετ, pat, pad), i. e. easily led astray; to such an one it gives a solid basis and stability, σφίσει αὐτόν, 2 Tim. iii. 15. The Law divides into פְּקֻדִים, precepts or declarations concerning man's obligation; these are יְשָׁרִים, straight or upright, as a norma normata, because they proceed from the upright, absolutely good will of God, and as a norma normans they lead along a straight way in the right track. They are therefore מְשַׁמְּרֵי לֵב, their educative guidance, taking one as it were by the hand, frees one from all tottering, satisfies a moral want, and preserves a joyous consciousness of being in the right way towards the right goal. מִצְוַת יְהוָה, Jahve's statute (from צָוָה statuere), is the tenour of His commandments. The statute is a lamp — it is said in Prov. vi. 23 — and the law a light. So here: it is בְּרָרָה, clear, like the light of the sun (Cant. vi. 10), and its light is imparted to other objects: מְאִירָה עֵינַיִם, enlightening the eyes, which refers not merely to the enlightening of the understanding, but of one's whole condition; it makes the mind clear, and body as well as mind healthy and fresh, for the darkness of the eyes is sorrow, melancholy, and bewilderment. In this chain of names for the Law, יִרְאָה ה' is not the fear of God as an act performed, but as a precept, it is what God's revelation demands, effects, and maintains; so that it is the revealed way in which God is to be feared (xxxiv. 12), — in short, it is the religion of Jahve (cf. Prov. xv. 33 with Deut. xvii. 19). This is טְהוֹרָה, clean, pure, as the word which is like to pure gold, by which it is taught, xii. 7, cf. Job xxviii. 19; and therefore לְעֶד עֹמְדָה, enduring for ever in opposition to all false forms of reverencing God, which carry their own condemnation in themselves. מִשְׁפָּטֵי ה' are the jura of the Law as a corpus juris divini, everything that is right and constitutes right according to the decision of Jahve. These judgments are אֱמֶת, truth, which endures and verifies itself; because, in distinction from most others and those outside Israel, they have an unchangeable moral foundation: צְדִיקוֹ יִחַדוּ, i. e. they are צְדִיקִים, in accordance with right and appropriate (Deut. iv. 8), altogether, because no reproach of inappropriateness and sanctioned injustice or wrong clings to them. The eternal will of God has attained a relatively perfect form and development in the Law of Jahve according to the standard set up as the law of the nation.

Vers. 11—15. With הַנְּחֻמִּים (for which, preferring a simple Shebā with the gutturals, Ben-Naphtali writes הַנְּחֻמִּים) the poet sums up the characteristics enumerated; the article is summative, as in הַיֶּשֶׁעַ at the close of the hexahemeron, Gen. i. 31. פָּן is the finest purified gold, cf. 1 Kings x. 18 with 2 Chron. ix. 17. נִפְתַּח צִיפִים "the discharge (from נִפְתַּח = نَفَث) of the honeycombs" is the virgin honey, i. e. the honey that flows of itself out of the cells. To be desired are the revealed words of God, to him who possesses them as an outward possession; and to him who has received them inwardly they are sweet. The poet, who is himself conscious of being a servant of God, and of striving to act as such, makes use of these words for the end for which they are revealed: he is נִוְהָר, one who suffers himself to be enlightened, instructed, and warned by them. נִם belongs to נוֹהָר (according to the usual arrangement of the words, e. g. Hos. vi. 11), just as in ver. 14 it belongs to חֶשֶׁךְ. He knows that בְּשִׂמְרָם (with a subjective suffix in an objective sense, cf. Prov. xxv. 7, just as we may also say:) in their observance is, or is included, great reward. עֵקֶב is that which follows upon one's heels (עקב), or comes immediately after anything, and is used here of the result of conduct. Thus, then, inasmuch as the Law is not only a copy of the divine will, but also a mirror of self-knowledge, in which a man may behold and come to know himself, he prays for forgiveness in respect of the many sins of infirmity, — though for the most part unperceived by him, — to which, even the pardoned one succumbs. שְׁנֵי־אָרָה (in the terminology of the Law, שְׁנֵי־נֶגֶד, ἀγνοηματα) comprehends the whole province of the peccatum involuntarium, both the peccatum ignorantiae and the peccatum infirmitatis. The question delicta quis intelligit is equivalent to the negative clause: no one can discern his faults, on account of the heart of man being unfathomable and on account of the disguise, oftentimes so plausible, and the subtlety of sin. Hence, as an inference, follows the prayer: pronounce me free also מִנְּסֻחָרוֹת, ab occultis (peccatis, which, however, cannot be supplied on grammatical grounds), equivalent to מִעֲלָמִים (xc. 8), i. e. all those sins, which even he, who is most earnestly striving after sanctification, does not discern, although he may desire to know them, by reason of the ever limited nature of his knowledge both of himself and of sin.* נִקְרָה, δικάσῃς, is a vox judicialis, to declare innocent, pronounce free from, to let go unpunished. The prayer for justification is followed in ver. 14 by the prayer for sanctification, and indeed for preservation against deliberate sins. From זֵד, זָדוֹן, to seethe, boil over, Hiph. to sin wilfully, deliberately, insolently, — opp. of sin arising from infirmity, Exod. xxi. 14, Deut. xviii. 22, xvii. 12, — is formed זָדוֹן an insolent sinner, one who does not sin בְּשִׁגְגָה, but בְּזָדוֹן (cf. 1 Sam. xvii. 28, where David's brethren bring this reproach against him), or בְּיָד בְּיָדָה, and the neuter collective זָדוֹת (cf. בְּזָדוֹת, ci. 3, Hos. v. 2) peccata proæretica or contra conscientiam, which cast one out of the state of grace or favour, Num. xv. 27—31. For if זָדוֹת had been intended of arrogant and insolent possessors of power (Ewald), the prayer would have taken some other form than that of "keeping back" (קִשְׁרָה as in 1 Sam. xxv. 39 in the mouth of David). חַיִּים, presumptuous sins, when they are repeated, become dominant sins, which irresistibly enslave the man (מִשְׁלָל) with a non-personal subject, as in Isa. iii. 4b, cf. Ps. ciii. 19); hence the last member of the climax (which advances from the peccatum involuntarium to the proæreticum, and from this to the regnans): let them not have dominion over me (רָבָה with Dechi in Baer; generally wrongly marked with Munach).

Then (אָן), when Thou bestowest this twofold favour upon me, the favour of pardon and the grace of preservation, shall I be blameless (אֵיחָדִים 1 fut. Kal, instead of אָחָדִים, with ׀ as a characteristic of ē) and absolved (וְנִקְיָתִי not Piel, as in ver. 13, but Niph., to be made pure, absolved) from great transgression. פָּשַׁע* from פָּשַׁע (root פֶּשַׁע), to spread out, go beyond the bounds, break through, trespass, is a collective name for deliberate and reigning, dominant sin, which breaks through man's relation of favour with God, and consequently casts him out of favour, — in one word, for apostasy. Finally, the psalmist supplicates a gracious acceptance of his prayer, in which both mouth and heart accord, supported by the faithfulness, stable as the rock (צִדְקָה), and redeeming love (גֹּאֲלִי redemptor, vindex, root גָּל, חָלַל, to loose, redeem) of his God. הָיָה לְרִצּוֹן is a standing expression of the sacrificial tôra, e. g. Lev. i. 3 sq. The לְרִצּוֹן, which, according to Exod. xxviii. 38, belongs to לְרִצּוֹן, stands in the second member in accordance with the "parallelism by postponement." Prayer is a sacrifice offered by the inner man. The heart meditates and fashions it; and the mouth presents it, by uttering that which is put into the form of words.

* The Gaja with פָּשַׁע is intended in this instance, where מִפְּשַׁע רָבָה are to be read in close connection, to secure distinctness of pronunciation for the unaccented ׀, as e. g. is also the case in lxxviii. 13, בָּרָקָה (bāḳa' jām).

PSALM XX.

PRAYER FOR THE KING IN TIME OF WAR.

- 2 JAHVE answer thee in the day of distress,
The name of the God of Jacob set thee up on high,
- 3 Send thee help from the sanctuary,
And uphold thee out of Zion!
- 4 Remember all thy meat-offerings,
And graciously accept thy burnt offerings! (Sela).
- 5 Give thee according to thine own heart,
And fulfil all thy counsel!
- 6 We will shout for joy because of Thy help,
And in the name of our God will we raise our banners —
Jahve fulfil all thy wishes.
- 7 Now know I that Jahve giveth help to His Anointed;
He will answer him from His holy heaven
With the helpful mighty deeds of His right hand.
- 8 Some [praise] chariots and some horses,
And we, we praise the name of Jahve, our God.
- 9 If those have bowed down and fallen,
Then we have risen up and stand firm.
- 10 Jahve, Oh help the king! —
May He hear us in the day we call.

To Ps. xix. is closely attached Ps. xx., because its commencement is as it were the echo of the prayer with which the former closes; and to Ps. xx. is closely attached Ps. xxi., because both Psalms refer to the same event relatively, as prayer and thanksgiving. Ps. xx. is an intercessory psalm of the nation, and Ps. xxi. a thanksgiving psalm of the nation, on behalf of its king. It is clearly manifest that the two Psalms form a pair, being connected by unity of author and subject. They both open somewhat uniformly with a synonymous parallelism of the members,

xx. 2—6, xxi. 2—8; they then increase in fervour and assume a more vivid colouring as they come to speak of the foes of the king and the empire, xx. 7—9, xxi. 9—13; and they both close with an ejaculatory cry to Jahve, xx. 10, xxi. 14. In both, the king is apostrophised through the course of several verses, xx. 2—6, xxi. 9—13; and here and there this is done in a way that provokes the question whether the words are not rather addressed to Jahve, xx. 6, xxi. 10. In both Psalms the king is referred to by הַמֶּלֶךְ, xx. 10, xxi. 8; both comprehend the goal of the desires in the word יִשְׁמְחָה, xx. 6, cf. 7, xxi. 2, 6; both delight in rare forms of expression, which are found only in these instances in the whole range of Old Testament literature, viz. נִרְגַל xx. 6, נִחְעָרָד xx. 9, אֲרִשָׁה xxi. 3, וַאֲצַחְדָּרוּ xx. 7.

If, as the לָרֵךְ indicates, they formed part of the oldest Davidic Psalter, then it is notwithstanding more probable that their author is a cotemporary poet, than that it is David himself. For, although both as to form of expression (cf. xxi. 12 with x. 2) and as to thoughts (cf. xxi. 7 with xvi. 11), they exhibit some points of contact with Davidic Psalms, they still stand isolated by their peculiar character. But that David is their subject, as the inscription לָרֵךְ, and their position in the midst of the Davidic Psalms, lead one to expect, is capable of confirmation. During the time of the Syro-Ammonitish war comes David's deep fall, which in itself and in its consequences made him sick both in soul and in body. It was not until he was again restored to God's favour out of this self-incurred peril, that he went to his army which lay before Rabbath Ammon, and completed the conquest of the royal city of the enemy. The most satisfactory explanation of the situation referred to in this couplet of Psalms is to be gained from 2 Sam. xi. xii. Ps. xx. prays for the recovery of the king, who is involved in war with powerful foes; and Ps. xxi. gives thanks for his recovery, and wishes him a victorious issue to the approaching campaign. The "chariots and horses" (xx. 8) are characteristic of the military power of Aram (2 Sam. x. 18, and frequently), and in xxi. 4 and 10 we perceive an allusion to 2 Sam. xii. 30, 31, or at least a remarkable agreement with what is there recorded.

Vers. 2—6. Litany for the king in distress, who offers sacrifices for himself in the sanctuary. The futures in vers. 2—5, standing five times at the head of the climactic members of the parallelism, are optatives. וַיִּמְלֵא, ver. 6, also continues the chain of wishes, of which even נִרְנְנָה (cf. lxi. 15) forms one of the links. The wishes of the people accompany both the prayer and the sacrifice. "The Name of the God of Jacob" is the self-manifesting power and grace of the God of Israel. יִעֲקֹב is used in poetry interchangeably with יִשְׂרָאֵל, just like יְהוָה with אֱלֹהִים. Alshêch refers to Gen. xxxv. 3; and it is not improbable that the desire moulds itself after the fashion of the record of the fact there handed down to us. May Jahve, who, as the history of Jacob shews, hears (and answers) in the day of distress, hear the king; may the Name of the God of Jacob bear him away from his foes to a triumphant height. שֶׁנָּבֹא alternates with רוּמָם (xviii. 49) in this sense. This intercession on the behalf of the praying one is made in the sanctuary on the heights of Zion, where Jahve sits enthroned. May He send him succour from thence, like auxiliary troops that decide the victory. The king offers sacrifice. He offers sacrifice according to custom before the commencement of the battle (1 Sam. xiii. 9 sq., and cf. the phrase קָדַשׁ מִלְחָמָה), a whole burnt-offering and at the same time a meat or rather meal offering also, מִנְחוֹת;* for every whole offering and every shelamim- or peace-offering had a meat-offering and a drink-offering as its indispensable accompaniment. The word זָבַח is perfectly familiar in the ritual of the meal-offering. That portion of the meal-offering, only a part of which was placed upon the altar (to which, however, according to traditional practice, does not belong the accompanying meal-offering of the מִנְחַת נֹסְחִים, which was entirely devoted to the altar), which ascended with the altar fire is called אֲזִכָּרָה, אֲזִכָּרָה, אֲזִכָּרָה.

* This, though not occurring in the Old Testament, is the principal form of the plural, which, as even David Kimchi recognises in his Lexicon, points to a verb כָּנַח (just as שָׁמְלוּת, גְּבַעוּת, שְׁפָחוּת point to שָׁפַל, גָּבַע, שָׁפַח); whereas other old grammarians supposed נָחָה to be the root, and were puzzled with the traditional pronunciation m'nachôth, but without reason.

(cf. Acts x. 4), that which brings to remembrance with God him for whom it is offered up (not "incense", as Hupfeld renders it); for the designation of the offering of jealousy, Num. v. 15, as "bringing iniquity to remembrance before God" shews, that in the meal-offering ritual זָכַר retains the very same meaning that it has in other instances. Every meal-offering is in a certain sense a מִנְחַת זִכְרוֹן. Hence here the prayer that Jahve would graciously remember them is combined with the meal-offerings.

As regards the 'olah, the wish "let fire from heaven (Lev. ix. 24, 1 Kings xviii. 38, 1 Chron. xxi. 26) turn it to ashes", would not be vain. But the language does not refer to anything extraordinary; and in itself the consumption of the offering to ashes (Böttcher) is no mark of gracious acceptance. Moreover, as a denominative from רָשַׁן, fat ashes, רָשַׁן means "to clean from ashes", and not: to turn into ashes. On the other hand, רָשַׁן also signifies "to make fat", xxiii. 5, and this effective signification is applied declaratively in this instance: may He find thy burnt-offering fat, which is equivalent to: may it be to Him a רִיחַ נִיחֻם [an odour of satisfaction, a sweet-smelling savour]. The voluntative ah only occurs here and in Job xi. 17 (which see) and Isa. v. 19, in the 3 pers.; and in this instance, just as with the cohortative in 1 Sam. xxviii. 15, we have a change of the lengthening into a sharpening of the sound (cf. the exactly similar change of forms in 1 Sam. xxviii. 15, Isa. lix. 5, Zech. v. 4, Prov. xxiv. 14, Ezek. xxv. 13) as is very frequently the case in מָה for מֶה. The alteration to יִשְׁעָה or יִדְשְׁנָה (Hitzig) is a felicitous but needless way of getting rid of the rare form. The explanation of the intensifying of the music here is, that the intercessory song of the choir is to be simultaneous with the presentation upon the altar (הַקְטֹרֶת). עֵצָה is the resolution formed in the present war-time. "Because of thy salvation", i. e. thy success in war, is, as all the language is here, addressed to the king, cf. xxi. 2, where it is addressed to Jahve, and intended of the victory accorded to him. It is needless to read נָגַדְלָה instead of נָגַדְלָה, after the rendering of the LXX. μεγαλυσθησόμεθα. נָגַדְלָה is a denominative from דָּגַל: to wave a banner. In the closing line, the rejoicing of hope goes back again to the present and again assumes the form of an intercessory desire.

Vers. 7—9. While vers. 2—6 were being sung the offering of the sacrifice was probably going on. Now, after a lengthened pause, there ascends a voice, probably the voice of one of the Levites, expressing the cheering assurance of the gracious acceptance of the offering that has been presented by the priest. With עָתָה or עֲתָה, the usual word to indicate the turning-point, the instantaneous entrance of the result of some previous process of prolonged duration, whether hidden or manifest (e. g. 1 Kings xvii. 24, Isa. xxix. 22), is introduced. הוֹשִׁיעַ is the perfect of faith, which, in the certainty of being answered, realises the fulfilment in anticipation. The exuberance of the language in ver. 7 corresponds to the exuberance of feeling which thus finds expression.

In ver. 3 the answer is expected out of Zion, in the present instance it is looked for from God's holy heavens; for the God who sits enthroned in Zion is enthroned for ever in the heavens. His throne on earth is as it were the vestibule of His heavenly throne; His presence in the sanctuary of Israel is no limitation of His omnipresence; His help out of Zion is the help of the Celestial One and Him who is exalted above the heaven of heavens. נְבִירוֹת does not here mean the fulness of might (cf. xc. 10), but the displays of power (cvi. 2, cxlv. 4, cl. 2, Isa. lxiii. 15), by which His right hand procures salvation, i. e. victory, for the combatant. The glory of Israel is totally different from that of the heathen, which manifests itself in boastful talk. In ver. 8a הוֹפִירוֹ or הוֹפִירוֹ must be supplied from the הוֹפִיר in ver. 8b (LXX. μεγαλυθησομεθα = נִבִיר, xii. 5); הוֹפִיר, to make laudatory mention of any matter, to extol, and indirectly therefore to take credit to one's self for it, to boast of it (cf. הִלֵּל, xliv. 9). According to the Law Israel was forbidden to have any standing army; and the law touching the king (Deut. xvii. 16) speaks strongly against his keeping many horses. It was also the same under the judges, and at this time under David; but under Solomon, who acquired for himself horses and chariots in great number (1 Kings x. 26—29), it was very different. It is therefore a confession that must belong to the time of David which is here made in ver. 8, viz. that Israel's glory in opposition to their enemies, especially the Syrians, is the sure defence and protection of the Name of their God alone. The language of David to Goliath is very similar, 1 Sam. xvii. 45. The preterites in ver. 9 are præt. confidentiæ. It is, as Luther says, "a song of triumph before the victory, a shout of joy before succour." Since קים does not mean to stand, but to rise, קמני assumes the present superiority of the enemy. But the position of affairs changes: those who stand fall, and those who are lying down rise up; the former remain lying, the latter keep the field. The Hithpa. הִתְעוֹרֵר signifies to shew one's self firm, strong, courageous; like עוֹרֵר, cxlvi. 9, clxvii. 6, to strengthen, confirm, recover, from עוֹר to be compact, firm, cogn. אָ f. i., inf. aid, strength; as, e. g., the Koran (Sur. xxxviii. 16) calls David dhd-l-aidi, possessor of strength, II. ajjada, to strengthen, support, and אָ, inf. add, strength, superiority, V. taaddada, to shew one's self strong, brave, courageous.

Ver. 10. After this solo voice, the chorus again come on. The song is closed, as it was opened, by the whole congregation; and is rounded off by recurring to its primary note, praying for the accomplishment of that which is sought and pledged. The accentuation construes הַמֶּלֶךְ with יַעֲנֵנִי as its subject, perhaps in consideration of the fact, that הוֹשִׁיעָה is not usually followed by a governed object, and because thus a medium is furnished for the transition from address to direct assertion. But if in a Psalm, the express object of which is to supplicate salvation for the king, הוֹשִׁיעָה הַמֶּלֶךְ stand side by side, then, in accordance with the connection, הַמֶּלֶךְ must be treated as the object; and more especially since Jahve is called מֶלֶךְ רַב, in xlvi. 3, and the like, but never absolutely הַמֶּלֶךְ. Wherefore it is, with Hupfeld, Hitzig, and others, to be rendered according to the LXX. and Vulgate, Domine salvum fac regem. The New Testament cry Ὁσσαννά τῷ υἱῷ Δαυὶδ is a peculiar application of this Davidic "God bless the king (God save the king)", which is brought about by means of cxviii. 25. The closing line, ver. 10b, is an expanded Amen.

PSALM XXI.

THANKSGIVING FOR THE KING IN TIME OF WAR.

- 2 JAHVE, on account of Thy strength is the king glad,
And on account of Thy succour how greatly doth he rejoice!
- 3 The wish of his heart hast Thou granted him,
And the desire of his lips hast Thou not refused. (Sela.)
- 4 For Thou dost meet him bringing blessings of good,
Thou settest upon his head a crown of fine gold.
- 5 He asked life of Thee, — Thou grantedst it to him,
Length of days, for ever and ever.
- 6 Great is his glory through Thy help,
Praise and glory dost Thou lay upon him.
- 7 For Thou makest him blessings for ever,
Thou dost delight him with joy in Thy presence.
- 8 For the king trusted in Jahve,
And through the favour of the Most High he shall not be moved.
- 9 Thy hand will reach to all thine enemies
Thy right hand will reach all those that hate thee.
- 10 Thou shalt make them as a fiery oven,
when thou art angry,
Jahve in His wrath shall swallow them up, and a fire shall devour them.
- 11 Their fruit shalt thou destroy from the earth,
And their seed from among the children of men.
- 12 For they intend evil against thee,
They devise mischief: they shall accomplish nothing.
- 13 For thou wilt make them turn back,
With thy strings wilt thou aim at their faces.
- 14 Be Thou exalted, Jahve, in Thy might;
We will celebrate with voice and harp Thy strength.

“Jahve fulfil all thy desires” cried the people in the preceding Psalm, as they interceded on behalf of their king; and in this Psalm they are able thankfully to say to God “the desire of his heart hast Thou granted.” In both Psalms the people come before God with matters that concern the welfare of their king; in the former, with their wishes and prayers, in the latter, their thanksgivings and hopes; in the latter as in the former when in the midst of war, but in the latter after the recovery of the king, in the certainty of a victorious termination of the war.

The Targum and the Talmud, B. Succa 52*a*, understand this 21st Psalm of the king Messiah. Rashi remarks that this Messianic interpretation ought rather to be given up for the sake of the Christians. But even the Christian exposition cannot surely mean to hold fast this interpretation so directly and rigidly as formerly. This pair of Psalm treats of David; David's cause, however, in its course towards a triumphant issue — a course leading through suffering — is certainly figuratively the cause of Christ.

Vers. 2—3. The Psalm begins with thanksgiving for the bodily and spiritual blessings which Jahve has bestowed and still continues to bestow upon the king, in answer to his prayer. This occupies the three opening tetrastichs, of which these verses form the first. עָן (whence עָנָה, as in lxxiv. 13, together with עָנָה, lxiii. 3, and frequently) is the power that has been made manifest in the king, which has turned away his affliction; יִשְׁעָה is the help from above which has freed him out of his distresses. The יָנִי, which follows the מַה of the exclamation, is naturally shortened by the Keri into יָנִי (with the retreat of the tone); cf. on the contrary Prov. xx. 24, where מַה is interrogative and, according to the sense, negative). The ἀπ. λεγ. אֶרְשָׁה has the signification eager desire, according to the connection, the LXX. δέησις, and the perhaps also cognate רָשָׁה, to be poor; the Arabic وَرِش, avidum esse, must be left out of consideration according to the laws of the interchange of consonants, whereas יָרַשׁ, وَرِش, capere, captare (cf. وَرِث = اَرِث, an inheritance), but not רָשָׁה (vid. xxxiv. 11), belongs apparently to the same root. Observe the strong negation לֹא: no, thou hast not denied, but done the very opposite. The fact of the music having to strike up here favours the supposition, that the occasion of the Psalm is the fulfilment of some public, well-known prayer.

Vers. 4—5. "Blessings of good" (Prov. xxiv. 25) are those which consist of good, i. e. true good fortune. The verb קָרַךְ, because used of the favour which meets and presents one with some blessing, is construed with a double accusative, after the manner of verbs of putting on and bestowing (Ges. § 139). Since ver. 4*b* cannot be intended to refer to David's first coronation, but to the preservation and increase of the honour of his kingship, this particularisation of ver. 4*a* sounds like a prediction of what is recorded in 2 Sam. xii. 30: after the conquest of the Ammonitish royal city Rabbah David set the Ammonitish crown (עֲטָרָה), which is renowned for the weight of its gold and its ornamentation with precious stones, upon his head. David was then advanced in years, and in consequence of heavy guilt, which, however, he had overcome by penitence and laying hold on the mercy of God, was come to the brink of the grave. He, worthy of death, still lived; and the victory over the Syro-Ammonitish power was a pledge to him of God's faithfulness in fulfilling his promises. It is contrary to the tenour of the words to say that ver. 5*b* does not refer to length of life, but to hereditary succession to the throne. To wish any one that he may live לְעוֹלָם, and especially a king, is a usual thing, 1 Kings i. 31, and frequently. The meaning is, may the life of the king be prolonged to an indefinitely distant day. What the people have desired elsewhere, they here acknowledge as bestowed upon the king.

Vers. 6—7. The help of God turns to his honour, and paves the way for him to honour, it enables him — this is the meaning of ver. 6*b* — to maintain and strengthen his kingship with fame and glory. שָׁרָה עָלַי used, as in lxxxix. 20, of divine investiture and endowment. To make blessings, or a fulness of blessing, is a stronger form of expressing God's words to Abram, Gen. xii. 2: thou shalt be a blessing i. e. a possessor of blessing thyself, and a medium of blessing to others. Joy in connection with (אֵת as in xvi. 11) the countenance of God, is joy in delightful and most intimate fellowship with Him. חֲדָה, from חָדַד, which occurs once in Exod. xviii. 9, has in Arabic, with reference to nomad life, the meaning "to cheer the beasts of burden with a song and urge them on to a quicker pace", and in Hebrew, as in Aramaic, the general signification "to cheer, enliven."

Vers. 8—9. With this strophe the second half of the Psalm commences. The address to God is now changed into an address to the king; not, however, expressive of the wishes, but of the confident expectation, of the speakers. Hengstenberg rightly regards ver. 8 as the transition to the second half; for by its objective utterance concerning the king and God, it separates the language hitherto addressed to God, from the address to the king, which follows. We do not render ver. 8b: and [trusting] in the favour of the Most High — he shall not be moved; the mercy is the response of the trust, which (trust) does not suffer him to be moved; on the expression, cf. Prov. x. 30. This inference is now expanded in respect to the enemies who desire to cause him to totter and fall. So far from any tottering, he, on the contrary, makes a victorious assault upon his foes. If the words had been addressed to Jahve, it ought, in order to keep up the connection between vers. 9 and 8, at least to have been אֵיבֵי וּשְׂנְאָיו (his, i. e. the king's, enemies). What the people now hope on behalf of their king, they here express beforehand in the form of a prophecy. לְמַצָּא (as in Isa. x. 10) and מַצָּא seq. acc. (as in 1 Sam. xxiii. 17) are distinguished as: to reach towards, or up to anything, and to reach anything, attain it. Supposing לְ to represent the accusative, as e. g. in lxix. 6, ver. 9b would be a useless repetition.

Vers. 10—11. Hitherto the Psalm has moved uniformly in synonymous dipodia, now it becomes agitated; and one feels from its excitement that the foes of the king are also the people's foes. True as it is, as Hupfeld takes it, that לְעַת פְּנִיךָ sounds like a direct address to Jahve, ver. 10b nevertheless as truly teaches us quite another rendering. The destructive effect, which in other passages is said to proceed from the face of Jahve, xxxiv. 17, Lxx. xx. 6, Lam.

iv. 16 (cf.  $\xi\gamma\epsilon\iota\ \theta\epsilon\delta\varsigma\ \xi\lambda\delta\iota\kappa\omicron\nu\ \delta\mu\mu\alpha$ ), is here ascribed to the face, i. e. the personal appearing (2 Sam. xvii. 11) of the king. David's arrival did actually decide the fall of Rabbath Ammon, of whose inhabitants some died under instruments of torture and others were cast into brick-kilns, 2 Sam. xii. 26 sqq. The prospect here moulds itself according to this fate of the Ammonites.  $\text{פְּרִי הַבְּתֹנִיִּם}$  is a second accusative to  $\text{אֲשֶׁר תַּעֲשֶׂה$ , thou wilt make them like a furnace of fire, i. e. a burning furnace, so that like its contents they shall entirely consume by fire (synecdoche continentis pro contento). The figure is only hinted at, and is differently applied to what it is in Lam. v. 10, Mal. iii. 19. Ver. 10a and 10b are intentionally two long rising and falling wave-like lines, to which succeed, in ver. 11, two short lines; the latter describe the peaceful gleaning after the fiery judgment of God that has been executed by the hand of David.  $\text{פְּרִי הַבְּתֹנִיִּם}$ , as in Lam. ii. 20, Hos. ix. 16, is to be understood after the analogy of the expression  $\text{פְּרִי הַבְּתֹנִיִּם}$ . It is the fate of the Amalekites (cf. ix. 6 sq.), which is here predicted of the enemies of the king.

Vers. 12—13. And this fate is the merited frustration of their evil project. The construction of the sentences in ver. 12 is like xxvii. 10, cxix. 83; Ew. § 362, b.  $\text{נָטָה רֵעָה}$  is not to be understood according to the phrase  $\text{נָטָה רֵשָׁע}$  (= פְּרָשׁ), for this phrase is not actually found; we have rather, with Hitzig, to compare lv. 4, 2 Sam. xv. 14: to incline evil down upon any one is equivalent to: to put it over him, so that it may fall in upon him.  $\text{נָטָה}$  signifies "to extend lengthwise", to unfold, but also to bend by drawing tight.  $\text{שִׁית שְׂכָם}$  to make into a back, i. e. to make them into such as turn the back to you, is a more choice expression than  $\text{נָתַן עֲרֵף}$ , xviii. 41, cf. 1 Sam. x. 9; the half segolate form  $\text{שְׂכָם}$ , (=  $\text{שְׂכָם}$ ) becomes here, in pause, the full segolate form  $\text{שְׂכָם}$ .  $\text{הַצִּים}$  must be supplied as the object to  $\text{הִכְנִיחַ}$ , as it is in other instances after  $\text{הוֹרָה}$ ,  $\text{הִשְׁלִיךְ}$ ,  $\text{יָדָה}$ ;  $\text{כִּתְּנֵה חַץ}$ , xi. 2, cf. vii. 14, signifies to set the swift arrow upon the bow-string ( $\text{מִיָּחַר} = \text{יָחַר}$ ) = to aim. The arrows hit the front of the enemy, as the pursuer overtakes them.

Ver. 14. After the song has spread abroad its wings in twice three tetrastichs, it closes by, as it were, soaring aloft and thus losing itself in a distich. It is a cry to God for victory in battle, on behalf of the king. "Be Thou exalted", i. e. manifest Thyself in Thy supernal (lvii. 6, 12) and judicial (vii. 7 sq.) sovereignty. What these closing words long to see realised is that Jahve should reveal for world-wide conquest this נִבְרָךְ, to which everything that opposes Him must yield, and it is for this they promise beforehand a joyous gratitude.

PSALM XXII.

ELI ELI LAMA ASABTANI.

- 2 MY God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?!
Far from my help is my entreating cry,
- 3 O my God, I cry in the daytime, but Thou answerest not,
And in the night season, but I have no rest.
- 4 Yet Thou art holy, sitting enthroned above the praises of Israel.
- 5 In Thee our fathers trusted,
They trusted, and Thou didst deliver them.
- 6 Unto Thee they cried and were freed,
In Thee trusting, they were not put to shame.
- 7 But I am a worm, and not a man;
A reproach of men and despised of the people.
- 8 All they that see me laugh me to scorn;
They shoot out the lip, they shake the head:
- 9 "Roll it upon Jahve — let Him deliver him,
"Let Him rescue him, when He delighteth in him."
- 10 Yea Thou art He that took me out of the womb
That inspired me with trust at my mother's breasts.
- 11 On Thee was I cast from my birth,
From my mother's womb Thou art my God.
- 12 Be not far from me, for trouble is near,
For there is no helper at hand.
- 13 Mighty bulls have compassed me,
Strong ones of Bashan have beset me round.

14 They open their mouth against me —
A lion ravening and roaring.

15 Like water am I poured out,
And out of joint are all my bones.
My heart is become like wax,
Melted in the midst of my bowels.

16 Dried up like a potsherd is my strength,
And my tongue cleaveth to my jaws,
And Thou layest me in the dust of death.

17 For dogs have compassed me,
A band of wicked men encircles me,
Like a lion, my hands and my feet.

18 I can count all my bones,
They look, they stare upon me.

19 They part my garments among them,
And upon my vesture they cast lots.

20 And Thou, Jahve, remain not afar off!
My strength, haste Thee to help me!

21 Rescue my soul from the sword,
My only one from the paw of the dog.

22 Save me from the lion's jaws,
And from the horns of the antilopes — Thou wilt answer me.

23 I will declare Thy name among my brethren,
In the midst of the congregation will I praise Thee:

24 "Ye that fear Jahve, praise Him;
"All ye the seed of Jacob, glorify Him,
"And stand in awe of Him, all ye seed of Israel!"

25 "For He hath not despised nor abhorred the affliction of the afflicted,

"Neither hath He hid His face from him,
"And when he cried, He hath hearkened to him."

- 26 From Thee cometh my praise in the great congregation —
My vows will I pay before them that fear Him.
- 27 The meek shall eat and be satisfied,
They shall praise Jahve that seek Him:
"Let your heart refresh itself for ever!"
- 28 Remember and turn unto Jahve shall all the ends of the earth,
And all the families of the nations shall bow down before Thee.
- 29 For Jahve's is the kingship, and He ruleth among the nations.
- 30 All the thriving of the earth shall eat and bow down, Before Him shall all they that go down to the dust sink down and they that cannot prolong their life.
- 31 A seed shall serve Him: it shall be told to the generation concerning the Lord;
- 32 They shall come and declare His righteousness to a future people, that He hath finished it.

We have here a plaintive Psalm, whose deep complaints, out of the midst of the most humiliating degradation and most fearful peril, stand in striking contrast to the cheerful tone of Ps. xxi. — starting with a disconsolate cry of anguish, it passes on to a trustful cry for help, and ends in vows of thanksgiving and a vision of world-wide results, which spring from the deliverance of the sufferer. In no Psalm do we trace such an accumulation of the most excruciating outward and inward suffering pressing upon the complainant, in connection the most perfect innocence. In this respect Ps. lxxix. is its counterpart; but it differs from it in this particular, that there is not a single sound of imprecation mingled with its complaints.

It is David, who here struggles upward out of the gloomiest depth to such a bright height. It is a Davidic Psalm belonging to the time of the persecution by Saul. Ewald brings it down to the time preceding the destruction of Jerusalem, and Bauer to the time of the Exile. Ewald says it is not now possible to trace the poet more exactly. And Maurer closes by saying: illud unum equidem pro certo habeo, fuisse vatem hominem opibus præditum atque illustrem, qui magna auctoritate valeret non solum apud suos, verum etiam apud barbaros. Hitzig persists in his view, that Jeremiah composed the first portion when cast into prison as an apostate, and the second portion in the court of the prison, when placed under this milder restraint. And according to Olshausen, even here again, the whole is appropriate to the time of the Maccabees. But it seems to us to be confirmed at every point, that David, who was so persecuted by Saul, is the author. The cry of prayer אֱלֹהֵי חַדְדֹק (xxii. 12, 20, xxxv. 22, xxxviii 22, borrowed in lxxi. 12); the name given to the soul, יְחִידָה (xxii. 21, xxxv. 17); the designation of quiet and resignation by רְוִימִיָה (xxii. 3, xxxix. 3, lxii. 2, cf. lxv. 2), are all regarded by us, since we do not limit the genuine Davidic Psalms to Ps. iii. — xix. as Hitzig does, as Davidic idioms. Moreover, there is no lack of points of contact in other respects with genuine old Davidic hymns (cf. xxii. 30 with xxviii. 1, those that go down to the dust, to the grave; then in later Psalms as in cxliii. 7, in Isaiah and Ezekiel), and more especially those belonging to the time of Saul, as Ps. lxix. (cf. xxii. 27 with lxix. 33) and lix. (cf. xxii. 17 with lix. 15). To the peculiar characteristics of the Psalms of this period belong the figures taken from animals, which are heaped up in the Psalm before us. The fact that Ps. xxii. is an ancient Davidic original is also confirmed by the parallel passages in the later literature of the Shîr (lxxi. 5 sq. taken from xxii. 10 sq.; cii. 18 sq. in imitation xxii. 25, 31 sq.), of the Chokma (Prov. xvi. 3, נָל אֱלֹהֵי taken from Ps. xxii. 9, xxxvii. 5), and of prophecy (Isaiah, ch. xlix. liii.; Jeremiah, in Lam. iv. 4; cf. Ps. xxii. 15, and many other similar instances). In spite of these echoes in the later literature there are still some expressions that remain unique in the Psalm and are not found else where, as the hapaxlegomena אֵילָהָה and עֲנֹוָה. Thus, then, we entertain no doubts respecting the truth of the לְדָוִד. David speaks in this Psalm, — he and not any other, and that out of his own inmost being. In accordance with the nature of lyric poetry, the Psalm has grown up on the soil of his individual life and his individual sensibilities.

There is also in reality in the history of David, when persecuted by Saul, a situation which may have given occasion to the lifelike picture drawn in this Psalm, viz. 1 Sam. xxiii. 25 sq. The detailed circumstances of the distress at that time are not known to us, but they certainly did not coincide with the rare and terrible sufferings depicted in this Psalm in such a manner that these can be regarded as an historically faithful and literally exact copy of those circumstances; cf. on the other hand Ps. xvii. which was composed at the same period. To just as slight a degree have the prospects, which he connects in this Psalm with his deliverance, been realised in David's own life. On the other hand, the first portion exactly coincides with the sufferings of Jesus Christ, and the second with the results that have sprung from His resurrection. It is the agonising situation of the Crucified One which is presented before our eyes in vers. 15—18 with such artistic faithfulness: the spreading out of the limbs of the naked body, the torturing pain in hands and feet, and the burning thirst which the Redeemer, in order that the Scripture might be fulfilled, announced in the cry  $\delta\psi\omega$ , John xix. 28. Those who blaspheme and those who shake their head at Him passed by His cross, Mat. xxvii. 39, just as ver. 8 says; scoffers cried out to Him: let the God in whom He trusts help Him, Mat. xxvii. 43, just as ver. 9 says; His garments were divided and lots were cast for His coat, John xix. 23 sq., in order that ver. 19 of our Psalm might be fulfilled. The fourth of the seven sayings of the dying One, 'Ηλί, 'Ηλί x. τ. λ., Mat. xxvii. 46, Mark xv. 34, is the first word of our Psalm and the appropriation of the whole. And the Epistle to the Hebrews, ch. ii. 11 sq., cites ver. 23 as the words of Christ, to shew that He is not ashamed to call them brethren, whose sanctifier God has appointed Him to be, just as the risen Redeemer actually has done, Mat. xxviii. 10, John xx. 17. This has by no means exhausted the list of mutual relationships. The Psalm so vividly sets before us not merely the sufferings of the Crucified One, but also the salvation of the world arising out of His resurrection and its sacramental efficacy, that it seems more like history than prophecy, ut non tam prophetia, quam historia videatur (Cassiodorus). Accordingly the ancient Church regarded Christ, not David, as the speaker in this Psalm; and condemned Theodore of Mopsuestia who expounded it as cotemporary history. Bakius expresses the meaning of the older Lutheran expositors when he says: asserimus, hunc Psalmum ad literam primo, proprie et absque ulla allegoria, tropologia et ἀναγωγῇ integrum et per omnia de solo Christo exponendum esse. Even the synagogue, so far as it recognises a suffering Messiah, hears Him speak here; and takes the "hind of the morning" as a name of the Shechina and as a symbol of the dawning redemption.

To ourselves, who regard the whole Psalm as the words of David, it does not thereby lose anything whatever of its prophetic character. It is a typical Psalm. The same God who communicates His thoughts of redemption to the mind of men, and there causes them to develope into the word of prophetic announcement, has also moulded the history itself into a prefiguring representation of the future deliverance; and the evidence for the truth of Christianity which is derived from this factual prophecy (Thatweissagung) is as grand as that derived from the verbal prediction (Wortweissagung). That David, the anointed of Samuel, before he ascended the throne, had to traverse a path of suffering which resembles the suffering path of Jesus, the Son of David, baptized of John, and that this typical suffering of David is embodied for us in the Psalms as in the images reflected from a mirror, is an arrangement of divine power, mercy, and wisdom. But Ps. xxii. is not merely a typical Psalm. For in the very nature of the type is involved the distance between it and the antitype. In Ps. xxii., however, David descends, with his complaint, into a depth that lies beyond the depth of his affliction, and rises, with his hopes, to a height that lies far beyond the height of the reward of his affliction.

In other words: the rhetorical figure hyperbole (مبالغة, i. e. depiction, with colours thickly laid on), without which, in the eyes of the Semite, poetic diction would be flat and faded, is here made use of by the Spirit of God. By this Spirit the hyperbolic element is changed into the prophetic. This elevation of the typical into the prophetic is also capable of explanation on psychological grounds. Since David has been anointed with the oil of royal consecration, and at same time with the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of the kingship of promise, he regards himself also as the messiah of God, towards whom the promises point; and by virtue of this view of himself, in the light of the highest calling in connection with the redemptive history, the historical reality of his own experiences becomes idealised to him, and thereby both what he experiences and what he hopes for acquire a depth and height of background which stretches out into the history of the final and true Christ of God. We do not by this maintain any overflowing of his own consciousness to that of the future Christ, an opinion which has been shewn by Hengstenberg, Tholuck and Kurtz to be psychologically impossible. But what we say is, that looking upon himself as the Christ of God, — to express it in the light of the historical fulfilment, — he looks upon himself in Jesus Christ. He does not distinguish himself from the Future One, but in himself he sees the Future One, whose image does not free itself from him till afterwards, and whose history will coincide with all that is excessive in his own utterances. For as God the Father moulds the history of Jesus Christ in accordance with His own counsel, so His Spirit moulds even the utterances of David concerning himself the type of the Future One, with a view to that history. Through this Spirit, who is the Spirit of God and of the future Christ at the same time, David's typical history, as he describes it in the Psalms and more especially in this Psalm, acquires that ideal depth of tone, brilliancy, and power, by virtue of which it (the history) reaches far beyond its typical facts, penetrates to its very root in the divine counsels, and grows to be the word of prophecy: so that, to a certain extent, it may rightly be said that Christ here speaks through David, insofar as the Spirit of Christ speaks through him, and makes the typical suffering of His ancestor the medium for the representation of His own future sufferings. Without recognising this incontestable relation of the matter Ps. xxii. cannot be understood nor can we fully enter into its sentiments.

The inscription runs: To the precentor, upon (after) the hind of the morning's dawn, a Psalm of David. Luther, with reference to the fact that Jesus was taken in the night and brought before the Sanhedrim, renders it "of the hind, that is early chased," for

Patris Sapientia, Veritas divina, Deus homo captus est horâ matutinâ.

This interpretation is certainly a well-devised improvement of the ὑπὲρ τῆς ἀντιλήψεως τῆς ἑωθινῆς of the LXX. (Vulg. pro susceptione matutina), which is based upon a confounding of אֵילֹת with אֵילוֹת (ver. 20), and is thus explained by Theodoret: ἀντίληψις ἑωθινή ἢ τοῦ σωτῆρος ἡμῶν ἐπιφάνεια. Even the Midrash recalls Cant. ii. 8, and the Targum the lamb of the morning sacrifice, which was offered as soon as the watchman on the pinnacle of the Temple cried: בְּרֵק בְּרֵקָא (the first rays of the morning burst forth). אֵילֹת הַשָּׁחַר is in fact, according to traditional definition, the early light preceding the dawn of the morning, whose first rays are likened to the horns of a hind.* But natural as it may be to assign to the inscription a symbolical meaning in the case of this Psalm, it certainly forms no exception to the technical meaning, in connection with the music, of the other inscriptions. And Melissus (1572) has explained it correctly "concerning the melody of a common song, whose commencement was Ajëleth Hashdhar, that is, The hind of the morning's dawn." And it may be that the choice of the melody bearing this name was designed to have reference to the glory which bursts forth in the night of affliction.

According to the course of the thoughts the Psalm falls into three divisions, vers. 2—12, 13—22, 23—32, which are of symmetrical compass, consisting of 21, 24, and 21 lines. Whether the poet has laid out a more complete strophic arrangement within these three groups or not, must remain undecided. But the seven long closing lines are detached from the third group and stand to the column of the whole, in the relation of its base.

* There is a determination of the time to this effect, which is found both in the Jerusalem and in the Babylonian Talmud "from the hind of the morning's dawn till the east is lighted up." In Jer. Berachoth, ad init., it is explained: אֵילֹת הַשָּׁחַר כַּמֵּן חֲרָחִי קִרְנֵי דְנְהוּרָא וּמְנַהֲרִין לְעֵלְמָא סְלִקִּין מִמִּינְחָא וּמְנַהֲרִין לְעֵלְמָא, "like two horns of light, rising from the east and filling the world with light."

Vers. 2—3. In the first division, vers. 2—12, the disconsolate cry of anguish, beginning here in ver. 2 with the lamentation over prolonged desertion by God, struggles through to an incipient, trustfully inclined prayer. The question beginning with לָמָּה (instead of לְפָנָי before the guttural, and perhaps to make the exclamation more piercing, vid. on vi. 5, x. 1) is not an expression of impatience and despair, but of alienation and yearning. The sufferer feels himself rejected of God; the feeling of divine wrath has completely enshrouded him; and still he knows himself to be joined to God in fear and love; his present condition belies the real nature of his relationship to God; and it is just this contradiction that urges him to the plaintive question, which comes up from the lowest depths: Why hast Thou forsaken me? But in spite of this feeling of desertion by God, the bond of love is not torn asunder; the sufferer calls God אֱלֹהֵי (my God), and urged on by the longing desire that God again would grant him to feel this love, he calls Him, אֱלֹהֵי אֱלֹהֵי. That complaining question: why hast Thou forsaken me? is not without example even elsewhere in the Psalms, lxxxviii. 15, cf. Isa. xlix. 14. The forsakenness of the Crucified One, however, is unique; and may not be judged by the standard of David or of any other sufferers who thus complain when passing through trial. That which is common to all is here, as there, this, viz. that behind the wrath that is felt, is hidden the love of God, which faith holds fast; and that he who thus complains even on account of it, is, considered in itself, not a subject of wrath, because in the midst of the feeling of wrath he keeps up his communion with God. The Crucified One is to His latest breath the Holy One of God; and the reconciliation for which He now offers himself is God's own eternal purpose of mercy, which is now being realised in the fulness of times. But inasmuch as He places himself under the judgment of God with the sin of His people and of the whole human race, He cannot be spared from experiencing God's wrath against sinful humanity as though He were himself guilty. And out of the infinite depth of this experience of wrath, which in His case rests on no mere appearance, but the sternest reality*, comes the cry of His complaint which penetrates the wrath and reaches to God's love, יְלִי יְלִי לֹאמַר סַבְּאֲחָנִי, which the evangelists, omitting the additional *πρόσχεος μοι*** of the LXX., render: Θεέ μου, θεέ μου, ἵνα τί με ἐγκατέλιπες. He does not say יָנִי עֲזַבְתָּ, but יָנִי שָׁקַעְתָּ, which is the Targum word for the former. He says it in Aramaic, not in order that all may understand it, — for such a consideration was far from His mind at such a time, — but because the Aramaic was His mother tongue, for the same reason that He called God אֱלֹהִים in prayer. His desertion by God, as ver. 2b says, consists in God's help and His cry for help being far asunder. הִנֵּנִי, prop. of the roar of the lion (Aq. βρόχημα), is the loud cry extorted by the greatest agony, xxxviii. 9; in this instance, however, as יְרִי shews, it is not an inarticulate cry, but a cry bearing aloft to God the words of prayer. יְרִי is not to be taken as an apposition of the subject of עֲזַבְתָּ: far from my help. (from) the words of my crying (Riehm); for יְרִי שְׁאֵנִי would then also, on its part, in connection with the non-repetition of the כֵּן, be in apposition to מִשְׁעוֹעֵי. But to this it is not adapted on account of its heterogeneousness; hence Hitzig seeks to get over the difficulty by the conjecture יְרִי מִשְׁעוֹעֵי ("from my cry, from the words of my groaning"). Nor can it be explained, with Olshausen and Hupfeld, by adopting Aben-Ezra's interpretation, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me, far from my help? are the words of my crying." This violates the structure of the * Eusebius observes on ver. 2 of this Psalm, δικαιοσύνης ὑπάρχων πηγή τὴν ἡμετέραν ἀμαρτίαν ἀνέλαβε καὶ εὐλογίας ὡν πέλαγος τὴν ἐπιχειμένῃν ἡμῖν ἐδέξατο κατάραν, and: τὴν ὀρισμένῃν ἡμῖν παιδείαν ὑπέσθη ἐκὼν, παιδεία γὰρ εἰρήνης ἡμῶν ἐπ' αὐτὸν, ἣ φησὶν ὁ προφήτης.

verse, the rhythm, and the custom of the language, and gives to the Psalm a flat and unlyrical commencement. Thus, therefore, רחוק in the primary form, as in cxix. 155, according to Ges. § 146, 4, will be the predicate to דברי and placed before it: far from my salvation, i. e. far from my being rescued, are the words of my cry; there is a great gulf between the two, inasmuch as God does not answer him though he cries unceasingly. In ver. 3 the reverential name of God אֱלֹהֵי takes the place of אֱלִי the name that expresses His might; it is likewise vocative and accordingly marked with Rebia magnum. It is not an accusative of the object after xviii. 4 (Hitzig), in which case the construction would be continued with וְלֹא יַעֲנֶנּוּ. That it is, however, God to whom he calls is implied both by the direct address אֱלֹהֵי, and by וְלֹא תַעֲנֶנּוּ, since he from whom one expects an answer is most manifestly the person addressed. His uninterrupted crying remains unanswered, and unappeased. The clause וְלֹא-דַמְיָה לִי is parallel to וְלֹא תַעֲנֶנּוּ, and therefore does not mean: without allowing me any repose (Jer. xiv. 17, Lam. iii. 49), but: without any rest being granted to me, without my complaint being appeased or stilled. From the sixth to the ninth hour the earth was shrouded in darkness. About the ninth hour Jesus cried, after a long and more silent struggle, ἡλί, ἡλί. The ἀνεβόησεν φωνῇ μεγάλῃ, Mat. xxvii. 46, and also the κραυγὴ ἰσχυρά of Hebr. v. 7, which does not refer exclusively to the scene in Gethsemane, calls to mind the שִׁנְאוֹת of ver. 2*b*. When His passion reached its climax, days and nights of the like wrestling had preceded it, and what then becomes audible was only an outburst of the second David's conflict of prayer, which grows hotter as it draws near to the final issue.

Vers. 4—6. The sufferer reminds Jahve of the contradiction between the long season of helplessness and His readiness to help so frequently and so promptly attested. תָּהָא opens an adverbial clause of the counterargument: although Thou art . . . Jahve is שָׁרֵיף, absolutely pure, lit. separated (root קָרַ, קָרַ, to cut, part, just as ṭahara, the synonym of ḥadusa, is the intransitive of ṭahara = ab'ada, to remove to a distance, and כָּרַר pure, clean, radically distinct from pū-rus, goes back to כָּרַר to sever), viz. from that which is worldly and common, in one word: holy. Jahve is holy, and has shewn Himself such as the תהלות of Israel solemnly affirm, upon which or among which He sits enthroned. תהלות are the songs of praise offered to God on account of His attributes and deeds, which are worthy of praise (these are even called תהלות in lxxviii. 4, Exod. xv. 11, Isa. lxxiii. 7), and in fact presented in His sanctuary (Isa. lxiv. 10). The combination ישב תהלות (with the accusative of the verbs of dwelling and tarrying) is like ישב פרכים, cix. 1, lxxx. 2. The songs of praise, which resounded in Israel as the memorials of His deeds of deliverance, are like the wings of the cherubim, upon which His presence hovered in Israel. In vers. 5, 6, the praying one brings to remembrance this graciously glorious self-attestation of God, who as the Holy One always, from the earliest times, acknowledged those who fear Him in opposition to their persecutors and justified their confidence in Himself. In ver. 5 trust and rescue are put in the connection of cause and effect; in ver. 6 in reciprocal relation. פלט and קלט are only distinguished by the harder and softer sibilants, cf. xvii. 13 with cxvi. 4. It need not seem strange that such thoughts were at work in the soul of the Crucified One, since His divine-human consciousness was, on its human side, thoroughly Israelitish; and the God of Israel is also the God of salvation; redemption is that which He himself determined, why, then, should He not speedily deliver the Redeemer?

Vers. 7—9. The sufferer complains of the greatness of his reproach, in order to move Jahve, who is Himself involved therein, to send him speedy succour. Notwithstanding his cry for help, he is in the deepest affliction without rescue. Every word of ver. 7 is echoed in the second part of the Book of Isaiah. There, as here, Israel is called a worm, ch. xli. 14; there all these traits of suffering are found in the picture of the Servant of God, ch. xlix. 7, liii. 3, cf. l. 6, and especially lii. 14 "so marred was His appearance, that He no longer looked like a man." תולע is more particularly the kermes, or cochineal (vermiculus, whence color vermiculi, vermeil, vermiglio); but the point of comparison in the present instance is not the blood-red appearance, but the suffering so utterly defenceless and even ignominious. עַץ is gen. subj., like גַּי, Isa. xlix. 7. Jerome well renders the ἐξουθένωμα λαοῦ of the LXX. by abjectio (Tertullian: nullificamen) plebis, not populi. The ἐξεμακτήριον μὲν, by which the LXX. translates ילעינו לִי, is used by Luke, ch. xxiii. 35, cf. xvi. 14, in the history of the Passion; fulfilment and prediction so exactly coincide, that no more adequate expressions can be found in writing the gospel history than those presented by prophecy. In הַפְטִיר בְּשִׁפָּה, what appears in other instances as the object of the action (to open the mouth wide, diducere labia), is regarded as the means of its execution; so that the verbal notion being rendered complete has its object in itself: to make an opening with the mouth, cf. פָּעַר בְּפִה, Job xvi. 10, נָחַן נָחַן בְּקוֹל, lxviii. 34; Ges. § 138, 1, rem. 3. The shaking of the head is, as in cix. 25, cf. xlv. 15, lxiv. 9, a gesture of surprise and astonishment at something unexpected and strange, not a προσεύειν approving the injury of another, although נָד, נָדַן, נָדַט, νεύ-ω, nu-t-o, nic-to, neigen, nicken, all form one family of roots. In ver. 9 the words of the mockers follow without לְאִמֹר. גָּל is not the 3 præt. (LXX., cf. Mat. xxvii. 43) like אָרַךְ, אָרַךְ; it is not only in Piel (Jer. xi. 20, xx. 12, where גָּלִיתִי = גָּלִיתִי, Ew. § 121, a) that it is transitive, but even in Kal; nor is it inf. absol. in the sense of the imperative (Hitz., Böttch.), although this infinitive form is found, but always only as an inf. intens. (Numb. xxiii. 25, Ruth ii. 16, cf. Isa. xxiv. 19); but, in accordance with the parallels xxxvii. 5 (where it is written גָּל), Prov. xvi. 3, cf. Ps. lv. 23, 1 Pet. v. 7, it is imperat.: roll, viz. thy doing and thy suffering to Jahve, i. e. commit it to Him. The mockers call out this גָּל to the sufferer, and the rest they say of him with malicious looks askance. כִּי in the mouth of the foes is not confirmatory as in xviii. 20, but a conditional ἐάν (in case, provided that).

Vers. 10—12. The sufferer pleads that God should respond to his trust in Him, on the ground that this trust is made an object of mockery. With כִּי he establishes the reality of the loving relationship in which he stands to God, at which his foes mock. The intermediate thought, which is not expressed, "and so it really is", is confirmed; and thus כי comes to have an affirmative signification. The verb נָחַץ (נָחַץ) signifies both intransitive: to break forth (from the womb), Job xxxviii. 8, and transitive: to push forward (cf. جَمَعَ), more especially, the fruit of the womb, Mic. iv. 10. It might be taken here in the first signification: my breaking forth, equivalent to "the cause of my breaking forth" (Hengstenberg, Baur, and others); but there is no need for this metonymy. נָחַץ is either part. equivalent to נָחַץ, my pusher forth, i. e. he who causes me to break forth, or, — since נָחַץ in a causative signification cannot be supported, and participles like בָּרַם stamping and לוֹט veiling (Ges. § 72, rem. 1) are nowhere found with a suffix, — participle of a verb נָחַץ, to draw forth (Hitz.), which perhaps only takes the place, per metaplasmum, of the Pil. נָחַץ with the uneuphonic מְנַחֵץ (Ewald S. 859, Addenda). Ps. lxxi. has נָחַץ (ver. 6) instead of נָחַץ, just as it has מְנַחֵץ (ver. 5) instead of מְנַחֵץ. The Hiph. מְנַחֵץ does not merely mean to make secure (Hupf.), but to cause to trust. According to biblical conception, there is even in the new-born child, yea in the child yet unborn and only living in the womb, a glimmering consciousness springing up out of the remotest depths of unconsciousness (Psychol. S. 215; transl. p. 254). Therefore, when the praying one says, that from the womb he has been cast* upon Jahve, i. e. directed to go to Him, and to Him alone, with all his wants and care (lv. 23, cf. lxxi. 6), that from the womb onwards Jahve was his God, there is also more in it than the purely objective idea, that he grew up into such a relationship to God. Twice he mentions his mother. Throughout the Old Testament there is never any mention made of a human father, or begetter, to the Messiah, but always only of His mother, or her who bare Him. And the words of the praying one here also imply that the beginning of his life, as regards its outward circumstances, was amidst poverty, which likewise accords with the picture of Christ as drawn both in the Old and New Testaments. On the ground of his fellowship with God, which extends so far back, goes forth the cry for help (ver. 12), which has been faintly heard through all the preceding verses, but now only comes to direct utterance for the first time. The two כִּי are alike. That the necessity is near at hand, i. e. urgent, refers back antithetically to the prayer, that God would not remain afar off; no one doth, nor can help except He alone. Here the first section closes.

Vers. 13—14. Looking back upon his relationship to God, which has existed from the earliest times, the sufferer has become somewhat more calm, and is ready, in vers. 13—22, to describe his outward and inner life, and thus to unburden his heart. Here he calls his enemies פָּרִים, bullocks, and in fact אֲבִירֵי בָשָׁן (cf. l. 13 with Deut. xxxii. 14), strong ones of Bashan, the land rich in luxuriant oak forests and fat pastures (בָּשָׁן = buthène, which in the Beduin dialect means rich, stoneless meadow-land, vid. Job S. 509 f.; tr. ii. pp. 399 sq.) north of Jabbok extending as far as to the borders of Hermon, the land of Og and afterwards of Manasseh (Num. xxx. 1). They are so called on account of their robustness and vigour, which, being acquired and used in opposition to God is brutish rather than human (cf. Amos iv. 1). Figures like these drawn from the animal world and applied in an ethical sense are explained by the fact, that the ancients measured the instincts of animals according to the moral rules of human nature; but more deeply by the fact, that according to the indisputable conception of Scripture, since man was made to fall by Satan through the agency of an animal, the animal and Satan are the two dominant powers in Adamic humanity. כִּתּוּר is a climactic synonym of סִבְבָּ. On ver. 14a compare the echoes in Jeremiah, Lam. ii. 16, iii. 46. Finally, the foes are all comprehended under the figure of a lion, which, as soon as he sights his prey, begins to roar, Amos iii. 4. The Hebrew מִצְרָף, discerpere, according to its root, belongs to מִצְרָף, carpere. They are instar leonis dilaniaturi et rugientis.

Vers. 15—16. Now he describes, how, thus encompassed round, he is still just living, but already as it were dead.

The being poured out like water reminds us of the ignominious abandonment of the Crucified One to a condition of weakness, in which His life, deprived of its natural support, is in the act of dissolution, and its powers dried up (2 Sam. xiv. 14); the bones being stretched out, of the forcible stretching out of His body (הִחָפְרֵד, from פָּרַד to separate, cf. فرد according to its radical signification, which has been preserved in the common Arabic dialect: so to spread out or apart that the thing has no bends or folds,* Greek ἐξάπλωσθαι); the heart being melted, recalls His burning anguish, the inflammation of the wounds, and the pressure of blood on the head and heart, the characteristic cause of death by crucifixion. נָמַס, in pause נָמַס, is 3 præt.; wax, נִדְוַנְג, receives its name from its melting (דָּוַנְג, root דָּוַנְג, דָּוַנְג). In ver. 16 the comparison כָּחֶרֶשׁ has reference to the issue or result (vid. xviii. 43): my strength is dried up, so that it is become like a potsherd. חָפִי (Saadia) instead of כָּחִי commends itself, unless, כָּח, perhaps, like the Talmudic כָּחַ, also had the signification "spittle" (as a more dignified word for רֶקֶק). לָשׁוֹן, with the exception perhaps of Prov. xxvi. 28, is uniformly feminine; here the predicate has the masculine ground-form without respect to the subject. The part. pass. has a tendency generally to be used without reference to gender, under the influence of the construction laid down in Ges. § 143, 1, b, according to which לָשׁוֹן may be treated as an accusative of the object; מְלִקְחֵי, however, is acc. loci (cf. ל cxxxvii. 6, Job xxix. 10; אֶל Lam. iv. 4, Ezek. iii. 26): my tongue is made to cleave to my jaws, fauces meas. Such is his state in consequence of outward distresses. His enemies, however, would not have power to do all this, if God had not given it to them. Thus it is, so to speak, God Himself who lays him low in death. שָׁפַח to put anywhere, to lay, with the accompanying idea of firmness and duration, ثَبَات, Isa. xxvi. 12; the future is used of that which is just taking place. Just in like manner, in Isa. liii., the death of the Servant of God is spoken of not merely as happening thus, but as decreed; and not merely as permitted by God, but as being in accordance with the divine will. David is persecuted by Saul, the king of His people, almost to the death; Jesus, however, is delivered over by the Sanhedrim, the authority of His people, to the heathen, under whose hands He actually dies the death of the cross: it is a judicial murder put into execution according to the conditions and circumstances of the age; viewed, however, as to its final cause, it is a gracious dispensation of the holy God, in whose hands all the paths of the world's history run parallel, and who in this instance makes sin subservient to its own expiation.

Vers. 17—19. A continuation, referring back to ver. 12, of the complaint of him who is dying and is already as it were dead. In the animal name כְּלָבִים, figuratively descriptive of character, beside shamelessness and meanness, special prominence is given to the propensity for biting and worrying, i. e. for persecuting; hence Symmachus and Theodotion render it θηράται, αὐτηγέται. In ver. 17*b* עָרָה מְרַעִים takes the place of כְּלָבִים; and this again is followed by הַקִּיָּה in the plur. (to do anything in a circle, to surround by forming a circle round, a climactic synonym, like כָּפַר to סָבַב) either per attractionem (cf. cxi. 10, 1 Sam. ii. 4), or on account of the collective עָרָה. Tertullian renders it synagoga maleficorum, Jerome concilium pessimorum. But a faction gathered together for some evil purpose is also called עָרָה, e. g. עָרָה קָרָה. In ver. 17*c* the meaning of בְּאֲרֵי, instar leonis, is either that, selecting a point of attack, they make the rounds of his hands and feet, just as a lion does its prey upon which it springs as soon as its prey stirs; or, that, standing round about him like lions, they make all defence impossible to his hands, and all escape impossible to his feet. But whether we take this יְדֵי וְרַגְלָי as accusative of the members beside the accusative of the person (vid. xvii. 11), or as the object of the הַקִּיָּפוּ to be supplied from ver. 17*b*, it still remains harsh and drawing so far as the language is concerned. Perceiving this, the Masora on Isa. xxxviii. 13 observes, that בְּאֲרֵי, in the two passages in which it occurs (Ps. xxii. 17, Isa. xxxviii. 13), occurs in two different meanings (בְּחָרִי לִישָׁנִי); just as the Midrash then also understands כִּאֲרֵי in the Psalm as a verb used of marking with conjuring, magic chaacters.* Is the meaning of the Masora that כְּאָרִי, in the passage before us, is equivalent to כְּאָרִים? If so the form would be doubly Aramaic: both the participial form כְּאָר (which only occurs in Hebrew in verbs med. E) and the apocopated plural, the occurrence of which in Hebrew is certainly, with Gesenius and Ewald, to be acknowledged in rare instances (vid. xlv. 9, and compare on the other hand 2 Sam. xxii. 44), but which would here be a capricious form of expression most liable to be misapprehended. If כְּאָרִי is to be understood as a verb, then it ought to be read כְּאָרִי. Tradition is here manifestly unreliable. Even in MSS. the readings כְּאָרִי and כְּאָרִי are found. The former is attested both by the Masora on Num. xxiv. 9 and by Jacob ben Chajim in the Masora finalis as a MS. Chethib.** Even the Targum, which renders mordent sicut leo manus et pedes meos, bears witness to the ancient hesitancy between the substantival and verbal rendering of the כְּאָרִי. The other ancient versions have, without any doubt, read כְּאָרִי. Aquila in the 1st edition of his translation rendered it κτῆρας (from the Aramaic and Talmudic כְּאָר = כְּעָר to soil, part. כְּאָרִי, dirty, nasty); but this is not applicable to hands and feet, and therefore has nothing to stand upon. In the 2nd edition of his translation the same Aquila had instead of * Hupfeld suspects this Masoretic remark (כְּאָרִי כִּי קִמְצִין כְּהָרִי) as a Christian interpolation, but it occurs in the alphabetical Masoreth register כִּי בִּי וְהָרִידוֹן כְּהָרִי לִישָׁנִי. Even Elias Levita speaks of it with astonishment (in his מסרה המסרה [ed. Ginsburg, p. 253]) without doubting its genuineness, which must therefore have been confirmed, to his mind, by MS. authority. Heidenheim also cites it in his edition of the Pentateuch, מאור עינים, on Num. xxiv. 9; and down to the present time no suspicion has been expressed on the part of Jewish critics, although all kinds of unsatisfactory attempts have been made to explain this Masoretic remark (e. g. in the periodical Bicure ha-'Itim).

this, like Symmachus, "they have bound",* after כָּר, כָּר, to twist, lace; but this rendering is improbable since the Hebrew has other words for "to bind", constringere. On the other hand nothing of any weight can be urged against the rendering of the LXX. ἄροσαν (Peshito בועו, Vulg. foderunt, Jer. fixerunt); for (1) even if we do not suppose any special verb כָּר, כָּר, can be expanded from כָּרוּ (כָּרוּ) = כָּרוּ (כָּרוּ) just in the same manner as כָּרָה, Zech. xiv. 10 from כָּרָה, cf. כָּרָה Dan. vii. 16. And (2) that כָּרוּ and כָּרָה can signify not merely to dig out and dig into, engrave, but also to dig through, pierce, is shewn, — apart from the derivative כָּרָה (the similarity of the sound of which to μάχαυρα from the root μαχ, maksh, mraksh, is only accidental), — by the double meaning of the verbs כָּרָה, ἄροσαν (e. g. ἄροσαν τὸν ἰσθμὸν Herod. i. 174), fodere (hastā); the LXX. version of Ps. xl. 7 would also support this meaning, if κατατρῆσω (from κατατρῆσῶν) in that passage had been the original reading instead of κατατρῖσω. If כָּרָה be read, then ver. 17c, applied to David, perhaps under the influence of the figure of the attacking dogs (Böhl), says that the wicked bored into his hands and feet, and thus have made him fast, so that he is inevitably abandoned to their inhuman desires. The fulfilment in the nailing of the hands and (at least, the binding fast) of the feet of the Crucified One to the cross is clear. This is not the only passage in which it is predicted that the future Christ shall be murderously pierced; but it is the same in Isa. liii. 5 where He is said to be pierced (מְדוּלָל) on account of our sins, and in Zech. xii. 10, where Jahve describes Himself as ἐκκεντηθείς in Him.

Thus, therefore, the reading כָּרָה might at least have an equal right to be recognised with the present recepta, for which Hupfeld and Hitzig demand exclusive recognition; while Böttcher, — who reads כָּרָה, and gives this the meaning

* Also in Jerome's independent translation the reading vinxerunt is found by the side of fixerunt, just as Abraham of Zante paraphrases it in his paraphrase of the Psalter in rhyme גַּם כָּרָה יָרִי וְרַגְלֵי אֶסְרוּ. The want of a verb is too perceptible. Saadia supplies it in a different way "they compass me as a lion. to crush my hands and feet."

“springing round about (after the manner of dogs)”, — regards the sicut leo as “a production of meagre Jewish wit”; and also Thenius after taking all possible pains to clear it up gives it up as hopeless, and with Meier, adopting a different division of the verse, renders it: “a mob of the wicked has encompassed me like lions. On my hands and feet I can count all my bones.” But then, how יָאֲרִי comes limping on after the rest! And how lamely does יְרֵי וְרַגְלֵי precede ver. 18! How unnaturally does it limit עֲצְמוֹתַי, with which one chiefly associates the thought of the breast and ribs, to the hands and feet! אֲסַפֵּר is potentialis. Above in ver. 15 he has said that his bones are out of joint. There is no more reason for regarding this “I can count &c.” as referring to emaciation from grief, than there is for regarding the former as referring to writhing with agony. He can count them because he is forcibly stretched out, and thereby all his bones stand out. In this condition he is a mockery to his foes. הִבִּיט signifies the turning of one’s gaze to anything, רָאָה בְּ, the fixing of one’s sight upon it with pleasure. In ver. 19 a new feature is added to those that extend far beyond David himself: they part my garments among them . . . It does not say they purpose doing it, they do it merely in their mind, but they do it in reality. This never happened to David, or at least not in the literal sense of his words, in which it has happened to Christ. In Him ver. 19a and 19b are literally fulfilled. The parting of the בְּגָדִים by the soldiers dividing His ἱμάτια among them into four parts; the casting lots upon the לְבָשׁ by their not dividing the χιτῶν ἄβραφος, but casting lots for it, John xix. 23 sq. לְבָשׁ is the garment which is put on the body that it may not be bare; בְּגָדִים the clothes, which one wraps around one’s self for a covering; hence לְבָשׁ is punningly explained in B. Sabbath 77b by לֹא בֹשָׁה (with which one has no need to be ashamed of being naked) in distinction from גְּלִימָה, a mantle (that through which one appears כְּגֹלָם, because it conceals the outline of the body). In Job xxiv. 7, and frequently, לְבָשׁ is an undergarment, or shirt, what in Arabic is called absolutely ثوب thôb “the garment”, or expressed according to the Roman distinction: the tunica in distinction from the toga, whose exact designation is מְעִיל. With ver. 19 of this Psalm it is exactly as with Zech. ix. 9, cf. Mat. xxi. 5; in this instance also, the fulfilment has realised that which, in both phases of the synonymous expression, is seemingly identical.*

Vers. 20—22. In ver. 19 the description of affliction has reached its climax, for the parting of, and casting lots for, the garments assumes the certain death of the sufferer in the mind of the enemies. In ver. 20, with אֶתְהַרָה the looks of the sufferer, in the face of his manifold torments, concentrate themselves all at once upon Jahve. He calls Him אֵילֵי אֱלֹהֵי nom. abstr. from אֵיל, lxxxviii. 5: the very essence of strength, as it were the idea, or the ideal of strength; le-'ezrāthi has the accent on the penult., as in lxxi. 12 (cf. on the other hand xxxviii. 23), in order that two tone syllables may not come together. In ver. 21, הַרְבֵּה means the deadly weapon of the enemy and is used exemplificatively. In the expression מִיַּד כָּלֵב מִיַּד מִיַּד is not merely equivalent to מִן, but יַד is, according to the sense, equivalent to "paw" (cf. כַּף, Lev. xi. 27), as פִּי is equivalent to jaws; although elsewhere not only the expression "hand of the lion and of the bear", 1 Sam. xvii. 37, but also "hands of the sword", Ps. lxiii. 11, and even "hand of the flame", Isa. xlvi. 14 are used, inasmuch as יַד is the general designation of that which acts, seizes, and subjugates, as the instrument of the act. Just as in connection with the dog יַד, and in connection with the lion פִּי (cf., however, Dan. vi. 28) is mentioned as its weapon of attack, the horns, not the horn (also not in Deut. xxxiii. 17), are mentioned in connection with antilopes, רַמִּים (a shorter form, occurring only in this passage, for רַאֲמִים, xxix. 6, Isa. xxxiv. 7). Nevertheless, Luther following the LXX. and Vulgate, renders it "rescue me from the unicorns" (vid. thereon on xxix. 6). תְּיִדְרֶה, as the parallel member here and in xxxv. 17 shews, is an epithet of נֶפֶשׁ. The LXX. in both instances renders it correctly ἑνὴ ψυχῆς ἑνὴ μὸν, Vulg. unicam meam, according to Gen. xxii. 2, Judges xi. 34, the one soul besides which man has no second, the one life besides which man has no second to lose, applied subjectively, that is, soul or life as the dearest and most precious thing, cf. Homer's φίλον κῆρ. It is also interpreted according to xxv. 16, lxviii. 7: my solitary one, solitarium, the soul as forsaken by God and man, or at least by man, and abandoned to its own self (Hupfeld, Kamphausen, and others). But the parallel נַפְשִׁי, and the analogy of כְּבוֹדִי (= נַפְשִׁי), stamp it as an universal name for the soul: the single one, i. e. that which does not exist in duplicate, and consequently that which cannot be replaced, when lost. The praet. עֲנִיתָנִי might be equivalent to עֲנֵנִי, provided it is a perf. consec. deprived of its Waw convers. in favour of the placing of מְקַרְנֵי רַמִּים first for the sake of emphasis; but considering the turn which the Psalm takes in ver. 23, it must be regarded as perf. confidentiae, inasmuch as in the very midst of his supplication there springs up in the mind of the suppliant the assurance of being heard and answered. To answer from the horns of the antelope is equivalent to hearing and rescuing from them; cf. the equally pregnant expression קָ עָנָה cxviii. 5, perhaps also Hebr. v. 7.*

Vers. 23—24. In the third section, vers. 23—32, the great plaintive prayer closes with thanksgiving and hope. In certainty of being answered, follows the vow of thanksgiving. He calls his fellow-country men, who are connected with him by the ties of nature, but, as what follows, viz. "ye that fear Jahve" shews, also by the ties of spirit, "brethren". קָהָל (from קָהָל = קָל, καλ-έω, cal-o, Sanscr. kal, to resound) coincides with ἐκκλησία. The sufferer is conscious of the significance of his lot of suffering in relation to the working out of the history of redemption. Therefore he will make that salvation which he has experienced common property. The congregation or church shall hear the evangel of his rescue. In ver. 24 follows the introduction to this announcement, which is addressed to the whole of Israel, so far as it fears the God of revelation. Instead of וְיָרֵךְ the text of the Orientals (מְרַחֵם), i. e. Babylonians, had here the Chethib יגור with the Keri יגור; the introduction of the jussive (xxxiii. 8) after the two imperatives would not be inappropriate. גור מן (= יגר) is a stronger form of expression for ירא מן, xxxiii. 8.

Ver. 25. This tristich is the evangel itself. The materia laudis is introduced by כִּי עֲנִיתָ (principal form עָנִיתָ) bending, bowing down, affliction, from עָנָה, the proper word to denote the Passion. For in Isaiah, ch. liii. 4, 7, the Servant of God is also said to be מְעִנָּה and נֶעְנָה, and Zechariah, ch. ix. 9, also introduces Him as עָנִי and נוֹשָׁע. The LXX., Vulgate, and Targum erroneously render it "cry". עָנָה does not mean to cry, but to answer, ἀπεῖθεσθα; here, however, as the stem-word of עֲנִיתָ, it means to be bent. From the שָׁקַץ (to regard as an abhorrence), which alternates with בָּזָה, we see that the sufferer felt the wrath of God, but this has changed into a love that sends help; God did not long keep His countenance hidden, He hearkened to him, for his prayer was well-pleasing to Him. שָׁמַע is not the verbal adjective, but, since we have the definite fact of the rescue before us, it is a pausal form for שָׁמַע, as in xxxiv. 7, 18, Jer. xxxvi. 13.

Vers. 26—27. The call to thanksgiving is now ended; and there follows a grateful upward glance towards the Author of the salvation; and this grateful upward glance grows into a prophetic view of the future. This fact, that the sufferer is able thus to glory and give thanks in the great congregation (xl. 10), proceeds from Jahve (יְהוָה) as in cxviii. 23, cf. lxxi. 6). The first half of the verse, according to Baer's correct accentuation, closes with בְּקִרְוֵי רֵב יִרְאֵי. יִרְאֵי does not refer to קִרְוֵי, but, as everywhere else, is meant to be referred to Jahve, since the address of prayer passes over into a declarative utterance. It is not necessary in this passage to suppose, that in the mind of David the paying of vows is purely ethical, and not a ritualistic act. Being rescued he will bring the שְׁלָמֵי נֶדֶר, which it is his duty to offer, the thank-offerings, which he vowed to God when in the extremest peril. When the sprinkling with blood (וְיִקְרָה) and the laying of the fat pieces upon the altar (הִקְטִירָה) were completed, the remaining flesh of the shelamim was used by the offerer to make a joyous meal;

and the time allowed for this feasting was the day of offering and on into the night in connection with the tôda-she-lamim offering, and in connection with the shelamim of vows even the following day also (Lev. vii. 15 sq.). The invitation of the poor to share in it, which the law does not command, is rendered probable by these appointments of the law, and expressly commended by other and analogous appointments concerning the second and third tithes. Ver. 27 refers to this: he will invite the עניים, those who are outwardly and spiritually poor, to this "eating before Jahve"; it is to be a meal for which they thank God, who has bestowed it upon them through him whom He has thus rescued. Ver. 27c is as it were the host's blessing upon his guests, or rather Jahve's guests through him: "your heart live for ever", i. e. may this meal impart to you ever enduring refreshment. קַיִּי optative of קַיִּיָה, here used of the reviving of the heart, which is as it were dead (1 Sam. xxv. 37), to spiritual joy. The reference to the ritual of the peace offerings is very obvious. And it is not less obvious, that the blessing, which, for all who can be saved, springs from the salvation that has fallen to the lot of the sufferer, is here set forth. But it is just as clear, that this blessing consists in something much higher than the material advantage, which the share in the enjoyment of the animal sacrifice imparts; the sacrifice has its spiritual meaning, so that its outward forms are lowered as it were to a mere figure of its true nature; it relates to a spiritual enjoyment of spiritual and lasting results. How natural, then, is the thought of the sacramental eucharist, in which the second David, like to the first, having attained to the throne through the suffering of death, makes us partakers of the fruits of His suffering!

Vers. 28—32. The long line closing strophe, which forms as it were the pedestal to the whole, shews how far not only the description of the affliction of him who is speaking here, but also the description of the results of his rescue, transcend the historical reality of David's experience. The sufferer expects, as the fruit of the proclamation of that which Jahve has done for him, the conversion of all peoples. The heathen have become forgetful and will again recollect themselves; the object, in itself clear enough in ix. 18, becomes clear from what follows: there is a  $\gamma\psi\omega\sigma\iota\varsigma$  τοῦ θεοῦ (Psychol. S. 346 ff.; tr. pp. 407 sqq.) among the heathen, which the announcement of the rescue of this afflicted one will bring back to their consciousness.\* This prospect (Jer. xvi. 19 sqq.) is, in ver. 29 (cf. Jer. x. 7), based upon Jahve's right of kingship over all peoples. A ruler is called מֶלֶךְ as being exalted above others by virtue of his office (מֶלֶךְ according to its primary meaning — erectum stare, synonymous with כָּרֵן, vid. on cx. 4, cf. מֶלֶךְ Mic. v. 3). In מֶלֶךְ וּמֶלֶךְ we have the part., used like the 3 præt., without any mark of the person (cf. vii. 10, lv. 20), to express the pure præs., and, so to speak, as tempus durans: He rules among the nations (ἔθνη). The conversion of the heathen by that sermon will, therefore, be the realisation of the kingdom of God.

Ver. 30. The eating is here again brought to mind. The perfect, אָכַל, and the future of sequence, וַיִּשְׂתַּחֲוּוּ, stand to one another in the relation of cause and effect. It is, as is clear from ver. 27, an eating that satisfies the soul, a spiritual meal, that is intended, and in fact, one that is brought about by the mighty act of rescue God has wrought. At the close of Ps. lxxix, where the form of the ritual thank-offering is straightway ignored, רָאָה (ver. 33) takes the place of the אָכַל. There it is the view of one who is rescued and who thankfully glorifies God, which leads to others sharing with him in the enjoyment of the salvation he has experienced; here it is an actual enjoyment of it, the joy, springing from thankfulness, manifesting itself not merely in words but in a thank-offering feast, at which, in Israel, those who long for salvation are the invited guests, for with them it is an acknowledgment of the mighty act of a God whom they already know; but among the heathen, men of the most diversified conditions, the richest and the poorest, for to them it is a favour unexpectedly brought to them, and which is all the more gratefully embraced by them on that account. So magnificent shall be the feast, that all רִשְׁוֹנֵי אֶרֶץ, i. e.

those who stand out prominently before the world and before their own countrymen by reason of the abundance of their temporal possessions (compare on the ascensive use of אָרץ, lxxv. 9, lxxvi. 10, Isa. xxiii. 9), choose it before this abundance, in which they might revel, and, on account of the grace and glory which the celebration includes within itself, they bow down and worship. In antithesis to the "fat ones of the earth" stand those who go down to the dust (עָפָר, always used in this formula of the dust of the grave, like the Arabic turâb) by reason of poverty and care. In the place of the participle יִרְדֵי we now have with תִּפְשֶׁן (= וְאֲשֶׁר נִפְשֶׁן) a clause with וְלֵא, which has the value of a relative clause (as in xlix. 21, lxxviii. 39, Prov. ix. 13, and frequently): and they who have not heretofore prolonged and could not prolong their life (Ges. § 123, 3, c). By comparing Phil. ii. 10 Hupfeld understands it to be those who are actually dead; so that it would mean, His kingdom extends to the living and the dead, to this world and the nether world. But any idea of a thankful adoration of God on the part of the dwellers in Hades is alien to the Old Testament; and there is nothing to force us to it here, since יִרְדֵי עָפָר, can just as well mean descensuri as qui descenderunt, and וְיִהֶה נִפְשֶׁן (also in Ezek. xviii. 27) means to preserve his own life, — a phrase which can be used in the sense of vitam sustentare and of conservare with equal propriety. It is, therefore, those who are almost dead already with care and want, these also (and how thankfully do these very ones) go down upon their knees, because they are accounted worthy to be guests at this table. It is the same great feast, of which Isaiah, ch. xxv. 6, prophesies, and which he there accompanies with the music of his words. And the result of this evangel of the mighty act of rescue is not only of boundless universality, but also of unlimited duration: it propagates itself from one generation to another.

Formerly we interpreted ver. 31 "a seed, which shall serve Him, shall be reckoned to the Lord for a generation;" taking יִסְפָּר as a metaphor applying to the census, 2 Chron. ii. 16, cf. Ps. lxxxvii. 6, and לָדוֹר, according to xxiv. 6 and other passages, as used of a totality of one kind, as וְרַע of the whole body of those of the same race. But the connection makes it more natural to take דור in a genealogical sense; and, moreover, with the former interpretation it ought to have been לְדֹר instead of לְדֹר. We must therefore retain the customary interpretation: "a seed (posterity) shall serve Him, it shall be told concerning the Lord to the generation (to come)". Decisive in favour of this interpretation is לְדֹר with the following יבא, by which דור acquires the meaning of the future generation, exactly as in lxxi. 18, inasmuch as it at once becomes clear, that three generations are distinctly mentioned, viz. that of the fathers who turn unto Jahve, ver. 30, that of the coming דור, ver. 31, and עַם נֹלָד, to whom the news of the salvation is propagated by this דור, ver. 32: "They shall come (בוא as in lxxi. 18: to come into being), and shall declare His righteousness to the people that shall be born, that He hath finished." Accordingly זרע is the principal notion, which divides itself into דור (יבא) and עַם נֹלָד; from which it is at once clear, why the expression could be thus general, "a posterity", inasmuch as it is defined by what follows. עַם נֹלָד is the people which shall be born, or whose birth is near at hand (lxxviii. 6); the LXX. well renders it: λαῶν τῶν τεχθησομένων (cf. cii. 19 בְּרֵא עַם populus creandus). צַדִּיקוֹ is the δικαιοσύνη of God, which has become manifest in the rescue of the great sufferer. That He did not suffer him to come down to the very border of death without snatching him out of the way of his murderous foes and raising him to a still greater glory, this was divine צַדִּיקוֹ. That He did not snatch him out of the way of his murderous foes without suffering him to be on the point of death — even this wrathful phase of the divine צַדִּיקוֹ, is indicated in ver. 16c, but then only very remotely. For the fact, that the Servant of God, before spreading the feast accompanying the shelamim (thank-offering) in which He makes the whole world participants in the fruit of His suffering, offered Himself as an asham (sin-offering), does not become a subject of prophetic revelation until later on, and then under other typical relationships. The nature of the עֲשׂוּהָ, which is in accordance with the determinate counsel of God, is only gradually disclosed in the Old Testament. This one word, so full of meaning (as in lii. 11, xxxvii. 5, Isa. xlv. 23), implying the carrying through of the work of redemption, which is prefigured in David, comprehends everything within itself. It may be compared to the  $\text{וַיִּבְרָא}$ , Gen. ii. 3, at the close of the history of the creation. It is the last word of the Psalm, just as  $\text{τετέλεσται}$  is the last word of the Crucified One. The substance of the gospel in its preparatory history and its fulfilment, of the declaration concerning God which passes from generation to generation, is this, that God has accomplished what He planned when He anointed the son of Jesse and the Son of David as mediator in His work of redemption; that He accomplished it by leading the former through affliction to the throne, and making the cross to the latter a ladder leading up to heaven.

PSALM XXIII.

PRAISE OF THE GOOD SHEPHERD.

- 1 JAHVE is my Shepherd, I shall not want.
- 2 In green pastures He maketh me to lie down, Beside still waters He leadeth me.
- 3 My soul He restoreth,
He leadeth me in right paths —
For His Name's sake.
- 4 Yea, though I walk in the valley of the shadow of death:
I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me,
Thy rod and Thy staff — they comfort me.
- 5 Thou preparest me a table in the presence of mine
oppressors,
Thou anointest my head with oil,
My cup is fulness.
- 6 Only prosperity and mercy shall follow me
All the days of my life,
And again shall I dwell in the house of Jahvc
For length of days

The arrangement, by which a Psalm that speaks of a great feast of mercy prepared for mankind is followed by a Psalm that praises Jahve as the Shepherd and Host of His own people, could not possibly be more sensible and appropriate. If David is the author, and there is no reason for doubting it, then this Psalm belongs to the time of the rebellion under Absalom, and this supposition is confirmed on every hand. It is like an amplification of iv. 8; and iii. 7 is also echoed in it. But not only does it contain points of contact with this pair of Psalms of the time mentioned, but also with other Psalms belonging to same period, as xxvii. 4, and more especially lxiii., which is said to have been composed when David had retreated with his faithful followers over Kidron and the Mount of Olives into the plains of the wilderness of Judah, whither Hushai sent him tidings, which counselled him to pass over Jordan with all possible haste. It is characteristic of all these Psalms, that in them David yearns after the house of God as after the peculiar home of his heart, and, that all his wishes centre in the one wish to be at home again. And does not this short, tender song, with its depth of feeling and its May-like freshness, accord with David's want and wanderings to and fro at that time?

It consists of two hexastichs with short closing lines, resembling (as also in Isa. xvi. 9, 10) the Adonic verse of the strophe of Sappho, and a tetrastich made up of very short and longer lines intermixed.

Vers. 1—3. The poet calls Jahve רָעִי, as He who uniformly and graciously provides for and guides him and all who are His. Later prophecy announces the visible appearing of this Shepherd, Isa. xl. 11, Ezek. xxxiv. 37, and other passages. If this has taken place, the רָעִי רַחֵם from the mouth of man finds its cordial response in the words ἐγὼ εἶμι ὁ ποιμὴν ὁ καλός. He who has Jahve, the possessor of all things, himself has all things, he lacks nothing; viz. לְכֹל־טוֹב | whatever is good in itself and would be good for him, xxxiv. 11, lxxxiv. 12. נְאוֹת דְּשֵׂא are the pastures of fresh and tender grass, where one lies at ease, and rest and enjoyment are combined. נָחָה (נָחָה), according to its primary meaning, is a resting- or dwelling-place, specifically an oasis, i. e. a verdant spot in the desert. מֵי מְנוּחָה are waters, where the weary finds a most pleasant resting-place (according to Hitzig, it is a plural brought in by the plural of the governing word, but it is at any rate a superlative plural), and can at the same time refresh himself. נָהַל is suited to this as being a pastoral word used of gentle leading, and more especially of guiding the herds to the watering-places, just as הִרְבִּיץ is used of making them to rest, especially at noon-tide, Cant. i. 7; cf. ὄσθηται, Apoc. vii. 17. שׁוֹכֵב נַפְשׁ (elsewhere הַשִּׁיב) signifies to bring back the soul that is as it were flown away, so that it comes to itself again, therefore to impart new life, recreate. This He does to the soul, by causing it amidst the dryness and heat of temptation and trouble, to taste the very essence of life which refreshes and strengthens it. The Hiph. הִנְחָה (Arabic: to put on one side, as perhaps in Job xii. 23) is, as in cxliii. 10 the intensive of נָחָה (lxxvii. 21). The poet glories that Jahve leads him carefully and without risk or wandering in מַעְלֵי-צֶדֶק, straight paths and leading to the right goal, and this לְמַעַן שְׁמוֹ (for His Name's sake). He has revealed Himself as the gracious One, and as such He will prove and glorify Himself even in the need of him who submits to His guidance.

Vers. 4—5. Ῥod and staff are here not so much those of the pilgrim, which would be a confusing transition to a different figure, but those of Jahve, the Shepherd (שׂוֹכֵב), as in Mic. vii. 14, and in connection with it, cf. Num. xxi. 18, מִשְׁעֵנָה as the filling up of the picture), as the means of guidance and defence. The one rod, which the shepherd holds up to guide the flock and upon which he leans and anxiously watches over the flock, has assumed a double form in the conception of the idea. This rod and staff in the hand of God comfort him, i. e. preserve to him the feeling of security, and therefore a cheerful spirit. Even when he passes through a valley dark and gloomy as the shadow of death, where surprises and calamities of every kind threaten him, he fears no misfortune. The LXX. narrows the figure, rendering בָּנִיא according to the Aramaic בְּנִיא, Dan. iii. 25, ἐν ἀσάφ. The noun צִלְמוֹת, which occurs in this passage for the first time in the Old Testament literature, is originally not a compound word; but being formed from a verb צלם, צל, ظلم (root צל, ظلم), to overshadow, darken, after the form עֲבֹרֹת, but pronounced עֲלֹמוֹת (cf. הַעֲרֵמוֹת, Hadramôt — the court of death, בְּעֵלְאֵל in-God's-shadow), it signifies the shadow of death as an epithet of the most fearful darkness, as of Hades, Job x. 21 sq., but also of a shaft of a mine, Job xxviii. 3, and more especially of darkness such as makes itself felt in a wild, uninhabited desert, Jer. ii. 6.

After the figure of the shepherd fades away in ver. 4, that of the host appears. His enemies must look quietly on (גָּרַ) as in xxxi. 20), without being able to do anything, and see how Jahve provides bountifully for His guest, anoints him with sweet perfumes as at a joyous and magnificent banquet (xcii. 11), and fills his cup to excess. What is meant thereby, is not necessarily only blessings of a spiritual kind. The king fleeing before Absalom and forsaken by the mass of his people was, with his army, even outwardly in danger of being destroyed by want; it is, therefore, even an abundance of daily bread streaming in upon them, as in 2 Sam. xvii. 27—29, that is meant; but even this, spiritually regarded, as a gift from heaven, and so that the satisfying, refreshing and quickening is only the outside phase of simultaneous inward experiences.* The future תִּשְׂרֶה is followed, according to the customary return to the perfect ground-form, by וְשָׂנֵה, which has, none the less, the signification of a present. And in the closing assertion, כּוֹסִי, my cup, is metonymically equivalent to the contents of my cup. This is וְרִיחֵה, a fulness satiating even to excess.

Ver. 6. Foes are now pursuing him, but prosperity and favour alone shall pursue him, and therefore drive his present pursuers out of the field. אֶךְ, originally affirmative, here restrictive, belongs only to the subject-notion in its signification nil nisi (xxxix. 6, 12, cxxxix. 11). The expression is remarkable and without example elsewhere: as good spirits Jahve sends forth טוֹב and חַסֵּד to overtake David's enemies, and to protect him against them to their shame,

* In the mouth of the New Testament saint, especially on the dies viridium, it is the table of the Lord's supper, as Apollinaris also hints when he applies to it the epithet βίψυκτων βίβρωσαν, horrendorum onustam

and that all his life long (accusative of continuance). We have now no need, in connection with our reference of the Psalm to the persecution under Absalom, either to persuade ourselves that וְשָׁבְתִי is equivalent to וְשָׁבְתִי xxvii. 4, or that it is equivalent to וְיִשְׁבְּתִי. The infinitive is logically inadmissible here, and unheard of with the vowel ā instead of i, which would here (cf. on the other hand קָחֲתִי) be confusing and arbitrary. Nor can it be shewn from Jer. xlii. 10 to be probable that it is contracted from וּשְׁבַתִּי, since in that passage שׁוּב signifies redeundo = rursus. The LXX., certainly, renders it by καθίσταντες, as in 1 Sam. xii. 2 by καὶ καθήσονται; but (since so much uncertainty attaches to these translators and their text) we cannot draw a safe inference as to the existing usage of the language, which would, in connection with such a contraction, go out of the province of one verb into that of another, which is not the case with תָּחֶה — נָחֶה in 2 Sam. xxii. 41. On the contrary we have before us in the present passage a constructio prægna: "and I shall return (perf. consec.) in the house of Jahve", i. e. again, having returned, dwell in the house of Jahve. In itself בְּשָׁבְתִי might also even mean et revertam ad (cf. vii. 17, Hos. xii. 7), like בְּעֹלָה, xxiv. 3, adscendere ad (in). But the additional assertion of continuance, לְאָרְךָ יָמִים (as in xciii. 5, Lam. v. 20, אָרְךָ, root רָךְ, extension, lengthening — length) favours the explanation, that בְּ is to be connected with the idea of וּשְׁבַתִּי, which is involved in וְשָׁבְתִי as a natural consequence.

PSALM XXIV.

PREPARATION FOR THE RECEPTION OF THE LORD WHO IS ABOUT TO COME.

A. Psalm on going up (below, on the hill of Zion).

Chorus of the festive procession.

- 1 JAHVE's is the earth, and its fulness,
The world, and they that dwell therein.
- 2 For He, He hath founded it upon the seas,
And upon streams did He set it fast.

A voice.

- 3 Who may ascend the hill of Jahve,
Who may stand in His holy place?

Another voice.

- 4 He that is of innocent hands and of pure heart,
He that doth not lift up his soul to vanity,
And doth not swear deceitfully —

Chorus.

- 5 He shall receive a blessing from Jahve,
And righteousness from the God of his salvation.
6 This is the generation of those who aspire after Him,
Who seek Thy face — Jacob. (Sela)

B. Psalm on entering (above, on the citadel of Zion).

Chorus of the festive procession.

- 7 Lift up, ye gates, your heads,
And raise yourselves, ye ancient doors,
That the King of Glory may come in.

A voice, as it were, from the gates.

- 8 Who is, then, the King of Glory?

Chorus.

- Jahve, a mighty one and a hero,
Jahve, a hero in battle.
9 Lift up, ye gates, your heads,
And raise yourselves, ye ancient doors,
That the King of Glory may come in.

As it were, from the gates.

- 10 Who is He, then, the King of Glory?

Chorus.

- Jahve of Hosts,
He is the King of Glory. (Sela)

Ps. xxiii. expressed a longing after the house of Jahve on Zion; Ps. xxiv. celebrates Jahve's entrance into Zion, and the true character of him who may enter with Him. It was composed when the Ark was brought from Kirjath Jearim to Mount Zion, where David had caused it to be set up in a tabernacle built expressly for it, 2 Sam. vi. 17, cf. xi. 11, 1 Kings i. 39; or else, which is rendered the more probable by the description of Jahve as a warrior, at a time when the Ark was brought back to Mount Zion, after having been taken to accompany the army to battle (vid. Ps. lxxviii.). Ps. xv. is very similar. But only xxiv. 1—6 is the counterpart of that Psalm; and there is nothing wanting to render the first part of Ps. xxiv. complete in itself. Hence Ewald divides Ps. xxiv. into two songs, belonging to different periods, although both old Davidic songs, viz. Ps. xxiv. 7—10, the song of victory sung at the removal of the Ark to Zion; and xxiv. 1—6, a purely didactic song pre-supposing this event which forms an era in their history. And it is relatively more natural to regard this Psalm rather than Ps. xix., as two songs combined and made into one; but these two songs have an internal coherence; in Jahve's coming to His temple is found that which occasioned them and that towards which They point; and consequently they form a whole consisting of two divisions. To the inscription לְדוֹד מְזִמּוֹר the LXX. adds ἡς μᾶς σαββατου* (= שַׁבָּת אֶחָד בַּשָּׁבֹעַ, for the first day of the week), according to which this Psalm was a customary Sunday Psalm. This addition is confirmed by B. Tamid extr., Rosh ha-Shana 31a, Sofrim xviii. (cf. supra p. 32). In the second of these passages cited from the Talmud, R. Akiba seeks to determine the reasons for this choice by reference to the history of the creation.

Incorporated in Israel's hymn-book, this Psalm became, with a regard to its original occasion and purpose, an Old Testament Advent hymn in honour of the Lord who should come into His temple, Mal. iii. 1; and the cry: Lift up, ye gates, your heads, obtained a meaning essentially the same as that of the voice of the crier in Isaiah xl. 3: Prepare ye Jahve's way, make smooth in the desert a road for our God! In the New Testament consciousness, the second appearing takes the place of the first, the coming of the Lord of Glory to His church, which is His spiritual temple; and in this Psalm we are called upon to prepare Him a worthy reception. The interpretation of the second half of the Psalm of the entry of the Conqueror of death into Hades, — an interpretation which has been started by the Gospel of Nicodemus (vid. Tischendorf's Ev. apocrypha p. 306 sq.) and still current in the Greek church, — and the patristic interpretation of it of the εἰς οὐρανὸς ἀνάληψις τοῦ κυρίου, do as much violence to the rules of exegesis as to the parallelism of the facts of the Old and New Testaments.

Vers. 1—6. Jahve, whose throne of grace is now set upon Zion, has not a limited dominion, like the heathen deities: His right to sovereignty embraces the earth and its fulness (l. 12, lxxxix. 12), i. e. everything that is to be found upon it and in it.* For He, יהוה, is the owner of the world, because its Creator. He has founded it upon seas, i. e. the ocean and its streams, יַהַרְרֹתָ, ἰεζερα (Jon. ii. 4); for the waters existed before the dry land, and this has been cast up out of them at God's word, so that consequently the solid land, — which indeed also conceals in its interior a יַהַרְרֹתָ יַבֵּיבָה (Gen. vii. 11), — rising above the surface of the sea, has the waters, as it were, for its foundation (cxxxvi. 6), although it would more readily sink down into them than keep itself above them, if it were not in itself upheld by the creative power of God. Hereupon arises the question, who may ascend the mountain of Jahve, and stand above in His holy place? The futures have a potential signification: who can have courage to do it? what, therefore, must he be, whom Jahve receives into His fellowship, and with whose worship He is well-pleased? Answer: he must be one innocent in his actions and pure in mind, one who does not lift up his soul to that which is vain (נפשׁוֹל, according to the Masora with Waw minusculum). (ה) לֵאמֹר נַפְשׁוֹ לַיהוָה, to direct one's soul, xxv. 1, or longing and striving, towards anything, Deut. xxiv. 15, Prov. xix. 18, Hos. iv. 8. The Keri נַפְשׁוֹ is old and acknowledged by the oldest authorities.* Even the LXX. Cod. Alex. translates: τὴν ψυχὴν μου; whereas Cod. Vat. (Eus., Apollin., Theodor., et al.): τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ. Critically it is just as intangible, as it is exegetically incomprehensible; נַפְשׁוֹ might then be equivalent to נַפְשׁוֹ, Exod. xx. 7, an explanation, however, which does not seem possible even from Amos vi. 8, Jer. li. 14. We let this Keri alone to its undisturbed critical rights. But that the poet did actual write thus, is incredible.

* In 1 Cor. x. 26, Paul founds on this verse (cf. l. 12) the doctrine that a Christian (apart from a charitable regard for the weak) may eat whatever is sold in the shambles, without troubling himself to enquire whether it has been offered to idols or not. A Talmudic teacher, B. Berachoth 35a, infers from this passage the duty of prayer before meat: He who eats without giving thanks is like one who lays hands upon קדושי שמים (the sacred things of God); the right to eat is only obtained by prayer.

In ver. 5 (just as at the close of Ps. xv.), in continued predicates, we are told the character of the man, who is worthy of this privilege, to whom the question in ver. 3 refers. Such an one shall bear away, or acquire (נֶאֱמַר), as e. g. Esth. ii. 17) blessing from Jahve and righteousness from

* The reading נַפְשׁוֹ is adopted by Saadia (in Emunoth ii, where נַפְשׁוֹ is equivalent to נַפְשׁוֹ), Juda ha-Levi (Cuzari iii. 27), Abulwalid (Rikma p. 180), Rashi, Kimchi, the Sohar, the Codices (and among others by that of the year 1294) and most editions (among which, the Complutensis has נַפְשׁוֹ in the text). Nor does Aben-Ezra, whom Norzi has misunderstood, by any means reverse the relation of the Chethib and Keri; to him נַפְשׁוֹ is the Keri, and he explains it as a metaphor (an anthropomorphism): וּכְחוּב נַפְשׁוֹ רִדָּךְ כִּנִּי. Elias Levita is the only one who rejects the Keri נַפְשׁוֹ; but he does so through misunderstanding a Masora (vid. Baer's Psalterium p. 130) and not without admitting Masoretic testimony in favour of it (וְכִן רִאשׁוֹנֵי בְרוּב נִסְחָאוֹת הַמַּסֹּרֶת). He is the only textual critic who rejects it. For Jacob b. Chajim is merely astonished that נַפְשׁוֹ is not to be found in the Masoreth register of words written with Waw and to be read with Jod. And even Norzi does not reject this Keri, which he is obliged to admit has greatly preponderating testimony in its favour, and he would only too gladly get rid of it.

the God of his salvation (xxv. 5, xxvii. 9). Righteousness, i. e. conformity to God and that which is well-pleasing to God, appears here as a gift, and in this sense it is used interchangeably with יָשַׁע (e. g. cxxxii. 9, 16). It is the righteousness of God after which the righteous, but not the self-righteous, man hungers and thirsts; that moral perfection which is the likeness of God restored to him and at the same time brought about by his own endeavours; it is the being changed, or transfigured, into the image of the Holy One Himself. With ver. 5 the answer to the question of ver. 3 is at an end; ver. 6 adds that those thus qualified, who may accordingly expect to receive God's gifts of salvation, are the true church of Jahve, the Israel of God. דָּוָר (lit. a revolution, Arabic dahr, root דָּר, to turn, revolve) is used here, as in xiv. 5, lxxiii. 15, cxii. 2, of a collective whole, whose bond of union is not cotemporaneousness, but similarity of disposition; and it is an alliteration with the דְּרָשִׁי (Chethib דְּרָשִׁי, without the Jod plur.) which follows. מִבְּקָשִׁי פָּנֶיךָ is a second genitive depending on דָּוָר, as in xxvii. 8. Here at the close the predication passes into the form of invocation (Thy face). And יַעֲקֹב is a summarising predicate: in short, these are Jacob, not merely after the flesh, but after the spirit, and thus in truth (Isa. xlv. 2, cf. Rom. ix. 6, Gal. vi. 16). By interpolating אֱלֹהֶיךָ, as is done in the LXX. and Peshîto, and adopted by Ewald, Olshausen, Hupfeld, and Böttcher, the nerve, as it were, of the assertion is cut through. The predicate, which has been expressed in different ways, is concentrated intelligibly enough in the one word יַעֲקֹב, towards which it all along tends. And here the music becomes forte. The first part of this double Psalm dies away amidst the playing of the instruments of the Levitical priests; for the Ark was brought in בְּכָל־עֹז וּבְשִׁירִים, as 2 Sam. vi. 5 (cf. 14) is to be read.

Vers. 7—10. The festal procession has now arrived above at the gates of the citadel of Zion. These are called פְּתָחַי עוֹלָם, doors of eternity (not "of the world" as Luther renders it contrary to the Old Testament usage of the language) either as doors which pious faith hopes will last for ever, as Hupfeld and Hitzig explain it, understanding them, in opposition to the inscription of the Psalm, to be the gates of Solomon's Temple; or, what seems to us much more appropriate in the mouth of those who are now standing before the gates, as the portals dating back into the hoary ages of the past (עֹלָם as e. g. in Gen. xlix. 26, Isa. lviii. 12), the time of the Jebusites, and even of Melchizedek, through which the King of Glory, whose whole being and acts is glory, is now about to enter. It is the gates of the citadel of Zion, to which the cry is addressed, to expand themselves in a manner worthy of the Lord who is about to enter, for whom they are too low and too strait. Rejoicing at the great honour, thus conferred upon them, they are to raise their heads (Job x. 15, Zech. ii. 4), i. e. lift up their portals (lintels); the doors of antiquity are to open high and wide.* Then the question echoes back to the festal procession from Zion's gates which are wont only to admit mighty lords: who, then (יְהוָה giving vividness to the question, Ges. § 122, 2), is this King of Glory; and they describe Him more minutely: it is the Hero-god, by whom Israel has wrested this Zion from the Jebusites with the sword, and by whom he has always been victorious in time past. The adjectival climactic form עָזָה (like לָמִיר, with î instead of the ā in קָשִׁיב, חָנִּין) is only found in one other passage, viz. Isa. xliii. 17. מִלְחָמָה refers back to Exod. xv. 3. Thus then shall the gates raise their heads and the ancient doors lift themselves, i. e. open high and wide; and this is expressed here by Kal instead of Niph. (נָשָׂא to lift one's self up, rise, as in Nah. i. 5, Hos. xiii. 1, Hab. i. 3), according to the well-known order in which recurring verses and refrain-like repetitions move gently onwards. The gates of Zion ask once more, yet now no longer hesitatingly, but in order to hear more in praise of the great King. It is now the enquiry seeking fuller information; and the heaping up of the pronouns (as in Jer. xxx. 21, cf. xlvi. 7, Esth. vii. 5) expresses its urgency (quis tandem, ecquisnam). The answer runs, "Jahve Tsebaoth, He is the King of Glory (now making His entry)". ה' צְבָאוֹת is the proper name of Jahve as King, which had become His customary name in the time of the kings of Israel. צְבָאוֹת is a genitive governed by ה'; and, while it is otherwise found only in reference to human hosts, in this combination it gains, of itself, the reference to the angels and the stars, which are called צְבָאוֹת in ciii. 21, cxlviii. 2: Jahve's hosts consisting of celestial heroes, Joel ii. 11, and of stars standing on the plain of the heavens as it were in battle array, Isa. xl. 26, — a reference for which experiences and utterances like those recorded in Gen. xxxii. 2 sq., Deut. xxxiii. 2, Judges v. 20, have prepared the way. It is, therefore, the Ruler commanding innumerable and invincible super-terrestrial powers, who desires admission. The gates are silent and open wide; and Jahve, sitting enthroned above the Cherubim of the sacred Ark, enters into Zion.

PRAYER FOR GRACIOUS PROTECTION AND GUIDANCE

- 1 א UNTO Thee, Jahve, do I lift up my soul.
- 2 ב My God in Thee do I trust, let me not be ashamed,
Let not mine enemies triumph over me.
- 3 ג Yea none that wait on Thee shall be ashamed,
They shall be ashamed who are faithless without cause.
- 4 ד Thy ways, Jahve, make known to me,
Thy paths teach Thou me.
- 5 ה Lead me in Thy truth, and teach me;
For Thou art the God of my salvation,
On Thee do I hope continually.
- 6 ו Remember, Jahve, Thy tender mercies and Thy loving-kindnesses,
For they are ever of old.
- 7 ז The sins of my youth and my transgressions remember not,
According to Thy mercy remember Thou me
For Thy goodness' sake, Jahve!
- 8 ח Good and upright is Jahve;
Therefore He instructeth sinners in the right way.
- 9 ט He leadeth the humble in that which is right,
And teacheth the humble His way.

- 10 ▷ All the paths of Jahve are mercy and truth,
To such as keep His covenant and His testimonies.
- 11 ↳ For Thy name's sake, Jahve, pardon my sin,
For it is great.
- 12 ▷ What man is he that feareth Jahve?
Him shall He teach in the way of right choice.
- 13 ▷ His soul shall dwell in prosperity,
And his seed shall inherit the land.
- 14 ▷ The secret of Jahve is with them that fear Him,
And His covenant doth He make them know.
- 15 γ Mine eyes are ever towards Jahve,
For He will pluck my feet out of the net.
- 16 ▷ Turn Thee unto me and be gracious unto me,
For I am desolate and needy.
- 17 γ Troubles have spread over my heart,
Out of my distresses bring Thou me forth!
- 18 γ Look upon mine affliction and my trouble,
And forgive all my sins.
- 19 γ Look upon mine enemies, that they are many,
And with cruel hatred they hate me.

A question similar to the question, Who may ascend the mountain of Jahve? which Ps. xxiv. propounded, is thrown out by Ps. xxv., Who is he that feareth Jahve? in order to answer it in great and glorious promises. It is a calmly confident prayer for help against one's foes, and for God's instructing, pardoning, and leading grace. It is without any definite background indicating the history of the times in which it was composed; and also without any clearly marked traits of individuality. But it is one of the nine alphabetical Psalms of the whole collection, and the companion to Ps. xxxiv., to which it corresponds even in many peculiarities of the acrostic structure. For both Psalms have no ṽ strophe; they are parallel both as to sound and meaning in the beginnings of the ם, ץ, and the first ם strophes; and both Psalms, after having gone through the alphabet, have a ם strophe added as the concluding one, whose beginning and contents are closely related. This homogeneousness points to one common author. We see nothing in the alphabetical arrangement at least, which even here as in Ps. ix—x. is handled very freely and not fully carried out, to hinder us from regarding David as this author. But, in connection with the general ethical and religious character of the Psalm, it is wanting in positive proofs of this. In its universal character and harmony with the plan of redemption Ps. xxv. coincides with many post-exilic Psalms. It contains nothing but what is common to the believing consciousness of the church in every age; nothing specifically belonging to the Old Testament and Israelitish, hence Theodoret says: ἀρμόζει μάλιστα τοῖς ἐξ ἔθνων κεκλημένοις. The introits for the second and third Quadragesima Sundays are taken from vers. 6 and 15; hence these Sundays are called Reminiscere and Oculi. Paul Gerhard's hymn "Nach dir, o Herr, verlanget mich" is a beautiful poetical rendering of this Psalm.

Vers. 1—2. The Psalm begins, like Ps. xvi. xxiii., with a monostich. Ver. 2 is the ם strophe, יה־לֹא (unless one is disposed to read יה־לֹא ך according to the position of the words in xxxi. 2), after the manner of the interjections in the tragedians, e. g. ὦμοι, not being reckoned as belonging to the verse (J. D. Köhler). In need of help and full of longing for deliverance he raises his soul, drawn away from earthly desires, to Jahve (lxxxvi. 4, cxliiii. 8), the God who alone can grant him that which shall truly satisfy his need. His ego, which has the soul within itself, directs his soul upwards to Him whom he calls יה־לֹא, because in believing confidence he clings to Him and is united with Him. The two לֹא declare what Jahve is not to allow him to experience, just as in xxxi. 2, 18. According to xxxv. 19, 24, xxxviii. 17, it is safer to construe לֹא with אֲנִי (cf. lxxi. 10), as also in xxvii. 2, xxx. 2, Mic. vii. 8, although it would be possible to construe it with אִיְיָ (cf. cxliv. 2). In ver. 3 the confident expectation of the individual is generalised.

Ver. 3. That wherewith the praying one comforts himself is no peculiar personal prerogative, but the certain, joyous prospect of all believers: ἡ ἐλπὶς οὐ κατασχόμεναι, Rom. v. 5. These are called קוֹיָה (קוֹיָה participle to קוֹיָה, just as דְּבָר is the participle to דְּבָר). Hope is the eye of faith which looks forth clear and fixedly into the future. With those who hope in Jahve, who do not allow themselves to be in any way disconcerted respecting Him, are contrasted those who act treacherously towards Him (cxix. 158, Aq., Symm., Theodot., οἱ ἀποστατοῦντες), and that רִיקָם, i. e. — and it can only mean this — from vain and worthless pretexts, and therefore from wanton unconscientiousness.

Ver. 4. Recognising the infamy of such black ingratitude, he prays for instruction as to the ways which he must take according to the precepts of God (xviii. 22). The will of God, it is true, lies before us in God's written word, but the expounder required for the right understanding of that word is God Himself. He prays Him for knowledge; but in order to make what he knows a perfect and living reality, he still further needs the grace of God, viz. both His enlightening and also His guiding grace.

Ver. 5. His truth is the lasting and self-verifying fact of His revelation of grace. To penetrate into this truth and to walk in it (xxvi. 3, lxxxvi. 11) without God, is a contradiction in its very self. Therefore the psalmist prays, as in cxix. 35, ὁδῆγησόν με ἐν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ σου (LXX. Cod. Alex.; whereas Cod. Vat. ἐπὶ τῆν . . . , cf. John xvi. 13). He prays thus, for his salvation comes from Jahve, yea Jahve is his salvation. He does not hope for this or that, but for Him, all the day, i. e. unceasingly,* for everything worth hoping for, everything that can satisfy the longing of the soul, is shut up in Him. All mercy or grace, however, which proceeds from Him, has its foundation in His compassion and condescension.

* Hupfeld thinks the accentuation inappropriate; the first half of the verse, however, really extends to וְשִׁבְחֵי, and consists of two parts, of which the second is the confirmation of the first: the second half contains a relatively new thought. The sequence of the accents: Rebia magnum, Athnach, therefore fully accords with the matter.

Ver. 6. The supplicatory reminiscere means, may God never forget to exercise His pity and grace towards him, which are (as the plurals imply) so rich and superabundant. The ground on which the prayer is based is introduced with כִּי (nam, or even quoniam). God's compassion and grace are as old in their operation and efficacy as man's feebleness and sin; in their counsels they are eternal, and therefore have also in themselves the pledge of eternal duration (c. 5, ciii. 17).

Ver. 7. May Jahve not remember the faults of his youth (חַטָּאתַי), into which lust and thoughtlessness have precipitated him, nor the transgressions (פְּשָׁעַיִם), by which even in maturer and more thoughtful years he has turned the grace of God into licentiousness and broken off his fellowship with Him (פָּשַׁע בָּ, of defection); but may He, on the contrary, turn His remembrance to him (זָכַר לִי as in cxxxvi. 23) in accordance with His grace or loving-kindness, which חַסְדֶּךָ challenges as being the form of self-attestation most closely corresponding to the nature of God. Memor esto quidem mei, observes Augustine, non secundum iram, qua ego dignus sum, sed secundum misericordiam tuam, quae te digna est. For God is טוֹב, which is really equivalent to saying, He is ἀγάπη. The next distich shews that טוֹב is intended here of God's goodness, and not, as e. g. in Neh. ix. 35, of His abundance of possessions.

Ver. 8. The כִּי with הַדֶּרֶךְ denotes the way, i. e. the right way (Job xxxi. 7), as the sphere and subject of the instruction, as in xxxii. 8, Prov. iv. 11, Job xxvii. 11. God condescends to sinners in order to teach them the way that leads to life, for He is טוֹב-וַיֵּשֶׁר; well-doing is His delight, and, if His anger be not provoked (xviii. 27b), He has only the sincerest good intention in what He does.

Ver. 9. The shortened form of the future stands here, according to Ges. § 128, 2, rem., instead of the full form (which, viz. יַדְרִיךְ, is perhaps meant); for the connection which treats of general facts, does not admit of its being taken as optative. The ב (cf. ver. 5, cvii. 7, cxix. 35) denotes the sphere of the guidance. מְשַׁפֵּט is the right so far as it is traversed, i. e. practised or carried out. In this course of right He leads the עֲנִיִּים, and teaches them the way that is pleasing to Himself. עֲנִיִּים is the one word for the gentle, mansueti, and the humble, modesti. Jerome uses these words alternately in ver. 9*a* and 9*b*; but the poet designedly repeats the one word — the cardinal virtue of עֲנָוָה — here with the preponderating notion of lowliness. Upon the self-righteous and self-sufficient He would be obliged to force Himself even against their will. He wants disciples eager to learn; and how richly He rewards those who guard what they have learnt!

Ver. 10. The paths intended, are those which He takes with men in accordance with His revealed will and counsel. These paths are חַסֵּד [loving-kindness, mercy, or grace], for the salvation of men is their goal, and אֱמֶת [truth], for they give proof at every step of the certainty of His promises. But only they who keep His covenant and His testimonies faithfully and obediently shall share in this mercy and truth. To the psalmist the name of Jahve, which unfolds itself in mercy and truth, is precious. Upon it he bases the prayer that follows.

Ver. 11. The perf. consec. is attached to the יְהוָה, which is, according to the sense, implied in לְמַעַן שְׂמֶךָ, just as in other instances it follows adverbial members of a clause, placed first for the sake of emphasis, when those members have reference to the future, Ges. § 126, rem. 1. Separate and manifold sins (ver. 7) are all comprehended in עֲוֹן, which is in other instances also the collective word for the corruption and the guilt of sin. כִּי gives the ground of the need and urgency of the petition. A great and multiform load of sin lies upon him, but the name of God, i. e. His nature that has become manifest in His mercy and truth, permits him to ask and to hope for forgiveness, not for the sake of anything whatever that he has done, but just for the sake of this name (Jer. xiv. 7, Isa. xliii. 25). How happy therefore is he who fears God, in this matter!

Ver. 12. The question: quisnam est vir, which resembles xxxiv. 13, cvii. 43, Isa. l. 10, is only propounded in order to draw attention to the person who bears the character described, and then to state what such an one has to expect.

In prose we should have a relative antecedent clause instead, viz. qui (quisquis) talis est qui Dominum vereatur.* The attributive יִקְחֶרֶךְ, (viam quam eligat (cf. Isa. xlvi. 17), might also be referred to God: in which He takes delight (LXX.); but parallels like cxix. 30, 173, favour the rendering: which he should chose. Among all the blessings which fall to the lot of him who fears God, the first place is given to this, that God raises him above the vacillation and hesitancy of human opinion.

Ver. 13. The verb לִין (לִין), probably equivalent to לִין (from לִין) signifies to tarry the night, to lodge. Good, i. e. inward and outward prosperity, is like the place where such an one turns in and finds shelter and protection. And in his posterity will be fulfilled what was promised to the patriarchs and to the people delivered from Egypt, viz. possession of the land, or as this promise runs in the New Testament, of the earth, Mat. v. 5 (cf. Ps. xxxvii. 11), Apoc. v. 10.

Ver. 14. The LXX. renders ἄνοιμα, as though it were equivalent to אִנִּים. The reciprocal אִנִּים, ii. 2 (which see), leads one to the right primary signification. Starting from the primary meaning of the root אִנ, "to be or to make tight, firm, compressed", אִנִּים signifies a being closely pressed together for the purpose of secret communication and converse, confidential communion or being together, lxxxix. 8, cxi. 1 (Symm. δμῦλῖα), then the confidential communication itself, lv. 15, a secret (Aquila ἀπόρρητον, Theod. μυστήριον). So here: He opens his mind without any reserve, speaks confidentially with those who fear Him; cf. the derivative passage Prov. iii. 32, and an example of the thing itself in Gen. xviii. 17. In ver. 14b the infinitive with ל, according to Ges. § 132, rem. 1, as in Isa. xxxviii. 20, is an expression for the fut. periphrast.: fædus suum notum facturum est iis; the position of the words is like Dan. ii. 16, 18, iv. 15. הוֹרִיעַ is used of the imparting of not merely intellectual, but experimental knowledge. Hitzig renders it differently, viz.

to enlighten them. But the Hiph. is not intended to be used thus absolutely even in 2 Sam. vii. 21. בְּרִירוֹ is the object; it is intended of the rich and deep and glorious character of the covenant revelation. The poet has now on all sides confirmed the truth, that every good gift comes down from above, from the God of salvation; and he returns to the thought from which he started.

Ver. 15. He who keeps his eyes constantly directed towards God (cxli. 8, cxxiii. 1), is continually in a praying mood, which cannot remain unanswered. תָּמִיד corresponds to ἀδιαλείπτως in 1 Thess. v. 17. The aim of this constant looking upwards to God, in this instance, is deliverance out of the enemy's net. He can and will pull him out (xxxii. 5) of the net of complicated circumstances into which he has been ensnared without any fault of his own.

Ver. 16. The rendering "regard me", so far as לִפְנֵי אֵל means God's observant and sympathising turning to any one (LXX. ἐπιβλέπειν), corresponds to lxxxvi. 16, Lev. xxvi. 9. For this he longs, for men treat him as a stranger and refuse to have anything to do with him. יָחִיד is the only one of his kind, one who has no companion, therefore the isolated one. The recurrence of the same sounds אָנִי אָנִי is designedly not avoided. To whom could he, the isolated one, pour forth his affliction, to whom could he unveil his inmost thoughts and feelings? to God alone! To Him he can bring all his complaints, to Him he can also again and again always make supplication.

Ver. 17. The Hiph. הִרְחִיב signifies to make broad, and as a transitive denominative applied to the mind and heart: to make a broad space — to expand one's self (cf. as to the idea, Lam. ii. 13, "great as the sea is thy misfortune"), LXX. ἐπλατύνθησαν, perhaps originally it was ἐπλατύνθησαν. Accordingly הִרְחִיבִי is admissible so far as language is concerned; but since it gives only a poor antithesis to צָרוֹת it is to be suspected. The original text undoubtedly was וַיִּמְצְאוּנִי וּמְצוֹקוֹתֵי הַרְחִיבֵהּ (הִרְחִיבֵהּ, as in lxxvii. 2, or הִרְחִיבֵהּ, as e. g. in 2 Kings viii. 6): the straits of my heart do Thou enlarge (cf. cxix. 32, 2 Cor. vi. 11) and bring me out of my distresses (Hitzig and others).

Vers. 18—19. The falling away of the p is made up for by a double  $\gamma$  strophe. Even the LXX. has  $\tilde{\iota}\delta\epsilon$  twice over. The seeing that is prayed for, is in both instances a seeing into his condition, with which is conjoined the notion of interposing on his behalf, though the way and manner thereof is left to God.  $\text{לְנַשֵּׂא}$ , with the object in the dative instead of the accusative (tollere peccata), signifies to bestow a taking away, i. e. forgiveness, upon any one (synon.  $\text{לְסַלַח}$ ). It is pleasing to the New Testament consciousness that God's vengeance is not expressly invoked upon his enemies.  $\text{כִּי}$  is an expansive quod as in Gen. i. 4.  $\text{שְׂנֵאתָ הָאֵם}$  with an attributive genitive is hatred, which springs from injustice and ends in injustice.

Ver. 20. He entreats for preservation and deliverance from God; and that He may not permit his hope to be disappointed ( $\text{אַל־אֲכַזֵּשׁ}$ , cf. 1 Chron. xxi. 13, instead of  $\text{אַל־אֲכַזְשֶׁה}$ , which is usual in other instances). This his hope rests indeed in Him: he has taken refuge in Him and therefore He cannot forsake him, He cannot let him be destroyed.

Ver. 21. Devoutness that fills the whole man, that is not merely half-hearted and hypocritical, is called  $\text{חֵם}$ ; and uprightness that follows the will of God without any by-paths and forbidden ways is called  $\text{יֵשֶׁר}$ . These two radical virtues (cf. Job i. 1) he desires to have as his guardians on his way which is perilous not only by reason of outward foes, but also on account of his own sinfulness. These custodians are not to let him pass out of their sight, lest he should be taken away from them (cf. xl. 12, Prov. xx. 28). He can claim this for himself, for the cynosure of his hope is God, from whom proceed  $\text{חֵם}$  and  $\text{יֵשֶׁר}$  like good angels.

Ver. 22. His experience is not singular, but the enmity of the world and sin bring all who belong to the people of God into straits just as they have him. And the need of the individual will not cease until the need of the whole undergoes a radical remedy. Hence the intercessory prayer of this meagre closing distich, whose connection with what precedes is not in this instance so close as in xxxiv. 23. It looks as though it was only added when Ps. xxv. came to be used in public worship; and the change of the name of God favours this view. Both Psalms close with a  $\text{פ}$  in excess of the alphabet. Perhaps the first  $\text{D}$  represents the  $\pi$ , and the second the  $\varphi$ ; for xxv. 16, xxxiv. 17 follow words ending in a consonant, and xxv. 22, xxxiv. 23, words ending in a vowel. Or is it a propensity for giving a special representation of the final letters, just as these are sometimes represented, though not always perfectly, at the close of the hymns of the synagogue (píjutim)?

PSALM XXVI.

THE LONGING OF ONE WHO IS PERSECUTED INNOCENTLY, TO GIVE THANKS TO GOD IN HIS HOUSE.

- 1 VINDICATE my cause, Jahve, for I have walked in mine integrity,
And in Jahve have I trusted without wavering.
- 2 Prove me, Jahve, and try me,
Purify my reins and my heart.
- 3 For Thy loving-kindness is before mine eyes,
And I walk in Thy truth.
- 4 I have not sat with vain persons,
And with dissemblers I have no intercourse.
- 5 I hate the congregation of the wicked,
And I sit not with the ungodly.
- 6 I will wash my hands in innocency,
And I desire to compass Thine altar, Jahve;
- 7 That I may join in with the voice of thanksgiving,
And tell of all Thy wondrous works.
- 8 Jahve, I love the habitation of Thy house,
And the place where Thy glory dwelleth.
- 9 Gather not my soul with sinners,
Nor my life with men of blood,
- 10 In whose hands is infamy,
And whose right hand is full of bribery!
- 11 I, however, do walk in mine integrity --- Deliver me and be gracious unto me!

12 My foot is come to stand in a wide plain,
In the choirs of the congregation will I praise Jahve.

Ps. xxv. and xxvi. are bound together by similarity of thought and expression. In the former as in this Psalm, we find the writer's testimony to his trust in God (יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה, xxv. 2, xxvi. 1); there as here, the cry coming forth from a distressed condition for deliverance (פָּדֵה, xxv. 22, xxvi. 11), and for some manifestation of mercy (יִנְיֶה, xxvi. 11, xxv. 16); and in the midst of these, other prominent points of contact (xxvi. 11, xxv. 21; xxvi. 3., xxv. 5). These are grounds sufficient for placing these two Psalms close together. But in Ps. xxvi. there is wanting the self-accusation that goes hand in hand with the self-attestation of piety, that confession of sin which so closely corresponds to the New Testament consciousness (vid. supra p. 72), which is thrice repeated in Ps. xxv. The harshness of the contrast in which the psalmist stands to his enemies, whose character is here more minutely described, does not admit of the introduction of such a lament concerning himself. The description applies well to the Absolomites. They are hypocrites, who, now that they have agreed together in their faithless and bloody counsel, have thrown off their disguise and are won over by bribery to their new master; for Absolom had stolen the hearts of the men of Israel, 2 Sam. xv. 6. David at that time would not take the Ark with him in his flight, but said: If I shall find favour in the eyes of Jahve, He will bring me back, and grant me to see both it and His habitation, 2 Sam. xv. 25. The love for the house of God, which is expressed herein, is also the very heart of this Psalm.

Vers. 1—3. The poet, as one who is persecuted, prays for the vindication of his rights and for rescue; and bases this petition upon the relation in which he stands to God. יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה, as in vii. 9, xxxv. 24, cf. xliii. 1. צַדִּיק (synon. צַדִּיקָה, which, however, does not take any suffix) is, according to Gen. xx. 5 sq., 1 Kings xxii. 34, perfect freedom from all sinful intent, purity of character, pureness, guilelessness (ἀκακία, ἀπλότης). Upon the fact, that he has walked in a harmless mind, without cherishing or provoking enmity, and trusted unwaveringly (לֹא אֶחָדָה, an adverbial circumstantial clause, cf. xxi. 8) in Jahve, he bases the petition for the proving of his injured right. He does not self-righteously hold himself to be morally perfect, he appeals only to the fundamental tendency of his inmost nature, which is turned towards God and to Him only. Ver. 2 also is not so much a challenge for God to satisfy Himself of his innocence, as rather a request to prove the state of his mind, and, if it be not as it appears to his consciousness, to make this clear to him (cxxxix. 23 sq). כָּחֹן is not used in this passage of proving by trouble, but by a penetrating glance into the inmost nature (xi. 5, xvii. 3). נִסְפָה, not in the sense of πειράζειν, but of δοκιμάζειν. צָרַף, to melt down, i. e. by the agency of fire, the precious metal, and separate the dross (xii. 7, lxvi. 10). The Chethib is not to be read צָרִיפָה (which would be in contradiction to the request), but צָרִיפָה, as it is out of pause also in Isa. xxxii. 11, cf. Judges ix. 8, 12, 1 Sam. xxviii. 8. The reins are the seat of the emotions, the heart is the very centre of the life of the mind and soul.

Ver. 3 tells how confidently and cheerfully he would set himself in the light of God. God's grace or loving-kindness is the mark on which his eye is fixed, the desire of his eye, and he walks in God's truth. חֶסֶד is the divine love, condescending to His creatures, and more especially to sinners (xxv. 7), in unmerited kindness; אֱמִתָּה is the truth with which God adheres to and carries out the determination of His love and the word of His promise. This lovingkindness of God has been always hitherto the model of his life, this truth of God the determining line and the boundary of his walk.

Vers. 4—5. He still further bases his petition upon his comportment towards the men of this world; how he has always observed a certain line of conduct and continues still to keep to it. With ver. 4a compare Jer. xv. 17. מְרִי שָׁוֵא (Job xi. 11, cf. xxxi. 5, where the parallel word is מְרִמָּה) are "not-real," unreal men, but in a deeper stronger sense than we are accustomed to use this word. שָׁוֵא (= שְׁוֵא, from שָׁו) is aridity, hollowness, worthlessness, and therefore badness (סו') of disposition; the chaotic void of alienation from God; untruth white-washed over with the lie of dissimulation (xii. 3), and therefore nothingness: it is the very opposite of being filled with the fulness of God and with that which is good, which is the morally real (its synonym is און, e. g. Job xxii. 15). נַעֲלָמִים, the veiled, are those who know how to keep their worthlessness and their mischievous designs secret and to mask them by hypocrisy; post-biblical צְבוּעִים, dyed (cf. ἀσπαρτος, Luther "ungefärbt", undyed). (אָר) בּוֹא עִם, to go in with any one, is a short expression for: to go in and out with, i. e. to have intercourse with him, as in Prov. xxii. 24, cf. Gen. xxiii. 10. מְרֵעַ (from רָעַע) is the name for one who plots that which is evil and puts it into execution. On רָשָׁע see i. 1.

Vers. 6—8. The poet supports his petition by declaring his motive to be his love for the sanctuary of God, from which he is now far removed, without any fault of his own. The coloured future וְאֶחְבְּבָהּ, distinct from וְאֶחְבְּבָהּ (vid. on iii. 6 and lxxiii. 16), can only mean, in this passage, et ambiam, and not et ambibam as it does in a different connection (Isa. xliii. 26, cf. Judges vi. 9); it is the emotional continuation (cf. xxvii. 6, Cant. vii. 12, Isa. i. 24, v. 19, and frequently) of the plain and uncoloured expression אֶרְחֹץ. He wishes to wash his hands in innocence (יָדַי of the state that is meant to be attested by the action), and compass (lix. 7) the altar of Jahve. That which is elsewhere a symbolic act (Deut. xxi. 6, cf. Mat. xxvii. 24), is in this instance only a rhetorical figure made use of to confess his consciousness of innocence; and it naturally assumes this form (cf. lxxiii. 13) from the idea of the priest washing his hands preparatory to the service of the altar (Exod. xxxii. 20 sq.) being associated with the idea of the altar. And, in general, the expression of vers. 6 sq. takes a priestly form, without exceeding that which the ritual admits of, by virtue of the consciousness of being themselves priests which appertained even to the Israelitish laity (Exod. xix. 16). For סָבַב can be used even of half encompassing as it were like a semi-circle (Gen. ii. 11, Num. xxi. 4), no matter whether it be in the immediate vicinity of, or at a prescribed distance from, the central point. לְשַׁמַּע is a syncopated and defectively written Hiph., for לְהַשְׁמיעַ, like לְשַׁמַּר, Isa. xxiii. 11. Instead of לְשַׁמַּע קוֹל הַזֶּדֶה, “to cause the voice of thanksgiving to be heard”, since הַשְׁמיעַ is used absolutely (1 Chron. xv. 19, 2 Chron. v. 13) and the object is conceived of as the instrument of the act (Ges. § 138, 1, rem. 3), it is “in order to strike in with the voice of thanksgiving”. In the expression “all Thy wondrous works” is included the latest of these, to which the voice of thanksgiving especially refers, viz. the bringing of him home from the exile he had suffered from Absalom. Longing to be back again he longs most of all for the gorgeous services in the house of his God, which are performed around the altar of the outer court; for he loves the habitation of the house of God, the place, where His doxa, — revealed on earth, and in fact revealed in grace, — has taken up its abode. מְעוֹן does not mean refuge, shelter (Hupfeld), — for although it may obtain this meaning from the context, it has nothing whatever to do with עָנָה, med. Waw, in the signification to help (whence má’ûn, má’ûne, má’âne, help, assistance, succour or support), — but place, dwelling, habitation, like the Arabic má’ân, which the Kamus explains by menzil, a place to settle down in, and explains etymologically by مَكَلَّ الْعَيْنِ, i. e. “a spot on which the eye rests as an object of sight”; for in the Arabic má’ân is traced back to عَانَ med. Je, as is seen from the phrase hum minka bi-má’ânin, i. e. they are from thee on a point of sight (= on a spot where thou canst see them from the spot on which thou standest). The signification place, sojourn, abode (Targ. מְדוּרָה) is undoubted; the primary meaning of the root is, however, questionable.

Vers. 9—11. It is now, for the first time, that the petition compressed into the one word שְׁפַטְנִי (ver. 1) is divided out. He prays (as in xxviii. 3), that God may not connect him in one common lot with those whose fellowship of sentiment and conduct he has always shunned. אֲנִשֵּׁי רָמִים, as in v. 7, cf. ἄνθρωποι αἰμάτων, Sir. xxxi. 25. Elsewhere נִמְרָה signifies purpose, and more particularly in a bad sense; but in this passage it means infamy, and not unnatural unchastity, to which בְּיִדְיָהּ is inappropriate, but scum of whatever is vicious in general: they are full of cunning and roguery, and their right hand, which ought to uphold the right — David has the lords of his people in his eye — is filled (מְלֹאָה, not מְלֵאָה) with accursed (Deut. xxvii. 25) bribery to the condemnation of the innocent. He, on the contrary, now, as he always has done, walks in his uprightness, so that now he can with all the more joyful conscience intreat God to interpose judicially in his behalf.

Ver. 12. The epilogue. The prayer is changed into rejoicing which is certain of the answer that shall be given. Hitherto shut in, as it were, in deep trackless gorges, he even now feels himself to be standing בְּמִישׁוֹר,* upon a pleasant plain commanding a wide range of vision (cf. בְּמִדְבָּר, xxxi. 9), and now blends his grateful praise of God with the song of the worshipping congregation, קהל (LXX. ἐν ἐκκλησιαστικῶν), and its full-voiced choirs.

P S A L M XXVII.

TAKING HEART IN GOD, THE ALL-RECOMPENSING ONE.

- 1 JAHVE is my light and my salvation, whom shall I fear?
Jahve is the defence of my life,
of whom shall I be afraid?
- 2 When the wicked come against me,
to eat up my flesh,
My oppressors and my enemies to me —
they have stumbled and fallen.
- 3 Though a host should encamp against me,
my heart shall not fear,
Though war should rise up against me,
in spite of it I will be confident.

* The first labial of the combination כַּכּ, כִּכּ. when the preceding word ends with a vowel and the two words are closely connected, receives the Dagesh contrary to the general rule; on this orthophonic Dag. lenē, vid. Luth. Zeitschr., 1863, S. 414.

- 4 One thing have I asked of Jahve, that do I desire:
 That I may dwell in the house of Jahve
                                           all the days of my life,
 To behold the graciousness of Jahve,
                                           and to meditate in His temple.
- 5 For He concealeth me in His pavilion in the day of evil,
 He hideth me in the shelter of His tabernacle,
 Upon a rock doth He raise me up.
- 6 Thus then shall my head be exalted above mine enemies round about me,
 And I will offer in His tabernacle sacrifices of thankful joy.
 I will sing and play the harp to Jahve.
- 7 Hear, Jahve, when I cry aloud; be gracious unto me and answer me.
- 8 To Thee saith my heart: Seek ye My face —
 'This Thy face, Jahve, will I seek.
- 9 Hide not Thy face from me,
 Put not Thy servant away in anger;
 Thou art my help, cast me not away,
 And forsake me not, O God of my salvation.
- 10 For my father and mother have forsaken me,
 But Jahve taketh me up.
- 11 Teach me, Jahve, Thy way,
 And lead me in an even path because of my liars in wait.
- 12 Give me not over into the will of mine oppressors,
 For false witnesses rise up against me and such as breathe out violence.
- 13 Did I not believe to see Jahve's goodness in the land of the living — !
- 14 Hope in Jahve,
 Be of good courage, and let thine heart be strong,
 And hope in Jahve.

The same longing after Zion meets us sounding forth from this as from the preceding Psalm. To remain his whole life long in the vicinity of the house of God, is here his only prayer; and that, rescued from his enemies, he shall there offer sacrifices of thanksgiving, is his confident expectation. The הִיבֵל of God, the King, is at present only אֱהָא which, however, on account of Him who sits enthroned therein, may just as much be called הִיבֵל as the הִיבֵל which Ezekiel beheld in remembrance of the Mosaic tabernacle, אֱהָא, Ezek. xli. 1. Cut off from the sanctuary, the poet is himself threatened on all sides by the dangers of war; but he is just as courageous in God as in iii. 7, where the battle is already going on: "I do not fear the myriads of people, who are encamped against me." The situation, therefore, resembles that of David during the time of Absalom. But this holds good only of the first half, vers. 1—6. In the second half, ver. 10 is not in favour of its being composed by David. In fact the two halves are very unlike one another. They form a hysteron-proteron, inasmuch as the fides triumphans of the first part changes into fides supplex in the second, and with the beginning of the δέησις in ver. 7, the style becomes heavy and awkward, the strophic arrangement obscure, and even the boundaries of the lines of the verses uncertain; so that one is tempted to regard vers. 7—14 as the appendage of another writer. The compiler, however, must have had the Psalm before him exactly as we now have it; for the grounds for his placing it to follow Ps. xxvi. are to be found in both portions, cf. ver. 7 with xxvi. 11; ver. 11 with xxvi. 12.

Vers. 1—3. In this first strophe is expressed the bold confidence of faith. It is a hexastich in the cæsural schema. Let darkness break in upon him, the darkness of night, of trouble, and of spiritual conflict, yet Jahve is his Light, and if he is in Him, he is in the light and there shines upon him a sun, that sets not and knows no eclipse. This sublime, infinitely profound name for God, אֱהָא, is found only in this passage; and there is only one other expression that can be compared with it, viz. אֱהָא in Isa. lx. 1; cf. φωσ; ἐλάμβανον, John xii. 46. אֱהָא does not stand beside אֱהָא

as an unfigurative, side by side with a figurative expression; for the statement that God is light, is not a metaphor. David calls Him his "salvation" in regard to everything that oppresses him, and the "stronghold (מָעוֹן from עָנָה, with an unchangeable ā) of his life" in regard to everything that exposes him to peril. In Jahve he conquers far and wide; in Him his life is hidden as it were behind a fortress built upon a rock (xxx. 3). When to the wicked who come upon him in a hostile way (עַל קָרַב differing from אֶל קָרַב), he attributes the intention of devouring his flesh, they are conceived of as wild beasts. To eat up any one's flesh signifies, even in Job xix. 22, the same as to pursue any one by evil speaking (in Aramaic by slander, back-biting) to his destruction. In בְּקָרַב the Shebā of the only faintly closed syllable is raised to a Chateph, as in וְלֹשְׁכֵנִי, xxxi. 12, לְשֹׂאֵל, and the like. The לִי of לִי אֹיְבֵי לִי may, as also in xxv. 2 (cf. cxliv. 2), be regarded as giving intensity to the notion of special, personal enmity; but a mere repetition of the subject (the enemy) without the repetition of their hostile purpose would be tame in the parallel member of the verse: לִי is a variation of the preceding עָלַי, as in Lam. iii. 60 sq. In the apodosis בְּשֵׁלֹי וְנִפְלִי, the overthrow of the enemy is regarded beforehand as an accomplished fact. The holy boldness and imperturbable repose are expressed in ver. 3 in the very rhythm. The thesis or downward movement in ver. 3*a* is spondaic: he does not allow himself to be disturbed; the thesis in ver. 3*b* is iambic: he can be bold. The rendering of Hitzig (as of Rashi): "in this do I trust, viz. that Jahve is my light, &c.," is erroneous. Such might be the interpretation, if בּוֹאֵת אֲנִי בּוֹיֵט closed ver. 2; but it cannot refer back over ver. 2 to ver. 1; and why should the poet have expressed himself thus materially, instead of saying בִּיהוֹה? The fact of the case is this, בּוֹיֵט signifies even by itself "of good courage", e. g. Prov. xi. 15; and בּוֹאֵת "in spite of this" (Coccejus: hoc non obstante), Lev. xxvi. 27, cf. Ps. lxxviii. 32, begins the apodosis, at the head of which we expect to find an adversative conjunction.

Vers. 4—5. There is only one thing, that he desires, although he also has besides full satisfaction in Jahve in the midst of strangers and in trouble. The future is used side by side with the perfect in ver. 4a, in order to express an ardent longing which extends out of the past into the future, and therefore runs through his whole life. The one thing sought is unfolded in שָׁבְתִי וְגו'. A life-long dwelling in the house of Jahve, that is to say intimate spiritual intercourse with the God, who has His dwelling (בֵּיתוֹ), His palace (הַיְיבֵל) in the holy tent, is the one desire of David's heart, in order that he may behold and feast upon (רָחַץ בְּ of a clinging, lingering, chained gaze, and consequently a more significant form of expression than רָחַץ with an accusative, lxiii. 3) נְעִם ה' (xc. 17), the pleasantness (or gracefulness) of Jahve, i. e. His revelation, full of grace, which is there visible to the eye of the spirit. The interpretation which regards amœnitas as being equivalent to amœnus cultus takes hold of the idea from the wrong side. The assertion that בִּקֵּר בְּ is intended as a synonym of רָחַץ בְּ, of a pleased and lingering contemplation (Hupf., Hitz.), is contrary to the meaning of the verb, which signifies "to examine (with לְ to seek or spie about after anything, Lev. xiii. 36), to reflect on, or consider"; even the post-biblical signification to visit, more especially the sick (whence בִּקֵּר הַלֵּים), comes from the primary meaning investigare. An appropriate sense may be obtained in the present instance by regarding it as a denominative from בִּקֵּר and rendering it as Dunash and Rashi have done, "and to appear early in His temple"; but it is unnecessary to depart from the general usage of the language. Hengstenberg rightly retains the signification "to meditate on". בְּהֵיכָלֹ is a designation of the place consecrated to devotion, and לְבִקֵּר is meant to refer to contemplative meditation that loses itself in God who is there manifest. In ver. 5 David bases the justification of his desire upon that which the sanctuary of God is to him; the futures affirm what Jahve will provide for him in His sanctuary. It is a refuge in which he may hide himself, where Jahve takes good care of him who takes refuge therein from the storms of trouble that rage outside: there he is far removed from all dangers, he is lifted high above them and his feet are upon rocky ground. The Chethib may be read בְּסִקְתָּ, as in xxxi. 21 and with Ewald § 257,d; but, in this passage, with אֶהְלֵ אֶסֶךְ alternates אֶסֶךְ, which takes the place of סָפָה in the poetic style (lxvi. 3, Lam. ii. 6), though it does not do so by itself, but always with a suffix.*

Ver. 6. With וְעֵתָהּ the poet predicts inferentially (cf. ii. 10) the fulfilment of what he fervently desires, the guarantee of which lies in his very longing itself. וְכַחֵי תְרוּעָה do not mean sacrifices in connection with which the trumpets are blown by the priests; for this was only the case in connection with the sacrifices of the whole congregation (Num. x. 10), not with those of individuals. תְרוּעָה is a synonym of תּוֹרָה, xxvi. 7; and וְכַחֵי תְרוּעָה is a stronger form of expression for וְכַחֵי תּוֹרָה (cvii. 22), i. e. (cf. וְכַחֵי צֶדֶק, iv. 6. li. 21) sacrifices of jubilant thanksgiving: he will offer sacrifices in which his gratitude plays a prominent part, and will sing songs of thanksgiving, accompanied by the playing of stringed instruments, to his Deliverer, who has again and so gloriously verified His promises.

Vers. 7—8. Vows of thanksgiving on the assumption of the answering of the prayer and the fulfilment of the thing supplicated, are very common at the close of Psalms. But in this Psalm the prayer is only just beginning at this stage. The transition is brought about by the preceding conception of the danger that threatens him from the side of his foes who are round about him. The reality, which, in the first part, is overcome and surmounted by his faith, makes itself consciously felt here. It is not to be rendered, as has been done by the Vulgate, Exaudi Domine vocem qua clamavi (rather, clamo) ad te (the introit of the Dominica exspectionis in the interval of preparation between Ascension and Pentecost). קוֹלִי אֶמְעַע has Dechi, and accordingly אֶמְעַע אֶקְרָא, voce mea (as in iii. 5) clamo, is an adverbial clause equivalent to voce mea clamante me. In ver. 8 לֵךְ cannot possibly be so rendered that לִי is treated as Lamed auctoris (Dathe, Olshausen): Thine, saith my heart, is (the utterance:) seek ye my face. The declaration is opposed to this sense, thus artificially put upon it. לִי אֶמְרָךְ are undoubtedly to be construed together; and what the heart says to Jahve is not: Seek ye my face, but by reason of this, and as its echo (Calvin: velut Deo succinens): I will therefore seek Thy face. Just as in Job xlii. 3, a personal inference is drawn from a directly quoted saying of God. In the periodic style it would be necessary to transpose פָּנַי בְּקִשְׁתִּי thus: since Thou hast permitted and exhorted us, or in accordance with Thy persuasive invitation, that we should seek Thy face, I do seek Thy face (Hupfeld). There is no retrospective reference to any particular passage in the Tôra, such as Deut. iv. 29. The prayer is not based upon any single passage of Scripture, but upon God's commands and promises in general.

Vers. 9—10. The requests are now poured forth with all the greater freedom and importunity, that God may be willing to be entreated and invoked. The Hiph. הִפְתָּה signifies in this passage standing by itself (cf. Job xxiv. 4): to push aside. The clause עֲזַרְתִּי הָיִיתָ does not say: be Thou my help (which is impossible on syntactical grounds), nor is it to be taken relatively: Thou who wast my help (for which there is no ground in what precedes); but on the contrary the præf. gives the ground of the request that follows "Thou art my help (lit. Thou has become, or hast ever been) — cast me, then, not away", and it is, moreover, accented accordingly. Ver. 10, as we have already observed, does not sound as though it came from the lips of David, of whom it is only said during the time of his persecution by Saul, that at that time he was obliged to part from his parents, 1 Sam. xxii. 3 sq. The words certainly might be David's, if ver. 10*a* would admit of being taken hypothetically, as is done by Ewald, § 362*b*: should my father and my mother forsake me, yet Jahve will &c. But the entreaty "forsake me not" is naturally followed by the reason: for my father and my mother have forsaken me; and just as naturally does the consolation: but Jahve will take me up, prepare the way for the entreaties which begin anew in ver. 11. Whereas, if כִּי is taken hypothetically, ver. 11 stands disconnectedly in the midst of the surrounding requests. On יִאֲחַזְנֵי cf. Josh. xx. 4.

Vers. 11—12. He is now wandering about like a hunted deer; but God is able to guide him so that he may escape all dangers. And this is what he prays for. As in cxliii. 10, מִישׁוֹר is used in an ethical sense; and differs in this respect from its use in xxvi. 12. On שֶׁרְרִים, see the primary passage v. 9, of which this is an echo. Wily spies dodge his every step and would gladly see what they have invented against him and wished for him, realised. Should he enter the way of sin leading to destruction, it would tend to the dishonour of God, just as on the contrary it is a matter of honour with God not to let His servant fall. Hence he prays to be led in the way of God, for a oneness of his own will with the divine renders a man inaccessible [toevil]. נִפְזָז, ver. 12, is used, as in xvii. 9, and in the similar passage, which is genuinely Davidic, xli. 3, in the signification passion or strong desire; because the soul, in its natural state, is selfishness and inordinate desire. יִפְחַ is a collateral form of פִּיחַ; they are both adjectives formed from the future of the verb פִּיחַ (like יִרְיַח, יִרְיַח): accustomed to breathe out (exhale), i. e. either to express, or to snort, breathe forth (cf. πνεῖν, or ἐμπνεῖν φόνον and φόνος, θύμους, and the like, Acts ix. 1). In both Hitzig sees participles of יִפְחַ (Jer. iv. 31); but x. 5 and Hab. ii. 3 lead back to פִּיחַ (פִּיחַ); and Hupfeld rightly recognises such nouns formed from futures to be, according to their original source, circumlocutions of the participle after the manner of an elliptical relative clause (the صِفَة of the Arabic syntax), and explains יִפְחַ חֲזָבִים together with יִפְחַ חֲמָם, from the verbal construction which still continues in force.

Vers. 13—14. Self-encouragement to firmer confidence of faith. Joined to ver. 12 (Aben-Ezra, Kimchi), ver. 13 trails badly after it. We must, with Geier, Dachsel, and others, suppose that the apodosis is wanting to the protasis with its לִילָא pointed with three points above,* and four below, according to the Masora (cf. B. Berachoth 4a), but a word which is indispensably necessary, and is even attested by the LXX. (ἐαυτῆ) and the Targum (although not by any other of the ancient versions); cf. the protasis with ל, which has no apodosis, in Gen. i. 15, and the apodoses with ו after ל in Gen. xxxi. 42, xliii. 10, 1 Sam. xxxv. 34, 2 Sam. ii. 27 (also Num. xxii. 33, where אָלִי = לֹא אֲנִי = לֹא אֲלִי), which are likewise to be explained per aposiopesin. The perfect after לִלְאֵל (לִלְאֵי) has sometimes the sense of a plusquamperfectum (as in Gen. xliii. 10, nisi cunctati essemus), and sometimes the sense of an imperfect, as in the present passage (cf. Deut. xxxii. 29, si saperent). The poet does not speak of a faith that he once had, a past faith, but, in regard to the danger that is even now abiding and present, of the faith he now has, a present faith. The apodosis ought to run something like this (cxix. 92, xciv. 17): did I not believe, were not confidence preserved to me . . . then (אִם or אִם כֵּן) I should perish; or: then I had suddenly perished. But he has such faith, and he accordingly in ver. 14 encourages himself to go on cheerfully waiting and hoping; he speaks to himself, it is, as it were, the believing half of his soul addressing the despondent and weaker half. Instead of אָמֵן (Deut. xxxi. 7) the expression is, as in xxxi. 25, אָמֵן לַיהוָה, let thy heart be strong, let it give proof of strength. The rendering "May He (Jahve) strengthen thy heart" would require אָמֵן; but אָמֵן, as e.g. הִרְחִיבֵנוּ xxv. 17, belongs to the transitive denominatives applying to the mind or spirit, in which the Hebrew is by no means poor, and in which the Arabic is especially rich.

PSALM XXVIII.

CRY FOR HELP AND THANKSGIVING, IN A TIME OF REBELLION.

- 1 TO Thee, O Jahve, do I cry;
My Rock, remain not deaf to me,
Lest, if Thou be silent to me, I be like them that go down to the pit.
- 2 Hear the voice of my supplication, when I cry unto Thee,
When I lift up my hands to Thy holy sanctuary.
- 3 Carry me not away with the ungodly and with the workers of iniquity,

- Who speak peace with their neighbours,
While evil is in their hearts.
- 4 Give to them according to their work and the wickedness of their deeds;
According to the work of their hands give to them,
Requite them what they have done!
- 5 For they regard not the doings of Jahve,
Nor the work of His hands —
He shall pull them down, not build them up.
- 6 Blessed be Jahve,
Because He hath heard my loud supplication!
- 7 Jahve is my defence and my shield,
In Him my heart trusted and I was helped — Therefore my heart exulteth, and with my song do I praise Him.
- 8 Jahve is a defence to them,
And the saving defence of His anointed one is He.
- 9 O help Thy people
And bless Thy heritage,
And feed them, and bear them up for ever!

To Ps. xxvi. and xxvii. a third Psalm is here added, belonging to the time of the persecution by Absalom. In this Psalm, also, the drawing towards the sanctuary of God cannot be lost sight of; and in addition thereto we have the intercession of the anointed one, when personally imperilled, on behalf of the people who are equally in need of help, — an intercession which can only be rightly estimated in connection with the circumstances of that time. Like Ps. xxvii. this, its neighbour, also divides into two parts; these parts, however, though their lines are of a different order, nevertheless bear a similar poetic impress. Both are composed of verses consisting of two and three lines. There are many points of contact between this Psalm and Ps. xxvii.; e. g. in the epithet applied to God, מַעֲזָר; but compare also ver. 3 with xxvi. 9; ver. 2 with xxxi. 23; ver. 9 with xxix. 11. The echoes of this Psalm in Isaiah are very many, and also in Jeremiah.

Vers. 1—5. This first half of the Psalm (vers. 1—5) is supplicatory. The preposition מן in connection with the verbs שָׁמַע, to be deaf, dumb, and דָּבַר, to keep silence, is a pregnant form of expression denoting an aversion or turning away which does not deign to give the suppliant an answer. Jahve is his צַר, his ground of confidence; but if He continues thus to keep silence, then he who confides in Him will become like those who are going down (xxii. 30), or are gone down (Isa. xiv. 19) to the pit. The participle of the past answers better to the situation of one already on the brink of the abyss. In the double sentence with וְ, the chief accent falls upon the second clause, for which the first only paratactically opens up the way (cf. Isa. v. 4, xii. 1); in Latin it would be ne, te mihi non respondente, similis fiam. Olshausen, and Baur with him, believes that because וְנִמְשַׁלְתִּי has not the accent on the ultima as being perf. consec., it must be interpreted according to the accentuation thus, "in order that Thou mayst no longer keep silence, whilst I am already become like . . ." But this ought to be וְנִמְשַׁלְתִּי, or at least וְנִמְשַׁלְתִּי. And if וְנִמְשַׁלְתִּי were to be taken as a real perfect, it would then rather have to be rendered "and I should then be like." But, notwithstanding וְנִמְשַׁלְתִּי is Milel, it is still perf. consecutivum ("and I am become like"); for if, in a sentence of more than one member following upon פ, the fut., as is usually the case (vid. on xxxviii. 17), goes over into the perf., then the latter, in most instances, has the tone of the perf. consec. (Deut. iv. 19, Judges xviii. 25, Prov. v. 9—12, Mal. iii. 24), but not always. The penultima-accentuation is necessarily retained in connection with the two great pausal accents, Silluk and Athnach, Deut. viii. 12, Prov. xxx. 9; in this passage in connection with Rebia mugrash, just as we may say, in general, the perf. consec. sometimes retains its penultima-accentuation in connection with distinctives instead of being accented on the ultima; c. g. in connection with Rebia mugrash, Prov. xxx. 9; with Rebia, xix. 14 (cf. Prov. xxx. 9 with Ezek. xiv. 17); with Zakeph. 1 Sam. xxix. 8; and even with Tiphcha Obad. ver. 10, Joel iv. 21. The national grammarians are ignorant of any law on this subject.*

The point towards which the psalmist stretches forth his hands in prayer is Jahve's holy הַבַּיִת. Such is the word (after the form הַבַּיִת, בְּלִיָּהּ, עֲצֵן) used only in the Books of Kings and Chronicles, with the exception of this passage, to denote the Holy of Holies, not as being χρηματιστήριον (Aquila and Symmachus), or λαλητήριον, oraculum (Jerome), as it were, Jahve's audience chamber (Hengstenberg) — a meaning that is not in accordance with the formation of the word,—but as the hinder part of the tent, from הַבַּר, Arabic dabara, to be behind, whence dubr (Talmudic הַבַּר), that which is behind (opp. kubl, kibal, that which is in the front), cf. Jesurun p. 87 sq. In vers. 3, 4 the prayer is expanded. מִשֶּׁשׁ (instead of which we find אֶסֶף in xxvi. 9), to draw any one down forcibly to destruction, or to drag him to the place of judgment, Ezek. xxxii. 20. cf. x. 9, Job. xxiv. 22. The delineation of the ungodly David borrows from his actual foes. Should he succumb to them, then his fate would be like that which awaits them, to whom he is conscious that he is radically unlike. He therefore prays that God's recompensing justice may anticipate him, i. e. that He may requite them according to their desert, before he succumbs, to whom they have feigned שְׁלוֹם, a good understanding, or being on good terms, whereas they cherished in their heart the רָעָה that is now unmasked (cf. Jer. ix. 7). נָחַן, used of an official adjudication, as in Hos. ix. 14, Jer. xxxii. 19. The epanaphora of הִתְנַחֵם is like xxvii. 14.* The phrase הִלְשִׁיב גְּמֹל (שָׁלֵם), which occurs frequently in the prophets, signifies to recompense or repay to any one his accomplishing, his manifestation, that is to say, what he has done and merited; the thoughts and expression call to mind more particularly Isa. iii. 8—11, i. 16. The right to pray for recompense (vengeance) is grounded, in ver. 5, upon their blindness to God's just and merciful rule as it is to be seen in human history (cf. Isa. v. 12, xxii. 11). The contrast of כָּנָה and חָרַם, to pull down (with a personal object, as in penult. in Prov. xxx. 9 from the conformity of sound, and Kimchi (Michlol 6b) simply records the phenomenon.

Exod. xv. 7), is like Jeremiah's style (ch. xlii. 10, cf. i. 10, xviii. 9, and frequently, Sir. xlix. 7). In ver. 5*a*, the prominent thought in David's mind is, that they shamefully fail to recognise how gloriously and graciously God has again and again acknowledged him as His anointed one. He has (2 Sam. vii.) received the promise, that God would build him a house, i.e. grant perpetual continuance to his kingship. The Absalomites are in the act of rebellion against this divine appointment. Hence they shall experience the very reverse of the divine promise given to David: Jahve will pull them down and not build them up, He will destroy, at its very commencement, this dynasty set up in opposition to God.

Vers. 6—9. The first half of the Psalm prayed for deliverance and for judgment; this second half gives thanks for both. If the poet wrote the Psalm at one sitting then at this point the certainty of being answered dawns upon him. But it is even possible that he added this second part later on, as a memorial of the answer he experienced to his prayer (Hitzig, Ewald). It sounds, at all events, like the record of something that has actually taken place. Jahve is his defence and shield. The conjoined perfects in ver. 7*b* denote that which is closely united in actual realisation; and in the fut. consec., as is frequently the case, e. g. in Job. xiv. 2, the historical signification retreats into the background before the more essential idea of that which has been produced. In לְשִׁירֵי, the song is conceived as the spring whence the הַדָּוָד bubble forth; and instead of אֲדֹרְנִי we have the more impressive form אֲדֹרְנִי, as in xlv. 18, cxvi. 6, 1 Sam. xvii. 47, the syncope being omitted. From suffering (Leid) springs song (Lied), and from song springs the praise (Lob) of Him, who has "turned" the suffering, just as it is attuned in vers. 6 and 8.* The αὐτοί, who are intended by לָמוֹ in ver. 8*a*, are those of Israel, as in xii. 8, Isa. xxxiii. 2 (Hitzig). The LXX. (καταίωμα τοῦ λαοῦ αὐτοῦ) reads לְעַמּוֹ, as in xxix. 11, which is approved by Böttcher, Olshausen and Hupfeld; but לָמוֹ yields a similar sense. First of all

* There is a play of words and an alliteration in this sentence which we cannot fully reproduce in the English. — TR.

David thinks of the people, then of himself; for his private character retreats behind his official, by virtue of which he is the head of Israel. For this very reason his deliverance is the deliverance of Israel, to whom, so far as they have become unfaithful to His anointed, Jahve has not requited this faithlessness, and to whom, so far as they have remained true to him, He has rewarded this fidelity. Jahve is a ry to them, inasmuch as He preserves them by His might from the destruction into which they would have precipitated themselves, or into which others would have precipitated them; and He is the שָׁמַיְמָה of His anointed. inasmuch as He surrounds him as an inaccessible place of refuge which secures to him salvation in all its fulness instead of the destruction anticipated. Israel's salvation and blessing were at stake; but Israel is in fact God's people and God's inheritance — may He, then, work salvation for them in every future need and bless them. Apostatised from David, it was a flock in the hands of the hireling — may He ever take the place of shepherd to them and carry them in His arms through the destruction. The שָׁמַיְמָה coupled with רָצַח (thus it is to be pointed according to Ben-Asher) calls to mind Deut. i. 31, "Jahve carried Israel as a man doth carry his son", and Exod. xix. 4, Deut. xxxii. 11, "as on eagles' wings." The Piel, as in Isa. lxiii. 9, is used of carrying the weak, whom one lifts up and thus removes out of its helplessness and danger. Ps. iii. closes just in the same way with an intercession; and the close of Ps. xxix. is similar, but promissory, and consequently it is placed next to Ps. xxviii.

PSALM XXIX.

THE PSALM OF THE SEVEN THUNDERS.

- 1 GIVE unto Jahve, ye sons of God,
Give unto Jahve glory and might!
- 2 Give unto Jahve the glory of His name,
Do homage to Jahve in holy attire!
- 3 The voice of Jahve is upon the waters.
The God of Glory thundereth,

- Jahve is upon the great waters.
- 4 The voice of Jahve goeth forth in power,
The voice of Jahve goeth forth in majesty.
- 5 The voice of Jahve breaketh the cedars,
Yea, Jahve breaketh the cedars of Lebanon.
- 6 And He maketh them to skip like a calf,
Lebanon and Sirion like a young antelope.
- 7 The voice of Jahve flameth forth quivering fire.
- 8 The voice of Jahve shaketh the wilderness.
Jahve shaketh the wilderness of Kadesh.
- 9 The voice of Jahve maketh the hinds to travail,
He strippeth the forest —
And in His temple everything saith: "Glory!"
- 10 Jahve hath sat at the Flood,
And Jahve sitteth a King for ever.
- 11 Jahve will give power to His people,
Jahve will bless His people with peace.

The occasion of this Psalm is a thunderstorm; it is not, however, limited to the outward natural phenomena, but therein is perceived the self-attestation of the God of the redemptive history. Just as in the second part of Ps. xix. the God of the revelation of salvation is called יהוה seven times in distinction from the God revealed in nature, so in this Psalm of thunders, יהוה is repeated seven times, so that it may be called the Psalm of the ἐπὶ βρονταί (Apoc. x. 3 sq.). During the time of the second Temple, as the addition to the inscription by the LXX. ἐξοδίου (ἐξόδου) σκηνης (= σκηνοπηγίας) seems to imply *, it was sung on the Shemini Azereth, the last day (ἐξόδου, Lev. xxiii. 36) of the feast of tabernacles. Between two tetrastichs, in each of which the name

* The יהוה of the Temple liturgy of the Shemini Azereth is not stated in the Talmud (vid. Tosefoth to B. Succa 47a, where, according to Sofrim xix. § 2 and a statement of the Jerusalem Talmud, Ps. vi., or xii, is guessed at). We only know, that Ps. xxix. belongs to the Psalm-portions for the intervening days of the feast of tabernacles, which are יהוה occurs four times, lie three pentastichs, which, in their sevenfold קל ה', represent the peals of thunder which follow in rapid succession as the storm increases in its fury.

Vers. 1—2. The opening strophe calls upon the celestial spirits to praise Jahve; for a revelation of divine glory is in preparation, which, in its first movements, they are accounted worthy to behold, for the roots of everything that takes place in this world are in the invisible world. It is not the mighty of the earth, who are called in lxxxii. 6 בְּנֵי עֲלִיִן, but the angels, who are elsewhere called בְּנֵי אֱלֹהִים (e.g. Job ii. 1), that are here, as in lxxxix. 7, called בְּנֵי אֱלִים. Since אֱלִים never means God, like אֱלֹהִים (so that it could be rendered sons of the deity), but gods, Exod. xv. 11, Dan. ix. 36, the expression בְּנֵי אֱלִים must be translated as a double plural from בְּנֵי-אֵל, after the analogy of בְּרַחֲמֵי קְדָשׁ, Isa. xlii. 22, from בֵּית קֳדָשׁ (Ges. § 108, 3), "sons of God", not "sons of gods." They, the God-begotten, i.e. created in the image of God, who form with God their Father as it were one family (vid. Genesis S. 121), are here called upon to give unto God glory and might (the primary passage is Deut. xxxii. 3), i.e. to render back to Him cheerfully and joyously in a laudatory recognition, as it were by an echo, His glory and might, which are revealed and to be revealed in the created world, and to give unto Him the glory of His name, i.e. to praise His glorious name (lxxii. 19) according its deserts. הָרְבִי in all three instances has the accent on the ultima according to rule (cf., on the other hand, Job vi. 22). הַרְרָה קִישׁ is holy vestments, splendid festal attire, 2 Chron.

comprehended in the vox memorialis הַיּוֹם בְּהֵי (Succa 55a, cf. Rashi on Joma 3a), viz. Ps. xxix. (ה); 1. 16 (ו); xciv. 16 (ז); xciv. 8 (ח); lxxxi. 7 (ט); lxxxii. 5b (י). Besides this the treatise Sofrim xviii. § 3 mentions Ps. xxix. as the Psalm for the festival of Pentecost and the tradition of the synagogue which prevails even at the present day recognises it only as a festival Psalm of the first day of Shabuoth [Pentecost]; the Psalm for Shemini Azereth is the 65th. The only confirmation of the statement of the LXX. is to be found in the Sohar; for there (section ז) Ps. xxix. is referred to the pouring forth of the water on the seventh day of the feast of tabernacles (Hosianna rabba), since it is said, that by means of the seven קִילוֹת (corresponding to the seven compassings of the altar) seven of the Sephiroth open the flood-gates of heaven.

xx. 21, cf. Ps. cx. 3.* A revelation of the power of God is near at hand. The heavenly spirits are to prepare themselves for it with all the outward display of which they are capable. If ver. 2 were a summons to the church on earth, or, as in xcvi. 9, to the dwellers upon the earth, then there ought to be some expression to indicate the change in the parties addressed; it is, therefore, in ver. 2 as in ver. 1, directed to the priests of the heavenly הִיכָל. In the Apocalypse, also, the songs of praise and trumpeting of the angels precede the judgments of God.

Vers. 3—9. Now follows the description of the revelation of God's power, which is the ground of the summons, and is to be the subject-matter of their praise. The All-glorious One makes Himself heard in the language (Apoc. x. 3 sq.) of the thunder, and reveals Himself in the storm. There are fifteen lines, which naturally arrange themselves into three five-line strophes. The chief matter with the poet, however, is the sevenfold קָל ה'. Although קָל is sometimes used almost as an ejaculatory "Hark!" (Gen. iv. 10, Isa. lii. 8), this must not, with Ewald (§ 286, f), be applied to the קָל ה' of the Psalm before us, the theme of which is the voice of God, who announces Himself from heaven, — a voice which moves the world. The dull sounding קָל serves not merely to denote the thunder of the storm, but even the thunder of the earthquake, the roar of the tempest, and in general, every low, dull, rumbling sound, by which God makes Himself audible to the world, and more especially from the wrathful side of His doxa. The waters in ver. 3 are not the lower waters. Then the question arises what are they? Were the waters of the Mediterranean intended, they would be more definitely denoted in such a vivid description. It is, however, far more appropriate to the commencement of this description to understand them to mean the mass of water gathered together in the thick, black storm-clouds (vid. xviii. 12, Jer. x. 13). The rumbling* of Jahve is, as the poet himself explains in ver. 3*b*, the thunder produced on high by the אֵל הַכְּבוֹד (cf. מֶלֶךְ הַכְּבוֹד, xxiv. 7 sqq.), which rolls over the sea of waters floating above the earth in the sky. Ver. 4*a* and 4*b*, just like ver. 3*a* and 3*b*, are independent substantival clauses. The rumbling of Jahve is, issues forth, or passes by; כּ with the abstract article as in lxxvii. 14, Prov. xxiv. 5 (cf. Prov. viii. 8, Luke iv. 32, ἐν ἰσχυρί Apoc. xviii. 2), is the כּ of the distinctive attribute. In ver. 3 the first peals of thunder are heard; in ver. 4 the storm is coming nearer, and the peals become stronger, and now it bursts forth with its full violence: ver. 5*a* describes this in a general form, and ver. 5*b* expresses by the fut. consec., as it were inferentially, that which is at present taking place: amidst the rolling of the thunder the descending lightning flashes rive the cedars of Lebanon (as is well-known, the lightning takes the outermost points). The suffix in ver. 6*a* does not refer proleptically to the mountains mentioned afterwards, but naturally to the cedars (Hengst., Hupf., Hitz.), which bend down before the storm and quickly rise up again. The skipping of Lebanon and Sirion, however, is not to be referred to the fact, that their wooded summits bend down and rise again, but, according to cxiv. 4, to their being shaken by the crash of the thunder, — a feature in the picture which certainly does not rest upon what is actually true in nature, but figuratively describes the apparent quaking of the earth during a heavy thunderstorm. שְׂרִיין, according to Deut. iii. 9, is the Sidonian name of Hermon, and therefore side by side with Lebanon it represents Anti-Lebanon. The word, according to the Masora, has שׁ sini-strum, and consequently is שְׂרִיין, wherefore Hitzig correctly derives it from سُرَّاءُ, fut. i., to gleam, sparkle, cf. the passage from an Arab poet at cxxxiii. 3. The lightning makes these mountains bound (Luther, lecken, i.e. according to his explanation: to spring, skip) like young antelopes. אֲנָתִי*, like βούβαλος, βούβαλις, is a generic name of the antelope, and of the buffalo that roams in herds through the forests beyond the Jordan even at the present day; for there are antelopes that resemble the buffalo and also (except in the formation of the head and the cloven hoofs) those that resemble the horse. The LXX. renders: ὡς υἱὸς μονοκεράτων. Does this mean the unicorn [Germ. one-horn] depicted on Persian and African monuments? Is this unicorn distinct from the one horned antelope? Neither an unicorn nor an one horned antelope have been seen to the present day by any traveller. Both animals, and consequently also their relation to one another, are up to the present time still undefinable from a scientific point of view.**

Each peal of thunder is immediately followed by a flash of lightning; Jahve's thunder cleaveth flames of fire, i. e. forms (as it were λατομεῖ) the fire-matter of the storm-clouds into cloven flames of fire, into lightnings that pass swiftly along; in connection with which it must be remembered that קול ה' denotes not merely the thunder as a phenomenon, but at the same time it denotes the omnipotence of God expressing itself therein. The brevity and threefold division of ver. 7 depicts the incessant, zigzag, quivering movement

Moreover, the rhinoceros [Germ. nose-horn] is called in Egypt charnin (from قَرْن = قرن), but the unicorn, charnit. "In the year 1862 the French archæologist, M. Waddington, was with me in Damascus when an antiquary brought me an ancient vessel on which a number of animals were engraved, their names being written on their bellies. Among the well known animals there was also an unicorn, exactly like a zebra or a horse, but with a long horn standing out upon its forehead; on its body was the word خَرْنَيْت. M. Waddington wished to have the vessel and I gave it up to him; and he took it with him to Paris. We talked a good deal about this unicorn, and felt obliged to come to the conclusion that the form of the fabulous animal might have become known to the Arabs at the time of the crusades, when the English coat of arms came to Syria." — Wetzstein.

of the lightning (tela trisulca, ignes trisulci, in Ovid). From the northern mountains the storm sweeps on towards the south of Palestine into the Arabian desert, viz. as we are told in ver. 8*b* (cf. ver. 5, according to the schema of "parallelism by reservation"), the wilderness region of Kadesh (Kadesh Barnea), which, however we may define its position, must certainly have lain near the steep western slope of the mountains of Edom toward the Arabah. Jahve's thunder, viz. the thunderstorm, puts this desert in a state of whirl, inasmuch as it drives the sand (חול) before it in whirlwinds; and among the mountains it, viz. the strong lightning and thundering, makes the hinds to writhe, inasmuch as from fright they bring forth prematurely. Both the Hiph. יִחַיֵּל and the Pil. יִחַלְלֵל are used with a causative meaning (root חו, חוּ, to move in a circle, to encircle). The poet continues with וַיִּרְחַשֵּׁף, since he makes one effect of the storm to develop from another, merging as it were out of its chrysalis state. יַעֲרוּת is a poetical plural form; and תִּשְׁאֵף describes the effect of the storm which "shells" the woods, inasmuch as it beats down the branches of the trees, both the tops and the foliage. While Jahve thus reveals Himself from heaven upon the earth in all His irresistible power, בְּהִרְבֵּהוּ, in His heavenly palace (xi. 4, xviii. 7), כָּלוּ (note how בְּהִרְבֵּהוּ resolves this כָּלוּ out of itself), i. e. each of the beings therein, says: כִּבְיֹד. That which the poet, in vers. 1—2, has called upon them to do, now takes place. Jahve receives back His glory, which is immanent in the universe, in the thousand-voiced echo of adoration.

Vers. 10—11. Luther renders it: "The Lord sitteth to prepare a Flood", thus putting meaning into the unintelligible rendering of the Vulgate and LXX.; and in fact a meaning that accords with the language — for יִשַׁב לְ is most certainly intended to be understood after the analogy of יִשַׁב לְמִשְׁפַּח, cxxii. 5, cf. ix. 8 — just as much as with the context; for the poet has not thus far expressly referred to the torrents of rain, in which the storm empties itself. Engelhardt also (Lutherische Zeitschrift, 1861, 216 f.), Kurtz (Bibel und Astronomie, S. 568, Aufl. 4), Riehm (Liter.-Blatt of the Allgem. Kirchen-Zeit., 1864, S. 110), and others understand by מַבּוּל the quasi-flood of the torrent of rain accompanying the lightning and thunder. But the word is not לַמְבּוּל, but לַמַּבּוּל, and הַמַּבּוּל (Syr. momûl) occurs exclusively in Gen. vi.—xi. as the name of the great Flood. Every tempest, however, calls to mind this judgment and its merciful issue, for it comes before us in sacred history as the first appearance of rain with lightning and thunder, and of the bow in the clouds speaking its message of peace (Genesis, S. 276). The retrospective reference to this event is also still further confirmed by the aorist וַיֵּשֶׁב which follows the perfect יָשַׁב (Hofmann, Schriftbeweis i. 208). Jahve — says the poet — sat (upon His throne) at the Flood (to execute it), and sits (enthroned) in consequence thereof, or since that time, as this present revelation of Him in the tempest shews, as King for ever, inasmuch as He rules down here upon earth from His throne in the heavens (cxv. 16) in wrath and in mercy, judging and dispensing blessing. Here upon earth He has a people, whom from above He endows with a share of His own might and blesses with peace, while the tempests of His wrath burst over their foes. How expressive is בְּשֵׁלֹמֹם as the closing word of this particular Psalm! It spans the Psalm like a rain-bow. The opening of the Psalm shews us the heavens opened and the throne of God in the midst of the angelic songs of praise, and the close of the Psalm shews us, on earth, His people victorious and blessed with peace (בָּ as in Gen. xxiv. 1*), in the midst of Jahve's voice of anger, which shakes all things. Gloria in excelsis is its beginning, and pax in terris its conclusion.

PSALM XXX.

SONG OF THANKSGIVING AFTER RECOVERY FROM DANGEROUS SICKNESS.

- 2 I WILL extol Thee, Jahve, that Thou hast raised me up,
And hast not made mine enemies to rejoice over me.
3 Jahve, my God, I cried to Thee, then Thou didst heal me;

* The Holy One, blessed be He — says the Mishna, Uksin iii. 12, with reference to this passage in the Psalms — has not found any other vessel (כֵּל) to hold the blessing specially allotted to Israel

- 4 Jahve, Thou hast brought up my soul from Hades, Thou hast revived me, that I should not go down to the grave.
- 5 Sing unto Jahve, ye saints of His,
And give thanks to His holy name.
- 6 For His anger endureth but for a moment, His favour for a life long;
At eventide weeping cometh in for the night —
And in the morning cometh a shout of joy.
- 7 I, however, thought in my security:
"I shall not totter for ever."
- 8 Jahve, by Thy favour hadst Thou made my mountain to stand strong;
Thou hast hidden Thy face, — I became troubled.
- 9 To Thee, Jahve, did I cry,
And to Jahve, made I supplication:
- 10 "What profit is there in my blood, in my going down to the grave?
"Shall the dust praise Thee? shall it declare Thy truth?"
- 11 "Hear, Jahve, and be gracious unto me!
"Jahve, be Thou my helper!"
- 12 Thou hast turned for me my mourning into dancing, Thou hast put off my sackcloth and didst gird me with joy;
- 13 To the end that my glory might sing of Thee, and not be silent —
Jahve, my God, for ever will I praise Thee.

The summons to praise God which is addressed to the angels above in Ps. xxix., is directed in Ps. xxx. to the pious here below. There is nothing against the adoption of the לָרוּר. Hitzig again in this instance finds all kinds of indications of Jeremiah's hand; but the parallels in Jeremiah are echoes of the Psalms, and רָלִיתָנִי in ver. 2 does not need to be explained of a lowering into a tank or dungeon, it is a metaphorical expression for raising up out of the depths of affliction. Even Hezekiah's song of thanksgiving in Isa. xxxviii. has grown out of the two closing strophes of this Psalm under the influence of an intimate acquaintance with the Book of Job. We are therefore warranted in supposing that it is David, who here, having in the midst of the stability of his power come to the verge of the grave, and now being roused from all carnal security, as one who has been rescued, praises the Lord, whom he has made his refuge, and calls upon all the pious to join with him in his song. The Psalm bears the inscription: A Song-Psalm at the Dedication of the House, by David. This has been referred to the dedication of the site of the future Temple, 2 Sam. xxiv., 1 Chron. xxi.; but although the place of the future Temple together with the altar then erected on it, can be called בית ירוה (1 Chron. xxii. 1), and might also at any rate be called absolutely הבית (as הר הבית, the Temple hill); yet we know that David did not himself suffer (2 Sam. xxiv. 17) from the pestilence, which followed as a punishment upon the numbering of the people which he instituted in his arrogant self-magnification. The Psalm, however, also does not contain anything that should point to a dedication of a sanctuary, whether Mount Moriah, or the tabernacle, 2 Sam. vi. 17. It might more naturally be referred to the re-consecration of the palace, that was defiled by Absalom, after David's return; but the Psalm mentions some imminent peril, the gracious averting of which does not consist in the turning away of bloodthirsty foes, but in recovery from some sickness that might have proved fatal. Thus then it must be the dedication of the citadel on Zion, the building of which was just completed. From 2 Sam. v. 12 we see that David regarded this building as a pledge of the stability and exaltation of his kingdom; and all that is needed in order to understand the Psalm is, with Aben-Ezra, Flaminus, Crusius, and Vaihinger, to infer from the Psalm itself, that David had been delayed by some severe illness from taking possession of the new building. The situation of Ps. xvi. is just like it. The regular official title אֶשֶׁר עַל-הַבַּיִת (majordomo) shews, that הבית, used thus absolutely, may denote the palace just as well as the Temple. The LXX. which renders it τοῦ ἐγκατασκευοῦ τοῦ βασιλῆος (τοῦ) Δαυίδ, understands the palace, not the Temple. In the Jewish ritual, Ps. xxx. is certainly, as is even stated in the Tractate Sofrim xviii. § 2, the Psalm for the feast of Chanucca, or Dedication, which refers to 1 Macc. iv. 52 sqq.

Vers. 2—4. The Psalm begins like a hymn. The Piel הָלַךְ (from הִלַּךְ, Arab.  $\text{حَل}$ , to hold anything long, loose and pendulous, whether upwards or downwards, conj. V. تَدَلَّى, to dangle) signifies to lift or draw up, like a bucket (הָלַי, Greek ἀναλίσκω, Latin tollo, tolleno in Festus). The poet himself says what that depth is into which he had sunk and out of which God had drawn him up without his enemies rejoicing over him (לִי as in xxv, 2), i. e. without allowing them the wished for joy at his destruction: he was brought down almost into Hades in consequence of some fatal sickness. הָרַה (never: to call into being out of nothing) always means to restore to life that which has apparently or really succumbed to death, or to preserve anything living in life. With this is easily and satisfactorily joined the Keri מִיָּרְדִי בֹר (without Makkeph in the correct text), ita ut non descenderem; the infinitive of יָרַד in this instance following the analogy of the strong verb is יָרַד, like יִשָּׁן, יִבֵּשׁ, and with suffix jordi (like josdi, Job xxxviii. 4) or jār'di, for here it is to be read thus, and not jordi (vid. on xvi. 1, lxxxvi. 2).\* The Chethib מִיָּוֹרְדִי might also be the infinitive, written with Cholem plenum, as an infinitive Gen. xxxii. 20, and an imperative Num. xxiii. 8, is each pointed with Cholem instead of Kametz chatuph; but it is probably intended to be read as a participle, מִיָּוֹרְדִי: Thou hast revived me from those who sink away into the grave (xxviii. 1), or out of the state of such (cf. xxii. 22b) — a perfectly admissible and pregnant construction.

Vers. 5—6 call upon all the pious to praise this God, who after a short season of anger is at once and henceforth gracious. Instead of שֵׁם of Jahve, we find the expression

* The Masora does not place the word under אֱלֹהֵינוּ חַי וְחַיִּים יְהוָה (Introduction 28b), as one would expect to find it if it were to be read mijordi, and proceeds on the assumption that mijār'di is infinitive like עֲמַדְךָ (read amādcha) Obad. ver 11, not participle (Ewald, S. 533).

זָכַר in this instance, as in xcvi. 12 after Exod. iii. 15. Jahve, by revealing Himself, renders Himself capable of being both named and remembered, and that in the most illustrious manner. The history of redemption is, as it were, an unfolding of the Name of Jahve and at the same time a setting up of a monument, an establishment of a memorial, and in fact the erection of a זָכַר קָדָשׁ; because all God's self-attestations, whether in love or in wrath, flow from the sea of light of His holiness. When He manifests Himself to His own love prevails; and wrath is, in relation to them, only a vanishing moment: a moment passes in His anger, a (whole) life in His favour, i. e. the former endures only for a moment, the latter the whole life of a man. "Alles Ding währt seine Zeit, Gottes Lieb' in Ewigkeit." All things last their season, God's love to all eternity. The preposition בְּ does not here, as in the beautiful parallel Isa. liv. 7 sq., cf. lx. 10, denote the time and mode of that which takes place, but the state in which one spends the time. Ver. 6bc portrays the rapidity with which love takes back wrath (cf. Isa. xvii. 14): in the evening weeping takes up its abode with us for the night, but in the morning another guest, viz. רִנָּה, appears, like a rescuing angel, before whom בְּכִי disappears. The predicate יִלֵּן does not belong to ver. 6c as well (Hupfeld, Hitzig). The substantival clause: and in the morning joy—joy is present, depicts the unexpectedness and surprise of the help of Him who sends בְּכִי and רִנָּה.

Vers. 7—8. David now relates his experience in detail, beginning with the cause of the chastisement, which he has just undergone. In וָאֲנִי אֲמַרְתִּי (as in xxxi. 23, Psa. xlix. 4) he contrasts his former self-confidence, in which (like the רָשָׁע, x. 6) he thought himself to be immoveable, with the God-ward trust he has now gained in the school of affliction. Instead of confiding in the Giver, he trusted in the gift, as though it had been his own work. It is uncertain, — but it is all the same in the end, — whether שָׁלַח is the inflected infinitive שָׁלַח of the verb שָׁלַח (which we adopt in our translation), or the inflected noun שָׁלַח (שָׁלַח) = שָׁלַח, after the form שָׁחַ, a swimming, Ezek. xlvi. 5, = שָׁלַח, Jer. xxii. 21. The inevitable consequence of such carnal security, as it is more minutely described in Deut. viii. 11—18, is some humbling divine chastisement. This intimate connection is expressed by the perfects in ver. 8, which represent God's pardon, God's withdrawal of favour, which is brought about by his self-exaltation, and the surprise of his being undeceived, as synchronous.  $\text{הָעֲמִיר עֵן}$ , to set up might is equivalent to: to give it as a lasting possession; cf. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 8, which passage is a varied, but not (as Riehm supposes) a corrupted, repetition of 2 Kings xxi. 8. It is, therefore, unnecessary, as Hitzig does, to take  $\text{ל}$  as accusative and  $\text{וַי}$  as adverbial: in Thy favour hadst Thou made my mountain to stand firm. The mountain is Zion, which is strong by natural position and by the additions of art (2 Sam. v. 9); and this, as being the castle-hill, is the emblem of the kingdom of David: Jahve had strongly established his kingdom for David, when on account of his trust in himself He made him to feel how all that he was he was only by Him, and without Him he was nothing whatever. The form of the inflexion  $\text{הַרְרִי}$ , instead of  $\text{הָרִי} = harri$ , is defended by Gen. xiv. 6 and Jer. xvii. 3 (where it is  $\text{הַרְרִי}$  as if from  $\text{הָרָר}$ ). The reading  $\text{להררי}$  (LXX., Syr.), i. e. to my kingly dignity is a happy substitution; whereas the reading of the Targum  $\text{להררי}$ , "placed (me) on firm mountains", at once refutes itself by the necessity for supplying "me."

Vers. 9—11. Nevertheless he who is thus chastened prayed fervently. The futures in ver. 9, standing as they do in the full flow of the narration, have the force of imperfects, of "the present in the past" as the Arabian grammarians call it. From the question "What profit is there (the usual expression for  $\tau\acute{\iota} \acute{\sigma}\phi\epsilon\lambda\omicron\varsigma$ , quid lucri) in my blood?", it is not to be inferred that David was in danger of death by the hand of a foe; for  $\text{וְהָרַפְּאֵנִי}$  in ver. 3 teaches us very different, "what profit would there be in my blood?" is therefore equivalent to (cf. Job xvi. 18) what advantage would there be in Thy slaying me before my time? On the contrary God would rob Himself of the praise, which the living one would render to Him, and would so gladly render. His request that his life may be prolonged was not, therefore, for the sake of worldly possessions and enjoyment, but for the glory of God. He feared death as being the end of the praise of God. For beyond the grave there will be no more psalms sung, vi. 6. In the Old Testament, Hades was as yet unvanquished, Heaven was not yet opened. In Heaven are the בני אלים, but as yet no blessed בני אדם.

Vers. 12—13. In order to express the immediate sequence of the fulfilling of the prayer upon the prayer itself, the otherwise (e.g. xxxii. 5) usual ו of conjunction is omitted; on הִפְכֵתָנוּ cf. the echoes in Jer. xxxi. 13, Lam. v. 15. According to our interpretation of the relation of the Psalm to the events of the time, there is as little reason for thinking of 2 Sam. vi. 14 in connection with מְחוּל, as of 1 Chron. xxi. 16 in connection with שָׁקֵי. In place of the garment of penitence and mourning (cf. מְחִינָה שָׁק, Isa. iii. 24) slung round the body (perhaps fastened only with a cord) came a girding up (אָזַר, synon. חָגַר, lxx. 13, whence אָזַר, חֲגִירָה) with joy. The designed result of such a speedy and radical change in his affliction, after it had had the salutary effect of humbling him, was the praise of Jahve: in order that my glory (כְּבוֹד for כְּבוֹדִי = נִפְאֵשׁ, as in vii. 6, xvi. 9, cviii. 2) may sing Thy praises without ceasing (יָרִים fut. Kal). And the praise of Jahve for ever is moreover his resolve, just as he vows, and at the same time carries it out, in this Psalm.

PSALM XXXI.

SURRENDER OF ONE SORELY PERSECUTED INTO THE HAND OF GOD.

- 2 IN Thee, Jahve, have I hidden —
 Let me not be ashamed for ever;
 In Thy righteousness set me free.
- 3 Bow down Thine ear to me, deliver me speedily;
 Be Thou to me a rock of refuge,
 A house of fortresses, to save me.
- 4 For my rock and my fortress art Thou,
 And for Thy Name's sake wilt Thou lead me and guide me.
- 5 Thou wilt pull me out of the net they have laid privily for me,
 For Thou art my defence.
- 6 Into Thy hand do I commend my spirit,
 Thou redeemest me, Jahve, God of truth!

- 7 Hateful to me are the worshippers of vain idols,
Whereas I cleave to Jahve.
- 8 I will exult and rejoice in Thy mercy,
That Thou hast regarded my poverty,
That Thou hast taken knowledge of the distresses of my soul.
- 9 And hast not shut me up in the hand of the enemy,
Thou hast set my feet in a broad place.
- 10 Be gracious unto me, Jahve, for I am straitened:
Consumed with grief is mine eye, and my soul, and my body.
- 11 For spent is my life with sorrow,
And my years with sighing;
My strength has failed by reason of mine iniquity,
And my bones are consumed.
- 12 Because of all mine adversaries I am become a reproach,
And a burden to my neighbours, and a terror to my friends;
Those who see me in the streets flee from me.
- 13 I am forgotten as a dead man out of mind;
I am become like a broken vessel.
- 14 For I hear the slander of many,
Fear on every side;
While they take counsel together against me—
They devise to take away my life.
- 15 But I — in Thee do I trust, Jahve,
I say: Thou art my God.
- 16 In Thy hand are my times, Deliver me out of the hand of mine enemies, and from my persecutors!
- 17 Make Thy face to shine upon Thy servant,
Save me in Thy mercy.
- 18 Jahve, I shall not be ashamed, for on Thee do I call;
The wicked shall be ashamed, they shall be silent in Hades.
- 19 Lying lips shall be put to silence,
Which speak insolently of the righteous,
With pride and contempt.

- 20 How great is Thy goodness, which Thou hast reserved for them that fear Thee,
Which Thou dost effect for them that hide in Thee in the presence of the children of men.
- 21 Thou protectest them in the hiding-place of Thy presence from the factions of man;
Thou keepest them in a pavilion from the strife of tongues.
- 22 Blessed be Jahve,
That He hath shewed me marvellous lovingkindness in a strong city,
- 23 Whilst I said in my feeble faith:
"I am cut off from the vision of Thine eyes."—
Nevertheless Thou heardest the cry of my supplication when I cried to Thee.
- 24 O love Jahve, all ye His saints;
The faithful doth Jahve preserve,
And plentifully rewardeth the proud doer.
- 25 Be strong and let your heart take courage,
All ye that wait on Jahve!

In Ps. xxxi. the poet also, in וַאֲנִי אֶמְרָתִי (ver. 23), looks back upon a previous state of mind, viz. that of conflict, just as in xxx. 7 upon that of security. And here, also, he makes all the רוֹצְחֵי דָם partakers with him of the healthful fruit of his deliverance (cf. xxxi. 24 with xxx. 5). But in other respects the situation of the two Psalms is very different. They are both Davidic. Hitzig, however, regards them both as composed by Jeremiah. With reference to Ps. xxxi., which Ewald also ascribes to "Jéremjás", this view is well worthy of notice. Not only do we find ver. 14*a* recurring in Jeremiah, ch. xx. 10, but the whole Psalm, in its language (cf., e. g., ver. 10 with Lam. i. 20; ver. 11 with Jer. xx. 18; ver. 18 with Jer. xvii. 18; ver. 23 with Lam. iii. 54) and its plaintive tenderness, reminds one of Jeremiah. But this relationship does not decide the question. The passage Jer. xx. 10, like many other passages of this prophet, whose language is so strongly imbued with that of the Psalter, may be just as much a reminiscence as Jon. ii. 5, 9; and as regards its plaintive tenderness there are no two characters more closely allied naturally and in spirit than David and Jeremiah; both are servants of Jahve, whose noble, tender spirits were capable of strong feeling, who cherished earnest longings, and abounded in tribulations. We abide, though not without some degree of hesitation, by the testimony of the inscription; and regard the Psalm as a song springing from the outward and inward conflict (LXX. ἀκταόσεως, probably by a combination of ver. 23, ἐν ἀκταόσεω, בְּחַפְזִי, with Sam. xxiii. 26) of the time of Saul. While ver. 12c is not suited to the mouth of the captive Jeremiah (Hitzig), the Psalm has much that is common not only to Ps. lxix. (more especially lxix. 9, 33), a Psalm that sounds much like Jeremiah's, but also to others, which we regard as Davidic; viz. the figures corresponding to the life of warfare which David then lived among the rocks and caves of the wilderness; the cheering call, xxxi. 25, cf. xxii. 27, xxvii. 14; the rare use of the Hiph. הִפְלִי אֱלֹהִים xxxi. 22, xvii. 7; the desire to be hidden by God, xxxi. 21, cf. xvii. 8, lxiv. 3; etc. In common with Ps. xxii. this may be noted, that the crucified Christ takes His last word from this Psalm, just as He takes His last utterance but three from that Psalm. But in xxxi. 10—14, the prefiguration of the Passion is confined within the limits of the type and does not undergo the same prophetic enhancement as it does in that unique Ps. xxii., to which only Ps. lxix. is in any degree comparable. The opening, vers. 2—4, is repeated in the centonic Ps. lxxi., the work of a later anonymous poet, just as ver. 23 is in part repeated in cxvi. 11. The arrangement of the strophes is not very clear.

Vers 2—9. The poet begins with the prayer for deliverance, based upon the trust which Jahve, to whom he surrenders himself, cannot possibly disappoint; and rejoices beforehand in the protection which he assumes will, without any doubt, be granted. Out of his confident security in God (הַיְסוּדִי) springs the prayer: may it never come to this with me, that I am put to confusion by the disappointment of my hope. This prayer in the form of intense desire is followed by prayers in the direct form of supplication. The supplicatory פְּלִטָה is based upon God's righteousness, which cannot refrain from repaying conduct consistent with the order of redemption, though after prolonged trial, with the longed for tokens of deliverance. In the second paragraph, the prayer is moulded in accordance with the circumstances of him who is chased by Saul hither and thither among the mountains and in the desert, homeless and defenceless. In the expression צור מְעוֹן, מְעוֹן is genit. appositionis: a rock of defence (מְעוֹן from עוֹן, as in xxvii. 1), or rather: of refuge (מְעוֹן = מְעָן, from עוֹן, עוֹן = עָן, as in xxxvii. 39, lii. 9, and probably also in Isa. xxx. 2 and elsewhere);* a rock-castle, i. e. a castle upon a rock, would be called מְעוֹן צוֹר, reversing the order of the words. צוֹר מְעוֹן in lxxi. 3, a rock of habitation, i. e. of safe sojourn, fully warrants this interpretation. מְצוּדָה, prop. specula, signifies a mountain height or the summit of a mountain; a house on the mountain height is one that is situated on some high mountain

* It can hardly be doubted, that, in opposition to the pointing as we have it, which only recognises one מְעוֹן (מְעָן) from עוֹן, to be strong, there are two different substantives having this principal form, viz. מְעוֹן a fortress, secure place, bulwark, which according to its derivation is inflected מְעוֹנִי, etc., and מְעוֹן equivalent to the Arabic ma'adh, a hiding-place, defence, refuge, which ought to have been declined מְעוֹנִי or מְעוֹנִי like the synonymous מְנוֹסִי (Olshausen § 201, 202). Moreover עוֹן, עָן, like הִסְתָּה, of which it is the parallel word in Isa. xxx. 2, means to hide one's self anywhere (Piel and Hiph., Hebrew הִסְתָּה, according to the Kamus, Zamachshari and Neshwân: to hide any one, e. g. Koran iii. 31); hence عَائِدٌ, a plant that grows among bushes (bên esh-shók according to the Kamus) or in the crevices of the rocks (fi-l-hazn according to Neshwân) and is thus inaccessible to the herds; عَوْنٌ, gazelles that are invisible, i. e. keep hidden, for seven days after giving birth, also used of pieces of flesh of which part is hidden among the bones; عَوْدَةٌ, an amulet with which a man covers himself (protegit), and so forth. — Wetzstein top and affords a safe asylum (vid. on xviii. 3). The thought "shew me Thy salvation, for Thou art my Saviour", underlies the connection expressed by כִּי in vers. 4 and 5b. Köster considers it to be illogical, but it is the logic of every believing prayer. The poet prays that God would become to him, actu reflexo, that which to the actus directus of his faith He is even now. The futures in vers. 4, 5 express hopes which necessarily arise out of that which Jahve is to the poet. The interchangeable notions הַיְהוָה and הַיְהוָה, with which we are familiar from Ps. xxiii., stand side by side, in order to give urgency to the utterance of the longing for God's gentle and safe guidance. Instead of translating it "out of the net, which etc.," according to the accents (cf. x. 2, xii. 8) it should be rendered "out of the net there", so that לִי מִמְּנֵהוּ is a relative clause without the relative.

Consequently מְעוֹן (formed like מְעָן, according to Neshwân equivalent to مَعْوَن) is prop. a place in which to hide one's self, synonymous with מְנוֹסָה, מְנוֹס, מְלִجָּה, מְלָגָה, and the like. True, the two substantives from עוֹן and עוֹן meet in their meanings like praesidium and asylum, and according to passages like Jer. xvi. 19 appear to be blended in the genius of the language, but they are radically distinct.

Into the hand of this God, who is and will be all this to him, he commends his spirit; he gives it over into His hand as a trust or deposit (פְּקָדוֹן); for whatsoever is deposited there is safely kept, and freed from all danger and all distress. The word used is not נֶפֶשׁ, which Theodotion substitutes when he renders it τὴν ἑαυτοῦ ψυχὴν τῇ σῆ παρατίθῃμι προμνησεία, but רִוּחַ; and this is used designedly. The language of the prayer lays hold of life at its root, as springing directly from God and as also living in the believer from God and in God; and this life it places under His protection, who is the true life of all spirit-life (Isa. xxxviii. 16) and of all life. It is the language of prayer with which the dying Christ breathed forth His life, Luke xxiii. 46. The period of David's persecution by Saul is the most prolific in types of the Passion; and this language of prayer, which proceeded from the furnace of affliction through which David at that time passed, denotes, in the mouth of Christ, a crisis in the history of redemption in which the Old Testament receives its fulfilment. Like David, He commends His spirit to God; but not, that He may not die, but that dying He may not die, i. e. that He may receive back again His spirit-corporeal life, which is hidden in the hand of God, in imperishable power and glory. That which is so ardently desired and hoped for is regarded by him, who thus in faith commends himself to God, as having already taken place, “Thou hast redeemed me, Jahve, God of truth.” The perfect פָּרִיתָהּ is not used here, as in iv. 2, of that which is past, but of that which is already as good as past; it is not precativè (Ew. § 223, b), but, like the perfects in vers. 8, 9, an expression of believing anticipation of redemption. It is the præt. confidentiæ which is closely related to the præt. prophet.; for the spirit of faith, like the spirit of the prophets, speaks of the future with historic certainty. In the notion of אֱלֹהֵי אֱמֶת it is impossible to exclude the reference to false gods which is contained in אֱלֹהֵי אֱמֶת, 2 Chron. xv. 3, since, in ver. 7, “vain illusions” are used as an antithesis. הַבְּלִיָּם, ever since Deut. xxxii. 21, has become a favourite name for idols, and more particularly in Jeremiah (e. g. ch. viii. 19). On the other hand, according to the context, it may also not differ very greatly from אֱלֹהֵי אֱמֶת, Deut. xxxii. 4; since the idea of God as a depositary or trustee still influences the thought, and אֱמֶת and אֱמוּנָה are used interchangeably in other passages as personal attributes. We may say that אֱמֶת is being that lasts and verifies itself, and אֱמוּנָה is sentiment that lasts and verifies itself. Therefore אֱלֹהֵי אֱמֶת is the God, who as the true God, maintains the truth of His revelation, and more especially of His promises, by a living authority or rule.

In ver. 7, David appeals to his entire and simple surrender to this true and faithful God: hateful to him are those, who worship vain images, whilst he, on the other hand, cleaves to Jahve. It is the false gods, which are called הַבְּלִיָּים, as beings without being, which are of no service to their worshippers and only disappoint their expectations. Probably (as in v. 6) it is to be read שָׁמָּה with the LXX., Vulgate, Syriac, and Arabic versions (Hitzig, Ewald, Olshausen, and others). In the text before us, which gives us no corrective Keri as in 2 Sam. xiv. 21, Ruth iv. 5, אֲנִי is not an antithesis to the preceding clause, but to the member of that clause which immediately precedes it. In Jonah's psalm, ch. ii. 9, this is expressed by הַבְּלִיָּים שָׁמָּה; in the present instance the Kal is used in the signification observare, colere, as in Hos. iv. 10, and even in Prov. xxvii. 18. In the waiting of service is included, according to lix. 10, the waiting of trust. The word בְּטַח which denotes the Aducia fidei is usually construed with  $\text{ב}$  of adhering to, or  $\text{ל}$  of resting upon; but here it is combined with  $\text{ל}$  of hanging on. The cohortatives in ver. 8 express intentions. Olshausen and Hitzig translate them as optatives: may I be able to rejoice; but this, as a continuation of ver. 7, seems less appropriate. Certain that he will be heard, he determines to manifest thankful joy for Jahve's mercy, that ( $\text{רָצָה}$  as in Gen. xxxiv. 27) He has regarded ( $\text{ἐπέβλεψε}$ , Luke i. 48) his affliction, that He has known and exerted Himself about his soul's distresses. The construction  $\text{ב}$   $\text{יָרַע}$ , in the presence of Gen. xix. 33, 35, Job xii. 9, xxxv. 15, cannot be doubted (Hupfeld); it is more significant than the expression "to know of anything";  $\text{ב}$  is like  $\text{ἐπί}$  in  $\text{ἐπιγινώσκειν}$  used of the perception or comprehensive knowledge, which grasps an object and takes possession of it, or makes itself master of it.  $\text{רָחַסְנִיר}$ , ver. 9,  $\text{συγκλείειν}$ , as in 1 Sam. xxiii. 11 (in the mouth of David) is so to abandon, that the hand of another closes upon that which is abandoned to it, i. e. has it completely in its power.  $\text{מִתְרַחֵב}$ , as in xviii. 20, cf. xxvi. 12. The language is David's, in which the language of the Tóra, and more especially of Deuteronomy (xxxii. 30, xxiii. 16), is re-echoed.

Vers. 10—14. After the pæan before victory, which he has sung in the fulness of his faith, in this second part of the Psalm (with groups, or strophes, of diminishing compass: 6. 5. 4) there again breaks forth the petition, based upon the greatness of the suffering which the psalmist, after having strengthened himself in his trust in God, now all the more vividly sets before Him.  $\text{צָר־לִי}$ , angustum est mihi, as in lxix. 18, cf. xviii. 7. Ver. 10*b* is word for word like vi. 8, except that in this passage to  $\text{עֵינַי}$ , the eye which mirrors the state of suffering in which the sensuous perception and objective receptivity of the man are concentrated, are added  $\text{נַפְשִׁי}$ , the soul forming the nexus of the spirit and the body, and  $\text{בְּטֵן}$ , the inward parts of the body reflecting the energies and feelings of the spirit and the soul.  $\text{חַיִּים}$ , with which is combined the idea of the organic intermingling of the powers of soul and body, has the predicate in the plural, as in lxxxviii. 4. The fact that the poet makes mention of his iniquity as that by which his physical strength has become tottering (לָשַׁל as in Neh. iv. 4), is nothing surprising even in a Psalm that belongs to the time of his persecution by Saul; for the longer this persecution continued, the more deeply must David have felt that he needed this furnace of affliction.

The text of ver. 12*ab* upon which the LXX. rendering is based, was just the same as ours: παρὰ πάντας τοὺς ἐχθρούς μου ἐγενήθην ὄνειδος, καὶ τοῖς γείτοσί μου σφόδρα καὶ φόβος τοῖς γνωστοῖς μου. But this σφόδρα (Jerome nimis) would certainly only be tolerable, if it could be rendered, "I am become a reproach even to my neighbours exceedingly" — in favour of this position of מֵאֵר we might compare Judges xii. 2, — and this rendering is not really an impossible one; for not only has י frequently the sense of "even" as in 2 Sam. i. 23, but (independently of passages, in which it may even be explained as "and that", an expression which takes up what has been omitted, as in Amos iv. 10) it sometimes has this meaning direct (like καί, et = etiam), Isa. xxxii. 7, Hos. viii. 6 (according to the accents), 2 Chron. xxvii. 5, Eccl. v. 5 (cf. Ew. § 352, b). Inasmuch, however, as this usage, in Hebrew, was not definitely developed, but was only as it were just developing, it may be asked whether it is not possible to find a suitable explanation without having recourse to this rendering of the י as equivalent to ׀, a rendering which is always hazardous. Olshausen places וּלְשִׁבְנִי after לְמִי־עֵי, a change which certainly gets rid of all difficulty. Hitzig alters מֵאֵר into מִנֹּר, frightened, scared. But one naturally looks for a parallel substantive to מִרְפָּה, somewhat like "terror" (Syriac) or "burden". Still מִנֹּר (dread) and מְשָׂאָה (a burden) do not look as though מֵאֵר could be a corruption of either of those words. Is it not perhaps possible for מֵאֵר itself to be equivalent in meaning to מְשָׂאָה? Since in the signification σφόδρα it is so unsuited to this passage, the expression would not be ambiguous, if it were here used in a special sense.

J. D. Michaelis has even compared the Arabic أَوْدَانٌ (أَوْدَانٌ) in the sense of onus. We can, without the hesitation felt by Maurer and Hupfeld, suppose that מֵאֵר has indeed this meaning in this passage, and without any necessity for its being pointed מֵאֵר; for even the adverb מֵאֵר is originally a substantive derived from אָדָּם, אָד (after the form קָצָר from צָר) gravitas, firmitas, which is then used in the sense of gravier, firmiter (cf. the French ferme). אָדָּם, אָד, however, has the radical signification to be compressed, compact, firm, and solid, from which proceed the significations, which are divided between ada, jaidu, and ada, jaudu, to be strong, powerful, and to press upon, to burden, both of which meanings אָד unites within itself (cf. on xx. 9).

The number of opponents that David had, at length made him a reproach even in the eyes of the better disposed of his people, as being a revoler and usurper. Those among whom he found friendly shelter began to feel themselves burdened by his presence because they were thereby imperilled; and we see from the sad fate of Abimelech and the other priests of Nob what cause, humanly speaking, they, who were not merely slightly, but even intimately acquainted with him (מְקַדְעִים as in lv. 14, lxxxviii. 9, 19), had for avoiding all intercourse with him. Thus, then, he is like one dead, whom as soon as he is borne out of his home to the grave, men are wont, in general, to put out of mind also (נִשְׁכַּח מִלֵּב, oblivione extingui ex corde; cf. מִסֵּפֶה, Deut. xxxi. 21). All intimate connection with him is as it were sundered, he is become כְּכֵלִי אֲבֵד, — a phrase, which, as we consider the confirmation which follows in ver. 14, has the sense of vas periens (not vas perditum), a vessel that is in the act of אֲבֵד, i. e. one that is set aside or thrown away, being abandoned to utter destruction and no more cared for (cf. Hos. viii. 8, together with Jer. xlvi. 38, and Jer. xxii. 28). With כִּי he gives the ground for his comparison of himself to a household vessel that has become worthless. The insinuations and slanders of many brand him as a transgressor, dread surrounds him on every side (this is word for word the same as in Jer. xx. 10, where the prophet, with whom in other passages also מִגֹּר מִסָּבִיב is a frequent and standing formula, under similar circumstances uses the language of the psalmist); when they come together to take counsel concerning him (according to the accents the second half of the verse begins with בְּהִיָּסְרֵם), they think only how they may get rid of him. If the construction of ב with its infinitive were intended to be continued in ver. 14*d*, it would have been וְיִזְמְמוּ לְקַחַח נַפְשִׁי or לְקַחַח נַפְשִׁי יִזְמוּ.

Vers. 15—19. But, although a curse of the world and an offscouring of all people, he is confident in God, his Deliverer and Avenger. By וְיִצְאֵי prominence is given to the subject by way of contrast, as in ver. 7. It appears as though Jahve had given him up in His anger; but he confides in Him, and in spite of this appearance, he even confides in Him with the prayer of appropriating faith. עֲתוּוֹת or עֲתוּיִם (1 Chron. xxix. 30) are the appointed events and circumstances, the vicissitudes of human life; like the Arabic 'idât (like עָר from וָעָר), the appointed rewards and punishments. The times, with whatsoever they bring with them, are in the Lord's hand, every lot is of His appointment or sending. The Vulgate follows the LXX., in manibus tuis sortes meæ. The petitions of vers. 16*b*, 17, spring from this consciousness that the almighty and faithful hand of God has moulded his life. There are three petitions; the middle one is an echo of the Aaronitish blessing in Num. vi. 25. כִּי קָרְאֵתִיךָ, which gives the ground of his hope that he shall not be put to shame (cf. ver. 2), is to be understood like אֲמַרְתִּי in ver. 15, according to Ges. § 126, 3. The expression of the ground for אֶל-אֲבוֹשָׁה, favours the explanation of it not so much as the language of petition (let me not be ashamed) as of hope. The futures which follow might be none the less regarded as optatives, but the order of the words does not require this. And we prefer to take them as expressing hope, so that the three petitions in vers. 16, 17, correspond to the three hopes in vers. 18, 19. He will not be ashamed, but the wicked shall be ashamed and silenced for ever. The form יִדְמוּ, from דָּמַם, is, as in Jer. viii. 14, the plural of the fut. Kal יִדַם, with the doubling of the first radical, which is customary in Aramaic (other examples of which we have in יִקְדַם, יִשְׁלַם, יִחַם), not of the fut. Niph. יִדַם, the plural of which would be יִדְמוּ, as in 1 Sam. ii. 9; conticescere in orcum is equivalent to: to be silent, i. e. being made powerless to fall a prey to hades. It is only in accordance with the connection, that in this instance נִגְזַלְתֶּם, ver. 19, just like דָּמַם, denotes that which is forcibly laid upon them by the judicial intervention of God: all lying lips shall be dumb, i. e. made dumb.

עֲתִיק prop. that which is unrestrained, free, insolent (cf. Arabic 'atik, 'atik, unrestrained, free*) is the accusative of the object, as in xciv. 4, and as it is the nominative of the subject in 1 Sam. ii. 3.

Vers. 20—25. In this part well-grounded hope expands to triumphant certainty; and this breaks forth into grateful praise of the goodness of God to His own, and an exhortation to all to wait with steadfast faith on Jahve. The thought: how gracious hath Jahve been to me, takes a more universal form in ver. 20. It is an exclamation (בָּרָה, as in xxxvi. 8) of adoring admiration. מִיֵּב יְהוָה is the sum of the good which God has treasured up for the constant and ever increasing use and enjoyment of His saints. צָפֵן is used in the same sense as in xvii. 14; cf. τὸ ἀμύνα τὸ ἀεχρυσμένον, Apoc. ii. 17. Instead of פָּעִלָּהּ it ought strictly to be נָתַתָּה; for we can say פָּעַל מִיֵּב, but not מִיֵּב פָּעַל. What is meant is, the doing or manifesting of מִיֵּב springing from this מִיֵּב, which is the treasure of grace. Jahve thus makes Himself known to His saints for the confounding of their enemies and in defiance of all the world besides, xxiii. 5. He takes those who are His under His protection from the רִבְסֵי אִישׁ, confederations of men (from רָכַס, رَكْس, magna copia), from the wrangling, i. e. the slanderous scourging, of tongues. Elsewhere it is said, that God hides one in סֶתֶר אֱהָלוֹ (xxvii. 5), or in סֶתֶר בְּנִיפָיו (lxi. 5), or in His shadow (צֶל, xci. 1); in this passage it is: in the defence and protection of His countenance, i. e. in the region of the unapproachable light that emanates from His presence. The סֶתֶר is the safe and comfortable protection of the Almighty which spans over the persecuted one like an arbour of rich foliage. With בָּרַךְךָ ה' David again passes over to his own personal experience. The unity of the Psalm requires us to refer the praise to the fact of the deliverance which is anticipated by faith. Jahve has shewn him wondrous favour, inasmuch as He has given him a עֵר מְצוּר as a place of abode. מְצוּר, from צוּר to shut in (Arabic misr with the denominative verb massara, to found a fortified city), signifies both a siege, i. e. a shutting in by siege-works, and a fortifying (cf. lx. 11 with cviii. 11), i. e. a shutting in by fortified works against the attack of the enemy, 2 Chron. viii. 5. The fenced city is mostly interpreted as God Himself and His powerful and gracious protection. We might then compare Isa. xxxiii. 21 and other passages. But why may not an actual city be intended, viz. Ziklag? The fact, that after long and troublous days David there found a strong and sure resting-place, he here celebrates beforehand, and unconsciously prophetically, as a wondrous token of divine favour. To him Ziklag was indeed the turning-point between his degradation and exaltation. He had already said in his trepidation (רָחַץ, trepidare), cf. cxvi. 11: I am cut away from the range of Thine eyes. נִגְרָחֵץ is explained according to גִּרְחֹן, an axe; Lam. iii. 54, נִגְרָחֵץ, and Jonah ii. 5, נִגְרָשָׁץ, favour this interpretation. He thought in his fear and despair, that God would never more care about him. אָבָן, verum enim vero, but Jahve heard the cry of his entreaty, when he cried unto Him (the same words as in xxviii. 2). On the ground of these experiences he calls upon all the godly to love the God who has done such gracious things, i. e. to love Love itself. On the one hand, He preserves the faithful (אֲמוּנִים, from אָמוּן = אֱמוּן, πιστοί, as in xii. 2), who keep faith with Him, by also proving to them His faithfulness by protection in every danger; on the other hand, not scantily, but plentifully (עַל as in Isa. lx. 7, Jer. vi. 14: κατὰ περισσεΐαν) He rewardeth those that practise pride — in the sight of God, the Lord, the sin of sins. An animating appeal to the godly (metamorphosed out of the usual form of the expression יִחַזַּק אֲמִץ, macte esto), resembling the animating call to his own heart in xxvii. 14, closes the Psalm. The godly and faithful are here called "those who wait upon Jahve". They are to wait patiently, for this waiting has a glorious end; the bright, spring sun at length breaks through the dark, angry aspect of the heavens, and the esto mihi is changed into halleluja. This eye of hope patiently directed towards Jahve is the characteristic of the Old Testament faith. The substantial unity, however, of the Old Testament order of grace, or mercy, with that of the New Testament, is set before us in Ps. xxxii., which, in its New Testament and Pauline character, is the counterpart of Ps. xix.

PSALM XXXII.

THE WAY TO THE FORGIVENESS OF SINS.

- 1 BLESSED is he whose transgression is taken away, whose sin is covered.
- 2 Blessed is the man to whom Jahve doth not reckon iniquity,
And in whose spirit there is no guile.
- 3 When I kept silence, my bones rotted
Through my constant groaning.
- 4 For day and night Thy hand was heavy upon me,
My moisture was changed with the drought of summer.
(Sela)
- 5 I acknowledged my sin unto Thee and did not cover my guilt;
I said: "I will confess my transgressions unto Jahve" —
And Thou, Thou hast taken away the guilt of my sin.
(Sela)
- 6 For this cause let every godly man pray unto Thee in a time when Thou mayest be found;
Surely, when the great waters rise —
They shall not reach him.
- 7 Thou art my hiding-place, from trouble Thou wilt guard me,
With songs of deliverance wilt Thou compass me about (Sela)
- 8 I will instruct thee and teach thee concerning the way thou shalt go.
I will give counsel, keeping mine eye upon thee.
- 9 Be ye not as horses, as mules without understanding,
With bit and bridle is their mouth to be curbed,
Otherwise they will not come near unto thee.

- 10 Many sorrows are to the ungodly,
But whoso trusteth in Jahve, with favour doth He compass him about.
- 11 Be glad in Jahve, and rejoice, ye righteous,
And shout for joy all ye that are upright in heart!

There are several prominent marks by which this Psalm is coupled with the preceding (vid. Symbolæ § 52). In both Psalms, with the word אִמְרָתִי, the psalmist looks back upon some fact of his spiritual life; and both close with an exhortation to the godly, which stands in the relation of a general inference to the whole Psalm. But in other respects the two Psalms differ. For Ps. xxxi. is a prayer under circumstances of outward distress, and Ps. xxxii. is a didactic Psalm, concerning the way of penitence which leads to the forgiveness of sins; it is the second of the seven Psalmi pœnitentiales of the church, and Augustine's favourite Psalm. We might take Augustine's words as its motto: intelligentia prima est ut te noris peccatorem. The poet bases it upon his own personal experience, and then applies the general teaching which he deduces from it, to each individual in the church of God. For a whole year after his adultery David was like one under sentence of condemnation. In the midst of this fearful anguish of soul he composed Ps. li., whereas Ps. xxxii. was composed after his deliverance from this state of mind. The former was written in the very midst of the penitential struggle; the latter after he had recovered his inward peace. The theme of this Psalm is the precious treasure which he brought up out of that abyss of spiritual distress, viz. the doctrine of the blessedness of forgiveness, the sincere and unreserved confession of sin as the way to it, and the protection of God in every danger, together with joy in God, as its fruits.

In the signification psalmus didascalicus s. informatorius (Reuchlin: ut si liceret dicere intellectificum vel resipiscenticum), מִשְׁכֵּל would after all be as appropriate a designation as we could have for this Psalm which teaches the way of salvation. This meaning, however, cannot be sustained. It is improbable that מִשְׁכֵּל, which, in all other instances, signifies intelligens, should, as a technical term, mean intelligentem faciens; because the Hiph. הִשְׁכִּיל, in the causative meaning "to impart understanding", occurs only in solitary instances (ver. 8, Prov. xxi. 11) in the Hebrew of the period before the Exile, and only came into common use in the later language (in Daniel, Chronicles, and Nehemiah). But, that which is decisive against the meaning "a didactic poem" is the fact, that among the thirteen Psalms which are inscribed מִשְׁכִּיל, there are only two (xxxii. and lxxviii.) which can be regarded as didactic poems. Ps. xlv. is called, in addition, שִׁיר יְדִידָה, and Ps. cxlii., תְּפִלָּה, two names which ill accord with a didactic intention and plan. Even Ps. xlvii. 8, a passage of importance in the determining of the right idea of the word, in which מִשְׁכִּיל occurs as an accusative of the object, excludes the meaning "didactic poem". Ewald observes (Dichter des Alten Bundes, i, 31) that "in Ps. xlvii. 8 we have the safest guide to the correct meaning of the word; in this passage מִשְׁכִּיל stands side by side with זִמְרָה as a more exact definition of the singing and there can be no doubt, that an intelligent, melodious song must be equivalent to a choice or delicate, skillfully composed song". But in all other cases, מִשְׁכִּיל is only found as an attribute of persons, because it is not that which makes prudent, but that which is in itself intelligent, that is so named. Even in 2 Chron. xxx. 22, where allusion is made to the Maskil Psalms, it is the Levitemusicians themselves who are called (הַמְשַׁכִּילִים (שֶׁכַל טוֹב)) (i. e. those who play skillfully with delicate tact). Thus then we are driven to the Hiphil meaning of pensive meditation in cvi. 7, cf. xli. 2, Prov. xvi. 20; so that מִשְׁכִּיל signifies that which meditates, then meditation, just like מְכַבֵּיר, that which multiplies, and then fulness; מִשְׁחִיחַ, that which destroys, and then destruction. From the Maskil Psalms, as e. g. from liv. and cxlii., we cannot discover anything special as to the technical meaning or use of the word. The word means just pia meditatio, a devout meditation, and nothing more.

Vers. 1—2. The Psalm begins with the celebration of the happiness of the man who experiences God's justifying grace, when he gives himself up unreservedly to Him. Sin is called פֶּשַׁע, as being a breaking loose or tearing away from God; הִטָּאָה, as a deviation from that which is well-pleasing to God; עָוֹן, as a perversion, distortion, misdeed. The forgiveness of sin is styled נָשָׂא (Exod. xxxiv. 7), as a lifting up and taking away, ἀρῶν and ἀφαιρεῖν, Exod. xxxiv. 7; כָּסָה (lxxxv. 3, Prov. x. 12, Neh. iii. 37), as a covering, so that it becomes invisible to God, the Holy One, and is as though it had never taken place; לֹא הָשִׁב (2 Sam. xix. 20, cf. حَسِب, to number, reckon, οὐ λογίζεσθαι, Rom. iv. 6—9), as a non-imputing; the δικαιοσύνη χάρις ἔργων is here distinctly expressed. The justified one is called נְשִׁי-עֲשֵׂה, as being one who is exempted from transgression, prævaricatione levatus (Ges. § 135, 1); נְשִׁי, instead of נָשָׂא, Isa. xxxiii. 24, is intended to rhyme with כָּסִי (which is the part. to כָּסָה, just as בְּרוּךְ is the participle to בָּרַךְ); vid. on Isa. xxii. 13. One "covered of sin" is one over whose sin lies the covering of expiation (כִּפָּר, root כָּפַר, to cover, cogn. غفر, خفر, غمر) before the holy eyes of God. The third designation is an attributive clause: "to whom Jahve doth not reckon misdeed", inasmuch as He, on the contrary, regards it as discharged or as settled. He who is thus justified, however, is only he in whose spirit there is no רִמְיָה, no deceit, which denies and hides, or extenuates and excuses, this or that favourite sin. One such sin designedly retained is a secret ban, which stands in the way of justification.

Vers. 3—5. For, as his own experience has taught the poet, he who does not in confession pour out all his corruption before God, only tortures himself until he unburdens himself of his secret curse. Since ver. 3 by itself cannot be regarded as the reason for the proposition just laid down, כִּי signifies either "because, quod" (e. g. Prov. xxii. 22) or "when, quum" (Judges xvi. 16, Hos. xi. 1). The שִׁמְמָה was an outburst of the tortures which his accusing conscience prepared for him. The more he strove against confessing, the louder did conscience speak; and while it was not in his power to silence this inward voice, in which the wrath of God found utterance, he cried the whole day, viz. for help: but while his heart was still unbroken, he cried yet received no answer. He cried all day long, for God's punishing right hand (xxxviii. 3, xxxix. 11) lay heavy upon him day and night; the feeling of divine wrath left him no rest, cf. Job xxxiii. 14 sqq. A fire burned within him which threatened completely to devour him. The expression is בְּרִכְנֵי בָּעֵשׂן (like בְּעֵשׂן in xxxvii. 20, cii. 4), without כ, inasmuch as the fears which burn fiercely within him even to his heart and, as it were, scorch him up, he directly calls the droughts of summer. The בָּ is the Beth of the state or condition, in connection with which the change, i. e. degeneration (Job xx. 14), took place; for mutare in aliquid is expressed by הִפְתָּ לְ. The ל (which Saadia and other have mistaken) in לְשֵׁנִי is part of the root; לָשַׁד (from לָשַׁד, لَسَد, to suck), inflected after the analogy of נָמַל and the like, signifies succus. In the summer-heat of anxiety his vital moisture underwent a change: it burned and dried up. Here the music becomes louder and does its part in depicting these torments of the awakened conscience in connection with a heart that still remains unbroken. In spite of this διάψαλμα, however, the historical connection still retains sufficient influence to give אִוְרִיעַךְ the force of the imperfect (cf. xxx. 9): “I made known my sin and my guilt did I not cover up (כִּסֶּה used here as in Prov. xxviii. 13, Job xxxi. 33); I made the resolve: I will confess my transgressions to the Lord (הִתְוֹדַה = הוֹדַה, Neh. i. 6, ix. 2; elsewhere construed with the accusative, vid. Prov. xxviii. 13) — then Thou forgavest”, etc. Hupfeld is inclined to place אִמְרָתִי before חַטָּאתִי אִוְרִיעַךְ, by which אִוְרִיעַךְ and אִוְרָה would become futures; but אִוְרִיעַךְ sounds like an assertion of a fact, not the statement of an intention, and וְאִתָּה נִשְׂאָה is the natural continuation of the אִמְרָתִי which immediately precedes. The form וְאִתָּה נִשְׂאָה is designedly used instead of וְחִשָּׂא. Simultaneously with his confession of sin, made fide supplice, came also the absolution: then Thou forgavest the guilt (עֲוֹן, misdeed, as a deed and also as a matter of fact, i. e. guilt contracted, and penance or punishment, cf. Lam. iv. 6, Zech. xiv. 19) of my sin. Vox nondum est in ore, says Augustine, et vulnus sanatur in corde. The סִלַּח here is the antithesis of the former one. There we have a shrill lament over the sinner who tortures himself in vain, here the clear tones of joy at the blessed experience of one who pours forth his soul to God — a musical Yea and Amen to the great truth of justifying grace.

Vers. 6—7. For this mercy, which is provided for every sinner who repents and confesses his sin, let then, every חסיד, who longs for חסד, turn in prayer to Jahve לַעֲוֹת מִצָּחַד, at the time (xxi. 10, 1 Chron. xii. 22; cf. בָּעֵת, Isa. xlix. 8) when He, and His mercy, is to be found (cf. Deut. iv. 29 with Jer. xxix. 13, Isa. lv. 6, בְּהַמְצֵאוֹ). This hortatory wish is followed by a promissory assurance. The fact of לְשֹׁמֵרָה מִיַּם רַבִּים being virtually a protasis: quum inundant aquæ magnæ (לְ of the time), which separates רַק from אֱלֹהֵי, prohibits our regarding רַק as belonging to אֱלֹהֵי in this instance, although like אָה, אָד, גַּם, and פֶּן, רַק is also placed per hypallage at the head of the clause (as in Prov. xiii. 10: with pride there is only contention), even when belonging to a part of the clause that follows further on. The restrictive meaning of רַק here, as is frequently the case (Deut. iv. 6, Judges xiv. 16, 1 Kings xxi. 25, cf. Ps. xci. 8), has passed over to the affirmative: certo quum, etc. Inundation or flooding is an exemplificative description of the divine judgment (cf. Nah. i. 8); ver. 6*bcd* is a brief form of expressing the promise which is expanded in Ps. xci. In ver. 7, David confirms it from his own experience. The assonance in מִצָּר הַצָּרֵנִי (Thou wilt preserve me, so that צָר, angustum = angustia, does not come upon me, cxix. 143) is not undesigned; and after חֲצֵרֵנִי comes רֵנִי, just like כָּלוּ after בְּהִיכָלוּ in xxix. 9. There is no sufficient ground for setting aside רֵנִי, with Houbigant and others, as a repetition of the half of the word חֲצֵרֵנִי. The infinitive רִן (Job xxxviii. 7) might, like רַב, plur. רַבִּי, חֹק, plur. חֻקֵּי, with equal right be inflected as a substantive; and פָּלַט (as in lvi. 8), which is likewise treated as a substantive, cf. נַפְסֵי, Dan. xii. 7, presents, as a genitive, no more difficulty than does רָעַת in the expression אִישׁ רָעַת. With songs of deliverance doth Jahve surround him, so that they encompass him on all sides, and an occasion of exulting meets him in whatever direction he turns. The music here again for the third time becomes forte, and that to express the highest feeling of delight.

Vers. 8—10. It is not Jahve, who here speaks in answer to the words that have been thus far addressed to Him. In this case the person addressed must be the poet, who, however, has already attained the knowledge here treated of.

It is he himself who now directly adopts the tone of the teacher (cf. xxxiv. 12). That which David, in Ps. li. 15, promises to do, he here takes in hand, viz. the instruction of sinners in the way of salvation. It is unnecessary to read אֶעֱצֶה instead of אֶעֱצֶה, as Olshausen does; the suffix of אֶעֱצֶה and אֶרְדֶּה (for אֶרְדֶּה) avails also for this third verb, to which עֵינַי עָלֶיךָ, equivalent to שָׁם עָלֶיךָ עֵינַי (fixing my eye upon thee, i. e. with sympathising love taking an interest in thee), stands in the relation of a subordinate relative clause. The LXX. renders it by ἐπιστηριῶ ἐπὶ σὲ τοὺς ὀφθαλμούς μου, so that it takes יַעֲצֶה, in accordance with its radical signification firmare, as the regens of עֵינַי (I will fix my eye steadfastly upon thee); but for this there is no support in the general usage of the language. The accents give a still different rendering; they apparently make עֵינַי an accus. adverb. (since אֶעֱצֶה עֵינַי is transformed from אֶעֱצֶה עֵינַי): I will counsel thee with mine eye; but in every other instance, יַעֲצֶה means only a hostile determination against any one, e. g. Isa. vii. 5. The form of address, without changing its object, passes over, in ver. 9, into the plural and the expression becomes harsh in perfect keeping with the perverted character which it describes. The sense is on the whole clear: not constrained, but willing obedience is becoming to man, in distinction from an irrational animal which must be led by a bridle drawn through its mouth. The asyndeton clause: like a horse, a mule (פָּרָד as an animal that is isolated and does not pair; cf. פָּרָד alone of its kind, single, unlike, the opposite of which is זֶגֶג, a pair, equal number), has nothing remarkable about it, cf. xxxv. 14, Isa. xxxviii. 14. But it is not clear what עֲרִי is intended to mean. We might take it in its usual signification "ornament", and render "with bit and bridle, its ornament", and perhaps at once recognise therein an allusion to the senseless servility of the animal, viz. that its ornament is also the means by which it is kept in check, unless עֲרִי, ornament, is perhaps directly equivalent to "harness". Still the rendering of the LXX. is to be respected: in camo et fræno — as Jerome reproduces it — maxillas eorum constringere qui non approximant ad te. If עֲרִי means jaw, mouth or cheek, then עֲרִי לְבָלוֹם is equivalent to ora eorum obturanda sunt (Ges. § 132, rem. 1), which the LXX. expresses by ἄρξαι, constringe, or, following the Cod. Alex., ἄρξεις (ἄρξεις), constringes. Like Ewald and Hitzig (on Ezek. xvi. 7), we may compare with עָרִי, the cheek, the Arabic حَدّ, which, being connected with نָרִיד, a furrow, signifies properly the furrow of the face, i. e. the indented part running downwards from the inner corners of the eyes to both sides of the nose, but then by synecdoche the cheek. If עָרִי refers to the mouth or jaws, then it looks as if כָּל קֶרֶב אֱלֹהֶיךָ must be translated: in order that they may not come too near thee, viz. to hurt thee (Targ., Syriac, Rashi, etc.); but this rendering does not produce any point of comparison corresponding to the context of this Psalm. Therefore, it is rather to be rendered: otherwise there is no coming near to thee. This interpretation takes the emphasis of the כָּל into account, and assumes that, according to a usage of the language that is without further support, one might, for instance, say: כָּל לִבִּי לְשָׁמֶר: "I will never go thither." In Prov. xxiii. 17, כָּל also includes within itself the verb to be. So here: by no means an approaching to thee, i. e. there is, if thou dost not bridle them, no approaching or coming near to thee. These words are not addressed to God, but to man, who is obliged to use harsh and forcible means in taming animals, and can only thus keep them under his control and near to him. In the antitype, it is the sinner, who will not come to God, although God only is his help, and who, as David has learned by experience, must first of all endure inward torture, before he comes to a right state of mind. This agonising life of the guilty conscience which the ungodly man leads, is contrasted in ver. 10 with the mercy which encompasses on all sides him, who trusts in God. רַבִּים, in accordance with the treatment of this adjective as if it were a numeral (vid. lxxxix. 51), is an attributive or adjective placed before its noun. The final clause might be rendered: mercy encompasses him; but the Poel and ver. 7 favour the rendering: with mercy doth He encompass him.

Ver. 11. After the doctrine of the Psalm has been unfolded in three unequal groups of verses, there follows, corresponding to the brief introduction, a still shorter close, which calls upon those whose happy state is there celebrated, to join in songs of exultant joy.

PSALM XXXIII.

PRAISE OF THE RULER OF THE WORLD AS BEING THE DEFENDER OF HIS PEOPLE.

- 1 SHOUT for joy, O ye righteous, in Jahve,
For the upright praise is comely.
- 2 Praise Jahve with cithern,
With a ten-stringed nabla play unto Him.
- 3 Sing unto Him a new song,
Play merrily with a joyful noise.
- 4 For upright is the word of Jahve,
And all His working is in faithfulness.
- 5 He loveth righteousness and judgment;
The earth is full of the mercy of Jahve.
- 6 By the word of Jahve were the heavens made,
And by the breath of His mouth all their host.
- 7 He gathereth the waters of the sea together as a heap,
He layeth up the depths in storehouses.
- 8 Let all the earth fear before Jahve,
Let all the inhabitants of the world stand in awe of Him.
- 9 For He spake, and it was done;
He commanded, and it stood fast.
- 10 Jahve hath brought the counsel of the heathen to nought,
He hath made the thoughts of the people of none effect.
- 11 The counsel of Jahve standeth for ever,
The thoughts of His heart to all generations.
- 12 Blessed is the nation whose God is Jahve,
The people whom He chooseth for His own inheritance.

- 13 From heaven Jahve looketh down,
He seeth all the children of men.
- 14 From the place of His habitation He looketh Upon all the inhabitants of the earth,
- 15 He, who fashioneth their heart together,
Who considereth all their works.
- 16 A king doth not triumph by great strength,
A mighty man is not delivered by great power.
- 17 A vain thing is a horse for victory,
And its great strength cannot deliver.
- 18 Behold, the eye of Jahve is upon them that fear Him, Upon them that hope in His mercy,
- 19 To deliver their soul from death,
And to keep them alive in famine.
- 20 Our soul waiteth for Jahve,
Our help and our shield is He.
- 21 For in Him shall our heart rejoice,
Because we trust in His holy Name
- 22 Let, then, Thy mercy, O Jahve, be upon us,
According as we hope in Thee!

The Davidic Maskil, Ps. xxxii., is followed by an anonymous congregational song of a hymnic character, which begins just like the former closes. It owes its composition apparently to some deliverance of the nation from heathen oppression, which had resulted from God's interposition and without war. Moreover it exhibits no trace of dependence upon earlier models, such as might compel us to assign a late date to it; the time of Jeremiah, for instance, which Hitzig adopts. The structure is symmetrical. Between the two hexastichs, vers. 1—3, 20—22, the materia laudis is set forth in eight tetrastichs.

Vers. 1—3. The call contained in this hexastich is addressed to the righteous and upright, who earnestly seek to live a godly and God-pleasing life, and the sole determining rule of whose conduct is the will and good pleasure of God. These alone know God, whose true nature finds in them a clear mirror; so on their part they are joyfully to confess what they possess in Him. For it is their duty, and at the same time their honour, to praise him, and make their boast in Him. נְאוּה is the feminine of the adjective נְאוּה (formed out of נְאוּי), as in cxlvii. 1, cf. Prov. xix. 10. On נְנוּר (LXX. κισθῆρα, κισύρα) and נְבֵל (LXX. ψαλτήριον,νάβλα, ναῦλα, etc.) vid. Introduction § II. נְבֵל is the name given to the harp or lyre on account of its resemblance to a skin bottle or flask (root נב, to swell, to be distended), and נְבֵל עֶשׂוּר, "harp of the decade", is the ten-stringed harp, which is also called absolutely עֶשׂוּר, and distinguished from the customary נְבֵל, in xcii. 4. By a comparison of the asyndeton expressions in xxxv. 14, Jer. xi. 19, Aben-Ezra understands by נְבֵל עֶשׂוּר two instruments, contrary to the tenour of the words. Gecatilia, whom he controverts, is only so far in error as that he refers the ten to holes (נְקִיבִים) instead of to strings. The נְ is Beth instrum., just like the expression κισθαρίσειν ἐν κισθῆραις, Apoc. xiv. 2. A "new song" is one which, in consequence of some new mighty deeds of God, comes from a new impulse of gratitude in the heart, xl. 4, and frequently in the Psalms, Isa. xlii. 10, Judith vi. 13, Apoc. v. 9. In הִשְׁבִּיחֵי the notions of scite and strenue, suaviter and naviter, blend. With בְּהַרְמֵהָ, referring back to רַנְנוּ, the call to praise forms, as it were, a circle as it closes.

Vers. 4—5. Now begins the body of the song. The summons to praise God is supported (1) by a setting forth of His praiseworthiness* (a) as the God of revelation in the kingdom of Grace. His word is יֶשֶׁר, upright in intention, and, without becoming in any way whatever untrue to itself, straightway fulfilling itself. His every act is an act in אֱמִתּוֹה, truth, which verifies the truth of His word, and one which accomplishes itself. On אֱהֵב, equivalent to הֵאֱהֵב, vid. vii. 10, xxii. 29. צְדִיקָה is righteousness as conduct; מִשְׁפָּט is right as a rule of judgment and a state or condition. חָסֵד is an accusative, as in cxix. 64: miseri-cordiâ Domini plena est terra (the introit for Misericordias Sunday or the second Sunday after Easter).

Vers. 6—9. God's praiseworthiness (b) as the Creator of the world in the kingdom of Nature. Jahve's דְּבַר is His almighty "Let there be"; and רוּחַ פִּי (inasmuch as the breath is here regarded as the material of which the word is formed and the bearer of the word) is the command, or in general, the operation of His commanding omnipotence (Job xv. 30, cf. iv. 9; Isa. xxxiv. 16, cf. xi. 4). The heavens above and the waters beneath stand side by side as miracles of creation. The display of His power in the waters of the sea consists in His having confined them within fixed bounds and keeping them within these. נֶדֶד is a pile, i. e. a piled up heap (Arabic nadd), and more especially in reference to harvest: like such a heap do the convex waters of the sea, being firmly held together, rise above the level of the continents. The expression is like that in Josh. iii. 13, 16, cf. Exod. xv. 8; although there the reference is to a miracle occurring in the course of history, and in this passage to a miracle of creation. פְּנֵים refers to the heap itself, not to the walls of the storehouses as holding together. This latter figure is not introduced until ver. 7*b*: the bed of the sea and those of the rivers are, as it were, אֹצְרוֹת, treasuries or storehouses, in which God has deposited the deep, foaming waves or surging mass of waters. The inhabitants (יֹשְׁבֵי, not יֹשְׁבֵי) of the earth have cause to fear God who is thus omnipotent (יָן, in the sense of falling back from in terror); for He need only speak the word and that which He wills comes into being out of nothing, as we see from the hexaëmeron or history of Creation, but which is also confirmed in human history (Lam. iii. 37). He need only command and it stands forth like an obedient servant, that appears in all haste at the call of his lord, cxix. 91.

Vers. 10—11. His praiseworthiness (c) as the irresistible Ruler in the history of men. Since in 2 Sam. xv. 34, xvii. 14, and frequently, הִפְרַ עֵצָה is a common phrase, therefore הִפְרַ as in lxxxix. 34, Ezek. xvii. 19, is equivalent to הִפְרַ (Ges. § 67, rem. 9). The perfects are not used in the abstract, but of that which has been experienced most recently, since the "new song" presupposes new matter. With ver. 11 compare Prov. xix. 21. The  $\text{עֶצֶר}$  of God is the unity of the "thoughts of His heart," i. e. of the ideas, which form the inmost part, the ultimate motives of everything that takes place. The whole history of the world is the uninterrupted carrying out of a divine plan of salvation, the primary object of which is His people, but in and with these are included humanity at large.

Vers. 12—19. Hence the call to praise God is supported (2) by a setting forth of that which His people possess in Him. This portion of the song is like a paraphrase of the  $\text{אֲזַיֵּרִי}$  in Deut. xxxiii. 29. The theme in ver. 12 is proved in vers. 13—15 by the fact, that Jahve is the omniscient Ruler, because He is the Creator of men, without whose knowledge nothing is undertaken either secretly or openly, and especially if against His people. Then in vers. 16—19 it is supported by the fact, that His people have in Jahve a stronger defence than the greatest worldly power would be. Jahve is called the fashioner of all the hearts of men, as in Zech. xii. 1, cf. Prov. xxiv. 12, as being their Maker. As such He is also the observer of all the works of men; for He is acquainted with their origin in the laboratory of the heart, which He as Creator has formed. Hupfeld takes  $\text{וַיַּרְךָ}$  as an equalisation (pariter ac) of the two appositions; but then it ought to be  $\text{וַיַּרְכֵן}$  (cf. xlix. 3, 11). The LXX. correctly renders it  $\kappa\alpha\tau\alpha\mu\acute{o}\nu\alpha\varsigma$ , singillatim. It is also needless to translate it, as Hupfeld does: He who formed, qui finxit; for the hearts of men were not from the very first created all at one time, but the primeval impartation of spirit-life is continued at every birth in some mysterious way. God is the Father of spirits, Hebr. xii. 9. For this very reason everything that exists, even to the most hidden thing, is encompassed by His omniscience and omnipotence. He exercises an omniscient control over all things, and makes all things subservient to the designs of His plan of the universe, which, so far as His people are concerned, is the plan of salvation. Without Him nothing comes to pass; but through Him everything takes place. The victory of the king, and the safety of the warrior, are not their own works. Their great military power and bodily strength can accomplish nothing without God, who can also be mighty in the feeble. Even for purposes of victory (הַשָּׂעָרָה, cf. הַשָּׂעָרָה, xxi. 2) the war-horse is שָׂעָרָה, i. e. a thing that promises much, but can in reality do nothing; it is not its great strength, by which it enables the trooper to escape (יִמָּלֵט). "The horse", says Solomon in Prov. xxi. 31, "is equipped for the day of battle, but לֹדֶה הַהַשָּׂעָרָה, Jahve's is the victory", He giveth it to whomsoever He will. The ultimate ends of all things that come to pass are in His hands, and — as vers. 18 sq. say, directing special attention to this important truth by הַנִּיבָה — the eye of this God, that is to say the final aim of His government of the world, is directed towards them that fear Him, is pointed at them that hope in His mercy (לְמִתְּלִים). In ver. 19, the object, לְחַסְדֵּי, is expanded by way of example. From His mercy or loving-kindness, not from any acts of their own, conscious of their limited condition and feebleness, they look for protection in the midst of the greatest peril, and for the preservation of their life in famine. Ps. xx. 8 is very similar; but the one passage sounds as independent as the other.

Vers. 20—22. Accordingly, in this closing hexastich, the church acknowledges Him as its help, its shield, and its source of joy. Besides the passage before us, הִתְּבַר occurs in only one other instance in the Psalter, viz. cvi. 13. This word, which belongs to the group of words signifying hoping and waiting, is perhaps from the root חָכַ (חָכָא), חָכִי, firmiter constringere sc. nodum), to be firm, compact, like קָוָה from קָוָה, to pull tight or fast, cf. the German harren (to wait) and hart (hard, compact). In ver. 20<sup>b</sup> we still hear the echo of the primary passage Deut. xxxiii. 29 (cf. ver. 26). The emphasis, as in cxv. 9—11, rests upon הוֹיָהּ, into which בָּו, in ver. 21, puts this thought, viz. He is the unlimited sphere, the inexhaustible matter, the perennial spring of our joy. The second פִּי confirms this subjectively. His holy Name is His church's ground of faith, of love, and of hope; for from thence comes its salvation. It can boldly pray that the mercy of the Lord may be upon it, for it waits upon Him, and man's waiting or hoping and God's giving are reciprocally conditioned. This is the meaning of the בְּאִשֶּׁר. God is true to His word. The Te Deum laudamus of Ambrose closes in the same way.

P S A L M XXXIV.

THANKSGIVING AND TEACHING OF ONE WHO HAS EXPERIENCED DELIVERANCE.

- 2 א I WILL bless Jahve at all times,
Continually let His praise be in my mouth.
- 3 ב In Jahve shall my soul make her boast,
The patient shall hear thereof and be glad.
- 4 ג O magnify Jahve with me,
And let us exalt His name together.
- 5 ד I sought Jahve, and He answered me,
And out of all my fears did He deliver me.
- 6 ה Looking unto Him they are lightened,
And their faces shall not be ashamed.
- 7 ו This afflicted one cried, and Jahve heard,
And saved him out of all his troubles.
- 8 ז The Angel of Jahve encampeth round about them that fear Him,
And delivereth them.
- 9 ח Taste and see, that Jahve is good — Blessed is the man that trusteth in Him.
- 10 ט Fear Jahve, ye His saints!
For there is no want to them that fear Him.
- 11 י Young lions do lack and suffer hunger,
But they that seek Jahve do not want any good thing.
- 12 יא Come, ye children, hearken unto me!
The fear of Jahve will I teach you.
- 13 יב Whosoever thou art, dost thou desire long life,
Dost thou love days that thou mayst see good —:
- 14 יג Keep thy tongue from evil,
And thy lips from deceitful speaking.
- 15 יד Depart from evil and do good,
Seek peace, and pursue it.
- 16 יו The eyes of Jahve observe the righteous,
And His ears their cry.

- 17 פ The face of Jahve is against the evil doers,
To cut off their remembrance from the earth.
- 18 צ The former cry unto Jahve, and He heareth,
And out of all their troubles He delivereth them.
- 19 פ Jahve is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart,
And saveth such as be of a contrite spirit.
- 20 ו Many are the afflictions of the righteous,
But out of them all doth Jahve deliver him.
- 21 ו He preserveth all his bones,
Not one of them is broken.
- 22 ו Evil shall slay the wicked,
And they that hate the righteous shall be punished.
- 23 פ Jahve redeemeth the soul of His servant,
And they shall not be punished who trust in Him.

In Ps. xxxiii. 18 we heard the words, "Behold, the eye of Jahve is directed towards them that fear Him", and in xxxiv. 16 we hear this same grand thought, "the eyes of Jahve are directed towards the righteous". Ps. xxxiv. is one of the eight Psalms which are assigned, by their inscriptions, to the time of David's persecution by Saul, and were composed upon that weary way of suffering extending from Gibea of Saul to Ziklag. (The following is an approximation to their chronological order: vii., lix., lvi., xxxiv., lii., lvii., cxlii., liv.). The inscription runs: Of David, when he disguised his understanding (מַעְמֹוֹ with Dag., lest it should be pronounced מַעְמֹו before Abimelech, and he drove him away (וַיִּגְרֵם אֶת־שָׂרָף), with Chateph Pathach, as is always the case with verbs whose second radical is ר, if the accent is on the third radical) and he departed. David, being pressed by Saul, fled into the territory of the Philistines; here he was recognised as the man who had proved such a dangerous enemy to them years since and he was brought before Achish, the king. Ps. lvi. is a prayer which implores help in the trouble of this period (and its relation to Ps. xxiv. resembles that of Ps. li. to xxxii.). David's life would have been lost had not his desperate attempt to escape by playing the part of a madman been successful. The king commanded him to depart, and David betook himself to a place of concealment in his own country, viz. the cave of Adullam in the wilderness of Judah.

The correctness of the inscription has been disputed. Hupfeld maintains that the writer has blindly taken it from 1 Sam. xxi. 14. According to Redslob, Hitzig, Olshausen, and Stähelin, he had reasons for so doing, although they are invalid. The מַעֲמֹי of the Psalm (ver. 9) seemed to him to accord with מַעֲמֹי, 1 Sam. xxi. 14; and in addition to this, he combined תִּתְרַלֵּל, gloriaris, of the Psalm (ver. 3) with וַיִּתְרַלֵּל, insanivit, 1 Sam. xxi. 14. We come to a different conclusion. The Psalm does not contain any express reference to that incident in Philistia, hence we infer that the writer of the inscription knew of this reference from tradition. His source of information is not the Books of Samuel; for there the king is called אֲכִישׁ, whereas he calls him אֲכִישׁוֹן, and this, as even Basil has perceived (vid. Euthymius Zigadenus' introduction to this Psalm), is the title of the Philistine kings, just as Pharaoh is title of the Egyptian, Agag of the Amalekite, and Lucumo of the Etruscan kings. His source of information, as a comparison of 2 Sam. xxii. 1 with Ps. xviii. 1 shews, is a different work, viz. the Annals of David, in which he has traced the Psalm before us and other Psalms to their historical connection, and then indicated it by an inscription in words taken from that source. The fact of the Psalm being alphabetical says nothing against David as its author (vid. on Ps. ix.—x.). It is not arranged for music; for although it begins after the manner of a song of praise, it soon passes into the didactic tone. It consists of verses of two lines, which follow one another according to the order of the letters of the alphabet. The ו is wanting, just as the נ is wanting in Ps. cxlv.; and after ט, as in Ps. xxv., which is the counterpart to xxxiv., follows a second supernumerary ע.

Vers. 2—4. The poet begins with the praise of Jahve, and calls upon all the pious to unite with him in praising Him. The substantival clause ver. 2*b*, is intended to have just as much the force of a cohortative as the verbal clause ver. 2*a*. אֲבִיבֵךָ, like וַיִּגְדֵּשׁוּ, is to be written with Chateph-Pathach in the middle syllable. In distinction from עֲנִיִּים, afflicti, עֲנִיִּים signifies submissi, those who have learnt endurance or patience in the school of affliction. The praise of the psalmist will greatly help to strengthen and encourage such; for it applies to the Deliverer of the oppressed. But in order that this praise may sound forth with strength and fulness of tone, he courts the assistance of companions in ver. 4. To acknowledge the divine greatness with the utterance of praise is expressed by נָגִיל with an accusative in lxix. 31; in this instance with לְ: to offer נִגְלָה unto Him, cf. xxix. 2. Even רוּמָם has this subjective meaning: with the heart and in word and deed, to place the exalted Name of God as high as it really is in itself. In accordance with the rule, that when in any word two of the same letters follow one another and the first has a Sh'bd, this Sh'bd must be an audible one, and in fact Chateph Pathach preceded by Gaja (Metheg), we must write תְּרַמְּמָה.

Vers. 5—7. The poet now gives the reason for this praise by setting forth the deliverance he has experienced. He longed for God and took pains to find Him (such is the meaning of שָׁרַר in distinction from שָׁשׂ), and this striving, which took the form of prayer, did not remain without some actual answer (עָנָה is used of the being heard and the fulfilment as an answer to the petition of the praying one). The perfects, as also in vers. 6, 7, describe facts, one of which did not take place without the other; whereas וַיַּעֲנֵנִי would give them the relation of antecedent and consequent. In ver. 6, his own personal experience is generalised into an experimental truth, expressed in the historical form: they look unto Him and brighten up, i. e. whosoever looketh unto Him (הִבִּיט אֵלַי of a look of intense yearning, eager for salvation, as in Num. xxi. 9, Zech. xii. 10) brightens up. It is impracticable to make the עָנִיִּים from ver. 3 the subject; it is an act and the experience that immediately accompanies it, that is expressed with an universal subject and in gnomic perfects. The verb נָהַר, here as in Isa. lx. 5, has the signification to shine, glitter (whence נִהָרָה, light). Theodoret renders it: Ὁ μετὰ πίστεως τῷ θεῷ προσώπων φωτὸς ἀκτῖνας δέχεται νοσοῦ, the gracious countenance of God is reflected on their faces; to the actus directus of fides supplex succeeds the actus reflexus of fides triumphans. It never comes to pass that their countenances must be covered with shame on account of disappointed hope: this shall not and cannot be, as the sympathetic force of ל implies. In all the three dialects חָפַר (חָפַר) has the signification of being ashamed and scared; according to Gesenius and Fürst (root פּר) it proceeds from the primary signification of reddening, blushing; in reality, however, since it is to be combined, not with חמר, but with חמר (cf. כפר, כפר, גפר, גפר), it proceeds from the primary signification of covering, hiding, veiling (Arabic chafra, tachuffara, used of a woman, cf. chamara, to be ashamed, to blush, to be modest, used of both sexes), so that consequently the shame-covered countenance is contrasted with that which has a bright, bold, and free look. In ver. 7, this general truth is again individualised. By וְהָיָה עֵינַי (like וְהָיָה עֵינַי in lxviii. 9) David points to himself. From the great peril in which he was placed at the court of the Philistines, from which God has rescued him, he turns his thoughts with gratitude and praise to all the deliverances which lie in the past.

Vers. 8—11. This praise is supported by a setting forth of the gracious protection under which God's saints continually are. The מַלְאֲכֵי יְהוָה, is none other than He who was the medium of Jahve's intercourse with the patriarchs, and who accompanied Israel to Canaan. This name is not collective (Calvin, Hupfeld, Kamphausen, and others). He, the One, encampeth round about them, in so far as He is the Captain of the host of Jahve (Josh. v. 14), and consequently is accompanied by a host of inferior ministering angels; or insofar as He can, as being a spirit not limited by space, furnish protection that covers them on every side. חֲנֻכָּה (cf. Zech. ix. 8) is perhaps an allusion to מַחֲנֵי in Gen. xxxii. 2 sq., that angel-camp which joined itself to Jacob's camp, and surrounded it like a barricade or carrago. On the fut. consec. וַיִּהְיֶה לָּם, et expedit eos, as a simple expression of the sequence, or even only of a weak or loose internal connection, vid. Ewald, § 343, a. By reason of this protection by the Angel of God arises (ver. 9) the summons to test the graciousness of God in their own experience. Tasting (γεύσασθαι, Hebr. vi. 4 sq., 1 Pet. ii. 3) stands before seeing; for spiritual experience leads to spiritual perception or knowledge, and not vice versâ. Nisi gustaveris, says Bernard, non videbis.

David is desirous that others also should experience what he has experienced in order that they may come to know what he has come to know, viz. the goodness of God.* Hence, in ver. 10, the call to the saints to fear Jahve (יִרְאֵי instead of יִרְאֵי, in order to preserve the distinction between veremini and videbunt, as in Josh. xxiv. 14, 1 Sam. xii. 24); for whoso fears Him, possesses everything in Him. The young mature lions may sooner lack and suffer hunger, because they have no prey, than that he should suffer any want whatsoever, the goal of whose striving is fellowship with God. The verb רָשׁ (to lack, be poor, once by metaplasm יִרְשׁ, 1 Sam. ii. 7, root רָשׁ, to be or to make loose, lax), elsewhere used only of men, is here, like civ. 21 בָּקַשׁ מֵאֵל, transferred to the lions, without כְּפִיּוּרִים being intended to refer emblematically (as in xxxv. 17, lvii. 5, xvii. 12) to his powerful foes at the courts of Saul and of Achish.

Vers. 12—15. The first main division of the Psalm is ended; the second (much the same as in Ps. xxxii.) assumes more the tone of a didactic poem; although even vers. 6, 9—11 have something of the didactic style about them. The poet first of all gives a direction for fearing God. We may compare xxxii. 8, li. 15 — how thoroughly Davidic is the turn which the Psalm here takes! בָּנִים are not children in years or in understanding; but it is a tender form of address of a master experienced in the ways of God to each one and to all, as in Prov. i. 8, and frequently. In ver. 13 he throws out the question, which he himself answers in vers. 14 sq. This form of giving impressiveness to a truth by setting it forth as a solution of some question that has been propounded is a habit with David: xv. 1, xxiv. 8, 10, xxv. 12. In the use made of this passage from the Psalms in 1 Pet. iii. 10—12 (= vers. 13—17a of the Psalm) this form of the question is lost sight of. To הִפְסֵךְ חַיִּים, as being just as exclusive in sense, corresponds אֲהַרְבֵּ יָמִים, so that consequently לְיָאוֹר is a definition of the purpose. יָמִים signifies days in the mass, just as חַיִּים means long-enduring life. We see from James

iii. 2 sqq., where ver. 13 also, in its form, calls to mind the Psalm before us, why the poet give the pre-eminence to the avoiding of sins of the tongue. In ver. 15, from among what is good peace is made prominent, — peace, which not only are we not to disturb, but which we are to seek, yea, pursue it like as the hunter pursues the finest of the herds. Let us follow, says the apostle Paul also, Rom. xiv. 19 (cf. Hebr. xii. 14), after those things which make for peace. שְׁלוֹמִים is a relationship, harmonious and free from trouble, that is well-pleasing to the God of love. The idea of the bond of fellowship is connected with the corresponding word εἰρήνη, according to its radical notion.

Vers. 17—22. The poet now recommends the fear of God, to which he has given a brief direction, by setting forth its reward in contrast with the punishment of the ungodly. The prepositions לְ and כִּי, in vers 16*a* and 17*a*, are a well considered interchange of expression: the former, of gracious inclination (xxxiii. 18), the latter, of hostile intention or determining, as in Job vii. 8, Jer. xxi. 10, xlv. 11, after the phrase in Lev. xvii. 10. The evil doers are overwhelmed by the power of destruction that proceeds from the countenance of Jahve, which is opposed to them, until there is not the slightest trace of their earthly existence left. The subjects to ver. 18 are not, according to cvii. 17—19, the עֲשֵׂי רָע (evil doers), since the indispensable characteristic of penitence is in this instance wanting, but the צַדִּיקִים (the righteous). Probably the ד strophe stood originally before the י strophe, just as in Lam. ii—iv. the ד precedes the י (Hitzig). In connection with the present sequence of the thoughts, the structure of ver. 18 is just like ver. 6: Clamant et Dominus audit = si qui (quicumque) clamant. What is meant is the cry out the depth of a soul that despairs of itself. Such crying meets with a hearing with God, and in its realisation, an answer that bears its own credentials. "The broken in heart" are those in whom the egotistical, i. e. self-loving, life, which encircles its own personality, is broken at the very root; "the crushed or contrite (דָּכָא), from דָּכָא, with a changeable ā, after the form אֵילֹת from לָא) in spirit" are those whom grievous experiences, leading to penitence, of the false eminence to which their proud self-consciousness has raised them, have subdued and thoroughly humbled. To all such Jahve is nigh, He preserves them from despair, He is ready to raise up in them a new life upon the ruins of the old and to cover or conceal their infinitive deficiency; and, they, on their part, being capable of receiving, and desirous of, salvation, He makes them partakers of His salvation. It is true these afflictions come upon the righteous, but Jahve rescues him out of them all,  $\text{כִּלְמֵי} = \text{לֵן} \text{זָמ}$  (the same enallage generis as in Ruth i. 19, iv. 11). He is under the most special providence, "He keepeth all his bones, not one of them (ne unum quidem) is broken" — a pictorial exemplification of the thought that God does not suffer the righteous to come to the extremity, that He does not suffer him to be severed from His almighty protecting love, nor to become the sport of the oppressors. Nevertheless we call to mind the literal fulfilment which these words of the psalmist received in the Crucified One; for the Old Testament prophecy, which is quoted in John xix. 33—37, may be just as well referred to our Psalm as to Exod. xii. 46. Not only the Paschal lamb, but in a comparative sense even every affliction of the righteous, is a type. Not only is the essence of the symbolism of the worship of the sanctuary realised in Jesus Christ, not only is the history of Israel and of David repeated in Him, not only does human suffering attain in connection with Him its utmost intensity, but all the promises given to the righteous are fulfilled in Him  $\kappa\alpha\tau' \xi\lambda\omicron\chi\acute{\eta}\nu$ ; because He is the righteous One in the most absolute sense, the Holy One of God in a sense altogether unique (Isa. liii. 11, Jer. xxiii. 5, Zach. ix. 9, Acts iii. 14, xxii. 14). — The righteous is always preserved from extreme peril, whereas evil ( $\text{רָעָה}$ ) slays ( $\text{מִוִּתֵּהוּ}$  stronger than  $\text{הִמִּיתוּ}$ ) the ungodly: evil, which he loved and cherished, becomes the executioner's power, beneath which he falls. And they that hate the righteous must pay the penalty. Of the meanings to incur guilt, to feel one's self guilty, and to undergo punishment as being guilty,  $\text{כַּשְׂאָ$  (vid. on iv. 11) has the last in this instance.

Ver. 23. The order of the alphabet having been gone through, there now follows a second  $\text{פ}$  exactly like xxv. 22. Just as the first  $\text{פ}$ , xxv. 16, is  $\text{פִּנְה}$ , so here in ver. 17 it is יָצַד; and in like manner the two supernumerary Phe's correspond to one another — the Elohimic in the former Psalm, and the Jehovic in this latter.

PSALM XXXV.

CALL TO ARMS AGAINST UNGRATEFUL PERSECUTORS, ADDRESSED TO GOD.

- 1 CONTEND, Jahve, with those who contend with me, Fight Thou against those who fight against me.
- 2 Lay hold of shield and buckler,
And stand up as my help.
- 3 And draw forth the spear and shut up the way against
my persecutors,
Say unto my soul: I am thy salvation.
- 4 Let those be confounded and ashamed who seek after
my soul,
Let those fall back and be covered with shame who devise my hurt.
- 5 Let them become as chaff before the wind,
The Angel of Jahve thrusting them away.
- 6 Let their way become darkness and slipperiness,
The Angel of Jahve pursuing them.
- 7 For without cause have they hid for me their net,
Without cause a pit have they digged for my soul.
- 8 Let destruction come upon him at unawares,
And let his net, which he hath hid, catch himself,
With a crash let him fall into it.
- 9 So shall my soul exult in Jahve,
It shall rejoice in His salvation.
- 10 All my bones shall say: Jahve, who is like unto Thee,
Who deliverest the afflicted from him who is too strong for him,
The afflicted and the poor from him who robbeth him!

- 11 Unjust witnesses rise up;
That which I know not, they ask of me
- 12 They reward me evil for good,
Bereavement hath come upon my soul.
- 13 And I — when they were sick, my clothing was sackcloth,
I mortified my soul with fasting,
And my prayer returned into my own bosom.
- 14 As for a friend, a brother to me, did I go about,
As one who sorroweth for a mother, I went softly about in mourning attire.
- 15 And now when I halt they are joyous and gather themselves together,
The abjects gather themselves together against me, and those whom I do not know,
They mock and cease not.
- 16 After the manner of common parasites,
They gnash upon me with their teeth.
- 17 O Lord, how long wilt Thou look on?!
Bring back my soul from their destructions,
My only one from the lions.
- 18 I will praise Thee in a great congregation,
Among much people will I sing praise unto Thee.
- 19 Let not mine enemies falsely rejoice over me, Let not those who hate me without a cause wink the eye.
- 20 For they utter not peaceful words,
But against those who are quiet in the land they devise deceitful matters.
- 21 And they open their mouth wide concerning me,
They say: Aha, aha, now our eye sees it.
- 22 Thou seest it, Jahve, therefore keep not silence:
O Lord, remain not far from me.
- 23 Stir up Thyself and awake to my right,
My God and my Lord, to my cause.

- 24 Do justice to me according to Thy righteousness, Jahve, my God,
And let them not rejoice over me.
- 25 Let them not say in their heart: Aha, it is our desire!
Let them not say: We have swallowed him up.
- 26 Let those be ashamed and be covered with confusion together
Who rejoice at my hurt,
Let those be clothed with shame and dishonour
Who magnify themselves against me.
- 27 Let those shout for joy and rejoice who do not envy me my right.
And let them say continually: Jahve be magnified,
Who hath pleasure in the prosperity of His servant.
- 28 And my tongue shall declare Thy righteousness,
Thy praise at all times.

This Ps. xxxv. and Ps. xxxiv. form a pair. They are the only Psalms in which the name מלאך יהוה is mentioned. The Psalms that belong to the time of David's persecution by Saul are the Psalms which are more especially pervaded by such retrospective references to the Tôra. And in fact this whole Psalm is, as it were, the lyrical expansion of that which David expresses before Saul in 1 Sam. xiv. 16 [15, Engl.]. The critical opinion as to the authorship of this Psalm is closely allied with that respecting the author of Ps. xl. and lxix. to which Ps. xxxv. is nearly related; cf. vers. 21, 27 with xl. 16 sq.; ver. 13 with lxix. 11 sq.; whereas the relation of Ps. lxxi. to Ps. xxxv. is decidedly a secondary one. Hitzig conjectures it to be Jeremiah; but vers. 1—3 are appropriate in the lips of a persecuted king, and not of a persecuted prophet. The points of contact of the writings of Jeremiah with our Psalm (Jer. xviii. 19 sq., xxiii. 12, Lam. ii. 16), may therefore in this instance be more safely regarded as reminiscences of an earlier writer than in Ps. lxix. Throughout the whole Psalm there prevails a deep vexation of spirit (to which corresponds the suffix יָצַר, as in Ps. lix. lvi. xi. xvii. xxii. lxiv.)

and strong emotion; it is not until the second part, where the poet describes the base ingratitude of his enemies, that the language becomes more calm and transparent, and a more quiet sadness takes the place of indignation and rage.

Each of the three parts opens with a cry for deliverance; and closes, in the certain assumption that it will take place, with a vow of thanksgiving. The divisions cannot therefore be mistaken, viz. vers. 1—10, 11—18, 19—28. The relative numbers of the stichs in the separate groups is as follows: 6. 6. 5. 5. | 7. 7. 5. | 6. 6. 6. 5.

There are only a few Psalms of David belonging to the time of Saul's persecution, which, like Ps. xxii., keep within the limits of deep inward grief; and in scarcely a single instance do we find him confining himself to the expression of the accursed fate of his enemies with prophetic certainty, as that which he confidently expects will be realised (as, e. g., in vii. 13—17). But for the most part the objective announcement of punishment is swallowed up by the force of his inmost feelings, and changed into the most importunate prayer (as in vii. 7, xvii. 13, and frequently); and this feverish glow of feeling becomes still more harshly prominent, when the prayer for the revelation of divine judgment in punishment passes over into a wish that it may actually take place. In this respect Ps. vii. xxxv. lxix. cix. form a fearful gradation. In Ps. cix., the old expositors count as many as thirty anathemas. What explanation can we give of such language coming from the lips and heart of the poet? Perhaps as paroxysms of a desire for revenge? His advance against Nabal shews that even a David was susceptible of such feelings; but 1 Sam. xxv. 32 sq. also shews that only a gentle stirring up of his conscience was needed to dissuade him from it. How much more natural — we throw out this consideration in agreement with Kurtz — that the preponderance of that magnanimity peculiar to him should have maintained its ascendancy in the moments of the highest religious consecration in which he composed his Psalms! It is inconceivable that the unholy fire of personal passion could be here mingled with the holy fire of his love to God. It is in fact the Psalms more especially, which are the purest and most faithful mirror of the piety of the Old Testament:

the duty of love towards one's enemies, however, is so little alien to the Old Testament (Exod. xxiii. 4 sq., Lev. xix. 18, Prov. xx. 22, xxiv. 17, xxv. 21 sq., Job xxxi. 29 sq.), that the very words of the Old Testament are made use of even in the New to inculcate this love. And from Ps. vii., in its agreement with the history of his conduct towards Saul, we have seen that David was conscious of having fulfilled this duty. All the imprecatory words in these Psalms come, therefore, from the pure spring of unself-seeking zeal for the honour of God. That this zeal appears in this instance as zeal for his own person or character arises from the fact, that David, as the God-anointed heir of the kingdom, stands in antagonism to Saul, the king alienated from God; and, that to his mind the cause of God, the continuance of the church, and the future of Israel, coincide with his own destiny. The fire of his anger is kindled at this focus (so to speak) of the view which he has of his own position in the course of the history of redemption. It is therefore a holy fire; but the spirit of the New Testament, as Jesus Himself declares in Luke ix. 55, is in this respect, nevertheless, a relatively different spirit from that of the Old. That act of divine love, redemption, out of the open fountain of which there flowed forth the impulse of a love which embraces and conquers the world, was then as yet not completed; and a curtain then still hung before eternity, before heaven and hell, so that imprecations like lxix. 20 were not understood, even by him who uttered them, in their infinite depth of meaning. Now that this curtain is drawn up, the New Testament faith shrinks back from invoking upon any one a destruction that lasts לעולם; and love seeks, so long as a mere shadow of possibility exists, to rescue everything human from the perdition of an unhappy future, — a perdition the full meaning of which cannot be exhausted by human thought.

In connection with all this, however, there still remains one important consideration. The curses, which are contained in the Davidic Psalms of the time of Saul's persecution, are referred to in the New Testament as fulfilled in the enemies of Jesus Christ, Acts i. 20, Rom. xi. 7—10. One expression found in our Psalm, ἐμίσησάν με δωρσάν (cf. lxix. 5) is used by Jesus (John xv. 25) as fulfilled in Him; it therefore appears as though the whole Psalm ought to be, or at least may be, taken typically as the words of Christ. But nowhere in the Gospels do we read an imprecation used by Jesus against His own and the enemies of the kingdom of God; David's imprecations are not suited to the lips of the Saviour, nor do the instances in which they are cited in the New Testament give them the impress of being His direct words: they are treated as the language of prophecy by virtue of the Spirit, whose instrument David was, and whose work the Scriptures are. And it is only in this sense that the Christian adopts them in prayer. For after the pattern of his Lord, who on the cross prayed "Father forgive them", he desires that even his bitterest enemies may not be eternally lost, but, though it be only when in articulo mortis, that they may come to their right mind. Even the anathemas of the apostle against the Judaising false teachers and against Alexander the smith (Gal. i. 9, v. 12, 2 Tim. iv. 14), refer only to temporal removal and chastisement, not to eternal perdition. They mark the extreme boundary where, in extraordinary instances, the holy zeal of the New Testament comes in contact with the holy fervour of the Old Testament.

Vers. 1—3. The psalmist begins in a martial and anthropomorphical style such as we have not hitherto met with. On the ultima-accentuation of יִרְכֶּה, vid. on iii. 8. Both אֵן are signs of the accusative. This is a more natural rendering here, where the psalmist implores God to subjugate his foes, than to regard אֵן as equivalent to עַם (cf. Isa. xlix. 25 with ib. xxvii. 8, Job x. 2); and, moreover, for the very same reason the expression in this instance is לְחַם (in the Kal, which otherwise only lends the part. לְחַם, lvi. 2 sq., to the Niph. לְחַם) instead of the reciprocal form לְחַמְתָּהוּ. It is usually supposed that לְחַם means properly vorare, and war is consequently conceived of as a devouring of men; but the Arabic offers another primary meaning: to press close and compact (Niph. to one another), consequently מִלְחָמָה means a dense crowd, a dense bustle and tumult (cf. the Homeric κλόνος). The summons to Jahve to arm, and that in a twofold manner, viz. with the  $\text{מָגֵן}$  for warding off the hostile blow and  $\text{צִנְהָה}$  (vid. v. 13) which covers the body like a testudo — by which, inasmuch as it is impossible to hold both shields at the same time, the figure is idealised — is meant to express, that He is to make Himself felt by the foes, in every possible way, to their own confounding, as the unapproachable One. The  $\text{בְּעֲרֹתַי}$  (in the character of help turned towards me) is the so-called Beth essentialis,\* as in Exod. xviii. 4, Prov. iii. 26, Isa. xlvi. 10 (tanquam argentum), and frequently.  $\text{הֵרִיק}$  has the same meaning as in Exod. xv. 9, cf. Gen. xiv. 14, viz. to bring forth, draw forth, to draw or unsheath (a sword); for as a sword is sheathed when not in use, so a spear is kept in the  $\delta\upsilon\sigma\pi\omicron\delta\delta\alpha\chi\eta$  (Odys. i. 128). Even Parchon understands  $\text{כֶּנֶר}$  to mean a weapon; and the word  $\sigma\acute{\alpha}\gamma\alpha\rho\iota\varsigma$ , in Herodotus, Xenophon, and Strabo, a northern Asiatic, more especially a Scythian, battle-axe, has been compared here;\*\* but the battle-axe was not a Hebrew weapon, and  $\text{כֶּנֶר}$ , which, thus defectively written, has the look of an imperative, also gives the best sense when so taken (LXX.  $\sigma\acute{\upsilon}\gamma\lambda\epsilon\iota\sigma\omicron\nu$ , Targ.  $\text{וַיִּצְרֹק}$ ), viz. close, i. e. cut off, interclude scil. viam. The word has Dechi, because  $\text{לְקַרְאֵת רִדְפֵי}$ , “casting Thyself against my per-

\* The Hebrew Beth essentialis is used much more freely and extensively than the Arabic, which is joined exclusively to the predicate of a simple clause, where in our language the verb is “to be”, and as a rule only to the predicate of negative clauses: laisa bi-hakimin, he is not wise, or laisa bi-l-hakimi, he is not the wise man. The predicate can accordingly be indeterminate or determinate. Moreover, in Hebrew, where this  $\text{בְּ}$  is found with the predicate, with the complement of the subject, or even, though only as a solecism (vid. Gesenius' Thesaurus p. 175), with the subject itself, the word to which it is prefixed may be determinate, whether as an attribute determined by itself (Exod. vi. 3,  $\text{בְּפִאֵל שְׂרָי}$ ), by a suffix (as above. xxxv. 2, cf. cxlvi. 5, Exod. xviii. 4, Prov. iii. 26), or even by the article. At all events no syntactic objection can be brought against the interpretations of  $\text{בְּעֵשָׁן}$ , “in the quality of smoke”, xxxvii. 20; cf.  $\text{בְּפִהָבֵל}$ , lxxviii. 33, and of  $\text{בְּנַפְשׁוֹ}$ , “in the character of the soul”, Lev. xvii. 11.

secutors", belongs to both the preceding summonses. Dachsel rightly directs attention to the similar sequence of the accents in lv. 19, lxvi. 15. The Mosaic figure of Jahve as a man of war (אִישׁ מִלְחָמָה, Exod. xv. 3, Deut. xxxii. 41 sq.) is worked out here with brilliant colours, under the impulse of a wrathful spirit. But we see from ver. 3*b* what a spiritual meaning, nevertheless, the whole description is intended to convey. In God's intervention, thus manifested in facts, he would gladly hear His consolatory utterance to himself. The burden of his cry is that God's love may break through the present outward appearance of wrath and make itself felt by him.

Vers. 4.—8. Throughout the next two strophes follow terrible imprecations. According to Fürst and others the relation of בּוֹשׁ and חָפַר is like that of erblassen, to turn pale (cf. Isa. xxix. 22 with Ps. xxxiv. 6), and erröthen, to turn red, to blush. בּוֹשׁ has, however, no connection with בּוֹץ, nor has חָפַר, חָפַר, חָפַר, any connection with חָמַר, to be red; but, according to its radical notion, בּוֹשׁ means disturbari (vid. vi. 11), and חָפַר, obtegere, abscondere (vid. xxxiv. 6). יָשָׁבוּ, properly "let them be made to fall back" (cf., e. g., Isa. xlii. 17). On the figure in ver. 5*a* cf. lxxxiii. 14. The clauses respecting the Angel of Jahve, vers. 5*b* and 6*b*, are circumstantial clauses, viz. clauses defining the manner. דָּחָה (giving, viz. them, the push that shall cause their downfall, equivalent to דָּחָה or דָּחָה, lxviii. 28) is closely connected with the figure in ver. 6*a*, and רָדְפָם, with the figure in ver. 5*a*; consequently it seems as though the original position of these two clauses respecting the Angel of Jahve had been disturbed; just as in Ps. xxxiv., the y strophe and the פ strophe have changed their original places. It is the Angel, who took off Pharaoh's chariot wheels so that they drave them heavily (Exod. xiv. 25) that is intended here. The fact that this Angel is concerned here, where the point at issue is whether the kingship of the promise shall be destroyed at its very beginning or not, harmonises with the appearing of the מַלְאֲךְ ה' at all critical junctures in the course of the history of redemption. תִּלְקָחוּ, loca passim lubrica, is an intensive form of expression for תִּלְקָחוּ, lxxxiii. 18. Just as דָּחָה recalls to mind Exod.

xv., so רדפם recalls Judges v. In this latter passage the Angel of Jahve also appears in the midst of the conquerors who are pursuing the smitten foe, incarnate as it were in Deborah.

Ver. 7 also needs re-organising, just as in vers. 5 sq. the original positions of רחה and רדפם are exchanged. רחם רשח would be a pit deceptively covered over with a net concealed below; but, as even some of the older critics have felt, רחם is without doubt to be brought down from ver. 7a into 7b: without cause, i. e. without any provocation on my part, have they secretly laid their net for me (as in ix. 16, xxxi. 5), without cause have they digged a pit for my soul. In ver. 8 the foes are treated of collectively. לא ידע is a negative circumstantial clause (Ew. § 341, b): improviso, as in Prov. v. 6, Isa. xlvii. 11 extrem. Instead of תלכרו, the expression is תלכרו, as in Hos. viii. 3; the sharper form is better adapted to depict the suddenness and certainty of the capture. According to Hupfeld, the verb שואה signifies a wild, dreary, confused noise or crash, then devastation and destruction, a transition of meaning which — as follows from שואה (cf. תרו) as a name of the desolate steppe, from שוא, a waste, emptiness, and from other indications — is solely brought about by transferring the idea of a desolate confusion of tones to a desolate confusion of things, without any intermediate notion of the crashing in of ruins. But it may be asked whether the reverse is not rather the case, viz. that the signification of a waste, desert, emptiness or void is the primary one, and the meaning that has reference to sound (cf. هوى, to gape, be empty; to drive along, fall down headlong, then also: to make a dull sound as of something falling, just like rumor from ruere, fragor from frangi) the derived one. Both etymology (cf. תרה, whence תרו) and the preponderance of other meanings, favour this latter view. Here the two significations are found side by side, inasmuch as שואה in the first instance means a waste — devastation, desolation, and in the second a waste — a heavy, dull sound, a rumbling (δουσαει). In the Syriac version it is rendered: "into the pit which he has digged let him fall", as though it were רחם in the second instance instead of שואה; and from this Hupfeld, with J. H. Michaelis, Stier, and others, is of opinion that it must be rendered: "into the destruction which he himself has prepared let him fall". But this quam ipse paravit is not found in the text, and to mould the text accordingly would be a very arbitrary proceeding.

Vers. 9—10. This strophe, with which the first part of the song closes, contains the logical apodosis of those imprecatory jussives. The downfall of the power that is opposed to God will be followed by the joy of triumph. The bones of the body, which elsewhere are mentioned as sharing only in the anguish of the soul (vi. 3, xxxi. 11, xxxii. 3, li. 10), are here made to share (as also in li. 10) in the joy, into which the anxiety, that agitated even the marrow of the bones, is changed. The joy which he experiences in his soul shall throb through every member of his body and multiply itself, as it were, into a choir of praiseful voices. לָּ with a conjunctive accent and without Makkeph, as also in Prov. xix. 7 (not לָּ-לָּ, vid. the Masora in Baer's Psalterium p. 133), is to be read cāl (with קָמִין רָחֵב, opp. קָמִין רָחוּץ) according to Kimchi. According to Lonzano, however, it is to be read col, the conjunctive accent having an equal power with Makkeph; but this view is false, since an accent can never be placed against Kametz chatuph. The exclamation מִי כְמוֹתָי is taken from Exod. xv. 11, where, according to the Masora, it is to be pointed מִי כְמוֹתָי, as Ben Naphtali also points it in the passage before us. The Dagesh, which is found in the former passage and is wanting here, sharpens and hardens at the same time; it requires that the expression should be emphatically pronounced (without there being any danger in this instance of its being slurred over); it does not serve to denote the closer connection, but to give it especial prominence. חָזַק מִמֶּנִּי, stronger than he, is equivalent to: strong, whereas the other is weak, just as in Jer. xxxi. 11, cf. Hab. i. 13, צַדִּיק מִמֶּנִּי, righteous, whereas he is ungodly. The repetition of וְעֵנִי is meant to say: He rescues the עֵנִי, who is אֲבִיוֹן (poor) enough already, from him who would take even the few goods that he possesses.

Vers. 11—16. The second part begins with two strophes of sorrowful description of the wickedness of the enemy. The futures in vers. 11, 12 describe that which at present takes place. עֲדֵי חַיִּים are μῆτρους ἀδελφοί (LXX.). They demand from him a confession of acts and things which lie entirely outside his consciousness and his way of acting (cf. lxix. 5): they would gladly brand him as a perjurer, as an usurper, and as a plunderer. What David complains of in ver. 12*a*, we hear Saul confess in 1 Sam. xxiv. 18; the charge of ingratitude is therefore well-grounded. שָׁבֹל לְנַפְשִׁי is not dependent on יִשְׁלַמְתִּי, in which case one would have looked for לְשׂוֹל rather than שָׁבֹל, but a substantival clause: "bereavement is to my soul", its condition is that of being forsaken by all those who formerly shewed me marks of affection; all these have, as it were, died off so far as I am concerned. Not only had David been obliged to save his parents by causing them to flee to Moab, but Michal was also torn from him, Jonathan removed, and all those at the court of Saul, who had hitherto sought the favour and friendship of the highly-gifted and highly-honoured son-in-law of the king, were alienated from him. And how sincerely and sympathisingly had he reciprocated their leanings towards himself! By וְאֲנִי in ver. 13, he contrasts himself with the ungrateful and unfeeling ones. Instead of לְבַשְׁתִּי שֶׁק, the expression is לְבַשְׁתִּי שֶׁק; the tendency of poetry for the use of the substantival clause is closely allied to its fondness for well-conceived brevity and pictorial definition. He manifested towards them a love which knew no distinction between the ego and tu, which regarded their sorrow and their guilt as his own, and joined with them in their expiation for it; his head was lowered upon his breast, or he cowered, like Elijah (1 Kings xviii. 42), upon the ground with his head hanging down upon his breast even to his knees, so that that which came forth from the inmost depths of his nature returned again as it were in broken accents into his bosom. Riehm's rendering, "at their ungodliness and hostility my prayer for things not executed came back", is contrary to the connection, and makes one look for אֲנִי instead of אֶל-הַיְקִי. Perret-Gentil correctly renders it, Je priai la tête penchée sur la poitrine.

The psalmist goes on to say in ver. 14, I went about as for a friend, for a brother to me, i. e. as if the sufferer had been such to me. With הִתְחַלֵּךְ, used of the solemn slowness of gait, which corresponds to the sacredness of pain, alternates שָׁחָה used of the being bowed down very low, in which the heavy weight of pain finds expression. כְּאִבְלֵ-אִם, not: like the mourning (from אִבַּל, like הִבַּל from הִבֵּל) of a mother (Hitzig), but, since a personal אִבַּל is more natural, and next to the mourning for an only child the loss of a mother (cf. Gen. xxiv. 67) strikes the deepest wound: like one who mourns (אִבַּל־, like לִבְרָךְ, Gen. xlix. 12, from אִבַּל, construct state, like מִטְמָא) for a mother (the objective genitive, as in Gen. xxvii. 41, Deut. xxxiv. 8, Amos viii. 10, Jer. vi. 26). קָרָר signifies the colours, outward appearance, and attire of mourning: with dark clothes, with tearful unwashed face, and with neglected beard. But as for them — how do they act at the present time, when he finds himself in צַלַע (xxxviii. 17, Job. xviii. 12), a sideway direction, i. e. likely to fall (from צָלַע, ظلع, to incline towards the side)? They rejoice and gather themselves together, and this assemblage of ungrateful friends rejoicing over another's misfortune, is augmented by the lowest rabble that attach themselves to them. The verb נָכָה means to smite; Niph. נָכָה, Job xxx. 6, to be driven forth with a whip, after which the LXX. renders it μαρτυρεῖς, Symm. πλῆττα, and the Targum conterentes me verbis suis; cf. הִכָּה בְּלִשׁוֹן, Jer. xviii. 18. But נָכָה cannot by itself mean smiters with the tongue. The adjective נָכָה signifies elsewhere with רַגְלִים, one who is smitten in the feet, i. e. one who limps or halts, and with רִיחַ, but also without any addition, in Isa. xvi. 7, one smitten in spirit, i. e. one deeply troubled or sorrowful. Thus, therefore, נָכָה from נָכָה, like נָאִים from נָאָה, may mean smitten men, i. e. men who are brought low or reduced (Hengstenberg). It might also, after the Arabic navika, to be injured in mind, anwak, stupid, silly (from the same root נָךְ, to prick, smite, wound, cf. ichtalla, to be pierced through = mad), be understood as those mentally deranged, enraged at nothing or without cause. But the former definition of the notion of the word is favoured by the continuation of the idea of the verbal adjective נָזִים by וְלֹא יִדְעוּנִי, persons of whom I have hitherto taken no notice because they were far removed from me, i. e. men belonging to the dregs of the people (cf. Job xix. 18, xxx. 1). The addition of וְלֹא יִדְעוּנִי certainly makes Olshausen's conjecture that we should read נִזְרִים somewhat natural; but the expression then becomes tautological, and there are other instances also in which psalm-poesy goes beyond the ordinary range of words, in order to find language to describe that which is loathsome, in the most glaring way. קָרַע, to tear, rend in pieces, viz. with abusive and slanderous words (like قرع II.) also does not occur anywhere else. And what remarkable language we now meet with in ver. 16a! מְעוֹן does not mean scorn or buffoonery, as Böttcher and Hitzig imagine*, but according to 1 Kings xvii. 12, a cake of a round formation (like the Talmudic עֵגָה, a circle); לְעַי, jeering, jesting. Therefore מְעוֹן לְעַי means: mockers for a cake, i. e. those who for a delicate morsel, for the sake of dainty fare, make scornful jokes, viz. about me, the persecuted one, vile parasites; German Tellerlecker, Bratenriecher, Greek αυτοσοκόλακες, ψωμοκόλακες, Mediæval Latin buccellarii. This לְעַי מְעוֹן, which even Rashi interprets in substantially the same manner, stands either in a logical co-ordinate relation (vid. on Isa. xix. 11) or in a logical as well as grammatical subordinate relation to its regens חֲנִיפֵי. In the former case, it would be equivalent to: the profane, viz. the cake-jesters; in the latter, which is the more natural, and quite suitable: the profane (= the profanest, vid. xlv. 13, Isa. xxix. 19, Ezek. vii. 24) among cake-jesters. The בְּ is not the Beth of companionship or fellowship, to express which עִם or עִתָּא (Hos. vii. 5) would have been used, but Beth essentialis or the Beth of characterisation: in the character of the most abject examples of this class of men do they gnash upon him with their teeth. The gerund חֲרִיק (of the noise of the teeth being pressed together, like حرق of the crackling of a fire and the grating of a file), which is used according to Ges. § 131,

* According to the old Babylonian reading (belonging to a period when Pathach and Segol were as yet not distinguished from one another) כְּאִבְלֵ (with the sign of Pathach and the stroke for Raphe below = ä); vid. Pinsker, Zur Geschichte des Karaismus, S. 141, and Einleitung, S. 118.

* The Talmudic עֵגָה (לִשְׁתָּה), B. Sanhedrin 101b, which is said to mean "a jesting way of speaking", has all the less place here, as the reading wavers between עֵגָה (עֵגָה) and עֵגָה.

4, b, carries its subject in itself. They gnash upon him with their teeth after the manner of the profanest among those, by whom their neighbour's honour is sold for a delicate morsel.

Vers. 17—18. Just as the first part of the Psalm closed with wishes, and thanksgiving for their fulfilment, so the second part also closes with prayer and thanksgiving. כָּמָה (compounded of כָּ, instar, and the interrogative מָה which is drawn into the genitive by it; Aramaic כְּמָה, Arabic kam, Hebrew, like כִּמְהָ, with Dag. forte conjunct., properly: the total of what?), which elsewhere means quot, here has the signification of quousque, as in Job vii. 19. מְשִׂאֵיהֶם from מְשִׂאָה, the plural of which may be both מְשִׂאִים and מְשִׂאוֹת (this latter, however, does not occur), like the plural of מְשִׂאָה, terror, מְשִׂאִים and מְשִׂאוֹת. The suffix, which refers to the enemies as the authors of the destructions (Prov. iii. 25), shews that it is not to be rendered "from their destroyers" (Hitzig). If God continues thus to look on instead of acting, then the destructions, which are passing over David's soul, will utterly destroy it. Hence the prayer: lead it back, bring that back, which is already well nigh borne away to destruction. On יְקִיְרָה vid. xxii. 21. The כְּפִיְרִים, which is intended literally in xxxiv. 11, is here emblematical. אֲדַרְךָ is the cohortative. עֲצוּם as a parallel word to רַב always refers, according to the context, to strength of numbers or to strength of power.

Vers. 19—21. In the third part, vers. 19—28 the description of the godlessness of his enemies is renewed; but the soul of the praying psalmist has become more tranquil, and accordingly the language also is more clear and moves on with its accustomed calmness. חֶזְקוֹ and חֶזְקוֹ are genitives, having an attributive sense (vid. on 2 Šam. xxii. 23). The verb קָרַץ signifies both to pinch = nip, Job xxxiii. 6 (cf. the Arabic karāḍa, to cut off), and to pinch together, compress = to wink, generally used of the eyes, but also of the lips, Prov. xvi. 30, and always as an insidiously malicious gesture. אֵל rules over both members of the verse as in lxxv. 6, and frequently. שְׁלוֹם in ver. 20 is the word for whatever proceeds from good intentions and aims at the promotion or restoration of a harmonious relationship.

רָגַע-אֲרָץ (from רָגַע, cf. עָנִי-אֲרָץ, lxxvi. 10, Zeph. ii. 3, צָפִינָה, lxxxiii. 4) are those who quietly and unostentatiously walk in the ways of God. Against such they devise mischievous, lying slanders and accusations. And with wide-opened mouth, i. e. haughty scorn, they cry, as they carouse in sight of the misfortune of those they have persecuted: now we have that which we have longed to see. הִאֲרָא (composed of הָאָה and אָרָא) is a cry of joy, and more especially of malignant joy at another's hurt (cf. Ezek. xxv. 3).

Vers. 22—24. The poet takes up this malignant "now our eye sees it" and gives another turn to it. With הִוֵּהוּ, alternates in vers. 22, 23, cf. ver. 17, אֲרִי, the pronominal force of which is revived in the combination אֲרִי וְאֲרִי (vid. xvi. 2). הִוֵּהוּ, carrying its object within itself, signifies to stir, rouse up, and הִקַּיֵּן, to break off, tear one's self away, gather one's self up from, sleep. "To my right", viz. to prove it by facts; "to my cause", to carry it on in my defence.

Vers. 25—26. On the metonymical use of נִפְטָה, like τὸ δρεαταχόν for δρεξίς, vid. Psychol. S. 203 [tr. p. 239]. The climax of desire is to swallow David up, i. e. to overpower him and clear him out of the way so that there is not a trace of him left. בִּלְעֵנָהוּ with ע before נ, as in cxxxii. 6, and frequently; on the law of the vowels which applies to this, vid. Ewald, § 60, a. שְׁמָחַי רָעָתִי is a short form of expression for רָעָתִי עַל (בְּ) שְׁמָחַיִם. To put on shame and dishonour (cix. 29, cf. 18), so that these entirely cover them, and their public external appearance corresponds with their innermost nature.

Vers. 27—28. Those who wish that David's righteousness may be made manifest and be avenged are said to take delight in it. When this takes place, Jahve's righteousness is proved. יִגְדַּל, let Him be acknowledged and praised as great, i. e. let Him be magnified! David desires that all who remain true to him may thus speak; and he, on his part, is determined to stir up the revelation of God's righteousness in his heart, and to speak of that of which his heart is full (lxxi. 24).

'A useful, valuable, and instructive commentary. The interpretation is set forth with clearness and cogency, and in a manner calculated to commend the volumes to the thoughtful reader. The book is beautifully got up, and reflects great credit on the publishers as well as the writers.'—The Bishop of Gloucester.

'I have looked into this volume, and read several of the notes on crucial passages. They seem to me very well done, with great fairness, and with evident knowledge of the controversies concerning them. The illustrations are very good. I cannot doubt that the book will prove very valuable.'—The Bishop of Winchester.

'We have already spoken of this commentary with warm praise, and we can certainly assert that the enterprise has now been brought to a close with really admirable work.'—English Churchman.

'We congratulate Dr. Schaff on the completion of this useful work, which we are now able to commend, in its complete form, to English readers of the Scriptures. . . . It will be seen that we have a high opinion of this commentary, of the present volume, and also of the whole work. In this last respect it is perhaps of more uniform excellence than any of its rivals, and in beauty of appearance it excels them all.'—Church Bells.

'External beauty and intrinsic worth combine in the work here completed. Good paper, good type, good illustrations, good binding, please the eye, as accuracy and thoroughness in matter of treatment satisfy the judgment. Everywhere the workmanship is careful, solid, harmonious.'—Methodist Recorder.

'There are few better commentaries having a similar scope and object; indeed, within the same limits, we do not know of one so good upon the whole of the New Testament.'—Literary World.

'We predict that this work will take its place among the most popular of the century. . . . The publishers have spared no pains to secure volumes that shall be worthy of the theme, and of the scholarship of the age.'—Freeman.

'The commentators have given the results of their own researches in a simple style, with brevity, but with sufficient fulness; and their exposition is all through eminently readable.'—Record.

'From so many contributors we are led confidently to expect a well-considered, careful, and edifying comment, constructed with sufficient learning and Biblical knowledge. And this confidence will not be disappointed on examination. . . . We regard the work as well done, and calculated both to instruct and to benefit those who consult it. The printing, paper, illustrations, and all such matters are of unusual beauty and excellence.'—The Literary Churchman.

Ps. I.-XLI.

PSALM XXXVI.

THE CURSE OF ALIENATION FROM GOD, AND THE BLESSING OF FELLOWSHIP WITH HIM.

2 AN oracle of transgression hath the ungodly within his heart :

There is no fear of God before his eyes.

3 For it flattereth him in his own eyes,
In order that he may become guilty, that he may hate.

4 The words of his mouth are evil and deceit ;
He hath ceased to act wisely and well.

5 Evil doth he devise upon his bed,
He taketh his stand in a way that is not good,
He abhorreth not evil.

6 O Jahve, to the heavens doth Thy mercy extend,
Thy faithfulness unto the clouds.

7 Thy righteousness is like the mountains of God,
Thy judgments are a great deep,
Man and beast dost Thou preserve, O Jahve.

8 How precious is Thy mercy, Elohim, That the children of men find refuge in the shadow of Thy wings !

- 9 They become drunk with the fatness of Thy house,
 And Thou givest them to drink of the river of Thy 10 For with Thee is the fountain of life, [pleasures.
 And in Thy light do we see light.
- 11 Lengthen out Thy mercy to those who know Thee,
 And Thy righteousness to those who are upright in heart.
- 12 Let not the foot of pride overtake me,
 And let not the hand of the wicked scare me away.
- 13 Behold, there have the workers of evil fallen,
 They are thrust down and are not able to rise.

The preceding Psalm, in the hope of speedy deliverance, put into the lips of the friends of the new kingship, who were now compelled to keep in the background, the words: "Jahve, be magnified, who hath pleasure in the well-being of His servant." David there calls himself the servant of Jahve, and in the inscription to Ps. xxxvi. he bears the very same name: To the Precentor, by the servant of Jahve, by David. The textus receptus accents למננה with a conjunctive Illuj; Ben-Naphtali accents it less ambiguously with a disjunctive Legarme (vid. Psalter, ii. 462), since David is not himself the מננה. Ps. xii., xiv. (liii.), xxxvi., xxxvii., form a group. In these Psalms David complains of the moral corruption of his generation. They are all merely reflections of the character of the time, not of particular occurrences. In common with Ps. xii., the Psalm before us has a prophetic colouring; and, in common with Ps. xxxvii., allusions to the primeval history of the Book of Genesis. The strophe schema is 4. 5. 5. 6. 6.

Vers. 2-5. At the outset the poet discovers to us the wickedness of the children of the world, which has its roots in alienation from God. Supposing it were admissible to render ver. 2: "A divine word concerning the evil-doing of the ungodly is in the inward parts of my heart" (מִן־נֶפֶשׁ with a genitive of the object, like מִן־עֵץ, which is compared by Hofmann), then the difficulty of this word, so much complained of, might find the desired relief in some much more easy way than by means of the conjecture proposed by Diestel, נֶעֱמַר (נֶעֱמַר), "Pleasant is transgression to the evil-doer," etc. But the genitive after מִן־

(which in ex. 1, Num. xxiv. 3 sq., 15 sq., 2 Sam. xxiii. 1, Prov xxx. 1, just as here, stands at the head of the clause) always denotes the speaker, not the thing spoken. Even in Isa. v. 1 שירת דודי לברמו is not a song concerning my beloved in relation to His vineyard, but a song of my beloved (such a song as my beloved has to sing) touching His vineyard. Thus, therefore, פִּשֵׁעַ must denote the speaker, and לְרָשָׁע, as in ex. 1 לְאֹרְנִי, the person or thing addressed; transgression is personified, and an oracular utterance is attributed to it. But the predicate בְּקִרְבִּי לְבִי, which is intelligible enough in connection with the first rendering of פִּשֵׁעַ as genit. obj., is difficult and harsh with the latter rendering of פִּשֵׁעַ as gen. subj., whatever way it may be understood: whether, that it is intended to say that the utterance of transgression to the evil-doer is inwardly known to him (the poet), or it occupies and affects him in his inmost parts. It is very natural to read לְבִי, as the LXX., Syriac, and Arabic versions, and Jerome do. In accordance therewith, while with Von Lengerke he takes נֶאֱמַר as part of the inscription, Thenius renders it: "Sin is to the ungodly in the midst of his heart," i. e. it is the inmost motive or impulse of all that he thinks and does. But this isolation of נֶאֱמַר is altogether at variance with the usage of the language and custom. The rendering given by Hupfeld, Hitzig, and at last also by Böttcher, is better: "The suggestion of sin dwells in the ungodly in the inward part of his heart;" or rather, since the idea of בקרב is not central, but circumferential, in the realm of (within) his heart, altogether filling up and absorbing it. And in connection with this explanation, it must be observed that this combination לבו בקרב (instead of בקרבו, or בלבו, בלבבו) occurs only here, where, together with a personification of sin, an incident belonging to the province of the soul's life, which is the outgrowth of sin, is intended to be described. It is true this application of נֶאֱמַר does not admit of being further substantiated; but נֶאֱמַר (cognate נֶאֱמַר, נֶאֱמַר), as an onomatopoeic designation of a dull, hollow sound, is a suitable word for secret communication (cf. Arabic nemmâm, a tale-bearer), or even—since the genius of the language does not combine with it the idea of that which is significantly secretly, and solemnly silently communicated, but spoken out—a suitable word for that which transgression says to the ungodly with all the solemn mien of the prophet or the philosopher, inasmuch as it has set itself within his heart in the place of God and of the voice of his conscience. לְרִשְׁעֵי does not, however, denote the person addressed, but, as in xxxii. 10, the possessor. He possesses this inspiration of iniquity as the contents of his heart, so that the fear of God has no place therein, and to him God has no existence (objectivity), that He should command his adoration.

Since after this נִשְׁעַתְּ אֵלַי we expect to hear further what and how transgression speaks to him, so before all else the most probable thing is, that transgression is the subject to הַחֲלִיק. We do not interpret: He flatters God in His eyes (with eye-service), for this rendering is contrary both to what precedes and to what follows; nor with Hupfeld (who follows Hofmann): "God deals smoothly (gently) with him according to his delusions," for the assumption that הַחֲלִיק must, on account of בְּעֵינָי, have some other subject than the evil-doer himself, is indeed correct. It does not, however, necessarily point to God as the subject, but, after the solemn opening of ver. 2a, to transgression, which is personified. This addresses flattering words to him (לְאֵל like לַע in Prov. xxix. 5) in his eyes, i.e. such as are pleasing to him; and to what end? For the finding out, i.e. establishing (עָלַם מִצָּנָא, as in Gen. xlv. 16, Hos. xii. 9), or—since this is not exactly suited to פִּשַׁע as the subject, and where it is a purpose that is spoken of, the meaning assequi, originally proper to the verb מִצָּנָא, is still more natural—to the attainment of his culpability, i.e. in order that he may inculcate himself, to hating, i.e. that he may hate God and man instead of loving them. לְשִׁנְאָה is designedly used without an object just as in Eccles. iii. 8, in order to imply that the flattering words of פִּשַׁע incite him to turn into an object of hatred everything that he ought to love, and to live and move in hatred as in his own proper element. Thenius endeavours to get rid of the harshness of the expression by the following easy alteration of the text: לְמִצָּנָא עָלַם וְלִשְׁנָא; and interprets it: Yea, it flatters him in his own eyes (it tickles his pride) to discover faults in others and to make them suffer for them. But there is no support in the general usage of the language for the impersonal rendering of the הַחֲלִיק; and the בְּעֵינָי, which in this case is not only pleonastic, but out of place, demands a distinction between the flatterer and the person who feels himself flattered. The expression in ver. 3*b*, in whatever way it may be explained, is harsh; but David's language, whenever he describes the corruption of sin with deep-seated indignation, is wont to envelope itself in such clouds, which, to our difficult comprehension, look like corruptions of the text. In the second strophe the whole language is more easy. לְהִשְׁבִּיל לְהִיטִיב is just such another asyndeton as לִמְצָא עוֹנוֹ לְשׂוֹנֵא. A man who has thus fallen a prey to the dominion of sin, and is alienated from God, has ceased (הָרַל לְ), as in 1 Sam. xxiii. 13) to act wisely and well (things which essentially accompany one another). His words when awake, and even his thoughts in the night-time, run upon רָע (Isa. lix. 7), evil, wickedness, the absolute opposite of that which alone is truly good. Most diligently does he take up his position in the way which leads in the opposite direction to that which is good (Prov. xvi. 29, Isa. lxxv. 2); and his conscience is deadened against evil: there is not a trace of aversion to it to be found in him, he loves it with all his soul.

Vers. 6-10. The poet now turns from this repulsive prospect to one that is more pleasing. He contemplates, and praises, the infinite, ever sure mercy of God, and the salvation, happiness, and light which spring from it. Instead of בְּשִׂמְיִם, the expression is בְּהִשְׁמִימִים, the syncope of the article not taking place. בְּ alternating with עַר, cf. lvii. 11, has here, as in xix. 5, lxxii. 16, the sense of touching or reaching to the spot that is denoted in connection with it. The poet describes the exaltation and super-eminence of divine mercy and faithfulness figuratively, after earthly standards. They reveal themselves on earth in a height that reaches to the heavens and extends to שְׁחָקִים, i.e. the thin veil of vapour which spreads itself like a veil over the depths of the heavens; they transcend all human thought, desire, and comprehension (ciii. 11, and cf. Eph. iii. 18). The צְדִיקָה (righteousness) is distinguished from the אֱמוּנָה (faithfulness) thus: the latter is governed by the promises of God, the former by His holiness; and further, the latter has its being in the love of God, the former, on the other hand, manifests itself partly as justifying in mercies, and partly as avenging in wrath. Concerning the righteousness, the poet says that it is like the mountains of God, i.e. (cf. cedars of God, lxxx. 11) unchangeably firm (cxi. 3), like the giant primeval mountains which bear witness to the greatness and glory of God; concerning God's judgments, that they are "a great deep," incomprehensible and unsearchable (ἀνεξέρευνηται, Rom. xi. 33) as the great, deep-surg-ing mass of waters in the lower parts of the earth, which becomes visible in the seas and in the rivers. God's punitive righteousness, as at length becomes evident, has His compassion for its reverse side; and this, as in the case of the Flood (cf. Jon. iv. 11), embraces the animal world, which is most closely involved, whether for weal or for woe, with man, as well as mankind.

Lost in this depth, which is so worthy of adoration, the Psalmist exclaims: How precious (cf. cxxxix. 17) is Thy mercy, Elohim! i.e. how valuable beyond all treasures, and how precious to him who knows how to prize it! The Waw of וַיִּבֶן is the explicative Waw = et hoc ipsum quod. The energetic form of the future, יִהְיֶה, has the pre-tonic Kametz, here in pause, as in xxxvi. 8, xxxix. 7, lxxviii. 44. The shadow of God's wings is the protection of His love, which hides against temptation and persecution. To be thus hidden in God is the most unspeakable blessedness, ver. 9: they satiate themselves, they drink full draughts of "the fatness of Thy house." The house of God is His sanctuary, and in general the domain of His mercy and grace. רָצוֹן (cf. טוֹב, lxv. 5) is the expression for the abundant, pleasant, and powerful gifts and goods and recreations with which God entertains those who are His; and רָוָה (whence רָוֵן, as in Deut. viii. 13, Isa. xl. 18) is the spiritual joy of the soul that experiences God's mercy to overflowing. The abundant fare of the priests from Jahve's table (vid. Jer. xxxi. 14), and the festive joy of the guests at the shelamim-offering, i.e. the communion-offering,—these outward rites are here treated according to their spiritual significance, receive the depth of meaning which radically belongs to them, and are ideally generalized. It is a stream of pleasures (עֲרֵנִים) with which He irrigates and fertilizes them, a paradisaic river of delights. This, as the four arms of the river of Paradise had one common source (Gen. ii. 10), has its spring in God, yea, God is the fountain itself. He is "the fountain of life" (Jer. ii. 13); all life flows forth from Him, who is the absolutely existing and happy One. The more inwardly, therefore, one is joined to Him, the fuller are the draughts of life which he drinks from this first fountain of all life. And as God is the fountain of life, so also is He the fountain of light: "In Thy light do we see light;" out of God, seeing we see only darkness, whereas immersed in God's sea of light we are illumined by divine knowledge, and lighted up with spiritual joy. The poet, after having taken a few glimpses into the chaos of evil, here moves in the blessed depths of holy mysticism [Mystik, i.e. mysticism in the good sense—true religion, vital godliness], and in proportion as in the former case his language is obscure, so here it is clear as crystal.

Vers. 11–13. Now for the first time, in the concluding hexastich, after complaint and commendation comes the language of prayer. The poet prays that God would lengthen out, i.e. henceforth preserve (אֲשִׁיב, as in cix. 12), such mercy to His saints; that the foot of arrogance, which is conceived of as a tyrant, may not come suddenly upon him (אֲבֹא, as in xxxv. 8), and that the hand of the wicked may not drive him from his home into exile (cf. x. 18). With אֲשִׁיב alternates אֲרַחֵם, which, on its merciful side, is turned towards them that know God, and bestows upon them the promised gracious reward. Whilst the Psalmist is thus praying, the future all at once becomes unveiled to him. Certain in his own mind that his prayer will be heard, he sees the adversaries of God and of His saints for ever overthrown. אֲשִׁיב, as in xiv. 5, points to the place where the judgment is executed. The preterites are prophetic, as in xiv. 5, lxiv. 8–10. The poet, like Isaiah (ch. xxvi. 14), beholds the whole tribe of the oppressors of Jahve's Church changed into a field of corpses, without hope of any rising again.

PSALM XXXVII.

THE SEEMING PROSPERITY OF THE WICKED, AND THE REAL PROSPERITY OF THE GODLY.

- 1 א BE not incensed at the evil-doers,
Be not envious of the workers of iniquity.
- 2 For like grass they are soon cut down,
And like a green herb they wither away.
- 3 ב Trust in Jahve and do good,
Dwell in the land and cultivate faithfulness.

- 4 And delight thyself in Jahve,
So shall He give thee the desires of thy heart.
- 5 2 Commit thy way unto Jahve,
And trust in Him; and He will bring it to pass.
- 6 He will bring forth like the light thy righteousness,
And thy right like the noon-day brightness.
- 7 7 Resign thyself to Jahve and wait for Him;
Fret not thyself over him who prospereth in his way,
Over the man who bringeth wicked devices to pass.
- 8 8 Cease from anger and let go wrath,
Be not incensed, it leads only to evil-doing.
- 9 For evil-doers shall be cut off,
But they who hope in Jahve—they inherit the land.
- 10 1 Yet a little while and the wicked is no more,
And if thou observest his place, he is gone.
- 11 But the meek shall inherit the land,
And delight themselves in the abundance of peace.
- 12 1 The wicked deviseth evil against the righteous,
And gnasheth upon him with his teeth—
- 13 The Lord laugheth at him,
For He seeth that his day is coming.
- 14 8 The wicked draw the sword and bend their bow,
To cast down the poor and needy,
To slay them that are of upright walk.
- 15 Their sword shall enter into their own heart,
And their bows shall be broken.
- 16 6 Better is the little that a righteous man hath,
Than the riches of many wicked.
- 17 For the arms of the wicked shall be broken,
And Jahve upholdeth the righteous.
- 18 1 Jahve observeth the days of the perfect,
And their inheritance shall endure for ever.
- 19 They are not ashamed in the evil time,
And in the days of famine they are satisfied.
- 20 6 But the wicked perish,
And the enemies of Jahve are like the glory of the meadows,
They vanish away like smoke, they disappear.

- 21 ב The wicked is obliged to borrow and cannot pay,
But the righteous is liberal and can give.
- 22 For they that are blessed of Him shall inherit the land,
And they that are cursed of Him shall be cut off.
- 23 ב With Jahve are a man's steps established,
And He hath delight in his way.
- 24 When he falls, he shall not be utterly cast down,
For Jahve upholdeth his hand.
- 25 י I have been young, and now am old,
Yet have I not seen a righteous man forsaken,
And his seed begging bread.
- 26 He continually giveth and lendeth,
And his seed is a blessing.
- 27 ב Depart from evil and do good,
And dwell for evermore.
- 28 For Jahve loveth the right,
And will not forsake His saints.
For ever are they preserved,
But the seed of the wicked is cut off.
- 29 The righteous shall inherit the land,
And dwell therein for ever.
- 30 ב The mouth of the righteous uttereth wisdom,
And his tongue speaketh what is right.
- 31 The law of his God is in his heart,
His steps do not slip.
- 32 ז The wicked lieth in wait for the righteous,
And seeketh to slay him.
- 33 Jahve doth not give him over into his hand,
Nor condemn him when he is judged.
- 34 פ Wait on Jahve and keep His way,
So shall He exalt thee to inherit the land;
With the cutting off the wicked shalt thou delight thine eyes.
- 35 ו I have seen a violent wicked man,
And he spread himself like an indigenous tree of luxuriant foliage.
- 36 And one passed by, and lo he was not,
And I sought him and he was not to be found.

- 37  $\psi$  Mark the perfect man, and observe the upright;
That the man of peace hath a posterity.
- 38 But the transgressors are destroyed together,
The posterity of the wicked is cut off.
- 39  $\eta$  And the salvation of the righteous is from Jahve,
Who is their hiding-place in the time of trouble.
- 40 And Jahve helpeth them and rescueth them,
He rescueth them from the wicked and saveth them,
Because they trust in Him.

The bond of connection between Ps. xxxvi. and xxxvii. is their similarity of contents, which here and there extends even to accords of expression. The fundamental thought running through the whole Psalm is at once expressed in the opening verses: Do not let the prosperity of the ungodly be a source of vexation to thee, but wait on the Lord; for the prosperity of the ungodly will suddenly come to an end, and the issue determines between the righteous and the unrighteous. Hence Tertullian calls this Psalm providentiæ speculum; Isodore, potio contra murmur; and Luther, vestis piorum, cui adscriptum: Hic Sanctorum patientia est (Apoc. xiv. 12). This fundamental thought the poet does not expand in strophes of ordinary compass, but in shorter utterances of the proverbial form following the order of the letters of the alphabet, and not without some repetitions and recurrences to a previous thought, in order to impress it still more convincingly and deeply upon the mind. The Psalm belongs therefore to the series Ps. ix. and x., xxv., xxxiv.,—all alphabetical Psalms of David, of whose language, cheering, high-flown, thoughtful, and at the same time so easy and unartificial, and withal elegant, this Psalm is fully worthy. The structure of the proverbial utterances is almost entirely tetrastichic; though  $\gamma$ ,  $\delta$ , and  $\rho$  are tristichs, and  $\eta$  (which is twice represented, though perhaps unintentionally),  $\nu$ , and  $\tau$  are pentastichs. The  $\psi$  is apparently wanting; but, on closer inspection, the originally separated strophes  $\delta$  and  $\psi$  are only run into one another by the division of the verses. The  $\psi$  strophe begins with לעולם, ver. 28b, and forms a tetrastich, just like the  $\delta$ . The fact that the preposition  $\zeta$  stands before the letter next in order need not confuse one. The  $\eta$ , ver. 39, also begins with ותשועת. The homogeneous beginnings, רָשַׁע, זִמַּם רָשַׁע, לָוֶה רָשַׁע, צוֹפֵה רָשַׁע, vers. 12, 21, 32, seem, as Hitzig remarks, to be designed to give prominence to the pauses in the succession of the proverbial utterances.

Vers. 1, 2. Olshausen observes, "The poet keeps entirely to the standpoint of the old Hebrew doctrine of recompense, which the Book of Job so powerfully refutes." But, viewed in the light of the final issue, all God's government is really in a word righteous recompense; and the Old Testament theodicy is only inadequate in so far as the future, which adjusts all present inconsistencies, is still veiled. Meanwhile the punitive justice of God does make itself manifest, as a rule, in the case of the ungodly even in the present world; even their dying is usually a fearful end to their life's prosperity. This it is which the poet means here, and which is also expressed by Job himself in the Book of Job, ch. xxvii. With הִתְחַרְחַר, to grow hot or angry (distinct from תִּתְחַרְחַר, to emulate, Jer. xii. 5, xxii. 15), alternates נִינֵן, to get into a glow, excarescentia, whether it be the restrained heat of sullen envy, or the incontrollable heat of impetuous zeal which would gladly call down fire from heaven. This first distich has been transferred to the Book of Proverbs, ch. xxiv. 19, cf. xxiii. 17, xxiv. 1, iii. 31; and in general we may remark that this Psalm is one of the Davidic patterns for the Salomonic gnome system. The form יָפְלוּ is, according to Gesenius, Olshausen, and Hitzig, fut. Kal of מָלַל, cognate אָמַל, they wither away, pausal form for יָפְלוּ like יָתַמוּ, cii. 28; but the signification to cut off also is secured to the verb מָלַל by the Niph. נָמַל, Gen. xvii. 11, whence fut. יָפְלוּ = יָמְלוּ; vid. on Job xiv. 2, xvlii. 16. יֵרֶק הָאֲשָׁא is a genitival combination: the green (viror) of young vigorous vegetation.

Vers. 3, 4. The "land" is throughout this Psalm the promised possession (Heilsgut), viz. the land of Jahve's presence, which has not merely a glorious past, but also a future rich in promises; and will finally, more perfectly than under Joshua, become the inheritance of the true Israel. It is therefore to be explained: enjoy the quiet sure habitation which God gives thee, and diligently cultivate the virtue of faithfulness. The two imperatives in ver. 3*b*, since there are two of them (cf. ver. 27) and the first is without any conjunctive Waw, have the appearance of being continued admonitions, not promises; and consequently  $\text{לְמַנְתָּהּ}$  is not an adverbial accusative as in cxix. 75 (Ewald), but the object to  $\text{רָעָה}$ , to pasture, to pursue, to practise (Syriac  $\text{רָרָה}$ , Hos. xii. 2); cf.  $\text{רָעָה}$ ,  $\text{רָע}$ , one who interests himself in any one, or anything; Beduin  $\text{رَاعِي} = \text{صاحب}$  of every kind of closer relationship (Deutsch. Morgenländ. Zeitschr. v. 9). In ver. 4,  $\text{וַיִּחַד}$  is an apodosis: delight in Jahve (cf. Job xxii. 26, xxvii. 10, Isa. lviii. 14), so will He grant thee the desire ( $\text{מִשְׁאַלְתָּ}$ , as in xx. 6) of thy heart; for he who, entirely severed from the creature, finds his highest delight in God, cannot desire anything that is at enmity with God, but he also can desire nothing that God, with whose will his own is thoroughly blended in love, would refuse him.

Vers. 5, 6. The LXX. erroneously renders  $\text{נָלֵךְ}$  (=  $\text{לָלֵךְ}$ , xxii. 9) by ἀποκάλυψον instead of ἐπιρρίψον, 1 Pet. v. 7: roll the burden of cares of thy life's way upon Jahve, leave the guidance of thy life entirely to Him, and to Him alone, without doing anything in it thyself: He will gloriously accomplish (all that concerns thee):  $\text{עָשָׂה}$ , as in xxii. 32, lii. 11; cf. Prov. xvi. 3, and Paul Gerhardt's Befehl du deine Wege, "Commit thou all thy ways," etc. The perfect in ver. 6 is a continuation of the promissory  $\text{יַעֲשֶׂה$ .  $\text{הוֹצִיא}$ , as in Jer. li. 10, signifies to set forth: He will bring to light thy misjudged righteousness like the light (the sun, Job xxxi. 26, xxxvii. 21, and more especially the morning sun, Prov. iv. 18), which breaks through the darkness; and thy down-trodden right ( $\text{מִשְׁפָּטֶיךָ}$  is the pausal form of the singular beside Mugrash) like the bright light of the noon-day: cf. Isa. lviii. 10, as on ver. 4, Isa. lviii. 14.

Ver. 7. The verb  $\text{רָמַם}$ , with its derivatives (lxii. 2, 6, Lam. iii. 28), denotes resignation, i.e. a quiet of mind which rests on God, renounces all self-help, and submits to the will of God.  $\text{הִתְחַוֵּל}$  (from  $\text{חָוַל}$ , to be in a state of tension, to wait) of the inward gathering of one's self together in hope intently directed towards God, as in B. Berachoth 30b as a synonym of  $\text{הִתְחַוֵּן}$ , and as it were reflexive of  $\text{חָלַף}$  of the collecting one's self to importunate prayer. With ver. 7b the primary tone of the whole Psalm is struck anew. On ver. 7c compare the definition of the mischief-maker in Prov. xxiv. 8.

Vers. 8, 9. On  $\text{הִרְהַר}$  (let alone), imper. apoc. Hiph., instead of  $\text{הִרְפֶּה}$ , vid. Ges. § 75, rem. 15.  $\text{אֵף לָרָע}$  is a clause to itself

(cf. Prov. xi. 24, xxi. 5, xxii. 16): it tends only to evil-doing, it ends only in thy involving thyself in sin. The final issue, without any need that thou shouldst turn sullen, is that the מְרַעֵים, like to whom thou dost make thyself by such passionate murmuring and displeasure, will be cut off, and they who, turning from the troublous present, make Jahve the ground and aim of their hope, shall inherit the land (vid. xxv. 13). It is the end, the final and consequently eternal end, that decides the matter.

Vers. 10, 11. The protasis in ver. 10a is literally: adhuc parum (temporis superest), עוֹר מְעַט וְ, as e.g. Ex. xxiii. 30, and as in a similar connection וְ מְעַט, Job xxiv. 24. וְהִתְבּוֹנֵנָה also is a protasis with a hypothetical perfect, Ges. § 155, 4, a. This promise also runs in the mouth of the Preacher on the Mount (Matt. v. 5) just as the LXX. renders ver. 11a: οἱ δὲ πραεῖς κληρονομήσουσι γῆν. Meekness, which is content with God, and renounces all earthly stays, will at length become the inheritor of the land, yea of the earth. Whatever God-opposed self-love may amass to itself and may seek to acquire, falls into the hands of the meek as their blessed possession.

Vers. 12, 13. The verb מַמְ is construed with לְ of that which is the object at which the evil devices aim. To gnash the teeth (elsewhere also: with the teeth) is, as in xxxv. 16, cf. Job xvi. 9, a gesture of anger, not of mockery, although anger and mockery are usually found together. But the Lord, who regards an assault upon the righteous as an assault upon Himself, laughs (ii. 4) at the enraged schemer; for He, who orders the destinies of men, sees beforehand, with His omniscient insight into the future, his day, i.e. the day of his death (2 Sam. xxvi. 10), of his visitation (cxxxvii. 7, Obad. ver. 12, Jer. l. 27, 31).

Vers. 14, 15. That which corresponds to the "treading" or stringing of the bow is the drawing from the sheath or unsheathing of the sword: פָּתַח, Ezek. xxi. 33, cf. Ps. lv. 22. The combination יִשְׂרִידָרֶךְ is just like תַּמִּימִי־דָרֶךְ, cxix. 1. The emphasis in ver. 15 is upon the suffix of בְּלָבָם: they shall perish by their own weapon. קִשְׁתוֹתָם has (in Baer) a Shebá dirimens, as also in Isa. v. 28 in correct texts.

Vers. 16, 17. With ver. 16 accord Prov. xv. 16, xvi. 8, cf. Tobit xii. 8. The לְ of לְצַדִּיק is a periphrastic indication of the genitive (Ges. § 115). הַמִּזְמֵן is a noisy multitude, here used of earthly possessions. רַבִּים is not per attract. (cf. xxxviii. 11, הַם for הוּא) equivalent to רַב, but the one righteous man is contrasted with many unrighteous. The arms are here named instead of the bow in ver. 15*b*. He whose arms are broken can neither injure others nor help himself. Whereas Jahve does for the righteous what earthly wealth and human power cannot do: He Himself upholds them.

Vers. 18, 19. The life of those who love Jahve with the whole heart is, with all its vicissitudes, an object of His loving regard and of His observant providential care, i. 6, xxxi. 8, cf. 16. He neither suffers His own to lose their heritage nor to be themselves lost to it. The αἰώνιος κληρονομία is not as yet thought of as extending into the future world, as in the New Testament. In ver. 19 the surviving refers only to this present life.

Ver. 20. With פִּי the preceding assertion is confirmed by its opposite (cf. cxxx. 4). פִּי יִקַּר פְּרִים forms a fine play in sound; יִקַּר is a substantivized adjective like גִּדְּלָה, Ex. xv. 16. Instead of בְּעֵשֶׂן, it is not to be read בְּעֵשֶׂן, Hos. xiii. 3; תֵּבַב is secured by cii. 4, lxxviii. 33. The idea is, that they vanish into smoke, i.e. are resolved into it, or also, that they vanish in the manner of smoke, which is first thick, but then becomes thinner and thinner till it disappears (Rosenmüller, Hupfeld, Hitzig); both expressions are admissible as to fact and as to the language, and the latter is commended by בְּהִבָּל, lxxviii. 33, cf. בְּצִלָּם, xxxix. 7. בְּעֵשֶׂן belongs to the first, regularly accented פְּלִי; for the Munach by בעשן is the substitute for Mugrash, which never can be used where at least two syllables do not precede the Silluk tone (vid. Psalter ii. 503). The second פְּלִי has the accent on the penult. for a change (Ew. § 194, c), i.e. variation of the rhythm (cf. לְמָה . . לְמָה, xlii. 10, xliii. 2; עוּרִי . . עוּרִי, Judg. v. 12, and on cxxxvii. 7), and in particular here on account of its pausal position (cf. עֲרִי, cxxxvii. 7).

Vers. 21, 22. It is the promise expressed in Deut. xv. 6, xxviii. 12, 44, which is rendered in ver. 21 in the more universal, sententious form. לָקַח signifies to be bound or under obligation to any one = to borrow and to owe (nequum esse). The confirmation of ver. 22 is not inappropriate (as Hitzig considers it, who places ver. 22 after ver. 20): in that ever deeper downfall of the ungodly, and in that charitableness of the righteous, which becomes more and more easy to him by reason of his prosperity, the curse and blessing of God, which shall be revealed in the end of the earthly lot of both the righteous and the ungodly, are even now foretold. Whilst those who reject the blessing of God are cut off, the promise given to the patriarchs is fulfilled in the experience of those who are blessed of God, in all its fulness.

Vers. 23, 24. By Jahve (יְהוָה, ápó, almost equivalent to úπό with the passive, as in Job xxiv. 1, Eccles. xii. 11, and in a few other passages) are a man's steps made firm, established; not: ordered or directed (LXX., Jerome, κατευθύνεται), which, according to the extant usage of the language, would be הִדְקִנִּי (passive of הִדְקִין, Prov. xvi. 9, Jer. x. 23, 2 Chron. xxvii. 6), whereas בִּוְנִנִּי, the Pulal of בִּוְנִין, is to be understood according to xl. 3. By יָבֵר is meant man in an emphatic sense (Job xxxviii. 3), and in fact in an ethical sense; compare, on the other hand, the expression of the more general saying, "Man proposes, and God disposes," Prov. xvi. 9, xx. 24, Jer. x. 23. Ver. 23*b* shows that it is the upright man that is meant in ver. 23*a*: to the way, i.e. course of life, of such an one God turns with pleasure (יִפְתָּח. pausal change of vowel for יִפְתָּח): supposing he should fall, whether it be a fall arising from misfortune or from error, or both together, he is not prostrated, but Jahve upholds his hand, affords it a firm point of support or fulcrum (cf. אֶתְּמַחְךָ, lxiii. 9, and frequently), so that he can raise himself again, rise up again.

Vers. 25, 26. There is an old theological rule: promissiones corporales intelligendæ sunt cum exceptione crucis et castigationis. Temporary forsakenness and destitution the Psalm does not deny: it is indeed even intended to meet the conflict of doubt which springs up in the minds of the God-fearing out of certain conditions and circumstances that are seemingly contradictory to the justice of God; and this it does, by contrasting that which in the end abides with that which is transitory, and in fact without the knowledge of any final decisive adjustment in a future world; and it only solves its problem, in so far as it is placed in the light of the New Testament, which already dawns in the Book of Ecclesiastes.

Vers. 27, 28*a*. The round of the exhortations and promises is here again reached as in ver. 3. The imperative  $\text{שָׁב}$ , which is there hortatory, is found here with the  $\text{ו}$  of sequence in the sense of a promise: and continue, doing such things, to dwell for ever = so shalt thou, etc. ( $\text{שָׁב}$ , pregnant as in cii. 29, Isa. lvii. 15). Nevertheless the imperative retains its meaning even in such instances, inasmuch as the exhortation is given to share in the reward of duty at the same time with the discharge of it. On ver. 28a compare xxxiii. 5.

Vers. 28b, 29. The division of the verses is wrong; for the  $\text{D}$  strophe, without any doubt, closes with  $\text{הַסִּדְיִי}$ , and the  $\text{Y}$  strophe begins with  $\text{לְעֹלָם}$ , so that, according to the text which we possess, the  $\text{Y}$  of this word is the acrostic letter. The LXX., however, after  $\epsilon\iota\varsigma\ \tau\omicron\nu\nu\ \alpha\iota\omega\nu\alpha\ \phi\upsilon\lambda\alpha\chi\theta\eta\sigma\omicron\nu\nu\tau\alpha\iota$  has another line, which suggests another commencement for the  $\text{Y}$  strophe, and runs in Cod. Vat., incorrectly,  $\alpha\mu\omega\mu\omicron\iota\ \epsilon\kappa\delta\iota\kappa\eta\sigma\omicron\nu\nu\tau\alpha\iota$ , in Cod. Alex., correctly,  $\alpha\nu\omicron\mu\omicron\iota\ \delta\epsilon\ \epsilon\kappa\delta\iota\omega\chi\theta\eta\sigma\omicron\nu\nu\tau\alpha\iota$  (Symmachus,  $\alpha\nu\omicron\mu\omicron\iota\ \epsilon\zeta\alpha\rho\theta\eta\sigma\omicron\nu\nu\tau\alpha\iota$ ). By  $\alpha\nu\omicron\mu\omicron\varsigma$  the LXX. translates  $\text{עָרַר}$  in Isa. xxix. 20; by  $\alpha\nu\omicron\mu\omicron\alpha$ ,  $\text{עָלָה}$  in Job xxvii. 4; and by  $\epsilon\kappa\delta\iota\omega\kappa\epsilon\iota\nu$ ,  $\text{הַצִּמִּית}$ , the synonym of  $\text{הַשְׁמִיר}$ , in Ps. ci. 5; so that consequently this line, as even Venema and Schleusner have discerned, was  $\text{עֲלֵיִם נִשְׁמְרוּ}$ . It will at once be seen that this is only another reading for  $\text{לְעֹלָם נִשְׁמְרוּ}$ ; and, since it stands side by side with the latter, that it is an ancient attempt to produce a correct beginning for the  $\text{Y}$  strophe, which has been transplanted from the LXX. into the text. It is, however, questionable whether this reparation is really a restoration of the original words (Hupfeld, Hitzig); since  $\text{עָלָה}$  ( $\text{עֲלֵי}$ ) is not a word found in the Psalms (for which reason Böttcher's conjecture of  $\text{עֲשֵׂי עֲלָה}$  more readily commends itself, although it is critically less probable), and  $\text{לְעֹלָם נִשְׁמְרוּ}$  forms a continuation that is more naturally brought about by the context and perfectly logical.

Vers. 30, 31. The verb  $\text{הִנָּה}$  unites in itself the two meanings of meditating and of meditative utterance (vid. ii. 1), just as  $\text{אָמַר}$  those of thinking and speaking. Ver. 31b in this connection affirms the stability of the moral nature. The walk of the righteous has a fixed inward rule, for the Tôra is to him not merely an external object of knowledge and a compulsory precept; it is in his heart, and, because it is the Tôra of his God whom he loves, as the motive of his actions closely united with his own will. On תִּמְעַד, followed by the subject in the plural, compare xviii. 35, lxxiii. 2 Chethib.

Vers. 32, 33. The Lord as ἀνακρίνων is, as in 1 Cor. iv. 3 sq., put in contrast with the ἀνακρίνειν of men, or of human ἡμέρα. If men sit in judgment upon the righteous, yet God, the supreme Judge, does not condemn him, but acquits him (cf. on the contrary cix. 7). Si condemnamur a mundo, exclaimed Tertullian to his companions in persecution, absolvimur a Deo.

Ver. 34. Let the eye of faith directed hopefully to Jahve go on its way, without suffering thyself to be turned aside by the persecution and condemnation of the world, then He will at length raise thee out of all trouble, and cause thee to possess (לְרַשֵּׁת, ut possidas et possideas) the land, as the sole lords of which the evil-doers, now cut off, conducted themselves.

Vers. 35, 36. עָרִיץ (after the form צַדִּיק) is coupled with רָשָׁע, just as these two words alternate in Job xv. 20: a terror-inspiring, tyrannical evil-doer; cf. besides also Job v. 3. The participle in ver. 35b forms a clause by itself: et se diffundens, scil. erat. The LXX. and Jerome translate as though it were בארו הלבנן, "like the cedars of Lebanon," instead of באורח רענן. But אֲזוּרַת רֵעֵנָן is the expression for an oak, terebinth, or the like, that has grown from time immemorial in its native soil, and has in the course of centuries attained a gigantic size in the stem, and a wide-spreading overhanging head. וַיַּעֲבֹר does not mean: then he vanished away (Hupfeld and others); for עָבַר in this sense is not suitable to a tree. Luther correctly renders it: man ging vorüber, one (they) passed by, Ges. § 137, 3. The LXX., Syriac, and others, by way of lightening the difficulty, render it: then I passed by.

Vers. 37, 38. הֵם might even be taken as neuter for הָם, and יִשָּׂר for יִשָּׂר; but in this case the poet would have written רֵעִה instead of רֵאִה; נִשְׁמַר is therefore used as, e.g., in 1 Sam. i. 12. By כִּי that to which attention is specially called is introduced. The man of peace has a totally different lot from the evil-doer who delights in contention and persecution. As the fruit of his love of peace he has אַחֲרֵיתָא, a future, Prov. xxiii. 18, xxiv. 14, viz. in his posterity, Prov. xxiv. 20; whereas the apostates are altogether blotted out; not merely they themselves, but even the posterity of the ungodly is cut off, Amos

iv. 2, ix. 1, Ezek. xxiii. 25. To them remains no posterity to carry forward their name, their אֲזַרְיָה is devoted to destruction (cf. cix. 13 with Num. xxiv. 20).

Vers. 39, 40. The salvation of the righteous cometh from Jahve; it is therefore characterized, in accordance with its origin, as sure, perfect, and enduring for ever. מְעֵיָם is an apposition; the plena scriptio serves, as in 2 Sam. xxii. 33, to indicate to us that מַעוֹן is meant in this passage to signify not a fortress, but a hiding-place, a place of protection, a refuge, in which sense معان الله (the protection of God) and معان وجه الله (the protection of God's presence) is an Arabic expression (also used as a formula of an oath); vid. moreover on xxxi. 3. The moods of sequence in ver. 40 are aoristi gnomici. The parallelism in ver. 40*ab* is progressive after the manner of the Psalms of degrees. The short confirmatory clause ki ch'á'su bo forms an expressive closing cadence.

PSALM XXXVIII.

PRAYER FOR THE CHANGING OF MERITED WRATH INTO RESCUING LOVE.

- 2 JAHVE, do not in Thy wrath rebuke me,
And in Thy hot displeasure chasten me.
- 3 For Thine arrows have entered deep into me,
And Thy hand hath sunk down upon me.
- 4 There is no soundness in my flesh because of Thine anger,
There is no health in my bones because of my sin.
- 5 For mine iniquities are gone over my head,
Like a heavy burden they are too heavy for me.
- 6 My wounds stink and fester
Because of my foolishness.
- 7 I am bent, I am sore bowed down,
All the day long do I go mourning.
- 8 For my loins are full of burning,
And there is no soundness in my flesh.

- 9 I am benumbed and sore crushed,
I roar by reason of the groaning of my heart.
- 10 O Lord, to Thee is all my desire manifest,
And my sighing is not hidden from Thee.
- 11 My heart beateth quickly, my strength hath failed me,
And the light of mine eyes, even of these, is gone from me.
- 12 My lovers and friends stand aloof from my stroke,
[And my kinsmen stand afar off,]
- 13 And they lay snares for me who seek after my soul,
And they who strive after my misfortune speak mischievous
And utter falsehoods continually. [things,
- 14 But I am like a deaf man, as though I heard not,
And like one dumb that openeth not his mouth ;
- 15 I am become like a man that heareth not,
And in whose mouth are no replies.
- 16 For in Thee, Jahve, do I hope ;
Thou, Thou wilt answer, O Lord my God.
- 17 For I say : Let them not rejoice over me
Who, when my foot tottereth, would magnify themselves against me.
- 18 For I am ready to fall,
And my great sorrow is ever before me.
- 19 For mine iniquity must I confess,
I must tremble on account of my sin.
- 20 But mine enemies are vigorous, they are numerous,
And many are my lying haters.
- 21 And requiting evil for good,
They are hostile towards me for my following that which is good.
- 22 Forsake me not, Jahve ;
My God, be not far from me.
- 23 Make haste to help me,
O Lord, who art my salvation !

The penitential Psalm, xxxviii., is placed immediately after Ps. xxxvii. on account of the similarity of its close to the strophe of that Psalm. It begins like Ps. vi. If we regard David's adultery as the occasion of it (cf. more especially 2 Sam. xii. 14), then Ps. vi., xxxviii., li., xxxii. form a chronological series. David is distressed both in mind and body, forsaken by his friends, and regarded by his foes as one who is cast off for ever. The fire of divine anger burns within him like a fever, and the divine withdrawal as it were rests upon him like darkness. But he fights his way by prayer through this fire and this darkness to the bright confidence of faith. The Psalm, although it is the pouring forth of such elevated and depressed feelings, is nevertheless symmetrically and skilfully laid out. It consists of three main paragraphs, which divide into four (vers. 2-9), three (vers. 10-15), and four (vers. 16-23) tetrastichs. The way in which the names of God are brought in is well conceived. The first word of the first group or paragraph is יהוה, the first word of the second אֱלֹהֵי, and in the third יהוה and אֱלֹהֵי are used interchangeably twice. The Psalm, in common with Ps. lxx., bears the inscription לְהַזְכִּיר. The chronicler, in 1 Chron. xvi. 4, refers to these Hazkir Psalms together with the Hodu and Halleluja Psalms. In connection with the presentation of meat-offerings, מִנְחָה, a portion of the meat-offering was cast into the altar fire, viz. a handful of the meal mixed with oil and the whole of the incense. This portion was called אֲזָכָרָה, ἀνάμνησις, and to offer it הִזְכִּיר (a denominative), because the ascending smoke was intended to bring the owner of the offering into remembrance with God. In connection with the presentation of this memorial portion of the mincha, the two Psalms are appointed to be used as prayers; hence the inscription: at the presentation of the Azcara (the portion taken from the meal-offering). The LXX. adds here περὶ (τοῦ) σαββάτου; perhaps equivalent to לְשַׁבָּת.

In this Psalm we find a repetition of a peculiarity of the penitential Psalms, viz. that the praying one has to complain not only of afflictions of body and soul, but also of outward enemies, who come forward as his accusers and take occasion from his sin to prepare the way for his ruin. This arises from the fact that the Old Testament believer, whose perception of sin was not as yet so spiritual and deep as that of the New Testament believer, almost always calls to mind some sinful act that has become openly known. The foes, who would then prepare for his ruin, are the instruments of the Satanic power of evil (cf. ver. 21, אֲשֶׁר־נִגְזְרָה), which, as becomes perceptible to the New Testament believer even without the intervention of outward foes, desires the death of the sinning one, whereas God wills that he should live.

Vers. 2-9. David begins, as in Ps. vi., with the prayer that his punitive affliction may be changed into disciplinary. Bakius correctly paraphrases ver. 2: Corripi sane per legem, castiga per crucem, millies promerui, negare non possum, sed castiga, quæso, me ex amore ut pater, non ex furore et fervore ut iudex; ne punias justitiæ rigore, sed misericordiæ dulcore (cf. on vi. 2). The negative is to be repeated in ver. 2*b*, as in i. 5, ix. 19, lxxv. 6. In the description, which gives the ground of the cry for pity, נָחַח is not the Piel, as in xviii. 35, but the Niphal of the Kal נָחַח immediately following (root נָח). קִצְף is anger as a breaking forth, fragor (cf. Hos. x. 7, LXX. φρύγανον), with é instead of z in the first syllable, vowels which alternate in this word; and הִמְיָה, as a glowing or burning. הַצִּיּוֹם (in Homer, κήλα), God's wrath-arrows, i.e. lightnings of wrath, are His judgments of wrath; and יָד, as in xxxii. 4, xxxix. 11, God's punishing hand, which makes itself felt in dispensing punishment, hence הַנִּחַח might be attached as a mood of sequence. In ver. 4 wrath is called זַעַם as a boiling up. Sin is the cause of this experiencing wrath, and the wrath is the cause of the bodily derangement; sin as an exciting cause of the wrath always manifests itself outwardly even on the body as a fatal power. In ver. 5*a* sin is compared to waters that threaten to drown one, as in ver. 5*b* to a burden that presses one down. יִכְבְּדוּ כִמְצִי, they are heavier than I, i.e. than my power of endurance, too heavy for me. In ver. 6 the effects of the operation of the divine hand (as punishing) are wounds, תְּבוּרֹת (properly, suffused variegated marks from a blow or wheals, Isa. i. 6; from חָבַר, حبر, to be or make striped, variegated), which תִּבְאֵשׁוּ, send forth an offensive smell, and נִמְקִי, suppurate. Sin, which causes this, is called אֲנִלָּת because, as it is at last manifest, it is always the destruction of itself.

With emphasis does מִפְּנֵי אֵילָתַי form the second half of the verse. To take גַּעְיֹתַי out of ver. 7 and put it to this, as Meier and Thenius propose, is to destroy this its proper position. On the three מִפְּנֵי, vid. Ewald, § 217, l. Thus sick in soul and body, he is obliged to bow and bend himself in the extreme. גַּעְיָה is used of a convulsive drawing together of the body, Isa. xxi. 3; שָׁחָח, of a bowed mien, Ps. xxxv. 14; הִקְלָה, of a heavy, lagging gait. With פִּי in ver. 8 the grounding of the petition begins for the third time. His בְּסָלְיִים, i.e. internal muscles of the loins, which are usually the fattest parts, are full of נִקְלָה, that which is burnt, i.e. parched. It is therefore as though the burning, starting from the central point of the bodily power, would spread itself over the whole body: the wrath of God works commotion in this latter as well as in the soul. Whilst all the energies of life thus yield, there comes over him a partial, almost total lifelessness. פָּגַע is the proper word for the coldness and rigidity of a corpse; the Niphal means to be brought into this condition, just as נִרְבַּע means to be crushed, or to be brought into a condition of crushing, i.e. of violent dissolution. The מֶן of מִנְהַמַּת is intended to imply that the loud wail is only the utterance of the pain that is raging in his heart, the outward expression of his ceaseless, deep inward groaning.

Vers. 10-15. Having thus bewailed his suffering before God, he goes on in a somewhat calmer tone: it is the calm of weariness, but also of the rescue which shows itself from afar. He has complained, but not as if it were necessary for him first of all to make God acquainted with his suffering; the Omniscient One is directly cognisant of (has directly before Him, נִנָּה, like לִנְנֶה in xviii. 25) every wish that his suffering extorts from him, and even his softer sighing does not escape His knowledge. The sufferer does not say this so much with the view of comforting himself with this thought, as of exciting God's compassion. Hence he even goes on to draw the piteous picture of his condition: his heart is in a state of violent rotary motion, or only of violent, quickly repeated contraction and expansion (Psychol. S. 252; tr. p. 297), that is to say, a state of violent palpitation (פְּתַרְתָּר, Pealal according to Ges. § 55, 3). Strength of which the heart is the centre (xl. 13) has left him, and the light of his eyes, even of these (by attraction for נִבְהַרְהוּא, since the light of the eyes is not contrasted with anything else), is not with him, but has become lost to him by weeping, watching, and fever. Those who love him and are friendly towards him have placed themselves far from his stroke (נגיע, the touch of God's hand of wrath), merely looking on (Obad. ver. 11), therefore, in a position hostile (2 Sam. xviii. 13) rather than friendly. מִנְּגִי, far away, but within the range of vision, within sight, Gen. xxi. 16, Deut. xxxii. 52. The words יִקְרֹבֵי מִרְחֵק עֲמָדוֹ, which introduce a pentastich into a Psalm that is tetrastichic throughout, have the appearance of being a gloss or various reading: מִרְחֵק = מִנְּגִי, 2 Kings ii. 7. His enemies, however, endeavour to take advantage of his fall and helplessness, in order to give him his final death-blow. וַיִּנְקְשׁוּ (with the p dagashed*) describes what they have planned in consequence of the position he is in. The substance of their words is הוֹדוֹת, utter destruction (vid. v. 10); to this end it is מְרִמֹת, deceit upon deceit, malice upon malice, that they unceasingly hatch with heart and mouth. In the consciousness of his sin he is obliged to be silent, and, renouncing all self-help, to abandon his cause to God. Consciousness of guilt and resignation close his lips, so that he is not able, nor does he wish, to refute the false charges of his enemies; he has no תוֹכְחוֹת, counter-evidence wherewith to vindicate himself. It is not to be rendered: "just as one dumb opens not his mouth;" כִּי is only a preposition, not a conjunction, and it is just here, in vers. 14, 15, that the manifest proofs in support of this are found.†

* The various reading וַיִּנְקְשׁוּ in Norzi rests upon a misapprehended passage of Abulwalid (Rikma, p. 166).

† The passages brought forward by Hupfeld in support of the use of כִּי as a conjunction, viz. xc. 5, cxxv. 1, Isa. liii. 7, lxi. 11, are invalid; the passage that seems most to favour it is Obad. ver. 16, but in this instance the expression is elliptical, כִּי לֵאמֹר being equivalent to כִּי לֵאמֹר, like לֵאמֹר, Isa. lxxv. 1, = לֵאמֹר לֵאמֹר. It is only כִּי (כ) that can be used as a conjunction; but כִּי (כ) is always a preposition in ancient Hebrew just as in Syriac and Arabic (vid. Fleischer in the Hallsche Allgem. Lit. Zeitschr. 1843, Bd. iv. S. 117 ff.). It is not until the mediæval synagogal poetry (vid. Zunz, Synagogal-poesie des Mittelalters, S. 121, 381 f.) that it is admissible to use it as a conjunction (e.g. כִּי מָצָא, when he had found), just as it also occurs in Himjaritic, according to Osiander's deciphering of the

Vers. 16-23. Become utterly useless in himself, he renounces all self-help, for (וְ) he hopes in Jahve, who alone can help him. He waits for His answer, for (כִּי) he says, etc.—he waits for an answer, for the hearing of this his petition which is directed towards the glory of God, that God would not suffer his foes to triumph over him, nor strengthen them in their mercilessness and injustice. Ver. 18*b* appears also to stand under the government of the וְ; * but, since in this case one would look for a Waw relat. and a different order of the words, ver. 18*b* is to be regarded as a subject clause: “who, when my foot totters, i.e. when my affliction changes to entire downfall, would magnify themselves against me.” In ver. 18, וְ connects what follows with בְּמוֹט רַגְלִי by way of confirmation: he is נָכוֹן לְפֹלֵעַ, ready for falling (xxxv. 15), he will, if God does not graciously interpose, assuredly fall headlong. The fourth וְ in ver. 19 is attached confirmatorily to ver. 18*b*: his intense pain or sorrow is ever present to him, for he is obliged to confess his guilt, and this feeling of guilt is just the very sting of his pain. And whilst he in the consciousness of well-deserved punishment is sick unto death, his foes are numerous and withal vigorous and full of life. Instead of חַיִּים, probably חַזְקִים, as in xxxv. 19, lxix. 5, is to be read (Houbigant, Hitzig, Köster, Hupfeld, Ewald, and Olshausen). But even the LXX. read חַיִּים; and the reading which is so old, although it does not very well suit עֲצֵמִי (instead of which one would look for וְעֲצֵמִים), is still not without meaning: he looks upon himself, according to ver. 9, more as one dead than living; his foes, however, are חַיִּים, living, i.e. vigorous. The verb frequently has this pregnant meaning, and the adjective can also inscriptions. The verbal clause appended to the word to which this וְ, instar, is prefixed is for the most part an attributive clause as above, but sometimes even a circumstantial clause (حال), as in xxxviii. 14; cf. Sur. lxii. 5: “as the likeness of an ass carrying books.”

* The following are the constructions of וְ when a clause of more than one member follows it: (1) fut. and perf., the latter with the tone of the perf. consec., e.g. Ex. xxxiv. 15 sq., or without it, e.g. xxviii. 1 (which see); (2) fut. and fut. as in ii. 12, Jer. li. 46. This construction is indispensable where it is intended to give special prominence to the subject notion or a secondary notion of the clause, e.g. Deut. xx. 6. In one instance וְ is even followed (3) by the perf. and fut. consec., viz. 2 Kings ii. 10.

have it. Just as the accentuation of the form כָּבוֹ varies elsewhere out of pause, וְרַבִּי here has the tone on the ultima, although it is not perf. consec.* Ver. 21a is an apposition of the subject, which remains the same as in ver. 20. Instead of וְרוּפִי (Ges. § 61, rem. 2) the Kerî is רַדְפֵי, rād'phî (without any Makkeph following), or רַדְפֵי, rād'phî; cf. on this pronunciation, lxxxvi. 2, xvi. 1, and with the Chethâb רַדּוּבִי, the Chethâb צַרּוּבָה, xxvi. 2, also מִיּוֹרְדֵי, xxx. 4. By the "following of that which is good" David means more particularly that which is brought into exercise in relation to his present foes.† He closes in vers. 22 sq. with sighs for help. No lighting up of the darkness of wrath takes place. The fides supplex is not changed into fides triumphans. But the closing words, "O Lord, my salvation" (cf. li. 16), show where the repentance of Cain and that of David differ. True repentance has faith within itself, it despairs of itself, but not of God.

PRAYERS OF ONE SORELY TRIED AT THE SIGHT OF THE PROSPERITY OF THE UNGODLY.

- 2 I SAID: "I will keep my ways against sinning with my tongue;
I will keep a bridle on my mouth,
So long as the wicked is before me."
3 I was dumb in silence,

* As perf. consec. the following have the accent on the ultima:—וְחַתְּנִי, Isa. xx. 5, Obad. ver. 9, and וְרַבִּי, Isa. lxvi. 16; perhaps also וְחַתְּנִי, וְקַלְבִּי, Hab. i. 8, and וְרַבִּי (perf. hypoth.), Job xxxii. 15. But there is no special reason for the ultima-accentuation of רַבִּי, lv. 22; רַבִּי, lxix. 5; רַבִּי, Isa. xxxviii. 14; קַלְבִּי, Jer. iv. 13; וְשֹׁחֵי, Prov. xiv. 19, Hab. iii. 6; וְחַתְּנִי, Job xxxii. 15; וְחַתְּנִי, Lam. iv. 7.

† In the Greek and Latin texts, likewise in all the Æthiopic and several Arabic texts, and in the Syriac Psalterium Medilanense, the following addition is found after ver. 21: Ce aperripsan me ton agapeton osi necron ebdelygmenon, Et projecerunt me dilectum tanquam mortuum abominatum (so the Psalt. Veronense). Theodoret refers it to Absalom's relation to David. The words ὡς ἐν νεκρῶν ἐβδελυγμένον are taken from Isa. xiv. 19.

- I held my peace taking no note of prosperity,
 Yet my pain became violent.
- 4 My heart was hot within me,
 While I mused the fire burned—
 I spake with my tongue.
- 5 Make me to know, O Jahve, mine end,
 And the measure of my days how short it is;
 Oh that I might know, how frail I am !
- 6 Behold, Thou hast made my days as a handbreadth,
 And my lifetime is as nothing before Thee.
 Only a mere breath is every man, however firm he may stand. (Sela.)
- 7 Only as a shadow doth man wander to and fro,
 Only for a breath do they make an uproar ;
 He heapeth up and knoweth not who will gather it.
- 8 And now for what shall I wait, Lord !
 My hope is towards Thee.
- 9 From all my transgressions rescue me,
 Make me not a reproach of the profane !
- 10 I am dumb, I open not my mouth,
 For Thou, Thou hast done it.
- 11 Take away from me Thy stroke,
 Before the blow of Thy hand I must perish.
- 12 When Thou with rebukes dost chasten a man for iniquity, Thou makest his beauty melt away, like the damage of the moth—
 Only a breath are all men. (Sela.)
- 13 O hear my prayer, Jahve,
 And hearken to my cry !
 At my tears be not silent,
 For I am a guest with Thee,
 A sojourner, like all my fathers.
- 14 Look away from me, that I may rally,
 Before I go hence and am no more.

In xxxviii. 14 the poet calls himself a dumb person, who opens not his mouth ; this submissive, resigned keeping of silence he affirms of himself in the same words in xxxix. 3 also. This forms a prominent characteristic common to the two Psalms, which fully warranted their being placed together as a pair. There is, however, another Psalm, which is still more closely related to Ps. xxxix., viz. Ps. lxii., which, together with Ps. iv., has a similar historical background. The author, in his dignity, is threatened by those who from being false friends have become open enemies, and who revel in the enjoyment of illegitimately acquired power and possessions. From his own experience, in the midst of which he commits his safety and his honour to God, he derives the general warnings, that to trust in riches is deceptive, and that power belongs alone to God the Avenger—two doctrines, in support of which the issue of the affair with Absalom was a forcible example. Thus it is with Ps. lxii., and in like manner Ps. xxxix. also. Both Psalms bear the name of Jeduthun side by side with the name of David at their head; both describe the nothingness of everything human in the same language; both delight more than other Psalms in the use of the assuring, confident  $\eta\delta$ ; both have  $\text{סֵלָה}$  twice; both coincide in some points with the Book of Job; the form of both Psalms, however, is so polished, transparent, and classic, that criticism is not authorized in assigning to this pair of Psalms any particular poet other than David. The reason of the redacteur not placing Ps. lxii. immediately after Ps. xxxix. is to be found in the fact that Ps. lxii. is an Elohim-Psalms, which could not stand in the midst of Jahve-Psalms.

To the inscribed  $\text{לְיִדְוֹתָן, לְמַנְצֵה}$  is added in this instance. The name is also written thus in lxxvii. 1, 1 Chron. xvi. 38, Neh. xi. 17, and always with the Keri  $\text{יְדוֹתָן}$ , which, after the analogy of  $\text{וְבִלְתָּן}$ , is the more easily pronouncible pointing (lxii. 1). It is an offshoot of the form  $\text{יְדוֹת}$  or  $\text{יְדִית}$ ; cf.  $\text{שְׁבוּת}$  and  $\text{שְׁבִית}$  and  $\text{חֲפָשִׁית}$  and  $\text{חֲפָשׁוֹת}$ . It is the name of one of David's three choir-masters or precentors—the third in conjunction with Asaph and Heman, 1 Chron. xvi. 41 sq., xxv. 1 sqq., 2 Chron. v. 12, xxxv. 15, and is, without doubt, the same person as  $\text{אִיתָן}$ , 1 Chron. ch. xv., a name which is changed into  $\text{יְדוֹתָן}$  after the arrangement in Gibeon, 1 Chron. ch. xvi. Consequently side by side with  $\text{לְמַנְצֵה, לְיְדוֹתָן}$  will be the name of the  $\text{מַנְצֵה}$  himself, i.e. the name of the person to whom the song was handed over to be set to music. The fact that in two inscriptions (lxii. 1, lxxvii. 1) we read על instead of the ל of לִירִיתוֹן, does not militate against this. By ל Jeduthun is denoted as the person to whom the song was handed over for performance; and by על, as the person to whom the performance was assigned. The rendering: "to the director of the Jeduthunites," adopted by Hitzig, is possible regarding the יִרְתָּן as used as a generic name like אֲהֲרֹן in 1 Chron. xii. 27, xxvii. 17; but the customary use of the ל in inscriptions is against it.

The Psalm consists of four stanzas without any strophic symmetry. The first three are of only approximately the same compass, and the final smaller stanza has designedly the character of an epilogue.

Vers. 2-4. The poet relates how he has resolved to bear his own affliction silently in the face of the prosperity of the ungodly, but that his smart was so overpowering that he was compelled involuntarily to break his silence by loud complaint. The resolve follows the introductory אֲמַרְתִּי in cohortatives. He meant to take heed to his ways, i.e. his manner of thought and action, in all their extent, lest he should sin with his tongue, viz. by any murmuring complaint concerning his own misfortune, when he saw the prosperity of the ungodly. He was resolved to keep (i.e. cause invariably to press) a bridling (cf. on the form, Gen. xxx. 37), or a bridle (capistrum), upon his mouth, so long as he should see the ungodly continuing and sinning in the fulness of his strength, instead of his speedy ruin which one ought to expect. Then he was struck dumb דִּימְטָה, in silence, i.e. as in lxii. 2, cf. Lam. iii. 26, in resigned submission, he was silent מִפִּי, turned away from (vid. xxviii. 1, 1 Sam. vii. 8, and frequently) prosperity, i.e. from that in which he saw the evil-doer rejoicing; he sought to silence for ever the perplexing contradiction between this prosperity and the righteousness of God. But this self-imposed silence gave intensity to the repressed pain, and this was thereby נִעְצָר, stirred up, excited, aroused; the inward heat became, in consequence of restrained complaint, all the more intense (Jer. xx. 9): "and while I was musing a fire was kindled," i.e. the thoughts and emotions rubbing against one another produced a blazing fire, viz. of irrepressible vexation, and the end of it was: "I spake with my tongue," unable any longer to keep in my pain. What now follows is not what was said by the poet when in this condition. On the contrary, he turns away from his purpose, which has been proved to be impracticable, to God Himself with the prayer that He would teach him calm submission.

Vers. 5-7. He prays God to set the transitoriness of earthly life clearly before his eyes (cf. xc. 12); for if life is only a few spans long, then even his suffering and the prosperity of the ungodly will last only a short time. Oh that God would then grant him to know his end (Job vi. 11), i.e. the end of his life, which is at the same time the end of his affliction, and the measure of his days, how it is with this (מָה, interrog. extenuantis, as in viii. 5), in order that he may become fully conscious of his own frailty! Hupfeld corrects the text to מַה-חֵלֶל אֲנִי, after the analogy of lxxxix. 48, because חֵלֶל cannot signify "frail." But חֵלֶל signifies that which leaves off and ceases, and consequently in this connection, finite and transitory or frail. מַה, quam, in connection with an adjective, as in viii. 2, xxxi. 20, xxxvi. 8, lxvi. 3; cxxxiii. 1. By וְ (the customary form of introducing the propositio minor, Lev. x. 18, xxv. 20) the preceding petition is supported. God has, indeed, made the days, i.e. the lifetime, of a man מַפְרוֹת, handbreadths, i.e. He has allotted to it only the short extension of a few handbreadths (cf. יָמִים, a few days, e.g. Isa. lxv. 20), of which nine make a yard (cf. πῆχυρος χόβος in Mimnermus, and 1 Sam. xx. 3); the duration of human life (on חֵלֶל vid. xvii. 14) is as a vanishing nothing before God the eternal One. The particle וְ is originally affirmative, and starting from that sense becomes restrictive; just as כִּי is originally restrictive and then affirmative. Sometimes also, as is commonly the case with וְכִי, the affirmative signification passes over into the adversative (cf. verum, verum enim vero). In our passage, agreeably to the restrictive sense, it is to be explained thus: nothing but mere nothingness (cf. xlv. 14, Jas. i. 2) is every man וְכִי, standing firmly, i.e. though he stand never so firmly, though he be never so steadfast (Zech. xi. 16). Here the music rises to tones of bitter lament, and the song continues in ver. 7 with the same theme. צֶלֶם, belonging to the same root as צָל, signifies a shadow-outline, an image; the אֵל is, as in xxxv. 2, Beth essentia: he walks about consisting only of an unsubstantial shadow.

Only הַבָּל, breath-like, or after the manner of breath (cxliv. 4), from empty, vain motives and with vain results, do they make a disturbance (pausal fut. energeticum, as in xxxvi. 8); and he who restlessly and noisily exerts himself knows not who will suddenly snatch together, i.e. take altogether greedily to himself, the many things that he heaps up (צָבַר, as in Job xxvii. 16); cf. Isa. xxxiii. 4, and on —ām = αἰτῶ, Lev. xv. 10 (in connection with which אֱלֵה הַרְבִּירִים, cf. Isa. xlii. 16, is in the mind of the speaker).

Vers. 8-12. It is customary to begin a distinct turning-point of a discourse with וַעֲתִידָהּ; and now, i.e. in connection with this nothingness or vanity of a life which is so full of suffering and unrest, what am I to hope, quid sperem (concerning the perfect, vid. on xi. 3)? The answer to this question which he himself throws out is, that Jahve is the goal of his waiting or hoping. It might appear strange that the poet is willing to make the brevity of human life a reason for being calm, and a ground of comfort. But here we have the explanation. Although not expressly assured of a future life of blessedness, his faith, even in the midst of death, lays hold on Jahve as the Living One and as the God of the living. It is just this which is so heroic in the Old Testament faith, that in the midst of the riddles of the present, and in the face of the future which is lost in dismal night, it casts itself unreservedly into the arms of God. While, however, sin is the root of all evil, the poet prays in ver. 9a before all else, that God would remove from him all the transgressions by which he has fully incurred his affliction; and while, given over to the consequences of his sin, he would become, not only to his own dishonour but also to the dishonour of God, a derision to the unbelieving, he prays in ver. 9b that God would not permit it to come to this. בָּרָא, ver. 9a, has Mercha, and is consequently, as in xxxv. 10, to be read with ā (not ō), since an accent can never be placed by Kametz chatûph. Concerning נָבַל, ver. 9b, see on xiv. 1. As to the rest he is silent and calm; for God is the author, viz. of his affliction (עָשָׂה, used just as absolutely as in xxii. 32, xxxvii. 5, lii. 11, Lam. i. 21). Without ceasing still to regard intently the prosperity of the ungodly, he recognises the hand of God in his affliction, and knows that he has not merited anything better. But it is permitted to him to pray that God would suffer mercy to take the place of right. נִגְעָה is the name he gives to his affliction, as in xxxviii. 12, as being a stroke (blow) of divine wrath; תִּנְרַת יָדָךְ, as a quarrel into which God's hand has fallen with him; and by אֲנִי, with the almighty (punishing) hand of God, he contrasts himself the feeble one, to whom, if the present state of things continues, ruin is certain. In ver. 12 he puts his own personal experience into the form of a general maxim: when with rebukes (תּוֹכְחוֹת) from תּוֹכַחְתָּה, collateral form with תּוֹכַחָה, Thou chastenest a man on account of iniquity (perf. conditionale), Thou makest his pleasantness (Isa. liii. 3), i.e. his bodily beauty (Job xxxiii. 21), to melt away, moulder away (הִמָּסָה, fut. apoc. from הִמָּסָה, to cause to melt, vi. 7), like the moth (Hos. v. 12), so that it falls away, as a moth-eaten garment falls into rags. Thus do all men become mere nothing. They are sinful and perishing. The thought expressed in ver. 6c is here repeated as a refrain. The music again strikes in here, as there.

Vers. 13, 14. Finally, the poet renews the prayer for an alleviation of his sufferings, basing it upon the shortness of this earthly pilgrimage. The urgent שְׁמָעָה is here fuller toned, being שְׁמָעָה.* Side by side with the language of prayer, tears even appear here as prayer that is intelligible to God; for when the gates of prayer seem to be closed, the gates of tears still remain unclosed (שְׁעַר דַּמְעוֹת לֹא נִנְעָלוּ), B. Berachoth 32b. As a reason for his being heard, David appeals to the instability and finite character of this earthly life in language which we also hear from his own lips in 1 Chron. xxix. 15. גֵּר is the stranger who travels about and sojourns as a guest in a country that is not his native land; תּוֹשָׁב is a sojourner, or one enjoying the protection of the laws, who, without possessing any hereditary title, has settled down there, and to whom a settlement is allotted by sufferance. The earth is God's; that which may be said of the Holy Land (Lev. xxv. 23) may be said of the whole earth; man has no right upon it, he only remains there so long as God permits him. כָּל־אֲבוֹתַי glances back even to the patriarchs (Gen. xlvii. 9, cf. xxiii. 4). Israel is, it is true, at the present time in possession of a fixed dwelling-place, but only as the gift of his God, and for each individual it is only during his life, which is but a handbreadth long. May Jahve, then—so David prays—turn away His look of wrath from him, in order that he may shine forth, become cheerful or clear up, before he goes hence and it is too late. הִשָּׁע is imper. apoc. Hiph. for הִשָּׁעָה (in the signification of Kal), and ought, according to the form הִרָב, properly to be הִשָּׁע; it is, however, pointed just like the imper. Hiph. of שָׁעַע in Isa. vi. 10, without any necessity for explaining it as meaning oblinc (oculos tuos) = connive (Abulwalîd), which would be an expression unworthy of God. It is on the contrary to be rendered: look away from me; on which compare Job vii. 19, xiv. 6; on אֲבָלִיגָה cf. ib. x. 20, ix. 27; on בְּטָרָם אֵלֶּה, ib. x. 21; on וְאֵינִי, ib. vii. 8, 21. The close of the Psalm, consequently, is re-echoed in many ways in the Book of Job. The Book of Job is occupied with the same riddle as that with which this Psalm is occupied. But in the solution of it, it advances a step further. David does not know how to disassociate in his mind sin and suffering, and wrath and suffering. The Book of Job, on the contrary, thinks of suffering and love together; and in the truth that suffering also, even though it be unto death, must serve the highest interests of those who love God, it possesses a satisfactory solution.

PSALM XL.

THANKSGIVING, AN OFFERING UP OF ONE'S SELF,
AND PRAYER.

- 2 I WAITED patiently upon Jahve,
And He inclined unto me, and heard my cry.
- 3 And He drew me up out of a pit of destruction, out of the mire of the swamp,
And set my feet upon a rock, made my footsteps firm.
- 4 And put into my mouth a new song, praise unto our God—
Many see it and fear, and put their trust in Jahve.

- 5 Blessed is the man who maketh Jahve his trust,
And doth not turn to the proud and to lying apostates.
- 6 Much hast Thou done, Jahve, my God, in Thy wonders and Thy thoughts on our behalf ;
Nothing can be compared unto Thee,
Else would I declare and speak—
They are too numerous to be numbered.
- 7 Sacrifice and meat-offering dost Thou not desire,
Ears hast Thou digged for me,
Burnt-offering and sin-offering dost Thou not require.
- 8 Then said I : “ Lo, I come with the roll of the book which is written concerning me.
- 9 To do Thy will, my God, do I desire,
And Thy Law is in my inward part.”
- 10 I brought glad tidings of righteousness in the great con-
Lo, I closed not my lips ; [gregation, Jahve, Thou, even Thou knowest it.
- 11 Thy righteousness did I not hide within my heart,
Thy faithfulness and Thy salvation did I declare,
I concealed not Thy loving-kindness and Thy truth from the great congregation.
- 12 Do Thou, then, Jahve, not shut up Thy tender mercies from me,
Let Thy loving-kindness and Thy truth continually pre-tect me.
- 13 For evils have surrounded me without number, Mine iniquities have taken hold upon me and I am not able to see ;
They are more numerous than the hairs of my head,
And my heart hath failed me.
- 14 Be pleased, O Jahve, to deliver me ;
Jahve, to my help make haste !
- 15 Let those be ashamed and confounded together who seek my soul to destroy it ;
Let those fall back and be put to shame who desire my misfortune.

- 16 Let those be struck dumb on account of the merited punishment of their shame,
Who say to me : Aha, aha !
- 17 Let all those heartily rejoice in Thee who seek Thee,
Let those continually say " Jahve be magnified " who love Thy salvation.
- 18 Though I be both needy and poor,
The Lord will care for me.
My help and my deliverer art Thou !
My God, make no tarrying !

Ps. xxxix. is followed by Ps. xl., because the language of thanksgiving with which it opens is, as it were, the echo of the language of prayer contained in the former. If Ps. xl. was composed by David, and not rather by Jeremiah—a question which can only be decided by including Ps. lxix. (which see) in the same investigation—it belongs to the number of those Psalms which were composed between Gibeon of Saul and Ziklag. The mention of the roll of the book in ver. 8 harmonizes with the retrospective references to the Tôrah, which abound in the Psalms belonging to the time of Saul. And to this we may add the vow to praise Jahve בְּקִרְיָהּ, vers. 10 sq., cf. xxii. 26, xxxv. 18 ; the expression, " more in number than the hairs of my head," ver. 13, cf. lxix. 5 ; the wish יִצְרִינִי, ver. 12, cf. xxv. 21 ; the mocking הִאֲנִי הִאֲנִי, ver. 16, cf. xxxv. 21, 25 ; and much besides, on which vid. my Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, S. 457 [transl. vol. ii. p. 149]. The second half has an independent form in Ps. lxx. It is far better adapted to form an independent Psalm than the first half, which merely looks back into the past, and for this very reason contains no prayer.

The long lines, more in keeping with the style of prayer than of song, which alternate with disproportionately shorter ones, are characteristic of this Psalm. If with these long lines we associate a few others, which are likewise more or less distinctly indicated, then the Psalm can be easily divided into seven six-line strophes.

In the Epistle to the Hebrews, ch. x. 5–10, vers. 7–9 of this Psalm are, by following the LXX., taken as the language of the Christ at His coming into the world. There can be no doubt in this particular instance that, as we look to the second part of the Psalm, this rendering is brought about typically. The words of David, the anointed one, but only now on the way to the throne, are so moulded by the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of prophecy, that they sound at the same time like the words of the second David, passing through suffering to glory, whose offering up of Himself is the close of the animal sacrifices, and whose person and work are the very kernel and star of the roll of the Law. We are not thereby compelled to understand the whole Psalm as typically predictive. It again descends from the typically prophetic height to which it has risen even from ver. 10 onwards; and from ver. 13 onwards, the typically prophetic strain which still lingers in vers. 10 and 11 has entirely ceased.

Vers. 1-4. David, whom, though not without some hesitation, we regard as the author, now finds himself in a situation in which, on the one hand, he has just been rescued from danger, and, on the other, is still exposed to peril. Under such circumstances praise rightly occupies the first place, as in general, according to l. 23, gratitude is the way to salvation. His hope, although תוֹקֶהָתָּה כִּמְשֻׁבָּה (Prov. xiii. 12), has not deceived him; he is rescued, and can now again sing a new song of thanksgiving, an example for others, strengthening their trust. קָיִים קִיְיָתִי, I waited with constancy and perseverance. יהוה is the accusative as in xxv. 5, cxxx. 5, and not the vocative as in xxxix. 8. אֶנִּי is to be supplied in thought to אֲנִי, although after the analogy of xvii. 6, xxxi. 3, one might have looked for the Hiph. יִי instead of the Kal. בוֹר שִׁאֵן does not mean a pit of roaring (of water), since שִׁאֵן standing alone (see, on the other hand, lxv. 8, Isa. xvii. 12 sq.) has not this meaning; and, moreover, "rushing, roaring" (Hengstenberg), tumultuous waters of a pit or a cistern does not furnish any idea that is true to nature; neither does it mean a pit of falling in, since שִׁאֵן does not exhibit the signification deorsum labi; but the meaning is: a pit of devastation, of destruction, of ruin (Jer. xxv. 31, xlvi. 17), vid. supra on xxxv. 8. Another figure is "mire of the marsh" (לֵי) found only here and in lxix. 3), i.e. water, in the miry bottom of which one can find no firm footing—a combination like מְטַר־נֶשֶׁם, Zech. x. 1, אֲדַמַת־עָפָר, Dan. xii. 2, explained in the Mishna, Mikvaoth ix. 2, by טִיט הַבְּרוּתָה (mire of the cisterns). Taking them out of this, Jahve placed his feet upon a rock, established his footsteps, i.e. removed him from the danger which surrounded him, and gave him firm ground under his feet. The high rock and the firm footsteps are the opposites of the deep pit and the yielding miry bottom. This deliverance afforded him new matter for thanksgiving (cf. xxxiii. 3), and became in his mouth “praise to our God;” for the deliverance of the chosen king is an act of the God of Israel on behalf of His chosen people. The futures in ver. 4*b* (with an alliteration similar to lii. 8) indicate, by their being thus cumulative, that they are intended of the present and of that which still continues in the future.

Vers. 5, 6. He esteems him happy who puts his trust (מִבְּטַח־וֹ), with a latent Dagesh, as, according to Kimchi, also in lxxi. 5, Job xxxi. 24, Jer. xvii. 7) in Jahve, the God who has already made Himself glorious in Israel by innumerable wonderful works. Jer. xvii. 7 is an echo of this אֲשֶׁר־י. Ps. lii. 9 (cf. xci. 9) shows how Davidic is the language. The expression is designedly not הָאִישׁ, but הַיִּבְרָא, which is better adapted to designate the man as being tempted to put trust in himself. מִרְהָבִים from רָהַב (not from רָהַב) are the impetuous or violent, who in their arrogance cast down everything. שָׁטַי כָּזָב, “turners aside of falsehood” (שָׁטָה = שָׁטָה, cf. ci. 3), is the expression for apostates who yield to falsehood instead of to the truth: to take כָּזָב as accusative of the aim is forbidden by the status construct.; to take it as the genitive in the sense of the accusative of the object (like הַלְכֵי חָם, Prov. ii. 7) is impracticable, because שָׁטַי (שָׁטָה) does not admit of a transitive sense; כָּזָב is, therefore, genit. qualit. like אֶן in lix. 6. This second strophe contains two practical applications of that which the writer himself has experienced. From this point of view, he who trusts in God appears to the poet to be supremely happy, and a distant view of God’s gracious rule over His own people opens up before him. נִפְלְאוֹת are the thoughts of God realized, and מִחֻשְׁבוֹת those that are being realized, as in Jer. li. 29, Isa. lv. 8 sq. רַבּוֹת is an accusative of the predicate: in great number, in rich abundance; אֵלֵינוּ, “for us,” as e.g. in Jer. xv. 1 (Ew. § 217, c). His doings towards Israel were from of old a fulness of wondrous deeds and plans of deliverance, which was ever realizing and revealing itself. There is not עֲרֹךְ אֱלֹהֵיךָ, a possibility of comparison with Thee, οὐκ ἔσται (Ew. § 321, c) ἰσοῦν τί σοι—עֲרֹךְ as in lxxxix. 7, Isa. xl. 18—they are too powerful (עֲצָם of a powerful sum, as in lxix. 5, cxxxix. 17, cf. Jer. v. 6) for one to enumerate. According to Rosenmüller, Stier, and Hupfeld, אֵין עֲרֹךְ אֱלֹהֵיךְ even affirms the same thing in other words: it is not possible to lay them forth to Thee (before Thee); but that man should “lay forth” (Symmachus ἐκθέσθαι) before God His marvellous works and His thoughts of salvation, is an unbecoming conception. The cohortative forms, which follow, אֲנַיִדָה וְאֲדַבֵּרָה, admit of being taken as a protasis to what follows, after the analogy of Job xix. 18, xvi. 6, xxx. 26, Ps. cxxxix. 8: if I wish to declare them and speak them forth, they are too powerful (numerous) to be enumerated (Ges. § 128, 1, d). The accentuation, however, renders it as a parenthetical clause: I would (as in li. 18, lv. 13, Job vi. 10) declare them and speak them forth. He would do this, but because God, in the fulness of His wondrous works and thoughts of salvation, is absolutely without an equal, he is obliged to leave it undone—they are so powerful (numerous) that the enumeration of them falls far short of their powerful fulness. The words alioqui pronunciarerem et eloquerer have the character of a parenthesis, and, as ver. 7 shows, this accords with the style of this Psalm.

Vers. 7-9. The connection of the thoughts is clear: great and manifold are the proofs of Thy loving-kindness, how am I to render thanks to Thee for them? To this question he first of all gives a negative answer: God delights not in outward sacrifices. The sacrifices are named in a twofold way: (a) according to the material of which they consist, viz. זֶבֶח, the animal sacrifice, and מִנְחָה, the meal or meat offering (including the נֶסֶךְ, the wine or drink offering, which is the inalienable accessory of the accompanying mincha); (b) according to their purpose, in accordance with which they bring about either the turning towards one of the good pleasure of God, as more especially in the case of the עֹלָה, or, as more especially in the case of the חַטָּאת (in this passage חַטָּאת), the turning away of the divine displeasure. The fact of the זֶבֶח and עֹלָה standing first, has, moreover, its special reason in the fact that זֶבֶח specially designates the shelamim offerings, and to the province of these latter belongs the thank-offering proper, viz. the tôda-shelamim offering; and that עֹלָה as the sacrifice of adoration (προσευχή), which is also always a general thanksgiving (εὐχαριστία), is most natural, side by side with the shelamim, to him who gives thanks. When it is said of God, that He does not delight in and desire such non-personal sacrifices, there is as little intention as in Jer. vii. 22 (cf. Amos v. 21 sqq.) of saying that the sacrificial Tôra is not of divine origin, but that the true, essential will of God is not directed to such sacrifices.

Between these synonymous utterances in ver. 7a and 7c stands the clause אָזְנַיִם פָּרִיתָ לִּי. In connection with this position it is natural, with Rosenmüller, Gesenius, De Wette, and Stier, to explain it "ears hast Thou pierced for me" = this hast Thou engraven upon my mind as a revelation, this disclosure hast Thou imparted to me. But, although פָּרִיתָ, to dig, is even admissible in the sense of digging through, piercing (vid. on xxii. 17), there are two considerations against this interpretation, viz.: (1) that then one would rather look for אָזְנִי instead of אָזְנַיִם after the analogy of the phrases הָעֵיר אָזְנִי, גְּלָהּ אָזְנִי, and פָּתַח אָזְנִי, since the inner sense, in which the external organs of sense, with their functions, have their basis of unity, is commonly denoted by the use of the singular; (2) that according to the syntax, הִפְצַתָּ, פָּרִיתָ, and שָׂאֲלָתָּ are all placed on the same level. Thus, therefore, it is with this very אָזְנַיִם כָּרִיתָ לִּי that the answer is intended, in its positive form, to begin; and the primary passage, 1 Sam. xv. 22, favours this view: "Hath Jahve delight in whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices as in one's obeying the voice of Jahve? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, to attend better than the fat of rams!" The assertion of David is the echo of this assertion of Samuel, by which the sentence of death was pronounced upon the kingship of Saul, and consequently the way of that which is well-pleasing to God was traced out for the future kingship of David. God—says David—desires not outward sacrifices, but obedience; ears hath He digged for me, i.e. formed the sense of hearing, bestowed the faculty of hearing, and given therewith the instruction to obey.* The idea is not that God has given

* There is a similar expression in the Tamul Kural, Graul's translation, S. 63, No. 418: "An ear, that was not hollowed out by hearing, has, even him ears in order to hear that disclosure concerning the true will of God (Hupfeld), but, in general, to hear the word of God, and to obey that which is heard. God desires not sacrifices but hearing ears, and consequently the submission of the person himself in willing obedience. To interpret it "Thou hast appropriated me to Thyself לְעֵבֶר עוֹלָם," after Ex. xxi. 6, Deut. xv. 17, would not be out of harmony with the context; but it is at once shut out by the fact that the word is not לְעֵבֶר, but לְעֵינַי. Concerning the generalizing rendering of the LXX., σῶμα δὲ κατηρτίσω μου, following which Apollinaris renders it αὐτὰρ ἐμοὶ βροτέης τεκτῆναο σάρκα γενέθλης, and the Italic (which is also retained in the Psalterium Romanum), corpus autem perfecisti mihi; vide on Heb. x. 5, Commentary, S. 460 sq. [transl. vol. ii. p. 153].

The אִזְ אֶמְרָתִי, which follows, now introduces the expression of the obedience, with which he placed himself at the service of God, when he became conscious of what God's special will concerning him was. With reference to the fact that obedience and not sacrifice has become known to him as the will and requirement of God, he has said: "Lo, I come," etc. By the words "Lo, I come," the servant places himself at the call of his master, Num. xxii. 38, 2 Sam. xix. 21. It is not likely that the words בְּמִגִּלַּת סֵפֶר בְּתוֹב עָלַי then form a parenthesis, since ver. 9 is not a continuation of that "Lo, I come," but a new sentence. We take the Beth, as in lxvi. 13, as the Beth of the accompaniment; the roll of the book is the Tôra, and more especially Deuteronomy, written upon skins and rolled up together, which according to the law touching the king (Deut. xvii. 14-20) was to be the vade-mecum of the king of Israel. And עָלַי cannot, as synonymous with the following בְּמִעַי, signify as much as "written upon my heart," as De Wette and Thenius render it—a meaning which, as Maurer has already correctly replied, עָלַי obtains elsewhere by means of a conception that is altogether inadmissible in this instance. On the contrary, this preposition here, as in 2 Kings xxii. 13, denotes the object of the contents; for לְעָלַי signifies to write anything concerning any one, so that he is the subject one has specially in view (e.g.

if hearing, the manner of not hearing." The "hollowing out" meaning in this passage an opening of the inward sense of hearing by instruction.

of the judicial decision recorded in writing, Job xiii. 26). Because Jahve before all else requires obedience to His will, David comes with the document of this will, the Tôra, which prescribes to him, as a man, and more especially as the king, the right course of conduct. Thus presenting himself to the God of revelation, he can say in ver. 9, that willing obedience to God's Law is his delight, as he then knows that the written Law is written even in his heart, or, as the still stronger expression used here is, in his bowels. The principal form of כֶּעַי does not occur in the Old Testament; it was כֶּעַיִם (from כֶּעַ, כֶּעַה, or even כֶּעַי), according to current Jewish pronunciation כֶּעַיִם (which Kimchi explains as dual); and the word properly means (vid. on Isa. xlvi. 19) the soft parts of the body, which even elsewhere, like רֶחֶם, which is synonymous according to its original meaning, appear pre-eminently as the seat of sympathy, but also of fear and of pain. This is the only passage in which it occurs as the locality of a mental acquisition, but also with the associated notion of loving acceptance and cherishing protection (cf. the Syriac phrase כֶּעַי בְּנוּ מַעִיָּה, som b'gau m'ajo, to shut up in the heart = to love). That the Tôra is to be written upon the tables of the heart is even indicated by the Deuteronomion, Deut. vi. 6, cf. Prov. iii. 3, vii. 3. This reception of the Tôra into the inward parts among the people hitherto estranged from God is, according to Jer. xxxi. 33, the characteristic of the new covenant. But even in the Old Testament there is among the masses of Israel "a people with My law in their heart" (Isa. li. 7), and even in the Old Testament, "he who hath the law of his God in his heart" is called righteous (Ps. xxxvii. 31). As such an one who has the Tôra within him, not merely beside him, David presents himself on the way to the throne of God.

Vers. 10, 11. The self-presentation before Jahve, introduced by אֲנִי אֶמְרָתִי, extends from הִנֵּה to כֶּעַי; consequently בְּשִׂרְתִּי joins on to אֶמְרָתִי, and the אֶכְלָא which stands in the midst of perfects describes the synchronous past. The whole is a retrospect. בְּשִׂר, בִּשְׂר (root בִּש), starting from its sensible primary signification to scrape off, scratch off, rub smooth, means: to smooth any one (glätten), Engl. to gladden one, i.e. vultum ejus dilucere, to make him joyful and glad, more especially to cheer one by good news (e.g. basharahu or bashsharuhu bi-maulûdin, he has cheered him by the intelligence of the birth of a son), in Hebrew directly equivalent to εὐαγγελίζειν (εὐαγγελίζεσθαι). He has proclaimed to all Israel the evangel of Jahve's justifying and gracious rule, which only changes into retribution towards those who despise His love; and he can appeal to the Omniscient One (Jer. xv. 15), that neither through fear of men, nor through shame and indolence, has he restrained his lips from confessing Him. God's conduct, in accordance with the prescribed order of redemption, is as a matter of fact called צדק, and as an attribute of His holy love, צדקה; just as אמונה is His faithfulness which fulfils the promises made and which does not suffer hope to be put to shame, and תשועה is His salvation as it is manifested in facts. This rich matter for the preaching of the evangel, which may be comprehended in the two words אמת וחסד, the Alpha and Omega of God's self-attestation in the course of the redemptive history, he has not allowed to slumber as a dead, unfruitful knowledge hidden deep down in his heart. The new song which Jahve put into his mouth, he has also really sung. Thus far we have the first part of the song, which renders thanks for past mercies.

Vers. 12, 13. Now, in accordance with the true art of prayer, petition develops itself out of thanksgiving. The two נָפְלָא, ver. 10 and here, stand in a reciprocal relation to one another: he refrained not his lips; therefore, on His part, let not Jahve withhold His tender mercies so that they should not be exercised towards him (בְּמִנִּי). There is just the same correlation of mercy and truth in ver. 11 and here: he wishes continually to stand under the protection of these two saving powers, which he has gratefully proclaimed before all Israel. With בִּי, ver. 13, he bases these desires upon his own urgent need. רעות are the evils, which come even upon the righteous (xxxiv. 20) as trials or as chastenings. אֶפְפוּ עָלַי is a more circumstantial form of expression instead of אֶפְפוּנִי, xviii. 5. His misdeeds have taken hold upon him, i.e. overtaken him in their consequences (הַשִּׁיג, as in Deut. xxviii. 15, 46; cf. לָכֵד, Prov. v. 22), inasmuch as they have changed into decrees of suffering. He cannot see, because he is closely encompassed on all sides, and a free and open view is thereby altogether taken from him (the expression is used elsewhere of loss of sight, 1 Sam. iii. 2, iv. 15, 1 Kings xiv. 4). The interpretation adopted by Hupfeld and Hitzig: I am not able to survey, viz. their number, puts into the expression more than it really expresses in the common usage of the language. His heart, i.e. the power of vital consistence, has forsaken him, he is disconcerted, dejected, as it were driven to despair (xxxviii. 11). This feeling of the misery of sin is not opposed to the date of the Psalm being assigned to the time of Saul, vid. on xxxi. 11.

Vers. 14-16. In the midst of such sufferings, which, the longer they last, discover him all the more to himself as a sinner, he prays for speedy help. The cry for help in ver. 14 turns with רָצִיָה towards the will of God; for this is the root of all things. As to the rest, it resembles xxii. 20 (xxxviii. 23). The persecuted one wishes that the purpose of his deadly foes may as it were rebound against the protection of God and miserably miscarry. לְמַפְּוֹתָהּ, ad abripiendam eam (with Dagesh in the פ according to Ges. § 45, 2, Ew. § 245, a, and not as Gesenius, Thesaurus, p. 1235, states, aspirated*), is added to מִבְּקֵשֵׁי נַפְשִׁי by way of explanation and definiteness. יִשְׁמַי from שָׁמַם, to become torpid, here used of outward and inward paralysis, which is the result of overpowering and as it were bewitching surprise or fright, and is called by the Arabs ro'b or ra'b (paralysis through terror) [cf. Job, i. 322, note]. An עַל following upon יִשְׁמַי looks at first sight as though it introduced the object and reason of this fright; it is therefore not: as a reward, in consequence of their infamy, which would not be עַל-עֵקֶב, but merely the accusative עֵקֶב (Isa. v. 23, Arabic عَقِيبَ), it is rather: on account of the reward (xix. 12) of their disgrace (cf., as belonging to the same period, cix. 29, xxxv. 26), i.e. of the reward which consists in their being put to shame (Hitzig). לִי as in iii. 3, xli. 6: with reference to me. הָאֵתָהּ הָאֵתָהּ (Aquila, à

* After ה the aspirate usually disappears, as here and in cxviii. 13; but there are exceptions, as לְנִתְוֹשׁ וְלִנְתוֹזִין, Jer. i. 10, and frequently, לְיִשְׂרָאֵל, ib. xlvii. 4. After ב and כ it usually remains, as in lxxxvii. 6, Job iv. 13, xxxiii. 15, 2 Sam. iii. 34, 1 Kings i. 21, Eccles. v. 10; but again there are exceptions, as בְּשִׁפְן, Gen. xxxv. 22, בְּזִבְרָה, Jer. xvii. 2. In Gen. xxiii. 2 it is pointed לְבַפְתָּהּ according to the rule, and in my Comment. S. 423 it is to be read "with a Dagesh."

ἀά, αὐτῇ συγχορησάμενος, as Eusebius says, οὕτως ἐχούση τῇ Ἑβραϊκῇ φωνῇ) is an exclamation of sarcastic delight, which finds its satisfaction in another's misfortune (xxxv. 25).

Vers. 17, 18. On ver. 17 compare xxxv. 27. David wishes, as he does in that passage, that the pious may most heartily rejoice in God, the goal of their longing; and that on account of the salvation that has become manifest, which they love (2 Tim. iv. 8), they may continually say: Let Jahve become great, i.e. be magnified or celebrated with praises! In ver. 18 with אֲנִי he comes back to his own present helpless state, but only in order to contrast with it the confession of confident hope. True he is אֲנִי וְאֵלֹהֵי אֲבֹתַי (as in cix. 22, lxxxvi. 1, cf. xxv. 16), but He who ruleth over all will care for him: Dominus sollicitus erit pro me (Jerome). אֲשֶׁב in the same sense in which in ver. 6 the מַחֲשַׁבוֹת, i.e. God's thoughts of salvation, is conceived of (cf. the corresponding North-Palestinian expression in Jonah i. 6). A sigh for speedy help (אֶל־הַצְּהָרָה, as in Dan. ix. 19 with a transition of the merely tone-long Tsere into a pausal Pathach, and here in connection with a preceding closed syllable, Olshausen, § 91, d, under the accompanying influence of two final letters which incline towards the a sound) closes this second part of the Psalm. The first part is nothing but thanksgiving, the second is exclusively prayer.

PSALM XLI.

COMPLAINT OF A SUFFERER OF BEING SURROUNDED BY HOSTILE AND TREACHEROUS PERSONS.

- 2 BLESSED is he who regardeth the afflicted,
In the day of evil Jahve will deliver him.
- 3 Jahve will protect him and preserve him,
That he may be pronounced happy in the land;
And Thou dost not give him over to the greed of his enemies.
- 4 Jahve will support him on the bed of sickness,
All his couch dost Thou turn, when he falleth sick.
- 5 As for me, I say: Jahve, be merciful unto me,
O heal my soul, for I have sinned against Thee.

- 6 Mine enemies, however, speak evil of me :
 “ When will he die and his name perish ? ! ”
- 7 And if one cometh to see me, he speaketh deceit,
 His heart gathereth that which is groundless to itself,
 He goeth abroad, he telleth it.
- 8 Together against me do all those whisper one to another who hate me,
 Against me do they imagine evil for me :
- 9 “ An incurable evil is welded to him,
 And when once he lieth down he will not rise up again. ”
- 10 Even the man of my friendship in whom I trusted,
 Who did eat of my bread, lifteth his heel high against me.
- 11 And Thou, Jahve, be merciful unto me and raise me up,
 Then will I requite them.
- 12 By this I should like to know, that Thou hast pleasure in me :
 That mine enemy cannot exult over me.
- 13 And as for me, in mine integrity dost Thou uphold me,
 And dost set me before Thine eyes for ever.
- 14 BLESSED BE JAHVE THE GOD OF ISRAEL FROM EVER-LASTING TO EVERLASTING.
 AMEN, AMEN.

After a Psalm with אֲשֵׁרִי follows one beginning with אֲשֵׁרִי ; so that two Psalms with אֲשֵׁרִי close the First Book of the Psalms, which begins with אֲשֵׁרִי. Ps. xli. belongs to the time of the persecution by Absalom. Just as the Jahve-Psalm xxxix. forms with the Elohim-Psalm lxii. a coherent pair belonging to this time, so does also the Jahve-Psalm xli. with the Elohim-Psalm lv. These two Psalms have this feature in common, viz. that the complaint concerning the Psalmist's foes dwells with especial sadness upon some faithless bosom-friend. In Ps. xli. David celebrates the blessing which accompanies sincere sympathy, and depicts the hostility and falseness which he himself experiences in his sickness, and more especially from a very near friend. It is the very same person of whom he complains in Ps. lv., that he causes him the deepest sorrow—no ideal character, as Hengstenberg asserts; for these Psalms have the most distinctly impressed individual physiognomy of the writer's own times. In Ps. lv. the poet wishes for the wings of a dove, in order that, far away from the city, he might seek for himself a safe spot in the wilderness; for in the city deceit, violence, and mischief prevail, and the storm of a wide-spread conspiracy is gathering, in which he himself sees his most deeply attached friend involved. We need only supplement what is narrated in the second Book of Samuel by a few features drawn from these two Psalms, and these Psalms immediately find a satisfactory explanation in our regarding the time of their composition as the period of Absalom's rebellion. The faithless friend is that Ahithophel whose counsels, according to 2 Sam. xvi. 23, had with David almost the appearance of being divine oracles. Absalom was to take advantage of a lingering sickness under which his father suffered, in order to play the part of the careful and impartial judge and to steal the heart of the men of Israel. Ahithophel supported him in this project, and in four years after Absalom's reconciliation with his father the end was gained. These four years were for David a time of increasing care and anxiety; for that which was planned cannot have remained altogether concealed from him, but he had neither the courage nor the strength to smother the evil undertaking in the germ. His love for Absalom held him back; the consciousness of his own deed of shame and bloodshed, which was now notorious, deprived him of the alacrity essential to energetic interference; and the consciousness of the divine judgments, which ought to follow his sin, must have determined him to leave the issue of the conspiracy that was maturing under his very eyes entirely to the compassion of his God, without taking any action in the matter himself. From the standpoint of such considerations, Ps. xli. and lv. lose every look of being alien to the history of David and his times. One confirmation of their Davidic origin is the kindred contents of Ps. xxviii.

Jesus explains (John xiii. 18) that in the act of Judas Iscariot Ps. xli. 10 is fulfilled, ὁ τρώγων μετ' ἐμοῦ τὸν ἄρτον, ἐπήρην ἐπ' ἐμὲ τὴν πτέρναν αὐτοῦ (not following the LXX.), and John xvii. 12, Acts i. 16 assume in a general way that the deed and fate of the traitor are foretold in the Old Testament Scriptures, viz. in the Davidic Psalms of the time of Absalom—the treachery and the end of Ahithophel belong to the most prominent typical features of David's affliction in this second stage of persecution (vid. Hofmann, Weissagung und Erfüllung, ii. 122).

Vers. 2-4. The Psalm opens by celebrating the lot, so rich in promises, of the sympathetic man. ל is a general designation of the poor (e.g. Ex. xxx. 15), of the sick and weakly (Gen xli. 19), of the sick in mind (2 Sam. xiii. 4), and of that which outwardly or inwardly is tottering and consequently weak, frail. To show sympathising attention, thoughtful consideration towards such an one (לְהַשְׁכִּיל as in Neh. viii. 13, cf. ל Prov. xvii. 20) has many promises. The verb הִיָּה, which elsewhere even means to call to life again (lxxi. 20), in this instance side by side with preserving, viz. from destruction, has the signification of preserving life or prolonging life (as in xxx. 4, xxii. 30). The Pual אֲשַׁר signifies to be made happy (Prov. iii. 18), but also declaratively: to be pronounced happy (Isa. ix. 15); here, on account of the בְּאֶרְץ that stands with it, it is the latter. The Chethib אֲשַׁר sets forth as an independent promise that which the Keri וְאֲשַׁר joins on to what has gone before as a consequence. אֵל, ver. 3c (cf. xxxiv. 6 and frequently), expresses a negative with full sympathy in the utterance. נָתַן בְּנַפְשׁוֹ as in xxvii. 12. The supporting in ver. 4a is a keeping erect, which stops or arrests the man who is sinking down into death and the grave. דָּוִי (= darj, similar form to דָּמִי, דָּמִי, but wanting in the syllable before the tone) means sickness. If ver. 4a is understood of the supporting of the head after the manner of one who waits upon the sick (cf. Cant. ii. 6), then ver. 4 must, with Mendelssohn and others, be understood of the making of the couch or bed. But what then is meant by the word בֵּל? בֵּל מִשְׁכָּב is a sick-bed in Ex. xxi. 18 in the sense of being bedridden; and הִפְכָּתָהּ (cf. xxx. 12) is a changing of it into convalescence. By בֵּל־מִשְׁכָּבוֹ is not meant the constant lying down of such an one, but the affliction that casts him down, in all its extent. This Jahve turns or changes, so often as such an one is taken ill (בְּהִלָּיו, at his falling sick, parallel with עַל־עֵרֶשׂ דָּוִי). He gives a complete turn to the "sick-bed" towards recovery, so that not a vestige of the sickness remains behind.

Vers. 5-7. He, the poet, is treated in his distress of soul in a manner totally different from the way just described which is so rich in promises of blessing. He is himself just such a לָרַ, towards whom one ought to manifest sympathising consideration and interest. But, whilst he is addressing God in the language of penitential prayer for mercy and help, his enemies speak evil to him, i.e. with respect to him, wishing that he might die and that his name might perish. יִפְּאֶה is as an exception Milra, inasmuch as א draws the tone to its own syllable; cf. on the other hand רִנְיָהּ, Isa. xxxii. 11 (Hitzig). מָהִי (prop. extension, length of time) has only become a Semitic interrogative in the signification quando by the omission of the interrogative אִי (common Arabic in its full form ايمتى, émata). וְאֶבֶר is a continuation of the future. In ver. 7 one is singled out and made prominent, and his hypocritically malicious conduct described. רָאוֹת of a visit to a sick person as in 2 Sam. xiii. 5 sq., 2 Kings viii. 29. אִם is used both with the perf. (l. 18, lxiii. 7, lxxviii. 34, xciv. 18, Gen. xxxviii. 9, Amos vii. 2, Isa. xxiv. 13, xxviii. 25) and with the fut. (lxviii. 14, Job xiv. 14), like quum, as a blending together of si and quando, Germ. wenn (if) and wann (when). In יִדְבֵר לְבוֹ two Rebias come together, the first of which has the greater value as a distinctive, according to the rule laid down in Baer's Psalterium, p. xiv. Consequently, following the accents, it must not be rendered: "falsehood doth his heart speak." The LXX., Vulgate, and Targum have discerned the correct combination of the words. Besides, the accentuation, as is seen from the Targum and expositors, proceeds on the assumption that לְבוֹ is equivalent to בְּלְבוֹ. But why may it not be the subject-notion? "His heart gathereth" is an expression of the activity of his mind and feelings, concealed beneath a feigned and friendly outward bearing. The asyndeton portrays the despatch with which he seeks to make the material for slander, which has been gathered together, public both in the city and in the country.

Vers. 8-10. Continuation of the description of the conduct of the enemies and of the false friend. הִתְלַחֵשׁ, as in 2 Sam. xii. 19, to whisper to one another, or to whisper among themselves; the Hithpa. sometimes (cf. Gen. xlii. 1) has a reciprocal meaning like the Niphal. The intelligence brought out by hypocritical visitors of the invalid concerning his critical condition is spread from mouth to mouth by all who wish him ill as satisfactory news; and in fact in whispers, because at that time caution was still necessary. לְעַי stands twice in a prominent position in the sense of contra me. לִי עָרַרְתָּ לִי belong together: they maliciously invent what will be the very worst for him (going beyond what is actually told them concerning him). In this connection there is a feeling in favour of בְּלִיעַל being intended of an evil fate, according to xviii. 5, and not according to ci. 3 (cf. Deut. xv. 9) of pernicious or evil thought and conduct. And this view is also supported by the predicate בּוֹיָדָק: "a matter of destruction, an incurable evil (Hitzig) is poured out upon him," i.e. firmly cast upon him after the manner of casting metal (Job xli. 15 sq.), so that he cannot get free from it, and he that has once had to lie down will not again rise up. Thus do we understand וְשָׁנָה in ver. 9b; there is no occasion to take it as an accusative by departing from the most natural sense, as Ewald does, or as a conjunction, as Hitzig does. Even the man of his peace, or literally of his harmonious relationship (אִישׁ שְׁלוֹמֵךָ as in Obad. ver. 7, Jer. xx. 10, xxxviii. 22), on whom he has depended with fullest confidence, who did eat his bread, i.e. was his messmate (cf. lv. 15), has made his heel great against him, LXX. ἐμεγάλυνεν ἐπ' ἐμὲ πτερισμόν. The combination עָרַרְתָּ הַגֵּדִיל is explained by the fact that עָרַרְתָּ is taken in the sense of a thrust with the heel, a kick: to give a great kick, i.e. with a good swing of the foot.

Vers. 11-13. Having now described their behaviour towards him, sick in soul and body as he is, so devoid of affection, yea, so malignantly hostile and so totally contrary to the will and promise of God, David prays that God would raise him up, for he is now lying low, sick in soul and in body. The prayer is followed, as in xxxix. 14 and many other passages, by the future with ah: that I may be able to requite them, or: then will I requite them. What is meant is the requiting which it was David's duty as a duly constituted king to exercise, and which he did really execute by the power of God, when he subdued the rebellion of Absalom and maintained his ground in opposition to faithlessness and meanness. Instead of בְּזֹאת אֲרָעָה (Gen. xlii. 33, cf. xv. 8, Ex. vii. 17, Num. xvi.

28, Josh. iii. 10) the expression is  $\text{בְּזֹאת יִדְעָתִי}$  in the sense of (ex hoc) cognoverim. On  $\text{בִּי הִפְצֵתָּ בִּי}$  cf. xviii. 20, xxii. 9, xxxv. 27. By the second  $\text{בִּי}$ , the  $\text{בְּזֹאת}$ , which points forwards, is explained. The adversatively accented subject  $\text{וְאֲנִי}$  stands first in ver. 13 $\alpha$  as a nom. absol., just as in xxxv. 13. Ver. 13 states, retrospectively from the standpoint of fulfilment, what will then be made manifest and assure him of the divine good pleasure, viz. Jahve upholds him ( $\text{יְמַחֵדָּךְ}$  as in lxiii. 9), and firmly sets him as His chosen one before Him (cf. xxxix. 6) in accordance with the Messianic promise in 2 Sam. vii. 16, which speaks of an unlimited future.

Ver. 14. The closing doxology of the First Book, vid. Introduction, p. 15. Concerning  $\text{בְּרִינָה}$  vid. xviii. 47. The expression "from æon to æon" is, according to Berachoth ix. 5, directed against those who deny the truth of the future world.  $\text{וְאָמֵן וְאָמֵן}$  (a double  $\alpha\lambda\eta\theta\acute{\epsilon}\varsigma$  or  $\alpha\lambda\eta\theta\acute{\omega}\varsigma$ ) seals it in a climactic form.

SECOND BOOK OF THE PSALTER.

Ps. XLII.—LXXII.

PSALM XLII.—XLIII.

LONGING FOR ZION IN A HOSTILE COUNTRY

- 2 AS a hind, which panteth after the water-brooks,
So panteth my soul after Thee, Elohim.
- 3 My soul thirsteth for Elohim, for the living God:
When shall I come and appear before Elohim?!
- 4 My tears have been my food by day and night,
While they say continually unto me: Where is thy God?
- 5 I think thereon, pouring out my soul within me:
How I passed along among the throng, how I accompanied them to the house of Elohim Among the sound of rejoicing and thanksgiving,—a multitude keeping holy-day.
- 6 Why art thou bowed down, O my soul, and why groanest
thou within me?
Hope in Elohim, for I shall yet give thanks to Him,
That He is the health of my countenance and my God.
- 7 Within me is my soul bowed down, therefore do I remember Thee
From the land of Jordan and of the Hermôns, from the mountain of Miz'ar.
- 8 Flood calleth to flood at the sound of Thy cataracts,
All Thy breakers and Thy billows have passed over me.

- 9 By day Jahve will command His loving-kindness,
And at night a song concerning Him is with me, prayer to the God of my life.
- 10 Therefore say I to God, my rock: Why dost Thou forget me?
Why must I go mourning under the oppression of the enemy?
- 11 Like a crushing in my bones my oppressors scoff at me,
While they say to me continually: Where is thy God?
- 12 Why art thou bowed down, O my soul, and why groanest
thou within me?
Hope in Elohim, for I shall yet give thanks to Him,
That He is the health of my countenance and my God.
- 1 JUDGE me, Elohim, and plead my cause against an unmerciful people,
From the man of deceit and roguery be Thou pleased to rescue me;
- 2 For Thou art God, my fortress, why dost Thou spurn me?
Why must I go about mourning under the oppression of the enemy?
- 3 Send Thy light and Thy truth, let them lead me, Let them bring me to Thy holy mountain and to Thy tabernacles—
- 4 Then will I go in unto the altar of Elohim,
To the God of my exultant joy,
And give thanks to Thee with the cithern, Elohim my God.
- 5 Why art thou bowed down, O my soul, and why groanest
thou within me?
Hope in Elohim, for I shall yet give thanks to Him,
That He is the health of my countenance and my God.

The Second Book of Psalms consists entirely of Elohimic Psalms (vid. Introduction, p. 22); for whilst in the First Book יהוה occurred 272 times and אלהים only 15 times, the relation is here reversed: אלהים occurs 164 times, and יהוה only 30 times, and in almost every instance by a departure from the customary mode of expression for reasons that lie close at hand.

At the head of these Psalms written in the Elohimic style there stand seven inscribed לַבְּנֵי־קִרְחָה. That here as in לְאַסָּף the ל is Lamed auctoris, is made clear by the fact that none of these Psalms, as might be expected, have לָדוּד in addition to the name of the author. The LXX. renders it τοῖς υἱοῖς Κορέ, just as it does τῷ Δαυίδ, without distinguishing the one לָ from the other indicating the authorship, and even in the Talmud a similar meaning to the Lamed of לָדוּד is assumed. It is certainly remarkable that instead of an author it is always the family that is named, a rule from which Ps. lxxxviii. (which see) is only a seeming departure. The designation "Bohmische Brüder" in the hymnology of the German church is very similar. Probably the Korahitic songs originally formed a book of themselves, which bore the title שִׁירֵי בְנֵי קֹרַח or something similar; and then the בְנֵי קֹרַח of this title passed over to the inscription of each separate song of those incorporated in two groups in the Psalm-collection, just as appears also to be the case with the inscription שִׁיר הַמַּעֲלֹת, which is repeated fifteen times. Or we must suppose that it had become a family custom in the circle of the singers among the Korahites to allow the individual to retreat behind the joint responsibility of family unity, and, vying together, to expiate the name of their unfortunate ancestor by the best liturgical productions.

For Korah, the great-grandson of Levi, and grandson of Kehāth, is the same as he who perished by a divine judgment on account of his rebellion against Moses and Aaron (Num. ch. xvi.), whose sons, however, were not involved with him in this judgment (Num. xxvi. 11). In David's time the בְנֵי קֹרַח were one of the most renowned families of the Levite race of the Kehathites. The kingship of the promise very soon found valiant adherents and defenders in this family. Korahites gathered together to David to Ziklag, in order to aid in defending him and his title to the throne with the sword (1 Chron. xii. 6); for הַקְּרָחִים in this passage can hardly (as Bertheau is of opinion) be descendants of the קֹרַח of the family of Judah mentioned in 1 Chron. ii. 43, but otherwise unrenowned, since that name is elsewhere, viz. in ch. ix. 19, 31, a Levitic family name. In Jerusalem, after the Exile, Korahites were keepers of the temple gates (1 Chron. ix. 17, Neh. xi. 19), and the chronicler there informs us that even in David's time they were keepers of the threshold of the אֹהֶל (erected over the Ark on Zion); and still earlier, in the time of Moses, in the camp of Jahve they were appointed as watchers of the entrance. They retained this ancient calling, to which allusion is made in Ps. lxxxiv. 11, in connection with the new arrangements instituted by David. The post of door-keeper in the temple was assigned to two branches of the Korahite families together with one Merarite (1 Chron. xxvi. 1–19). But they also even then served as musicians in the sanctuary. Heman, one of the three precentors (to be distinguished from Heman the wise man mentioned in 1 Kings v. 11 [Engl. iv. 31]), was a Korahite (1 Chron. vi. 18–23); his fourteen sons belonged, together with the four sons of Asaph and the six sons of Ethan, to the twenty-four heads of the twenty-four divisions of the musicians (1 Chron. ch. xxv.). The Korahites were also renowned even in the days of Jehoshaphat as singers and musicians; see 2 Chron. xx. 19, where a plural בְּנֵי הַקְּרָהִים (cf. Ges. § 108, 3) is formed from בְּנֵי-קָרָה, which has as it were become smelted together as one word. Whereas in the period after the Exile there is no longer any mention of them in this character. We may therefore look for Korahitic Psalms belonging to the post-Davidic time of the kings; whereas we ought at the outset to be less inclined to find any post-exilic Psalms among them. The common feature of this circle of songs consists herein,—they delight in the praise of Elohim as the King who sits enthroned in Jerusalem, and join in the services in His temple with the tenderest and most genuine emotion. And this impress of unity which they bear speaks strongly in favour of taking לְבַנְיֵקָרָה in the sense of denoting authorship.

The composer of the מִשְׁבִּילִי, Ps. xlii., finds himself, against his will, at a great distance from the sanctuary on Zion, the resting-place of the divine presence and manifestation, surrounded by an ungodly people, who mock at him as one forsaken of God, and he comforts his sorrowful soul, looking longingly back upon that which it has lost, with the prospect of God's help which will soon appear. All the complaints and hopes that he expresses sound very much like those of David during the time of Absalom. David's yearning after the house of God in Ps. xxiii., xxvi., lv., lxiii., finds its echo here: the conduct and outlines of the enemies are also just the same; even the sojourn in the country east of Jordan agrees with David's settlement at that time at Mahanaim in the mountains of Gilead. The Korahite, however, as is to be assumed in connection with a lyric poem, speaks out of the depth of his own soul, and not, as Hengstenberg and Tholuck maintain, "as from the soul of David." He merely shares David's vexation, just as he then in lxxxiv. 10 prays for the anointed one. This Ps. lxxxiv. breathes forth the same feelings, and even in other respects bears traces of the same author; cf.  $\text{לֵךְ לַיְיָ}$ , lxxxiv. 3, xlii. 3;  $\text{מִשְׁבְּחֵי יְהוָה}$ , lxxxiv. 2, xliii. 3;  $\text{מִשְׁבְּחֵי יְהוָה}$ , lxxxiv. 4, xliii. 4; and the similar use of  $\text{יָג}$ , lxxxiv. 5, xlii. 6, cf. Isa. xlix. 20, Jer. xxxii. 15. The distinguishing features of the Korahitic type of Psalm meet us in both Psalms in the most strong and vivid manner, viz. the being joyous and weeping with God's anointed, the praise of God the King, and the yearning after the services in the holy place. And there are, it is true, thoughts that have been coined by David which we here and there distinctly hear in them (cf. xlii. 2 sq., lxxxiv. 3, with lxiii. 2); but they are reproduced with a characteristic beauty peculiar to the author himself. We do not, therefore, in the least doubt that Ps. xlii. is the poem of a Korahitic Levite, who found himself in exile beyond the Jordan among the attendants of David, his exiled king.

Concerning Ps. xliii. Eusebius has said: ὅτι μέρος ἔοικεν εἶναι τοῦ πρὸ αὐτοῦ δεδηλωταί ἕκ τε τῶν ὁμοίων ἐν ἀμφοτέροις λόγων καὶ ἐκ τῆς ἐμφεροῦς διανοίας, and an old Midrash reckons 147 Psalms, taking Ps. xlii.—xliii. together as one, just as with ix.—x., xxxii.—xxxiii. The similarity of the situation, of the general impress, of the structure, and of the refrain, is decisive in favour of these Psalms, which are commonly reckoned as two, being one. The one Psalm consists of three parts: thrice his pain breaks forth into complaint, and is each time again overcome by the admonitory voice of his higher consciousness. In the depicting of the past and the future there is unmistakable progress. And it is not until the third part (Ps. xliii.) that complaint, resignation, and hope are perfected by the language of confident prayer which supervenes. The unity of the Psalms is not affected by the repetition of xlii. 10*b* in xliii. 2*b*, since xlii. 11*b* is also a repetition of xlii. 4*b*. Beside an edging in by means of the refrain, the poet is also fond of such internal links of connection. The third part has thereby come to consist of thirteen lines, whereas the other two parts consist of twelve lines each.

What a variegated pattern card of hypotheses modern criticism opens out before us in connection with this Psalm (xlii.-xliii.)! Vaihinger regards it as a song composed by one of the Levites who was banished by Athaliah. Ewald thinks that King Jeconiah, who was carried away to Babylon, may have composed the Psalm; and in fact, when (and this is inferred from the Psalm itself) on the journey to Babylon, he may have been detained just a night in the vicinity of Hermon. Reuss (in the Nouvelle Revue de Théologie, 1858) prefers to suppose it is one of those who were carried off with Jeconiah (among whom there were also priests, as Ezekiel). Hitzig, however, is no less decisive in his view that the author is a priest who was carried off in the direction of Syria at the time of the wars of the Seleucidæ and Ptolemies; probably Onias III., high priest from 199 B.C., the collector of the Second Book of the Psalms, whom the Egyptians under the general Skopas carried away to the citadel of Paneas. Olshausen even here, as usual, makes Antiochus Epiphanes his watchword. In opposition to this positive criticism, Maurer adheres to the negative; he says: quærendo elegantissimi carminis scriptore frustra se fatigant interpretes.

Ps. xlii. 2-6. The poet compares the thirsting of his soul after God to the thirsting of a stag. אֵיל (like other names of animals is epicœne, so that there is no necessity to adopt Böttcher's emendation צִיָּאֵילַת הָעֵרֶג) is construed with a feminine predicate in order to indicate the stag (hind) as an image of the soul. עָרַג is not merely a quiet languishing, but a strong, audible thirsting or panting for water, caused by prevailing drought, lxiii. 2, Joel i. 20; the signification desiderare refers back to the primary notion of inclinare (cf. الميل, the act of inclining), for the primary meaning of the verb عَرَج is to be slanting, inclined or bent, out of which has been developed the signification of ascending and moving upwards, which is transferred in Hebrew to an upward-directed longing. Moreover, it is not with Luther (LXX., Vulgate [and authorized version]) to be rendered: as the (a) stag crieth, etc., but (and it is accented accordingly): as a stag, which, etc.  $\text{פַּיִם} = \text{פַּיִם}$  is, according to its primary signification, a watercourse holding water (vid. xviii. 16). By the addition of  $\text{מִים}$  the full and flowing watercourse is distinguished from one that is dried up.  $\text{לֵךְ}$  and  $\text{לֵךְ}$  point to the difference in the object of the longing, viz. the hind has this object beneath herself, the soul above itself; the longing of the one goes deorsum, the longing of the other sursum. The soul's longing is a thirsting  $\text{לֵךְ הַיָּיִל}$ . Such is the name here applied to God (as in lxxxiv. 3) in the sense in which flowing water is called living, as the spring or fountain of life (xxxvi. 10) from which flows forth a grace that never dries up, and which stills the thirst of the soul. The spot where this God reveals Himself to him who seeks Him is the sanctuary on Zion: when shall I come and appear in the presence of Elohim?! The expression used in the Law for the three appearances of the Israelites in the sanctuary at solemn feasts is  $\text{וַיִּרְאוּ אֱלֹהִים פְּנֵי ה'}$  or  $\text{וַיִּרְאוּ אֱלֹהִים פְּנֵי ה'}$ , Ex. xxiii. 17, xxxiv. 23. Here we find instead of this expression, in accordance with the licence of poetic brevity, the bare acc. localis (which is even used in other instances in the definition of localities, e.g. Ezek. xl. 44). Böttcher, Olshausen, and others are of opinion that  $\text{וַיִּרְאוּ אֱלֹהִים}$  in the mind of the poet is to be read  $\text{וַיִּרְאוּ אֱלֹהִים}$ , and that it has only been changed into  $\text{וַיִּרְאוּ אֱלֹהִים}$  through later religious timidity; but the avoidance of the phrase  $\text{וַיִּרְאוּ אֱלֹהִים פְּנֵי ה'}$  is explained from the fundamental assumption of the Tôra that a man could not behold God's פנים without dying, Ex. xxxiii. 20. The poet now tells us in ver. 4 what the circumstances were which drove him to such intense longing. His customary food does not revive him, tears are his daily bread, which day and night run down upon his mouth (cf. lxxx. 6, cii. 20), and that  $\text{בְּצִיָּתוֹ}$ , when say to him, viz. the speakers, all day long, i.e. continually: Where is thy God? Without cessation, these mocking words are continually heard, uttered again and again by those who are round about him, as their thoughts, as it were, in the soul of the poet. This derision, in the Psalms and in the Prophets, is always the keenest sting of pain: lxxix. 10, cxv. 2 (cf. lxxi. 11), Joel ii. 17, Mic. vii. 10.

In this gloomy present, in which he is made a mock of, as one who is forsaken of God, on account of his trust in the faithfulness of the promises, he calls to remembrance the bright and cheerful past, and he pours out his soul within him (on the עָלִי used here and further on instead of בִּי or בְּקִרְבִּי, and as distinguishing between the ego and the soul, vid. Psychol. S. 152; tr. p. 180), inasmuch as he suffers it to melt entirely away in pain (Job xxx. 16). As in lxxvii. 4, the cohortatives affirm that he yields himself up most thoroughly to this bitter-sweet remembrance and to this free outward expression of his pain. אֶלֶּה (hæcce) points forwards; the בִּי (quod) which follows opens up the expansion of this word. The futures, as expressing the object of the remembrance, state what was a habit in the time past. עָבַר frequently signifies not præterire, but, without the object that is passed over coming into consideration, porro ire. פָּקַע (a collateral form of פָּקַע), properly a thicket, is figuratively (cf. Isa. ix. 17, x. 34) an interwoven mass, a mixed multitude. The rendering therefore is: that I moved on in a dense crowd (here the distinctive Zinnor) The form אֶרְדָּם is Hithpa., as in Isa. xxxviii. 15, after the form אֶרְדָּם from the verb רָדָה, "to pass lightly and swiftly along," derived by reduplication from the root רָא (cf. רָאָה), which has the primary meaning to push, to drive (ἐλαύνειν, pousser), and in various combinations of the ר (רָא, רָאָה, רָאָה, רָאָה) expresses manifold shades of onward motion in lighter or heavier thrusts or jerks. The suffix, as in גָּרַל עָמִי = גָּרַלְתִּי, Job xxxi. 18 (Ges. § 121, 4), denotes those in reference to whom, or connection with whom, this moving onwards took place, so that consequently אֶרְדָּם includes within itself, together with the subjective notion, the transitive notion of אֶרְדָּם, for the singer of the Psalm is a Levite; as an example in support of this אֶרְדָּם, vid. 2 Chron. xx. 27 sq., cf. ver. 21. הַמִּזֶּן הַזֶּה is the apposition to the personal suffix of this אֶרְדָּם: with them, a multitude keeping holy-day. In ver. 6 the poet seeks to solace and encourage himself at this contrast of the present with the past: Why art thou thus cast down . . . (LXX. ὕνα τί περιλυπος εἶ, κ.τ.λ., cf. Matt. xxvi. 38, John xii. 27). It is the spirit which, as the stronger and more valiant part of the man, speaks to the soul as to the σκεῦος ἀσθενέστερον; the spiritual man soothes the natural man. The Hithpa. הִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה, which occurs only here and in Ps. xliii., signifies to bow one's self very low, to sit down upon the ground like a mourner (xxxv 14, xxxviii. 7), and to bend one's self downwards (xliv. 26) הָמָה (the future of which Ben-Asher here points וַתִּהְיֶינָהּ, but Ben-Naphtali וַתִּהְיֶינָהּ), to utter a deep groan, to speak quietly and mumbling to one's self. Why this gnawing and almost desponding grief? I shall yet praise Him with thanksgiving, praise יְשׁוּעוֹת פָּנָי, the ready succour of His countenance turned towards me in mercy. Such is the text handed down to us. Although it is, however, a custom with the psalmists and prophets not to express such refrainlike thoughts in exactly the same form and words (cf. xxiv. 7, 9, xlix. 13, 21, lvi. 5, 11, lix. 10, 18), nevertheless it is to be read here by a change in the division both of the words and the verses, according to ver. 12 and xliii. 5, יְשׁוּעוֹת פָּנָי וְאֵלֹהֵי, as is done by the LXX. (Cod. Alex.), Syriac, Vulgate, and most modern expositors. For the words יְשׁוּעוֹת פָּנָי, though in themselves a good enough sense (vid. e.g. xliv. 4, Isa. lxiv. 9), produce no proper closing cadence, and are not sufficient to form a line of a verse.*

Vers. 7-12. The poet here continues to console himself with God's help. God Himself is indeed dishonoured in him; He will not suffer the trust he has reposed in Him to go unjustified. True, עָלַי seems at the beginning of the line to be tame, but from עָלַי and אֲזַכְרֶךָ, the beginning and end of the line, standing in contrast, עָלַי is made emphatic, and it is at the same time clear that עָלַי is not equivalent to עַל-בְּנוֹ אִשָּׁר — which Gesenius asserts in his Lexicon, erroneously referring to i. 5, xlv. 3, is a poetical usage of the language; an assertion for which, however, there is as little support as that עַל-בְּנוֹ in Num. xiv. 43 and other passages is equivalent to עַל-בְּנוֹ. In all such passages, e.g. Jer. xlviii. 36, עָלַי means "therefore," and the relationship of reason and consequence is reversed. So even here: within him his soul is bowed very low, and on account of this downcast condition he thinks continually of God, from whom he is separated. Even in Jonah ii. 8 this thinking upon God does not appear as the cause but as the consequence of pain. The "land of Jordan and of Hermonim" is not necessarily the northern mountain range together with the sources of the Jordan. The land beyond the Jordan is so called in opposition to אֶרֶץ לְבָנוֹן, the land on this side. According to Dietrich (Abhandlungen, S. 18), הַרְמוֹנִים is an amplificative plural: the Hermon, as a peak soaring far above all lower summits. John Wilson (Lands of the Bible, ii. 161) refers the plural to its two summits. But the plural serves to denote the whole range of the Antilebanon extending to the south-east, and accordingly to designate the east Jordanic country. It is not for one moment to be supposed that the psalmist calls Hermon even, in comparison with his native Zion, the chosen of God, הַר מְצֻעַר, i.e. the mountain of littleness: the other member of the antithesis, the majesty of Zion, is wanting, and the מֶן which is repeated before הַר is also opposed to this. Hitzig, striking out the מ of מֶהַר, makes it an address to Zion: "because I remember thee out of the land of Jordan and of summits of Hermon, thou little mountain;" but, according to ver. 8, these words are addressed to Elohim. In the vicinity of Mitz'ar, a mountain unknown to us, in the country beyond Jordan, the poet is sojourning; from thence he looks longingly towards the district round about his home, and just as there, in a strange land, the wild waters of the awe-inspiring mountains roar around him, there seems to be a corresponding tumult in his soul. In ver. 8a he depicts the natural features of the country round about him—and it may remind one quite as much of the high and magnificent waterfalls of the lake of Muzérib (vid. Job, ii. 422) as of the waterfall at the source of the Jordan near Paneas and the waters that dash headlong down the mountains round about—and in ver. 8b he says that he feels just as though all these threatening masses of water were rolling like so many waves of misfortune over his head (Tholuck, Hitzig, and Riehm). Billow follows billow as if called by one another (cf. Isa. vi. 3 concerning the continuous antiphon of the seraphim) at the roar (לְקוֹלֵי as in Hab. iii. 16) of the cataracts, which in their terrible grandeur proclaim the Creator, God (LXX. τῶν καταρρακτῶν σου)—all these breaking, sporting waves of God pass over him, who finds himself thus surrounded by the mighty works of nature, but taking no delight in them; and in them all he sees nothing but the mirrored image of the many afflictions which threaten to involve him in utter destruction (cf. the borrowed passage in that mosaic work taken from the Psalms, Jon. ii. 4).

He, however, calls upon himself in ver. 9 to take courage in the hope that a morning will dawn after this night of affliction (xxx. 6), when Jahve, the God of redemption and of the people of redemption, will command His loving-kindness (cf. xliv. 5, Amos ix. 3 sq.); and when this by day has accomplished its work of deliverance, there follows upon the day of deliverance a night of thanksgiving (Job xxxv. 10): the joyous excitement, the strong feeling of gratitude, will not suffer him to sleep. The suffix of  $\text{שִׁירָה}$  is the suffix of the object: a hymn in praise of Him, prayer (viz. praiseful prayer, Hab. iii. 1) to the God of his life (cf. Sir. xxiii. 4), i.e. who is his life, and will not suffer him to come under the dominion of death. Therefore will he say ( $\text{אוֹמְרָה}$ ), in order to bring about by prayer such a day of loving-kindness and such a night of thanksgiving songs, to the God of his rock, i.e. who is his rock (gen. appos.): Why, etc.? Concerning the different accentuation of  $\text{לְמָה}$  here and in xliii. 2, vid. on xxxvii. 20 (cf. x. 1). In this instance, where it is not followed by a guttural, it serves as a "variation" (Hitzig); but even the retreating of the tone when a guttural follows is not consistently carried out, vid. xlix. 6, cf. 1 Sam. xxviii. 15 (Ew. § 243, b). The view of Vaihinger and Hengstenberg is inadmissible, viz. that vers. 10 to 11 are the "prayer," which the psalmist means in ver. 9; it is the prayerful sigh of the yearning for deliverance, which is intended to form the burthen of that prayer. In some MSS. we find the reading  $\text{בְּרִצָּח}$  instead of  $\text{בְּרִצָּח}$ ; the  $\text{בְּ}$  is here really synonymous with the  $\text{בְּ}$ , it is the Beth essentialis (vid. xxxv. 2): after the manner of a crushing (cf. Ezek. xxi. 27, and the verb in lxii. 4 of overthrowing a wall) in my bones, i.e. causing me a crushing pain which seethes in my bones, mine oppressors reproach me ( $\text{תִּרְפָּהוּ}$  with the transfer of the primary meaning carpere, as is also customary in the Latin, to a plucking and stripping one of his good name). The use of  $\text{ב}$  here differs from its use in ver. 10*b*; for the reproaching is not added to the crushing as a continuing state, but is itself thus crushing in its operation (vid. ver. 4). Instead of  $\text{בְּאִמָּר}$  we have here the easier form of expression  $\text{בְּאִמְרָם}$ ; and in the refrain  $\text{יְיָ אֱלֹהֵי פָנַי}$ , which is also to be restored in ver. 6.

Ps. xliii. 1-3. The Elohimic Judica (the introit of the so-called Cross or Passion Sunday which opens the celebritas Passionis), with which the supplicatory and plaintive first strophe of the Psalm begins, calls to mind the Jehovic Judica in vii. 9, xxvi. 1, xxxv. 1, 24: judge me, i.e. decide my cause (LXX. κρίνον με, Symmachus κρίνον μοι). רִיבָה has the tone upon the ultima before the רִיבִי which begins with the half-guttural ר, as is also the case in lxxiv. 22, cxix. 154. The second prayer runs: vindica me a gente impia; מִן standing for contra in consequence of a constr. prægnaans. לֹא־תִסְרִי is here equivalent to one practising no חֶסֶד towards men, that is to say, one totally wanting in that חֶסֶד, by which God's חֶסֶד is to be imitated and repaid by man in his conduct towards his fellow-men. There is some uncertainty whether by אִישׁ one chief enemy, the leader of all the rest, is intended to be mentioned side by side with the unloving nation, or whether the special manner of his enemies is thus merely individualized. עֲלִיָּה means roguish, mischievous conduct, utterly devoid of all sense of right. In ver. 2 the poet establishes his petition by a twofold Why. He loves God and longs after Him, but in the mirror of his present condition he seems to himself like one cast off by Him. This contradiction between his own consciousness and the inference which he is obliged to draw from his afflicted state cannot remain unsolved. אֱלֹהֵי מַעְיָי, God of my fortress, is equivalent to who is my fortress. Instead of אֱלֹהֵי we here have the form אֶתְהַלֵּךְ, of the slow deliberate gait of one who is lost in his own thoughts and feelings. The sting of his pain is his distance from the sanctuary of his God. In connection with ver. 3 one is reminded of lvii. 4 and Ex. xv. 13, quite as much as of xlii. 9. "Light and truth" is equivalent to mercy and truth. What is intended is the light of mercy or loving-kindness which is coupled with the truth of fidelity to the promises; the light, in which the will or purpose of love, which is God's most especial nature, becomes outwardly manifest. The poet wishes to be guided by these two angels of God; he desires that he may be brought (according to the Chethâb of the Babylonian text יבואני, "let come upon me;" but the אל which follows does not suit this form) to the place where his God dwells and reveals Himself. "Tabernacles" is, as in lxxxiv. 2, xlvi. 5, an amplificative designation of the tent, magnificent in itself and raised to special honour by Him who dwells therein

Vers. 4, 5. The poet, in anticipation, revels in the thought of that which he has prayed for, and calls upon his timorous soul to hope confidently for it. The cohortatives in ver. 4 are, as in xxxix. 14 and frequently, an apodosis to the petition. The poet knows no joy like that which proceeds from God, and the joy which proceeds from Him he accounts as the very highest; hence he calls God אֱלֹהֵי שִׂמְחָת גִּילִי, and therefore he knows no higher aim for his longing than again to be where the fountainhead of this exultant joy is (Hos. ix. 5), and where it flows forth in streams (xxxvi. 9). Removed back thither, he will give thanks to Him with the cithern (Beth instrum.). He calls Him אֱלֹהִים אֱלֹהֵי, an expression which, in the Elohim-Psalms, is equivalent to יהוה אֱלֹהֵי in the Jahve-Psalms. The hope expressed in ver. 4 casts its rays into the prayer in ver. 3. In ver. 5, the spirit having taken courage in God, holds this picture drawn by hope before the distressed soul, that she may therewith comfort herself. Instead of וְתִחַי, xlii. 6, the expression here used, as in xlii. 12, is וַיִּמְחַדְתִּימִי. Variations like these are not opposed to a unity of authorship.

PSALM XLIV.

A LITANY OF ISRAEL, HARD PRESSED BY THE ENEMY, AND YET FAITHFUL TO ITS GOD.

- 2 ELOHIM, with our own ears have we heard,
Our fathers have declared to us:
A work hast Thou wrought in their days, in the days of old.
- 3 Thou,—Thine own hand did drive out peoples and did plant them,
Did destroy nations and did spread them out.
- 4 For not by their own sword did they acquire the land,
And their own arm did not obtain for them the victory;
But Thy right hand, Thine arm, the light of Thy countenance, because Thou didst love them.
- 5 Thou, Thou art my King, Elohim:
Command the full salvation of Jacob!

- 6 By Thee do we push down our oppressors,
In Thy name do we tread down those who rise up against us.
- 7 For not in mine own bow do I trust,
And my sword doth not obtain for me the victory.
- 8 No indeed; Thou givest us the victory over our oppressors,
And dost put to shame those who hate us.
- 9 In Elohim do we make our boast continually,
And to Thy name will we ever give thanks. (Sela.)
- 10 Nevertheless Thou hast cast off and put us to confusion,
And wentest not forth with our armies;
- 11 Thou madest us to turn back before the oppressor,
And those who hate us spoiled just as they liked.
- 12 Thou gavest us up like sheep for consumption,
And among the heathen didst Thou scatter us,
- 13 Thou didst sell Thy people for a mere nothing,
And didst not set a high price upon them.
- 14 Thou didst make us a reproach to our neighbours,
A scorn and a derision to those who are round about us.
- 15 Thou didst make us a proverb among the heathen,
A shaking of the head among the peoples.
- 16 Continually is my confusion before me,
And the shame of my face covereth me;
- 17 Because of the voice of him who reproacheth and blasphemeth,
Because of the sight of the enemy and the revengeful.
- 18 All this is come upon us and we have not forgotten Thee,
And have not become faithless to Thy covenant.
- 19 Our heart has not turned back,
That our step should have declined from Thy path,
- 20 That Thou hast crushed us in the place of jackals,
And didst cover us with the shadow of death.
- 21 If we had forgotten the name of our God,
And stretched out our hands to a strange god:
- 22 Would not Elohim have searched it out?
For He knoweth the hidden things of the heart.

- 23 No indeed, for Thy sake are we slain continually,
We are counted as sheep for the slaughter.
- 24 Awake then, why sleepest Thou, O Lord?
Arouse Thyself, cast not off for ever!
- 25 Wherefore hidest Thou Thy face,
Why forgettest Thou our affliction and oppression?
- 26 For our soul is bowed down to the dust,
Our body cleaveth to the earth.
- 27 Oh arise for our help,
And redeem us, for Thy loving-kindness' sake.

The Korahitic Maskil Ps. xlii., with its counterpart Ps. xliii., is followed by a second, to which a place is here assigned by manifold accords with Ps. xlii.—xliii., viz. with its complaints (cf. xliv. 26 with the refrain of xliii., xlii.; xliv. 10, 24 sq. with xliii. 2, xlii. 10), and prayers (cf. xliv. 5 with xliii. 3, xlii. 9). The counterpart to this Psalm is Ps. lxxxv. Just as Ps. xlii.—xliii. and lxxxiv. form a pair, so do Ps. xliv. and lxxxv. as being Korahitic plaintive and supplicatory Psalms of a national character. Moreover, Ps. lx. by David, Ps. lxxx. by Asaph, and Ps. lxxxix. by Ethan, are nearest akin to it. In all these three there are similar lamentations over the present as contrasting with the former times and with the promise of God; but they do not contain any like expression of consciousness of innocence, a feature in which Ps. xliv. has no equal.

In this respect the Psalm seems to be most satisfactorily explained by the situation of the חסידים (saints), who under the leadership of the Maccabees defended their nationality and their religion against the Syrians and fell as martyrs by thousands. The war of that period was, in its first beginnings at least, a holy war of religion; and the nation which then went forth on the side of Jahve against Jupiter Olympius, was really, in distinction from the apostates, a people true to its faith and confession, which had to lament over God's doom of wrath in 1 Macc. i. 64, just as in this Psalm. There is even a tradition that it was a stated lamentation Psalm of the time of the Maccabees. The Levites daily ascended the pulpit (דוכן) and raised the cry of prayer: Awake, why sleepest Thou, O Lord?! These Levite criers praying for the interposition of God were called קעוררים (wakers). It is related in B. Sota 48a of Jochanan the high priest, i.e. John Hyrcanus (135–107 B.C.), that he put an end to these מעוררים, saying to them: “Doth the Deity sleep? Hath not the Scripture said: Behold the Keeper of Israel slumbereth not and sleepeth not!?” Only in a time when Israel was in distress and the peoples of the world in rest and prosperity, only in reference to such circumstances was it said: Awake, why sleepest Thou, O Lord?”

Nevertheless many considerations are opposed to the composition of the Psalm in the time of the Maccabees. We will mention only a few. In the time of the Maccabees the nation did not exactly suffer any overthrow of its “armies” (ver. 10) after having gathered up its courage: the arms of Judah, of Jonathan, and of Simon were victorious, and the one defeat to which Hitzig refers the Psalm, viz. the defeat of Joseph and Azaria against Gorgias in Jamnia (1 Macc. v. 55 sqq.), was a punishment brought upon themselves by an indiscreet enterprise. The complaints in vers. 10 sq. are therefore only partially explained by the events of that time; and since a nation is a unit and involved as a whole, it is also surprising that no mention whatever is made of the apostates. But Ewald’s reference of the Psalm to the time of the post-exilic Jerusalem is still more inadmissible; and when, in connection with this view, the question is asked, What disaster of war is then intended? no answer can be given; and the reference to the time of Jehoiachin, which Tholuck in vain endeavours to set in a more favourable light—a king who did evil in the eyes of Jahve, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9, with which the descriptions of character drawn by Jeremiah, ch. xxii. 20–30, and by Ezekiel, ch. xix., fully accord—is also inadmissible. On the other hand, the position of the Psalm in the immediate neighbourhood of Psalms belonging to the time of Jehoshaphat, and also to a certain extent its contents, favours the early part of the reign of king Joash, in which, as becomes evident from the prophecy of Joel, there was no idolatry on the part of the people to be punished, and yet there were severe afflictions of the people to be bewailed. It was then not long since the Philistines and Arabs from the neighbourhood of the Cushites had broken in upon Judah, ransacked Jerusalem and sold the captive people of Judah for a mere song to the Greeks (2 Chron. xxi. 16 sq., Joel iv. 2–8). But this reference to cotemporary history is also untenable. That unhappy event, together with others, belongs to the category of well-merited judgments, which came upon king and people in the reign of Jehoram; nor does the Psalm sound like a retrospective glance at the time of Jehoram from the standpoint of the time of Joash: the defeat of which it complains, is one that is now only just experienced.

Thus we seem consequently driven back to the time of David; and the question arises, whether the Psalm does not admit, with Ps. lx., with which it forms a twin couple, of being understood as the offspring of a similar situation, viz. of the events which resulted from the Syro-Ammonitish war. The fact that a conflict with the foes of the kingdom in the south, viz. with the Edomites, was also mixed up with the wars with the Ammonites and their Syrian allies at that period, becomes evident from lx. 1 sq. when compared with 2 Sam. viii. 13, where the words ἐπάταξε τὴν Ἰδουμαίαν (LXX.) have fallen out. Whilst David was contending with the Syrians, the Edomites came down upon the country that was denuded of troops. And from 1 Kings xi. 15 it is very evident that they then caused great bloodshed; for, according to that passage, Joab buried the slain and took fearful revenge upon the Edomites: he marched, after having slain them in the Valley of Salt, into Idumæa and there smote every male. Perhaps, with Hengstenberg, Keil, and others, the Psalm is to be explained from the position of Israel before this overthrow of the Edomites. The fact that in ver. 12 the nation complains of a dispersion among the heathen may be understood by means of a deduction from Amos i. 6, according to which the Edomites had carried on a traffic in captive Israelites. And the lofty self-consciousness, which finds expression in the Psalm, is after all best explained by the times of David; for these and the early part of the times of Solomon are the only period in the history of Israel when the nation as a whole could boast of being free and pure of all foreign influence in its worship. In the kindred Ps. lx., lxxx. (also lxxxix.), it is true this self-consciousness does not attain the same lofty expression; in this respect Ps. xl. stands perfectly alone: it is like the national mirroring of the Book of Job, and by reason of this takes a unique position in the range of Old Testament literature side by side with Lam. ch. iii. and the deutero-Isaiah. Israel's affliction, which could not possibly be of a punitive character, resembles the affliction of Job; in this Psalm, Israel stands in exactly the same relation to God as Job and the "Servant of Jahve" in Isaiah, if we except all that was desponding in Job's complaint and all that was expiatory in the affliction of the Servant of Jahve. But this very self-consciousness does somewhat approximately find expression even in lx. 6 [4]. In that passage also no distinction is made between Israel and the God-fearing ones in Israel; but the psalmist calls Israel absolutely the God-fearing ones, and the battle, in which Israel is defeated, but not without hope of final victory, is a battle for the truth.

The charge has been brought against this Psalm, that it manifests a very superficial apprehension of the nature of sin, in consequence of which the writer has been betrayed into accusing God of unfaithfulness, instead of seeking for guilt in the congregation of Israel. This judgment is unjust. The writer certainly cannot mean to disown the sins of individuals, nor even this or that transgression of the whole people. But any apostasy on the part of the nation from its God, such as could account for its rejection, did not exist at that time. The supremacy granted to the heathen over Israel is, therefore, an abnormal state of things, and for this very reason the poet, on the ground of Israel's fidelity and of God's loving-kindness, prays for speedy deliverance. A Psalm born directly out of the heart of the New Testament church would certainly sound very differently. For the New Testament church is not a national community; and both as regards the relation between the reality and idea of the church, and as regards the relation between its afflictions and the motive and design of God, the view of the New Testament church penetrates far deeper. It knows that it is God's love that makes it conformable to the passion of Christ, in order that, being crucified unto the world, it may become through suffering partaker of the glory of its Lord and Head.

Vers. 2-4. The poet opens with a tradition coming down from the time of Moses and of Joshua which they have heard with their own ears, in order to demonstrate the vast distance between the character of the former times and the present, just as Asaph, also, in lxxviii. 3, appeals not to the written but to the spoken word. That which has been heard follows in the oratio directa. Ver. 3 explains what kind of "work" is intended: it is the granting of victory over the peoples of Canaan, the work of God for which Moses prays in xc. 16. Concerning  $\text{קָרַן}$ , vid. on iii. 5, xvii. 14. The position of the words here, as in lxix. 11, lxxxiii. 19, leads one to suppose that  $\text{קָרַן}$  is treated as a permutative of  $\text{קָרַן}$ , and consequently in the same case with it. The figure of "planting" (after Ex. xv. 17) is carried forward in  $\text{וַתִּשְׁלַחַם}$ ; for this word means to send forth far away, to make wide-branching, a figure which is wrought up in Ps. lxxx. It was not Israel's own work, but ( $\text{קָרַן}$ , no indeed, for [Germ. nein, denn] = imo) God's work: "Thy right hand and Thine arm and the light of Thy countenance," they it was which brought Israel salvation, i.e. victory. The combination of synonyms  $\text{יְמִינֶךָ וְיָדְךָ}$  is just as in lxxiv. 11, Sir. xxxiii. 7,  $\chi\epsilon\iota\rho\alpha\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \beta\rho\alpha\chi\iota\omicron\nu\alpha\ \delta\epsilon\chi\iota\omicron\nu\omicron\nu$ , and is explained by both the names of the members of the body as applied to God being only figures: the right hand being a figure for energetic interposition, and the arm for an effectual power that carries through the thing designed (cf. e.g. lxxvii. 16, Isa. liii. 1), just as the light of His countenance is a figure for His loving-kindness which lights up all darkness. The final cause was His purpose of love: for (inasmuch as) Thou wast favourable to them ( $\text{רָצִיתָ}$  as in lxxxv. 2). The very same thought, viz. that Israel owes the possession of Canaan to nothing but Jahve's free grace, runs all through Deut. ch. ix.

Vers. 5-9. Out of the retrospective glance at the past, so rich in mercy, springs up (ver. 5) the confident prayer concerning the present, based upon the fact of the theocratic relationship which began in the time of the deliverance wrought under Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 5). In the substantival clause  $\text{אֲתָהּ הוּא, הוּא מְלִכִי}$  is neither logical copula nor predicate (as in cii. 28, Deut. xxxii. 39, there equivalent to  $\text{אֲתָהּ הוּא אֱלֹהֵי}$ , cf. 1 Chron. xxi. 17), but an expressive resumption of the subject, as in Isa. xliii. 25, Jer. xlix. 12, Neh. ix. 6 sq., Ezra v. 11, and in the frequently recurring expression  $\text{יְהוָה הוּא הָאֱלֹהִים}$ ; it is therefore to be rendered: Thou—He who (such an one) is my King. May He therefore, by virtue of His duty as king which He has voluntarily taken upon Himself, and of the kingly authority and power indwelling in Him, command the salvation of Jacob, full and entire (xviii. 51, liii. 7).  $\text{יְצַדֵּק}$  as in xlii. 9. Jacob is used for Israel just as Elohim is used instead of Jahve. If Elohim, Jacob's King, now turns graciously to His people, they will again be victorious and invincible, as ver. 6 affirms.  $\text{יָצַד$  with reference to  $\text{קֶרֶן}$  as a figure and emblem of strength, as in lxxxix. 25 and frequently;  $\text{קָמִינִי}$  equivalent to  $\text{קָמִים עָלַיִנִי}$ . But only in the strength of God ( $\text{בְּדָ}$  as in xviii. 30); for not in my bow do I trust, etc., ver. 7. This teaching Israel has gathered from the history of the former times; there is no bidding defiance with the bow and sword and all the carnal weapons of attack, but Thou, etc., ver. 8. This "Thou" in  $\text{הוֹשִׁיעָה־נִי}$  is the emphatic word; the preterites describe facts of experience belonging to history. It is not Israel's own might that gives them the supremacy, but God's gracious might in Israel's weakness. Elohim is, therefore, Israel's glory or pride: "In Elohim do we praise," i.e. we glory or make our boast in Him; cf.  $\text{הִלַּל עַל}$ , x. 3. The music here joins in after the manner of a hymn. The Psalm here soars aloft to the more joyous height of praise, from which it now falls abruptly into bitter complaint.

Vers. 10-13. Just as  $\text{אֲנִי}$  signifies imo vero (lviii. 3) when it comes after an antecedent clause that is expressly or virtually a negative, it may mean "nevertheless,  $\delta\mu\omega\varsigma$ ," when it opposes a contrastive to an affirmative assertion, as is very frequently the case with  $\text{אֲנִי}$  or  $\text{אֲנִי}$ . True, it does not mean this in itself, but in virtue of its logical relation: we praise Thee, we celebrate Thy name unceasingly—also (= nevertheless) Thou hast cast off. From this point the Psalm comes into closest connection with Ps. lxxxix. 39, on a still more extended scale, however, with Ps. lx., which dates from the time of the Syro-Ammonitish war, in which Psalm ver. 10 recurs almost word for word. The  $\text{צְבָאוֹת}$  are not exactly standing armies (an objection which has been raised against the Maccabean explanation), they are the hosts of the people that are drafted into battle, as in Ex. xii. 41, the hosts that went forth out of Egypt. Instead of leading these to victory as their victorious Captain (2 Sam. v. 24), God leaves them to themselves and allows them to be smitten by the enemy. The enemy spoil  $\text{לָמְד}$ , i.e. just as they like, without meeting with any resistance, to their hearts' content. And whilst He gives over (נתן) as in Mic. v. 2, and the first יתן in Isa. xli. 2) one portion of the people as "sheep appointed for food," another becomes a diaspora or dispersion among the heathen, viz. by being sold to them as slaves, and that בלא-הון, "for not-riches," i.e. for a very low price, a mere nothing. We see from Joel iv. [iii.] 3 in what way this is intended. The form of the litotes is continued in ver. 13b: Thou didst not go high in the matter of their purchase-money; the rendering of Maurer is correct: in statuendis pretiis eorum. The ב is in this instance not the Beth of the price as in ver. 13a, but, as in the phrase הַלֵּל בְּ, the Beth of the sphere and thereby indirectly of the object. רָבָה in the sense of the Aramaic רַבֵּי (cf. Prov. xxii. 16, and the derivatives הַרְבִּית, מַרְבִּית), to make a profit, to practise usury (Hupfeld), produces a thought that is unworthy of God; vid. on the other hand, Isa. lii. 3. At the head of the strophe stands (ver. 10a) a perfect with an aorist following; וְלֹא תִצַּח is consequently a negative וְתִצַּח. And ver. 18, which sums up the whole, shows that all the rest is also intended to be retrospective.

Vers. 14-17. To this defeat is now also added the shame that springs out of it. A distinction is made between the neighbouring nations, or those countries lying immediately round about Israel (סְבִיבוֹת, as in the exactly similar passage lxxix. 4, cf. lxxx. 7, which closely resembles it), and the nations of the earth that dwell farther away from Israel. מִשָּׁל is here a jesting, taunting proverb, and one that holds Israel up as an example of a nation undergoing chastisement (vid. Hab. ii. 6). The shaking of the head is, as in xxii. 8, a gesture of malicious astonishment. In נִגְדֵי תָמִיד (as in xxxviii. 18) we have both the permanent aspect or look and the perpetual consciousness. Instead of "shame covers my face," the expression is "the shame of my face covers me," i.e. it has overwhelmed my entire inward and outward being (cf. concerning the radical notions of בֹּשֶׁשׁ, vi. 11, and הָפִיר, xxxiv. 6). The juxtaposition of "enemy and revengeful man" has its origin in viii. 3. In ver. 17 מְקוֹל and מְפִי alternate; the former is used of the impression made by the jeering voice, the other of the impression produced by the enraged mien.

Vers. 18-22. If Israel compares its conduct towards God with this its lot, it cannot possibly regard it as a punishment that it has justly incurred. Construed with the accusative, בוא signifies, as in xxxv. 8, xxxvi. 12, to come upon one, and more especially of an evil lot and of powers that are hostile. שָׁקַר, to lie or deceive, with בְּ of the object on whom the deception or treachery is practised, as in lxxxix. 34. In ver. 19b אֲשִׁירָא is construed as fem., exactly as in Job xxxi. 7; the fut. consec. is also intended as such (as e.g. in Job iii. 10, Num. xvi. 14): that our step should have declined from, etc.; inward apostasy is followed by outward wandering and downfall. This is therefore not one of the many instances in which the לְ of one clause also has influence over the clause that follows (Ges. § 152, 3). כִּי, ver. 20, has the sense of quod: we have not revolted against Thee, that Thou shouldest on that account have done to us the thing which is now befallen us. Concerning תַּנִּים vid. Isa. xiii. 22. A "place of jackals" is, like a habitation of dragons (Jer. x. 22), the most lonesome and terrible wilderness; the place chosen was, according to this, an inhospitable מִדְבָּר, far removed from the dwellings of men. בְּפֶה is construed with עַל of the person covered, and with בְּ of that with which (1 Sam. xix. 13) he is covered: Thou coveredst us over with deepest darkness (vid. xxiii. 4). אִם, ver. 21, is not that of asseveration (verily we have not forgotten), but, as the interrogatory apodosis ver. 22a shows, conditional: if we have (= should have) forgotten. This would not remain hidden from Him who knoweth the heart, for the secrets of men's hearts are known to Him. Both the form and matter here again strongly remind one of Job ch. xxxi., more especially ver. 4; cf. also on תַּעֲלָמוֹת, Job xi. 6, xxviii. 11.

Vers. 23-27. The church is not conscious of any apostasy, for on the contrary it is suffering for the sake of its fidelity. Such is the meaning intended by כִּי, ver. 23 (cf. xxxvii. 20). The emphasis lies on עָלֶיךָ, which is used exactly as in lxix. 8. Paul, in Rom. viii. 36, transfers this utterance to the sufferings of the New Testament church borne in witnessing for the truth, or I should rather say he considers it as a divine utterance corresponding as it were prophetically to the sufferings of the New Testament church, and by anticipation, coined concerning it and for its use, inasmuch as he cites it with the words καθὼς γέγραπται. The suppliant cries עֲזֶרְךָ and הִקְצֵה are Davidic, and found in his earlier Psalms, vii. 7, xxxv. 23, lix. 5 sq., cf.

lxxviii. 65. God is said to sleep when He does not interpose in whatever is taking place in the outward world here below ; for the very nature of sleep is a turning in into one's own self from all relationship to the outer world, and a resting of the powers which act outwardly. The writer of our Psalm is fond of couplets of synonyms like עָנִינוּ וְלֹהֲצֵנוּ in ver. 25 ; cf. ver. 4, יִמְיִנֶה וְזִרְעֶה. Ps. cxix. 25 is an echo of ver. 26. The suppliant cry קוֹמָה (in this instance in connection with the עוֹרְתָה which follows, it is to be accented on the ultima) is Davidic, iii. 8, vii. 7 ; but originally it is Mosaic. Concerning the ah of עוֹרְתָה, here as also in lxiii. 8 of like meaning with לְעוֹרְתִי, xxii. 20, and frequently, vid. on iii. 3.

PSALM XLV.

MARRIAGE SONG IN HONOUR OF THE PEERLESS KING.

- 2 MY heart overflows with goodly speech,
I say to myself : " My production is concerning a king,"
My tongue is the pen of a quick writer.
- 3 With beauty art thou arrayed beyond the children of men,
Gracefulness is shed upon thy lips ;
Therefore hath Elohim blessed thee for ever.
- 4 Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O mighty one,
Thy brightness and thy majesty.
- 5 And in thy majesty press through, ride on,
For the sake of truth and of the suffering of innocence,
And thy right hand shall teach thee terrible deeds.
- 6 Thine arrows are sharp,—peoples shall fall under thee,—
In the heart of the king's enemies !
- 7 Thy throne, Elohim, endureth for ever and ever,
An upright sceptre is the sceptre of thy kingdom.
- 8 Loving righteousness, thou hatest wickedness ;
Therefore hath Elohim thy God anointed thee
With the oil of joy above thy fellows.

- 9 Myrrh and aloes, cassia are all thy garments;
 Out of ivory palaces doth the music of stringed instruments make thee glad.
- 10 Kings' daughters are among thy beloved ones,
 The queen hath set herself at thy right hand
 In ornaments of gold of Ophir.
- 11 Hearken, O daughter, and see and incline thine ear,
 And forget thine own people and thy father's house;
- 12 And if the king desireth thy beauty,—
 For he is thy Lord,—then do thou do homage to him.
- 13 And the daughter of Tyre, with gifts shall they conciliate thy face,
 The richest among the peoples.
- 14 All glory is the king's daughter in the inner chamber,
 Of gold-woven textures is her clothing.
- 15 In variegated embroidered garments is she escorted to the king;
 Virgins after her, her companions,
 Are brought unto thee—
- 16 They are escorted with joy and exultation,
 They enter into the king's palace.—
- 17 Instead of thy fathers shall be thy sons,
 Thou shalt set them as princes in all lands.
- 18 Thy name will I remember in every generation,
 Therefore shall the peoples praise thee for ever and ever.

To a Korahitic Maskil is appended a song of the same name, and likewise bearing a royal impress after the style of the Korahitic productions. But whilst in xlv. 5 the words "Thou, Thou art my King, Elohim," are addressed in prayer to the God of Israel, in this Psalm the person of the king who is celebrated is a matter of doubt and controversy. The Epistle to the Hebrews (ch. i. 8) proceeds on the assumption that it is the future Christ, the Son of God. It is supported in this view by a tradition of the ancient synagogue, in accordance with which the Targumist renders ver. 3, "Thy beauty, O King Messiah, is greater than that of the children of men." This Messianic interpretation must be very ancient. Just as Ezek. xxi. 32 refers back to שִׁלָּה, Gen. xlix. 10, אֵל גְּבוּר among the names of the Messiah in Isa. ix. 5 (cf. Zech. xii. 8) refers back in a similar manner to Ps. xlv. And whilst the reception of the Song of Songs into the canon admits of being understood even without the assumption of any prophetically allegorical meaning in it, the reception of this Psalm without any such assumption is unintelligible. But this prophetically Messianic sense is therefore not the original meaning of the Psalm. The Psalm is a poem composed for some special occasion the motive of which is some cotemporary event. The king whom it celebrates was a cotemporary of the poet. If, however, it was a king belonging to David's family, then he was a possessor of a kingship to which were attached, according to 2 Sam. ch. vii., great promises extending into the unlimited future, and on which, consequently, hung all the prospects of the future prosperity and glory of Israel; and the poet is therefore fully warranted in regarding him in the light of the Messianic idea, and the church is also fully warranted in referring the song, which took its rise in some passing occasion, as a song for all ages, to the great King of the future, the goal of its hope. Moreover, we find only such poems of an occasional and individual character received into the Psalter, as were adapted to remain in constant use by the church as prayers and spiritual songs.

With respect to the historical occasion of the song, we adhere to the conjecture advanced in our commentary on Canticles and on the Epistle to the Hebrews, viz. that it was composed in connection with the marriage of Joram of Judah with Athaliah. The reference to the marriage of Ahab of Israel with Jezebel of Tyre, set forth by Hitzig, is at once set aside by the fact that the poet idealizes the person celebrated, as foreshadowing the Messiah, in a way that can only be justified in connection with a Davidic king. It could more readily be Solomon the king of Israel, whose appearance was fair as that of a woman, but majestic as that of a hero.* Even to the present day several interpreters† explain the Psalm of Solomon's marriage with the daughter of Pharaoh; but the entire absence of any mention of Egypt is decisive against this view. Hence Hupfeld imagines a daughter of Hiram to be the bride, by reference to the Zidonian Ashtôreth which is mentioned among Solomon's strange gods (1 Kings xi. 5, 33). But the fact that the king here celebrated is called upon to go forth to battle, is also strange, whilst the glory of Solomon consists in his being, in accordance with his name, the Prince of Peace, or אִישׁ מְנוּחָה, 1 Chron. xxii. 9. Further, the wish is expressed for him that he may have children who shall take the place of his ancestors: Solomon, however, had a royal father, but not royal fathers; and there is the less ground for any retrospective reference to the princes of Judah as Solomon's ancestors (which Kurtz inclines to), since of these only one, viz. Nabshon, occurs among the ancestry of David.

All this speaks against Solomon, but just with equal force in favour of Joram, as being the king celebrated. This Joram is the son of Jehoshaphat, the second Solomon of the Israelitish history. He became king even during the lifetime of his pious father, under whom the Salomonic prosperity of Israel was revived (cf. 2 Chron. xviii. 1 with xxi. 3, 2 Kings viii. 16, and Winer's Realwörterbuch under Jehoram); he was also married to Athaliah during his father's lifetime; and it is natural, that just at that time, when Judah had again attained to the height of the glory of the days of Solomon, the highest hopes should be gathered around these nuptials. This explains the name שָׁנַל which the queen bears,—a name that is elsewhere Chaldean (Dan. v. 2 sq.) and Persian (Neh. ii. 6), and is more North-Palestinian* than Jewish; for Athaliah sprang from the royal family of Tyre, and was married by Joram out of the royal family of Israel. If she is the queen, then the exhortation to forget her people and her father's house has all the greater force. And it becomes intelligible why the homage of Tyre in particular, and only of Tyre, is mentioned. The Salomonic splendour of Asiatic perfumes and costly things is thus quite as easily explained as by referring the Psalm to Solomon. For even Jehoshaphat had turned his attention to foreign wares, more especially Indian gold; he even prepared a fleet for the purpose of going to Ophir, but, ere it started, it was wrecked in the harbour of Ezion-geber (1 Kings xxii. 48-50, 2 Chron. xx. 35 sqq.). And Solomon, it is true, had a throne of ivory (1 Kings x. 18), and the Salomonic Song of Songs (vii. 5) makes mention of a tower of ivory; but he had no ivory palace; whereas the mention of הַיְקֵל־יִשָּׁן in our Psalm harmonizes surprisingly with the fact that Ahab, the father of Athaliah, built a palace of ivory (בַּיִת־יִשָּׁן), which the Book of Kings, referring to the annals, announces as something especially worthy of note, 1 Kings xxii. 39 (cf. Amos iii. 15, בַּיִתִּי הָיָה יִשָּׁן).

But why should not even Joram, at a crisis of his life so rich in hope, have been a type of the Messiah? His name is found in the genealogy of Jesus Christ, Matt. i. 8. Joram and Athaliah are among the ancestors of our Lord. This significance in relation to the history of redemption is still left them, although they have not realized the good wishes expressed by the poet at the time of their marriage, just as in fact Solomon also began in the spirit and ended in the flesh. Joram and Athaliah have themselves cut away all reference of the Psalm to them by their own godlessness. It is with this Psalm just as it is with the twelve thrones upon which, according to the promise, Matt. xix. 28, the twelve apostles shall sit and judge the twelve tribes of Israel. This promise was uttered even in reference to Judas Iscariot. One of the twelve seats belonged to him, but he has fallen away from it. Matthias became heir to the throne of Judas Iscariot, and who has become the heir to the promises in this Psalm? All the glorious things declared in the Psalm depend upon this as the primary assumption, as essential to their being a blessing and being realized, viz. that the king whom it celebrates should carry out the idea of the theocratic kingship. To the Old Testament prophecy and hope, more especially since the days of Isaiah, the Messiah, and to the New Testament conception of the fulfilment of prophecy Jesus Christ, is the perfected realization of this idea.

The inscription runs: To the Precentor, upon Lilies, by the Benê-Korah, a meditation, a song of that which is lovely. Concerning Maskîl, vid. on xxxii. 1. שִׁשָּׁן is the name for the (sixleafed) lily,* that is wide-spread in its use in the East; it is not the (five-leafed) rose, which was not transplanted into Palestine until a much later period. In על־שִׁשְׁנַיִם Hengstenberg sees a symbolical reference to the “lovely brides” mentioned in the Psalm. Luther, who renders it “concerning the roses,” understands it to mean the rosæ futuræ of the united church of the future. We would rather say, with Bugenhagen, Joh. Gerhard, and other old expositors, “The heavenly Bridegroom and the spiritual bride, they are the two roses or lilies that are discoursed of in this Psalm.” But the meaning of על־שִׁשְׁנַיִם must be such as will admit of the inscribed על־שִׁשְׁנַיִם עֲדוּת, lx. 1, and אֶל־שִׁשְׁנַיִם עֲדוּת (which is probably all one expression notwithstanding the Athnach), lxxx. 1, being understood after the analogy of it. The preposition על (אֶל) forbids our thinking of a musical instrument, perhaps lily-shaped bells.† There must therefore have been some well-known popular song, which began with the words “A lily is the testimony . . .” or “Lilies are the testimonies (עֲדוּת) . . .;” and the Psalm is composed and intended to be sung after the melody of this song in praise of the Tōra.‡ It is questionable whether יְדִירָת (Origen ιδιδωθ, Jerome ididoth) in the last designation of the Psalm is to be taken as a collateral form of יְדִירָת (love, and metonymically an object of love, Jer. xii. 7), or whether we are to explain it after the analogy of צְהוּת, Isa. xxxii. 4, and נְבָחוּת, Isa. xxvi. 10: it is just on this neuter use of the plur. fem. that the interchange which sometimes occurs of ôth with ûth in an abstract signification (Ew. § 165, c) is based. In the former case it ought to be rendered a song of love (Aquila ἄσμα προσφιλίας); in the latter, a song of that which is beloved, i.e. lovely, or lovable, and this is the more natural rendering. The adjective יְדִירָת signified beloved, or even (lxxxiv. 2) lovable. It is things that are loved, because exciting love, therefore lovely,

* This name is also ancient Egyptian, vid. the Book of the Dead, lxxxi. 2: nuk seshni pir am t.ah-en-Phrā, i.e. I am a lily, sprung from the fields of the sun-god.

† Vide C. Jessen, On the lily of the Bible, in Hugo von Mohl's Botanische Zeitung, 1861, No. 12. Thrupp in his Introduction (1860) also understands על־שִׁשְׁנַיִם to mean cymbals in the form of a lily.

‡ The point of comparison, then, to adopt the language of Gregory of Nyssa, is τὸ λαμπρὸν τε καὶ χιονῶδες εἶδος of the lily.

most pleasing things, which, as שִׁיר יִירֶדֶת says, form the contents of the song. שִׁיר יִירֶדֶת does not signify a marriage-song; this would be called שִׁיר הַחֲתָנָה (cf. xxx. 1). Nor does it signify a secular erotic song, instead of which the expression שִׁיר עֲנָבִים, Ezek. xxxiii. 32, or even (after Ezek. xvi. 8 and other passages) שִׁיר דְּוָדִים, would have been used. שִׁיר יִירֶדֶת is a noble word, and used of holy love.

Vers. 2, 3. The verb רָחַשׁ, as מְרַחֶשֶׁת shows, signifies originally to bubble up, boil, and is used in the dialects generally of excited motion and lively excitement; it is construed with the accusative after the manner of verbs denoting fulness, like the synonymous נָבַע, cxix. 171 (cf. Talmudic תְּרַחֵשׁ רִנּוֹת, let thy tongue overflow with songs of praise). Whatever the heart is full of, with that the mouth overflows; the heart of the poet gushes over with a "good word." דְּבַר is a matter that finds utterance and is put into the form of words; and טוֹב describes it as good with the collateral idea of that which is cheerful, pleasing, and rich in promise (Isa. lii. 7, Zech. i. 13). The fact that out of the fulness and oppression of his heart so good a word springs forth, arises from the subject in which now his whole powers of mind are absorbed: I am saying or thinking (אֲנִי pausal form by Dechi, in order that the introductory formula may not be mistaken), i.e. my purpose is: מַעֲשֵׂי לְמִלְכָּה, my works or creations (not sing., but plur., just as also מִקְנֵי in Ex. xvii. 3, Num. xx. 19, where the connection leads one to expect the plural) shall be dedicated to the king; or even: the thought completely fills me, quite carries me away, that they concern or have reference to the king. In the former case לְמִלְכָּה dispenses with the article because it is used after the manner of a proper name (as in xxi. 2, lxxii. 1); in the latter, because the person retires before the office or dignity belonging to it: and this we, in common with Hitzig, prefer on account of the self-conscious and reflecting אָמַר by which it is introduced. He says to himself that it is a king to whom his song refers; and this lofty theme makes his tongue so eloquent and fluent that it is like the style of a γραμματεὺς ὀξύγραφος. Thus it is correctly rendered by the LXX.; whereas סוֹפֵר מְהִיר as an epithet applied to Ezra (ch. vii. 6) does not denote a rapid writer, but a learned or skilled scribe.

Rapidly, like the style of an agile writer, does the tongue of the poet move; and it is obliged to move thus rapidly because of the thoughts and words that flow forth to it out of his heart. The chief thing that inspires him is the beauty of the king. The form  $\text{תְּפִיפִי}$ , which certainly ought to have a passive sense (Aquila  $\kappa\acute{\alpha}\lambda\lambda\epsilon\iota \acute{\epsilon}\kappa\alpha\lambda\lambda\acute{\iota}\omega\theta\eta\varsigma$ ), cannot be explained as formed by reduplication of the first two radicals of the verb  $\text{תִּפֵּי}$  ( $\text{תִּפֵּ}$ ); for there are no examples to be found in support of quinqueliterals thus derived. What seems to favour this derivation is this, that the legitimately formed Pealal  $\text{תִּפֵּי}$  (cf. the adjective  $\text{תִּפְּיָהּ} = \text{תִּפֵּי}$ , Jer. xli. 20) is made passive by a change of vowels in a manner that is altogether peculiar, but still explicable in connection with this verb, which is a twofold weak verb. The meaning is: Thou art beyond compare beautifully fashioned, or endowed with beauty beyond the children of men. The lips are specially singled out from among all the features of beauty in him. Over his lips is poured forth, viz. from above,  $\text{יָן}$  (gracefulness or benevolence), inasmuch as, even without his speaking, the form of his lips and each of their movements awakens love and trust; it is evident, however, that from such lips, full of  $\chi\acute{\alpha}\rho\iota\varsigma$ , there must proceed also  $\lambda\acute{o}\gamma\omicron\iota \tau\eta\varsigma \chi\acute{\alpha}\rho\iota\tau\omicron\varsigma$  (Luke iv. 22, Eccles. x. 12). In this beauty of the king and this charm of his lips the psalmist sees a manifestation of the everlasting blessing of God, that is perceptible to the senses. It is not to be rendered: because Elohim hath blessed thee for ever. The assertion that  $\text{עַל־כֵּן}$  is used in some passages for  $\text{עַל־כֵּן אֲשֶׁר}$  cannot be proved (vid. on xlii. 7). But the meaning of the psalmist is, moreover, not that the king, because he is so fair and has such gracious lips, is blessed of God. If this were the idea, then the noble moral qualities of which the beauty of this king is the transparent form, ought to be more definitely expressed. Thus personally conceived, as it is here, beauty itself is a blessing, not a ground for blessing. The fact of the matter is this, beauty is denoted by  $\text{עַל־כֵּן}$  as a reason for the blessing being known or recognised, not as a reason why the king should be blessed. From his outward appearance it is at once manifest that the king is one who is blessed by God, and that blessed for ever. The psalmist could not but know that "grace is deceitful and beauty vain" (Prov. xxxi. 30), therefore the beauty of this king was in his eyes more than mere earthly beauty; it appears to him in the light of a celestial transfiguration, and for this very reason as an imperishable gift, in which there becomes manifest an unlimited endless blessing.

Vers. 4-6. In the ever blessed one the greatest strength and vigour are combined with the highest beauty. He is a hero. The praise of his heroic strength takes the form of a summons to exert it and aid the good in obtaining the victory over evil. Brightness and majesty, as the objects to הַגִּיּוֹר, alternating with the sword, are not in apposition to this which is their instrument and symbol (Hengstenberg), but permutatives, inasmuch as הַגִּיּוֹר is zeugmatically referable to both objects: the king is (1) to gird himself with his sword, and (2) to surround himself with his kingly, God-like doxa. הוֹרֵרֵי הַיּוֹד is the brilliancy of the divine glory (xcvi. 6), of which the glory of the Davidic kingship is a reflection (xxi. 6); mentioned side by side with the sword, it is, as it were, the panoply that surrounds the king as bright armour. In ver. 5 והֵרֵךְ, written accidentally a second time, is probably to be struck out, as Olshausen and Hupfeld are of opinion. Hitzig points it וְהֵרֵךְ, "and step forth;" but this is not Hebrew. As the text runs, wa-hadārcha (with Legarme preceded by Illuj, vid. Accentsystem xiii. § 8c, 9) looks as though it were repeated out of ver. 4 in the echo-like and interlinked style that we frequently find in the songs of degrees, e.g. cxxi. 1, 2; and in fact repeated as an accusative of more exact definition (in the same bold manner as in xvii. 13, 14) to צִלָּח, which, like صلح, starting from the primary notion of cleaving, breaking through, pressing forward, comes to have the notion of carrying anything through prosperously, of being successful, pervadere et bene procedere (cf. the corresponding development of signification in افلح, افلح), and, according to Ges. § 142, rem. 1, gives to רִכַּב the adverbial notion of that which is effectual (victorious) or effective and successful. We cannot determine whether רִכַּב is here intended to say veli curru or veli equo; but certainly not upon a mule or an ass (1 Kings i. 44, Zech. ix. 9), which are the beasts ridden in a time of peace. The king going forth to battle either rides in a war-chariot (like Ahab and Jehoshaphat, 1 Kings ch. xxii.), or upon a war-horse, as in Apoc. xix. 11

the Logos of God is borne upon a white horse. That which he is to accomplish as he rides forth in majesty is introduced by עַל־דְּבַר (for the sake of, on account of), which is used just as in lxxix. 9, 2 Sam. xviii. 5. The combination עֲנָה צָדִיק is very similar to עֲרִיה־בִּשְׁת, Mic. i. 11 (nakedness-ignominy = ignominious nakedness), if עֲנָה = עֲנָה is to be taken as the name of a virtue. The two words are then the names of virtues, like אֱמֶת (truth = veracity, which loves and practises that which is true and which is hostile to lying, falseness, and dissimulation); and whereas עֲנָה צָדִיק would signify meek righteousness, and עֲנִית צָדִיק, righteous meekness, this conjunction standing in the middle between an addition and an asyndeton denotes meekness and righteousness as twin-sisters and reciprocally pervasive. The virtues named, however, stand for those who exemplify them and who are in need of help, on whose behalf the king is called upon to enter the strife: the righteous, if they are at the same time עֲנִיִּים (עֲנִיִּים), are doubly worthy and in need of his help. Nevertheless another explanation of עֲנָה presents itself, and one that is all the more probable as occurring just in this Psalm which has such a North-Palestinian colouring. The observation, that North-Palestinian writers do not always point the construct state with ath, in favour of which Hitzig, on lxviii. 29, wrongly appeals to Hos. x. 6, Job xxxix. 13, but rightly to Judg. vii. 8, viii. 32 (cf. Deut. xxxiii. 4, 27), is perfectly correct. Accordingly עֲנָה may possibly be equivalent to עֲנִית, but not in the signification business, affair = עֲנִיָּה, parallel with דְּבַר, but in the signification afflictio (after the form רַעֲוִיָּה, Ezek. xxviii. 17); so that it may be rendered: in order to put a stop to the oppression of righteousness or the suffering of innocence. The jussive וְתוֹרָה, like וְיָתֵאוּ in ver. 12, begins the apodosis of a hypothetical protasis that is virtually there (Ew. § 347, b): so shall thy right hand teach thee, i.e. lead thee forth and cause thee to see terrible things, i.e. awe-inspiring deeds. But in ver. 6 both summons and desire pass over into the expression of a sure and hopeful prospect and a vision, in which that which is to be is present to the mind: thine arrows are sharpened, and therefore deadly to those whom they hit; peoples shall fall (יִפְּלוּ)* under thee, i.e. so that thou passest over them as they lie upon the ground; in the heart of the enemies of the king, viz. they (i.e. the arrows) will stick. The harsh ellipse is explained by the fact of the poet having the scene of battle before his mind as though he were an eye-witness of it. The words "in the heart of the king's enemies" are an exclamation accompanied by a pointing with the finger. Thither, he means to say, those sharp arrows fly and smite. Crusius' explanation is similar, but it goes further than is required: apostrophe per prosopopœiam directa ad sagittas quasi jubens, quo tendere debeant. We are here reminded of cx. 2, where a similar קָרָב occurs in a prophetic-messianic connection. Moreover, even according to its reference to cotemporary history the whole of this strophe sounds Messianic. The poet desires that the king whom he celebrates may rule and triumph after the manner of the Messiah; that he may succour truth and that which is truly good, and overcome the enmity of the world, or, as Ps. ii. expresses it, that the God-anointed King of Zion may shatter everything that rises up in opposition with an iron sceptre. This anointed One, however, is not only the Son of David, but also of God. He is called absolutely בָּר, ó υἱός. Isaiah calls Him, even in the cradle, אֱלֹהֵי בִּבְרִי, ch. ix. 5, cf. x. 21. We shall not, therefore, find it to be altogether intolerable, if the poet now addresses him as אֱלֹהֵיִם, although the picture thus far sketched is thoroughly human in all its ideality.

* It is not יִפְּלוּ; for the pause falls upon שְׁנֵנִים, and the Athnach of

Vers. 7, 8. In order to avoid the addressing of the king with the word Elohim, ver. 6a has been interpreted, (1) "Thy throne of God is for ever and ever,"—a rendering which is grammatically possible, and, if it were intended to be expressed, must have been expressed thus (Nagelsbach, § 64, g); (2) "Thy throne is God (=divine) for ever and ever;" but it cannot possibly be so expressed after the analogy of "the altar of wood = wooden" (cf. ver. 9), or "the time is showers of rain = rainy" (Ezra x. 13), since God is neither the substance of the throne, nor can the throne itself be regarded as a representation or figure of God: in this case the predicative Elohim would require to be taken as a genitive for כִּסֵּא אֱלֹהִים, which, however, cannot possibly be supported in Hebrew by any syntax, not even by 2 Kings xxiii. 17, cf. Ges. § 110, 2, b. Accordingly one might adopt the first mode of interpretation, which is also commended by the fact that the earthly throne of the theocratic king is actually called כִּסֵּא יְהוָה in 1 Chron. xxix. 23. But the sentence "thy throne of God is an everlasting one" sounds tautological, inasmuch as that which the predicate asserts is already implied in the subject; and we have still first of all to try whether אֱלֹהִים cannot, with the LXX. ὁ θρόνος σου, ὁ Θεός, εἰς αἰῶνα αἰῶνος, be taken as a vocative. Now, since before everything else God's throne is eternal (x. 16, Lam. v. 19), and a love of righteousness and a hatred of evil is also found elsewhere as a description of divine holiness (v. 5, Isa. lxi. 8), אֱלֹהִים would be obliged to be regarded as addressed to God, if language addressed to the king did not follow with עַל־יְנִי. But might אֱלֹהִים by any possibility be even addressed to the king who is here celebrated? It is certainly true that the custom with the Elohim-Psalms of using Elohim as of equal dignity with Jahve is not favourable to this supposition; but the following surpassing of the אֱלֹהִים by אֱלֹהֵיךְ renders it possible. And since elsewhere earthly authorities are also called אֱלֹהִים, Ex. xxi. 6, xxii. 7 sq., Ps. lxxxii., cf. cxxxviii. 1, because they are God's representatives and the bearers of His image upon earth, so the king who is celebrated in this Psalm may be all the more readily styled Elohim, when in his heavenly beauty, his irresistible doxa or glory, and his divine holiness, he seems to the psalmist to be the perfected realization of the close relationship in which God has set David and his seed to Himself. He calls him אֱלֹהֵים, just as Isaiah calls the exalted royal child whom he exultingly salutes in ch. ix. 1-6, אֱלֹהֵי־נִבִּיר. He gives him this name, because in the transparent exterior of his fair humanity he sees the glory and holiness of God as having attained a salutary or merciful conspicuousness among men. At the same time, however, he guards this calling of the king by the name Elohim against being misapprehended by immediately distinguishing the God, who stands above him, from the divine king by the words "Elohim, thy God," which, in the Korahitic Psalms, and in the Elohimic Psalms in general, is equivalent to "Jahve, thy God" (xl. 4, xlvi. 15, l. 7); and the two words are accordingly united by Munach.* Because the king's sceptre is a "sceptre of uprightness" (cf. Isa. xi. 4), because he loves righteousness and consequently (fut. consec.) hates iniquity, therefore God, his God, has anointed him with the oil of joy (Isa. lxi. 3; cf. on the construction Amos vi. 6) above his fellows. What is intended is not the anointing to his office (cf. lxxxix. 21 with Acts x. 38) as a dedication to a happy and prosperous reign, but that God has poured forth upon him, more especially on this his nuptial day, a superabundant joy, both outwardly and in his spirit, such as He has bestowed upon no other king upon the face of the earth. That he rises high above all those round about him is self-evident; but even among his fellows of royal station, kings like himself, he has no equal. It is a matter of question whether the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (ch. i. 8) has taken the first ὁ Θεός of the expression ὁ Θεὸς ὁ Θεός σου as a vocative. Apollinaris does not seem so to have understood him; for he renders it τοῦνεκά σοι Θεὸς αὐτὸς ἔην περιέχειεν ἀλοιφήν χρύσεας τερπωλῆς μετόχοις παρὰ πάντας ἐλαίῳ, and the Greek expositors also take ὁ Θεός here as a nominative.

Vers. 9, 10. The song of that which is lovely here reaches the height towards which it aspires from the beginning. It has portrayed the lovely king as a man, as a hero, and as a divine ruler; now it describes him as a bridegroom on the day of his nuptials. The sequence of the thoughts and of the figures corresponds to the history of the future. When Babylon is fallen, and the hero riding upon a white horse, upon whom is inscribed the name "King of kings and Lord of lords," shall have smitten the hostile nations with the sword that goeth out of His mouth, there then follows the marriage of the Lamb, for which the way has been prepared by these avenging victories (Apoc. xix. 7 sq.). It is this final γάμος which the Psalm, as a song of the congregation, when the light was dawning upon the Old Testament church, sees by anticipation, and as it were goes forth to meet it, rejoicing to behold it afar off. The king's garments are so thoroughly scented with costly spices that they seem to be altogether woven out of them. And מְנִי out of the ivory palaces enchant him. This מְנִי has been taken mostly, according to Isa. lix. 18 (cf. also Isa. lii. 6), as a repetition of the מֶן: "out of ivory palaces, whence they enchant thee." But this repetition serves no special purpose. Although the apocopated plural in מְנִי, instead of מְנִים, is controvertible in Biblical Hebrew (vid. on xxii. 17, 2 Sam. xxii. 44), still there is the venture that in this instance מְנִי is equivalent to מְנִים, the music of stringed instruments (cl. 4); and if in connection with any Psalm at all, surely we may venture in connection with this Psalm, which in other respects has such an Aramaic or North-Palestinian colouring, to acknowledge this apocope, here perhaps chosen on account of the rhythm. In accordance with our historical rendering of the Psalm, by the ivory palaces are meant the magnificent residences of the king, who is the father of the bride. Out of the inner recesses of these halls, inlaid within with ivory and consequently resplendent with the most dazzling whiteness, the bridegroom going to fetch his bride, as he approaches and enters them, is met by the sounds of festive music: viewed in the light of the New Testament, it is that music of citherns or harps which the seer (Apoc. xiv. 2) heard like the voice of many waters and of mighty thunder resounding from heaven. The Old Testament poet imagines to himself a royal citadel that in its earthly splendour far surpasses that of David and of Solomon. Thence issues forth the sound of festive music zealous, as it were, to bid its welcome to the exalted king.

* The view that the Munach is here vicarius Tiphchæ anterioris (Dachselt in his Biblia Accentuata) is erroneous, vid. Accentuationssystem, xviii. § 4. It is the conjunctive to תִּיפְחָא, which, in Heidenheim and Baer, on the authority of the Codices, has Tiphcha anterior, not Athnach as in the editions heretofore published. The proper place for the Athnach would at first be by יְשׁוּעָה; but according to Accentuationssystem, xix. § 6, it cannot stand there.

Even the daughters of kings are among his precious ones. מְנִי is the name for that which is costly, and is highly prized and loved for its costliness (Prov. vi. 26). The form מְנִי resembles the form מְנִי, Prov. xxx. 17, in the appearance of the i and supplanting the Sheba mobile, and also in the Dag. dirimens in the q (cf. עֲקֵבִי, Gen. xlix. 17; מְקֵרֶשׁ, Ex. xv. 17).*

* It is the reading of Ben-Naphtali that has here, as an exception, become the receptus; whereas Ben-Asher reads מְנִי. Saadia, Rashi,

Now, however, he has chosen for himself his own proper wife, who is here called by a name commonly used of Chaldæan and Persian queens, and, as it seems (cf. on Judg. v. 30), a North-Palestinian name, שָׁנֶל,* instead of גְּבִירָה. From the fact that, glittering with gold of Ophir, she has taken the place of honour at the right hand of the king (נֹצֵרֶה, 3d part., not part.), it is evident that her relationship to the king is at this time just in the act of being completed. Who are those daughters of kings and who is this queen standing in closest relationship to the king? The former are the heathen nations converted to Christ, and the latter is the Israel which is remarried to God in Christ, after the fulness of the heathen is come in. It is only when Israel is won to Him, after the fulness of the heathen is come in (Rom. xi. 25), that the morning of the great day will dawn, which this Psalm as a song of the church celebrates. בְּנוֹת מְלָכִים cannot certainly, like בַּת-צֶרַח, be a personificative designation of heathen kingdoms, although שָׁנֶל is the believing Israel conceived of as one person. It is actually kings' daughters as the representatives of their nations that are intended; and the relation of things is just the same here as in Isa. xlix. 23, where, of the Israelitish church of the future, it is predicted that kings shall be its foster-fathers and their princesses its nursing-mothers.

Vers. 11-13. The poet next turns to address the one bride of the king, who is now honoured far above the kings' daughters. With שְׁמָעֵי he implores for himself a hearing; by רְאֵי he directs her eye towards the new relationship into which Simson ha-Nakdan and others, who derive the word from בִּקֵּר (to visit, wait on), follow the receptus, comparing מְשִׁיפָה, Isa. xlii. 24, in support of the form of writing. Also in לִיקָהָת, Prov. xxx. 17; וּיִלְלָת, Jer. xxv. 36; בְּיִתְרוֹן, Eccles. ii. 13, the otherwise rejected orthography of Ben-Naphtali (who pointed וּיְהַלֵּךְ, Job xxix. 21, לְיִשְׂרָאֵל, and the like) is retained, as quite an exception, in the textus receptus. Vide S. D. Luzzatto, Prolegomeni, § cxcix., and Grammatica della Lingua Ebraica, § 193.

* Bar-Ali says that in Babylonia Venus is called שָׁנֶל וּרְלַפַּת, vid. Lagarde, Gesammelte Abhandl. S. 17. Windischmann (Zoroastrische Studien, S. 161) erroneously compares çagar (pronounced tshagar) as a name of one of the two wives of Zarathustra; but it happens that this is not the name of the wife who holds the first rank (Neo-Persic padishâh-zen), but of the second (cakir-zen, bond-woman).

she is just entering; by הִפְטִי אֲזַנְנֶךָ he bespeaks her attention to the exhortation that follows; by בַּת he puts himself in a position in relation to her similar to that which the teacher and preacher occupies who addresses the bridal pair at the altar. She is to forget her people and her father's house, to sever her natural, inherited, and customary relationships of life, both as regards outward form and inward affections; and should the king desire her beauty, to which he has a right,—for he, as being her husband (1 Pet. iii. 6), and more especially as being king, is her lord,—she is to show towards him her profoundest, reverent devotion. וַיִּהְיֶה is a hypothetical protasis according to Ges. § 128, 2, c. The reward of this willing submission is the universal homage of the nations. It cannot be denied on the ground of syntax that וַבַּת־צֹר admits of being rendered “and O daughter of Tyre” (Hitzig),—a rendering which would also give additional support to our historical interpretation of the Psalm,—although, apart from the one insecure passage, Jer. xx. 12 (Ew. § 340, c), there is no instance to be found in which a vocative with ו occurs (Prov. viii. 5, Joel ii. 23, Isa. xlv. 21), when another vocative has not already preceded it. But to what purpose would be, in this particular instance, this apostrophe with the words וַבַּת־צֹר, from which it looks as though she were indebted to her ancestral house, and not to the king whose own she is become, for the acts of homage which are prospectively set before her? Such, however, is not the case; “daughter of Tyre” is a subject-notion, which can all the more readily be followed by the predicate in the plural, since it stands first almost like a nomin. absol. The daughter, i.e. the population of Tyre—approaching with presents shall they court (lit. stroke) thy face, i.e. meeting thee bringing love, they shall seek to propitiate thy love towards themselves. וַיִּהְיֶה corresponds to the Latin mulcere in the sense of delenire; for חָלַהּ, חָלָהּ (root חָל, whence חָלַל, חָלַל, solvit, laxavit), means properly to be soft and tender, of taste to be sweet (in another direction: to be lax, weak, sick); the Piel consequently means to soften, conciliate, to make gentle that which is austere. Tyre, however, is named only by way of example; עֲשִׂירֵי עָם is not an apposition, but a continuation of the subject: not only Tyre, but in general those who are the richest among each separate people or nation. Just as אֲבִינֵי אֲדָם (Isa. xxix. 19) are the poorest of mankind, so עֲשִׂירֵי עַם are the richest among the peoples of the earth.

As regards the meaning which the congregation or church has to assign to the whole passage, the correct paraphrase of the words "and forget thy people" is to be found even in the Targum: "Forget the evil deeds of the ungodly among thy people, and the house of the idols which thou hast served in the house of thy father." It is not indeed the hardened mass of Israel which enters into such a loving relationship to God and to His Christ, but, as prophecy from Deut. ch. xxxii. onward declares, a remnant thoroughly purged by desolating and sifting judgments and rescued, which, in order to belong wholly to Christ, and to become the holy seed of a better future (Isa. vi. 13), must cut asunder all bonds of connection with the stiff-neckedly unbelieving people and paternal house, and in like manner to Abram secede from them. This church of the future is fair; for she is expiated (Deut. xxxii. 43), washed (Isa. iv. 4), and adorned (Isa. lxi. 3) by her God. And if she does homage to Him, without looking back, He not only remains her own, but in Him everything that is glorious belonging to the world also becomes her own. Highly honoured by the King of kings, she is the queen among the daughters of kings, to whom Tyre and the richest among peoples of every order are zealous to express their loving and joyful recognition. Very similar language to that used here of the favoured church of the Messiah is used in lxxii. 10 sq. of the Messiah Himself.

Vers. 14-16. Now follows the description of the manner in which she absolutely leaves her father's house, and richly adorned and with a numerous train is led to the king and makes her entry into his palace; and in connection therewith we must bear in mind that the poet combines on the canvas of one picture (so to speak) things that lie wide apart both as to time and place. He sees her first of all in her own chamber (פְּנִימָה, prop. towards the inside, then also in the inside, Ges. § 90, 2, b), and how there* she is nothing but splendour (כָּל-כְּבוֹדָהּ, prop.

* In Babylonia these words, according to B. Jebamoth 77a, are cited in favour of domesticity as a female virtue; in Palestine (בְּמַעְרֵבָא) more appropriately, Gen. xviii. 9. The LXX. Codd. Vat. et Sinait. has Ἐσεβῶν mere splendour, fem. of פְּבוֹר as in Ezek. xxiii. 41; cf. כַּל-הַבֵּל, xxxix. 6, mere nothingness), her clothing is gold-interwoven textures (i.e. such as are interwoven with threads of gold, or woven in squares or diamond patterns and adorned with gold in addition). She, just like Esther (Esth. ii. 12), is being led to the king, her husband, and this takes place לְרִקְמוֹת, in variegated, embroidered garments (לְ used just as adverbially as in 2 Chron. xx. 21, לְהִרְרֹת), with a retinue of virgins, her companions, who at the same time with herself become the property of her spouse. According to the accents it is to be rendered: virgines post eam, sociæ ejus, adducuntur tibi, so that רֵעוּתֶיהָ is an apposition. This is also in harmony with the allegorical interpretation of the Psalm as a song of the church. The bride of the Lamb, whom the writer of the Apocalypse beheld, arrayed in shining white linen (byssus), which denotes her righteousness, just as here the variegated, golden garments denote her glory, is not just one person nor even one church, but the church of Israel together with the churches of the Gentiles united by one common faith, which have taken a hearty and active part in the restoration of the daughter of Zion. The procession moves on with joy and rejoicing; it is the march of honour of the one chosen one and of the many chosen together with her, of her friends or companions; and to what purpose, is shown by the hopes which to the mind of the poet spring up out of the contemplation of this scene.

Vers. 17, 18. All this has its first and most natural meaning in relation to cotemporary history, but without being at variance with the reference of the Psalm to the King Messiah, as used by the church. Just as the kings of Judah and of Israel allowed their sons to share in their dominion (2 Sam. viii. 18, 1 Kings iv. 7, cf. 2 Chron. xi. 23; 1 Kings xx. 15), so out of the loving relationship of the daughter of Zion and of the virgins of her train to the King Messiah there spring up children, to whom the regal glory of the house of David which culminates in Him is transferred,—a royal race among which He divides the dominion of the earth (vid. Ps. cxlix.); for He makes His own people “kings and priests, and they shall reign on the earth" (Apoc. v. 10). Those children are to be understood here which, according to Ps. cx., are born to Him as the dew out of the womb of the morning's dawn—the ever-youthful nation, by which He conquers and rules the world. When, therefore, the poet says that he will remember the name of the king throughout all generations, this is based upon the twofold assumption, that he regards himself as a member of an imperishable church (Sir. xxxvii. 25), and that he regards the king as a person worthy to be praised by the church of every age. Elsewhere Jahve's praise is called a praise that lives through all generations (cii. 13, cxxxv. 13); here the king is the object of the everlasting praise of the church, and, beginning with the church, of the nations also. On יהוה (as in the name יהוה) cf. the forms in cxvi. 6, lxxxii. 6. First of all Israel, whom the psalmist represents, is called upon to declare with praise the name of the Messiah from generation to generation. But it does not rest with Israel alone. The nations are thereby roused up to do the same thing. The end of the covenant history is that Israel and the nations together praise this love-worthy, heroic, and divine King: "His name shall endure for ever; as long as the sun shall His name bud, and all nations shall be blessed in Him (and) shall praise Him" (lxxii. 17).

PSALM XLVI.

A SURE STRONGHOLD IS OUR GOD.*

- 2 ELOHIM is unto us a refuge and safe retreat,
As a help in distresses He is thoroughly proved.
- 3 Therefore do we not fear when the earth changeth,
And the mountains fall into the heart of the ocean;
- 4 Let the waters thereof roar, let them foam,
Let mountains shake at the swelling thereof. (Sela.)
- 5 There is a river—the streams whereof make glad the city of Elohim,
The holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High.

---

* "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott."

- 6 Elohim is in the midst of her, she tottereth not,
Elohim helpeth her, when the morning dawneth.
- 7 The peoples rage, the kingdoms totter—
He raiseth His voice, and the earth melteth.
- 8 Jahve of Hosts is with us,
A stronghold unto us is the God of Jacob. (Sela.)
- 9 Go, behold the deeds of Jahve,
Who maketh desolations upon the earth,
- 10 Who maketh wars to cease unto the ends of the earth,
Who breaketh the bow and cutteth the spear in sunder,
Who destroyeth the chariots by fire.
- 11 "Cease ye, and know that I am Elohim!
I will be exalted among the peoples, I will be exalted upon the earth."
- 12 Jahve of Hosts is with us,
A stronghold unto us is the God of Jacob. (Sela.)

When, during the reign of Jehoshaphat, the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites (more particularly the Maonites, for in 2 Chron. xx. 1 it is to be read מְדַבְּרֵי מַעֲיָנִים) carried war into the kingdom of David and threatened Jerusalem, the Spirit of the Lord came upon Jahaziël the Asaphite in the temple congregation which the king had called together, and he prophesied a miraculous deliverance on the morrow. Then the Levite singers praised the God of Israel with jubilant voice, viz. singers of the race of Kohāth, and in fact out of the family of Korah. On the following day Levite singers in holy attire and with song went forth before the army of Jehoshaphat. The enemy, surprised by the attack of another plundering band of the sons of the desert, had turned their weapons against one another, being disbanded in the confusion of flight, and the army of Jehoshaphat found the enemy's camp turned into a field of corpses. In the feast of thanksgiving for victory which followed in Emek ha-Beracha the Levite singers again also took an active part, for the spoil-laden army marched thence in procession to Jerusalem and to the temple of Jahve, accompanied by the music of the nabras, citherns, and trumpets. Thus in the narrative in 2 Chron. xxii. does the chronicler give us the key to the Asaphic Psalm lxxxiii. (lxxvi.?) and to the Korahitic Psalms xlvii., xlviii. It is indeed equally admissible to refer these three Korahitic Psalms to the defeat of Sennacherib's army under Hezekiah, but this view has not the same historical consistency. After the fourteenth year of Hezekiah's reign the congregation could certainly not help connecting the thought of the Assyrian catastrophe so recently experienced with this Psalm; and more especially since Isaiah had predicted this event, following the language of this Psalm very closely. For Isaiah and this Psalm are remarkably linked together.

Just as Ps. ii. is, as it were, the quintessence of the book of Immanuel, Isa. ch. vii.-xii., so is Ps. xlvii. of Isa. ch. xxxiii., that concluding discourse to Isa. ch. xxviii.-xxxii., which is moulded in a lyric form, and was uttered before the deliverance of Jerusalem at a time of the direst distress. The fundamental thought of the Psalm is expressed there in ver. 2 in the form of a petition; and by a comparison with Isa. xxv. 4 sq. we may see what a similarity there is between the language of the psalmist and of the prophet. Isa. xxxiii. 13 closely resembles the concluding admonition; and the image of the stream in the Psalm has suggested the grandly bold figure of the prophet in ver. 21, which is there more elaborately wrought up: "No indeed, there dwells for us a glorious One, Jahve—a place of streams, of canals of wide extent, into which no fleet of rowing vessels shall venture, and which no mighty man-of-war shall cross." The divine determination expressed in אָרַם we also hear in Isa. xxxiii. 10. And the prospect of the end of war reminds us of the familiar prediction of Isaiah (ch. ii.), closely resembling Mical's in its language, of eternal peace; just as vers. 8, 12 remind us of the watch-word אֵל עִמּוֹ in Isa. vii.-xii. The mind of Isaiah and that of Jeremiah have, each in its own peculiar way, taken germs of thought (lit. become impregnated) from this Psalm.

We have already incidentally referred to the inscribed words עֲלֵ-עֲלָמוֹת, on vi. 1. Böttcher renders them ad voces puberes, "for tenor voices," a rendering which certainly accords with the fact that, according to 1 Chron. xv. 20, they were accustomed to sing עֲלֵ-עֲלָמוֹת בְּנַבְלִים, and the Oriental sounds, according to Villoteau (Description de l'Égypte), correspond aux six sons vers l'aigu de l'octave du médium de la voix de tenor. But עלמות does not signify voces puberes, but puellæ puberes (from עלם, غلم, cogn. חלם, حلم, to have attained to puberty); and although certainly no eunuchs sang in the temple, yet there is direct testimony that Levite youths were among the singers in the second temple;* and Ps. lxxviii. mentions the עלמות who struck the timbrels at a temple festival. Moreover, we must take into consideration the facts that the compass of the tenor extends even into the soprano, that the singers were of different ages down to twenty years of age, and that Oriental, and more particularly even Jewish, song is fond of falsetto singing. We therefore adopt Perret-Gentil's rendering, chant avec voix de femmes, and still more readily Armand de Mestral's, en soprano; whereas Melissus' rendering, "upon musical instruments called Alamoth (the Germans would say, upon the virginal)," has nothing to commend it.

Vers. 2-4. The congregation begins with a general declaration of that which God is to them. This declaration is the result of their experience. Luther, after the LXX. and Vulg., renders it, "in the great distresses which have come upon us." As though יִמְצָא could stand for הִנֵּמְצָאוֹת, and that this again could mean anything else but "at present existing," to which נִמְצָא is not at all appropriate. God Himself is called נִמְצָא מֵאֵד as being one who allows Himself to be found in times of distress (2 Chron. xv. 4, and frequently) exceedingly; i.e. to those who then seek Him He reveals Himself and verifies His word beyond all measure. Because God is such a God to them, the congregation or church does not fear though a still greater distress than that which they have just withstood, should break in upon them: if the earth should change, i.e. effect, enter upon, undergo or suffer a change (an inwardly transitive Hiphil, Ges. § 53, 2); and if the mountains should sink down into the heart (בְּלֵב exactly as in Ezek. xxvii. 27, Jon. ii. 4) of the sea (ocean), i.e. even if these should sink back again into the waters out of which they appeared on the third day of the creation, so that consequently the old chaos should return. The church supposes the most extreme case, viz. the falling in of the universe which has been creatively set in order. We are no more to regard the language as being allegorical here (as Hengstenberg interprets it, the mountains being = the kingdoms of the world), than we would the language of Horace: si fractus illabatur orbis (Carm. iii. 3, 7). Since יַמִּים is not a numerical but amplificative plural, the singular suffixes in ver. 4 may the more readily refer back to it. גִּבְוֹתָי, pride, self-exaltation, used of the sea as in lxxxix. 10 גִּבְוֹתַי, and in Job xxxviii. 11 יַמִּים are used. The futures in ver. 4 do not continue the infinitive construction: if the waters thereof roar, foam, etc.; but they are, as their position and repetition indicate, intended to have a concessive sense. And this favours the supposition of Hupfeld and Ewald that the refrain, vers. 8, 12, which ought to form the apodosis of this concessive clause (cf. cxxxix. 8-10, Job xx. 24, Isa. xl. 30 sq.) has accidentally fallen out here. In the text as it lies before us ver. 4 attaches itself to לֹא-נִירָא: (we do not fear), let its waters (i.e. the waters of the ocean) rage and foam continually; and, inasmuch as the sea rises high, towering beyond its shores, let the mountains threaten to topple in. The music, which here becomes forte, strengthens the believing confidence of the congregation, despite this wild excitement of the elements.

* The Mishna, Erachin 13b, expressly informs us, that whilst the Levites sang to the accompanying play of the nablās and citherns, their youths, standing at their feet below the pulpit, sang with them in order to give to the singing the harmony of high and deep voices (תְּבִלָּה, condimentum). These Levite youths are called צערי or סוערי הלוים, parvuli (although the Gemara explains it otherwise) or adjutores Levitarum.

Vers. 5-8. Just as, according to Gen. ii. 10, a stream issued from Eden, to water the whole garden, so a stream makes Jerusalem as it were into another paradise: a river—whose streams make glad the city of Elohim (lxxxvii. 3, xlvi. 9, cf. ci. 8); בְּלֵבָי (used of the windings and branches of the main-stream) is a second permutative subject (xliv. 3). What is intended is the river of grace, which is also likened to a river of paradise in xxxvi. 9. When the city of God is threatened and encompassed by foes, still she shall not hunger and thirst, nor fear and despair; for the river of grace and of her ordinances and promises flows with its rippling waves through the holy place, where the dwelling-place or tabernacle of the Most High is pitched. קֹדֶשׁ, Sanctum (cf. El-Kuds as a name of Jerusalem), as in lxv. 5, Isa. lvii. 15; גִּדְלָהּ, Ex. xv. 16. מִשְׁבְּנֵי, dwellings, like מִשְׁבְּנוֹת, xl. 3, lxxxiv. 2, cxxxii. 5, 7, equivalent to "a glorious dwelling." In ver. 6 in the place of the river we find Him from whom the river issues forth. Elohim helps her לַפְּנוֹת בִּקְרָה—there is only a night of trouble, the return of the morning is also the sunrise of speedy help. The preterites in ver. 7 are hypothetical: if peoples and kingdoms become enraged with enmity and totter, so that the church is in danger of being involved in this overthrow—all that God need do is to make a rumbling with His almighty voice of thunder (נָתַן בְּקוֹלוֹ, as in lxviii. 34, Jer. xii. 8, cf. הֵרִים בַּמַּטֵּה, to make a lifting with the rod, Ex. vii. 20), and forthwith the earth melts (מוּגָה, as in Amos ix. 5, Niph. Isa. xiv. 31, and frequently), i.e. their titanic defiance becomes cowardice, the bonds of their confederation slacken, and the strength they have put forth is destroyed—it is manifest that Jahve Tsebaoth is with His people. This name of God is, so to speak, indigenous to the Korahitic Psalms, for it is the proper name of God belonging to the time of the kings (vid. on xxiv. 10, lix. 6), on the very verge of which it occurs first of all in the mouth of Hannah (1 Sam. i. 11), and the Korahitic Psalms have a royal impress upon them. In the God, at whose summons all created powers are obliged to marshal themselves like the hosts of war, Israel has a steep stronghold, מִשְׁנֵב, which cannot be scaled by any foe—the army of the confederate peoples and kingdoms, ere it has reached Jerusalem, is become a field of the dead.

Vers. 9-12. The mighty deeds of Jahve still lie visibly before them in their results, and those who are without the pale of the church are to see for themselves and be convinced. In a passage founded upon this, lxvi. 5, stands מַפְעֵלוֹת אֱלֹהִים; here, according to Targum and Masora (vid. Psalter, ii. 472), מַפְעֵלוֹת יְהוָה.* Even an Elohimic Psalm gives to the God of Israel in opposition to all the world no other name than יְהוָה. יְהוָה does not here signify stupenda (Jer. viii. 21), but in accordance with the phrase לְשֹׂמֵר, Isa. xiii. 9, and frequently: devastations, viz. among the enemies who have kept the field against the city of God. The participle מְשַׁבֵּיחַ is designedly used in carrying forward the description. The annihilation of the worldly power which the church has just now experienced for its rescue, is a prelude to the ceasing of all war, Mic. iv. 3 (Isa. ii. 4). Unto the ends of the earth will Jahve make an end of waging war; and since He has no pleasure in war in general, much less in war waged against His own people, all the implements of war He in part breaks to pieces and in part consigns to the flames (cf. Isa. liv. 16 sq.). Cease, cries He (ver. 12) to the nations, from making war upon my people, and know that I am God, the invincible One,—invincible both in Myself and in My people,—who will be acknowledged in My exaltation by all the world. A similar inferential admonition closes Ps. ii. With this admonition, which is both warning and threatening at the same time, the nations are dismissed; but the church yet once more boasts that Jahve Tsebaoth is its God and its stronghold.

* Nevertheless מַפְעֵלוֹת אֱלֹהִים is also found here as a various reading that goes back to the time of the Talmud. The oldest Hebrew Psalter of 1477 reads thus, vide Repertorium für Bibl. und Morgenländ. Liter. v. (1779), 148. Norzi decides in favour of it, and Biesenthal has also adopted it in his edition of the Psalter (1837), which in other respects is a reproduction of Heidenheim's text.

PSALM XLVII.

EXULTATION AT THE LORD'S TRIUMPHANT ASCENSION.

- 2 ALL ye peoples, clap your hands,
Shout unto Elohim with loud rejoicing.
- 3 For Jahve is highly exalted, terrible,
A great King over all the earth.
- 4 He subdued peoples under us,
And nations under our feet.
- 5 He chose for us our inheritance,
The pride of Jacob, whom He hath loved. (Sela.)
- 6 Elohim is gone up with a shout,
Jahve with the sound of a trumpet.
- 7 Harp ye to Elohim, harp,
Harp ye to our King, harp!
- 8 For the King of all the earth is Elohim—
Harp ye songs of praise.

- 9 Elohim ruleth as king over the nations,
Elohim hath set Himself upon His holy throne.
- 10 The princes of the peoples gather themselves together—
A people of the God of Abraham.
For the shields of the earth are Elohim's,
Very highly exalted is He.

Whilst between Ps. xlv. and xlvi. scarcely any other bond of relationship but the similar use of the significant על־כֶּן can be discovered, Ps. xlvii. has, in common with Ps. xlvi., not only the thought of the kingly exaltation of Jahve over the peoples of the earth, but also its historical occasion, viz. Jehoshaphat's victory over the allied neighbouring nations,—a victory without a conflict, and consequently all the more manifestly a victory of Jahve, who, after having fought for His people, ascended again amidst the music of their celebration of victory; an event that was outwardly represented in the conducting of the Ark back to the temple (2 Chron. xx. 28). Ps. xlvii. has grown out of this event. The strophe schema cannot be mistaken, viz. 8. 8. 4.

On account of the blowing of the trumpet* mentioned in ver. 6, this Psalm is the proper new year's Psalm in the synagogue (together with Ps. lxxxi., the Psalm of the second new year's feast day); and on account of the mention of the ascension of Jahve, it is the Psalm for Ascension day in the church. Luther styles it, the "Christ ascended to Heaven of the sons of Korah." Paulus Burgensis quarrels with Lyra because he does not interpret it directly of the Ascension; and Badius says: Lyranus a Judæis seductus, in cortice hæret. The whole truth here, as is often the case, is not to be found on either side. The Psalm takes its occasion from an event in the reign of Jehoshaphat. But was the church of the ages succeeding required to celebrate, and shall more especially the New Testament church still celebrate, that defeat of the allied neighbouring peoples? This defeat brought the people of God repose and respect for a season, but not true and lasting peace; and the ascent at that time of Jahve, who had fought here on earth on behalf of His people, was not as yet the ascent above the powers that are most hurtful to His people, and that stand most in the way of the progress of salvation, viz. those powers of darkness which form the secret background of everything that takes place upon earth that is in opposition to God. Hence this Psalm in the course of history has gained a prophetic meaning, far exceeding its first occasion, which has only been fully unravelled by the ascension of Christ.

Vers. 2-5. "Thereupon the fear of Elohim"—so closes the chronicler (2 Chron. xx. 29) the narrative of the defeat of the confederates—"came upon all kingdoms of the countries, when they heard that Jahve had fought against the enemies of Israel." The psalmist, however, does not in consequence of this particular event call upon them to tremble with fear, but to rejoice; for fear is an involuntary, extorted inward emotion, but joy a perfectly voluntary one. The true and final victory of Jahve consists not in a submission that is brought about by war and bloodshed and in consternation that stupefies the mind, but in a change in the minds and hearts of the peoples, so that they render joyful worship unto Him. In order that He may thus become the God of all peoples, He has first of all become the God of Israel; and Israel longs that this the purpose of its election may be attained. Out of this longing springs the call in ver. 2. The peoples are to show the God of revelation their joy by their gestures and their words; for Jahve is absolutely exalted (עָלָה, here it is a predicate, just as in lxxviii. 56 it is an attribute), terrible, and the sphere of His dominion has Israel for its central point, not, however, for its limit, but it extends over the whole earth. Everything must do homage to Him in His own people, whether willingly or by constraint. According to the tenses employed, what is affirmed in ver. 4 appears to be a principle derived from their recent experience, inasmuch as the cotemporary fact is not expressed in an historical form, but generalized and idealized. But יִבְחַר, ver. 5a, is against this, since the choosing (election) is an act done once for all and not a continued act; we are therefore driven to regard the futures, as in Num. xxiii. 7, Judg. ii. 1, as a statement of historical facts. Concerning יִבְרַךְ, He bent, made to stoop, vid. xviii. 48. There is now no necessity for altering יִבְחַר into יִרְחֵב, and more especially since this is not suited to the fact which has given occasion to the Psalm. On the contrary, יִבְחַר presupposes that in the event of the day God has shown Himself to be a faithful and powerful Lord [lit. feudal Lord] of the land of Israel; the hostile confederation had thought of nothing less than driving Israel entirely out of its inheritance (2 Chron. xx. 11). The Holy Land is called the pride (פְּאִוֶּז) of Jacob, as being the gift of grace of which this, the people of God's love, can boast. In Amos vi. 8 נֶאֱזַק יַעֲקֹב has a different meaning (of the sin of pride), and again another sense in Nah. ii. 3 (of the glory of all Israel in accordance with the promise); here it is similar to Isa. xiii. 19. אֲנִי has a conjunctive accent instead of being followed by Makkeph, as in lx. 2, Prov. iii. 12 (these are the only three instances). The strophe which follows supports the view that the poet, in ver. 5, has a recent act of God before his mind.

Vers. 6-9. The ascent of God presupposes a previous descent, whether it be a manifestation of Himself in order to utter some promise (Gen. xvii. 22, Judg. xiii. 20) or a triumphant execution of judgment (vii. 8, lxviii. 19). So here: God has come down to fight on behalf of His people. They return to the Holy City and He to His throne, which is above on Zion, and higher still, is above in heaven. On בְּתִרְוָעָה and קוֹל שׁוֹפָר cf. xcviii. 6, 1 Chron. xv. 28, but more especially Amos ii. 2; for the "shout" is here the people's shout of victory, and "the sound of the horn" the clear sound of the horns announcing the victory, with reference to the celebration of the victory in the Valley of praise and the homeward march amidst the clanging music (2 Chron. xx. 26 sq.). The poet, who has this festival of victory before his mind as having recently taken place, desires that the festive sounds may find an unending and boundless echo unto the glory of God. זָמֵר is first construed with the accusative as in lxviii. 33, then with the dative. Concerning מִיִּשְׁבְּלֵי = ὁδὴ πνευματικῆ (Eph. v. 19, Col. iii. 16), vid. on xxxii. 1. That which excites to songs of praise is Jahve's dominion of the world which has just been made manifest. מְלִכָּה is to be taken in just the same historical sense as ἐβασίλευσας, Apoc. xi. 15–18. What has taken place is a prelude of the final and visible entering upon the kingdom, the announcement of which the New Testament seer there hears. God has come down to earth, and after having obtained for Himself a recognition of His dominion by the destruction of the enemies of Israel, He has ascended again in visible kingly glory. Imago conscensi a Messia throni gloriæ, says Chr. Aug. Crusius, tunc erat deportatio arcæ fœderis in sedem regni.

Ver. 10. In the mirror of the present event, the poet reads the great fact of the conversion of all peoples to Jahve which closes the history of the world. The nobles of the peoples (שׂוֹרְטֵי with the twofold meaning of generosi), the “shields (i.e. the lords who are the defenders of their people) of the earth” (Hos. iv. 18), enter into the society of the people of the God of Abraham; πέρας αἱ πρὸς τὸν πατριάρχην Ἀβραὰμ ἔλαβον ὑποσχέσεις, as Theodoret observes. The promise concerning the blessing of the tribes of the nations in the seed of the patriarch is being fulfilled; for the nobles draw the peoples who are protected by them after themselves. It is unnecessary to read עַל instead of עִל with Ewald, and following the LXX. and Syriac; and it is also inadmissible, since one does not say עַל הַסֵּל, but עִל or עִלָּה. Even Eusebius has rightly praised Symmachus and Theodotion, because they have translated the ambiguous ἀμ by λαὸς (τοῦ Θεοῦ Ἀβραάμ), viz. as being a nominative of the effect or result, as it is also understood by the Targum, Jerome, Luther, and most of the Jewish expositors, and among modern expositors by Crusius, Hupfeld, and Hitzig: They gather and band themselves together as a people or into a people of the God of Abraham, they submit themselves with Israel to the one God who is proved to be so glorious.* The conclusion (ver. 11) reminds one of the song of Hannah, 1 Sam. ii. 8. Thus universal homage is rendered to Him: He is gone up in triumph, and is in consequence thereof highly exalted (הִלְחָל, 3d præter., the result or consequence of the הִלָּח in ver. 6).

* It is also accented accordingly, viz. רַב־מַגְדָּל with Rebia magnum, which (and in this respect it is distinguished from Mugrask) makes a pause; and this is then followed by the supplementing clause with Zinnor, Galgal, and Olewejored.

15 That such an one is Elohim our God for ever—
He will guide us

Ps. xlviii. is also a song of thanksgiving for victory. It is connected with Ps. xlv. and xlvii. by the fundamental thought of the exaltation of Jahve above the peoples of the earth; but is distinguished from them both in this respect, viz. that, in accordance with the favourite characteristic of Korahitic poetry, the song of thanksgiving for victory has become a song in praise of Jerusalem, the glorious and strong city, protected by God who sits enthroned in it. The historical occasion is the same. The mention of the kings points to an army of confederates; ver. 10 points to the gathering held in the temple before the setting out of the army; and the figurative representation of the hostile powers by the shattered ships of Tarshish does not apply to any period so well as to the time of Jehoshaphat. The points of coincidence between this Psalm (cf. ver. 7 with Isa. xxxiii. 14; ver. 8 with Isa. xxxiii. 21; ver. 13 with Isa. xxxiii. 18; ver. 15 with Isa. xxxiii. 22), as well as Ps. xlv., and Isaiah do not prove that he is its author.

Vers. 2-9. Viewed as to the nature of its subject-matter, the Psalm divides itself into three parts. We begin by considering the three strophes of the first part. The middle strophe presents an instance of the rising and falling cæsural schema. Because Jahve has most marvellously delivered Jerusalem, the poet begins with the praise of the great King and of His Holy City. Great and praised according to His due (מְהִלָּה as in xviii. 4) is He in her, is He upon His holy mountain, which there is His habitation. Next follow, in ver. 3, two predicates of a threefold, or fundamentally only twofold, subject; for יִרְפְּתֵי צִפּוֹן, in whatever way it may be understood, is in apposition to הַר־צִיּוֹן. The predicates consequently refer to Zion-Jerusalem; for קְרִית מְלֶכֶה רַב is not a name for Zion, but, inasmuch as the transition is from the holy mountain to the Holy City (just as the reverse is the case in ver. 2*b*), Jerusalem; ὅτι πόλις ἐστὶ τοῦ μεγάλου βασιλέως, Matt. v. 35. Of Zion-Jerusalem it is therefore said, it is יְפֵה נֹיף, beautiful in prominence or elevation (הַנֶּחֱלָה from נָהַף, Arabic nâfa, nauf, root נָהַף, the stronger force of נָבַ, نَبَّ, to raise one's self, to mount, to come sensibly forward; just as יָפָה also goes back to a root יָהַף, يَفَّ, which signifies "to rise, to be high," and is transferred in the Hebrew to eminence, perfection, beauty of form), a beautifully rising terrace-like height;* and, in the second place, it is the joy (בְּשִׂשׂוֹן) of the whole earth. It is deserving of being such, as the people who dwell there are themselves convinced (Lam. ii. 15); and it is appointed to become such, it is indeed such even now in hope,—hope which is, as it were, being anticipatorily verified. But in what sense does the appositional יִרְבְּתִי יְרֵבֶתֶן follow immediately upon הַר־צִיּוֹן? Hitzig, Ewald, Hengstenberg, Caspari (Micha, p. 359), and others, are of opinion that the hill of Zion is called the extreme north with reference to the old Asiatic conception of the mountain of the gods—old Persic Ar-burg' (Al-burg'), also called absolutely hara or haraiti,† old Indian Kailâsa and Mêru‡—forming the connecting link between heaven and earth, which lay in the inaccessible, holy distance and concealment of the extreme north. But the poet in no way betrays the idea that he applies this designation to Zion in an ideal sense only, as being not inferior to the extreme north (Bertheau, Lage des Paradieses, S. 50, and so also S. D. Luzzatto on Isa. xiv. 13), or as having taken the place of it (Hitzig). That notion is found, it is true, in Isa. xiv. 13, in the mouth of the king of the Chaldeans; but, with the exception of the passage before us, we have no trace of the Israelitish mind having blended this foreign mythological style of speech with its own. We therefore take the expression "sides of the north" to be a topographical designation, and intended literally. Mount Zion is thereby more definitely designated as the Temple-hill; for the Temple-hill, or Zion in the narrower sense, formed in reality the north-eastern angle or corner of ancient Jerusalem. It is not necessarily the extreme north (Ezek. xxxviii. 6, xxxix. 2), which is called ירכתי צפון; for ירְפְתִים are the two sides, then the angle in which the two side lines meet, and just such a northern angle was Mount Moriah by its position in relation to the city of David and the lower city.

Ver. 4, where the pointing is rightly נִדְרַע, not נִדְרַע, shows that the praise sung by the poet is based upon an event in cotemporary history. Elohim has made Himself known by the loftily built parts* of Jerusalem (cxxii. 7) לְמִשְׁנֵב (the ל that is customary with verbs of becoming and making), i.e. as an inaccessible fortress, making them secure against any hostile attack. The fact by which He has thus made Himself known now immediately follows. הַמְלָכִים points to a definite number of kings known to the poet; it therefore speaks in favour of the time of peril and war in the reign of Jehoshaphat and against that in the reign of Hezekiah. נִדְרַע is reciprocal: to appoint themselves a place of meeting, and meet together there. עָבַר, as in Judg. xi. 29, 2 Kings viii. 21, of crossing the frontier and invasion (Hitzig), not of perishing and destruction, as in xxxvii. 36, Nah. i. 12 (De Wette); for נִדְרַע requires further progress, and the declaration respecting their sudden downfall does not follow till later on. The allies encamped in the desert of Tekoa, about three hours distant from Jerusalem. The extensive view at that point extends even to Jerusalem: as soon as they saw it they were amazed, i.e. the seeing and astonishment, panic and confused flight, occurred all together; there went forth upon them from the Holy City, because Elohim dwells therein, a הִרְרַת אֱלֹהִים (1 Sam. xiv. 15), or as we should say, a panic or a panic-striking terror. Concerning כִּן as expressive of simultaneousness, vid. on Hab. iii. 10. כִּן in the correlative protasis is omitted, as in Hos. xi. 2, and frequently; cf. on Isa. lv. 9. Trembling seized upon them there (שָׁם, as in xiv. 5), pangs as of a woman in travail. In ver. 8, the description passes over emotionally into the form of address. It moulds itself according to the remembrance of a recent event of the poet's own time, viz. the destruction of the merchant fleet fitted out by Jehoshaphat in conjunction with Ahaziah, king of Israel (1 Kings xxii. 49, 2 Chron. xx. 36 sq.). The general meaning of ver. 8 is, that God's omnipotence is irresistible. Concerning the "wind of the east quarter," which here, as in Ezek. xxvii. 26, causes shipwreck, vid. on Job xxvii. 21. The "ships of Tarshish," as is clear from the context both before and after, are not meant literally, but used as a figure of the worldly powers; Isaiah (ch. xxxiii.) also compares Assyria to a gallant ship. Thus, then, the church can say that in the case of Jerusalem it has, as an eye-witness, experienced that which it has hitherto only heard from the tradition of a past age (הָאָרֶץ and עַמְּךָ as in Job xlii. 5), viz. that God holds it erect, establishes it, for ever. Hengstenberg observes here, "The Jerusalem that has been laid in ruins is not that which the psalmist means; it is only its outward form which it has put off" [lit. its broken and deserted pupa]. It is true that, according to its inner and spiritual nature, Jerusalem continues its existence in the New Testament church; but it is not less true that its being trodden under foot for a season in the καίροὶ ἐθνῶν no more annuls the promise of God than Israel's temporary rejection annuls Israel's election. The Holy City does not fall without again rising up.

Vers. 10-12. Now follows grateful praise to God, who hears prayer and executes justice, to the joy of His city and of His people. By רָמִינוּ the poet refers back to the service held in the temple before the army set out, as narrated in 2 Chron. ch. xx., to the prayers offered in the time of their impending danger, and to the remembrance of the favour hitherto shown towards Jerusalem, from which source they drew the comfort of hope for the present time. הָאָרֶץ, to compare, to hold one thing over against another, in this instance by causing the history of the past to pass before one's mind. To God's mighty deeds of old is now added a new one. The Name of God, i.e. the sum of His self-attestations hitherto, was the subject of the רָמִינוּ in the temple, and more particularly of the Korahitic songs (2 Chron. xx. 19); and this name has gloriously verified itself by a new deed of righteousness. His fame extends even to the ends of the earth (2 Chron. xx. 29). He has proved Himself to be One whose right hand is full of righteousness, and who practises righteousness or justice where it is necessary. Let, then, the Holy City, let the country cities of Judah (Isa. xl. 9, cf. xvi. 2) rejoice. The whole inheritance of Israel was threatened. Now it is most gloriously delivered.

Vers. 13-15. The call is addressed not to the enemies of Jerusalem—for it would be absurd to invite such to look round about upon Jerusalem with joy and gladness—but to the people of Jerusalem itself. From the time of the going forth of the army to the arrival of the news of victory, they have remained behind the walls of the city in anxious expectation. Now they are to make the circuit of the city (רָקִיף, still more definite than רָבַד, Josh. vi. 3) outside the walls, and examine them and see that its towers are all standing, its bulwark is intact, its palaces are resplendent as formerly. הָיִלָּהּ, “upon its bulwark,” = הָיִלָּהּ (Zech. ix. 4), with softened suffix as in Isa. xxiii. 17, xlv. 6, and frequently; Ew. § 247, d. פָּגַג (according to another reading, הִפְסִיג) signifies, in B. Baba kamma 81*b*, to cut through (a vineyard in a part where there is no way leading through it); the signification “to take to pieces and examine, to contemplate piece by piece,” has no support in the usage of the language, and the signification “to extol” (erhöhen, Luther following Jewish tradition) rests upon a false deduction from the name פָּגַג. Louis de Dieu correctly renders it: Dividite palatia, h. e. obambulate inter palatia ejus, secundo omnes palatiorum vias, quo omnia possitis commode intueri. They are to convince themselves by all possible means of the uninjured state of the Holy City, in order that they may be able to tell to posterity, that הָיִלָּהּ, such an one, such a marvellous helper as is now manifest to them, is Elohim our God. He will also in the future guide us. . . . Here the Psalm closes; for, although הָיִלָּהּ is wont to be construed with לָמָּוֶת in the signification ἀγειν ἐπί (xxiii. 2, Isa. xlix. 10), still “at death” [lit. dying], i. e. when it comes to dying (Hengstenberg), or “even unto (לָמָּוֶת as in ver. 11, xix. 7) death” [lit. dying] (Hupfeld), forms no suitable close to this thoroughly national song, having reference to a people of whom the son of Sirach says (ch. xxxvii. 25): ζῶν ἀνδρὸς ἐν ἀριθμῷ ἡμερῶν καὶ αἱ ἡμέραι τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ ἀναριθμητοί. The rendering of Mendelssohn, Stier, and others, “over death,” i. e. beyond death (Syriac), would be better; more accurately:

beyond dying = destruction (Bunsen, Bibelwerk, Th. i. S. clxi.). But the expression does not admit of this extension, and the thought comes upon one unexpectedly and as a surprise in this Psalm belonging to the time before the Exile. The Jerusalem Talmud, Megilla, ch. ii. (fol. 73, col. b, ed. Venet.), presents a choice of the following interpretations: (1) עֲלָמוֹת = בְּעֵלְיָמוּת, in youthfulness, adopting which, but somewhat differently applied, the Targum renders, "in the days of youth;" (2) כַּאֲיֵלִין עֲלָמוֹת, like virgins, with which Luther's rendering coincides: like youth (wie die Jugend); (3) according to the reading עֲלָמוֹת, which the LXX. also reproduces: in this and the future world, noting at the same time that Akilas (Aquila) translates the word by ἀθανασία: "in a world where there is no death." But in connection with this last rendering one would rather expect to find אֲלָמוֹת (Prov. xii. 28) instead of עֲלָמוֹת. עֲלָמוֹת, however, as equivalent to aiōnes is Mishnic, not Biblical; and a Hebrew word עֲלָמוֹת (עֲלָיְמוֹת) in the sense of the Aramaic עֲלָיְמוֹת cannot be justified elsewhere. We see from the wavering of the MSS., some of which give עֲלָמוֹת, and others עֲלָיְמוֹת, and from the wavering of expositors, what little success is likely to follow any attempt to gain for עֲלָמוֹת, as a substantial part of the Psalm, any sense that is secure and in accordance both with the genius of the language and with the context. Probably it is a marginal note of the melody, an abbreviation for עֲלָמוֹת לָבֵן, ix. 1. And either this note, as in Hab. iii. 19 לְמַנְצָה בְּנִינִיּוֹתַי, stands in an exceptional manner at the end instead of the beginning (Hitzig, Reggio), or it belongs to the למנצה of the following Psalm, and is to be inserted there (Böttcher, De inferis, § 371). If, however, עֲלָמוֹת does not belong to the Psalm itself, then it must be assumed that the proper closing words are lost. The original close was probably more full-toned, and somewhat like Isa. xxxiii. 22.

PSALM XLIX.

OF THE VANITY OF EARTHLY PROSPERITY AND GOOD:

A DIDACTIC POEM.

2 HEAR ye this, all ye peoples
Observe, all ye inhabitants of the world,

- 3 Both low and high,
Rich and poor together !
- 4 My mouth shall utter wisdom,
And the meditation of my heart is understanding.
- 5 I will incline mine ear to the maxim,
I will disclose my riddle with the accompaniment of the cithern.
- 6 Wherefore should I fear in the days of misfortune,
When the evil-doing of my supplanters encompasseth me,
- 7 Who trust in their wealth
And boast themselves in the abundance of their riches ?
- 8 A man is not able by any means to redeem his brother,
Nor can he give to God a ransom for him,
- 9 (Too costly is the redemption of their soul,
And he must give it up for ever) ;
- 10 That he should live continually,
[And] not see the grave.
- 11 No indeed, he must see, that wise men the,
Likewise the fool and the stupid man perish,
And leave to others their wealth.
- 12 Their thought is that their houses are for ever,
Their dwellings from generation to generation ;
They proclaim their names over lands.
- 13 *But man in pomp hath no abiding,
He is like to the beasts that are destroyed.*
- 14 This is the lot of those who are full of self-confidence,
And who following them yield assent to their mouth. (Sela.)
- 15 Like sheep gathered to Hades death doth shepherd them,
And the upright shall triumph over them on that morning,
Whereas their form, falling a prey to the devouring of Hades, becomes habitationless.
- 16 Yet Elohim will redeem my soul from the power of Hades,
For He will take me up. (Sela.)
- 17 Be not thou afraid, when a man becometh rich,
When the glory of his house is increased.
- 18 For when he dieth he shall take nothing away with him,
His glory doth not go down after him.

- 19 Though a man blesseth his soul during his life—
 And they praise thee that thou dost enjoy thyself—
 20 It shall come to the generation of his fathers :
 In eternity they shall never see the light.
 21 Man in pomp, and yet having no understanding,
Is like to the beasts that are destroyed.

To the pair of Psalms xlvi. and xlvii. is appended Ps. xlix., which likewise begins with an appealing "all ye peoples;" in other respects, being a didactic song, it has nothing in common with the national and historical Psalms, xlvi.–xlviii. The poet here steps forward as a preacher in the midst of men. His theme is the transitoriness of the prosperity of the ungodly, and, on the other hand, the hope of the upright which rests on God. Accordingly the Psalm falls into the following divisions: an introduction, vers. 2–5, which by its very promissory tone reminds one of the speeches of Elihu in the Book of Job, and the two parts of the sermon following thereupon, vers. 6–13, 14–21, which are marked out by a refrain, in which there is only a slight variation of expression. In its dogmatic character it harmonizes with the Psalms of the time of David, and by its antique and bold form takes rank with such Psalms as Ps. xvii. by David and lxxiii. by Asaph. Since also in the didactic Psalms of David and Asaph we meet with a style differing from that of their other Psalms, and, where the doings of the ungodly are severely rebuked, we find a harsher and more concise mode of expression and a duller, heavier tone, there is nothing at variance with the assumption that Ps. xlix. was composed by the writer of Ps. xlii.–xliii. and lxxxiv.; and more especially since David has composed Psalms of a kindred character (xxxix. and lxii.) in the time of the persecution by Absalom. Nothing, however, is involved in this unity of the author.

Vers. 2–5. Introduction. Very similarly do the elder (in the reign of Jehoshaphat) and the younger Micha (Micah) introduce their prophecies (1 Kings xxii. 28, Mic. i. 2), and Elihu in the Book of Job his didactic discourses (ch. xxxiv. 2, cf. xxxiii. 2). It is an universal theme which the poet intends to take up, hence he calls upon all peoples and all the inhabitants of the הָלֵךְ. Such is the word first of all for this temporal life, which glides by unnoticed, then for the present transitory world itself (vid. on xvii. 14). It is his intention to declare to the rich the utter nothingness or vanity of their false ground of hope, and to the poor the superiority of their true ground of hope; hence he wishes to have as hearers both בני אדם, children of the common people, who are men and have otherwise nothing distinctive about them, and בְּנֵי-אֲדָמָה, children of men, i.e. of rank and distinction (vid. on iv. 3)—rich and poor, as he adds to make his meaning more clear. For his mouth will, or shall, utter הַקְּמוֹת, not: all sorts of wise teachings, but: weighty wisdom. Just in like manner תְּבִינֹת signifies profound insight or understanding; cf. plurals like בְּיָנוּת, Isa. xxvii. 11, יִשְׁעֵהָ, Ps. xlii. 12 and frequently, שְׁלוֹת, Jer. xxii. 21. The parallel word תְּבִינֹת in the passage before us, and the plural predicate in Prov. xxiv. 7, show that הַקְּמוֹת, here and in Prov. i. 20, ix. 1, cf. xiv. 1, is not to be regarded, with Hitzig, Olshausen, and others, as another form of the singular הַקְּמוֹת. Side by side with the speaking of the mouth stands הַגִּית לֵב (with an unchangeable Kametz before the tone-syllable, Ew. § 166, c): the meditation (LXX. μελέτη) of the heart, and in accordance therewith the well-thought-out discourse. What he intends to discourse is, however, not the creation of his own brain, but what he has received. אֵלֶּיךָ, a saying embodying the wisdom of practical life, as God teaches men it, presents itself to his mind demanding to be heard; and to this he inclines his ear in order that, from being a diligent scholar of the wisdom from above, he may become a useful teacher of men, inasmuch as he opens up, i.e. unravels, the divine Mashal, which in the depth and fulness of its contents is a תִּירָה, i.e. an involved riddle (from חָדַד, cogn. אָנַד, עָקַד), and plays the cithern thereby (ב of the accompaniment). The opening of the riddle does not consist in the solving of it, but in the setting of it forth. פָּתַח, to open = to propound, deliver [of a discourse], comes from the phrase פָּתַח אֶת-פִּי, Prov. xxxi. 26; cf. cxix. 130, where פָּתַח, an opening, is equivalent to an unlocking, a revelation.

Vers. 6-13. First division of the sermon. Those who have to endure suffering from rich sinners have no need to fear, for the might and splendour of their oppressors is hastening towards destruction. יָמֵי רָע are days in which one experiences evil, as in xciv. 13, cf. Amos vi. 3. The genitive עַוְוָה is continued in ver. 6*b* in a clause that is subordinate to the בְּיָמַי of ver. 6*a* (cf. 1 Sam. xxv. 15, Job xxix. 2, Ps. xc. 15). The poet calls his crafty and malicious foes עֲקָבָי. There is no necessity for reading עֲקָבָי as Böttcher does, since without doubt a participial noun עֲקָב, supplantator, can be formed from עָקַב, supplantare; and although in its branchings out it coincides with עָקַב, planta, its meaning is made secure by the connection. To render the passage: "when wickedness surrounds me about my heels," whether with or without changing עָוְוָה into עָוְוָה (Hupfeld, von Ortenberg), is proved on all sides to be inadmissible: it ought to have been עָוְוָה instead of עָוְוָה; but even then it would still be an awkward expression, "to surround any one's heels,"* and the הַבְּקָחִים, which follows, would be unconnected with what precedes. This last word comes after עֲקָבָי, giving minuteness to the description, and is then continued quite regularly in ver. 7*b* by the finite verb. Up to this point all is clear enough; but now the difficulties accumulate. One naturally expects the thought, that the rich man is not able to redeem himself from death. Instead of this it is said, that no man is able to redeem another from death. Ewald, Böttcher, and others, therefore, take חָסֵף, as in Ezek. xviii. 10, xxi. 20 (vid. Hitzig), to be a careless form of writing for חָסֵף, and change חָסֵף into the reflexive חָסֵף; but the thought that is sought thus to be brought out is only then arrived at with great difficulty: the words ought to be חָסֵף לֹא יִפְדֶּה נַפְשׁוֹ. The words as they stand assert: a brother (חָסֵף, as a prominently placed object, with Rebia magnum, = חָסֵף, cf. Ezek. v. 10, xviii. 18, Mic. vii. 6, Mal. i. 6) can a man by no means redeem, i.e. men cannot redeem one another. Hengstenberg and Hitzig find the thought that is to be expected in ver. 8*b*: the rich ungodly man can with all his riches not even redeem another (חָסֵף), much less then can he redeem himself, offer a כֹּפֶר for himself.

* This might be avoided if it were possible for עָוְוָה עֲקָבָי to mean "the sin that follows my heels, that follows me at the heels;" but apart from עָוְוָה being unsuitable with this interpretation, an impossible meaning is thereby extorted from the genitive construction. This, however, is perhaps what is meant by the expression of the LXX., ἡ ἀνομία τῆς πτέρυγος μου, so much spoken of in the Greek Church down to the present day.

But if the poet meant to be so understood, he must have written לֹא יִפְדֶּה נַפְשׁוֹ וְלֹא בְּפָדַיִם. Vers. 8a and 8b bear no appearance of referring to different persons; the second clause is, on the contrary, the necessary supplement of the first: Among men certainly it is possible under some circumstances for one who is delivered over to death to be freed by money, but no בְּפָדַיִם (= בְּפָדִיִּים נַפְשׁוֹ, Ex. xxi. 30 and frequently) can be given to God (לֹא לֵאלֹהִים).

All idea of the thought one would most naturally look for must therefore be given up, so far as it can be made clear why the poet has given no direct expression to it. And this can be done. The thought of a man's redeeming himself is far from the poet's mind; and the contrast which he has before his mind is this: no man can redeem another, Elohim only can redeem man. That one of his fellow-men cannot redeem a man, is expressed as strongly as possible by the words לֹא יִפְדֶּה אִישׁ אֶת אֶחָיו; the negative in other instances stands after the intensive infinitive, but here, as in Gen. iii. 4, Amos ix. 8, Isa. xxviii. 28, before it. By an easy flight of irony, ver. 9 says that the λύτρον which is required to be paid for the souls of men is too precious, i.e. exorbitant, or such as cannot be found, and that he (whoever might wish to lay it down) lets it alone (is obliged to let it alone) for ever. Thus much is clear enough, so far as the language is concerned (וְיִתְּרֵל according to the consec. temp. = וְיִתְּרֵל), and, although somewhat fully expressed, is perfectly in accordance with the connection. But how is ver. 10 attached to what precedes? Hengstenberg renders it, "he must for ever give it up, that he should live continually and not see the grave." But according to the syntax, וְיִתְּרֵל cannot be attached to וְיִתְּרֵל, but only to the futures in ver. 8, ranking with which the voluntative וְיִתְּרֵל, et vivat, is equivalent to the consequential ut vivat (Ew. § 347, a). Thus, therefore, nothing remains but to take ver. 9 (which von Ortenberg expunges as a gloss upon ver. 8) as a parenthesis; the principal clause affirms that no man can give to God a ransom that shall protect another against death, so that this other should still continue (עוֹר) to live, and that without end (לְנֶצְחַיִם), without seeing the grave, i.e. without being obliged to go down into the grave. The כִּי in ver. 11 is now confirmatory of what is denied by its opposite; it is, therefore, according to the sense, imo (cf. 1 Kings

xxi. 15): . . . that he may not see the grave—no indeed, without being able to interpose and alter it, he must see how all men, without distinction, succumb to death. Designedly the word used of the death of wise men is מוֹת, and of the death of the fool and the stupid man, אָבַר. Kurtz renders: “together with the fool and the slow of understanding;” but יַחַד as a proposition cannot be supported; moreover, וְעֹבְדֵי would then have “the wise” as its subject, which is surely not the intention of the poet. Everything without distinction, and in mingled confusion, falls a prey to death; the rich man must see it, and yet he is at the same time possessed by the foolish delusion that he, with his wealth, is immortal. The reading קְבָרִים (LXX., Targ., Syr.), preferred by Ewald, and the conjecture קְבָרָם, adopted by Olshausen and Riehm, give a thought that is not altogether contrary to the connection, viz. the narrow grave is the eternal habitation of those who called broad lands their own; but this thought appears here, in view of ver. 12c, too early. קָרָב denotes the inward part, or that which is within, described according to that which encircles or contains it: that which is within them is, “their houses (pronounce bättēmo) are for ever” (Hengstenberg, Hitzig); i.e. the contents of their inward part is the self-delusion that their houses are everlasting, and their habitations so durable that one generation after another will pass over them; cf. the similar style of expression in x. 4b, Esth. v. 7. Hitzig further renders: men celebrate their names in the lands; קָרָא בְּשֵׁם, to call with a name = solemnly to proclaim it, to mention any one’s name with honour (Isa. xlv. 5). But it is unlikely that the subject of קָרָא should now again be any other than the rich men themselves; and עָלֵי אֲדָמוֹת for בְּכָל-הָאָרֶץ or בְּאֲרָצוֹת is contrary to the usage of the language. אֲדָמָה is the earth as tillage, אֲדָמוֹת (only in this passage) in this connection, fields, estates, lands; the proclaiming of names is, according to 2 Sam. xii. 28, 1 Kings viii. 43, Amos ix. 12, equivalent to the calling of the lands or estates after their (the possessors’) names (Böttcher, Hupfeld, Kurtz). The idea of the rich is, their houses and dwelling-places (and they themselves who have grown up together with them) are of eternal duration; accordingly they solemnly give their own names to their lands, as being the names of immortals. But, adds the poet, man בִּיקָר, in the pomp of his riches and outward show, abideth not (non pernoctat = non permanet). בִּיקֵר is the complement of the subject, although it logically (cf. xxv. 13) also belongs to בְּלִיָּוִן. Böttcher has shown the impropriety of reading בְּלִיָּבִין here according to ver. 21. There are other instances also of refrains that are not exact repetitions; and this correction is moreover at once overthrown by the fact that בֵּל will not suit יבִין, it would stamp each man of rank, as such, as one deficient in intelligence. On the other hand, this emotional negative בֵּל is admirably suitable to לֵין: no indeed, he has no abiding. He is compared (נְמִשָּׁל) like the New Testament ὠμοιωθή), of like kind and lot, to cattle (בָּ as in Job xxx. 19). נְרָמִי is an attributive clause to כַּפְּהָמוֹת: like heads of cattle which are cut off or destroyed. The verb is so chosen that it is appropriate at the same time to men who are likened to the beasts (Hos. x. 7, 15, Obad. ver. 5, Isa. vi. 5).

Vers. 14-21. Second part of the discourse, of equal compass with the first. Those who are thought to be immortal are laid low in Hades; whilst, on the other hand, those who cleave to God can hope to be redeemed by Him out of Hades. Olshausen complains on this passage that the expression is abrupt, rugged, and in part altogether obscure. The fault, however, lies not, as he thinks, in a serious corruption of the text, but in the style, designedly adopted, of Psalms like this of a gloomy turn. וְהָרָפָם refers back to ver. 13, which is the proper mashal of the Psalm: this is their way or walk (דָּרָה) as in xxxvii. 5, cf. Hag. i. 5). Close upon this follows לְמִן לְמִן (their way), of those (cf. lxi. 4) who possess self-confidence; לְמִן signifies confidence both in a good and bad sense, self-confidence, impudence, and even (Eccles. vii. 25) in general, folly. The attributive clause is continued in ver. 14b: and of those who after them (i.e. when they have spoken, as Hitzig takes it), or in a more universal sense: after or behind them (i.e. treading in their footsteps), have pleasure in their mouth, i.e. their haughty, insolent, rash words (cf. Judg. ix. 38). If the meaning were "and after them go those who," etc., then one would expect to find a verb in connection with אַחֲרֵיהֶם (cf. Job xxi. 33). As a collateral definition, "after them = after their death," it would, however, without any reason, exclude the idea of the assent given by their cotemporaries. It is therefore to be explained according to Job xxix. 22, or more universally according to Deut. xii. 30. It may seem remarkable that the music here strikes in forte; but music can on its part, in mournfully shrill tones, also bewail the folly of the world.

Ver. 15, so full of eschatological meaning, now describes what becomes of the departed. The subject of שְׁתִּי (as in lxxiii. 9, where it is Milra, for שְׁתִּי) is not, as perhaps in the case of ἀπαιτούσω, Luke xii. 20, higher powers that are not named; but שָׁמָ (here שְׁתִּי), as in iii. 7, Hos. vi. 11, Isa. xxii. 7, is used in a semi-passive sense: like a herd of sheep they lay themselves down or they are made to lie down לְשָׂאֵל (thus it is pointed by Ben-Asher; whereas Ben-Naphtali points לְשָׂאֵל, with a silent Shebâ), to Hades = down into Hades (cf. lxxxviii. 7), so that they are shut up in it like sheep in their fold. And who is the shepherd there who rules these sheep with his rod? מִיּוֹת יָרְעֵם. Not the good Shepherd (xxiii. 1), whose pasture is the land of the living, but Death, into whose power they have fallen irrecoverably, shall pasture them. Death is personified, as in Job xviii. 14, as the king of terrors. The modus consecutivus, יִרְדֶּה, now expresses the fact that will be realized in the future, which is the reverse side of that other fact. After the night of affliction has swiftly passed away, there breaks forth, for the upright, a morning; and in this morning they find themselves to be lords over these their oppressors, like conquerors, who put their feet upon the necks of the vanquished (the LXX. well renders it by κατακυριεύουσιν). Thus shall it be with the upright, whilst the rich at their feet beneath, in the ground, are utterly destroyed. לְבָקָר has Rebia magnum, יִשְׂרָיִים has Asla-Legarme; accordingly the former word does not belong to what follows (in the morning, then vanishes . . .), but to what precedes. צִיר or צִירָ (as in Isa. xlv. 16) signifies a form or image, just as צִירָ (صورة) is generally used; properly, that which is pressed in or pressed out, i.e. primarily something moulded or fashioned by the pressure of the hand (as in the case of the potter, יִצֵר) or by means of some instrument that impresses and cuts the material. Here the word is used to denote materiality or corporeity, including the whole outward appearance (φαντασία, Acts xxv. 23). The לְ which refers to this, shows that  $\text{וְצִוְרָהֶם}$  is not a contraction of  $\text{וְצִוְרָהֶם}$  (vid. on xxvii. 5). Their materiality, their whole outward form belonging to this present state of being, becomes (falls away)  $\text{לְבַלְלוֹת שְׂאוֹל}$ . The Lamed is used in the same way as in  $\text{הָיָה לְבָעֵר}$ , Isa. vi. 13; and  $\text{שְׂאוֹל}$  is subject, like, e.g., the noun that follows the infinitive in lxviii. 19, Job xxxiv. 22. The same idea is obtained if it is rendered: and their form Hades is ready to consume (consumpturus est); but the order of the words, though not making this rendering impossible (cf. xxxii. 9, so far as  $\text{וְעֵינָי}$  there means "its cheek"), is, however, less favourable to it (cf. Prov. xix. 8, Esth. iii. 11).  $\text{בְּלָה}$  was the most appropriate word for the slow, but sure and entire, consuming away (Job xiii. 28) of the dead body which is gnawed or destroyed in the grave, this gate of the lower world. To this is added  $\text{לֹא מְנוּבָל לֵו}$  as a negative definition of the effect: so that there no longer remains to it, i.e. to the pompous external nature of the ungodly, any dwelling-place, and in general any place whatever; for whatever they had in and about themselves is destroyed, so that they wander to and fro as bare shadows in the dreary waste of Hades. To them, who thought to have built houses for eternity and called great districts of country after their own names, there remains no longer any  $\text{בְּלָה}$  of this corporeal nature, inasmuch as Hades gradually and surely destroys it; it is for ever freed from its solid and dazzling shell, it wastes away lonesome in the grave, it perishes leaving no trace behind. Hupfeld's interpretation is substantially the same, and that of Jerome even is similar: et figura eorum conteretur in infero post habitaculum suum; and Symmachus:  $\text{\tau\o\ \delta\epsilon\ \kappa\rho\alpha\tau\epsilon\rho\delta\omicron\nu\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\omega\omicron\nu\ \pi\alpha\lambda\alpha\iota\omega\sigma\epsilon\iota\ \acute{\alpha}\delta\eta\varsigma\ \acute{\alpha}\pi\omicron\ \tau\eta\varsigma\ \omicron\iota\kappa\eta\sigma\epsilon\omega\varsigma\ \tau\eta\varsigma\ \acute{\epsilon}\nu\tau\iota\mu\omicron\nu\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\omega\omicron\nu}$ .

Other expositors, it is true, solve the riddle of the half-verse in a totally different way. Mendelssohn refers  $\text{וְצִוְרָה}$  to the upright: whose being lasts longer than the grave (survives it), hence it cannot be a habitation (eternal dwelling) to it; and adds, "the poet could not speak more clearly of the resurrection (immortality)." \* A modern Jewish Christian, Isr. Pick, looked upon in Jerusalem as dead, sees here a prediction of the breaking through of the realm of the dead by the risen

* In the fragments of a commentary to his translation of Psalms, contributed by David Friedländer

One: "Their Rock is there, to break through the realm of the dead, that it may no longer serve Him as an abode."* Von Hofmann's interpretation (last of all in his Schriftbeweis ii. 2, 499, 2d edition) lays claim to a more detailed consideration, because it has been sought to maintain it against all objections. By the morning he understands the end of the state or condition of death both of the righteous and of the ungodly. "In the state of death have they both alike found themselves: but now the dominion of death is at an end, and the dominion of the righteous begins." But those who have, according to ver. 15, died are only the ungodly, not the righteous as well. Hofmann then goes on to explain: their bodily form succumbs to the destruction of the lower world, so that it no longer has any abode; which is said to convey the thought, that the ungodly, "by means of the destruction of the lower world, to which their corporeal nature in common with themselves becomes subject, lose its last gloomy abode, but thereby lose their corporeal nature itself, which has now no longer any continuance:" "their existence becomes henceforth one absolutely devoid of possessions and of space, [the exact opposite of the time when they possessed houses built for eternity, and broad tracts of country bore their name.]" But even according to the teaching of the Old Testament concerning the last things, in the period after the Exile, the resurrection includes the righteous and the unrighteous (Dan. xii. 2); and according to the teaching of the New Testament, the damned, after Death and Hades are cast into the lake of fire, receive another גֹּבַי, viz. Geheenna, which stands in just the same relation to Hades as the transformed world does to the old heavens and the old earth. The thought discovered in ver. 15, therefore, will not bear being put to the proof. There is, however, this further consideration, that nothing whatever is known in any other part of the Old Testament of such a destruction of She'ol; and לְבִלְיֹת found in the Psalm before us would be a most inappropriate word to express it, instead of which it ought to have been לְבִלְיֹת; for the figurative language in cii. 27, Isa. li. 6, is worthless as a justification of this word, which signifies a gradual wearing out and using up or consuming, and must not, in opposition to the usage of the language, be explained according to לַבַּיִת and לְבַיִת. For this reason we refrain from making this passage a locus classicus in favour of an eschatological conception which cannot be supported by any other passage in the Old Testament. On the other side, however, the meaning of לְבַקֵּר is limited if it be understood only of the morning which dawns upon the righteous one after the night of affliction, as Kurtz does. What is, in fact, meant is a morning which not merely for individuals, but for all the upright, will be the end of oppression and the dawn of dominion: the ungodly are totally destroyed, and they (the upright) now triumph above their graves. In these words is expressed, in the manner of the Old Testament, the end of all time. Even according to Old Testament conception human history closes with the victory of good over evil. So far ver. 15 is really a "riddle" of the last great day; expressed in New Testament language, of the resurrection morn, on which οἱ ἄγιοι τὸν κόσμον κρινούσι (1 Cor. vi. 2).

With אֵס, in ver. 16 (used here adversatively, as e.g. in Job xiii. 15, and as אֵס is more frequently used), the poet contrasts the totally different lot that awaits him with the lot of the rich who are satisfied in themselves and unmindful of God. אֵס belongs logically to אֲשֶׁר־אֵס, but (as is moreover frequently the case with אֵס, אֵס, and אֵס) is, notwithstanding this relation to a following member of the sentence, placed at the head of the sentence: yet Elohim will redeem my soul out of the hand of Sheôl (lxxxix. 49, Hos. xiii. 14). In what sense the poet means this redemption to be understood is shown by the allusion to the history of Enoch (Gen. v. 24) contained in אֵס אֲשֶׁר־אֵס. Böttcher shrewdly remarks, that this line of the verse is all the more expressive by reason of its relative shortness. Its meaning cannot be: He will take me under His protection; for אֵס does not mean this. The true parallels are lxxiii. 24, Gen. v. 24. The removals of Enoch and Elijah were, as it were, finger-posts which pointed forward beyond the cheerless idea they possessed of the way of all men, into the depth of Hades. Glancing at these, the poet, who here speaks in the name of all upright sufferers, gives expression to the hope, that God will wrest him out of the power of Sheôl and take him to Himself. It is a hope that possesses no direct word of God upon which it could rest; it is not until later on that it receives the support of divine promise, and is for the present only a "bold flight" of faith. Nor can we, for this very reason, attempt to define in what way the poet conceived of this redemption and this taking to Himself. In this matter he himself has no fully developed knowledge; the substance of his hope is only a dim inkling of what may be. This dimness that is only gradually lighted up, which lies over the last things in the Old Testament, is the result of a divine plan of education, in accordance with which the hope of eternal life was gradually to mature, and to be born as it were out of this wrestling faith itself. This faith is expressed in ver. 16; and the music accompanies his confidence in cheerful and rejoicing strains.

After this, in vers. 17 sqq., there is a return from the lyric strain to the gnomic and didactic. It must not, with Mendelssohn, be rendered: let it (my soul) not be afraid; but, since the psalmist begins after the manner of a discourse: fear thou not. The increasing קְבוֹר, i.e. might, abundance, and outward show (all these combined, from קָבַר, grave esse), of the prosperous oppressor is not to make the saint afraid: he must after all die, and cannot take hence with him הַכֹּל, the all = anything whatever (cf. לְכֹל, for anything whatever, Jer. xiii. 7). כִּי, ver. 17, like έάν, puts a supposable case; כִּי, ver. 18, is confirmatory; and כִּי, ver. 19a, is concessive, in the sense of כִּי־כִי, according to Ew. § 362, b: even though he blessed his soul during his life, i.e. called it fortunate, and flattered it by cherished voluptuousness (cf. Deut. xxix. 18, הִתְפַּרֵּן בְּנַפְשׁוֹ, and the soliloquy of the rich man in Luke xii. 19), and though they praise thee, O rich man, because thou dost enjoy thyself (Luke xvi. 25), wishing themselves equally fortunate, still it (the soul of such an one) will be obliged to come or pass עַד־דֹּר אֲבוֹתָיו. There is no necessity for taking the noun דֹּר here in the rare signification dwelling (Arabic dâr, synonym of menzîl), and it appears the most natural way to supply נַפְשׁוֹ as the subject to תְּבוֹא (Hofmann, Kurtz, and others), seeing that one would expect to find אֲבוֹתָיִךְ in the case of תְּבוֹא being a form of address. And there is then no need, in order to support the synallage, which is at any rate inelegant, to suppose that the suffix יִי takes its rise from the formula אֵל־אֲבוֹתָי (נְיָאֵרָה) בוֹא, and is, in spite of the unsuitable grammatical connection, retained, just as יְהוָה and בְּכֻלָּם, without regard to the suffixes, signify "together" and "all together" (Böttcher). Certainly the poet delights in difficulties of style, of which quite sufficient remain to him without adding this to the list. It is also not clear whether ver. 20b is intended to be taken as a relative clause intimately attached to אֲבוֹתָיו, or as an independent clause. The latter is admissible, and therefore to be preferred: there are the proud rich men together with their fathers buried in darkness for ever, without ever again seeing the light of a life which is not a mere shadowy life.

The didactic discourse now closes with the same proverb as the first part, ver. 13. But instead of בְּלִי יָלֵן the expression here used is וְלֹא יָבִין, which is co-ordinate with בְּיָקָר as a second attributive definition of the subject (Ew. § 351, b): a man in glory and who has no understanding, viz. does not distinguish between that which is perishable and that which is imperishable, between time and eternity. The proverb is here more precisely expressed. The gloomy prospect of the future does not belong to the rich man as such, but to the worldly and carnally minded rich man.

PSALM L.

DIVINE DISCOURSE CONCERNING THE TRUE SACRIFICE AND WORSHIP.

- 1 EL ELOHIM JAHVE speaketh,
And summoneth the earth from the rising of the sun to its going down.
- 2 Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, Elohim shineth.
- 3 Our God will come and shall not keep silence;
Fire devoureth before Him,
And round about Him it is very tempestuous.
- 4 He calleth to the heavens above
And to the earth to come to judge His people.
- 5 "Gather My saints together unto Me,
Who make a covenant with Me over sacrifice!"—

- 6 And the heavens proclaim His righteousness,
For Elohim purposeth to sit in judgment. (Sela.)
- 7 Hear, then, My people, and I will speak;
O Israel, and I will testify to thee—
Elohim, thy God am I.
- 8 Not for thy sacrifices do I reprove thee,
And thy burnt-offerings are continually before Me.
- 9 I have no need to take bullocks out of thy house,
Nor he-goats out of thy folds.
- 10 For Mine is every beast of the forest,
The cattle upon a thousand hills.
- 11 I know every bird of the mountains,
And that which moveth on the meadows is with Me.
- 12 If I were hungry I would not tell thee,
For Mine is the world and its fulness.
- 13 Should I eat the flesh of bulls?
And the blood of he-goats should I drink?
- 14 Offer unto God thanksgiving,
And pay to the Most High thy vows.
- 15 And call upon Me in the day of trouble—
I will deliver thee, and thou shalt honour Me.
- 16 But to the evil-doer Elohim saith:
How dost thou dare to tell My statutes,
And that thou takest My covenant into thy mouth;
- 17 Whereas thou nevertheless hatest instruction,
And castest My words behind thee?!
- 18 When thou seest a thief, thou takest pleasure in him,
And with adulterers dost thou make thyself familiar.
- 19 Thou lettest thy mouth loose to wickedness,
And thy tongue frameth deceit.
- 20 Thou sittest and slanderest thy brother,
Upon thy mother's son thou bringest reproach.
- 21 These things doest thou, and, because I keep silence,
Thou thinkest I am exactly like thee—
I will show thee and set it before thine eyes.
- 22 Consider, now, this, ye who forget God,
Lest I tear in pieces and there be none to rescue.

- 23 Whoso offereth thanksgiving, honoureth Me truly,
 And prepareth a way, in which I may show him the salvation of Elohim.

With the preceding Psalm the series of the Korahitic Elohim-Psalms of the primary collection (Ps. i.-lxxii.) closes. There are, reckoning Ps. xlii. and xliii. as one Psalm, seven of them (Ps. xlii.-xlix.). They form the principal group of the Korahitic Psalms, to which the third book furnishes a supplement, bearing in part an Elohimic (Ps. lxxxiv.) and in part a Jehovic impress (Ps. lxxxv., lxxxvii., lxxxviii.). The Asaphic Psalms, on the contrary, belong exclusively to the Elohimic style of Psalms, but do not, however, all stand together: the principal group of them is to be found in the third book (Ps. lxxiii.-lxxxiii.), and the primary collection contains only one of them, viz. Ps. l., which is here placed immediately after Ps. xlix. on account of several points of mutual relationship, and more especially because the prominent Hear then, My people (l. 7), is in accord with the beginning of Ps. xlix., Hear, all ye peoples.

According to 1 Chron. xxiii. 2-5, the whole of the thirty-eight thousand Levites were divided by David into four divisions (24,000 + 6000 + 4000 + 4000). To the fourth division (4000) was assigned the music belonging to divine worship. Out of this division, however, a select company of two hundred and eighty-eight singers was further singled out, and divided into twenty-four classes. These last were placed under three leaders or precentors (Sangmeister), viz. fourteen classes under Heman the Kehathite and his fourteen sons; four classes under Asaph the Gersonite and his four sons; and six classes under Ethan (Jeduthun) and his six sons (1 Chron. ch. xxv., cf. ch. xv. 17 sqq.). The instruments played by these three leaders, which they made use of on account of their clear, penetrating sound, were the cymbals (1 Chron. xv. 19). Also in 1 Chron. xvi. 5, where Asaph is described as the chief (הַרְאֵשׁ) of the sacred music in the tent where the Ark was placed, he strikes the cymbals. That he was the chief, first leader, cannot be affirmed. The usual order of the names is "Heman, Asaph, and Ethan." The same order is also observed in the genealogies of the three in

History bears witness to the fact that Asaph was also a Psalm-writer. For, according to 2 Chron. xxix. 30, Hezekiah brought "the words of David and of Asaph the seer" into use again in the service of the house of God. And in the Book of Nehemiah, ch. xii. 46, David and Asaph are placed side by side as רִאשֵׁי הַמְּשֻׁרְרִים in the days of old in Israel.

The twelve Psalms bearing the inscription לְאָסָפָה are all Elohimic. The name of God יהוה does not occur at all in two (lxxvii., lxxxii.), and in the rest only once, or at the most twice. Side by side with אֱלֹהִים, אֲדֹנָי, and אֱל are used as favourite names, and especial preference is also given to עֲלִיּוֹן. Of compounded names of God, אֱלֹהִים יְהוה (only besides in Josh. xxii. 22) in the Psalter, and אֱלֹהִים צְבָאוֹת in the Old Testament Scriptures generally (vid. Symbolæ, pp. 14-16), are exclusively peculiar to them. So far as concerns their contents, they are distinguished from the Korahitic Psalms by their prophetically judicial character. As in the prophets, God is frequently introduced as speaking; and we meet with detailed prophetic pictures of the appearing of God the Judge, together with somewhat long judicial addresses (Ps. l., lxxv., lxxxii.). The appellation הַחַיָּה, which Asaph bears in 2 Chron. xxix. 30, accords with this; notwithstanding the chronicler also applies the same epithet to both the other precentors. The ground of this, as with נָבִיא, which is used by the chronicler of the singing and playing of instruments in the service of the house of God, is to be found in the intimate connection between the sacred lyric and prophecy as a whole. The future visionary character of the Asaphic Psalms has its reverse side in the historical past. We frequently meet with descriptive retrospective glances at facts of the primeval history (lxxiv. 13-15, lxxvii. 15 sqq., lxxx. 9-12, lxxxii. 5-8, lxxxiii. 10-12), and Ps. lxxviii. is entirely taken up with holding up the mirror of the ancient history of the nation to the people of the present. If we read the twelve Psalms of Asaph in order one after the other, we shall, moreover, observe this striking characteristic, that mention is made of Joseph and the tribes descended from him more frequently than anywhere else (lxxvii. 16, lxxviii. 9, 67 sq., lxxxii. 6, lxxx. 2 sq.). Nor is another feature less remarkable, viz. that the mutual relationship of Jahve to Israel is set forth under the figure of the shepherd and his flock rather than any other (lxxiv. 1, lxxvii. 21, lxxviii. 52, cf. lxx.-lxxii., lxxix. 13, lxxx. 2). Moreover these Psalms delight in other respects to vary the designations for the people of God as much as possible.

In Ps. l., lxxiii.-lxxxiii., we have before us a peculiar type of Psalms. The inscription אֲשָפֹרָה has, so to speak, deep-lying internal grounds in its support. But it does not follow from this inscription that all these Psalms were composed by the aged Asaph, who, as lxxviii. 69 shows, lived until the early part of Solomon's reign. The outward marks peculiar to Asaph were continued in his posterity even into the period after the Exile. History mentions Asaphites under Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xx. 14), under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix. 13), and among the exiles who returned (Ezra ii. 41, cf. iii. 10, one hundred and twenty-eight Asaphites; Neh. vii. 44, cf. xi. 22, a hundred and forty-eight of them). Since down to the period after the Exile even the cymbals (צִלְצִלִּים) descended to them from their ancestor, the poetic talent and enthusiasm may also have been hereditary among them. The later "Psalms of Asaph," whether composed by later Asaphites or some other person, are inscribed אֲשָפֹרָה because, by whomsoever, they are composed in the style of Asaph and after Asaphic models. Ps. l., however, is an original Psalm of Asaph.

After the manner of the prophets the twofold truth is here advanced, that God has no delight in animal sacrifice without the sacrifice of prayer in which the heart is engaged, and that the confession of His word without a life that accords with His word is an abomination to Him. It is the very same fundamental thought which is expressed in xl. 7-9, lxix. 31 sq., li. 18 sq., and underlies Ps. xxiv. (1-6) and xv.; they are all echoes of the grand utterance of Samuel (1 Sam. xv. 22), the father of the poetry of the Psalms. It cannot surprise one that stress is laid on this denunciation of a heartless service of works by so many voices during the Davidic age. The nothingness of the opus operatum is also later on the watchword of the prophets in times when religious observances, well ordered and in accordance with legal prescription, predominate in Judah. Nor should it seem strange that Asaph the Levite, who was appointed to the sanctuary on Zion, expresses himself thus; for Jeremiah was also a Levite and even a priest (cohen), and yet no one has spoken a bolder, and more cutting word against the outward and formal service of sacrifice than he (Jer. vii. 22 sq.). Both these objections being removed, there is nothing else that stands in the way of our ascribing this Psalm to Asaph himself. This is favoured by echoes of the Psalm in the prophets (cf. ver. 2 with Lam. ii. 15, and the verse-ending ver. 8, xxxviii. 18, with Isa. xlix. 16), and there is nothing opposed to it in the form of the language.

Vers. 1-3. The theophany. The names of God are heaped up in ver. 1 in order to gain a thoroughly full-toned exordium for the description of God as the Judge of the world. Hupfeld considers this heaping up cold and stiff; but it is exactly in accordance with the taste of the Elohimic style. The three names are co-ordinate with one another; for אֱלֹהִים אֵל does not mean "God of gods," which would rather be expressed by אֱלֹהֵי הָאֱלֹהִים or אֱלִים אֵל. אֵל is the name for God as the Almighty; אֱלֹהִים as the Revered One; יְהוָה as the Being, absolute in His existence, and who accordingly freely influences and moulds history after His own plan—this His peculiar proper-name is the third in the triad. Perfects alternate in vers. 1-6 with futures, at one time the idea of that which is actually taking place, and at another of that which is future, predominating. Jahve summons the earth to be a witness of the divine judgment upon the people of the covenant. The addition "from the rising of the sun to its going down," shows that the poet means the earth in respect of its inhabitants. He speaks, and because what He speaks is of universal significance He makes the earth in all its compass His audience. This summons precedes His self-manifestation. It is to be construed, with Aquila, the Syriac, Jerome, Tremellius, and Montanus, "out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, Elohim shineth." Zion, the perfect in beauty (cf. the dependent passage Lam. ii. 15, and 1 Macc. ii. 12, where the temple is called ἡ καλλονὴ ἡμῶν), because the place of the presence of God the glorious One, is the bright spot whence the brightness of the divine manifestation spreads forth like the rising sun. In itself certainly it is not inappropriate, with the LXX., Vulgate, and Luther, to take מְגִלְלֵי יְפִי as a designation of the manifestation of Elohim in His glory, which is the non pius ultra of beauty, and consequently to be explained according to Ezek. xxviii. 12, cf. Ex. xxxiii. 19, and not according to Lam. ii. 15 (more particularly since Jeremiah so readily gives a new turn to the language of older writers). But, taking the fact into consideration that nowhere in Scripture is beauty (יָפִי) thus directly predicated of God, to whom peculiarly belongs a glory that transcends all beauty, we must follow the guidance of the accentuation, which marks מְכַל־יָפִי by Mercha as in apposition with צִיּוֹן (cf. Psychol. S. 49; tr. p. 60). The poet beholds the appearing of God, an appearing that resembles the rising of the sun (הוֹפֵיעַ, as in the Asaph Psalm lxxx. 2, after Deut. xxxiii. 2, from הֵפַע, with a transition of the primary notion of rising, יָפַע, יָפַע, to that of beaming forth and lighting up far and wide, as in שָׁטַע); for "our God will come and by no means keep silence." It is not to be rendered: Let our God come (Hupfeld) and not keep silence (Olshausen). The former wish comes too late after the preceding הוֹפֵיעַ (הוֹפֵיעַ is consequently veniet, and written as e.g. in xxxvii. 13), and the latter is superfluous. אֵל, as in xxxiv. 6, xli. 3, Isa. ii. 9, and frequently, implies in the negative a lively interest on the part of the writer: He cannot, He dare not keep silence, His glory will not allow it. He who gave the Law, will enter into judgment with those who have it and do not keep it; He cannot long look on and keep silence. He must punish, and first of all by word in order to warn them against the punishment by deeds. Fire and storm are the harbingers of the Lawgiver of Sinai who now appears as Judge. The fire threatens to consume the sinners, and the storm (viz. a tempest accompanied with lightning and thunder, as in Job xxxviii. 1) threatens to drive them away like chaff. The expression in ver. 3b is like xviii. 9. The fem. Niph. נִשְׁעָרָה does not refer to אֵשׁ, but is used as neuter: it is stormed, i.e. a storm rages (Apollinaris, ἐλαιλαπίσθη σφόδρα). The fire is His wrath; and the storm the power or force of His wrath.

Vers. 4-6. The judgment scene. To the heavens above (מֵעַל, elsewhere a preposition, here, as in Gen. xxvii. 39, xlix. 25, an adverb, desuper, superne) and to the earth God calls (לְאָרְצָא as, e.g., Gen. xxviii. 1), to both לְרֵיץ עַמּוֹ, in order to sit in judgment upon His people in their presence, and with them as witnesses of His doings. Or is it not that they are summoned to attend, but that the commission, ver. 5, is addressed to them (Olshausen, Hitzig)? Certainly not, for the act of gathering is not one that properly belongs to the heavens and the earth, which, however, because they exist from the beginning and will last for ever, are suited to be witnesses (Deut. iv. 26, xxxii. 1, Isa. i. 2, 1 Macc. ii. 37). The summons אָסַפּי is addressed, as in Matt. xxiv. 31, and frequently in visions, to the celestial spirits, the servants of the God here appearing. The accused who are to be brought before the divine tribunal are mentioned by names which, without their state of mind and heart corresponding to them, express the relationship to Himself in which God has placed them (cf. Deut. xxxii. 15, Isa. xlii. 19). They are called הַסִּידִים, as in the Asaph Psalm lxxix. 2. This contradiction between their relationship and their conduct makes an undesigned but bitter irony. In a covenant relationship, consecrated and ratified by a covenant sacrifice (עֲלִיָּה זָבַח similar to xcii. 4, Num. x. 10), has God placed Himself towards them (Ex. xxiv.); and this covenant relationship is also maintained on their part by offering sacrifices as an expression of their obedience and of their fidelity. The participle בִּרְתִּי here implies the constant continuance of that primary covenant-making. Now, while the accused are gathered up, the poet hears the heavens solemnly acknowledge the righteousness of the Judge beforehand. The participial construction הוּא שֹׁפֵט הוּא, which always, according to the connection, expresses the present (Nah. i. 2), or the past (Judg. iv. 4), or the future (Isa. xxv. 31), is in this instance an expression of that which is near at hand (fut. instans). הוּא has not the sense of ipse (Ew. § 314, a), for it corresponds to the "I" in אֲנִי שֹׁפֵט or הֲנִי שֹׁפֵט; and פִּי is not to be translated by nam (Hitzig), for the fact that God intends to judge requires no further announcement. On the contrary, because God is just now in the act of sitting in judgment, the heavens, the witnesses most prominent and nearest to Him, bear witness to His righteousness. The earthly music, as the סִלָּה directs, is here to join in with the celestial praise. Nothing further is now wanting to the completeness of the judgment scene; the action now begins.

Vers. 7-15. Exposition of the sacrificial Tōra for the good of those whose holiness consists in outward works. The forms strengthened by ah, in ver. 7, describe God's earnest desire to have Israel for willing hearers as being quite as strong as His desire to speak and to bear witness. הָעֵירָב, obtestari aliquem, to come forward as witness, either solemnly assuring, or, as here and in the Psalm of Asaph, lxxx. 9, earnestly warning and punishing (cf. שָׁהַד with ב, to bear witness against any one). On the Dagesh forte conjunctive in הָעֵירָב, vid. Ges. § 20, 2, a. He who is speaking has a right thus to stand face to face with Israel, for he is Elohim, the God of Israel—by which designation reference is made to the words אֲנִי יְהוָה אֱלֹהֶיךָ (Ex. xx. 2), with which begins the Law as given from Sinai, and which here take the Elohimic form (whereas in lxxx. 11 they remain unaltered) and are inverted in accordance with the context. As ver. 8 states, it is not the material sacrifices, which Israel continually, without cessation, offers, that are the object of the censuring testimony. וְעוֹלֹתֶיךָ, even if it has Mugrash, as in Baer, is not on this account, according to the interpretation given by the accentuation, equivalent to וְעַל-עוֹלוֹתֶיךָ (cf. on the other hand xxxviii. 18); it is a simple assertory substantival clause: thy burnt-offerings are, without intermission, continually before Me. God will not dispute about sacrifices in their outward characteristics; for—so vers. 9-11 go on to say—He does not need sacrifices for the sake of receiving from Israel what He does not otherwise possess. His is every wild beast (הַיַּחֲזִיר, as in the Asaph Psalm, lxxix. 2) of the forest, His the cattle בְּהֵמַת הָאֲלֵף, upon the mountains of a thousand, i.e. upon the thousand (and myriad) mountains (similar to מִתֵּי מִכְפָּר or מִתֵּי מֵעַט), or: where they live by thousands (a similar combination to נִבְלָל עֲשׂוֹר). Both explanations of the genitive are unsupported by any perfectly analogous instance so far as language is concerned; the former, however, is to be preferred on account of the singular, which is better suited to it. He knows every bird that makes its home on the mountains; יָדַע, as usually, of a knowledge which masters a subject, compasses it and makes it its own. Whatever moves about the fields is with Him, i.e. is within the range of His knowledge (cf. Job xxvii. 11, x. 13), and therefore of His power; יָזַח (here and in the Asaph Psalm lxxx. 14) from יָזַח = יָזַח, to move to and fro, like יָזַח from יָזַח, to sweep out, cf. κινώπετον, κινώδαλον, from κινεῖν. But just as little as God requires sacrifices in order thereby to enrich Himself, is there any need on His part that might be satisfied by sacrifices, vers. 12 sq. If God should hunger, He would not stand in need of man's help in order to satisfy Himself; but He is never hungry, for He is the Being raised above all carnal wants. Just on this account, what God requires is not by any means the outward worship of sacrifice, but a spiritual offering, the worship of the heart, ver. 14. Instead of the שְׁלָמִים, and more particularly זֶבַח הַתּוֹדָה, Lev. vii. 11-15, and שְׁלֵמֵי נֶדָר, Lev. vii. 16 (under the generic idea of which are also included, strictly speaking, vowed thank-offerings), God desires the thanksgiving of the heart and the performance of that which has been vowed in respect of our moral relationship to Himself and to men; and instead of the עוֹלָה in its manifold forms of devotion, the prayer of the heart, which shall not remain unanswered, so that in the round of this λογικῆ λατρεία everything proceeds from and ends in εὐχαριστία. It is not the sacrifices offered in a becoming spirit that are contrasted with those offered without the heart (as, e.g., Sir. xxxii. [xxxv.] 1-9), but the outward sacrifice appears on the whole to be rejected in comparison with the spiritual sacrifice. This entire turning away from the outward form of the legal ceremonial is, in the Old Testament, already a predictive turning towards that worship of God in spirit and in truth which the new covenant makes alone of avail, after the forms of the Law have served as swaddling clothes to the New Testament life which was coming into being in the old covenant. This "becoming" begins even in the Tōra itself, especially in Deuteronomy. Our Psalm, like the Chokma (Prov. xxi. 3), and prophecy in the succeeding age (cf. Hos. vi. 6, Mic. vi. 6-8, Isa. i. 11-15, and other passages), stands upon the standpoint of this concluding book of the Tōra, which traces back all the requirements of the Law to the fundamental command of love.

Vers. 16-21. The accusation of the manifest sinners. It is not those who are addressed in vers. 7 sqq., as Hengstenberg thinks, who are here addressed. Even the position of the words וְלִרְשָׁעִים אָמַר clearly shows that the divine discourse is now turned to another class, viz. to the evil-doers, who, in connection with open and manifest sins and vices, take the word of God upon their lips, a distinct class from those who base their sanctity upon outward works of piety, who outwardly fulfil the commands of God, but satisfy and deceive themselves with this outward observance.  $\text{לֹא כִי־תִלְקֶהָ לְ}$ , what hast thou, that thou = it belongs not to thee, it does not behove thee. With  $\text{וְאֵתָהּ}$ , in ver. 17, an adversative subordinate clause begins: since thou dost not care to know anything of the moral ennobling which it is the design of the Law to give, and my words, instead of having them as a constant test-line before thine eyes, thou castest behind thee and so turnest thy back upon them (cf. Isa. xxxviii. 17).  $\text{וְהִתְרַן}$  is not from  $\text{רָנַן}$  (LXX., Targum, and Saadia), in which case it would have to be pointed  $\text{וְהִתְרַן}$ , but from  $\text{רָצָה}$ , and is construed here, as in Job xxxiv. 9, with  $\text{עָם}$ : to have pleasure in intercourse with any one. In ver. 18a the transgression of the eighth commandment is condemned, in ver. 18b that of the seventh, in vers. 19 sq. that of the ninth (concerning the truthfulness of testimony).  $\text{וְשָׁלַח פִּי בְרָעָה}$ , to give up one's mouth unrestrainedly to evil, i.e. so that evil issues from it.  $\text{וְהִיטִיב}$ , ver. 20a, has reference to gossiping company (cf. i. 1).  $\text{וְהִפְּיָהּ}$  signifies a thrust, a push (cf.  $\text{וְהִרְפָּה}$ ), after which the LXX. renders it  $\epsilon\tau\iota\theta\epsilon\iota\varsigma \sigma\kappa\acute{\alpha}\nu\delta\alpha\lambda\omicron\nu$  (cf. Lev. xix. 14), but it also signifies vexation and mockery (cf.  $\text{וְהִרְפָּה}$ ); it is therefore to be rendered: to bring reproach (Jerome, opprobrium) upon any one, to cover him with dishonour. The preposition  $\text{בְּ}$  with  $\text{וְהִרְפָּהּ}$  has, just as in Num. xii. 1, and frequently, a hostile signification. "Thy mother's son" is he who is born of the same mother with thyself, and not merely of the same father, consequently thy brother after the flesh in the fullest sense. What Jahve says in this passage is exactly the same as that which the apostle of Jesus Christ says in Rom. ii. 17-24. This contradiction between the knowledge and the life of men God must, for His holiness' sake, unmask and punish, ver. 21. The sinner thinks otherwise: God is like himself, i.e. that is also not accounted by God as sin, which he allows himself to do under the cloak of his dead knowledge. For just as a man is in himself, such is his conception also of his God (vid. xviii. 26 sq.). But God will not encourage this foolish idea: "I will therefore reprove thee and set (it) in order before thine eyes" ( $\text{וְאֵתְרַכְּתָהּ}$ , not  $\text{וְאֵעֲרַכְּתָהּ}$ , in order to give expression, the second time at least, to the mood, the form of which has been obliterated by the suffix); He will set before the eyes of the sinner, who practically and also in theory denies the divine holiness, the real state of his heart and life, so that he shall be terrified at it. Instead of הָיָה, the infin. intensit. here, under the influence of the close connection of the clauses (Ew. § 240, c), is הָיָה; the oratio obliqua begins with it, without פִּי (quod). בְּמוֹד exactly corresponds to the German deines Gleichen, thine equal.

Vers. 22, 23. Epilogue of the divine discourse. Under the name שְׁבַחֵי אֱלֹהִים are comprehended the decent or honourable whose sanctity relies upon outward works, and those who know better but give way to licentiousness; and they are warned of the final execution of the sentence which they have deserved. In dead works God delighteth not, but whoso offereth thanksgiving (viz. not shelamim-tôda, but the tôda of the heart), he praises Him* and שָׁם הָרָךְ. It is unnecessary with Luther, following the LXX., Vulgate, and Syriac versions, to read שָׁם. The Talmudic remark אַל תִּקְרִי וְשָׁם אֱלֹהִים וְשָׁם [do not read וְשָׁם, but וְשָׁם] assumes וְשָׁם to be the traditional reading. If we take שָׁם הָרָךְ as a thought complete in itself,—which is perfectly possible in a certain sense (vid. Isa. xliii. 19),—then it is best explained according to the Vulgate (qui ordinat viam), with Böttcher, Maurer, and Hupfeld: viam h. e. recta incedere (lege agere) parans; but the expression is inadequate to express this ethical sense (cf. Prov. iv. 26), and consequently is also without example. The LXX. indicates the correct idea in the rendering καὶ ἐκεῖ ὁδὸς ἣν δειξῶ αὐτῷ τὸ σωτήριον Θεοῦ. The וְשָׁם הָרָךְ (designedly not pointed הָרָךְ), which standing entirely by itself has no definite meaning, receives its requisite supplement by means of the attributive clause that follows. Such an one prepares a way along which I will grant to him to see the salvation of Elohim, i.e. along which I will grant him a rapturous vision of the full reality of My salvation. The form יִכְבְּרֵנִי is without example elsewhere. It sounds like the likewise epenthetical יִקְרָאֵנִי, Prov. i. 28, cf. viii. 17, Hos. v. 15, and may be understood as an imitation of it as regards sound. יִכְבְּרֵנִי (= יִכְבְּרֵנִי) is in the writer's mind as the form out of pause

* In Vedic jag, old Bactrian jaz (whence jag'jas, the primitive word of ἀγίος), the notions of offering and of praising lie one within the other.

‘Ges. § 58, 4). With ver. 23 the Psalm recurs to its central point and climax, ver. 14 sq. What Jahve here discourses in a post-Sinaitic appearing, is the very same discourse concerning the worthlessness of dead works and concerning the true will of God that Jesus addresses to the assembled people when He enters upon His ministry. The cycle of the revelation of the Gospel is linked to the cycle of the revelation of the Law by the Sermon on the Mount; this is the point at which both cycles touch.

PSALM LI.

PENITENTIAL PRAYER AND INTERCESSION FOR RESTORATION TO FAVOUR.

- 3 BE merciful to me, Elohim, according to Thy loving-kindness,
According to the greatness of Thy compassion blot out my transgressions!
- 4 Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity,
And from my sin make me clean.
- 5 For of my transgressions I am conscious,
And my sin is ever present to me.
- 6 Against Thee only have I sinned,
And done that which is evil in Thine eyes;
That Thou mayest appear just when Thou speakest, Clear when Thou judgest.
- 7 Behold, in iniquity was I born,
And in sin did my mother conceive me.
- 8 Behold, truth dost Thou desire in the reins,
And in the hidden part do Thou make me to know wisdom.
- 9 Oh purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean;
Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow.
- 10 Make me to hear joy and gladness,
That the bones which Thou hast crushed may exult.
- 11 Hide Thy face from my sins,
And all my iniquities do Thou blot out.

- 12 Create me a clean heart, Elohim,
And renew a stedfast spirit in my inward part.
- 13 Cast me not from Thy presence,
And Thy Holy Spirit take not from me.
- 14 Turn again upon me the joy of Thy salvation,
And with a spirit of willingness uphold me.
- 15 Then will I teach transgressors Thy ways,
And sinners shall be converted to Thee.
- 16 Deliver me from blood-guiltiness, Elohim, God of my salvation,
Then shall my tongue exult over Thy righteousness.
- 17 O Lord, open Thou my lips,
And my mouth shall declare Thy praise.
- 18 For Thou delightest not in sacrifice, else would I give it, Burnt-offering Thou desirest not.
- 19 The sacrifices of Elohim are a broken spirit,
A heart broken and contrite, Elohim, Thou dost not despise!—
- 20 Do good in Thy good pleasure unto Zion, Build Thou the walls of Jerusalem;
- 21 Then shalt Thou delight in true sacrifices, burnt-offering and whole-burnt-offering;
Then shall bullocks be offered on Thine altar.

The same depreciation of the external sacrifice that is expressed in Ps. l. finds utterance in Ps. li., which supplements the former, according as it extends the spiritualizing of the sacrifice to the offering for sin (cf. xl. 7). This Psalm is the first of the Davidic Elohim-Psalms. The inscription runs: To the Precentor, a Psalm by David, when Nathan the prophet came to him, after he had gone in to Bathsheba. The carelessness of the Hebrew style shows itself in the fact that one and the same phrase is used of Nathan's coming in an official capacity to David (cf. 2 Sam. xii. 1) and of David's going in unto Bathsheba (בָּאָה אֵלַי, as in Gen. vi. 4, xvi. 2, cf. 2 Sam. xi. 4). The comparative בְּאֵשֶׁר, as a particle of time in the whole compass of the Latin quum, holds together that which precedes and that which subsequently takes place. Followed by the perfect (2 Sam. xii. 21, 1 Sam. xii. 8), it has the sense of postquam (cf. the confusing of this כַּאֲשֶׁר with אַחֲרַי אֲשֶׁר, Josh. ii. 7). By בְּיֹמָיו the period within which the composition of the Psalm falls is merely indicated in a general way. The Psalm shows us how David struggles to gain an inward and conscious certainty of the forgiveness of sin, which was announced to him by Nathan (2 Sam. xii. 13). In Ps. vi. and xxxviii. we have already heard David, sick in soul and body, praying for forgiveness; in Ps. li. he has even become calmer and more cheerful in his soul, and there is nothing wanting to him except the rapturous realization of the favour within the range of which he already finds himself. On the other hand, Ps. xxxii. lies even beyond Ps. li. For what David promises in li. 15, viz. that, if favour is again shown to him, he will teach the apostate ones the ways of God, that he will teach sinners how they are to turn to God, we heard him fulfil in the sententious didactic Ps. xxxii.

Hitzig assigns Ps. li., like Ps. l., to the writer of Isa. ch. xl.–lxvi. But the manifold coincidences of matter and of style only prove that this prophet was familiar with the two Psalms. We discern in Ps. li. four parts of decreasing length. The first part, vers. 3–11, contains the prayer for remission of sin; the second, vers. 12–15, the prayer for renewal; the third, vers. 16–19, the vow of spiritual sacrifices; the fourth, vers. 20, 21, the intercession for all Jerusalem. The divine name Elohim occurs five times, and is appropriately distributed throughout the Psalm.

Vers. 3, 4. Prayer for the remission of sin. Concerning the interchangeable names for sin, vid. on xxxii. 1 sq. Although the primary occasion of the Psalm is the sin of adultery, still David says אֲשַׁחֲטֶנּוּ, not merely because many other sins were developed out of it, as his guilt of blood in the case of Uriah, the scandal put into the mouths of the enemies of Jahve, and his self-delusion, which lasted almost a whole year; but also because each solitary sin, the more it is perceived in its fundamental character and, as it were, microscopically discerned, all the more does it appear as a manifold and entangled skein of sins, and stands forth in a still more intimate and terrible relation, as of cause and effect, to the whole corrupt and degenerated condition in which the sinner finds himself. In כְּחַהּ sins are conceived of as a cumulative debt (according to Isa. xliv. 22, cf. xliii. 25, like a thick, dark cloud) written down (Jer. xvii. 1) against the time of the payment by punishment. In כְּבִפְסֵי (from כָּפַס, πλύνειν, to wash by rubbing and kneading up, distinguished from רָחַץ, λούειν, to wash by rinsing) iniquity is conceived of as deeply ingrained dirt. In כְּהִרְגֵי, the usual word for a declarative and de facto making clean, sin is conceived of as a leprosy, Lev. xiii. 6, 34. The Keri runs הָרַב כְּבִפְסֵי (imperat. Hiph., like הִרְרָה, xxxvii. 8), "make great or much, wash me," i.e. (according to Ges. § 142, 3, b) wash me altogether, penitus et totum, which is the same as is expressed by the Chellib הִרְבֵּה (prop. multum faciendo = multum, prorsus, Ges. § 131, 2). In בְּרַב (Isa. lxiii. 7) and הָרַב is expressed the depth of the consciousness of sin; profunda enim malitia, as Martin Geier observes, insolitam varamque gratiam postulat.

Vers. 5, 6. Substantiation of the prayer by the consideration, that his sense of sin is more than superficial, and that he is ready to make a penitential confession. True penitence is not a dead knowledge of sin committed, but a living sensitive consciousness of it (Isa. lix. 12), to which it is ever present as a matter and ground of unrest and pain. This penitential sorrow, which pervades the whole man, is, it is true, no merit that wins mercy or favour, but it is the condition, without which it is impossible for any manifestation of favour to take place. Such true consciousness of sin contemplates sin, of whatever kind it may be, directly as sin against God, and in its ultimate ground as sin against Him alone (אֵתָּא with לְ of the person sinned against, Isa. xlii. 24, Mic. vii. 9); for every relation in which man stands to his fellow-men, and to created things in general, is but the manifest form of his fundamental relationship to God; and sin is "that which is evil in the eyes of God" (Isa. lxxv. 12, lxxvi. 4), it is contradiction to the will of God, the sole and highest Lawgiver and Judge. Thus it is, as David confesses, with regard to his sin, in order that . . . This לְמַעַן must not be weakened by understanding it to refer to the result instead of to the aim or purpose. If, however, it is intended to express intention, it follows close upon the moral relationship of man to God expressed in לְךָ לְבָרֶךְ and הִרְעֵ בְעֵינָיִךְ, —a relationship, the aim of which is, that God, when He now condemns the sinner, may appear as the just and holy One, who, as the sinner is obliged himself to acknowledge, cannot do otherwise than pronounce a condemnatory decision concerning him. When sin becomes manifest to a man as such, he must himself say Amen to the divine sentence, just as David does to that passed upon him by Nathan. And it is just the nature of penitence so to confess one's self to be in the wrong in order that God may be in the right and gain His cause. If, however, the sinner's self-accusation justifies the divine righteousness or justice, just as, on the other hand, all self-justification on the part of the sinner (which, however, sooner or later will be undeceived) accuses God of unrighteousness or injustice (Job xl. 8): then all human sin must in the end tend towards the glorifying of God. In this sense ver. 6*b* is applied by Paul (Rom. iii. 4), inasmuch as he regards what is here written in the Psalter—ὅπως ἂν δικαιωθῆς ἐν τοῖς λόγοις σου, καὶ νικήσῃς ἐν τῷ κρίνεσθαι σε (LXX.)—as the goal towards which the whole history of Israel tends. Instead of בְּדַבְרֶךָ (infin. like שָׁלַחְךָ, Gen. xxxviii. 17, in this instance for the sake of similarity of sound* instead of the otherwise usual form דַּבַּרְךָ), in Thy speaking, the LXX. renders ἐν τοῖς λόγοις σου = בְּדַבְרֶיךָ; instead of בְּשִׁפְטֶיךָ, ἐν τῷ κρίνεσθαι σε = בְּהִשְׁפָּטֶיךָ (infin. Niph.), provided κρίνεσθαι is intended as passive and not (as in Jer. ii. 9 LXX., cf. Matt. v. 40) as middle. The thought remains essentially unchanged by the side of these deviations; and even the taking of the verb זָכָה, to be clean, pure, in the Syriac signification νικᾶν, does not alter it. That God may be justified in His decisive speaking and judging; that He, the Judge, may gain His cause in opposition to all human judgment, towards this tends David's confession of sin, towards this tends all human history, and more especially the history of Israel.

Vers. 7, 8. David here confesses his hereditary sin as the root of his actual sin. The declaration moves backwards from his birth to conception, it consequently penetrates even to the most remote point of life's beginning. הִלְלֵתִי stands instead of * Cf. the following forms, chosen on account of their accord:—נִטְוֵי, xxxii. 1; הִנְדִּיךָ, lxviii. 3; צִאֲיִנָּה, Cant. iii. 11; שְׁתוֹת, Isa. xxii. 13; מְטַחִים, ib. xxv. 6; הִלְוֵי, ib. xxv. 7.

נוֹלְדָתִי, perhaps (although elsewhere, e.g. in xc. 2, the idea of painfulness is kept entirely in the background) with reference to the decree, "with pain shalt thou bring forth children," Gen. iii. 16 (Kurtz); and instead of הִרְתָּה אֶתִּי, with still more definite reference to that which precedes conception, the expression is יִהְיֶה מִתְּנִי (for יִהְיֶה מִנִּי, following the same interchange of vowel as in Gen. xxx. 39, Judg. v. 28). The choice of the verb decides the question whether by עֵינֶן and חָטָא is meant the guilt and sin of the child or of the parents. יָהֵם (to burn with desire) has reference to that, in coition, which partakes of the animal, and may well awaken modest sensibilities in man, without עֵינֶן and חָטָא on that account characterizing birth and conception itself as sin; the meaning is merely, that his parents were sinful human beings, and that this sinful state (habitus) has operated upon his birth and even his conception, and from this point has passed over to him. What is thereby expressed is not so much any self-exculpation, as on the contrary a self-accusation which glances back to the ultimate ground of natural corruption. He is sinful מִלְּרָה וּמִהָרִיזִין (lviii. 4, Gen. viii. 21), is טָמֵא מִטָּמֵא, an unclean one springing from an unclean (Job xiv. 4), flesh born of flesh. That man from his first beginning onwards, and that this beginning itself, is tainted with sin; that the proneness to sin with its guilt and its corruption is propagated from parents to their children; and that consequently in the single actual sin the sin-pervaded nature of man, inasmuch as he allows himself to be determined by it and himself resolves in accordance with it, becomes outwardly manifest—therefore the fact of hereditary sin is here more distinctly expressed than in any other passage in the Old Testament, since the Old Testament conception, according to its special character, which always fastens upon the phenomenal, outward side rather than penetrates to the secret roots of a matter, is directed almost entirely to the outward manifestation only of sin, and leaves its natural foundation, its issue in relation to primeval history, and its demonic background undisclosed. The הֵן in ver. 7 is followed by a correlative second הֵן in ver. 8 (cf. Isa. lv. 4 sq., liv. 15 sq.). Geier correctly says: Orat ut sibi in peccatis concepto veraque cordis probitate carenti penitioem ac mysticam largiri velit sapientiam, cujus medio liberetur a peccati tum reatu tum dominio. תָּמֵא is the nature and life of man as conformed to the nature and will of God (cf. ἀλήθεια, Eph. iv. 21). חֵכֶמָה, wisdom which is most intimately acquainted with (eindringlich weiss) such nature and life and the way to attain it. God delights in and desires truth אֱמֻנָה. The Beth of this word is not a radical letter here as it is in Job xii. 6, but the preposition. The reins utpote adipe obducti, here and in Job xxxviii. 36, according to the Targum, Jerome, and Parchon, are called אֱמֻנָה (Psychol. S. 269; tr. p. 317). Truth in the reins (cf. xl. 9, God's law in visceribus meis) is an upright nature in man's deepest inward parts; and in fact, since the reins are accounted as the seat of the tenderest feelings, in man's inmost experience and perception, in his most secret life both of conscience and of mind (xvi. 7). In the parallel member אֲחֵרִית denotes the hidden inward part of man. Out of the confession, that according to the will of God truth ought to dwell and rule in man even in his reins, comes the wish, that God would impart to him (i.e. teach him and make his own),—who, as being born and conceived in sin, is commended to God's mercy,—that wisdom in the hidden part of his mind which is the way to such truth.

Vers. 9-11. The possession of all possessions, however, most needed by him, the foundation of all other possessions, is the assurance of the forgiveness of his sins. The second futures in ver. 9 are consequents of the first, which are used as optatives. Ver. 9a recalls to mind the sprinkling of the leper, and of one unclean by reason of his contact with a dead body, by means of the bunch of hyssop (Lev. ch. xiv., Num. ch. xix.), the βοτάνη καθαρτική (Bähr, Symbol. ii. 503); and ver. 9b recalls the washings which, according to priestly directions, the unclean person in all cases of uncleanness had to undergo. Purification and washing which the Law enjoins, are regarded in connection with the idea implied in them, and with a setting aside of their symbolic and carnal outward side, inasmuch as the performance of both acts, which in other cases takes place through priestly mediation, is here sup-plicated directly from God Himself. Manifestly אֲחֵרִית (not אֲחֵרִית) is intended to be understood in a spiritual sense. It is a spiritual medium of purification without the medium itself being stated. The New Testament believer confesses, with Petrarch in the second of his seven penitential Psalms: omnes sordes meas una gutta, vel tenuis, sacri sanguinis absterget. But there is here no mention made of atonement by blood; for the antitype of the atoning blood was still hidden from David. The operation of justifying grace on a man stained by the blood-red guilt of sin could not, however, be more forcibly denoted than by the expression that it makes him whiter than snow (cf. the dependent passage Isa. i. 18). And history scarcely records a grander instance of the change of blood-red sin into dazzling whiteness than this, that out of the subsequent marriage of David and Bathsheba sprang Solomon, the most richly blessed of all kings. At the present time David's very bones are still shaken, and as it were crushed, with the sense of sin.  $\text{חַיִּיךָ}$  is an attributive clause like  $\text{לְעַל}$  in vii. 16. Into what rejoicing will this smitten condition be changed, when he only realizes within his soul the comforting and joyous assuring utterance of the God who is once more gracious to him! For this he yearns, viz. that God would hide His face from the sin which He is now visiting upon him, so that it may as it were be no longer present to Him; that He would blot out all his iniquities, so that they may no longer testify against him. Here the first part of the Psalm closes; the close recurs to the language of the opening (ver. 3b).

Vers. 12, 13. In the second part, the prayer for justification is followed by the prayer for renewing. A clean heart that is not beclouded by sin and a consciousness of sin (for  $\text{כִּי}$  includes the conscience, Psychology, S. 134; tr. p. 160); a stedfast spirit ( $\text{יִשְׁבֵּט}$ , cf. lxxviii. 37, cxii. 7) is a spirit certain respecting his state of favour and well-grounded in it. David's prayer has reference to the very same thing that is promised by the prophets as a future work of salvation wrought by God the Redeemer on His people (Jer. xxiv. 7, Ezek. xi. 19, xxxvi. 26); it has reference to those spiritual facts of experience which, it is true, could be experienced even under the Old Testament relatively and anticipatively, but to the actual realization of which the New Testament history, fulfilling ancient prophecy, has first of all produced effectual and comprehensive grounds and motives, viz.  $\text{μετάνοια}$  ( $\text{כִּי} = \text{νοῦς}$ ),  $\text{καινή κτίσις}$ ,  $\text{παλιγγενεσία καὶ ἀνακαίνωσις πνεύματος}$  (Tit. iii. 5). David, without distinguishing between them, thinks of himself as king, as Israelite, and as man. Consequently we are not at liberty to say that רִיחַ הַקֹּדֶשׁ (as in Isa. lxiii. 16), πνεῦμα ἀγίου = ἀγιον, is here the Spirit of grace in distinction from the Spirit of office. If Jahve should reject David as He rejected Saul, this would be the extreme manifestation of anger (2 Kings xxiv. 20) towards him as king and as a man at the same time. The Holy Spirit is none other than that which came upon him by means of the anointing, 1 Sam. xvi. 13. This Spirit, by sin, he has grieved and forfeited. Hence he prays God to show favour rather than execute His right, and not to take this His Holy Spirit from him.

Vers. 14, 15. In connection with רִיחַ נְדִיבָה, the old expositors thought of נְרִיב, a noble, a prince, and נְדִיבָה, nobility, high rank, Job xxx. 15, LXX. πνεύματι ἡγεμονικῶ (spiritu principali) στήριξόν με,—the word has, however, without any doubt, its ethical sense in this passage, Isa. xxxii. 8, cf. נְרִיבָה, Ps. liv. 8; and the relation of the two words רוח נדיבה is not to be taken as adjectival, but genitival, since the poet has just used רוח in the same personal sense in ver. 12a. Nor are they to be taken as a nominative of the subject, but—what corresponds more closely to the connection of the prayer—according to Gen. xxvii. 37, as a second accusative of the object: with a spirit of willingness, of willing, noble impulse towards that which is good, support me; i.e. imparting this spirit to me, uphold me constantly in that which is good. What is meant is not the Holy Spirit, but the human spirit made free from the dominion of sin by the Holy Spirit, to which good has become an inward, as it were instinctive, necessity. Thus assured of his justification and fortified in new obedience, David will teach transgressors the ways of God, and sinners shall be converted to Him, viz. by means of the testimony concerning God's order of mercy which he is able to bear as the result of his own rich experience.

Vers. 16-19. The third part now begins with a doubly urgent prayer. The invocation of God by the name Elohim is here made more urgent by the addition of אֱלֹהֵי תְשׁוּעָתִי; inasmuch as the prayers for justification and for renewing blend together in the "deliver me." David does not seek to lessen his guilt; he calls it in דָּמִים by its right name,—a word which signifies blood violently shed, and then also a deed of blood and blood-guiltiness (ix. 13, cvi. 38, and frequently). We have also met with הַצִּיל construed with מִן of the sin in xxxix. 9. He had given Uriah over to death in order to possess himself of Bathsheba. And the accusation of his conscience spoke not merely of adultery, but also of murder. Nevertheless the consciousness of sin no longer smites him to the earth, Mercy has lifted him up; he prays only that she would complete her work in him, then shall his tongue exultingly praise (יְהַלֵּל with an accusative of the object, as in lix. 17) God's righteousness, which, in accordance with the promise, takes the sinner under its protection. But in order to perform what he vowed he would do under such circumstances, he likewise needs grace, and prays, therefore, for a joyous opening of his mouth. In sacrifices God delighteth not (xl. 7, cf. Isa. i. 11), otherwise he would bring some (וְאֶתֵּינָהּ, darem, sc. si velles, vid. on xl. 6); whole-burnt-offerings God doth not desire: the sacrifices that are well-pleasing to Him and most beloved by Him, in comparison with which the flesh and the dead work of the עוֹלָה and the זבחים (שְׁלָמִים) is altogether worthless, are thankfulness (l. 23) out of the fulness of a penitent and lowly heart. There is here, directly at least, no reference to the spiritual antitype of the sin-offering, which is never called זבחה. The inward part of a man is said to be broken and crushed when his sinful nature is broken, his ungodly self slain, his impenetrable hardness softened, his haughty vainglory brought low,—in fine, when he is in himself become as nothing, and when God is everything to him. Of such a spirit and heart, panting after grace or favour, consist the sacrifices that are truly worthy God's acceptance and well-pleasing to Him (cf. Isa. lvii. 15, where such a spirit and such a heart are called God's earthly temple).*

Vers. 20, 21. From this spiritual sacrifice, well-pleasing to God, the Psalm now, in vers. 20 sq., comes back to the material sacrifices that are offered in a right state of mind; and this is to be explained by the consideration that David's prayer for himself here passes over into an intercession on behalf of all Israel: Do good in Thy good pleasure unto Zion. אֶת־ may be a sign of the accusative, for הֵיטִיב (הֵטִיב) does take the accusative of the person (Job xxiv. 21); but also a preposition, for as it is construed with לְ and עִם, so also with אֶת in the same signification (Jer. xviii. 10, xxxii. 41). וְבַחֲרֵי־צֶדֶק are here, as in iv. 6, Deut. xxxiii. 19, those sacrifices which not merely as regards their outward character, but also in respect of the inward character of him who causes them to be offered on his behalf, are exactly such as God the Lawgiver will have them to be. By כָּלֵל beside עֹלָה might be understood the priestly vegetable whole-offering, Lev. vi. 15 sq. (מִנְחַת הַבְּהֵימָה, Epistle to the Hebrews, ii. 8), since every עֹלָה as such is also כָּלֵל; but Psalm-poetry does not make any such special reference to the sacrificial tôra. וְכָלֵל is, like כָּלֵל in 1 Sam. vii. 9, an explicative addition, and the combination is like יַמִּינְךָ וְרוּעֶךָ, xliv. 4, אֶרֶץ וְחַבֵּל, xc. 2, and the like. A שָׁלֵם כָּלֵל (Hitzig, after the Phœnician sacrificial tables) is unknown to the Israelitish sacrificial worship. The prayer: Build Thou the walls of Jerusalem, is not inadmissible in the mouth of David; since בָּנָה signifies not merely to build up what has been thrown down, but also to go on and finish building what is in the act of being built (lxxxix. 3); and, moreover, the wall built round about Jerusalem by Solomon (1 Kings iii. 1) can be regarded as a fulfilment of David's prayer.

* The Talmud finds a significance in the plural זבחי. Joshua ben Levi (B. Sanhedrin 43b) says: At the time when the temple was standing, whoever brought a burnt-offering received the reward of it, and whoever brought a meat-offering, the reward of it; but the lowly was accounted by the Scriptures as one who offered every kind of sacrifice at once (כְּאִילוֹ הַקְּרִיב כָּל הַקְּרִבָּנוֹת כּוֹלֵן). In Irenæus, iv. 17, 2, and Clemens Alexandrinus, Pædagog. iii. 12, is found to θυσία τῷ Θεῷ καρδία συντετριμμένη the addition: ἀσμη εὐαδίας τῷ Θεῷ καρδία δοξάζουσα τὸν πεπλαύστα αὐτήν.

Nevertheless what even Theodoret has felt cannot be denied: τοῖς ἐν Βαβυλῶνι . . . ἀρμόττει τὰ ῥήματα. Through penitence the way of the exiles led back to Jerusalem. The supposition is very natural that vers. 20 sq. may be a liturgical addition made by the church of the Exile. And if the origin of Isa. ch. xl.-lxvi. in the time of the Exile were as indisputable as the reasons against such a position are forcible, then it would give support not merely to the derivation of vers. 20 sq. (cf. Isa. lx. 10, 5, 7), but of the whole Psalm, from the time of the Exile; for the general impress of the Psalm is, according to the accurate observation of Hitzig, thoroughly deutero-Isaianic. But the writer of Isa. xl.-lxvi. shows signs in other respects also of the most familiar acquaintance with the earlier literature of the Shîr and the Mashal; and that he is none other than Isaiah reveals itself in connection with this Psalm by the echoes of this very Psalm, which are to be found not only in the second but also in the first part of the Isaianic collection of prophecy (cf. on vers. 9, 18). We are therefore driven to the inference, that Ps. li. was a favourite Psalm of Isaiah's, and that, since the Isaianic echoes of it extend equally from the first verse to the last, it existed in the same complete form even in his day as in ours; and that consequently the close, just like the whole Psalm, so beautifully and touchingly expressed, is not the mere addition of a later age.

PSALM LII.

THE PUNISHMENT THAT AWAITS THE EVIL TONGUE.

3 WHY boastest thou thyself of wickedness, O thou mighty one?!—

The mercy of God endureth continually.

4 Destruction doth thy tongue devise,
Like a sharpened razor, O worker of guile!

5 Thou lovest evil rather than good,
Lying instead of speaking that which is right. (Sela.)

6 Thou lovest only destroying words, O deceitful tongue!

7 Thus then will God smite thee down for ever,
He will seize thee and pluck thee out of the tent,
And root thee out of the land of the living. (Sela.)

8 The righteous shall see it and fear,
And over him shall they laugh:

9 "Behold there the man who made not Elohim his hiding-place,
And boasted of the abundance of his riches, trusted in his self-devotedness!"

10 I, however, am like a green olive-tree in the house of Elohim,
I trust in the mercy of Elohim for ever and ever.

11 I will give thanks to Thee for ever, that Thou hast accomplished it;
And I will wait on Thy name, because it is so gracious, in the presence of Thy saints.

With Ps. lii., which, side by side with Ps. li., exhibits the contrast between the false and the right use of the tongue, begins a series of Elohimic Mashils (Ps. lii.-lv.) by David. It is one of the eight Psalms which, by the statements of the inscriptions, of which some are capable of being verified, and others at least cannot be replaced by anything that is more credible, are assigned to the time of his persecution by Saul (vii., lix., lvi., xxxiv., lii., lvii., cxlii., liv.). Augustine calls them Psalms fugitivos. The inscription runs: To the Precentor, a meditation (vid. xxxii. 1), by David, when Doeg the Edomite came and told Saul and said to him: David is gone in to the house of Ahimelech. By גְּבוּיָהוּ, as in li. 2, liv. 2, the writer of the inscription does not define the exact moment of the composition of the Psalm, but only in a general way the period in which it falls. After David had sojourned a short time with Samuel, he betook himself to Nob to Ahimelech the priest; and he gave him without hesitation, as being the son-in-law of the king, the shew-bread that had been removed, and the sword of Goliath that had been hung up in the sanctuary behind the ephod. Doeg the Edomite was witness of this; and when Saul, under the tamarisk in Gibeon, held an assembly of his serving men, Doeg, the overseer of the royal mules, betrayed what had taken place between David and Ahimelech to him. Eighty-five priests immediately fell as victims of this betrayal, and only Abiathar (Ebjathar) the son of Ahimelech escaped and reached David, 1 Sam. xxii. 6-10 (where, in ver. 9, פָּרִי, is to be read instead of עֲבָרִי, cf. ch. xxi. 8).

Vers. 3-6. It is bad enough to behave wickedly, but bad in the extreme to boast of it at the same time as an heroic act. Doeg, who causes a massacre, not, however, by the strength of his hand, but by the cunning of his tongue, does this. Hence he is sarcastically called גְּבוּיָהוּ (cf. Isa. v. 22). David's cause, however, is not therefore lost; for it is the cause of God, whose loving-kindness endures continually, without allowing itself to be affected, like the favour of men, by calumny. Concerning הַיּוֹת vid. on v. 10. לְשׁוֹן is as usual treated as fem.; עֵינָהּ רְמְיָהּ (according to the Masora with Tsere) is consequently addressed to a person. In ver. 5 רָע after אָהַבְתָּ has the Dagesh that is usual also in other instances according to the rule of the אֲתִי מרחיק, especially in connection with the letters בנר"כפת (with which Resh is associated in the Book of Jezira, Michlol 96b, cf. 63b).* The מן of מְטוֹב and מְרַבֵּר is not meant to affirm that he loves good, etc., less than evil, etc., but that he does not love it at all (cf. cxviii. 8 sq., Hab. ii. 16). The music which comes in after ver. 5 has to continue the accusations con amarezza without words. Then in ver. 6 the singing again takes them up, by addressing the adversary with the words "thou tongue of deceit" (cf. cxx. 3), and by reproaching him with loving only such utterances as swallow up, i.e. destroy without leaving a trace behind (בִּלְעָ, pausal form of בָּלַע, like בָּצַע in cxix. 36, cf. the verb in xxxv. 25, 2 Sam. xvii. 16, xx. 19 sq.), his neighbour's life and honour and goods. Hupfeld takes ver. 6b as a second object; but the figurative and weaker expression would then follow the unfigurative and stronger one, and "to love a deceitful tongue" might be said with reference to this character of tongue as belonging to another person, not with reference to his own.

Vers. 7-9. The announcement of the divine retribution begins with נָם as in Isa. lxvi. 4, Ezek. xvi. 43, Mal. ii. 9. The אֹהֶל is not, as one might suppose, the holy tent or tabernacle, that he has desecrated by making it the lurking-place of the betrayer (1 Sam. xxi. 8 [7]), which would have been expressed by מֵאֹהֶלָּו, but his own dwelling. God will pull him, the lofty and * אֹתִי מְרַחֵק is the name by which the national grammarians designate a group of two words, of which the first, ending with Kametz or Segol, has the accent on the penult., and of which the second is a monosyllable, or likewise is accented on the penult. The initial consonant of the second word in this case receives a Dagesh, in order that it may not, in consequence of the first ictus of the group of words "coming out of the distance," i.e. being far removed, be too feebly and indistinctly uttered. This dageshing, however, only takes place when the first word is already of itself Milel, or at least, as e.g. מִצְעָה בֵּית, had a half-accented penult., and not when it is from the very first Milra and is only become Milel by means of the retreating of the accent, as עֵשָׂה פֶלֶא, lxxviii. 12, cf. Deut. xxiv. 1. The penultima-accent has a greater lengthening force in the former case than in the latter; the following syllables are therefore uttered more rapidly in the first case, and the Dagesh is intended to guard against the third syllable being too hastily combined with the second. Concerning the rule, vid. Baer's Thorath Emeth, p. 29 sq.

imperious one, down (יָרַד, like a tower perhaps, Judg. viii. 9, Ezek. xxvi. 9) from his position of honour and his prosperity, and drag him forth out of his habitation, much as one rakes a coal from the hearth (הִתְחַדְּ בִּבְרִיתָא Biblical and Talmudic in this sense), and tear him out of this his home (הִתְחַדְּ, cf. קָרַדְּ, Job xviii. 14) and remove him far away (Deut. xxviii. 63), because he has betrayed the homeless fugitive; and will root him out of the land of the living, because he has destroyed the priests of God (1 Sam. xxii. 18). It then proceeds in vers. 8 sq. very much like xl. 4b, 5, just as the figure of the razor also coincides with Psalms belonging to exactly the same period (li. 8, lvii. 5, cf. עִבְדָּךְ, vii. 13). The excitement and indignant anger against one's foes which expresses itself in the rhythm and the choice of words, has been already recognised by us since Ps. vii. as a characteristic of these Psalms. The hope which David, in ver. 8, attaches to God's judicial interposition is the same as e.g. in Ps. lxiv. 10. The righteous will be strengthened in the fear of God (for the play of sounds cf. xl. 4) and laugh at him whom God has overthrown, saying: Behold there the man, etc. According to lviii. 11, the laughing is joy at the ultimate breaking through of justice long hidden and not discerned; for even the moral teaching of the Old Testament (Prov. xxiv. 17) reprobates the low malignant joy that glories at the overthrow of one's enemy. By יִבְטַח the former trust in mammon on the part of the man who is overtaken by punishment is set forth as a consequence of his refusal to put trust in God, in Him who is the true מְעוֹן = معان, hiding-place or place of protection (vid. on xxxi. 3, xxxvii. 39, cf. xvii. 7, 2 Sam. xxii. 33). הִתְחַדְּ is here the passion for earthly things which rushes at and falls upon them (animo fertur).

Vers. 10, 11. The gloomy song now brightens up, and in calmer tones draws rapidly to a close. The betrayer becomes like an uprooted tree; the betrayed, however, stands firm and is like to a green-foliaged olive (Jer. xi. 16) which is planted in the house of Elohim (xc. 14), that is to say, in sacred and inaccessible ground; cf. the promise in Isa. lx. 13. The weighty expression הִתְחַדְּ עָלַי refers, as in xxii. 32, to the gracious and just carrying out of that which was aimed at in the election of David. If this be attained, then he will for ever give thanks and further wait on the Name, i.e. the self-attestation, of God, which is so gracious and kind, he will give thanks and “wait” in the presence of all the saints. This “waiting,” וַיִּצְקֶינָה, is open to suspicion, since what he intends to do in the presence of the saints must be something that is audible or visible to them. Also “hoping in the name of God” is, it is true, not an unbiblical notional combination (Isa. xxvi. 8); but in connection with שִׂמְךָ בִּי טוֹב which follows, one more readily looks for a verb expressing a thankful and laudatory proclamation (cf. liv. 8). Hitzig’s conjecture that we should read וַיִּזְמְרֶנָּה is therefore perfectly satisfactory. וַיְנַדֵּם הַמִּסְרִיד does not belong to טוֹב, which would be construed with פְּעִינִי, and not נַדַּם, but to the two votive words; cf. xxii. 26, cxxxviii. 1, and other passages. The whole church (xxii. 23 sq., xl. 10 sq.) shall be witness of his thankfulness to God, and of his proclamation of the proofs which God Himself has given of His love and favour.

PSALM LIII.

ELOHIMIC VARIATION OF THE JAHVE-PSALM XIV.

- 2 THE fool hath said in his heart: “There is no God;”
Corruptly and abominably do they carry on their iniquity,
There is none that doeth good.
- 3 Elohim looketh down from heaven upon the children of men,
To see if there be any that have understanding,
If any that seek after God.
- 4 Every one of them is gone back, altogether they are corrupt,
There is none that doeth good,
Not even one.
- 5 Are the workers of iniquity so utterly devoid of understanding,
Who eating up my people eat up bread,
(And) call not on Elohim?

- 6 Then were they in great fear, when there was no fear;
 For Elohim scattered the bones of him that encamped round about thee;
 Thou didst put them to shame, for Elohim had despised them.
- 7 Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion!
 When Elohim turneth the captivity of His people,
 Jacob shall rejoice, Israel shall be glad.

Psalms lii. and liv., which are most closely related by occasion, contents, and expression, are separated by the insertion of Ps. liii., in which the individual character of Ps. lii., the description of moral corruption and the announcement of the divine curse, is generalized. Ps. liii. also belongs to this series according to its species of poetic composition; for the inscription runs: To the Precentor, after Machalath, a Maskîl of David. The formula עַל־מַחֲלָת recurs in lxxxviii. 1 with the addition of לְעֵבוֹת. Since Ps. lxxxviii. is the gloomiest of all the Psalms, and Ps. liii., although having a bright border, is still also a dark picture, the signification of מַחֲלָה, laxness (root חל, opp. מר), sickness, sorrow, which is capable of being supported by Ex. xv. 26, must be retained. עַל־מַחֲלָה signifies after a sad tone or manner; whether it be that מַחֲלָה itself (with the ancient dialectic feminine termination, like נְגִינָה, lxi. 1) is a name for such an elegiac kind of melody, or that it was thereby designed to indicate the initial word of some popular song. In the latter case מַחֲלָה is the construct form, the standard song beginning מַחֲלָה לְבָב or some such way. The signification to be sweet (Aramaic) and melodious (Æthiopic), which the root חל obtains in the dialects, is foreign to Hebrew. It is altogether inadmissible to combine מַחֲלָה with مَحَلَّة, ease, comfort (Gern. Gemächlichkeit, cf. mächlich, easily, slowly, with mählich, by degrees), as Hitzig does; since מַחֲלָה, Rabbinic, to pardon, coincides more readily with מַחָה, li. 3, 11. So that we may regard machalath as equivalent to mesto, not piano or andante.

That the two texts, Ps. xiv. and liii., are "vestiges of an original identity" (Hupfeld) is not established: Ps. liii. is a later variation of Ps. xiv. The musical designation, common only to the earlier Psalms, at once dissuades one from coming down beyond the time of Jehoshaphat or Hezekiah. Moreover, we have here a manifest instance that even Psalms which are composed upon the model of, or are variations of Davidic Psalms, were without any hesitation inscribed לְדָוִד.

Beside the critical problem, all that remains here for the exegesis is merely the discussion of anything peculiar in the deviations in the form of the text.

Ver. 2. The well-grounded asyndeton הַשְּׁחִיתוּ הַתְּעִיבוּ is here dismissed; and the expression is rendered more bombastic by the use of עָוַל instead of עֲלִילָה. עָוַל (the masculine to עֲלִילָה), pravitas, is the accusative of the object (cf. Ezek. xvi. 52) to both verbs, which give it a twofold superlative attributive notion. Moreover, here הַשְּׁחִיתוּ is accented with Mugrash in our printed texts instead of Tarcha. One Mugrash after another is contrary to all rule.

Ver. 3. In both recensions of the Psalm the name of God occurs seven times. In Ps. xiv. it reads three times Elohim and four times Jahve; in the Psalm before us it is all seven times Elohim, which in this instance is a proper name of equal dignity with the name Jahve. Since the mingling of the two names in Ps. xiv. is perfectly intentional, inasmuch as Elohim in vers. 1, 2c describes God as a Being most highly exalted and to be reverentially acknowledged, and in ver. 5 as the Being who is present among men in the righteous generation and who is mighty in their weakness, it becomes clear that David himself cannot be the author of this levelling change, which is carried out more rigidly than the Elohimic character of the Psalm really demands.

Ver. 4. Instead of הַכֹּל, the totality, we have כָּל, which denotes each individual of the whole, to which the suffix, that has almost vanished (xxix. 9) from the genius of the language, refers. And instead of כָּר, the more elegant כָּנ, without any distinction in the meaning.

Ver. 5. Here in the first line the word כָּל, which, as in v. 6, vi. 9, is in its right place, is wanting. In Ps. xiv. there then follow, instead of two tristichs, two distichs, which are perhaps each mutilated by the loss of a line. The writer who has retouched the Psalm has restored the tristichic symmetry that had been lost sight of, but he has adopted rather violent means : inasmuch as he has fused down the two distichs into a single tristich, which is as closely as possible adapted to the sound of their letters.

Ver. 6. The last two lines of this tristich are in letters so similar to the two distichs of Ps. xiv., that they look like an attempt at the restoration of some faded manuscript. Nevertheless, such a close following of the sound of the letters of the original, and such a changing of the same by means of an interchange of letters, is also to be found elsewhere (more especially in Jeremiah, and e.g. also in the relation of the Second Epistle of Peter to Jude). And the two lines sound so complete in themselves and full of life, that this way of accounting for their origin takes too low an estimate of them. A later poet, perhaps belonging to the time of Jehoshaphat or Hezekiah, has here adapted the Davidic Psalm to some terrible catastrophe that has just taken place, and given a special character to the universal announcement of judgment. The addition of לֹא־תִהְיֶה פֶּחַד (supply אֲשֶׁר = אֲשֶׁר שָׁם, lxxxiv. 4) is meant to imply that fear of judgment had seized upon the enemies of the people of God, when no fear, i.e. no outward ground for fear, existed ; it was therefore תְּרַחַת אֱלֹהִים (1 Sam. xiv. 15), a God-wrought panic. Such was the case with the host of the confederates in the days of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xx. 22-24) ; such also with the army of Sennacherib before Jerusalem (Isa. xxxvii. 36). יָּ gives the proof in support of this fright from the working of the divine power. The words are addressed to the people of God : Elohim hath scattered the bones (so that unburied they lie like dirt upon the plain a prey to wild beasts, cxli. 7, Ezek. vi. 5) of thy besieger, i.e. of him who had encamped against thee. תִּהְיֶה instead of תִּהְיֶה = תִּהְיֶה עֲלֶיךָ.* By the might of his God, who has overthrown them, the enemies of

* So it has been explained by Menachem ; whereas Dunash wrongly takes the ך of תִּהְיֶה as part of the root, overlooking the fact that with the suffix it ought rather to have been תִּהְיֶה instead of תִּהְיֶה. It is true that within the province of the verb âch does occur as a pausal masculine suffix instead of écha, with the preterite (Deut. vi. 17, Isa. xxx. 19, lv. 5, and even out of pause in Jer. xxiii. 37), and with the infinitive (Deut. xxviii. 24, Ezek. xxviii. 15), but only in the passage before us with the participle.

His people, Israel has put them to shame, i.e. brought to nought in a way most shameful to them, the project of those who were so sure of victory, who imagined they could devour Israel as easily and comfortably as bread. It is clear that in this connection even ver. 5 receives a reference to the foreign foes of Israel originally alien to the Psalm, so that consequently Mic. iii. 3 is no longer a parallel passage, but passages like Num. xiv. 9, our bread are they (the inhabitants of Canaan); and Jer. xxx. 16, all they that devour thee shall be devoured.

Ver. 7. The two texts now again coincide. Instead of ישועת, we here have ישועות; the expression is strengthened, the plural signifies entire, full, and final salvation.

PSALM LIV.

CONSOLATION IN THE PRESENCE OF BLOODTHIRSTY ADVERSARIES.

- 3 ELOHIM, by Thy name save me,
And by Thy strength maintain my cause!
- 4 Elohim, hear my prayer,
Hearken to the words of my mouth:
- 5 For strangers are risen up against me,
And violent men seek after my life;
They set not Elohim before their eyes. (Sela.)
- 6 Behold, Elohim is my helper,
The Lord it is who upholdeth my soul.
- 7 He will requite the evil to mine enemies—
By virtue of Thy truth cut Thou them off.

---

Attached to the participle this masculine suffix closely approximates to the Aramaic; with proper substantives there are no examples of it found in Hebrew. Simson ha-Nakdan, in his חבור הקוניים (a MS. in Leipzig University Library, fol. 29b), correctly observes that forms like שָׁמְךָ, עֲמָךָ, are not biblical Hebrew, but Aramaic, and are only found in the language of the Talmud, formed by a mingling of the Hebrew and Aramaic.

- 8 With willing mind will I sacrifice unto Thee,
I will give thanks to Thy name, Jahve, that it is gracious.
9 For out of all distress hath it delivered me,
And upon mine enemies doth mine eye delight itself.

Here again we have one of the eight Psalms dated from the time of Saul's persecution,—a Maskil, like the two preceding Psalms, and having points of close contact both with Ps. liii. (cf. ver. 5 with liii. 3) and with Ps. lii. (cf. the resemblance in the closing words of ver. 8 and lii. 11): To the Precentor, with the accompaniment of stringed instruments (vid. on iv. 1), a meditation, by David, when the Ziphites came and said to Saul: Is not David hidden among us? Abiathar, the son of Ahimelech, had escaped to David, who with six hundred men was then in the fortified town of Keila (Keilah), but received through Abiathar the divine answer, that the inhabitants would give him up if Saul should lay siege to the town. Thereupon we find him in the wilderness of Ziph; the Ziphites betray him and pledge themselves to capture him, and thereby he is in the greatest straits, out of which he was only rescued by an invasion of the Philistines, which compelled Saul to retreat (1 Sam. xxiii. 19 sqq.). The same history which the earlier narrator of the Books of Samuel relates here, we meet with once more in 1 Sam. ch. xxvi., related with fuller colouring. The form of the inscription of the Psalm is word for word the same as both in 1 Sam. xxiii. 19 and in 1 Sam. xxvi. 1; the annals are in all three passages the ultimate source of the inscription.

Vers. 3-5. This short song is divided into two parts by Sela. The first half prays for help and answer. The Name of God is the manifestation of His nature, which has mercy as its central point (for the Name of God is טוב, ver. 8, lii. 11), so that בְּשֵׁמֶךָ (which is here the parallel word to בְּנִבְרֹתֶיךָ) is consequently equivalent to בְּחַסְדֶיךָ. The obtaining of right for any one (יָי like שָׁפַט, vii. 9, and frequently, עָשָׂה דִין, ix. 5) is attributed to the all-conquering might of God, which is only one side of the divine Name, i.e. of the divine nature which manifests itself in the diversity of its attributes. הַיְיָוִי (ver. 4b) is construed with לְ (cf. אֵל, lxxvii. 2) like הַטָּה אֵינִי, lxxviii. 1.

The Targum, misled by lxxxvi. 14, reads זָרִים instead of זָרִים in ver. 5. The inscription leads one to think of the Ziphites in particular in connection with "strangers" and "violent men." The two words in most instances denote foreign enemies, Isa. xxv. 2 sq., xxix. 5, Ezek. xxxi. 12; but זָר is also a stranger in the widest sense, regulated in each instance according to the opposite, e.g. the non-priest, Lev. xxii. 10; and one's fellow-countrymen can also turn out to be זָרִים, Jer. xv. 21. The Ziphites, although Judæans like David, might be called "strangers," because they had taken the side against David; and "violent men," because they pledged themselves to seize and deliver him up. Under other circumstances this might have been their duty as subjects. In this instance, however, it was godlessness, as ver. 5c (cf. lxxxvi. 14) says. Any one at that time in Israel who feared God more than man, could not lend himself to be made a tool of Saul's blind fury. God had already manifestly enough acknowledged David.

Vers. 6-9. In this second half, the poet, in the certainty of being heard, rejoices in help, and makes a vow of thanksgiving. The זָ of בְּסִמְכֵי is not meant to imply that God is one out of many who upheld his threatened life; but rather that He comes within the category of such, and fills it up in Himself alone, cf. cxviii. 7; and for the origin of this Beth essentialis, xcix. 6, Judg. xi. 35. In ver. 7 the Kerî merits the preference over the Chethîb (evil shall "revert" to my spies), which would at least require עָל instead of לָ (cf. vii. 17). Concerning שָׁרָר, vid. on xxvii. 11. In the rapid transition to invocation in ver. 7b the end of the Psalm announces itself. The truth of God is not described as an instrumental agent of the cutting off, but as an impelling cause. It is the same Beth as in the expression בְּנִרְבָּה (Num. xv. 3): by or out of free impulse. These free-will sacrifices are not spiritual here in opposition to the ritual sacrifices (l. 14), but ritual as an outward representation of the spiritual. The subject of הַצִּלֵּנִי is the Name of God; the post-biblical language, following Lev. xxiv. 11, calls God straightway הַשֵּׁם, and passages like Isa. xxx. 27 and the one before us come very near to this usage. The præterites mention the ground of the thanksgiving. What David now still hopes for, will then lie behind him in the past. The closing line, ver. 9b, recalls xxxv. 21, cf. lix. 11, xcii. 12; the invoking of the curse upon his enemies in ver. 7 recalls xvii. 13, lvi. 8, lix. 12 sqq.; and the vow of thanksgiving in ver. 8 recalls xxii. 26, xxxv. 18, xl. 10 sqq.

PSALM LV.

PRAYER OF ONE WHO IS MALICIOUSLY BESET AND BETRAYED BY HIS FRIEND.

- 2 GIVE ear, Elohim, to my prayer,
And veil not Thyself from my supplication;
3 Oh hearken to me and answer me!
I toss to and fro in my thoughts and must groan,
4 Because of the voice of the enemy, because of the oppression of the evil-doer.

For they roll iniquity upon me,
And in anger do they pursue me.

- 5 My heart writhes within me,
And the terrors of death have fallen upon me.
6 Fear and trembling come upon me,
And horror hath covered me.

7 I thought: Oh that I had wings like a dove,
Then would I fly away and be at rest!

8 Yea, I would flee afar off,
I would lodge in the wilderness. (Sela.)

9 I would soar to my place of refuge
From the raging wind, from the tempest.

10 Destroy, O Lord, divide their tongues,
For I see violence and strife in the city.

11 Day and night they go their rounds upon its walls,
And evil and trouble are in the midst of it.

12 Destruction is in the midst of it,
And oppression and guile depart not from its market-place.

13 For it is not an enemy that reproacheth me, then I would bear it;

- Neither is it he that hateth me that exalteth himself
 against me,
 Then I could indeed hide myself from him.
- 14 But thou wast a man on an equality with me, my companion and familiar friend,
- 15 We who were wont to have sweet intercourse together,
 To the house of Elohim we walked in the festive throng.
- 16 Let death surprise them,
 Let them go down alive to Hades ;
 For wickedness is in their dwelling, in their inward part.
- 17 As for me, to Elohim do I cry,
 And Jahve will save me.
- 18 Evening and morning and at noon will I meditate and groan,
 And He will hear my voice,
- 19 He will deliver, in peace, my soul, so that they come not at me ;
 For they are very many against me.
- 20 God will hear, and answer them—
 Yea, He sitteth enthroned from the very beginning—(Sela)
- Even them, who think nothing of another,
 And who fear not Elohim.
- 21 He layeth his hand upon those who are at peace with him,
 He violateth his covenant.
- 22 Smooth are the butter-words of his mouth,
 and war is his heart ;
 Soft are his words as oil, and yet are sword-blades.
- 23 Cast thy burden upon Jahve,
 He, He will sustain thee ;
 He will never suffer the righteous to be moved.
- 24 And Thou, Elohim, shalt cast them down into the abyss of the pit,
 Bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their lives ;
 But I trust in Thee.

Ps. liv. is followed by another Davidic Psalm bearing the same inscription : To the Precentor, with accompaniment of stringed instruments, a meditation, by David. It also accords with the former in the form of the prayer with which it opens (cf. ver. 2 with liv. 3 sq.); and it is the Elohimic counterpart of the Jahve-Psalm xli. If the Psalm is by David, we require (in opposition to Hengstenberg) an assignable occasion for it in the history of his life. For how could the faithless bosom friend, over whom the complaint concerning malicious foes here, as in Ps. xli., lingers with special sadness, be a mere abstract personage; since it has in the person of Judas Iscariot its historical living antitype in the life and passion of the second David? This Old Testament Judas is none other than Ahithôphel, the right hand of Absalom. Ps. lv. belongs, like Ps. xli., to the four years during which the rebellion of Absalom was forming; only to a somewhat later period, when Absalom's party were so sure of their cause that they had no need to make any secret of it. How it came to pass that David left the beginnings and progressive steps of the rebellion of Absalom to take their course without bringing any other weapon to bear against it than the weapon of prayer, is discussed on Ps. xli.

Hitzig also holds this Psalm to be Jeremianic. But it contains no coincidences with the language and thoughts of Jeremiah worth speaking of, excepting that this prophet, in ch. ix. 1, gives utterance to a similar wish to that of the psalmist in vers. 7-9, and springing from the same motive. The argument in favour of Jeremiah in opposition to David is consequently referred to the picture of life and suffering which is presented in the Psalm; and it becomes a question whether this harmonizes better with the persecuted life of Jeremiah or of David. The exposition which follows here places itself—and it is at least worthy of being attempted—on the standpoint of the writer of the inscription.

Vers. 2-9. In this first group sorrow prevails. David spreads forth his deep grief before God, and desires for himself some lonely spot in the wilderness far away from the home or lurking-place of the confederate band of those who are compassing his overthrow. "Veil not Thyself" here, where what is spoken of is something audible, not visible, is equivalent to "veil not Thine ear," Lam. iii. 56, which He designedly does, when the right state of heart leaves the praying one, and consequently that which makes it acceptable and capable of being answered is wanting to the prayer (cf. Isa. i. 15). שִׁיחַ signifies a shrub (Syriac shucho, Arabic شَيْخ), and also reflection and care (Arabic, carefulness, attention; Aramaic, סח, to babble, talk, discourse). The Hiph. הִרִיר, which in Gen. xxvii. 40 signifies to lead a roving life, has in this instance the signification to move one's self backwards and forwards, to be inwardly uneasy; root רר, ר, to totter, whence râda, jarûda, to run up and down (IV. to desire, will); raïda, to shake (said of a soft bloated body); radda, to turn (whence taraddud, a moving to and fro, doubting); therefore: I wander hither and thither in my reflecting or meditating, turning restlessly from one thought to another. It is not necessary to read וְאֶהְיֶינָה after lxxvii. 4 instead of וְאֶהְיֶינָה, since the verb הוּם = הָמָה, xl. 6, 12, is secured by the derivatives. Since these only exhibit הוּם, and not הִים (in Arabic used more particularly of the raving of love), וְאֶהְיֶינָה, as also אֶרִיר, is Hiph., and in fact like this latter used with an inward object: I am obliged to raise a tumult or groan, break out into the dull murmuring sounds of pain. The cohortative not unfrequently signifies "I have to" or "I must" of incitements within one's self which are under the control of outward circumstances. In this restless state of mind he finds himself, and he is obliged to break forth into this cry of pain on account of the voice of the foe which he cannot but hear; by reason of the pressure or constraint (עָקַת) of the evil-doer which he is compelled to feel. The conjecture יַעֲקֹת (Olshausen and Hupfeld) is superfluous. עָקָה is a more elegant Aramaizing word instead of יַעֲקָה.

The second strophe begins with a more precise statement of that which justifies his pain. The Hiph. הִמִּיט signifies here, as in cxl. 11 (Chethîb), declinare: they cast or roll down evil (calamity) upon him and maliciously lay snares for him בָּאֵר, breathing anger against him, who is conscious of having manifested only love towards them. His heart turns about in his body, it writhes (יָהִיל); cf. on this, xxxviii. 11. Fear and trembling take possession of his inward parts; יָבֵא in the expression כִּי יָבֵא, as is always the case when followed by a tone syllable, is a so-called אָחוּר, i.e. it has the tone that has retreated to the penult. (Deut. i. 38, Isa. vii. 24, lx. 20), although this is only with difficulty discernible in our printed copies, and is therefore (vid. Accentsystem, vi. § 2) noted with Mercha. The fut. consec. which follows introduces the heightened state of terror which proceeds from this crowding on of fear and trembling. Moreover, the wish that is thereby urged from him, which David uttered to himself, is introduced in the third strophe by a fut. consec.* “Who will give me?” is equivalent to “Oh that I had!” Ges. § 136, 1. In וְאִשְׁפָּנָה is involved the self-satisfying signification of settling down (Ezek. xxxi. 13), of coming to rest and remaining in a place (2 Sam. vii. 10). Without going out of our way, a sense perfectly in accordance with the matter in hand may be obtained for אִשְׁפָּנָה לִי מִפְּלֶט לִי, if אִשְׁפָּנָה is taken not as Kal (lxxi. 12), but after Isa. v. 19, lx. 12, as Hiph.: I would hasten, i.e. quickly find for myself a place which might serve me as a shelter from the raging wind, from the storm. רָחַץ לְפָנָי is equivalent to the Arabic riḥin sāijat-in, inasmuch as سعى, “to move one’s self quickly, to go or run swiftly,” can be said both of light (Koran, lxvi. 8) and of water-brooks (vid. Jones, Comm. Poes. Asiat., ed. Lipsiæ, p. 358), and also of strong currents of air, of winds, and such like. The correction מְעַרְרָה, proposed by Hupfeld, produces a disfiguring tautology. Among those about David there is a wild movement going on which is specially aimed at his overthrow. From this he would gladly flee and hide himself, like a dove taking refuge in a cleft of the rock from the approaching storm, or from the talons of the bird of prey, fleeing with its noiseless but persevering flight.†

Vers. 10-17. In the second group anger is the prevailing feeling. In the city all kinds of party passions have broken loose; even his bosom friend has taken a part in this hostile

* That beautiful old song of the church concerning Jesus has grown out of this strophe:—

*Ecquis binas columbinas
Alas dabit animæ?
Et in albam crucis palmam
Evolat citissime, etc.*

† Kimchi observes that the dove, when she becomes tired, draws in one wing and flies with the other, and thus the more surely escapes. Aben-Ezra finds an allusion here to the carrier-pigeon.

rising. The retrospective reference to the confusion of tongues at Babel which is contained in the word בָּלַל (cf. Gen. x. 25), also in remembrance of בָּלַל (Gen. xi. 1-9), involves the choice of the word בָּלַע, which here, after Isa. xix. 3, denotes a swallowing up, i.e. annihilation by means of confounding and rendering utterly futile. לְשׂוֹנֵם is the object to both imperatives, the second of which is בָּלַע (like the pointing usual in connection with a final guttural) for the sake of similarity of sound. Instead of הָמָס וְרִיב, the pointing is וְרִיב הָמָס, which is perfectly regular, because the וְרִיב with a conjunctive accent logically hurries on to בָּעִיר as its supplement.* The subjects to ver. 11a are not violence and strife (Hengstenberg, Hitzig), for it is rather a comical idea to make these personified run round about upon the city walls; but (cf. lix. 7, 15) the Absalomites, and in fact the spies who incessantly watch the movements of David and his followers, and who to this end roam about upon the heights of the city. The narrative in 2 Sam. ch. xv. shows how passively David looked on at this movement, until he abandoned the palace of his own free will and quitted Jerusalem. The espionage in the circuit of the city is contrasted with the movements going on within the city itself by the word בָּקָרָב. We are acquainted with but few details of the affair; but we can easily fill in the details for ourselves in accordance with the ambitious, base, and craftily malicious character of Absalom. The assertion that deceit (מְרִמָּה) and the extremest madness had taken possession of the city is confirmed in ver. 13 by בִּי. It is not open enemies who might have had cause for it that are opposed to him, but faithless friends, and among them that Ahithophel of Giloh, the scum of perfidious ingratitude. The futures וְאֵשָׁא and וְאִפְתָּר are used as subjunctives, and וְ is equivalent to alioqui, as in li. 18, cf. Job vi. 14. He tells him to his face, to his shame, the relationship in which he had stood to him whom he now betrays. Ver. 14 is not to be rendered: and thou art, etc., but: and thou (who dost act thus) wast, etc.; for it is only because the principal clause has a * Certain exceptions, however, exist, inasmuch as וְ sometimes remains even in connection with a disjunctive accent, Isa. xlix. 4, Jer. xl. 10, xli. 16; and it is pointed וְ in connection with a conjunctive in Gen. xlv. 23, xlvii. 12, Lev. ix. 3, Mic. ii. 11, Job iv. 16, Eccles. iv. 8.

retrospective meaning that the futures נִמְתִּיק and נִהְלֶךְ describe what was a custom in the past. The expression is designedly אָנוּשׁ כְּעַרְבִי and not אִישׁ כְּעַרְבִי; David does not make him feel his kingly eminence, but places himself in the relation to him of man to man, putting him on the same level with himself and treating him as his equal. The suffix of כְּעַרְבִי is in this instance not subjective as in the כְּעַרְכָּךְ of the law respecting the asham or trespass-offering: according to my estimation, but objectively: equal to the worth at which I am estimated, that is to say, equally valued with myself. What heart-piercing significance this word obtains when found in the mouth of the second David, who, although the Son of God and peerless King, nevertheless entered into the most intimate human relationship as the Son of man to His disciples, and among them to that Iscariot! אֶלֶיךָ from אָלַיָּהּ, Arabic alifa, to be accustomed to anything, assuescere, signifies one attached to or devoted to any one; and מִיָּדַע, according to the Hebrew meaning of the verb יָדַע, an intimate acquaintance. The first of the relative clauses in ver. 15 describes their confidential private intercourse; the second the unrestrained manifestation of it in public. סוֹר here, as in Job xix. 19 (vid. supra on xxv. 14). הַמֵּתִיק סוֹר, to make friendly intercourse sweet, is equivalent to cherishing it. רָגַשׁ stands over against סוֹר, just like סוֹר, secret counsel, and רָגַשָׁה, loud tumult, in lxiv. 3. Here רָגַשׁ is just the same as that which the Korahitic poet calls הַמּוֹן הַזֶּה in xlii. 5.

In the face of the faithless friend who has become the head of the Absalomite faction David now breaks out, in ver. 16, into fearful imprecations. The Chethîb is יִשְׁמֹת, desolationes (super eos); but this word occurs only in the name of a place ("House of desolations"), and does not well suit such direct reference to persons. On the other hand, the Keri מָוֶת יִשְׂאֵם, let death ensnare or impose upon them, gives a sense that is not to be objected to; it is a pregnant expression, equivalent to: let death come upon them unexpectedly. To this יִשְׂאֵם corresponds the הַיָּם of the second imprecation: let them go down alive into Hades (שְׁאוֹל), perhaps originally שְׁאוֹלָה, the ה of which may have been lost beside the ה that follows), i.e. like the company of Korah, while their life is yet vigorous, that is to say, let them die a sudden, violent death. The drawing together of the decipiat (opprimat) mors into one word is the result of the ancient scriptio continua and of the defective mode of writing,  $\text{יָשָׁ}$ , like  $\text{יָנִי}$ , cxli. 5,  $\text{יָשָׁ}$ , 1 Kings xxi. 29. Böttcher renders it differently: let death crash in upon them; but the future form  $\text{יָשָׁ} = \text{יָשָׁה}$  from  $\text{יָשָׁה} = \text{יָשָׁ}$  is an imaginary one, which cannot be supported by Num. xxi. 30. Hitzig renders it: let death benumb them ( $\text{יָשָׁ}$ ); but this gives an inconceivable figure, with the turgidity of which the trepidantes Manes in Virgil, Aeneid viii. 246, do not admit of comparison. In the confirmation, ver. 16c,  $\text{בְּמִנְיָרָם}$ , together with the  $\text{בְּקִרְבָּם}$  which follows, does not pretend to be any advance in the thought, whether  $\text{מִנּוֹר}$  be rendered a settlement, dwelling, παροικία (LXX., Targum), or an assembly (Aquila, Symmachus, Jerome). Hence Hitzig's rendering: in their shrine, in their breast (= ἐν τῷ θησαυρῷ τῆς καρδίας αὐτῶν, Luke vi. 45),  $\text{בְּמִנְיָרָם}$  being short for  $\text{בְּמִנְיָרָתָם}$  in accordance with the love of contraction which prevails in poetry (on xxv. 5). But had the poet intended to use this figure he would have written  $\text{בְּמִנְיָרָתָם קִרְבָּם}$ , and is not the assertion that wickedness is among them, that it is at home in them, really a climax? The change of the names of God in ver. 17 is significant. He calls upon Him who is exalted above the world, and He who mercifully interposes in the history of the world helps him.

Vers. 18-24. In the third group confidence prevails, the tone that is struck up in ver. 17 being carried forward. Evening, morning, and noon, as the beginning, middle, and close of the day, denote the day in its whole compass or extent: David thus gives expression to the incessancy with which he is determined to lay before God, both in the quiet of his spirit and in louder utterances, whatsoever moves him. The fut. consec.  $\text{יִשְׁמַע}$  connects the hearing (answer) with the prayer as its inevitable result. Also in the praet.  $\text{פָּרָה}$  expression is given to the certainty of faith; and  $\text{בְּשָׁלוֹם}$  side by side with it denotes, with the same pregnancy of meaning as in cxviii. 5, the state of undisturbed outward and inward safety and prosperity, into which God removes his soul when He rescues him. If we read mi-k<sup>rob</sup>, then  $\text{קִרְב}$  is, as the ancient versions regard it, the infinitive: ne appropinquent mihi; whereas since the time of J. H. Michaelis the preference has been given to the pronunciation mi-k<sup>rāb</sup>: a conflictu mihi sc. parato, in which case it would be pointed  $\text{מִקְרָב}$  (with Metheg), whilst the MSS., in order to guard against the reading with  $\bar{a}$ , point it מִקְרָב־. Hitzig is right when he observes, that after the negative מְ the infinitive is indicated beforehand, and that לִי = עָלַי, xxvii. 2, is better suited to this. Moreover, the confirmatory clause ver. 19b is connected with what precedes in a manner less liable to be misunderstood if מִקְרָב is taken as infinitive: that they may not be able to gain any advantage over me, cannot come near me to harm me (xci. 10). For it is not until now less precarious to take the enemies as the subject of הָיָה, and to take עָמְרָי in a hostile sense, as in Job x. 17, xiii. 19, xxiii. 6, xxxi. 13, cf. עַם xciv. 16, and this is only possible where the connection suggests this sense. Heidenheim's interpretation: among the magnates were those who succoured me (viz. Hushai, Zadok, and Abiathar, by whom the counsel of Ahithophel was frustrated), does not give a thought characteristic of the Psalms. And with Aben-Ezra, who follows Numeri Rabba 294a, to think of the assistance of angels in connection with מְרַבִּים, certainly strongly commends itself in view of 2 Kings vi. 16 (with which Hitzig also compares 2 Chron. xxxii. 7); here, however, it has no connection, whereas the thought, "as many (consisting of many) are they with me, i.e. do they come forward and fight with me," is very loosely attached to what has gone before. The Beth essentiae serves here, as it does frequently, e.g. xxxix. 17, to denote the qualification of the subject. The preterite of confidence is followed in ver. 20 by the future of hope. Although side by side with שָׁמַע עֲנֵה presumptively has the signification to answer, i.e. to be assured of the prayer being heard, yet this meaning is in this instance excluded by the fact that the enemies are the object, as is required by ver. 20d (even if ver. 19b is understood of those who are on the side of the poet). The rendering of the LXX.: εἰσακούσεται ὁ Θεὸς καὶ ταπεινώσει αὐτούς ὁ ὑπάρχων πρὸ τῶν αἰώνων, is appropriate, but requires the pronunciation to be יַעֲנֵה, since the signification to bow down, to humble, cannot be proved to belong either to Kal or Hiphil. But even granted that יַעֲנֵה might, according to 1 Kings viii. 35 (vid. Keil), signify ταπεινώσει αὐτούς, it is nevertheless difficult to believe that יַעֲנֵה is not intended to have a meaning correlative with שָׁמַע, of which it is the continuation. Saadia has explained יַעֲנֵה in a manner worthy of attention, as being for יַעֲנֵה בְּ, he will testify against them; an interpretation which Aben-Ezra endorses. Hengstenberg's is better: "God will hear (the tumult of the enemies) and answer them (judicially)." The original text may have been וַיַּעֲנֵמוּ יֵשׁב־קָרָם. But as it now stands, וַיֵּשֶׁב־קָרָם represents a subordinate clause, with the omission of the הוּא, pledging that judicial response: since He it is who sitteth enthroned from earliest times (vid. on vii. 10). The bold expression יֵשֶׁב־קָרָם is an abbreviation of the view of God expressed in lxxiv. 12, Hab. i. 12, cf. Deut. xxxiii. 27, as of Him who from primeval days down to the present sits enthroned as King and Judge, who therefore will be able even at the present time to maintain His majesty, which is assailed in the person of His anointed one.

Ver. 20c. In spite of this interruption and the accompanying clashing in of the music, אֲשֶׁר with its dependent clause continues the וַיַּעֲנֵם, more minutely describing those whom God will answer in His wrath. The relative clause at the same time gives the ground for this their fate from the character they bear: they persevere in their course without any regard to any other in their godlessness. The noun הַלְּפָה, which is used elsewhere of a change of clothes, of a reserve in time of war, of a relief of bands of workmen, here signifies a change of mind (Targum), as in Job xiv. 14 a change of condition; the plural means that every change of this kind is very far from them. In ver. 21 David again has the one faithless foe among the multitude of the rebels before his mind. שְׁלֵמֹי is equivalent to שְׁלָמִים אִתּוֹ, Gen. xxxiv. 21, those who stood in peaceful relationship to him (שְׁלוֹם, xli. 10). David classes himself with his faithful adherents. בְּרִית is here a defensive and offensive treaty of mutual fidelity entered into in the presence of God. By שְׁלָה and הַלְּל is meant the intention which, though not carried out as yet, is already in itself a violation and profanation of the solemn compact. In ver. 22 the description passes into the tone of the cæsural schema. It is impossible for מִחֲמַאת, so far as the vowels are concerned, to be equivalent to מִחֲמֹאות, since this change of the vowels would obliterate the preposition; but one is forbidden to read מִחֲמֹאות (Targum, Symmachus, Jerome) by the fact that פִּי (LXX. τοῦ προσώπου αὐτοῦ, as in Prov. ii. 6) cannot be the subject of הִלְקִי. Consequently מ belongs to the noun itself, and the denominative מחמאות (from חִמְּאוֹה), like מְעֵרְנוֹת (from עָרָן), dainties, signifies articles of food prepared from curdled milk; here it is used figuratively of "milk-words" or butter-words" which come from the lips of the hypocrite softly, sweetly, and supplely as cream: os nectar promit, mens aconita vomit. In the following words וְקָרַב לְבָבוֹ (וְקָרַב) the Makkeph (in connection with which it would have to be read uk'rob just the same as in ver. 19, since the  $\text{—}$  has not a Metheg) is to be crossed out (as in fact it is even wanting here and there in MSS. and printed editions). The words are an independent substantival clause: war (קָרַב, a pushing together, assault, battle, after the form פָּתַב with an unchangeable ā) is his inward part and his words are swords; these two clauses correspond. רַבִּי (properly like رَجُلٌ, to be thin, weak, then also: to be soft, mild; root רך, רך, tendere, tenuare) has the accent on the ultima, vid. on xxxviii. 20. פְּתִיחָהּ is a drawn, unsheathed sword (xxxvii. 14).

The exhortation, ver. 23, which begins a new strophe and is thereby less abrupt, is first of all a counsel which David gives to himself, but at the same time to all who suffer innocently, cf. xxvii. 14. Instead of the obscure ἀπαξ γεγραμ. יְהִיבָהּ, we read in xxxvii. 5 וּרְבַח, and in Prov. xvi. 3 מַעֲשִׂיךָ, according to which the word is not a verb after the form יִדְעָה (Chajug', Gecatilia, and Kimchi), but an accusative of the object (just as it is in fact accented; for the Legarme of יהוה has a lesser disjunctive value than the Zinnor of יהבך). The LXX. renders it ἐπιρροῦσθον ἐπὶ κύριον εἰς τὴν μέριμνάν σου. Thus are these words of the Psalm applied in 1 Pet. v. 7. According to the Talmud יְהִיב (the same form as קָרַב) signifies a burden. "One day," relates Rabba bar-Chana, B. Rosh ha-Shana, 26b, and elsewhere, "I was walking with an Arabian (Nabataean?) tradesman, and happened to be carrying a heavy pack. And he said to me, שְׂקִיל יְהִיבְךָ וְשִׂרִי אֶנְמְלֵא, Take thy burden and throw it on my camel." Hence it is wiser to refer יְהִיב to יָהַב, to give, apportion, than to a stem יְהִיב = יָהַב, cxix. 131 (root אַב, אַב, to desire; so that it consequently does not mean desiring, longing, care, but that which is imposed, laid upon one, assigned or allotted to one (Böttcher), in which sense the Chaldee derivatives of יְהִיב (Targum Ps. xi. 6, xvi. 5, for מָנַת) do actually occur. On whomsoever one casts what is allotted to him to carry, to him one gives it to carry. The admonition proceeds on the principle that God is as willing as He is able to bear even the heaviest burden for us; but this bearing it for us is on the other side our own bearing of it in God's strength, and hence the promise that is added runs: He will sustain thee (בְּלִבִּי), that thou mayest not through feebleness succumb. Ver. 23c also favours this figure of a burden: He will not give, i.e. suffer to happen (lxxviii. 66), tottering to the righteous for ever, He will never suffer the righteous to totter. The righteous shall never totter (or be moved) with the overthrow that follows; whereas David is sure of this, that his enemies shall not only fall to the ground, but go down into Hades (which is here, by a combination of two synonyms, בְּאֵר שַׁחַת, called a well, i.e. an opening, of a sinking in, i.e. a pit, as e.g. in Prov. viii. 31, Ezek. xxxvi. 3), and that before they have halved their days, i.e. before they have reached the half of the age that might be attained under other circumstances (cf. cii. 25, Jer. xvi. 11). By אֱלֹהִים אֶתְּהַלֵּל prominence is given to the fact that it is the very same God who will not suffer the righteous to fall who casts down the ungodly; and by אֲנִי David contrasts himself with them, as being of good courage now and in all time to come.

PSALM LVI.

CHEERFUL COURAGE OF A FUGITIVE.

- 2 BE gracious unto me, Elohim, for man is greedy after me,
All the day he, fighting, oppresseth me.
- 3 Mine adversaries are greedy after me all the day,
For many are they who proudly war against me.
- 4 In the day that I fear do I cling confidently to Thee.
- 5 Through Elohim will I praise His word,
In Elohim do I trust, without fearing:
What can flesh do unto me?
- 6 All the day long they wrest my words,
Against me are all their thoughts for evil.
- 7 They band together, they set spies—
They watch my heels, because seeking after my life.

- 8 By such evil-doing shall they escape?—
In wrath cast down the peoples, Elohim!
- 9 My fugitive life Thou hast told,
My tears are laid up in Thy bottle—
Are they not in Thy book?
- 10 Then must mine enemies fall back in the day that I call;
This I know: that Elohim is for me.
- 11 Through Elohim do I praise the word,
Through Jahve do I praise the word.
- 12 In Elohim do I trust without fearing:
What can men do unto me?
- 13 Binding upon me, Elohim, are Thy vows;
I will pay thank-offerings unto Thee.
- 14 For Thou hast delivered my soul from death,
Yea my feet from falling,
That I might walk before Elohim in the light of life.

To Ps. lv., which in vers. 7 sq. gives utterance to the wish: "Oh that I had wings like a dove," etc., no Psalm could be more appropriately appended, according to the mode of arrangement adopted by the collector, than Ps. lvi., the musical inscription of which runs: To the Precentor, after "The silent dove among the far off," by David, a Michtam. מִחְתָּמִים is a second genitive, cf. Isa. xxviii. 1, and either signifies distant men or longiqua, distant places, as in lxxv. 6, cf. מִיָּמִים, xvi. 6. Just as in lviii. 2, it is questionable whether the punctuation מִלְּמִי has lighted upon the correct rendering. Hitzig is anxious to read מִלְּמִי, "Dove of the people in the distance;" but מִלְּמִי, people, in spite of Egli's commendation, is a word unheard of in Hebrew, and only conjectural in Phœnician. Olshausen's מִלְּמִי more readily commends itself, "Dove of the distant terebinths." As in other like inscriptions, לֵב does not signify de (as Joh. Campensis renders it in his paraphrase of the Psalms (1532 and frequently): Præfecto musices, de columba muta quæ procul avolaverat), but secundum; and the coincidence of the defining of the melody with the situation of the writer of the Psalm is explained by the consideration that the melody is chosen with reference to that situation. The LXX. (cf. the Targum), interpreting the figure, renders: ὑπὲρ τοῦ λαοῦ τοῦ ἀπὸ τῶν ἁγίων (from the sanctuary) μεμακρυμμένου, for which Symmachus has: φύλου ἀπωσμένου. The rendering of Aquila is correct: ὑπὲρ περιστερᾶς ἀλάλου μακρυσμῶν. From Ps. lv. (vers. 7 sq., cf. xxxviii. 14) we may form an idea of the standard song designated by the words יִנַּח אֱלֹהִים רַחֵם; for Ps. lv. is not this song itself, and for this reason, that it belongs to the time of Absalom, and is therefore of later date than Ps. lvi., the historical inscription of which, “when the Philistines assaulted him in Gath” (cf. בְּדָרָם, 1 Sam. xxi. 14), carries us back into the time of Saul, to the same time of the sojourn in Philistia to which Ps. xxxiv. is assigned. Ps. lvi. exhibits many points of the closest intermingling with the Psalms of this period, and thus justifies its inscription. It is a characteristic possessed in common by these Psalms, that the prospect of the judgment that will come upon the whole of the hostile world is combined with David’s prospect of the judgment that will come upon his enemies: lvi. 8, vii. 9, lix. 6 (12). The figure of the bottle in which God preserves the tears of the suffering ones corresponds to the sojourn in the wilderness. As regards technical form, Ps. lvi. begins the series of Davidic Elohimic Michtammim, Ps. lvi.–lx. Three of these belong to the time of Saul. These three contain refrains, a fact that we have already recognised on xvi. 1 as a peculiarity of these “favourite-word-poems.” The favourite words of this Ps. lvi. are בְּאֱלֹהִים אֱהַלֵּל דְּבַר (ו) and לֵי מַה־יַּעֲשֶׂה בְּשֵׁר (אָרָם).

Vers. 2-5. אֱלֹהִים and אֱנֹשׁ, ver. 2 (ix. 20, x. 18), are antitheses: over against God, the majestic One, men are feeble beings. Their rebellion against the counsel of God is ineffective madness. If the poet has God’s favour on his side, then he will face these pigmies that behave as though they were giants, who fight against him מְרוֹם, moving on high, i.e. proudly (cf. מְפָרוֹם, lxxiii. 8), in the invincible might of God. שָׁאָה, inhiare, as in lvii. 4; לָחַם, as in xxxv. 1, with לָ like אָל, e.g. in Jer. i. 19. Thus, then, he does not fear; in the day when (Ges. § 123, 3, b) he might well be afraid (conjunctive future, as e.g. in Josh. ix. 27), he clings trustfully to אֱלֹהֵי as in iv. 6, and frequently, Prov. iii. 5) his God, so that fear cannot come near him. He has the word of His promise on his side (דְּבַר as e.g.

cxix. 5); בְּאֱלֹהִים, through God will he praise this His word, inasmuch as it is gloriously verified in him. Hupfeld thus correctly interprets it; whereas others in part render it “in Elohim do I praise His word,” in part (and the form of this favourite expression in ver. 11ab is opposed to it): “Elohim do I celebrate, His word.” Hitzig, however, renders it: “Of God do I boast in matter,” i.e. in the present affair; which is most chillingly prosaic in connection with an awkward brevity of language. The exposition is here confused by x. 3 and xliv. 9. הִלֵּל does not by any means signify gloriarī in this passage, but celebrare; and בְּאֱלֹהִים is not intended in any other sense than that in lx. 14. בְּטַח is equivalent to the New Testament phrase πιστεύειν ἐν. לֹא אֲרִיא is a circumstantial clause with a finite verb, as is customary in connection with לֹא, cxix. 8, Job xxix. 24, and בֵּל, Prov. xix. 23.

Vers. 6-8. This second strophe describes the adversaries, and ends in imprecation, the fire of anger being kindled against them. Hitzig's rendering is: “All the time they are injuring my concerns,” i.e. injuring my interests. This also sounds unpoetical. Just as we say הָמַס תּוֹרָה, to do violence to the Tōra (Zeph. iii. 4, Ezek. xxii. 26), so we can also say: to torture any one's words, i.e. his utterances concerning himself, viz. by misconstruing and twisting them. It is no good to David that he asseverates his innocence, that he asserts his filial faithfulness to Saul, God's anointed; they stretch his testimony concerning himself upon the rack, forcing upon it a false meaning and wrong inferences. They band themselves together, they place men in ambush. The verb נָגַר signifies sometimes to turn aside, turn in, dwell (= جَار); sometimes, to be afraid (= وَجِر, نَجِر); sometimes, to stir up, excite, cxi. 3 (= נָרַה); and sometimes, as here, and in lix. 4, Isa. liv. 15: to gather together (= אָנַר). The Keri reads יַצְפוּנִי (as in x. 8, Prov. i. 11), but the scriptio plena points to Hiph. (cf. Job xxiv. 6, and also Ps. cxix. 5), and the following הִמָּה leads one to the conclusion that it is the causative יַצְפִּינִי that is intended: they cause one to keep watch in concealment, they lay an ambush (synon. הִאָרִיב, 1 Sam. xv. 5); so that הִמָּה refers to the liers-in-wait told off by them: as to these—they observe my heels or (like the feminine plural in lxxvii. 20, lxxxix. 52) footprints (Rashi: mes traces), i.e. all my footsteps or movements, because (properly, “in accordance with this, that,” as in Mic. iii. 4) they now as formerly (which is implied in the perfect, cf. lix. 4) attempt my life, i.e. strive after, lie in wait for it (קָהָה like שָׁמַר, lxxi. 10, with the accusative = לְ קָהָה in cxix. 95). To this circumstantial representation of their hostile proceedings is appended the clause עַל־אֲנִי פִלְט־לָמוּ, which is not to be understood otherwise than as a question, and is marked as such by the order of the words (2 Kings v. 26, Isa. xxviii. 28): In spite of iniquity [is there] escape for them? i.e. shall they, the liers-in-wait, notwithstanding such evil good-for-nothing mode of action, escape? At any rate פִּלְט is, as in xxxii. 7, a substantivized infinitive, and the “by no means” which belongs as answer to this question passes over forthwith into the prayer for the overthrow of the evil ones. This is the customary interpretation since Kimchi’s day. Mendelssohn explains it differently: “In vain be their escape,” following Aben-Jachja, who, however, like Saadia, takes פִּלְט to be imperative. Certainly adverbial notions are expressed by means of עַל,—e.g. עַל־יְהוָה, abundantly, xxxi. 24; עַל־שָׁקֶר, falsely, Lev. v. 22 (vid. Gesenius, Thesaurus, p. 1028),—but one does not say עַל־הַכֹּל, and consequently also would hardly have said עַל־אֲנִי (by no means, for nothing, in vain); moreover the connection here demands the prevailing ethical notion for אֲנִי. Hupfeld alters פִּלְט to פִּלְטִים, and renders it: “recompense to them for wickedness,” which is not only critically improbable, but even contrary to the usage of the language, since פִּלְט signifies to weigh out, but not to requite, and requires the accusative of the object. The widening of the circle of vision to the whole of the hostile world is rightly explained by Hengstenberg by the fact that the special execution of judgment on the part of God is only an outflow of His more general and comprehensive execution of judgment, and the belief in the former has its root in a belief in the latter. The meaning of הוֹרֵד becomes manifest from the preceding Psalm (lv. 24), to which the Psalm before us is appended by reason of manifold and closely allied relation.

Vers. 9-12. What the poet prays for in ver. 8, he now expresses as his confident expectation with which he solaces himself. נָרַח (ver. 9) is not to be rendered “flight,” which certainly is not a thing that can be numbered (Olshausen); but

“a being fugitive,” the unsettled life of a fugitive (Prov. xxvii. 8), can really be numbered both by its duration and its many temporary stays here and there. And upon the fact that God, that He whose all-seeing eye follows him into every secret hiding-place of the desert and of the rocks, counteth (tellet) it, the poet lays great stress; for he has long ago learnt to despair of man. The accentuation gives special prominence to נָרִי as an emphatically placed object, by means of Zarka; and this is then followed by בְּסַפְרֹתָהּ with the conjunctive Galgal and the pausal אֶתָּה with Olewejored (the ◀ of which is placed over the final letter of the preceding word, as is always the case when the word marked with this double accent is monosyllabic, or dissyllabic and accented on the first syllable). He who counts (Job xxxi. 4) all the steps of men, knows how long David has already been driven hither and thither without any settled home, although free from guilt. He comforts himself with this fact, but not without tears, which this wretched condition forces from him, and which he prays God to collect and preserve. Thus it is according to the accentuation, which takes שִׁמָּה as imperative, as e.g. in 1 Sam. viii. 5; but since שִׁמָּה, שִׁים, is also the form of the passive participle (1 Sam. ix. 24, and frequently, 2 Sam. xiii. 32), it is more natural, in accordance with the surrounding thoughts, to render it so even in this instance (posita est lacrima mea), and consequently to pronounce it as Mibra (Ewald, Hupfeld, Böttcher, and Hitzig). דַּמְעֵי (Eccles. iv. 1) corresponds chiasmatically (crosswise) to נָרִי, with which בְּנִאֲדָרָה forms a play in sound; and the closing clause הֲלֹא בְּסַפְרֹתָהּ unites with בְּסַפְרֹתָהּ in the first member of the verse. Both ver. 9b and ver. 9c are wanting in any particle of comparison. The fact thus figuratively set forth, viz. that God collects the tears of His saints as it were in a bottle, and notes them together with the things which call them forth as in a memorial (Mal. iii. 16), the writer assumes; and only appropriatingly applies it to himself. The אֶתָּה which follows may be taken either as a logical “in consequence of so and so” (as e.g. xix. 14, xl. 8), or as a “then” fixing a turning-point in the present tearful wandering life (viz. when there have been enough of the “wandering” and of the “tears”), or “at a future time” (more abruptly, like שׁוּם in xiv. 5, xxxvi. 13, vid. on ii. 5). אֶתָּה אֶתָּה is not an expansion of this אֶתָּה, which would trail awkwardly after it. The poet says that one day his enemies will be obliged to retreat, inasmuch as a day will come when his prayer, which is even now heard, will be also outwardly fulfilled, and the full realization of the succour will coincide with the cry for help. By  $\text{יְהִי־יְרַעַתִּי}$  in ver. 10b he justifies this hope from his believing consciousness. It is not to be rendered, after Job xix. 19: "I who know," which is a trailing apposition without any proper connection with what precedes; but, after 1 Kings xvii. 24: this I know (of this I am certain), that Elohim is for me.  $\text{יְהִי}$  as a neuter, just as in connection with  $\text{יָרַעַתִּי}$  in Prov. xxiv. 12, and also frequently elsewhere (Gen. vi. 15, Ex. xiii. 8, xxx. 13, Lev. xi. 4, Isa. xxix. 11, cf. Job xv. 17); and  $\text{לִי}$  as e.g. in Gen. xxxi. 42. Through Elohim, ver. 11 continues, will I praise  $\text{יְבָרַךְ}$ : thus absolutely is the word named; it is therefore the divine word, just like  $\text{בָּר}$  in ii. 12, the Son absolutely, therefore the divine Son. Because the thought is repeated, Elohim stands in the first case and then Jahve, in accordance with the Elohimic Psalm style, as in lviii. 7. The refrain in ver. 12 (cf. ver. 5b) indicates the conclusion of the strophe. The fact that we read  $\text{אָרְאֶם}$  instead of  $\text{בְּשֵׁר}$  in this instance, just as in ver. 11  $\text{יְבָרַךְ}$  instead of  $\text{יְבָרֵךְ}$  (ver. 5a), is in accordance with the custom in the Psalms of not allowing the refrain to recur in exactly the same form.

Vers. 13, 14. In prospect of his deliverance the poet promises beforehand to fulfil the duty of thankfulness.  $\text{עָלַי}$ , incumbent upon me, as in Prov. vii. 14, 2 Sam. xviii. 11.  $\text{נִדְרָיִךְ}$ , with an objective subject, are the vows made to God; and  $\text{תּוֹדוֹת}$  are distinguished from them, as e.g. in 2 Chron. xxix. 31. He will suffer neither the pledged  $\text{נִדְרֵי שְׁלָמִי}$  nor the  $\text{תּוֹדוֹת שְׁלָמִי}$  to be wanting; for—so will he be then able to sing and to declare—Thou hast rescued, etc. The perfect after  $\text{כִּי}$  denotes that which is then past, as in lix. 17, cf. the dependent passage cxvi. 8 sq. There the expression is  $\text{אֲרָצוֹת הַחַיִּים}$  instead of  $\text{אֹר הַחַיִּים}$  (here and in Elihu's speech, Job xxxiii. 30). Light of life (John viii. 12) or of the living (LXX.  $\tau\acute{o}\nu\ \zeta\acute{o}\nu\tau\omega\nu$ ) is not exclusively the sun-light of this present life. Life is the opposite of death in the deepest and most comprehensive sense; light of life is therefore the opposite of the night of Hades, of this seclusion from God and from His revelation in human history.

PSALM LVII.

BEFORE FALLING ASLEEP IN THE WILDERNESS.

- 2 BE gracious unto me, Elohim, be gracious unto me,
 For in Thee hath my soul hidden ;
 And in the shadow of Thy wings do I seek refuge,
 Until the destruction passeth by.
- 3 I call upon Elohim, the Most High,
 Upon God who performeth it for me :
- 4 He will send from heaven and save me.
 If he who is greedy for me doth slander—(Sela.)
 Elohim will send His mercy and truth.
- 5 My soul is in the midst of lions,
 I will lie down among those who breathe forth fire.
 The children of men—their teeth are spears and arrows,
 And their tongue is a sharp sword.
- 6 Oh show Thyself exalted above the heavens, Elohim,
 Above the whole earth Thy glory !
- 7 They had laid a net for my steps,
 They had bowed down my soul,
 They had digged out a pit before me—
 They themselves fall therein. (Sela.)
- 8 Confident is my heart, Elohim, confident is my heart,
 I will sing and play upon the harp.
- 9 Awake up, my glory,
 Awake up, O harp and cithern,
 I will awake the morning dawn !
- 10 I will praise Thee among the peoples, O Lord,
 I will praise Thee upon the harp among the nations.
- 11 For great unto the heavens is thy mercy,
 And unto the clouds Thy truth.

12 Oh show Thyself exalted above the heavens, Elohim,
Above the whole earth Thy glory.

The Psalms that are to be sung after the melody אֶל־הַשִּׁחָה (lvii., lviii., lix. Davidic, lxxv. Asaphic) begin here. The direction referring to the musical execution of the Psalm ought properly to be עַל אֶל־הַשִּׁחָה (אֶל); but this is avoided as being unmelodious, and harsh so far as the syntax is concerned. The Geneva version is correct: pour le chanter sur Al taschéchet. There is no actual reference in the words to Deut. ix. 26, or 1 Sam. xxvi. 9 (why not also to Isa. lxx. 8?).

The historical inscription runs: when he fled from Saul, in the cave. From the connection in the history from which this statement is extracted, it will have been clear whether the Psalm belongs to the sojourn in the cave of Adullam (1 Sam. ch. xxii.) or in the labyrinthine cave upon the alpine heights of Engedi, "by the sheep-folds" (1 Sam. ch. xxiv.), described in Van de Velde's Journey, ii. 74-76.

How manifold are the points in which these Psalms belonging to the time of Saul run into one another! Ps. lvii. has not merely the supplicatory "Be gracious unto me, Elohim," at the beginning, but also אָסֵף applied in the same way (lvii. 4, lvi. 2 sq.), in common with Ps. lvi; in common with Ps. vii., נָפְשִׁי = נַבְוִי (lvii. 9, vii. 6); the comparison of one's enemies to lions and lionesses (lvii. 5, vii. 3); the figure of the digging of a pit (lvii. 7, vii. 16); with Ps. lix. the figure of the sword of the tongue (lvii. 5, lix. 8, cf. lii. 4); with Ps. lii. the poetical expression הוֹחַ (lvii. 2, lii. 4); with Ps. xxii. the relation of the deliverance of the anointed one to the redemption of all peoples (lvii. 10, xxii. 28 sqq.). Also with Ps. xxxvi. it has one or two points of contact, viz. the expression "refuge under the shadow of God's wings" (ver. 2, xxxvi. 8), and in the measuring of the mercy and truth of God by the height of the heavens (ver. 11, xxxvi. 6). Yet, on the other hand, it has a thoroughly characteristic impress. Just as Ps. lvi. delighted in confirming what was said by means of the interrogatory הֲלֵא (vers. 9, 14), so Ps. lvii. revels in the figure epizeuxis, or an emphatic repetition of a word (vers. 2, 4, 8, 9). Ps. cviii. (which see) is a cento taken out of Ps. lvii. and lx.

The strophe-schema of Ps. lvii. is the growing one: 4. 5. 6;

4. 5. 6.* Here also the Michtam is not wanting in its prominent favourite word. A refrain of a lofty character closes the first and second parts. In the first part cheerful submission rules, in the second a certainty of victory, which by anticipation takes up the song of praise.

Vers. 2-6. By means of the two distinctive tense-forms the poet describes his believing flight to God for refuge as that which has once taken place (הִסַּף from הִסַּף = הִסַּף out of pause, like the same forms in lxxiii. 2, cxxii. 6), and still, because it is a living fact, is ever, and now in particular, renewed (אֶסַּף). The shadow of the wings of God is the protection of His gentle, tender love; and the shadow of the wings is the quickening, cordial solace that is combined with this protection. Into this shadow the poet betakes himself for refuge now as he has done before, until הַיּוֹם, i.e. the abysmal danger that threatens him, be overpast, præteriverit (cf. Isa. xxvi. 20, and on the enallage numeri x. 10, Ges. § 147, a). Not as though he would then no longer stand in need of the divine protection, but he now feels himself to be specially in need of it; and therefore his chief aim is an undaunted triumphant resistance of the impending trials. The effort on his own part, however, by means of which he always anew takes refuge in this shadow, is prayer to Him who dwells above and rules the universe. עָלַיִן is without the article, which it never takes; and גַּמַּר (ver. 3b) is the same, because it is regularly left out before the participle, which admits of being more fully defined, Amos ix. 12, Ezek. xxi. 19 (Hitzig). He calls upon God who accomplisheth concerning, i.e. for him (Esth. iv. 16), who carrieth out his cause, the cause of the persecuted one; גַּמַּר is transitive as in cxxxviii. 8. The LXX. renders τὸν εὐεργετήσαντά με, as though it were גַּמַּל עָלַי (xiii. 6, and frequently); and even Hitzig and Hupfeld hold that the meaning is exactly the same. But although גַּמַּל and גַּמַּר fall back upon one and the same radical notion, still it is just their distinctive final letters that serve to indicate a difference of signification that is strictly maintained. In ver. 4 follow futures of hope. In this instance "that which brings me deliverance" is to be supplied in thought to יְשִׁלַּח (cf. xx. 3) and not יְרוּ as in xviii. 17, cf. cxliv. 7; and this general and unmentioned object is then specialized and defined in the words "His mercy and His truth" in ver. 4c. Mercy and truth are as it were the two good spirits, which descending from heaven to earth (cf. xliii. 3) bring the divine יְשִׁעָה to an accomplishment. The words יְהַרְרֵף יְשִׁעָה standing between a and c have been drawn by the accentuators to the first half of the verse, they probably interpreting it thus: He (God) reproacheth my devourers for ever (Sela). But יְהַרְרֵף always (e.g. Isa. xxxvii. 23) has God as its object, not as its subject. יְהַרְרֵף שִׁעָה is to be connected with what follows as a hypothetical protasis (Ges. § 155, 4, a): supposing that he who is greedy or pants for me (inhians mihi) slandereth, then Elohim will send His mercy and His truth. The music that becomes forte in between, introduces and accompanies the throbbing confidence of the apodosis.

In ver. 5, on the contrary, we may follow the interpretation of the text that is handed down and defined by the accentuation, natural as it may also be, with Luther and others, to take one's own course. Since לְבָנָם has Zarka (Zinnor) and לְהַטִּים Olewejored, it is accordingly to be rendered: "My soul is in the midst of lions, I will (must) lie down with flaming ones; the children of men—their teeth are a spear and arrows." The rendering of the LXX., of Theodotion, and of the Syriac version accords with the interpunction of our text so far as both begin a new clause with ἐκοιμήθην (ורמכח, and I slept); whereas Aquila and Symmachus (taking נפשי, as it seems, as a periphrastic expression of the subject-notion placed in advance) render all as far as להטים as one clause, at least dividing the verse into two parts, just as the accentuators do, at להטים. The rendering of Aquila is ἐν μέσῳ λαϊνῶν κοιμηθήσομαι λάβρων; that of Symmachus: ἐν μέσῳ λέοντων εὐθαρσῶν ἐκοιμήθην, or according to another reading, μεταξὺ λέοντων ἐκοιμήθην φλεγόντων. They are followed by Jerome, who, however, in order that he may be able to reproduce the נפשי, changes אשכבה into שכבה: Anima mea in medio leonum dormivit ferocientium. This construction, however, can be used in Greek and Latin, but not in Hebrew. We therefore follow the accents even in reference to the Zarka above לְבָאִים (a plural form that only occurs in this one passage in the Psalter, = לְבָאִים). In a general way it is to be observed that this לְבָאִים in connection with אֲשַׁכְּבָה is not so much the accusative of the object as the accusative of the place, although it may even be said to be the customary local accusative of the object with verbs of dwelling; on שָׁכַב cf. Ruth iii. 8, 14, and Ps. lxxxviii. 6, Mic. vii. 5 (where at least the possibility of this construction of the verb is presupposed). But in particular it is doubtful (1) what לְהַטִּים signifies. The rendering "flaming ones" is offered by the Targum, Saadia, and perhaps Symmachus. The verb לָהַט obtains this signification apparently from the fundamental notion of licking or swallowing; and accordingly Theodotion renders it by ἀναλίσκόντων, and Aquila most appropriately by λάβρων (a word used of a ravenous furious longing for anything). But לָהַט nowhere means "to devour;" the poet must, therefore, in connection with לְהַטִּים, have been thinking of the flaming look or the fiery jaws of the lions, and this attributive will denote figuratively their strong desire, which snorts forth as it were flames of fire. The question further arises, (2) how the cohortative אֲשַׁכְּבָה is meant to be taken. Since the cohortative sometimes expresses that which is to be done more by outward constraint than inward impulse — never, however, without willing it one's self (Ew. § 228, a)—the rendering "I must," or "therefore must I lie down," commends itself. But the contrast, which has been almost entirely overlooked, between the literal beasts of prey and the children of men, who are worse than these, requires the simple and most natural rendering of the cohortative. We need only picture to ourselves the situation. The verb שָׁכַב here has the sense of cubitum ire (iv. 9). Starting from this אֲשַׁכְּבָה we look to ver. 9, and it at once becomes clear that we have before us an evening or nightly song. David the persecuted one finds himself in the wilderness and, if we accept the testimony of the inscription, in a cave: his soul is in the midst of lions, by which he means to say that his life is exposed to them. Here bold in faith, he is resolved to lie down to sleep, feeling himself more secure among lions than among men; for the children of men, his deadly foes both in word and in deed, are worse than beasts of prey: teeth and tongue are murderous weapons. This more than brutal joy at the destruction of one's neighbour* which prevails among men, urges him to put forth the prayer that God, who in Himself is exalted above the heavens and the whole earth, would show Himself by some visible manifestation over the heavens above as the exalted One, and the prayer that His glory may be, i.e. may become manifest (or even: exalted be His glory, יָרִים), over the whole earth beneath,—His glory which to His saints is a health-diffusing light, and to the heartless foes of men and God a consuming fire,—so that the whole world shall be compelled to acknowledge this glory in which His holiness manifests itself, and shall become conformed to it after everything that is hostile is overthrown.

Vers. 7-12. In this second half of the Psalm the poet refreshes himself with the thought of seeing that for which he longs and prays realized even with the dawning of the morning after this night of wretchedness. The perfect in ver. 7*d* is the perfect of certainty; the other perfects state what preceded and is now changed into the destruction of the crafty ones themselves. If the clause כִּפְפֵי נַפְשִׁי is rendered: my soul was bowed down (cf. לָלַץ, cix. 22), it forms no appropriate corollary to the crafty laying of snares. Hence כִּפַּף must be taken as transitive: he had bowed down my soul; the change of number in the mention of the enemies is very common in the Psalms relating to these trials, whether it be that the poet has one enemy κατ' ἐξοχήν before his mind or comprehends them all in one. Even the LXX. renders καὶ κατέκαμψαν τὴν ψυχὴν μου, it is true, as though it were וכִּפְפֵי, but can scarcely have read it thus. This line is still remarkable; one would expect for ver. 7*b* a thought parallel with ver. 7*d*, and perhaps the poet wrote כִּפְפֵי נַפְשִׁי, his (the net-layer's) own soul bends (viz. in order to fall into the net). Then כִּפַּף like נָפַל would be præc. confidentiæ. In this certainty, to express which the music here becomes triumphantly forte, David's heart is confident, cheerful (Symmachus ἐδραία), and a powerful inward impulse urges him to song and harp. Although נָכֵן may signify ready, equipped (Ex. xxxiv. 2, Job xii. 5), yet this meaning is to be rejected here in view of li. 12, lxxviii. 37, cxii. 7: it is not appropriate to the emphatic repetition of the word. His evening mood which found expression in ver. 4, was hope of victory; the morning mood into which David here transports himself, is certainty of victory. He calls upon his soul to awake (כְּבוֹרִי as in xvi. 9, xxx. 13), he calls upon harp and cithern to awake (וְנָבֵל וְכִנּוֹר with one article that avails for both words, as in Jer. xxix. 3, Neh. i. 5; and עִירָה with the accent on the ultima on account of the coming together of two aspirates), from which he has not parted even though a fugitive; with the music of stringed instruments and with song he will awake the not yet risen dawn, the sun still slumbering in its chamber: אֶעֱרֶה, expergeficiam (not expergisca), as e.g. in Cant. ii. 7, and as Ovid (Metam. xi. 597) says of the cock, evocat auroram.* His song of praise, however, shall not resound in a narrow space where it is scarcely heard; he will step forth as the evangelist of his deliverance and of his Deliverer in the world of nations (בְּעַמִּים; and the parallel word, as also in cviii. 4, cxlix. 7, is to be written בְּלִאֲמִים with Lamed raphatum and Metheg before it); his vocation extends beyond Israel, and the events of his life are to be for the benefit of mankind. Here we perceive the self-consciousness of a comprehensive mission, which accompanied David from the beginning to the end of his royal career (vid. xviii. 50). What is expressed in ver. 11 is both motive and theme of the discourse among the peoples, viz. God's mercy and truth which soar high as the heavens (xxxvi. 6). That they extend even to the heavens is only an earthly conception of their infinity (cf. Eph. iii. 18). In the refrain, ver. 12, which only differs in one letter from ver. 6, the Psalm comes back to the language of prayer. Heaven and earth have a mutually involved history, and the blessed, glorious end of this history is the sunrise of the divine doxa over both, here prayed for.

* With reference to the above passage in the Psalms, the Talmud, B. Berachoth 3b, says, "A cithern used to hang above David's bed; and when midnight came, the north wind blew among the strings, so that they sounded of themselves; and forthwith he arose and busied himself with the Tōra until the pillar of the dawn (עמוד השחר) ascended." Rashi observes, "The dawn awakes the other kings; but I, said David, will awake the dawn (אני מעורר את השחר)."

PSALM LVIII.

CRY FOR VENGEANCE UPON THOSE WHO PERVERT JUSTICE.

- 2 DO ye really, O ye gods, speak righteousness,
Do ye in uprightness judge the children of men?
- 3 Nay, in heart ye work iniquities,
In the land ye weigh out the violence of your hands.
- 4 Apostate are the ungodly from the womb,
Gone astray from the birth are the speakers of lies.
- 5 Poison have they after the likeness of the poison of the serpent,
Like a deaf adder which stoppeth her ear,
- 6 That she may not hear the voice of the charmers,
The skilful practiser of sorcery.
- 7 Elohim, break their teeth in their mouth,
The teeth of the lions do Thou wrench out, Jahve!
- 8 They must melt away as running water;
When he shooteth his arrows they are as though cut off.
- 9 (Let them be) as a snail that goes along dissolving as it goes,
(As) the untimely birth of a woman, that hath not seen the sun.
- 10 Before, then, your pots feel the thorn,
Whether it be raw or at boiling heat—He whirleth it away.
- 11 The righteous shall rejoice that he seeth vengeance,
He shall bathe his footsteps in the blood of the ungodly.
- 12 And men shall confess: Verily the righteous findeth fruit,
Verily there is a deity judging in the earth.

Their teeth, said Ps. lvii., are spear and arrows, and their tongue a sharp sword; Ps. lviii. prays: crush their teeth in their mouth. This prominent common thought has induced the collector to append the one Michtam of David, to be sung al-tashcheth, to the other. Ps. lviii., however, belongs to another period, viz. to the time of Absalom. The incomparable boldness of the language does not warrant us in denying it to David.

In no one Psalm do we meet with so many high-flown figures coming together within the same narrow compass. But that it is David who speaks in this Psalm is to a certain extent guaranteed by Ps. lxiv. and cxl. These three Psalms, of which the closing verses so closely resemble one another that they at once invite comparison, show that the same David who writes elsewhere so beautifully, tenderly, and clearly, is able among his manifold transitions to rise to an elevation at which his words as it were roll along like rumbling thunder through the gloomy darkness of the clouds, and more especially where they supplicate (lviii. 7) or predict (cxl. 10) the judgment of God.

The cumulative use of  $\text{מִי־בְּ}$  in different applications is peculiar to this Psalm. Its Michtam character becomes clearly defined in the closing verse.

Vers. 2, 3. The text of ver. 2a runs: Do ye really dictate the silence of righteousness? i.e. that before which righteousness must become silent, as the collector (cf. lvi. 1) appears to have read it ( $\text{מִי־בְּ} = \text{מִי־בְּ}$ , B. Chullin 89a). But instead of  $\text{מִי־בְּ}$  it is, with Houbigant, J. D. Michaelis, Mendelssohn, and others, to be read  $\text{מִי־בְּ}$  (=  $\text{מִי־בְּ}$ , as in Ex. xv. 11), as an apostrophe of those who discharge the godlike office of rulers and judges. Both the interrogative  $\text{מִי־בְּ}$  (with  $\text{יֵ}$  as is always the case at the head of interrogative clauses), num vere, which proceeds from doubt as to the questionable matter of fact (Num. xxii. 37, 1 Kings viii. 27, 2 Chron. vi. 18), and the parallel member of the verse, and also the historical circumstances out of which the Psalm springs, demand this alteration. Absalom with his followers had made the administration of justice the means of stealing from David the heart of his people; he feigned to be the more impartial judge. Hence David asks: Is it then really so, ye gods ( $\text{מִי־בְּ}$  like  $\text{מִי־בְּ}$ , lxxxii. 1, and here, as there, not without reference to their superhumanly proud and assumptive bearing), that ye speak righteousness, that ye judge the children of men in accordance with justice? Nay, on the contrary ( $\text{מִי־בְּ}$ , imo, introducing an answer that goes beyond the first No), in heart (i.e. not merely outwardly allowing yourselves to be carried away) ye prepare villanies ( $\text{מִי־בְּ}$ , as in Mic. ii. 1, and  $\text{מִי־בְּ}$ , as in lxiv. 7, from  $\text{מִי־בְּ} = \text{מִי־בְּ}$ , xcii. 16, Job v. 16, with  $\delta = \alpha + \omega$ ), in the land ye weigh out the violence of your hands (so that consequently violence fills the balances of your pretended justice). בְּנֵי אָרָם in ver. 2*b* is the accusative of the object; if it had been intended as a second vocative, it ought to have been בְּנֵי-אִישׁ (iv. 3). The expression is inverted in order to make it possible to use the heavy energetic futures. פְּאָרָץ (mostly erroneously marked with Pazer) has Athnach, cf. xxxv. 20, lxxvi. 12.

Vers. 4-6. After this bold beginning the boldest figures follow one another rapidly; and the first of these is that of the serpent, which is kept up longer than any of the others. The verb זָר (cogn. סָוַר) is intentionally written זָר in this instance in a neuter, not an active sense, plural זָרֵי, like בָּשׂוּ, טָבוּ. Bakius recognises a retrospective reference to this passage in Isa. xlviii. 8. In such passages Scripture bears witness to the fact, which is borne out by experience, that there are men in whom evil from childhood onwards has a truly diabolical character, i.e. a selfish character altogether incapable of love. For although hereditary sinfulness and hereditary sin (guilt) are common to all men, yet the former takes the most manifold combinations and forms; and, in fact, the inheriting of sin and the complex influence of the power of evil and of the power of grace on the propagation of the human race require that it should be so. The Gospel of John more particularly teaches such a dualism of the natures of men. הִמְתִּילָמוּ (with Rebia, as in xviii. 18*a*) is not the subject: the poison belonging to them, etc., but a clause by itself: poison is to them, they have poison; the construct state here, as in Lam. ii. 18, Ezek. i. 27, does not express a relation of actual union, but only a close connection. יִאָּמֵם (with the orthophonic Dagesh which gives prominence to the Teth as the commencement of a syllable) is an optative future form, which is also employed as an indicative in the poetic style, e.g. xviii. 11. The subject of this attributive clause, continuing the adjective, is the deaf adder, such an one, viz., as makes itself deaf; and in this respect (as in their evil serpent nature) it is a figure of the self-hardening evil-doer. Then with אֲשֶׁר begins the more minute description of this adder. There is a difference even among serpents. They belong to the worst among them that are inaccessible to any kind of human influence. All the arts of sorcery are lost upon them. מְלַחְשִׁים are the whisperers of magic formulæ (cf. Arabic naffu-thât, adjurations), and הַזֹּכֵר חֲבָרִים is one who works binding by spells, exorcism, and tying fast by magic knots (cf. הָבַר, to bind = to bewitch, cf. عَن, عَقَد, Persic bend = κατάδεσμος, vid. Isaiah, i. 118, ii. 242). The most inventive affection and the most untiring patience cannot change their mind. Nothing therefore remains to David but to hope for their removal, and to pray for it.

Vers. 7-10. The verb הָרַם is used much in the same way in ver. 7a as ἀράσσειν (e.g. Iliad, xiii. 577, ἀπὸ δὲ τρυφάλειαν ἀράξεν), which presents a similar onomatopoe. The form יִמְאַסִּי is, as in Job vii. 5, = יִמְסִי. The Jewish expositors, less appropriately, compare צִנְאָכִים, Num. xxxii. 24, and בָּזָא = בָּזָו, Isa. xviii. 2, 7; שִׁאֲמָה, Chethâb, Jer. xxx. 16, and הִרְאָמָה, Zechl. xiv. 10, more nearly resemble it. The treading (bending) of the bow is here, as in lxiv. 4, transferred to the arrows (= בִּזְוֹן, xi. 2): he bends and shoots off his arrows, they shall be as though cut off in the front, i.e. as inoperative as if they had no heads or points (פָּכוּ as in Isa. xxvi. 18). In ver. 9 follow two figures to which the apprecatory "let them become" is to be supplied. Or is it perhaps to be rendered: As a snail, which Thou causest to melt away, i.e. squashest with the foot (הִמָּסָה, as in xxxix. 12, fut. Hiph. of מָסָה = מָסָם), let him perish? The change of the number does not favour this; and according to the usage of the language, which is fond of construing הִלָּךְ with gerunds and participles, and also with abstract nouns, e.g. הִלָּךְ קָרִי, הִלָּךְ הַמָּסָה, the words הִלָּךְ הִמָּסָה belong together, and they are also accented accordingly: as a snail or slug which goes along in dissolution, goes on and dissolves as it goes (הִמָּסָה after the form הִתְבַּל from הִבֵּל*). The snail has received its name from this apparent dissolving into slime. For שִׁבְלִיל (with Dag. dirimens for שִׁבְלִיל) is the naked slimy snail or slug (Targum, according to ancient conception, זְחִיל הִתְבַּלֵּל "the slime-worm"), from שִׁבַּלֵּל, to make wet, moist.† In the second figure,

* In the Phœnician, the Cyprian copper mine Ταμασσός appears to have taken its name from תַּמָּס, liquefactio (Levy, Phönizische Studien, iii. 7).

† "God has created nothing without its use," says the Talmud, B. Shabbath 77b; "He has created the snail (שִׁבְלִיל לַבְּתִית) to heal bruises by laying it upon them:" cf. Genesis Rabba, ch. li. init., where שִׁבְלִיל is explained by לִימְצָא, סִילִי, סִילִי, כֹּגְכָלָה, σέσιλος, limax. Abraham b. David the only sense in which נפל אשה belong together is "the untimely birth of a woman;" and rather than explain with the Talmud (B. Mōed katan 6*b*) and Targum (contrary to the accents): as an abortion, a mole,* one would alter אשה into אשה. But this is not necessary, since the construct form אשה is found also in other instances (Deut. xxi. 11, 1 Sam. xxviii. 7) out of the genitival relation, in connection with a close coordinate construction. So here, where בל־חַוֵּי שָׁמֵשׁ, according to Job iii. 16, Eccles. vi. 3-5, is an attributive clause to נפל אשה (the falling away of a woman = abortions), which is used collectively (Ew. § 176, b). The accentuation also harmonizes here with the syntactic relation of the words. In ver. 10, אָטָר (plural in African, i.e. Punic, in Dioscorides ἀταδίν) is the rhamnus or buckthorn, which, like רְתָם, the broom, not only makes a cheerful crackling fire, but also produces an ash that retains the heat a long time, and is therefore very useful in cooking. The alternative בָּמוֹ—בָּמוֹ signifies sive, sive, whether the one or the other. חַי is that which is living, fresh, viz. the fresh, raw meat still having the blood in it, the opposite of מִבְּשָׁל (1 Sam. ii. 15); חֲרוֹן, a fierce heat or fire, here a boiling heat. There is no need to understand חרון metonymically, or perhaps as an adjective = charrōn, of boiled meat: it is a statement of the condition. The suffix of יִשְׁעֲרָנִי, however, refers, as being neuter, to the whole cooking apparatus, and more especially to the contents of the pots. The rendering therefore is: whether raw or in a state of heat, i.e. of being cooked through, He (Jahve) carries it away as with a whirlwind. Hengstenberg of Fez, the cotemporary of Saadia, has explained it in his Arabico-Hebrew Lexicon by אֶלְחֻלְזוֹן, the slug. Nevertheless this is properly the name of the snail with a house (נִרְתִּיק), Talmudic חֲקִלּוֹן, and even at the present day in Syria and Palestine حِلْزُون (which is pronounced ḥalezōn); whereas שְׂבָלִיל, in conformity with the etymon and with the figure, is the naked snail or slug. The ancient versions perhaps failed to recognise this, because the slug is not very often to be seen in hot eastern countries; but שְׂבָלִיל in this signification can be looked upon as traditional. The rendering "a rain-brook or mountain-torrent (Arabic seil sâbil) which running runs away," would, to say nothing more, give us, as Rosenmüller has already observed, a figure that has been made use of already in ver. 8.

* The mole, which was thought to have no eyes, is actually called in post-biblical Hebrew אֵישׁוֹת, plur. אֵישׁוֹת (vid. Kēlim xxi. 3).

rightly remarks, "To the raw meat correspond the immature plots, and to the cooked the mature ones." To us, who regard the Psalm as belonging to the time of Absalom, and not, like Hengstenberg, to the time of Saul, the meat in the pots is the new kingship of Absalom. The greater the self-renunciation with which David at that time looked on at the ripening revolt, disclaiming all action of his own, the stronger the confidence with which he expected the righteous interposition of God that did actually follow, but (as he here supposes possible) not until the meat in the pot was almost done through; yet, on the other side, so quickly, that the pots had scarcely felt the crackling heat which should fully cook the meat.

Vers. 11, 12. Finally, we have a view of the results of the judicial interposition of God. The expression made use of to describe the satisfaction which this gives to the righteous is thoroughly Old Testament and warlike in its tone (cf. lxxviii. 24). David is in fact king, and perhaps no king ever remained so long quiet in the face of the most barefaced rebellion, and checked the shedding of blood, as David did at that time. If, however, blood must nevertheless flow in streams, he knows full well that it is the blood of the partisans of his deluded son; so that the men who were led the further astray in their judgment concerning him, the more inactive he remained, will at last be compelled to confess that it does really repay one to be just, and that there is really one higher than the high ones (Eccles. v. 7 [8]), a deity (אֱלֹהִים) above the gods (אֱלֹהִים) who, though not forthwith, will nevertheless assuredly execute judgment in the earth. אֱלֹהִים here, as in Job xviii. 21, Isa. xlv. 14, retains its originally affirmative signification, which it has in common with אֱלֹהִים. אֱלֹהִים is construed with the plural (Ges. § 112, rem. 3), as is frequently the case, e.g. 2 Sam. vii. 23 (where, however, the chronicler, in 1 Chron. xvii. 21, has altered the older text). This is not because the heathen are speaking (Baur), but in order to set the infinite majesty and omnipotence of the heavenly Judge in contrast with these puffed-up "gods."

PSALM LIX.

PRAYER OF AN INNOCENT MAN WHOM MEN ARE TRYING TO TAKE.

- 2 DELIVER me from mine enemies, O my God,
From those who rise up against me bear me away!
- 3 Deliver me from the workers of iniquity,
And from men of blood save me!
- 4 For, lo, they lie in wait for my soul,
The shameless gather themselves together against me—
Not on account of transgression on my part and on account of sin, Jahve!
- 5 Without sin they run and make themselves ready;
Awake to meet me, and examine!
- 6 And do Thou, Jahve Elohim of hosts, God of Israel,
Stir Thyself to visit all the heathen,
Spare not all those who are atrociously faithless. (Sela.)
- 7 They come again at evening, they howl like dogs,
And go the rounds in the city.
- 8 Lo they foam at their mouth;
Swords are in their lips,
For "who doth hear it?!"
- 9 And Thou, Jahve, laughest at them,
Thou mockest at all the heathen.
- 10 *My strength, upon Thee will I wait,
For Elohim is my fortress.*
- 11 My God will come to meet me with His mercy, Elohim will cause me to rejoice over those who lie in wait
for me.
- 12 Slay them not, lest my people forget it,
Cause them to go astray by Thy power and cast them down;
Thou art our shield, O Lord!
- 13 The sin of their mouth is the word of their lips,
Therefore let them be ensnared in their pride,
And on account of the curse and the deceit which they utter.

- 14 Destroy in wrath, destroy, that they may be no more,
 And that they may know that Elohim is Ruler in Jacob Unto the ends of the earth! (Sela.)
- 15 They come again at evening, they howl like dogs,
 And go the rounds in the city.
- 16 They wander to and fro in order to eat;
 If they are not satisfied, they stay over night—
- 17 But as for me, I shall sing of Thy strength,
 And exult, in the morning, over Thy mercy;
 That Thou hast been a fortress to me,
 And a refuge in the day when I was afraid.
- 18 *My strength, to Thee will I harp,
 For Elohim is my fortress, my merciful God.*

This Michtam, after the melody Al-tashcheth, coinciding with lvii. 5 and lviii. 7 in the figure used in ver. 8, is the earliest among the Davidic Psalms which are dated from the time of Saul's persecution. When Saul sent and they (those who were sent by him) watched the house in order to slay him (David); it therefore belongs to the time spoken of in 1 Sam. xix. 11 sq. This inscription is no more intended to imply that the Psalm was composed on that night before the flight, which was rendered possible by the artifice of Michal, than the inscription of Ps. li. is meant to imply that the origin of the Psalm was coincident with the arrival of Nathan. The  $\text{?}$  of such inscriptions only sets forth in a general way the historical groundwork of the song. If we consider the contents of the Psalm from this point of view, we shall obtain a tolerably distinct picture of the situation. We must imagine that Saul, even before he issued that command to watch David's house the night through and to slay him in the morning, i.e. to assassinate him behind Michal's back (1 Sam. xix. 11), sought to get rid of him in some more secret way; that the venal men of his court, themselves not less ill-disposed towards David, had offered him their hand for the deed; and that in consequence of this, great activity, which was probably seen through by him whose life was threatened, was observable in Gibeon, and that more especially every evening, when the bandits strolled through the city in order to meet with the dreaded rival and give him his death-blow. The Psalms and the Prophets are often the medium through which we gain a deeper insight into events which are only sketched in the historical books after their most prominent outward features.

In consideration of the fact that the description of the nightly proceedings of the enemies is repeated after the manner of a refrain, and that the poet in ver. 17 contrasts his believably joyous prospects for the coming morning with the ineffectual ardour with which they pass the night patrolling the streets, Psalm lix. seems to be an evening song belonging to those perilous days spent in Gibea.

Vers. 2-10. First part. As far as ver. 4 we recognise strains familiar in the Psalms. The enemies are called מִתְקַוְמֵי as in Job xxvii. 7, cf. Ps. xvii. 7; עֲוִים as shameless, פְּנִים or שׁוֹנֵפִי; as in Isa. lvi. 11, on account of their bold shameless greediness, dogs. On לֹא in a subordinate clause, vid. Ewald, § 286, g: without there being transgression or sin on my side, which might have caused it. The suffix (transgression on my part) is similar to xviii. 24. בְּלִי־עֲוֹן (cf. Job xxxiv. 6) is a similar adverbial collateral definition: without there existing any sin, which ought to be punished. The energetic future jeruzân depicts those who servilely give effect to the king's evil caprice; they run hither and thither as if attacking and put themselves in position. הִתְכַּוְּנוּ = הִכְוִינוּ, like the Hithpa. הִפְסָה, Prov. xxvi. 26, the Hothpa. הִפְסַם, Lev. xiii. 55 sq., and the Nithpa. נִפְסַר, Deut. xxi. 8. Surrounded by such a band of assassins, David is like one besieged, who sighs for succour; and he calls upon Jahve, who seems to be sleeping and inclined to abandon him, with that bold עֲוֶרָה לְקִרְאָתִי וְרָאָה, to awake to meet him, i.e. to join him with His help like a relieving army, and to convince Himself from personal observation of the extreme danger in which His charge finds himself. The continuation was obliged to be expressed by וְאָמְתָה, because a special appeal to God interposes between עֲוֶרָה and הִקְיֶצָה. In the emphatic "Thou," however, after it has been once expressed, is implied the conditional character of the deliverance by the absolute One. And each of the divine names made use of in this lengthy invocation, which corresponds to the deep anxiety of the poet, is a challenge, so to speak, to the ability and willingness, the power and promise of God. The juxtaposition Jahve Elohim Tsebaoth (occurring, besides this instance, in lxxx. 5, 20, lxxxiv. 9), which is peculiar to the Elohimic Psalms, is to be explained by the consideration that Elohim had become a proper name like Jahve, and that the designation Jahve Tsebaoth, by the insertion of Elohim in accordance with the style of the Elohimic Psalms, is made still more imposing and solemn; and now צבאות is a genitive dependent not merely upon יהוה but upon יהוה אלהים (similar to lvi. 1a, Isa. xxviii. 1b; Symbolæ, p. 15). אלהי ישראל is in apposition to this threefold name of God. The poet evidently reckons himself as belonging to an Israel from which he excludes his enemies, viz. the true Israel which is in reality the people of God. Among the heathen, against whom the poet invokes God's interposition, are included the heathen-minded in Israel; this at least is the view which brings about this extension of the prayer. Also in connection with the words כָּל־בְּנֵי אֱוֹן the poet, in fact, has chiefly before his mind those who are immediately round about him and thus disposed. It is those who act treacherously from extreme moral nothingness and worthlessness (אֱוֹן genit. epexeg.). The music, as Sela directs, here becomes more boisterous; it gives intensity to the strong cry for the judgment of God; and the first unfolding of thought of this Michtam is here brought to a close.

The second begins by again taking up the description of the movements of the enemy which was begun in vers. 4, 5. We see at a glance how here ver. 7 coincides with ver. 5, and ver. 8 with ver. 4, and ver. 9 with ver. 6. Hence the imprecatory rendering of the futures of ver. 7 is not for a moment to be entertained. By day the emissaries of Saul do not venture to carry out their plot, and David naturally does not run into their hands. They therefore come back in the evening, and that evening after evening (cf. Job xxiv. 14); they snarl or howl like dogs (הָפִיהוּ, used elsewhere of the growling of the bear and the cooing of the dove; it is distinct from נב, נביח, to bark, and בלב, to yelp), because they do not want to betray themselves by loud barking, and still cannot altogether conceal their vexation and rage; and they go their rounds in the city (like סובב בעיר, Cant. iii. 2, cf. supra lv. 11), in order to cut off their victim from flight, and perhaps, what would be very welcome to them, to run against him in the darkness. The further description in ver. 8 follows them on this patrol. What they belch out or foam out is to be inferred from the fact that swords are in their lips, which they, as it were, draw so soon as they merely move their lips. Their mouth overflows with murderous thoughts and with slanders concerning David, by which they justify their murderous greed to themselves as if there were no one, viz. no God, who heard it. But Jahve, from whom nothing, as with men, can be kept secret, laughs at them, just as He makes a mockery of all heathen, to whom this murderous band, which fears the light and is unworthy of the Israelitish name, is compared. This is the primary passage to xxxvii. 13, ii. 4; for Ps. lix. is perhaps the oldest of the Davidic Psalms that have come down to us, and therefore also the earliest monument of Israelitish poetry in which the divine name Jahve Tsebaoth occurs; and the chronicler, knowing that it was the time of Samuel and David that brought it into use, uses this name only in the life of David. Just as this strophe opened in ver. 7 with a distich that recurs in ver. 15, so it also closes now in ver. 10 with a distich that recurs below in ver. 18, and that is to be amended according to the text of that passage. For all attempts to understand עָוֹן as being genuine prove its inaccuracy. With the old versions it has to be read עָוֹן; but as for the rest, אִשְׁמְרָה must be retained in accordance with the usual variation found in such refrains: my strength, Thee will I regard (1 Sam. xxvi. 15; observe, 2 Sam. xi. 16), or upon Thee will I wait (cf. הָ, cxxx. 6); i.e. in the consciousness of my own feebleness, tranquil and resigned, I will look for Thine interposition on my behalf.

Vers. 11-18. In this second half of the Psalm the cry of fear is hushed. Hope reigns, and anger burns more fiercely. The Keri says that ver. 11a is to be read: אֱלֹהֵי הַסְּדֵי יִקְרָמֵנִי, my gracious God will anticipate me,—but with what? This question altogether disappears if we retain the Chethib and point אֱלֹהֵי הַסְּדֵי: my God will anticipate me with His mercy (cf. xxi. 4), i.e. will meet me bringing His mercy without any effort of mine. Even the old translators have felt that הַסְּדֵי must belong to the verb as a second object. The LXX. is perfectly correct in its rendering, ὁ Θεός μου τὸ ἔλεος αὐτοῦ προφθάσει

με. The Keri has come into existence in looking to ver. 18, according to which it seems as though אֱלֹהֵי הַסָּדֵי ought to be added to the refrain, ver. 10 (cf. a similar instance in xlii. 6, 7). But ver. 11a would be stunted by doing this, and it accords with Biblical poetic usage that the refrain in ver. 18 should be climactic in comparison with ver. 10 (just as it also does not altogether harmonize in its first half); so that Olshausen's proposal to close ver. 10 with אֱלֹהֵי הַסָּדֵי and to begin ver. 11 with הַסָּדֵי (cf. lxxix. 8) is only just to be put on record. The prayer "slay them not" does not contradict the prayer that follows for their destruction. The poet wishes that those who lie in wait for him, before they are totally swept away, may remain for a season before the eyes of his people as an example of punishment. In accordance with this, הִנְיָעָמוּ, by a comparison of the Hiph. in Num. xxxii. 13, and of the Kal in ver. 16, cix. 10, is to be rendered: cause them to wander about (Targum, cf. Genesis Rabba, ch. xxxviii. init., טַלְטְלָמוּ); and in connection with בְּחַיְלָךְ one is involuntarily reminded of x. 10, 14, and is tempted to read בְּחַלְקָךְ or בְּחַלְקֵךְ: cause them to wander about in adversity or wretchedness, = عمر حالك, vita caliginosa h. e. misera), and more especially since בחילך occurs nowhere else instead of בְּזַרְעֶךָ or בְּיַמֶּיךָ. But the Jod in בחילך is unfavourable to this supposition; and since the martial apostrophe of God by "our shield" follows, the choice of the word is explained by the consideration that the poet conceives of the power of God as an army (Joel ii. 25), and perhaps thinks directly of the heavenly host (Joel iv. [iii.] 11), over which the Lord of Hosts holds command (Hitzig). By means of this He is first of all to cause them to go astray (נָע וָנָד, Gen. iv. 12), then utterly to cast them down (lvi. 8). The Lord (אֲדֹנָי) is to do this, as truly as He is Israel's shield against all the heathen and all pseudo-Israelites who have become as heathen. The first member of ver. 13 is undoubtedly meant descriptively: "the sin of their mouth (the sin of the tongue) is the word of their lips" (with the dull-toned suffix mo, in the use of which Ps. lix. associates itself with the Psalms of the time of Saul, lvi., xi., xvii., xxii., xxxv., lxiv.). The combination וְיִלְכְּדוּ בְּגִאוֹנֵם, however, more readily suggests parallel passages like Prov. xi. 6 than Prov. vi. 2; and moreover the מֶן of the expression וּמִאֲלֵה וּמִכְחָשׁ, which is without example in connection with כִּפְּר, and, taken as expressing the motive (Hupfeld), ought to be joined with some designations of the disposition of mind, is best explained as an appended statement of the reason for which they are to be ensnared, so that consequently יִסְפְּרוּ (cf. lxix. 27, lxiv. 6) is an attributive clause; nor is this contrary to the accentuation, if one admits the Munach to be a transformation of Mugrash. It is therefore to be rendered: "let them, then, be taken in their pride, and on account of the curse and deceit which they wilfully utter." If, by virtue of the righteousness of the Ruler of the world, their sin has thus become their fall, then, after they have been as it were a warning example to Israel, God is utterly to remove them out of the way, in order that they (it is unnecessary to suppose any change of subject), while perishing, may perceive that Elobim is Ruler in Jacob (י, used elsewhere of the object, e.g. Mic. v. 1, is here used of the place of dominion), and as in Jacob, so from thence unto the ends of the earth (ל like עַל, xlvi. 11) wields the sceptre. Just like the first group of the first part, this first group of the second part also closes with Sela.

The second group opens like the second group in the first part, but with this exception, that here we read וַיִּשְׁכְּבוּ, which loosely connects it with what precedes, whereas there it is וַיִּשְׁבּוּ. The poet's gaze is again turned towards his present straitened condition, and again the pack of dogs by which Saul is hunting him present themselves to his mind. הַפֶּה points towards an antithesis that follows, and which finds its expression in וַיִּאֲנִי. וַיִּלְיִנִי and לְבַקֵּר stand in direct contrast to one another, and in addition to this לְעָרֵב has preceded. The reading of the LXX. (Vulgate, Luther, [and authorized version]), καὶ γογγύσουσιν = וַיִּלְיִנִי or וַיִּלְנִי, is thereby proved to be erroneous. But if וַיִּלְיִנִי is the correct reading, then it follows that we have to take ver. 16 not as foretelling what will take place, but as describing that which is present; so that consequently the fut. consec. (as is frequently the case apart from any historical connection) is only a consecutive continuation of וַיִּנְעִי (for which the Keri has וַיִּנְעִי; the form that was required in ver. 12, but is inadmissible here): they wander up and down (נִיעַ as in cix. 10, cf. נִיר, Job xv. 23) to eat (that is to say, seeking after food); and if they are not satisfied, they pass the night, i.e. remain, eager for food and expecting it, over night on the spot. This interpretation is the most natural, the simplest, and the one that harmonizes best not only with the text before us (the punctuation יִשְׁבְּעוּ, not יִשְׁבְּעֵי, gives the member of the clause the impress of being a protasis), but also with the situation. The poet describes the activity of his enemies, and that by completing or re-touching the picture of their comparison to dogs: he himself is the food or prey for which they are so eager, and which they would not willingly allow to escape them, and which they nevertheless cannot get within their grasp. Their morbid desire remains unsatisfied: he, however, in the morning, is able to sing of the power of God, which protects him, and exultantly to praise God's loving-kindness, which satiates and satisfies him (xc. 14); for in the day of fear, which to him is now past, God was his inaccessible stronghold, his unapproachable asylum. To this God, then, even further the play of his harp shall be directed (אֲזַמְרָה), just as was his waiting or hoping (אֲשַׁמְרָה, ver. 10).

PSALM LX.

DRILL PSALM AFTER A LOST BATTLE.

- 3 ELOHIM, Thou hast cast us off, Thou hast scattered us,
Thou hast been angry, restore us again!
- 4 Thou hast made the land to tremble, Thou hast torn it asunder,
Heal its breaches, for it tottereth!!
- 5 Thou hast made Thy people experience a hard thing,
Thou hast given us wine to drink to intoxication.
- 6 Thou hast given those who fear Thee a banner
To lift themselves up on account of the truth. (Sela.)
- 7 In order that Thy beloved may be delivered,
Save now with Thy right hand and answer me!!!
- 8 Elohim hath promised in His holiness:
I shall rejoice, I shall portion out Shechem,
And measure out the valley of Succoth.

- 9 Mine is Gilead and mine Manasseh,
And Ephraim is the helm of my head,
Judah is my sceptre,
10 Moab is my wash-pot,
Upon Edom I cast my shoe.
Cry out concerning me, O Philistia!
- 11 Who will conduct me to the fortified city?
Who will bring me to Edom?!
- 12 Hast not Thou, Elohim, cast us off,
And goest not forth, Elohim, with our armies?—
- 13 Grant us deliverance from the oppressor;
Yea, vain is the help of man.
- 14 In Elohim shall we obtain the victory,
And He will tread down our oppressors.

This last of the Elohimic Michtammim of David is dated from the time of the Syro-Ammonitish war: When he (David) waged war (Hiph. of מִצַּח, to pull, to seize by the hair) with (תָּצַח like עָץ in Num. xxvi. 9; according to Ben-Asher, with Segol instead of Makkeph here, as in xlvi. 5, Prov. iii. 12, three passages which are noted by the Masora) Aram of the two rivers (the people of the land of the twin streams, Μεσοποταμία) and with Aram Zobah (probably between the Euphrates and Orontes north-east of Damascus), and Joab returned (וַיָּשֶׁב, transition from the infinitive to the finite verb, Ges. § 132, rem. 2) and smote Edom in the Valley of Salt (the Edomitish Ghor, i.e. the salt plain, some ten miles wide, at the southern extremity of the Dead Sea) with twelve thousand men. This historical inscription comes from an historical work which gave the Psalm in this connection. It is not taken out of any of the histories that have been preserved to us. For both in 2 Sam. viii. 13 and in 1 Chron. xviii. 12 we find the number eighteen thousand instead of twelve. In the former passage, in which עָשָׂה שָׁמַע is substantially equivalent to the Roman triumphum agere, we have to read אֶת־אֲרָם after the inscription of our Psalm instead of אֶת־אֲרָם. It is, however, still more probable that the words וַיָּצַח אֶת־אֲרָם (LXX. ἐπάταξε τὴν Ἰδουμαίαν) have accidentally fallen out. The fact that here in the Psalm the victory over the Edomites is ascribed to Joab, in the Chronicles to Abshai (Abishai), and in 2 Sam. ch. viii. to David, is a difference which may easily be reconciled by the consideration that the army of David was under the supreme command of Joab, and this battle in the Valley of Salt was fought against the Edomites by Joab indirectly through his brother (cf. 2 Sam. x. 10).

The inscription carries us into the time of the greatest, longest, and most glorious of David's wars, that with the Ammonites, which, so far as these were concerned, ended in the second year in the conquest of Rabbah (vid. Ps. xxi.), and with their Aramæan allies, among whom Hadadezer, the ruler of the powerful kingdom of Zobah, was defeated in the first year at Chêlam on the other side the Jordan. Then when, in the second year, he endeavoured to fortify himself anew in the districts on the banks of the Euphrates, he was completely subjugated together with the Syrians who had come to his assistance. Thus are the accounts of Aramæan wars related in 2 Sam. ch. viii. and x.-xii. to be combined. Whilst, now, the arms of David were making such triumphant progress in the north, the Edomites in the south had invaded the land which was denuded of troops, and here a new war, which jeopardized all the results that had been gained in the north, awaited the victorious army. Ps. lx. refers more especially to this Edomitish war. Hengstenberg is wrong when he infers from the inscription that it was composed after the victory in the Valley of Salt and before the conquest of Idunæa. The inscription only in a general way gives to the Psalm its historical setting. It was composed before the victory in the Valley of Salt, and presupposes the Israelitish south had been at that time grievously laid waste by the Edomites, against whom they were unable to oppose an adequate force. We may also infer from other indications how the occupation of the neighbouring and brother-country by the Edomites called for vengeance against them; vid. on Ps. xlv. That Korahitic Psalm may have been composed after the Davidic Psalm, and is designedly, by ver. 10, brought into relationship with it. In the cento Ps. cviii. vers. 7-14 correspond to lx. 7-14.

The Michtam character of the Psalm manifests itself both in the fact that a divine oracle is unfolded in it, and also in the fact that the language of complaint, "Elohim, Thou hast cast us off" (cf. xlv. 10), is repeated as its favourite utterance. Concerning עֵל־שׁוֹשַׁן עֲדוּת, after "A Lily is the testimony" (or "The Lily of the testimony"), vid. on xlv. 1. The addition of לְלַמֵּד is to be interpreted according to קָשָׁה בְּנִי־יְהוָה קָשָׁה, 2 Sam. i. 18: the song is thereby appointed to be sung in connection with the practice of the bow. The elegy on Saul and Jonathan was suited to this by reason of the praise which is therein given to the bow of Jonathan, the favourite weapon of that brave warrior, and by the indirect remembrance of the skilful Philistine archers, who brought a disgrace upon the name of Israel in the battle on Gilboa, that needed as speedily as possible to be wiped out. Ps. lx., this most martial of all the Psalms, is also a song at the practice of arms, which was designed to inflame and to hallow the patriotic martial ardour of the young men when they were being exercised.

Hengstenberg and others, who reckon according to the Masoretic verses, divide the Psalm into three strophes of four Masoretic verses each. The fact that the use made of Ps. lx. in Ps. cviii. begins with ver. 7, לִמְעַן יִחַלְצֵנּוּ, lends some colour to this division, which is also strengthened by the Sela. Nevertheless vers. 6 and 7 belong inseparably together.

Vers. 3-7. This first strophe contains complaint and prayer; and establishes the prayer by the greatness of the need and Israel's relationship to God. The sense in which פָּרַצְתָּנִי is intended becomes clear from 2 Sam. v. 20, where David uses this word of the defeat of the Philistines, and explains it figuratively. The word signifies to break through what has hitherto been a compact mass, to burst, blast, scatter, disperse. The prayer is first of all timidly uttered in הֲשׁוּבָה לָנוּ in the form of a wish; then in רַפָּה (ver. 4*b*) and הוֹשִׁיעָה (ver. 7*b*) it waxes more and more eloquent. הֲשׁוּבָה here signifies to grant restoration (like הִנִּיחָה לְ, to give rest; xxiii. 3, Isa. lviii. 12). The word also signifies to make a turn, to turn one's self away, in which sense, however, it cannot be construed with לְ.

On פָּצַמְתָּהּ Dunash has already compared rumpere, scindere, and Mose ha-Darshan the Targumic פָּצַם = קָרַע, Jer. xxii. 14. The deep wounds which the Edomites had inflicted upon the country, are after all a wrathful visitation of God Himself—reeling or intoxicating wine, or as תַּרְעֵלָה יין (not יין), properly conceived of, is : wine which is sheer intoxication (an apposition instead of the genitive attraction, vid. on Isa. xxx. 20), is reached out by Him to His people. The figure of the intoxicating cup has passed over from the Psalms of David and of Asaph to the prophets (e.g. Isa. li. 17, 21). A kindred thought is expressed in the proverb: Quem Deus perdere vult, eum dementat. All the preterites as far as הִשְׁקִיתָנִי (ver. 5*b*) glance back plaintively at that which has been suffered. But ver. 6 cannot be thus intended; for to explain with Ewald and Hitzig, following the LXX., “Thou hast set up a banner for those who reverence Thee, not for victory, but for flight,” is inadmissible, notwithstanding the fact that נִים מִפְּנֵי קִשְׁתָּא is a customary phrase and the inscribed לְמַר is favourable to the mention of the bow. For (1) The words, beginning with נָתַתָּ, do not sound like an utterance of something worthy of complaint,—in this case it ought at least to have been expressed by אָרָא לְהַתְנוּסִים (only for flight, not for victory); (2) it is more than improbable that the bow, instead of being called קִשְׁתָּא (feminine of the Arabic masculine kaus), is here, according to an incorrect Aramaic form of writing, called קִשְׁטָא, whereas this word in its primary form קִשְׁטָא (Prov. xxii. 21) corresponds to the Aramaic קִשְׁטָא not in the signification “a bow,” but (as it is also intended in the Targum of our passage) in the signification “truth” (Arabic kist of strict unswerving justice, root טק, to be hard, strong, firm; just as, vice versâ, the word sidk, coming from a synonymous root, is equivalent to “truth”). We therefore take the perfect predication, like ver. 4*a*, as the foundation of the prayer which follows: Thou hast given those who fear Thee a banner to muster themselves (sich aufpanieren), i.e. to raise themselves as around a standard or like a standard, on account of the truth—help then, in order that Thy beloved ones may be delivered, with Thy right hand, and answer me. This rendering, in accordance with which ver. 6 expresses the good cause of Israel in opposition to its enemies, is also favoured by the heightened effect of the music, which comes in here, as Sela prescribes. The reflexive הִתְנוּסִים here therefore signifies not, as Hithpal. of נִים, “to betake one’s self to flight,” but “to raise one’s self”—a signification on behalf of which we cannot appeal to Zech. ix. 16, where מְהַרְצֵנוּת is apparently equivalent to מְהַרְצֵנוּת, “sparkling,” but which here results from the juxtaposition with  $\text{נִצֵּץ}$  (cf.  $\text{נִצֵּץ}$ , iv. 7), inasmuch as  $\text{נִצֵּץ}$  itself, like  $\text{נָס}$ , is so called from  $\text{נָסַע}$ ,  $\text{נָס}$ , to set up, raise, whether it be that the Hithpo. falls back upon the Kal of the verb or that it is intended as a denominative (to raise one’s self as a banner, sich aufspanieren).\* It is undeniable that not merely in later (e.g. Neh. v. 15), but also even in older Hebrew,  $\text{מַפְּיָיִךְ}$  denotes the reason and motive (e.g. Deut. xxviii. 20). Moreover Ps. xlv. is like a commentary on this  $\text{מַפְּיָיִךְ}$ , in which the consciousness of the people of the covenant revelation briefly and comprehensively expresses itself concerning their vocation in the world. Israel looks upon its battle against the heathen, as now against Edom, as a rising for the truth in accordance with its mission. By reason of the fact and of the consciousness which are expressed in ver. 6, arises the prayer in ver. 7, that Jahve would interpose to help and to rescue His own people from the power of the enemy.  $\text{יְהוָה}$  is instrumental (vid. on iii. 5). It is to be read  $\text{יְהוָה}$  according to the Keri, as in cviii. 7, instead of  $\text{יְהוָה}$ ; so that here the king of Israel is speaking, who, as he prays, stands in the place of his people.

Vers. 8-10. A divine utterance, promising him victory, which he has heard, is expanded in this second strophe. By reason of this he knows himself to be in the free and inalienable possession of the land, and in opposition to the neighbouring nations, Moab, Edom, and Philistia, to be the victorious lord to whom they must bow. The grand word of promise in 2 Sam. vii. 9 sq. is certainly sufficient in itself to make this feeling of certainty intelligible, and perhaps vers. 8-10 are only

* [This expression well illustrates the power of the German language in coining words, so that the language critically dealt with may be exactly reproduced to the German mind. The meaning will at once be clear when we inform our readers that Panier is a banner or standard; the reflexive denominative, therefore, in imitation of the Hebrew, sich aufspanieren signifies to “up-standard one’s self,” to raise one’s self up after the manner of a standard, which being “done into English” may mean to rally (as around a standard). We have done our best above faithfully to convey the meaning of the German text, and we leave our readers to infer from this illustration the difficulties with which translators have not unfrequently to contend.—TR.]

a pictorial reproduction of that utterance; but it is also possible that at the time when Edom threatened the abandoned bordering kingdom, David received an oracle from the high priest by means of the Urim and Thummim, which assured him of the undiminished and continued possession of the Holy Land and the sovereignty over the bordering nations. That which God speaks "in His holiness" is a declaration or a promise for the sure fulfilment and inviolability of which He pledges His holiness; it is therefore equal to an oath "by His holiness" (lxxxix. 36, Amos iv. 2). The oracle does not follow in a direct form, for it is not God who speaks (as Olshausen thinks), to whom the expression אֱלֹהֵי is unbecoming, nor is it the people (as De Wette and Hengstenberg), but the king, since what follows refers not only to the districts named, but also to their inhabitants. יְיָ might have stood before אֱלֹהֵי, but without it the mode of expression more nearly resembles the Latin me exultaturum esse (cf. xlix. 12). Shechem in the centre of the region on this side the Jordan, and the valley of Succoth in the heart of the region on the other side, form the beginning; for there is not only a סַכּוֹת (the name both of the eminence and of the district) on the west side of the Jordan south of Beisân (Scythopolis), but there must also have been another on the other side of the Jordan (Gen. xxxiii. 17 sq., Judg. viii. 4 sq.) which has not as yet been successfully traced. It lay in the vicinity of Jabbok (ez-Zerka), about in the same latitude with Shechem (Sichem), south-east of Scythopolis, where Estori ha-Parchi contends that he had found traces of it not far from the left bank of the Jordan. Josh. xiii. 27 gives some information concerning the נַחַל (valley) of Succoth. The town and the valley belonged to the tribe of Gad. Gilead, side by side with Manasseh, ver. 9a, comprehends the districts belonging to the tribes of Gad and Reuben. As far as ver. 9c, therefore, free dominion in the cis- and trans-Jordanic country is promised to David. The proudest predicates are justly given to Ephraim and Judah, the two chief tribes; the former, the most numerous and powerful, is David's helmet (the protection of his head), and Judah his staff of command (מַטֵּה הַצֵּבָח, the command-giving = staff of command, as in Gen. xlix. 10, Num. xxi. 18); for Judah, by virtue of the ancient promise, is the royal tribe of the people who are called to the dominion of the world. This designation of Judah as the king's staff or sceptre and the marshal's baton shows that it is the king who is speaking, and not the people. To him, the king, who has the promise, are Moab, Edom, and Philistia subject, and will continue so. Moab the boastful serves him as a wash-basin;* Edom the crafty and malicious is forcibly taken possession of by him and obliged to submit; and Philistia the warlike is obliged to cry aloud concerning him, the irresistible ruler. פִּיר רַחֵץ is a wash-pot or basin in distinction from a seething-pot, which is also called פִּיר. The throwing of a shoe over a territory is a sign of taking forcible possession, just as the taking off of the shoe (חָלַץ יְצֵה) is a sign of the renunciation of one's claim or right: the shoe is in both instances the symbol of legal possession.† The rendering of the last line, with Hitzig and Hengstenberg: "exult concerning me, O Philistia," i.e. hail me, though compelled to do so, as king, is forbidden by the עָלֵי, instead of which we must have looked for לֵי. The verb רִעַץ certainly has the general signification "to break out into a loud cry," and like the Hiph. (e.g.

* A royal attendant, the tasht-dâr, cup- or wash-basin-bearer, carried the wash-basin for the Persian king both when in battle and on a journey (vid. Spiegel, Avesta ii. LXIX.). Moab, says the Psalmist, not merely waits upon him with the wash-basin, but himself serves as such to him.

† The sandal or the shoe, I. as an object of <sup>ء</sup>وَطَأَ, of treading down, oppressing, signifies metaphorically, (1) a man that is weak and incapable of defending himself against oppression, since one says, ma kuntu nd'lan, I am no shoe, i.e. no man that one can tread under his feet; (2) a wife (quæ subjicitur), since one says, g'alaad' nd'lahu, he has taken off his shoe, i.e. cast off his wife (cf. Lane under <sup>ء</sup>حَدَّآءَ, which even signifies a shoe and a wife). II. As an instrument of <sup>ء</sup>وَطَأَ, tropically of the act of oppressing and of reducing to submission, the <sup>ء</sup>نَعْلٌ serves as a symbol of subjugation to the dominion of another. Rosenmüller (Das alte und neue Morgenland, No. 483) shows that the Abyssinian kings, at least, cast a shoe upon anything as a sign of taking forcible possession. Even supposing this usage is based upon the above passage of the Psalms, it proves, however, that a people thinking and speaking after the Oriental type associated this meaning with the casting of a shoe upon anything.—FLEISCHER. Cf. Wetzstein's Excursus at the end of this volume

Isa. xv. 4) the Hithpal. can also be used of a loud outcry at violence.

Vers. 11-14. The third strophe reverts to prayer; but the prayer now breathes more freely with a self-conscious courage for the strife. The fortified city (עִיר מְצוּר) is not Rabbath Ammon; but, as becomes evident from the parallel member of the verse and 2 Kings xiv. 7, the Idumæan chief city of Sela' (סֶלַע) or Petra (vid. Knobel on Gen. xxxvi. 42, cf. Ps. xxxi. 22, 2 Chron. viii. 5, xi. 5 together with xiv. 5). The wish: who will conduct me = Oh that one would conduct me (Ges. § 136, 1)! expresses a martial desire, joyful at the prospect of victory; concerning מִי נִתְּנִי, quis perduxerit me, vid. on xi. 3. What follows is not now to be rendered: Not Thou (who but Thou), Elohim, who . . . (Hitzig)—for in order to have been understood thus and not as in ver. 3, xlv. 10, the poet could not have omitted אֲשֶׁר—on the contrary, the interrogatory הֲלֹא is the foundation on which the supplicatory הֲבָה is raised. The king of Israel is hard pressed in the battle, but he knows that victory comes from above, from the God who has hitherto in anger refused it to His people, inasmuch as He has given power to Edom to break through the defensive forces of Israel (vid. xlv. 10). עָזְרָת (not עֲזָרָת = עֲזָרָה) is, as in cviii. 13, equivalent to עֲזָרְתָהּ. The view that it is equal to עֲזָרְתִּי, the suffix being cast away, is not confirmed in this instance, vid. on xvi. 6, cf. iii. 3. How vain is human succour, has been seen only very recently in the case of the kings of Zobah and Ammon, who have succumbed in spite of their confederates. Israel prays for its victorious power from above, and also obtains it thence, as is most confidently expressed in ver. 14. עֲשֵׂה הַיָּל, to do valiantly, to show valour, is equivalent to: to be victorious, as in cxviii. 16. In God does Israel conquer, and God, who is in Israel, will by means of Israel tread down Edom in accordance with its deserts.

PSALM LXI.

PRAYER AND THANKSGIVING OF AN EXPELLED KING ON HIS WAY BACK TO THE THRONE.

- 2 OH hear, Elohim, my plaintive cry,
Oh hearken to my prayer!
- 3 From the end of the earth I cry to Thee when my heart
languisheth,
Up a rock too high for me do Thou lead me;
- 4 For Thou hast become a refuge for me,
A strong tower, hiding me from the enemy.
- 5 I shall dwell in Thy tabernacle for æons,
I shall find refuge in the protection of Thy wings. (Sela.)
- 6 For Thou, Elohim, hast hearkened to my vows, Thou hast given back the heritage of those who fear Thy name.
- 7 Days to the days of the king do Thou add,
Let his years be as a generation and a generation.
- 8 Let him remain for ever in the presence of Elohim—
Mercy and truth do Thou appoint to preserve him—
- 9 So will I harp unto Thy name for it for ever,
That I may pay my vows day by day.

The Davidic Michtammim are now ended, and there follows a short Davidic song על־נְנִינֹת. Does this expression mean “with the accompaniment of stringed instruments?” Not strictly, for this is expressed by the inscription בְּנְנִינֹת (iv. 1, cf. Isa. xxx. 29, 32). But the formula may signify “upon the music of stringed instruments,” i.e. upon stringed instruments. And this is more probable than that נְנִינֹת is the beginning of a standard song. The termination ath is not necessarily the construct state. It was the original feminine termination; and the prevailing one in Phœnician.

Some expositors, like Köster, Ewald, Hitzig, and Olshausen, feel themselves here also bound, by reason of the לְרֹד of the inscription, to seek a place for this Psalm as far down as the Babylonian Exile and the times of the Ptolemies and the Seleucidæ. Hupfeld deals somewhat more kindly with the לָרֵךְ in this instance, and Böttcher (De Inferis, p. 204) refutes the hypotheses set up in its stead in order finally to decide in favour of the idea that the king of whom the Psalm speaks is Cyrus—which is only another worthless bubble. We abide by the proudly ignored לָרֵךְ, and have as our reward a much more simple interpretation of the Psalm, without being obliged with Ewald to touch it up by means of a verse of one's own invention interwoven between verses 5 and 6. It is a Psalm of the time of Absalom, composed in Mahanaim or elsewhere in Gilead, when the army of the king had smitten the rebels in the wood of Ephraim. It consists of two parts of eight lines.

Vers. 2-5. Hurlled out of the land of the Lord in the more limited sense* into the country on the other side of the Jordan, David felt only as though he were banished to the extreme corner of the earth (not: of the land, cf. xlv. 10, Dent. xxviii. 49, and frequently), far from the presence of God (Hengstenberg). It is the feeling of homelessness and of separation from the abode of God by reason of which the distance, in itself so insignificant (just as was the case with the exiles later on), became to him immeasurably great. For he still continually needed God's helpful intervention; the enveloping, the veiling, the faintness of his heart still continues (עָטַף, עֲטָפָה, according to its radical signification: to bend and lay anything round so that it lies or draws over something else and covers it, here of a self-enveloping); a rock of difficulties still ever lies before him which is too high for his natural strength, for his human ability, therefore insurmountable. But he is of good courage: God will lead him up with a sure step, so that, removed from all danger, he will have rocky

* Just as in Num. xxxii. 29 sq. the country east of Jordan is excluded from the name "the land of Canaan" in the stricter sense, so by the Jewish mind it was regarded from the earliest time to a certain extent as a foreign country (הַחוּצָה לְאֶרֶץ), although inhabited by the two tribes and a half; so that not only is it said of Moses that he died in a foreign land, but even of Saul that he is buried in a foreign land (Numeri Rabba, ch. viii. and elsewhere).

ground under his feet. He is of good courage, for God has already proved Himself to be a place of refuge to him, to be a strong tower, defying all attack, which enclosed him, the persecuted one, so that the enemy can gain no advantage over him (cf. Prov. xviii. 10). He is already on the way towards his own country, and in fact his most dearly loved and proper home: he will or he has to (in accordance with the will of God) dwell (cf. the cohortative in Isa. xxxviii. 10, Jer. iv. 21) in God's tabernacle (vid. on xv. 1) throughout æons (an utterance which reminds one of the synchronous Ps. xxiii. ver. 6). With נָצַח is combined the idea of the divine protection (cf. Arabic g'âr ollah, the charge or protégé of God, and Beduinic g'aur, the protecting hearth; g'awir, according to its form = נָצַח, one who flees for refuge to the hearth). A bold figure of this protection follows: he has to, or will trust, i.e. find refuge, beneath the protection of God's wings. During the time the tabernacle was still being moved from place to place we hear no such mention of dwelling in God's tabernacle or house. It was David who coined this expression for loving fellowship with the God of revelation, simultaneously with his preparation of a settled dwelling-place for the sacred Ark. In the Psalms that belong to the time of his persecution by Saul such an expression is not yet to be found; for in Ps. lii. 7, when it is desired that Doeg may have the opposite of an eternal dwelling-place, it is not the sacred tent that is meant. We see also from its second part that this Ps. lxi. does not belong to the time of Saul; for David does not speak here as one who has drawn very near to his kingly office (cf. xl. 8), but as one who is entering upon a new stage in it.

Vers. 6-9. The second part begins with a confirmation of the gracious purpose of God expressed in ver. 5. David believes that he shall experience what he gives expression to in ver. 5; for God has already practically shown him that neither his life nor his kingship shall come to an end yet; He has answered the prayers of His chosen one, that, blended with vows, resulted from the lowly, God-resigned spirit which finds expression in 2 Sam. xv. 25 sq., and He has given or delivered up to him the land which is his by inheritance, when threatened by the rebels as robbers,—the land to which those who fear the covenant God have a just claim. It is clear enough that the receivers are "those who fear the name of Jahve;" the genitive relation describes the יִרְשָׁה as belonging to them in opposition to those who had usurped it. Or does יִרְשָׁה here perhaps mean the same as אֲרִשָׁה in xxi. 3? Certainly not. לָּ יִרְשָׁה לְּ is a customary phrase, the meaning of which, "to give anything to any one as his inheritance or as his own property," is to be retained (e.g. Deut. ii. 19). God has acknowledged David's cause; the land of Israel is again wrested from those to whom it does not belong; and now begins a new era in the reign of its rightful king. In view of this the king prays, in vers. 7, 8, that God would add another goodly portion to the duration of his life. The words sound like intercession, but the praying one is the same person as in vers. 2-5. The expression מְלִכָּה מְשִׁיחָה (the King Messiah) of the Targum shows to whom the church referred the word "king" after the extinction of the Davidic dynasty. The exalted tone of the wish expressed in ver. 7*b* (cf. Joel ii. 2) favours this without absolutely requiring it (cf. עוֹלָמִים, ver. 5, xxi. 5, and the royal salutation, 1 Kings i. 31, Dan. ii. 4, and frequently). There ought (as also e.g. in ix. 8) not to be any question whether יָשָׁב in ver. 8 signifies "to sit enthroned," or "to sit" = "to abide;" when the person spoken of is a king it means "to remain enthroned," for with him a being settled down and continuous enthronement are coincident. בָּ in ver. 8*b* is imperat. apoc. for בְּנִיה (after the form בָּה, בָּה, בָּה). The poet prays God to appoint mercy and truth as guardian angels to the king (xl. 12, Prov. xx. 28, where out of pause it is יִצְרִי; cf. on the other hand lxxviii. 7, Prov. ii. 11, v. 2). Since the poet himself is the king for whom he prays, the transition to the first person in ver. 9 is perfectly natural. בָּ signifies, as it always does, so or thus = in accordance therewith, corresponding to the fulfilment of these my petitions, thankfully responding to it. לְשַׁלְּמִי is the infinitive of the aim or purpose. Singing praise and accompanying it with music, he will make his whole life one continuous paying of vows.

PSALM LXII.

RESIGNATION TO GOD WHEN FOES CROWD IN UPON ONE.

- 2 VERILY resignation to Elohim is my soul,
From Him cometh my salvation.
- 3 Verily He is my rock and my salvation,
My fortress, I shall not be greatly moved.
- 4 How long will ye rush in upon a man,
How long will ye thrust him in all of you as a bowing wall, a tottering fence? !—
- 5 Only from his exaltation have they determined to thrust him down,
Seeing they love lies, each one blesseth with his mouth,
And in their inward part they curse. (Sela.)
- 6 Verily to Elohim resign thyself, my soul;
For from Him cometh my hope.
- 7 Verily He is my rock and my salvation,
My fortress, I shall not be moved.
- 8 Upon Elohim dependeth my salvation and my glory;
The rock of my defence, and my refuge, have I in Elohim.
- 9 Trust in Him at all times, ye people!
Pour out your heart before Him,
Elohim is a refuge for us! (Sela.)
- 10 Only a breath are the children of men, the sons of nobles a lie;
Going swiftly upward in the balance, they are altogether like a breath.
- 11 Trust not in oppression, and through plunder become not vain,
Increase of wealth do not deign to regard!
- 12 One thing hath Elohim spoken,
These two have I heard:
That power is of Elohim,
- 13 And Thine, O Lord, is mercy—
For Thou recompensest every man according to his work.

Concerning this Psalm, which is placed next to the preceding Psalm by reason of several points of mutual relationship (cf. lxii. 8*b* with lxi. 4, 8; lxii. 9*b* with lxi. 4; lxii. 13*b* with lxi. 9), as being a product of the time of the persecution by Absalom, and also concerning עַל־יְדִוּתוֹן, we have spoken already in the introduction to Ps. xxxix., which forms with it a twin pair. The particle אֵל occurs there four times, and in this Psalm even as many as six times. The strophic structure somewhat resembles that of Ps. xxxix., in that here we also have longer strophes which are interspersed by tristichs.

Vers. 2-5. The poet, although apparently irrecoverably lost, does not nevertheless despair, but opposes one thing to the tumultuous crowding in upon him of his many foes, viz. quiet calm submission,—not, however, a fatalistic resignation, but that which gives up everything to God, whose hand (vid. 2 Sam. xii. 7-13) can be distinctly recognised and felt in what is now happening to him. אֵל (yea, only, nevertheless) is the language of faith, with which, in the face of all assault, established truths are confessed and confirmed; and with which, in the midst of all conflict, resolutions, that are made and are to be firmly kept, are deliberately and solemnly declared and affirmed. There is no necessity for regarding דְּוִמָּה (not דְּוִמָּה), which is always a substantive (not only in xxii. 3, xxxix. 3, but also in this instance and in lxxv. 2), and which is related to דְּוִמָּה, silence, xciv. 17, cxv. 17, just as עַל־לִיָּה, Jer. xxxii. 19, is related to עַל־לִיָּה, as an accus. absol.: in silent submission (Hupfeld). Like תְּפִלָּה in cix. 4, it is a predicate: his soul is silent submission, i.e. altogether resigned to God without any purpose and action of its own. His salvation comes from God, yea, God Himself is his salvation, so that, while God is his God, he is even already in possession of salvation, and by virtue of it stands imperturbably firm. We see clearly from xxxvii. 24, what the poet means by רָבָה. He will not greatly, very much, particularly totter, i.e. not so that it should come to his falling and remaining down. רָבָה is an adverb like רַבַּת, cxxiii. 4, and הִרְבָּה, Eccles. v. 19.

There is some difficulty about the ἀπαξ λεγομ. ἡδὴ οὐκ (ver. 4*a*). Abulwalîd, whom Parchon, Kimchi, and most others follow, compares the Arabic هَتَّ الرَّجُلُ, the man brags; but this هت (intensive form هتهت) signifies only in a general way to speak fluently, smoothly and rapidly one word after another, which would give too poor an idea here. There is another هت (cogn. هتك, proscindere) which has a meaning that is even better suited to this passage, and one which is still retained in the spoken language of Syria at the present day: hattani is equivalent to "he compromised me" (= hataka es-sitra 'annî, he has pulled my veil down), dishonoured me before the world by speaking evil concerning me; whence in Damascus el-hettât is the appellation for a man who without any consideration insults a person before others, whether he be present or absent at the time. But this هت only occurs in Kal and with an accusative of the object. The words עַד-אֲנָה תְּהוֹתוֹ עַל-אִישׁ find their most satisfactory explanation in the هوت in common use in Damascus at the present day, which is not used in Kal, but only in the intensive form. The Piel هوت هوت على فلان signifies to rush upon any one, viz. with a shout and raised fist in order to intimidate him.* From this הוה, of which even the construction with על together with the intensive form is characteristic, we here read the Pil. הוהת, which is not badly rendered by the LXX. ἐπιτίθεσθε, Vulgate irruitis. In ver. 4b it is a question whether the reading תִּרְצָחֶיךָ of the school of Tiberias or the Babylonian תִּרְצָחֶיךָ is to be preferred. Certainly the latter; for the former (to be rendered, "may you" or "ye shall be broken in pieces, slain") produces a thought that is here introduced too early, and one that is inappropriate to the figures that follow. Standing as it still does under the

* Neshwân and the Kâmûs say: "hawwata and hajjata bi-fulân-in signifies to call out to any one in order to put him in terror (صاح به);" "but in Syria," as Wetzstein goes on to say, "the verb does not occur as med. Jod, nor is hawwata there construed with ب, but only with على."

A very ready phrase with the street boys in Damascus is لئى شئ تهوت على "why dost thou threaten me?"

regimen of עֲרֹאֲנָה, עֲרֹאֲנָה, is to be read as a Piel; and, as the following figures show, is to be taken, after xlii. 11, in its primary signification contundere (root רָץ).* The sadness of the poet is reflected in the compressed, obscure, and peculiar character of the expression. בְּלִבְכֶם and אִישׁ (a single one—ye all) stand in contrast. בְּקִיר וְגו', sicut parietem = similem parieti (cf. lxiii. 6), forms the object to תִּרְצְחוּ. The transmitted reading גִּרְר הַדְּחִיָּה, although not incorrect in itself so far as the gender (Prov. xxiv. 31) and the article are concerned (Ges. § 111, 2, a), must apparently be altered to גִּרְרָה דְּחִיָּה (Olshausen and others) in accordance with the parallel member of the verse, since both גִּרְרָה and גִּרְר are words that can be used of every kind of surrounding or enclosure. To them David seems like a bent, overhanging wall, like a wall of masonry that has received the thrust that must ultimately cause its fall; and yet they rush in upon him, and all together they pursue against the one man their work of destruction and ruin. Hence he asks, with an indignation that has a somewhat sarcastic tinge about it, how long this never-satiated self-satisfying of their lust of destruction is meant to last. Their determination (יָעֵז' as in Isa. xiv. 24) is clear. It aims only or entirely (אֵד, here tantummodo, prorsus) at thrusting down from his high position, that is to say from the throne, viz. him, the man at whom they are always rushing (לְהַרְיוֹ = לְהַרְיוֹת). No means are too base for them in the accomplishment of their object, not even the mask of the hypocrite. The clauses which assume a future form of expression are, logically at least, subordinate clauses (Ew. § 341, b). The Old Testament language allows itself a change of number like בְּפִי instead of בְּפִיהֶם, even to the very extreme, in the hurry of emotional utterance. The singular is distributive in this instance: suo quisque ore, like לוֹ

* The reading of Ben-Asher הִרְצִחוּ is followed by Aben-Ezra, Kimchi, and others, taking this form (which could not possibly be anything else) as Pual. The reading of Ben-Naphtali הִרְצְחוּ is already assumed in B. Sanhedrin 119a. Besides these the reading הִרְצְחוּ (without Dag.) is also found, which cannot be taken as a resolved Piel, since the Metheg is wanting, but is to be read terotzchu, and is to be taken (as also the reading כִּלְיֵי, ci. 5, and וַיִּחַלְקֵם, 1 Chron. xxiii. 6, xxiv. 3) as Poal (vid. on xciv. 20, cix. 10).

in Isa. ii. 20, כִּי־פָנֵי, Isa. v. 23, cf. xxx. 22, Zech. xiv. 12. The pointing יִקְלְלֵי follows the rule of יִהְלְלוּ, xxii. 27, יִרְנְנוּ, cxlix. 5, and the like (to which the only exceptions are הִנְנִי, הִקְנִי, הִנְנִי).

Vers. 6-9. The beginning of the second group goes back and seizes upon the beginning of the first. נָא is affirmative both in ver. 6 and in ver. 7. The poet again takes up the emotional affirmations of vers. 2, 3, and, firm and defiant in faith, opposes them to his masked enemies. Here what he says to his soul is very similar to what he said of his soul in ver. 2, inasmuch as he makes his own soul objective and exalts himself above her; and it is just in this that the secret of personality consists. He here admonishes her to that silence which in ver. 2 he has already acknowledged as her own; because all spiritual existence as being living remains itself unchanged only by means of a perpetual "becoming" (mittelst steten Werdens), of continuous, self-conscious renovation. The "hope" in ver. 6*b* is intended to be understood according to that which forms its substance, which here is nothing more nor less than salvation, ver. 2*b*. That for which he who resigns himself to God hopes, comes from God; it cannot therefore fail him, for God the Almighty One and plenteous in mercy is surety for it. David renounces all help in himself, all personal avenging of his own honour—his salvation and his honour are עַל־אֱלֹהִים (vid. on vii. 11). The rock of his strength, i.e. his strong defence, his refuge, is בְּאֱלֹהִים; it is where Elohim is, Elohim is it in person (? as in Isa. xxvi. 4). By עַם, ver. 9, the king addresses those who have remained faithful to him, whose feeble faith he has had to chide and sustain in other instances also in the Psalms belonging to this period. The address does not suit the whole people, who had become for the most part drawn into the apostasy. Moreover it would then have been עַמִּי (my people). עַם frequently signifies the people belonging to the retinue of a prince (Judg. iii. 18), or in the service of any person of rank (1 Kings xix. 21), or belonging to any union or society whatever (2 Kings iv. 42 sq.). David thus names those who cleave to him; and the fact that he cannot say "my people" just shows that the people as a body had become alienated from him. But those who have remained to him of the people are not therefore to despair; but they are to pour out before God, who will know how to protect both them and their king, whatever may lie heavily upon their heart.

Vers. 10-13. Just as all men with everything earthly upon which they rely are perishable, so also the purely earthly form which the new kingship has assumed carries within itself the germ of ruin; and God will decide as Judge, between the dethroned and the usurpers, in accordance with the relationship in which they stand to Him. This is the internal connection of the third group with the two preceding ones. By means of the strophe vers. 10-13, our Psalm is brought into the closest reciprocal relationship with Ps. xxxix. Concerning בְּגִי־אָדָם and שִׁבְי־אֱוִי־אִישׁ vid. on xlix. 3, iv. 3. The accentuation divides ver. 10 quite correctly. The Athnach does not mark לְעֹלֹת בְּמֵאֻזְנִים as an independent clause: they are upon the balance לְעֹלֹת, for a going up; they must rise, so light are they (Hengstenberg). Certainly this expression of the periphrastic future is possible (vid. on xxv. 14, Hab. i. 17), still we feel the want here of the subject, which cannot be dispensed with in the clause as an independent one. Since, however, the combining of the words with what follows is forbidden by the fact that the infinitive with לְ in the sense of the ablat. gerund. always comes after the principal clause, not before it (Ew. § 280, d), we interpret: upon the balances ad ascendendum = certo ascensuri, and in fact so that this is an attributive that is co-ordinate with אֲבָבָה. Is the clause following now meant to affirm that men, one and all, belong to nothingness or vanity (אֲבָבָה partitivum), or that they are less than nothing (אֲבָבָה comparat.)? Umbreit, Stier, and others explain Isa. xl. 17 also in the latter way; but parallels like Isa. xli. 24 do not favour this rendering, and such as Isa. xliv. 11 are opposed to it. So also here the meaning is not that men stand under the category of that which is worthless or vain, but that they belong to the domain of the worthless or vain.

The warning in ver. 11 does not refer to the Absalomites, but, pointing to these as furnishing a salutary example, to those who, at the sight of the prosperous condition and joyous life on that side, might perhaps be seized with envy and covetousness. Beside אֲבָבָה הַבָּבָה the meaning of אֲבָבָה הַבָּבָה is nevertheless not: to set a vain hope upon anything (for the idea of hoping does not exist in this verb in itself, Job xxvii. 12, Jer. ii. 5, nor in this construction of the verb), but: to be befooled, blinded by something vain (Hitzig). Just as they are not to suffer their heart to be befooled by their own unjust acquisition, so also are they not, when the property of others increases (גַּב, root גַּב, to raise one's self, to mount up; cf. Arabic nabata, to sprout up, grow; nabara, to raise; intransitive, to increase, and many other verbal stems), to turn their heart towards it, as though it were something great and fortunate, that merited special attention and commanded respect. Two great truths are divinely attested to the poet. It is not to be rendered: once hath God spoken, now twice (Job xl. 5, 2 Kings vi. 10) have I heard this; but after lxxxix. 36: One thing hath God spoken, two things (it is) that I have heard; or in accordance with the interpunction, which here, as in xii. 8 (cf. on ix. 16), is not to be called in question: these two things have I heard. Two divine utterances actually do follow. The two great truths are: (1) that God has the power over everything earthly, that consequently nothing takes place without Him, and that whatever is opposed to Him must sooner or later succumb; (2) that of this very God, the sovereign Lord (אֱלֹהֵינוּ), is mercy also, the energy of which is measured by His omnipotence, and which does not suffer him to succumb upon whom it is bestowed. With וְיָ the poet establishes these two revealed maxims which God has impressed upon his mind, from His righteous government as displayed in the history of men. He recompenses each one in accordance with his doing, κατὰ τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ, as Paul confesses (Rom. ii. 6) no less than David, and even (vid. LXX.) in the words of David. It shall be recompensed unto every man according to his conduct, which is the issue of his relationship to God. He who rises in opposition to the will and order of God, shall feel God's power (יָ) as a power for punishment that dashes in pieces; and he who, anxious for salvation, resigns his own will to the will of God, receives from God's mercy or loving-kindness (חַסְדֵּךָ), as from an overflowing fulness, the promised reward of faithfulness: his resignation becomes experience, and his hoping attainment.

PSALM LXIII.

MORNING HYMN OF ONE WHO IS PERSECUTED, IN A WATERLESS DESERT.

- 2 ELOHIM, Thou art my God, early do I seek Thee ;
My soul thirsteth after Thee, my flesh pineth for Thee
In a land of dryness, and is wearied without water.
- 3 Thus have I looked after Thee in the sanctuary,
To see Thy power and Thy glory.
- 4 For Thy loving-kindness is better than life,
My lips shall praise Thee.
- 5 Thus will I bless Thee while I live,
In Thy name will I lift up my hands.
- 6 As with marrow and fat is my soul satisfied,
And with jubilant lips doth my mouth sing praise.
- 7 When I remember Thee upon my bed,
Throughout the night-watches do I meditate upon Thee.
- 8 For Thou hast become a help to me,
And in the shadow of Thy wings can I shout for joy.
- 9 My soul followeth hard after Thee,
Thy right hand holdeth me fast.
- 10 But they, to destruction do they seek my soul :
They shall go into the abysses of the earth.
- 11 They deliver him into the power of the sword,
A portion of jackals do they become.
- 12 Nevertheless the king shall rejoice in Elohim,
Every one shall glory who sweareth by Him ;
For the mouth of those who speak lies shall be stopped.

Now follows Ps. lxiii., the morning Psalm of the ancient church with which the singing of the Psalms was always introduced at the Sunday service.* This Psalm is still more closely

* Constitutiones Apostolicæ, ii. 59 : 'Εκάστης ἡμέρας συναθροίξεσθε ὄρθρου καὶ ἑσπέρας ψάλλοντες καὶ προσευχόμενοι ἐν τοῖς κυριακοῖς ὄρθρου μὲν λέγοντες ψαλμὸν τὸν ξβ' (lxiii), ἑσπέρας δὲ τὸν ρμ' (cxli.). Athanasius says just the related to Ps. lxi. than Ps. lxii. Here, as in Ps. lxi., David gives utterance to his longing for the sanctuary; and in both Psalms he speaks of himself as king (vid. Symbolæ, p. 56). All the three Psalms, lxi.–lxiii., were composed during the time of Absalom; for we must not allow ourselves to be misled by the inscription, A Psalm, by David, when he was in the wilderness of Judah (also LXX., according to the correct reading and the one preferred by Euthymius, τῆς Ἰουδαίας, not τῆς Ἰδουμαίας), into transferring it, as the old expositors do, to the time of Saul. During that period David could not well call himself “the king;” and even during the time of his persecution by Absalom, in his flight, before crossing the Jordan, he tarried one or two days בערבות המדבר, in the steppes of the desert (2 Sam. xv. 23, 28, xvii. 16), i.e. of the wilderness of Judah lying nearest to Jerusalem, that dreary waste that extends along the western shore of the Dead Sea. We see clearly from 2 Sam. xvi. 2 (הַיַּעַף בַּמִּדְבָּר) and xvi. 14 (עַיִפִּים), that he there found himself in the condition of a יַעֵף. The inscription, when understood thus, throws light upon the whole Psalm, and verifies itself in the fact that the poet is a king; that he longs for the God on Zion, where he has been so delighted to behold Him, who is there manifest; and that he is persecuted by enemies who have plotted his ruin. The assertion that he is in the wilderness (ver. 2) is therefore no mere rhetorical figure; and when, in ver. 11, he utters the imprecation over his enemies, “let them become a portion for the jackals,” the influence of the desert upon the moulding of his thoughts is clearly seen in it.

We have here before us the Davidic original, or at any rate the counterpart, to the Korahitic pair of Psalms, xlii., xliiii. It is a song of the most delicate form and deepest spiritual contents; but in part very difficult of exposition. When we have, approximately at least, solved the riddle of same in his De virginitate: πρὸς ὄρθρον τὸν ψαλμὸν τοῦτον λέγετε, κ.τ.λ. Hence Ps. lxiii. is called directly ὁ ὄρθρινός (the morning hymn) in Constit. Apostol. viii. 37. Eusebius alludes to the fact of its being so in Ps. xci. (xcii.), p. 608, ed. Montfaucon. In the Syrian order of service it is likewise the morning Psalm κατ' ἐξοχήν, vid. Dietrich, De psalterii usu publico et divisione in Ecclesia Syriaca, p. 3. The LXX. renders אִשְׁחַרְךָ in ver. 2, πρὸς εἰ ὄρθρίζω, and באשמרת in ver. 7, ἐν τοῖς ὄρθροις (in matutinis).

one Psalm, the second meets us with new riddles. It is not merely the poetical classic character of the language, and the spiritual depth, but also this half-transparent and half-opaque covering which lends to the Psalms such a powerful and unvarying attractiveness. They are inexhaustible, there always remains an undeciphered residue; and therefore, though the work of exposition may progress, it does not come to an end. But how much more difficult is it to adopt this choice spiritual love-song as one's own prayer! For this we need a soul that loves after the same manner, and in the main it requires such a soul even to understand it rightly; for, as the saintly Bernard says, lingua amoris non amanti barbara est.

Vers. 2-4. If the words in ver. 2 were אֱלֹהִים אַתָּה אֲשַׁחֲרֶךָ, then we would render it, with Böttcher, after Gen. xlix. 8: Elohim, Thee do I seek, even Thee! But אֱלֹהִים forbids this construction; and the assertion that otherwise it ought to be, "Jahve, my God art Thou" (cxl. 7), rests upon a non-recognition of the Elohimic style. Elohim alone by itself is a vocative, and accordingly has Mehupach legarme. The verb אֲשַׁחֲרֶךָ signifies earnest, importunate seeking and inquiring (e.g. lxxviii. 34), and in itself has nothing to do with שַׁחַר, the dawn; but since ver. 7 looks back upon the night, it appears to be chosen with reference to the dawning morning, just as in Isa. xxvi. 9 also, אֲשַׁחֲרֶךָ stands by the side of אֱלֹהִים בְּלֵילָהּ. The LXX. is therefore not incorrect when it renders it: πρὸς σὲ ὀρθρίζω (cf. ὁ λαὸς ὄρθριζεν πρὸς αὐτόν, Luke xxi. 38); and Apollinaris strikes the right note when he begins his paraphrase,

Νύκτα μετ' ἀμφιλόκησιν σὲ μάκαρ μάκαρ ἀμφιχορεύσω—

At night when the morning dawns will I exult around Thee, most blessed One.

The supposition that בְּאֶשֶׁר בְּאֶרֶץ is equivalent to בְּאֶשֶׁר בְּאֶרֶץ, or even that the Beth is Beth essentialis ("as a," etc.), are views that have no ground whatever, except as setting the inscription at defiance. What is meant is the parched thirsty desert of sand in which David finds himself. We do not render it: in a dry and languishing land, for אֶרֶץ is not an adjective, but a substantive,—the transition of the feminine adjective to the masculine primary form, which sometimes (as in 1 Kings xix. 11) occurs, therefore has no application here; nor: in the land of drought and of weariness, for who would express himself thus? וְעֵינַי, referring to the nearest subject וְשֵׁרִי, continues the description of the condition (cf. Gen. xxv. 8). In a region where he is surrounded by sun-burnt aridity and a nature that bears only one uniform ash-coloured tint, which casts its unrefreshing image into his inward part, which is itself in much the same parched condition, his soul thirsts, his flesh languishes, wearied and in want of water (languidus deficiente aqua), for God, the living One and the Fountain of life. בְּמַה (here with the tone drawn back, בְּמַה, like בְּחַר, 1 Chron. xxviii. 10, עָמַר, Hab. iii. 11) of ardent longing which consumes the last energies of a man (root בָּמָ, whence בָּמָן and בָּמָם to conceal, and therefore like עָמַר, עָלָה, proceeding from the idea of enveloping; Arabic كَمَى, to be blind, dark, pale, and disconcerted). The LXX. and Theodotion erroneously read בְּמַה (how frequently is this the case!); whereas Aquila renders it ἐπεράθη, and Symmachus still better, imélpetai (the word used of the longing of love). It is not a small matter that David is able to predicate such languishing desire after God even of his flesh; it shows us that the spirit has the mastery within him, and not only forcibly keeps the flesh in subjection, but also, so far as possible, draws it into the realm of its own life—an experience confessedly more easily attained in trouble, which mortifies our carnal nature, than in the midst of the abundance of outward prosperity. The God for whom he is sick [lit. love-sick] in soul and body is the God manifest upon Zion.

Now as to the ׀ in ver. 3—a particle which is just such a characteristic feature in the physiognomy of this Psalm as ׀ is in that of the preceding Psalm—there are two notional definitions to choose from: thus = so, as my God (Ewald), and : with such longing desire (as e.g. Oettinger). In the former case it refers back to the confession, “Elohim, my God art Thou,” which stands at the head of the Psalm; in the latter, to the desire that has just been announced, and that not in its present exceptional character, but in its more general and constant character. This reference to what has immediately gone before, and to the modality, not of the object, but of the disposition of mind, deserves the preference. “Thus” is accordingly equivalent to “longing thus after Thee.” The two כן in vers. 3 and 5 are parallel and of like import. The alternation of the perfect (ver. 3) and of the future (ver. 5) implies that what has been the Psalmist's favourite occupation heretofore, shall also be so in the future. Moreover, בארץ ציה and בְּקִרְיָשׁ form a direct antithesis. Just as he does now in a dry land, so formerly in the sanctuary he looked forth longingly towards God (הָיָה with the conjoined idea of solemnity and devotion). We have now no need to take לראות as a gerundive (videndo), which is in itself improbable; for one looks, peers, gazes at anything just for the purpose of seeing what the nature of the object is (xiv. 2, Isa. xlii. 18). The purpose of his gazing upon God was to gain an insight into the nature of God, so far as it is disclosed to the creature; or, as it is expressed here, to see His power and glory, i.e. His majesty on its terrible and on its light and loving side, to see this, viz., in its sacrificial appointments and sacramental self-attestations. Such longing after God, which is now all the more intense in the desert far removed from the sanctuary, filled and impelled him; for God's loving-kindness is better than life, better than this natural life (vid. on xvii. 14), which is also a blessing, and as the prerequisite of all earthly blessings a very great blessing. The loving-kindness of God, however, is a higher good, is in fact the highest good and the true life: his lips shall praise this God of mercy, his morning song shall be of Him; for that which makes him truly happy, and after which he even now, as formerly, only and solely longs, is the mercy or loving-kindness (חַסְדֵּךָ) of this God, the infinite worth of which is measured by the greatness of His power (עֹז) and glory (קְבוֹד). It might also be rendered, "Because Thy loving-kindness is better than life, my lips shall praise Thee;" but if כִּי is taken as demonstrative (for), it yields a train of thought that that is brought about not merely by what follows (as in the case of the relative because), but also by what precedes: "for Thy loving-kindness . . . my lips shall then praise Thee" (שִׁבְחֵיךָ with the suffix appended to the energetic plural form ûn, as in Isa. lx. 7, 10, Jer. ii. 24).

Vers. 5-9. This strophe again takes up the יָדָה (ver. 3): thus ardently longing, for all time to come also, is he set towards God, with such fervent longing after God will he bless Him in his life, i.e. entirely filling up his life therewith (יְבָרַךְ as in civ. 33, cxlvi. 2; cf. Baruch iv. 20, ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις μου), and in His name, i.e. invoking it and appealing to it, will he lift up his hands in prayer. The being occupied with God makes him, even though as now in the desert he is obliged to suffer bodily hunger, satisfied and cheerful like the fattest and most marrowy food: velut adipe et pinguedine satiatur anima mea. From Lev. iii. 17, vii. 25, Grussetius and Frisch infer that spirituales epulæ are meant. And certainly the poet cannot have had the sacrificial feasts (Hupfeld) in his mind; for the  $\text{לֶחֶם}$  of the shelamim is put upon the altar, and is removed from the part to be eaten. Moreover, however, even the Tôra does not bind itself in its expression to the letter of that prohibition of the fat of animals, vid. Deut. xxxii. 14, cf. Jer. xxxi. 14. So here also the expression "with marrow and fat" is the designation of a feast prepared from well-fed, noble beasts. He feels himself satisfied in his inmost nature just as after a feast of the most nourishing and dainty meats, and with lips of jubilant songs (accus. instrum. according to Ges. § 138, rem. 3), i.e. with lips jubilant and attuned to song, shall his mouth sing praise. What now follows in ver. 7 we no longer, as formerly, take as a protasis subsequently introduced (like Isa. iv. 3 sq.): "when I remembered . . . meditated upon Thee," but so that ver. 7a is the protasis and ver. 7b the apodosis, cf. xxi. 12, Job ix. 16 (Hitzig): When I remember Thee (meminerim, Ew. § 355, b) upon my bed (stratis meis, as in cxxxii. 3, Gen. xlix. 4, cf. 1 Chron. v. 1)—says he now as the twilight watch is passing gradually into the morning—I meditate upon Thee in the night-watches (Symmachus, καθ' ἐκάστην φυλακὴν), or during, throughout the night-watches (like  $\text{בְּיָמַי}$  in ver. 5); i.e. it is no passing remembrance, but it so holds me that I pass a great part of the night absorbed in meditation on Thee. He has no lack of matter for his meditation; for God has become a help (auxilio, vid. on iii. 3) to him: He has rescued him in this wilderness, and, well concealed under the shadow of His wings (vid. on xvii. 8, xxxvi. 8, lvii. 2), which affords him a cool retreat in the heat of conflict and protection against his persecutors, he is able to exult ( $\text{אֲרִיז}$ , the potential). Between himself and God there subsists a reciprocal relationship of active love. According to the schema of the crosswise position of words (chiasmus),  $\text{אֲרִיז}$  and  $\text{בִּי}$  intentionally jostle close against one another: he depends upon God, following close behind Him, i.e. following Him everywhere and not leaving Him when He wishes to avoid him; and on the other side God's right hand holds him fast, not letting him go, not abandoning him to his foes.

Vers. 10-12. The closing strophe turns towards these foes. By וְהִפֹּתָ he contrasts with his own person, as in lix. 16 sq., lvi. 7 sq., the party of the enemy, before which he has retreated into the desert. It is open to question whether לְשׂוֹנְאֵי is intended to be referred, according to xxxv. 17, to the persecuted one (to destroy my life), or, with Hupfeld, to the persecutors (to their own destruction, they themselves for destruction). If the former reference to the persecuted be adopted, we ought, in order to give prominence to the evidently designed antithesis to ver. 9, to translate: those, however, who . . . , shall go down into the depths of the earth (Böttcher, and others); a rendering which is hazardous as regards the syntax, after וְהִפֹּתָ and in connection with this position of the words. Therefore translate: On the other hand, those, to (their own) ruin do they seek my soul. It is true this ought properly to be expressed by לְשׂוֹנְאֵתָם, but the absence of the suffix is less hazardous than the above relative rendering of יִבְקְשׁוּ. What follows in ver. 10b-11 is the expansion of לְשׂוֹנְאֵי. The futures from יִבְאֵי onwards are to be taken as predictive, not as imprecatory; the former accords better with the quiet, gentle character of the whole song. It shall be with them as with the company of Korah. תְּהִי־תֵי־וֹת הַתְּהִי־וֹת is the interior of the earth down into its deepest bottom; this signification also holds good in cxxxix. 15, Isa. xlv. 23.* The phrase עַל-יְדֵי הַרְבַּב here and in Jer. xviii. 21, Ezek. xxxv. 5 (Hiph., not of יָרַר, to drag, tear away, but יָגַר, to draw towards, flow), signifies properly to pour upon = into the hands (Job xvi. 11), i.e. to give over (הִסְגִּיר) into the power of the sword; effundent eum is (much the same as in Job iv. 19, xviii. 18, and frequently) equivalent to effundetur. The enallage is like v. 10, vii. 2 sq., and frequently: the singular refers to each individual of the homogeneous multitude, or to this multitude itself as a concrete persona moralis. The king, however, who is now banished from Jerusalem to the habitation of jackals, will, whilst they become a portion (מַנְיָהּ = מַנְיָהּ), i.e. prey, of the jackals (vid. the fulfilment in 2 Sam. xviii. 7 sq.), rejoice in Elohim. Every one who sweareth by Him shall boast himself. Theodoret understands this of swearing κατὰ τὴν τοῦ βασιλέως σωτηρίαν. Hengstenberg compares the oath הוֹי פִּרְעָה הוֹי, Gen. xlii. 15. Ewald also (§ 217, f) assumes this explanation to be unquestionable. But the Israelite is to swear by the name of Jahve and by no other, Deut. vi. 13, Isa. lxv. 16, cf. Amos viii. 14. If the king were meant, why was it not rather expressed by הוֹי מַלְכִי, he who swears allegiance to him? The syntax does not help us to decide to what the הוֹי refers. Heinrich Moeller (1573) says of the הוֹי as referred to the king: peregrinum est et coactum; and A. H. Franke in his Introductio in Psalterium says of it as referred to Elohim: coactum est. So far as the language is concerned, both references are admissible; but as regards the subject-matter, only the latter. The meaning, as everywhere else, is a swearing by God. He who, without allowing himself to turn from it, swore by Elohim, the God of Israel, the God of David His anointed, and therefore acknowledged Him as the Being exalted above all things, shall boast himself or “glory,” inasmuch as it shall be practically seen how well-founded and wise was this recognition. He shall glory, for the mouth of those who speak lies shall be stopped, forcibly closed, viz. those who, together with confidence in the Christ of God, have by falsehood also undermined the reverence which is due to God Himself. Ps. lxiv. closes very similarly, and hence is placed next in order.

* In this passage in Isaiah are meant the depths of the earth (LXX. θυσμέλια τῆς γῆς), the earth down to its inmost part, with its caverns, abysses, and subterranean passages. The apostle, however, in Eph. iv. 9 by τὰ κατώτερα τῆς γῆς means exactly the same as what in our passage is called in the LXX. τὰ κατώτατα τῆς γῆς: the interior of the earth = the under world, just as it is understood by all the Greek fathers (so far as my knowledge extends); the comparative κατώτερος is used just like ἐνέρετος.

PSALM LXIV.

INVOCATION OF DIVINE PROTECTION AGAINST THE FALSENESS OF MEN.

2 HEAR, Elohim, my voice in my complaint,
From the terror of the enemy do Thou preserve my life:

- 3 Hide me from the conspiracy of evil-doers,
From the tumultuous throng of the workers of iniquity,
4 Who whet their tongue like a sword,
Who aim their arrows, bitter words,
5 To shoot, in lurking-places, at the virtuous—
Suddenly they shoot at him, and fear not.
- 6 They make firm for themselves an evil agreement,
They decide to lay snares,
They ask, who can observe them?
7 They search out knavish things—
They are ready with a cunningly-wrought-out plan—
And the inward part of a man, and the heart, is deep!
- 8 But Elohim will shoot them with an arrow,
Suddenly do their wounds come.
9 And they are obliged to fall, upon them cometh their own
tongue ;
All who see them shall shake the head.
10 Then all men shall fear and declare the deed of Elohim,
And His work shall they consider well.
11 The righteous shall rejoice in Jabve and trust in Him,
And all the upright in heart shall glory.

Even Hilary begins the exposition of this Psalm with the words Psalmi superscriptio historiam non continet, in order at the outset to give up all attempt at setting forth its historical connection. The Midrash observes that it is very applicable to Daniel, who was cast into the lions' den by the satraps by means of a delicately woven plot. This is indeed true; but only because it is wanting in any specially defined features and cannot with any certainty be identified with one or other of the two great periods of suffering in the life of David.

Vers. 2-5. The Psalm opens with an octostich, and closes in the same way. The infinitive noun  $\Gamma^{\psi}$  signifies a complaint, expressed not by the tones of pain, but in words. The rendering of the LXX. (here and in lv. 3) is too general,  $\acute{\epsilon}\nu\ \tau\acute{\alpha}\ \theta\acute{\epsilon}\epsilon\sigma\theta\alpha\iota\ \mu\epsilon$ . The "terror" of the enemy is that proceeding from him (gen. obj. as in Deut. ii. 15, and frequently). The generic singular אֵיב is at once particularized in a more detailed description with the use of the plural. סוֹד is a club or clique; רִנְשָׁה (Targumic = רִמְזוֹן, e.g. Ezek. xxx. 10) a noisy crowd. The perfects after אֵשֶׁר affirm that which they now do as they have before done; cf. cxl. 4 and lviii. 8, where, as in this passage, the treading or bending of the bow is transferred to the arrow. דָּבַר מָר is the interpretation added to the figure, as in cxliv. 7. That which is bitter is called מָר, root מַר, stringere, from the harsh astringent taste; here it is used tropically of speech that wounds and inflicts pain (after the manner of an arrow or a stiletto), πικροὶ λόγοι. With the Kal לִירוֹת (xi. 2) alternates the Hiph. יִרְהוּ. With פִּתְאֹם the description takes a new start. וְלֹא יִירָאוּ, forming an assonance with the preceding word, means that they do it without any fear whatever, and therefore also without fear of God (lv. 20, Deut. xxv. 18).

Vers. 6, 7. The evil speech is one with the bitter speech in ver. 4, the arrow which they are anxious to let fly. This evil speech, here agreement or convention, they make firm to themselves (sibi), by securing, in every possible way, its effective execution. סִפֵּר (frequently used of the cutting language of the ungodly, lix. 13, lxix. 27; cf. Talmudic שְׁלִישֵׁי סִפֵּר לְשׁוֹן שְׁלִישֵׁי, to speak as with three tongues, i.e. slanderously) is here construed with לְ of that at which their haughty and insolent utterances aim. In connection therewith they take no heed of God, the all-seeing One: they say (ask), quis conspiciat ipsis. There is no need to take לָמוּ as being for לוֹ (Hitzig); nor is it the dative of the object instead of the accusative, but it is an ethical dative: who will see or look to them, i.e. exerting any sort of influence upon them? The form of the question is not the direct (lix. 8), but the indirect, in which כִּי, seq. fut., is used in a simply future (Jer. xlv. 28) or potential sense (Job xxii. 17, 1 Kings i. 20). Concerning עוֹלָה, vid. lviii. 3. It is doubtful whether תִּמְנֵג* is the first person (= תִּמְנֵגוּ) as in Num. xvii. 28, Jer. xlv. 18, or the third person as in Lam. iii. 22 (= תִּמְנֵגוּ, which first of all resolved is תִּמְנֵגוּ, and then transposed תִּמְנֵגוּ, like מַעֲנִיָּה = מַעֲנֵיָּה = מַעֲנֵיָּה, Isa. xxiii. 11). The reading תִּמְנֵג, from which Rashi proceeds, and which Luther follows in his translation, is opposed by the LXX and Targum; it does not suit the governing subject, and is nothing but an involuntary lightening of the difficulty. If we take into consideration, that מְמַחֵם signifies not to make ready, but to be ready, and that consequently שֵׁשׁ מְחַמֵּם is to be taken by itself, then it must be rendered either: they excogitate knavish tricks or villanies, "we are ready, a clever stroke is concocted, and the inward part of man and the heart is deep!" or, which we prefer, since there is nothing to indicate the introduction of any soliloquy: they excogitate knavish tricks, they are ready—a delicately devised, clever stroke (nominative of the result), and (as the poet ironically adds) the inward part of man and the heart is (verily) deep. There is nothing very surprising in the form מְמַחֵם for מְמַחֵם, since the Psalms, whenever they depict the sinful designs and doings of the ungodly, delight in singularities of language. On וְלֵב (not וְלֵב) = (אִישׁ) וְלֵב = וְלֵב, cf. exviii. 14a.

Vers. 8-11. Deep is man's heart and inward part, but not too deep for God, who knoweth the heart (Jer. xvii. 9 sq.). And He will just as suddenly surprise the enemies of His anointed with their death-blow, as they had plotted it for him. The futt. consec. that follow represent that which is future, with all the certainty of an historical fact as a retribution springing from the malicious craftiness of the enemies. According to the accentuation, ver. 8 is to be rendered: "then will Elohim shoot them, a sudden arrow become their wounds." Thus at length Hupfeld renders it; but how extremely puzzling is the meaning hidden behind this sentence! The Targum and the Jewish expositors have construed it differently: "Then will Elohim shoot them with arrows suddenly;" in this case, however, because ver. 8b then becomes too blunt and bald, מְמַחֵם has to be repeated in thought with this member of the verse, and this is in itself an objection to it. We interpunctuate with Ewald and Hitzig thus: then does Elohim shoot them with an arrow, suddenly arise (become a reality) their wounds (cf. Mic. vii. 4), namely, of those who had on their part aimed the murderous weapon against the upright for a sudden and sure shot. Ver. 9a is still more difficult. Kimchi's interpretation, which accords with the accents: et corrumpere facient eam super se, linguam suam, is intolerable; the proleptic suffix, having reference to וְשֹׁמְרֵי (Ex. iii. 6, Job xxxiii. 20), ought to have been feminine (vid. on xxii. 16), and “to make their own tongue fall upon themselves” is an odd fancy. The objective suffix will therefore refer per enallagen to the enemy. But not thus (as Hitzig, who now seeks to get out of the difficulty by an alteration of the text, formerly rendered it): “and they cause those to fall whom they have slandered [lit. upon whom their tongue came].” This form of retribution does not accord with the context; and moreover the gravely earnest עֲלִימוֹ, like the הִי—, refers more probably to the enemies than to the objects of their hostility. The interpretation of Ewald and Hengstenberg is better: “and one overthrows him, inasmuch as their tongue, i.e. the sin of their tongue with which they sought to destroy others, comes upon themselves.” The subject to וַיִּבְשְׁלֵהוּ, as in lxiii. 11, Job iv. 19, vii. 3, Luke xii. 20, is the powers which are at the service of God, and which are not mentioned at all; and the thought עֲלִימוֹ לְשׁוֹנֵם (a circumstantial clause) is like cxi. 10, where in a similar connection the very same singularly rugged lapidary, or terse, style is found. In ver. 9*b* we must proceed on the assumption that רָאָה בְּ in such a connection signifies the gratification of looking upon those who are justly punished and rendered harmless. But he who tarries to look upon such a scene is certainly not the person to flee from it; הִתְנוּרָה does not here mean “to betake one’s self to flight” (Ewald, Hitzig), but to shake one’s self, as in Jer. xlviii. 27, viz. to shake the head (xliv. 15, Jer. xviii. 16)—the recognised (vid. xxii. 8) gesture of malignant, mocking astonishment. The approbation is awarded, according to ver. 10, to God, the just One. And with the joy at His righteous interposition,—viz. of Him who has been called upon to interpose,—is combined a fear of the like punishment. The divine act of judicial retribution now set forth becomes a blessing to mankind. From mouth to mouth it is passed on, and becomes an admonitory nota bene. To the righteous in particular it becomes a consolatory and joyous strengthening of his faith. The judgment of Jahve is the redemption of the righteous. Thus, then, does he rejoice in his God, who by thus judging and redeeming makes history into the history of redemption, and hide himself the more confidingly in Him; and all the upright boast themselves, viz. in God, who looks into the heart and practically acknowledges them whose heart is directed unswervingly towards Him, and conformed entirely to Him In place of the futt. consec., which have a prophetic reference, simple futt. come in here, and between these a perf. consec. as expressive of that which will then happen when that which is prophetically certain has taken place.

PSALM LXV.

THANKSGIVING SONG FOR VICTORY AND BLESSINGS BESTOWED.

- 2 TO Thee resignation is as praise, Elohim, in Zion,
And to Thee is the vowed paid.
- 3 O Thou who answerest prayer! to Thee doth all flesh come.
- 4 If instances of iniquity have overpowered me—
Our transgressions Thou, Thou expiatest them.
- 5 Blessed is he who is chosen to dwell near Thee in Thy courts!
We will enjoy the good of Thy house,
of Thy holy Temple!!
- 6 In terrible deeds of righteousness dost Thou answer us,
O God of our salvation,
The confidence of all the ends of the earth and of the farthest sea,
- 7 Who setteth fast the mountains by His strength,
girded with might,
- 8 Who stilleth the roar of the seas, the roar of their waves,
And the tumult of the nations.
- 9 Therefore the dwellers at the boundaries of the earth are afraid at Thy tokens,
The outgoings of the morning and of the evening Thou makest to sing for joy.
- 10 Thou hast visited the land, that it should overflow, Abundantly didst Thou enrich it.
The fountain of Elohim was full of water—
Thou didst prepare their corn, for Thou didst thus prepare it;

- 11 Watering the furrows of the land, softening the ridges thereof.
 By showers of rain Thou madest it loose;
 Its increase didst Thou bless.
- 12 Thou hast crowned the year of Thy goodness,
 And Thy tracks drop with fat.
- 13 The pastures of the steppe drop,
 And with rejoicing do the hills gird themselves.
- 14 The meadows are clothed with flocks,
 And the valleys are covered over with corn—
 Everything shouts for joy, everything sings.

In this Psalm, the placing of which immediately after the preceding is at once explicable by reason of the וַיִּשְׂבֹּעַ so prominent in both (lxiv. 10, lxv. 9), we come upon the same intermingling of the natural and the historical as in Ps. viii., xix., xxix. The congregation gathered around the sanctuary on Zion praises its God, by whose mercy its imperilled position in relation to other nations has been rescued, and by whose goodness it again finds itself at peace, surrounded by fields rich in promise. In addition to the blessing which it has received in the bounties of nature, it does not lose sight of the answer to prayer which it has experienced in its relation to the world of nations. His rule in human history and His rule in nature are, to the church, reflected the one in the other. In the latter, as in the former, it sees the almighty and bountiful hand of Him who answers prayer and expiates sins, and through judgment opens up a way for His love. The deliverance which it has experienced redounds to the acknowledgment of the God of its salvation among the most distant peoples; the beneficial results of Jahve's interposition in the events transpiring in the world extend temporally as well as spiritually far beyond the bounds of Israel; it is therefore apparently the relief of Israel and of the peoples in general from the oppression of some worldly power that is referred to. The spring of the third year spoken of in Isa. xxxvii. 30, when to Judah the overthrow of Assyria was a thing of the past, and they again had the fields ripening for the harvest before their eyes, offers the most appropriate historical basis for the twofold purport of the Psalm. The inscription, To the Precentor, a Psalm, by David, a song (cf. lxxv. 1, lxxvi. 1), does not mislead us in this matter. For even we regard it as uncritical to assign to David all the Psalms bearing the inscription דוד. The Psalm in many mss. (Complutensian, Vulgate), beside the words Eis τὸ τέλος ψαλμὸς τῷ Δαυίδ ᾠδὴ, has the addition ᾠδὴ Ἱερεμίου καὶ Ἰεζεκιήλ, (ἐκ) τοῦ λαοῦ τῆς παροικίας ὅτε ἔμελλον ἐκπορεύεσθαι. At the head of the following Psalm it might have some meaning,—here, however, it has none.

Vers. 2-5. The praise of God on account of the mercy with which He rules out of Zion. The LXX. renders σοὶ πρέπει ὕμνος, but תִּבִּי פָּרֵס, tibi par est, h. e. convenit laus (Ewald), is not a usage of the language (cf. xxxiii. 1, Jer. x. 7). דְּמִיָּה signifies, according to xxii. 3, silence, and as an ethical notion, resignation, lxii. 2. According to the position of the words it looks like the subject, and הִלְלָהּ like the predicate. The accents at least (Illuj, Shalsheth) assume the relationship of the one word to the other to be that of predicate and subject; consequently it is not: To Thee belongeth resignation, praise (Hengstenberg), but: To Thee is resignation praise, i.e. resignation is (given or presented) to Thee as praise. Hitzig obtains the same meaning by an alteration of the text: לֹךְ דְּמִיָּה הִלְלָהּ; but opposed to this is the fact that הִלְלָהּ is not found anywhere in the Psalter, but only in the writings of the chronicler. And since it is clear that the words לֹךְ תְּהִלָּה belong together (xl. 4), the poet had no need to fear any ambiguity when he inserted דְּמִיָּה between them as that which is given to God as praise in Zion. What is intended is that submission or resignation to God which gives up its cause to God and allows Him to act on its behalf, renouncing all impatient meddling and interference (Ex. xiv. 14). The second member of the sentence affirms that this praise of pious resignation does not remain unanswered. Just as God in Zion is praised by prayer which resigns our own will silently to His, so also to Him are vows paid when He fulfils such prayer. That the answers to prayer are evidently thought of in connection with this, we see from ver. 3, where God is addressed as the "Hearer or Answerer of prayer." To Him as being the Hearer and Answerer of prayer all flesh comes, and in fact, as דְּמִיָּה implies (cf. Isa. xlv. 24), without finding help anywhere else, it clears a way for itself until it gets to Him; i.e. men, absolutely dependent, impotent in themselves and helpless, both collectively and individually (those only excepted who are determined to perish or despair), flee to Him as their final refuge and help. Before all else it is the prayer for the forgiveness of sin which He graciously answers. The perfect in ver. 4a is followed by the future in ver. 4b. The former, in accordance with the sense, forms a hypothetical protasis: granted that the instances of faults have been too powerful for me, i.e. (cf. Gen. iv. 13) an intolerable burden to me, our transgressions are expiated by Thee (who alone canst and also art willing to do it). יְרַחֵם is not less significant than in xxxv. 20, cv. 27, cxlv. 5, cf. 1 Sam. x. 2, 2 Sam. xi. 18 sq.: it separates the general fact into its separate instances and circumstances. How blessed therefore is the lot of that man whom (supply אֲשֶׁר) God chooses and brings near, i.e. removes into His vicinity, that he may inhabit His courts (future with the force of a clause expressing a purpose, as e.g. in Job xxx. 28, which see), i.e. that there, where He sits enthroned and reveals Himself, he may have his true home and be as if at home (vid. xv. 1)! The congregation gathered around Zion is esteemed worthy of this distinction among the nations of the earth; it therefore encourages itself in the blessed consciousness of this its privilege flowing from free grace (בְּחַר), to enjoy in full draughts (שָׂבַע with אֶ as in ciii. 5) the abundant goodness or blessing (טוֹב) of God's house, of the holy (ἅγιον) of His temple, i.e. of His holy temple (קֹדֶשׁ as in xlvi. 5, cf. Isa. lvii. 15). For for all that God's grace offers us we can give Him no better thanks than to hunger and thirst after it, and satisfy our poor soul therewith.

Vers. 6-9. The praise of God on account of the loving-kindness which Israel as a people among the peoples has experienced. The future תִּעֲנֶנֶנִי confesses, as a present, a fact of experience that still holds good in all times to come. נִרְאוֹת might, according to xx. 7, as in cxxxix. 14, be an accusative of the more exact definition; but why not, according to 1 Sam. xx. 10, Job ix. 3, a second accusative under the government of the verb? God answers the prayer of His people superabundantly. He replies to it נִרְאוֹת, terrible deeds, viz. בְּצִדְקָה, by a rule which stringently executes the will of His righteousness

(vid. on Jer. xlii. 6); in this instance against the oppressors of His people, so that henceforth everywhere upon earth He is a ground of confidence to all those who are oppressed. "The sea (אֲרָ) construct state, as is frequently the case, with the retention of the â) of the distant ones" is that of the regions lying afar off (cf. lvi. 1). Venema observes, Significatur, Deum esse certissimum præsidium, sive agnoscatur ab hominibus et ei fidatur, sive non (therefore similar to γρόντες, Rom. i. 21; Psychol. S. 347; tr. p. 408). But according to the connection and the subjective colouring the idea seems to have, מִבְּטַח וְנִי is to be understood of the believing acknowledgment which the God of Israel attains among all mankind by reason of His judicial and redemptive self-attestation (cf. Isa. xxxiii. 13, 2 Chron. xxxii. 22 sq.). In the natural world and among men He proves Himself to be the Being girded with power to whom everything must yield. He it is who setteth fast the mountains (cf. Jer x. 12) and stilleth the raging of the ocean. In connection with the giant mountains the poet may have had even the worldly powers (vid. Isa. xli. 15) in his mind; in connection with the seas he gives expression to this allegorical conjunction of thoughts. The roaring of the billows and the wild tumult of the nations as a mass in the empire of the world, both are stilled by the threatening of the God of Israel (Isa. xvii. 12-14). When He shall overthrow the proud empire of the world, whose tyranny the earth has been made to feel far and wide, then will reverential fear of Him and exultant joy at the end of the thralldom (vid. Isa. xiv. 3-8) become universal. אֹתָת (from the originally feminine אֹת = âwâjat, from אָתָּה, to mark, Num. xxxiv. 10), σημεῖα, is the name given here to His marvellous interpositions in the history of our earth. קִצְוֵי, ver. 6 (also in Isa. xxvi. 15), out of construction is קִצְוֵי. "The exit places of the morning and of the evening" are the East and West with reference to those who dwell there. Luther erroneously understands מוֹצֵי as directly referring to the creatures which at morning and evening "sport about (webern), i.e. go safely and joyfully out and in." The meaning is, the regions whence the morning breaks forth and where the evening sets. The construction is zeugmatic so far as בּוֹא, not נֶצֶף, is said of the evening sun, but only to a certain extent, for neither does one say מְבוֹא עֶרֶב (Ewald). Perret-Gentil renders it correctly: les lieux d'où surgissent l'aube et le crépuscule. God makes both these to shout for joy, inasmuch as He commands a calm to the din of war.

Vers. 10-14. The praise of God on account of the present year's rich blessing, which He has bestowed upon the land of His people. In vers. 10, 11 God is thanked for having sent down the rain required for the ploughing (vid. Commentary on Isaiah, ii. 522) and for the increase of the seed sown, so that, as vers. 12-14 affirm, there is the prospect of a rich harvest. The harvest itself, as follows from ver. 14*b*, is not yet housed. The whole of vers. 10, 11 is a retrospect; in vers. 12-14 the whole is a description of the blessing standing before their eyes, which God has put upon the year now drawing to a close. Certainly, if the forms רִיבָה and נִתַּח were supplicatory imperatives, then the prayer for the early or seed-time rain would attach itself to the retrospect in ver. 11, and the standpoint would be not about the time of the Passover and Pentecost, both festivals belonging to the beginning of the harvest, but about the time of the feast of Tabernacles, the festival of thanksgiving for the harvest, and vers. 12-14 would be a glance into the future (Hitzig). But there is nothing to indicate that in ver. 11 the retrospect changes into a looking forward. The poet goes on with the same theme, and also arranges the words accordingly, for which reason רִיבָה and נִתַּח are not to be understood in any other way. הֶעֱשִׂיר שֶׁקֶן (to enrich) signifies to cause to run over, overflow, i.e. to put anything in a state of plenty or abundance, from שָׁקַן (Hiph. Joel ii. 24, to yield in abundance), ساق, to push, impel, to cause to go on in succession and to follow in succession. רִבַּח (for which we find רִבָּה in lxii. 3) is an adverb, copiously, richly (cxx. 6, cxxiii. 4, cxxix. 1), like כִּפְאוֹת, a hundred times (Eccles. viii. 12). הַמַּעְשֵׂרָה is Hiph. with the middle syllable shortened, Ges. § 53, 3, rem. 4. The fountain (פְּלֵיגָה) of God is the name given here to His inexhaustible stores of blessing, and more particularly the fulness of the waters of the heavens from which He showers down fertilizing rain. כֵּן, "thus thoroughly," forms an alliteration with הִכִּין, to prepare, and thereby receives a peculiar twofold colouring. The meaning is: God, by raising and tending, prepared the produce of the field which the inhabitants of the land needed; for He thus thoroughly prepared the land in conformity with the fulness of His fountain, viz. by copiously watering (רִיַּה infin. absol. instead of רִיַּה, as in 1 Sam. iii. 12, 2 Chron. xxiv. 10; Ex. xxii. 22, Jer. xiv. 19, Hos. vi. 9) the furrows of the land and pressing down, i.e. softening by means of rain, its ridges (גְּרִירָה, defective plural, as e.g. in Ruth ii. 13), which the ploughshare has made. תָּלַם (related by root with תָּל, tell, a hill, prop. that which is thrown out to a place, that which is thrown up, a mound) signifies a furrow as being formed by casting up or (if from תָּלַם, ébrécher, to make a fracture, rent, or notch in anything) by tearing into, breaking up the ground; גָּדַד (related by root with uchdûd and chatt, the usual Arabic words for a furrow*) as being formed by cutting into the ground. In ver. 12 the year in itself appears as a year of divine goodness (טוֹבָה, bonitas), and the prospective blessing of harvest as the crown which is set upon it. For Thou hast crowned "the * Fürst erroneously explains תָּלַם as a bed or strip of ground between two deep furrows, in distinction from מַעֲנֵה or מַעֲנִית (vid. on cxxix. 3), a furrow. Beds such as we have in our potato fields are unknown to Syrian agriculture. There is a mode which may be approximately compared with it called ketif (כֶּתִיף), another far wider called meskeba (מִשְׁכָּבָה). The Arabic tilm (تَلْم, Hebrew תָּלַם = talm), according to the Kamûs (as actually in Magrebinish Arabic) talam (تَلْم), corresponds exact to our furrow, i.e. (as the Turkish Kamûs explains) a ditch-like fissure which the iron of the plough cuts into the field. Neshwân (i. 491) says: "The verb talam, fut. jatlum and jatlim, signifies in Jemen and in the Ghôr (the land on the shore of the Red Sea) the crevices (الشقوق) which the ploughman forms, and tilm, collective plural tîlâm, is, in the countries mentioned, a furrow of the corn-field. Some persons pronounce the word even thilm, collective plural thilâm." Thus it is at the present day universally in Haurân; in Edréât I heard the water-furrow of a corn-field called thilm el-kanâh (تَلْم الكناة). But this pronunciation with ث is certainly not the original one, but has arisen through a substitution of the cognate and more familiar verbal stem תָּלַם, cf. שָׂרַם, to slit (shurêm, a harelip). In other parts of Syria and Palestine, also where the distinction between the sounds ث and ت is carefully observed, I have only heard the pronunciation tilm.—WETZSTEIN.

year of Thy goodness" and "with Thy goodness" are different assertions, with which also different (although kindred as to substance) ideas are associated. The futures after  $\text{תָּרַץ}$  depict its results as they now lie out to view. The chariot-tracks (vid. Deut. xxxiii. 26) drop with exuberant fruitfulness, even the meadows of the uncultivated and, without rain, unproductive pasture land (Job xxxviii. 26 sq.). The hills are personified in ver. 13*b* in the manner of which Isaiah in particular is so fond (e.g. ch. xlv. 23, xlix. 13), and which we find in the Psalms of his type (xcvi. 11 sqq., xcvi. 7 sqq., cf. lxxxix. 13). Their fresh, verdant appearance is compared to a festive garment, with which those which previously looked bare and dreary gird themselves; and the corn to a mantle in which the valleys completely envelope themselves ( $\text{תָּרַץ}$  with the accusative, like  $\text{تَعَطَّف}$  with  $\text{ب}$  of the garment: to throw it around one, to put it on one's self). The closing words, locking themselves as it were with the beginning of the Psalm together, speak of joyous shouting and singing that continues into the present time. The meadows and valleys (Böttcher) are not the subject, of which it cannot be said that they sing; nor can the same be said of the rustling of the waving corn-fields (Kimchi). The expression requires men to be the subject, and refers to men in the widest and most general sense. Everywhere there is shouting coming up from the very depths of the breast (Hith-pal.), everywhere songs of joy; for this is denoted by  $\text{שִׁיר}$  in distinction from  $\text{זֶמֶר}$ .

PSALM LXVI.

THANKSGIVING FOR A NATIONAL AND PERSONAL DELIVERANCE.

- 1 RAISE a joyful shout unto Elohim, all ye lands,
- 2 Harp the glory of His name,
Give glory as praise unto Him.
- 3 Say unto Elohim: "How terrible are Thy works!
By reason of Thine omnipotence must Thy foes submit to Thee.

- 4 All lands shall do homage to Thee and harp to Thee,
They shall harp to Thy name." (Sela.)
- 5 Come ye and see the mighty deeds of Elohim,
Who ruleth terribly over the children of men!
- 6 He hath turned the sea into dry land,
Through the river they passed on foot—
Then we rejoiced in Him!
- 7 He who ruleth in His strength for ever—
His eyes keep watch upon the nations.
Let not the rebellious thus exalt themselves! (Sela.)
- 8 Bless, O ye peoples, our God,
And make His praise to sound aloud—
- 9 Who putteth our soul in life,
And hath not given our feet over to stumbling.
- 10 For Thou hast proved us, Elohim,
Thou hast smelted us as the smelting of silver.
- 11 Thou didst bring us into the mountain-hold,
Thou didst lay an oppressive burden upon our loins;
- 12 Thou didst cause men to ride over our head,
We fell into fire and into water—
Yet Thou didst bring us out into rich abundance.
- 13 I will enter Thy house with burnt-offerings,
I will pay Thee my vows,
14 Which my lips have uttered,
And which my mouth hath spoken, when I was straitened.
- 15 Burnt-offerings of fat sheep will I bring to Thee,
Together with the incense of rams,
I will offer bullocks with kids. (Sela.)
- 16 Come, hear, and I will tell, all ye who fear Elohim,
What He hath done for my soul.
- 17 Unto Him with my mouth did I cry—
And a hymn was under my tongue.
- 18 If I had purposed evil in my heart,
The Lord would not hear.
- 19 Elohim hath, however, heard,
He hath hearkened to the cry of my prayer.

20 Blessed be Elohim,
 Who hath not turned away my prayer
 And His mercy from me.

From Ps. lxv. onwards we find ourselves in the midst of a series of Psalms which, with a varying arrangement of the words, are inscribed both מְמוֹר and שִׁיר (lxv.—lxviii.). The two words שִׁיר מְמוֹר stand according to the accents in the stat. constr. (lxxxviii. 1), and therefore signify a Psalm-song.* This series, as is universally the case, is arranged according to the community of prominent watchwords. In Ps. lxv. 2 we read: “To Thee is the vow paid,” and in lxvi. 13: “I will pay Thee my vows;” in Ps. lxvi. 20: “Blessed be Elohim,” and in lxvii. 8: “Elohim shall bless us.” Besides, Ps. lxvi. and lxvii. have this feature in common, that לְמִנְצָה, which occurs fifty-five times in the Psalter, is accompanied by the name of the poet in every instance, with the exception of these two anonymous Psalms. The frequently occurring Sela of both Psalms also indicates that they were intended to have a musical accompaniment. These annotations referring to the temple-music favour the pre-exilic rather than the post-exilic origin of the two Psalms. Both are purely Elohimic; only in one instance (lxvi. 18) does אֲרִיִּי, equally belonging to this style of Psalm, alternate with Elohim.

On the ground of some deliverance out of oppressive bondage that has been experienced by Israel arises in Ps. lxvi. the summons to the whole earth to raise a shout of praise unto God. The congregation is the subject speaking as far as ver. 12. From ver. 13 the person of the poet appears in the foreground; but that which brings him under obligation to present a thank-offering is nothing more nor less than that which the whole congregation, and he together with it, has experienced. It is hardly possible to define this event more minutely. The lofty consciousness of possessing a God to whom all the world must bow, whether cheerfully or against its will, became strong among the Jewish people more especially after the overthrow of Assyria in the reign of Hezekiah. But there is no ground for conjecturing either Isaiah or Hezekiah to be the composer of this Psalm. If עולם in ver. 7 signified the world (Hitzig), then he would be (vid. xxiv. 9) one of the latest among the Old Testament writers; but it has the same meaning here that it has everywhere else in Old Testament Hebrew.

In the Greek Church this Psalm is called Ψαλμὸς ἀναστάσεως; the LXX. gives it this inscription, perhaps with reference to ver. 12, ἐξήγαγες ἡμᾶς εἰς ἀναψυχήν.

Vers. 1-4. The phrase לַיהוָה יְשׁוּבָה לְיָגִיד signifies "to give glory to God" in other passages (Josh. vii. 19, Isa. xlii. 12), here with a second accusative, either (1) if we take יְהוָה as an accusative of the object: facite laudationem ejus gloriam = gloriosam (Maurer and others), or (2) if we take יְשׁוּבָה as an accusative of the object and the former word as an accusative of the predicate: reddite honorem laudem ejus (Hengstenberg), or (3) also by taking יהוה as an apposition: reddite honorem, scil. laudem ejus (Hupfeld). We prefer the middle rendering: give glory as His praise, i.e. to Him as or for praise. It is unnecessary, with Hengstenberg, to render: How terrible art Thou in Thy works! in that case יְהוָה ought not to be wanting. יְשׁוּבָה might more readily be singular (Hupfeld, Hitzig); but these forms with the softened Jod of the root dwindle down to only a few instances upon closer consideration. The singular of the predicate (what a terrible affair) here, as frequently, e.g. cxix. 137, precedes the plural designating things. The song into which the Psalmist here bids the nations break forth, is essentially one with the song of the heavenly harpers in Apoc. xv. 3 sq., which begins, Μεγάλα καὶ θαυμαστὰ τὰ ἔργα σου.

Vers. 5-7. Although the summons: Come and see . . . (borrowed apparently from xlii. 9), is called forth by cotemporary manifestations of God's power, the consequences of which now lie open to view, the rendering of ver. 6c, "then will we rejoice in Him," is nevertheless unnatural, and, rightly looked at, neither grammar nor the matter requires it. For since יְשׁוּבָה in this passage is equivalent to יָגִיד, and the future after יָגִיד takes the signification of an aorist; and since the cohortative form of the future can also (e.g. after עָלֵךְ, lxxiii. 7, and in clauses having a hypothetical sense) be referred to the past, and does sometimes at least occur where the writer throws himself back into the past (2 Sam. xxii. 38), the rendering: Then did we rejoice in Him, cannot be assailed on syntactical grounds. On the "we," cf. Josh. v. 1, Chethâb, Hos. xii. 5 [4]. The church of all ages is a unity, the separate parts being jointly involved in the whole. The church here directs the attention of all the world to the mighty deeds of God at the time of the deliverance from Egypt, viz. the laying of the Red Sea and of Jordan dry, inasmuch as it can say in ver. 7, by reason of that which it has experienced in the present, that the sovereign power of God is ever the same: its God rules in His victorious might עֹלָם, i.e. not "over the world," because that ought to be בְּעֹלָם, but "in eternity" (accusative of duration, as in lxxxix. 2 sq., xlv. 7), and therefore, as in the former days, so also in all time to come. His eyes keep searching watch among the peoples; the rebellious, who struggle against His yoke and persecute His people, had better not rise, it may go ill with them. The Chethâb runs יָרִיבֵי, for which the Kerî is יָרִיבֵי. The meaning remains the same; הַרְיִים can (even without יָ, רָאֵשׁ, רָקַן, lxv. 5) mean "to practise exaltation," superbire. By means of לָמוּ this proud bearing is designated as being egotistical, and as unrestrainedly boastful. Only let them not imagine themselves secure in their arrogance! There is One more exalted, whose eye nothing escapes, and to whose irresistible might whatever is not conformed to His gracious will succumbs.

Vers. 8-12. The character of the event by which the truth has been verified that the God who redeemed Israel out of Egypt still ever possesses and exercises to the full His ancient sovereign power, is seen from this reiterated call to the peoples to share in Israel's Gloria. God has averted the peril of death and overthrow from His people: He has put their soul in life (בְּחַיִּים, like בְּיָשָׁע in xii. 6), i.e. in the realm of life; He has not abandoned their foot to tottering unto overthrow (מוֹט the substantive, as in cxxi. 3; cf. the reversed construction in lv. 23). For God has cast His people as it were into a smelting-furnace or fining-pot in order to purify and to prove them by suffering;—this is a favourite figure with Isaiah and Jeremiah, but is also found in Zech. xiii. 9, Mal. iii. 3. Ezek. xix. 9 is decisive concerning the meaning of מְצַוְדָה, where הָבִיא במצודות signifies "to bring into the holds or prisons;" besides, the figure of the fowling-net (although this is also called מצודה as well as מצודה) has no footing here in the context. מצודה (vid. xviii. 3) signifies specula, and that both a natural and an artificial watch-post on a mountain; here it is the mountain-hold or prison of the enemy, as a figure of the total loss of freedom. The laying on of a heavy burden mentioned by the side of it in ver. 11b also accords well with this. מועקה, a being oppressed, the pressure of a burden, is a Hophal formation, like מטה, a being spread out, Isa. viii. 8; cf. the similar masculine forms in lxix. 3, Isa. viii. 13, xiv. 6, xxix. 3. The loins are mentioned because when carrying heavy loads, which one has to stoop down in order to take up, the lower spinal region is called into exercise. אנוש is frequently (ix. 20 sq., x. 18, lvi. 2, Isa. li. 12, 2 Chron. xiv. 10) the word used for tyrants as being wretched mortals, perishable creatures, in contrast with their all the more revolting, imperious, and self-deified demeanour. God so ordered it, that "wretched men" rode upon Israel's head. Or is it to be interpreted: He caused them to pass over Israel (cf. cxxix. 3, Isa. li. 23)? It can scarcely mean this, since it would then be in dorso nostro, which the Latin versions capriciously substitute. The preposition ל instead of על is used with reference to the phrase לישב: sitting upon Israel's head, God caused them to ride along, so that Israel was not able to raise its head freely, but was most ignominiously wounded in its self-esteem. Fire and water are, as in Isa. xliii. 2, a figure of vicissitudes and perils of the most extreme character. Israel was nigh to being burnt up and drowned, but God led it forth לרוחה, to an abundant fulness, to abundance and superabundance of prosperity. The LXX., which renders εἰς ἀναψυχήν (Jerome absolutely: in refrigerium), has read לרוחה; Symmachus, εἰς εὐσυχωρίαν, probably reading לרחבה (cxix. 45, xviii. 20). Both give a stronger antithesis. But the state of straitness or oppression was indeed also a state of privation.

Vers. 13-15. From this point onwards the poet himself speaks, but, as the diversity and the kind of the sacrifices show, as being a member of the community at large. The עולות stand first, the gifts of adoring homage; ב is the Beth of the accompaniment, as in Lev. xvi. 3, 1 Sam. i. 24, cf. Heb. ix. 25.

“My vows” refer more especially to נָדַר שְׁלָמִי פָּה. פָּצָה פֶּה also occurs elsewhere of the involuntary vowing to do extraordinary things urged from one by great distress (Judg. xi. 35). אָשַׁר is an accusative of the object relating to the vows, quæ aperuerunt = aperiendo nuncupaverunt labia mea (Geier). In ver. 15 עָשָׂה, used directly (like the Aramaic and Phœnician עבר) in the signification “to sacrifice” (Ex. xxix. 36-41, and frequently), alternates with הִעֲלָה, the synonym of הִקְטִיר. The sacrifices to be presented are enumerated. מִיְהִים (incorrect for מִיָּהִים) are marrowy, fat lambs; lambs and bullocks (בָּקָר) have the most universal appropriation among the animals that were fit for sacrifices. The ram (אֵיל), on the contrary, is the animal for the whole burnt-offering of the high priest, of the princes of the tribes, and of the people; and appears also as the animal for the shelamim only in connection with the shelamim of Aaron, of the people, of the princes of the tribes, and, in Num. vi. 14, of the Nazarite. The younger he-goat (עֵתוּד) is never mentioned as an animal for the whole burnt-offering; but, indeed, as an animal for the shelamim of the princes of the tribes in Num. ch. vii. It is, therefore, probable that the shelamim which were to be offered in close connection with the whole burnt-offerings are introduced by עַם, so that קִטְרַת signifies the fat portions of the shelamim upon the altar smoking in the fire. The mention of “rams” renders it necessary that we should regard the poet as here comprehending himself among the people when he speaks thus.

Vers. 16-20. The words in ver. 16 are addressed in the widest extent, as in vers. 5 and 2, to all who fear God, where-soever such are to be found on the face of the earth. To all these, for the glory of God and for their own profit, he would gladly relate what God has made him to experience. The individual-looking expression לְנַפְשִׁי is not opposed to the fact of the occurrence of a marvellous answering of prayer, to which he refers, being one which has been experienced by him in common with the whole congregation. He cried unto God with his mouth (that is to say, not merely silently in spirit, but audibly and importunately), and a hymn (רוֹמֵם,* something that rises, collateral form to רוּמָם, as עוֹלָל and שׁוֹכֵב to עוֹלָל and שׁוֹכֵב) was under my tongue; i.e. I became also at once so sure of my being heard, that I even had the song of praise in readiness (vid. x. 7), with which I had determined to break forth when the help for which I had prayed, and which was assured to me, should arrive. For the purpose of his heart was not at any time, in contradiction to his words, אָסָה, God-abhorred vileness or worthlessness; רָצָה with the accusative, as in Gen. xx. 10, Ps. xxxvii. 37: to aim at, or design anything, to have it in one's eye. We render: If I had aimed at evil in my heart, the Lord would not hear; not: He would not have heard, but: He would not on any occasion hear. For a hypocritical prayer, coming from a heart which has not its aim sincerely directed towards Him, He does not hear. The idea that such a heart was not hidden behind his prayer is refuted in ver. 19 from the result, which is of a totally opposite character. In the closing doxology the accentuation rightly takes תְּפִלָּתִי וְחַסְדֵּךָ as belonging together. Prayer and mercy stand in the relation to one another of call and echo. When God turns away from a man his prayer and His mercy, He commands him to be silent and refuses him a favourable answer. The poet, however, praises God that He has deprived him neither of the joyfulness of prayer nor the proof of His favour. In this sense Augustine makes the following practical observation on this passage: Cum videris non a te amotam deprecationem tuam, securus esto, quia non est a te amota misericordia ejus.

PSALM LXVII.

HARVEST THANKSGIVING SONG.

- 2 ELOHIM be merciful unto us and bless us,
May He cause His face to shine among us—(Sela.)
- 3 That Thy way may be known upon earth,
Among all the heathen Thy salvation.
- 4 Peoples shall praise Thee, Elohim,
The peoples shall praise Thee, all of them.

5 Nations shall rejoice and shout for joy,
 For Thou wilt judge peoples in uprightness,
 And the nations upon earth Thou wilt lead. (Sela.)

6 *Peoples shall praise Thee, Elohim,
 The peoples shall praise Thee, all of them.*

7 The earth hath yielded her fruit,
 Elohim our God doth bless us.

8 Elohim shall bless us,
 And all the ends of the earth shall fear Him.

Like Ps. lxxv., this Psalm, inscribed To the Precentor, with accompaniment of stringed instruments, a song-Psalm (כְּזֹמֹר שִׁיר), also celebrates the blessing upon the cultivation of the ground. As Ps. lxxv. contemplated the corn and fruits as still standing in the fields, so this Psalm contemplates, as it seems, the harvest as already gathered in, in the light of the redemptive history. Each plentiful harvest is to Israel a fulfilment of the promise given in Lev. xxvi. 4, and a pledge that God is with His people, and that its mission to the whole world (of peoples) shall not remain unaccomplished. This mission-tone referring to the end of God's work here below is unfortunately lost in the church's closing strain, "God be gracious and merciful unto us," but it sounds all the more distinctly and sweetly in Luther's hymn, "Es woll uns Gott genädig sein," throughout.

There are seven stanzas: twice three two-line stanzas, having one of three lines in the middle, which forms the clasp or spangle of the septiad, a circumstance which is strikingly appropriate to the fact that this Psalm is called "the Old Testament Paternoster" in some of the old expositors.* The second half after the three-line stanza begins in ver. 6 exactly as the first closed in ver. 4. יְבָרְכֵנִי is repeated three times, in order that the whole may bear the impress of the blessing of the priest, which is threefold.

* Vid. Sonntag's Tituli Psalmorum (1687), where it is on this account laid out as the Rogate Psalm.

Vers. 2, 3. The Psalm begins (ver. 2) with words of the priest's benediction in Num. vi. 24-26. By אֲתָנִי the church desires for itself the unveiled presence of the light-diffusing loving countenance of its God. Here, after the echo of the holiest and most glorious benediction, the music strikes in. With ver. 3 the Beracha passes over into a Tephilla. לָרַעַת is conceived with the most general subject: that one may know, that may be known Thy way, etc. The more graciously God attests Himself to the church, the more widely and successfully does the knowledge of this God spread itself forth from the church over the whole earth. They then know His הַרְרָה, i.e. the progressive realization of His counsel, and His יְשׁוּעָה, the salvation at which this counsel aims, the salvation not of Israel merely, but of all mankind.

Vers. 4, 5. Now follows the prospect of the entrance of all peoples into the kingdom of God, who will then praise Him in common with Israel as their God also. His judging (שָׁפַט) in this instance is not meant as a judicial punishment, but as a righteous and mild government, just as in the christological parallels lxxii. 12 sq., Isa. xi. 3 sq. מִיֵּשֶׁר in an ethical sense for מִיִּשְׁרָיִם, as in xlv. 7, Isa. xi. 4, Mal. ii. 6. הַיְנָקָה as in xxxi. 4 of gracious guidance (otherwise than in Job xii. 23).

Vers. 6-8. The joyous prospect of the conversion of heathen, expressed in the same words as in ver 4, here receives as its foundation a joyous event of the present time: the earth has just yielded its fruit (cf. lxxxv. 13), the fruit that had been sown and hoped for. This increase of corn and fruits is a blessing and an earnest of further blessing, by virtue of which (Jer. xxxiii. 9, Isa. lx. 3; cf. on the contrary Joel ii. 17) it shall come to pass that all peoples unto the uttermost bounds of the earth shall reverence the God of Israel. For it is the way of God, that all the good that He manifests towards Israel shall be for the well-being of mankind.

PSALM LXVIII.

HYMN OF WAR AND VICTORY IN THE STYLE OF DEBORAH.

2 LET Elohim arise, let His enemies be scattered,
And let those who hate Him flee before His face.

- 3 As smoke is driven away, do Thou drive them away;
As wax melteth before the fire,
Let the wicked perish before Elohim.
- 4 And let the righteous rejoice, let them exult before Elohim,
And let them be glad with joy.
- 5 Sing unto Elohim, harp His name,
Pave a highway for Him who rideth along through the steppes;
Jāh is His name, and exult ye before Him.
- 6 A Father of the fatherless and an Advocate of the widows
Is Elohim in His holy habitation.
- 7 Elohim maketh a household for the solitary,
He leadeth forth prisoners into prosperity;
Yet the rebellious abide in a land of drought.
- 8 Elohim, when Thou wentest forth before Thy people,
When Thou didst march along in the wilderness—(Sela.)
- 9 The earth shook,
The heavens also dropped before Elohim,
Yon Sinai before Elohim, the God of Israel.
- 10 With plentiful rain didst Thou, Elohim, water Thine inheritance,
And when it was parched, THOU hast confirmed it.
- 11 Thy creatures have settled down therein,
Thou didst provide with Thy goodness for the poor, Elohim.
- 12 The Lord will sound forth the mandate;
Of the women who herald victory there is a great army.
- 13 The kings of hosts shall flee, shall flee,
And she that tarrieth at home shall divide the spoil.
- 14 If ye encamp among the sheep-folds,
The dove's wings are covered with silver
And her feathers with glistening gold.
- 15 When the Almighty scattereth kings therein,
It becometh snow-white upon Zalmon.

- 16 A mountain of Elohim is the mountain of Bashan,
A mountain full of peaks is the mountain of Bashan.
- 17 Why look ye enviously, ye many-peaked mountains,
Upon the mountain which Elohim hath chosen, to dwell thereon?
Yea, Jahve will dwell [there] for ever.
- 18 The war-chariots of Elohim are myriads, a thousand thousands,
The Lord is among them, it is a Sinai in holiness.
- 19 Thou hast ascended up to the height, Thou hast led captives captive,
Thou hast received gifts among men,
Even from the rebellious, that Jāh Elohim might dwell [there].
- 20 Blessed be the Lord :
Day by day doth He bear our burden,
He, God, is our salvation. (Sela.)
- 21 He, God, is to us a God for deeds of deliverance,
And Jahve the Lord hath ways of escape for death.
- 22 Yea, Elohim will smite the head of His enemies,
The hairy scalp of him who stalketh along in his trespasses.
- 23 The Lord hath said : Out of Bashan will I bring back,
I will bring back out of the depths of the sea,
- 24 That thou mayest bathe thy foot in blood,
That the tongue of thy dogs may have its share of the enemy.
- 25 They behold Thy splendid procession, Elohim,
The splendid procession of my God, my King in holiness.
- 26 Before went the singers, behind the players on stringed instruments,
In the midst of damsels striking timbrels.
- 27 In the choirs of the congregation bless ye Elohim,
The Lord, ye who are out of the fountain of Israel.
- 28 There is Benjamin the youngest, their ruler ;
The princes of Judah—their motley band,
The princes of Zebulun, the princes of Naphtali.

- 29 Thy God hath commanded thy supreme power—Uphold in power, Elohim, what Thou hast wrought for us!—
- 30 From Thy temple above Jerusalem
Let kings present offerings into Thee.
- 31 Threaten the wild beast of the reed, the troops of bulls with the calves of the people,
That they may prostrate themselves with ingots of silver!—
He hath scattered the peoples that delight in wars.
- 32 Magnates come out of Egypt,
Cush—quickly do his hands stretch out unto Elohim.
- 33 Ye kingdoms of the earth, sing unto Elohim, Praising the Lord with stringed instruments—(Sela.)
- 34 To Him who rideth in the heaven of heavens of the primeval time—
Lo, He made Himself heard with His voice, a mighty voice.
- 35 Ascribe ye might unto Elohim!

Over Israel is His majesty,
And His omnipotence in the heights of the heavens.

- 36 Terrible is Elohim out of thy sanctuaries;
“The God of Israel giveth might and abundant strength to the people!”
Blessed be Elohim!

Is it not an admirably delicate tact with which the collector makes the שִׁיר מִזְמוֹר lxviii. follow upon the שִׁיר מִזְמוֹר lcxvii.? The latter began with the echo of the benediction which Moses puts into the mouth of Aaron and his sons, the former with a repetition of those memorable words in which, at the breaking up of the camp, he called upon Jahve to advance before Israel (Num. x. 35). “It is in reality,” says Hitzig of Ps. lxviii., “no easy task to become master of this Titan.” And who would not agree with him in this remark? It is a Psalm in the style of Deborah, stalking along upon the highest pinnacle of hymnic feeling and recital; all that is most glorious in the literature of the earlier period is concentrated in it: Moses’ memorable words, Moses’ blessing, the prophecies of Balaam, the Deuteronomy, the Song of Hannah re-echo here. But over and above all this, the language is so bold and so peculiarly its own, that we meet with no less than thirteen words that do not occur anywhere else. It is so distinctly Elohimic in its impress, that the simple Elohim occurs twenty-three times; but in addition to this, it is as though the whole cornucopia of divine names were poured out upon it: יהוה in ver. 17; ארני six times; הָאֵל twice; שִׁרֵי in ver. 15; יָהּ in ver. 5; יהוה ארני in ver. 21; יה אלהים in ver. 19; so that this Psalm among all the Elohimic Psalms is the most resplendent. In connection with the great difficulty that is involved in it, it is no wonder that expositors, more especially the earlier expositors, should differ widely in their apprehension of it as a whole or in separate parts. This circumstance has been turned to wrong account by Ed. Reuss in his essay, "Der acht-und-sechzigste Psalm, Ein Denkmal exegetischer Noth und Kunst zu Ehren unsrer ganzen Zunft, Jena, 1851," for the purpose of holding up to ridicule the uncertainty of Old Testament exegesis, as illustrated in this Psalm.

The Psalm is said, as Reuss ultimately decides, to have been written between the times of Alexander the Great and the Maccabees, and to give expression to the wish that the Israelites, many of whom were far removed from Palestine and scattered abroad in the wide earth, might soon be again united in their fatherland. But this apprehension rests entirely upon violence done to the exegesis, more particularly in the supposition that in ver. 23 the exiles are the persons intended by those whom God will bring back. Reuss makes out those who are brought back out of Bashan to be the exiles in Syria, and those who are brought back out of the depths of the sea he makes out to be the exiles in Egypt. He knows nothing of the remarkable concurrence of the mention of the Northern tribes (including Benjamin) in ver. 28 with the Asaphic Psalms: Judah and Benjamin, to his mind, is Judæa; and Zebulun and Naphtali, Galilee in the sense of the time after the return from exile. The "wild beast of the reed" he correctly takes to be an emblem of Egypt; but he makes use of violence in order to bring in a reference to Syria by the side of it. Nevertheless Olshausen praises the services Reuss has rendered with respect to this Psalm; but after incorporating two whole pages of the "Denkmal" in his commentary he cannot satisfy himself with the period between Alexander and the Maccabees, and by means of three considerations arrives, in this instance also, at the common refuge of the Maccabæan period, which possesses such an irresistible attraction for him.

In opposition to this transplanting of the Psalm into the time of the Maccabees we appeal to Hitzig, who is also quick-sighted enough, when there is any valid ground for it, in finding out Maccabæan Psalms. He refers the Psalm to the victorious campaign of Joram against faithless Moab, undertaken in company with Jehoshaphat. Böttcher, on the other hand, sees in it a festal hymn of triumph belonging to the time of Hezekiah, which was sung antiphonically at the great fraternizing Passover after the return home of the young king from one of his expeditions against the Assyrians, who had even at that time fortified themselves in the country east of the Jordan (Bashan). Thenius (following the example of Rödiger) holds a different view. He knows the situation so very definitely, that he thinks it high time that the discussion concerning this Psalm was brought to a close. It is a song composed to inspire the army in the presence of the battle which Josiah undertook against Necho, and the prominent, hateful character in ver. 22 is Pharaoh with his lofty artificial adornment of hair upon his shaven head. It is, however, well known what a memorably tragical issue for Israel that battle had; the Psalm would therefore be a memorial of the most lamentable disappointment.

All these and other recent expositors glory in not advancing any proof whatever in support of the inscribed לָרוּר. And yet there are two incidents in David's life, with regard to which the Psalm ought first of all to be accurately looked at, before we abandon this לָרוּר to the winds of conjecture. The first is the bringing home of the Ark of the covenant to Zion, to which, e.g., Franz Volkmar Reinhard (in vol. ii. of the Velt-husen Commentationes Theol. 1795), Stier, and Hofmann refer the Psalm. But the manner in which the Psalm opens with a paraphrase of Moses' memorable words is at once opposed to this; and also the impossibility of giving unity to the explanation of its contents by such a reference is against it. Jahve has long since taken up His abode upon the holy mountain; the poet in this Psalm, which is one of the Psalms of war and victory, describes how the exalted One, who now, however, as in the days of old, rides along through the highest heavens at the head of His people, casts down all powers hostile to Him and to His people, and compels all the world to confess that the God of Israel rules from His sanctuary with invincible might. A far more appropriate occasion is, therefore, to be found in the Syro-Ammonitish war of David, in which the Ark was taken with them by the people (2 Sam. xi. 11); and the hymn was not at that time first of all composed when, at the close of the war, the Ark was brought back to the holy mountain (Hengstenberg, Reinke), but when it was set in motion from thence at the head of Israel as they advanced against the confederate kings and their army (2 Sam. x. 6). The war lasted into the second year, when a second campaign was obliged to be undertaken in order to bring it to an end; and this fact offers at least a second possible period for the origin of the Psalm. It is clear that in vers. 12-15, and still more clear that in vers. 20-24 (and from a wider point of view, vers. 29-35), the victory over the hostile kings is only hoped for, and in vers. 25-28, therefore, the pageantry of victory is seen as it were beforehand. It is the spirit of faith, which here celebrates beforehand the victory of Jahve, and sees in the single victory a pledge of His victory over all the nations of the earth. The theme of the Psalm, generalized beyond its immediate occasion, is the victory of the God of Israel over the world. Regarded as to the nature of its contents, the whole divides itself into two halves, vers. 2-19, 20-35, which are on the whole so distinct that the first dwells more upon the mighty deed God has wrought, the second upon the impressions it produces upon the church and upon the peoples of the earth; in both parts it is viewed now as future, now as past, inasmuch as the longing of prayer and the confidence of hope soar aloft to the height of prophecy, before which futurity lies as a fulfilled fact. The musical Sela occurs three times (vers. 8, 20, 33). These three forte passages furnish important points of view for the apprehension of the collective meaning of the Psalm.

But is David after all the author of this Psalm? The general character of the Psalm is more Asaphic than Davidic (vid. Habakkuk, S. 122). Its references to Zalmon, to Benjamin and the Northern tribes, to the song of Deborah, and in general to the Book of Judges (although not in its present form), give it an appearance of being Ephraimitish. Among the Davidic Psalms it stands entirely alone, so that criticism is quite unable to justify the לָרוּר. And if the words in ver. 29a are addressed to the king, it points to some other poet than David. But is it to a cotemporary poet? The mention of the sanctuary on Zion in vers. 30, 36, does not exclude such an one. Only the threatening of the "wild beast of the sedge" (ver. 31) seems to bring us down beyond the time of David; for the inflammable material of the hostility of Egypt, which broke out into a flame in the reign of Rehoboam, was first gathering towards the end of Solomon's reign. Still Egypt was never entirely lost sight of from the horizon of Israel; and the circumstance that it is mentioned in the first rank, where the submission of the kingdoms of this world to the God of Israel is lyrically set forth in the prophetic prospect of the future, need not astonish one even in a poet of the time of David. And does not ver. 28 compel us to keep on this side of the division of the kingdom? It ought then to refer to the common expedition of Jehoram and Jehoshaphat against Moab (Hitzig), the indiscriminate celebration of which, however, was no suitable theme for a psalmist.

Vers. 2-7. The Psalm begins with the expression of a wish that the victory of God over all His foes and the triumphant exultation of the righteous were near at hand. Ewald and Hitzig take יקום אלהים hypothetically: If God arise, His enemies will be scattered. This rendering is possible in itself so far as the syntax is concerned, but here everything conspires against it; for the futures in vers. 2-4 form an unbroken chain; then a glance at the course of the Psalm from ver. 20 onwards shows that the circumstances of Israel, under which the poet writes, urged forth the wish: let God arise and humble His foes; and finally the primary passage, Num. x. 35, makes it clear that the futures are the language of prayer transformed into the form of the wish. In ver. 3 the wish is addressed directly to God Himself, and therefore becomes petition. הִנָּדָה is inflected (as vice versa יִרְדֵּה, vii. 6, from יִרְדֵּה) from הִנָּדָה (like הִנָּתַן, Jer. xxxii. 4); it is a violation of all rule in favour of the conformity of sound (cf. הִקְצוּת for הִקְצוּת, Lev. xiv. 43, and supra on li. 6) with הִנָּדָה, the object of which is easily supplied (dispellat, sc. hostes tuos), and is purposely omitted in order to direct attention more stedfastly to the omnipotence which to every creature is so irresistible. Like smoke, wax (הוֹנֵךְ, root וָךְ, טַח, Sanscrit tak, to shoot past, to run, Zend tak', whence vitak'ina, dissolving, Neo-Persic gudâchten; causative: to cause to run in different directions = to melt or smelt) is an emblem of human feebleness. As Bakius observes, Si creatura creaturam non fert, quomodo creatura creatoris indignantis faciem ferre possit? The wish expressed in ver. 4 forms the obverse of the preceding. The expressions for joy are heaped up in order to describe the transcendency of the joy that will follow the release from the yoke of the enemy. הַפְּנִי is expressively used in alternation with מַפְּנִי in vers. 2, 3: by the wrathful action, so to speak, that proceeds from His countenance [just as the heat radiating from the fire melts the wax] the foes are dispersed, whereas the righteous rejoice before His gracious countenance.

As the result of the challenge that has been now expressed in vers. 2-4, Elohim, going before His people, begins His march; and in ver. 5 an appeal is made to praise Him with song, His name with the music of stringed instruments, and to make a way along which He may ride בְּעֶרְבוֹת. In view of ver. 34 we cannot take עֶרְבוֹת, as do the Targum and Talmud (B. Chagiga 12b), as a name of one of the seven heavens, a meaning to which, apart from other considerations, the verb עָרַב, to be effaced, confused, dark, is not an appropriate stem-word; but it must be explained according to Isa. xl. 3. There Jahve calls in the aid of His people, here He goes forth at the head of His people; He rides through the steppes in order to fight against the enemies of His people. Not merely the historical reference assigned to the Psalm by Hitzig, but also the one adopted by ourselves, admits of allusion being made to the "steppes of Moab;" for the way to Mêdebâ, where the Syrian mercenaries of the Ammonites had encamped (1 Chron. xix. 7), lay through these steppes, and also the way to Rabbath Ammon (2 Sam. x. 7 sq.). סָלַל calls upon them to make a way for Him, the glorious, invincible King (cf. Isa. lvii. 14, lxii. 10); סָלַל signifies to cast up, heap up or pave, viz. a raised and suitable street or highway, Symmachus καταστρώσατε. He who thus rides along makes the salvation of His people His aim: "Jāh is His name, therefore shout with joy before Him." The Beth in בְּיָה (Symmachus, Quinta : ŷa) is the Beth essentialis, which here, as in Isa. xxvi. 4, stands beside the subject: His name is (exists) in יָה, i.e. His essential name is יָה, His self-attestation, by which He makes Himself capable of being known and named, consists in His being the God of salvation, who, in the might of free grace, pervades all history. This Name is a fountain of exultant rejoicing to His people.

This Name is exemplificatively unfolded in vers. 6 sq. The highly exalted One, who sits enthroned in the heaven of glory, rules in all history here below and takes an interest in the lowliest more especially, in all circumstances of their lives following after His own to succour them. He takes the place of a father to the orphan. He takes up the cause of the widow and contests it to a successful issue. Elohim is one who makes the solitary or isolated to dwell in the house; בְּיָה with He locale, which just as well answers the question where? as whither? בְּיָה, a house = family bond, is the opposite of יָה, solitarius, recluse, xxv. 16. Dachselt correctly renders it, in domum, h.e. familiam numerosam durabilemque eos ut patres-familias plantabit. He is further One who brings forth (out of the dungeon and out of captivity) those who are chained into abundance of prosperity. בְּיָה, occurring only here, is a pluralet. from בְּיָה, synonym אֲשֶׁר, to be straight, fortunate. Ver. 7c briefly and sharply expresses the reverse side of this His humanely condescending rule among mankind. אֵין is here (cf. Gen. ix. 4, Lev. xi. 4) restrictive or adversative (as is more frequently the case with אֵין); and the preterite is the preterite of that which is an actual matter of experience. The סְוֵרִים, i.e. (not from סוּר, the apostate ones, Aquila ἀφιστάμενοι, but as in lxvi. 7, from סָרַר) the rebellious, Symmachus ἀπειθεῖς, who were not willing to submit to the rule of so gracious a God, had ever been excluded from these proofs of favour. These must inhabit אֶרֶץ (accusative of the object), a sun-scorched land; from אֶרֶץ, to be dazzlingly bright, sunny, dried or parched up. They remain in the desert without coming into the land, which, fertilized by the waters of grace, is resplendent with a fresh verdure and with rich fruits. If the poet has before his mind in connection with this the bulk of the people delivered out of Egypt, ὡν τὰ κῶλα ἔπεσαν ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ (Heb. iii. 17), then the transition to what follows is much more easily effected. There is, however, no necessity for any such intermediation. The poet had the march through the desert to Canaan under the guidance of Jahve, the irresistible Conqueror, in his mind even from the beginning, and now he expressly calls to mind that marvellous divine leading in order that the present age may take heart thereat.

Vers. 8-11. In vers. 8 sq. the poet repeats the words of Deborah (Judg. v. 4 sq.), and her words again go back to Deut. xxxiii. 2, cf. Ex. xix. 15 sqq.; on the other hand, our Psalm is the original to Hab. ch. iii. The martial verb  $\text{סָׁרַף}$  represents Elohim as, coming forth from His heavenly dwelling-place (Isa. xxvi. 21), He places Himself at the head of Israel. The stately verb  $\text{יָׁרַךְ}$  represents Him as He accompanies the hosts of His people with the step of a hero confident of victory; and the terrible name for the wilderness,  $\text{יַׁדְיָׁם}$ , is designedly chosen in order to express the contrast between the scene of action and that which they beheld at that time. The verb to  $\text{יָׁרַךְ}$  is easily supplied; Dachselt's rendering according to the accents is correct: hic mons Sinai (sc. in specie ita tremuit). The description fixes our attention upon Sinai as the central point of all revelations of God during the period of deliverance by the hand of Moses, as being the scene of the most glorious of them all (vid. on Hab. p. 136 sq.). The majestic phenomena which proclaimed the nearness of God are distributed over the whole journeying, but most gloriously concentrated themselves at the giving of the Law on Sinai. The earth trembled throughout the extended circuit of this vast granite range, and the heavens dropped, inasmuch as the darkness of thunder clouds rested upon Sinai, pierced by incessant lightnings (Ex. ch. xix.). There, as the original passages describe it, Jahve met His people; He came from the east, His people from the west; there they found themselves together, and shaking the earth, breaking through the heavens, He gave them a pledge of the omnipotence which should henceforth defend and guide them. The poet has a purpose in view in calling Elohim in this passage "the God of Israel;" the covenant relationship of God to Israel dates from Sinai, and from this period onwards, by reason of the Tôra, He became Israel's King (Deut. xxxiii. 5). Since the statement of a fact of earlier history has preceded, and since the preterites alternate with them, the futures that follow in vers. 10, 11 are to be understood as referring to the synchronous past; but hardly so that ver. 10 should refer to the miraculous supply of food, and more especially the rain of manna, during the journeyings through the wilderness. The giving of the Law from Sinai has a view to Israel being a settled, stationary people, and the deliverance out of the land of bondage only finds its completion in the taking and maintaining possession of the Land of Promise. Accordingly vers. 10, 11 refer to the blessing and protection of the people who had taken up their abode there.

The  $\text{נַחֲלָה}$  of God (genit. auctoris, as in 2 Macc. ii. 4) is the land assigned by Him to Israel as an inheritance; and  $\text{נִשְׂמַן נְרֵבוֹת}$  an emblem of the abundance of gifts which God has showered down upon the land since Israel took up its abode in it.  $\text{נְרֵבָה}$  is the name given to a deed and gift springing from an inward impulse, and in this instance the intensive idea of richness and superabundance is associated therewith by means of the plural;  $\text{נִשְׂמַן נְרֵבוֹת}$  is a shower-like abundance of good gifts descending from above. The Hiphil  $\text{הִנִּיחַ}$  here governs a double accusative, like the Kal in Prov. vii. 17, in so far, that is, as  $\text{נַחֲלֶתְךָ}$  is drawn to ver. 10a; for the accentuation, in opposition to the Targum, takes  $\text{נַחֲלֶתְךָ וְנִלְאָה}$  together: Thine inheritance and that the parched one (Waw epexeget. as in 1 Sam. xxviii. 3, Amos iii. 11, iv. 10). But this "and that" is devoid of aim; why should it not at once be read  $\text{הִנִּיחָהּ}$ ? The rendering of Böttcher, "Thy sickened and wearied," is inadmissible, too, according to the present pointing; for it ought to be  $\text{נַחֲלֶתְךָ}$  or  $\text{נַחֲלֶתְךָ}$ . And with a suffix this Niphal becomes ambiguous, and more especially so in this connection, where the thought of  $\text{נַחֲלָה}$ , an inherited possession, a heritage, lies so naturally at hand.  $\text{נַחֲלֶתְךָ}$  is therefore to be drawn to ver. 10a, and ver. 10b must begin with  $\text{וְנִלְאָה}$ , as in the LXX.,  $\text{καὶ ἡσθένησε, σὺ δὲ κατηρτίσω αὐτήν}$ . It is true  $\text{נִלְאָה}$  is not a hypothetical preterite equivalent to  $\text{וְנִלְאָתָה}$ ; but, as is frequently the case with the anarthrous participle (Ew. § 341, b), it has the value of a hypothetical clause: "and if it (Israel's inheritance) were in a parched, exhausted condition (cf. the cognate root  $\text{לָהָה}$ , Gen. xlvii. 13), then hast Thou always made it again firm" (viii. 4, Ex. xv. 17), i.e. strengthened, enlivened it. Even here the idea of the inhabitants is closely associated with the land itself; in ver. 11 they are more especially thought of: "Thy creatures dwelt therein." Nearly all modern expositors take חַיִּיהָ either according to 2 Sam. xxiii. 11, 13 (cf. 1 Chron. xi. 15), in the signification tent-circle, ring-camp (root חו, חו, to move in a circle, to encircle, to compass), or in the signification of חַי (from חַיִּי = חַיִּיהָ, חַיִּיהָ), a race or tribe, i.e. a collection of living beings (cf. חַיִּי, 1 Sam. xviii. 18). But the Asaphic character of this Psalm, which is also manifest in other points, is opposed to this rendering. This style of Psalm is fond of the comparison of Israel to a flock, so that also in lxxiv. 19 חַיִּיהָ עֲנִיִּים signifies nothing else than "the creatures [Gethier, collective] of Thy poor, Thy poor creatures." This use of חַיִּיהָ is certainly peculiar; but not so remarkable as if by the "creatures of God" we had to understand, with Hupfeld, the quails (Ex. ch. xvi.). The avoiding of חַיִּיהָ on account of the idea of brutum (lxxiii. 22) which is inseparable from this word, is sufficient to account for it; in חַיִּיהָ, ζῶον, there is merely the notion of moving life. We therefore are to explain it according to Mic. vii. 14, where Israel is called a flock dwelling in a wood in the midst of Carmel: God brought it to pass, that the flock of Israel, although sorely persecuted, nevertheless continued to inhabit the land. חַיִּיהָ, as in ver. 15, refers to Canaan. עָנִי in ver. 11b is the ecclesia pressa surrounded by foes on every side: Thou didst prepare for Thy poor with Thy goodness, Elohim, i.e. Thou didst regale or entertain Thy poor people with Thy possessions and Thy blessings. חַיִּיהָ, as in Gen. xliii. 16, 1 Chron. xii. 39, to make ready to eat, and therefore to entertain; טוֹבָה as in lxxv. 12, טוֹבָה ה', Jer. xxxi. 12. It would be quite inadmissible, because tautological, to refer חַיִּיהָ to the land according to lxxv. 10 (Ewald), or even to the desert (Olshausen), which the description has now left far behind.

Vers. 12-15. The futures that now follow are no longer to be understood as referring to previous history; they no longer alternate with preterites. Moreover the transition to the language of address in ver. 14 shows that the poet here looks forth from his present time and circumstances into the future; and the introduction of the divine name אֱלֹהִים, after Elohim has been used eleven times, is an indication of a new commencement. The prosperous condition in which God places His church by giving it the hostile powers of the world as a spoil is depicted. The noun אָמַר, never occurring in the genitival relationship, and never with a suffix, because the specific character of the form would be thereby obliterated, always denotes an important utterance, more particularly God's word of promise (lxxvii. 9), or His word of power (Hab. iii. 9), which is represented elsewhere as a mighty voice of thunder (lxviii. 34, Isa. xxx. 30), or a trumpet-blast (Zech. ix. 14); in the present instance it is the word of power by which the Lord suddenly changes the condition of His oppressed church. The entirely new state of things which this omnipotent behest as it were conjures into existence is presented to the mind in ver. 12b: the women who proclaim the tidings of victory—a great host. Victory and triumph follow upon God's אָמַר, as upon His creative יְהי'. The deliverance of Israel from the army of Pharaoh, the deliverance out of the hand of Jabin by the defeat of Sisera, the victory of Jephthah over the Ammonites, and the victorious single combat of David with Goliath were celebrated by singing women. God's decisive word shall also go forth this time, and of the evangelists, like Miriam (Mirjam) and Deborah, there shall be a great host.

Ver. 13 describes the subject of this triumphant exultation. Hupfeld regards vers. 13-15 as the song of victory itself, the fragment of an ancient triumphal ode (epinikion) reproduced here; but there is nothing standing in the way that should forbid our here regarding these verses as a direct continuation of ver. 12. The "hosts" are the numerous well-equipped armies which the kings of the heathen lead forth to the battle against the people of God. The unusual expression "kings of hosts" sounds very much like an ironically disparaging antithesis to the customary "Jahve of Hosts" (Böttcher). He, the Lord, interposes, and they are obliged to flee, staggering as they go, to retreat, and that, as the anadiplosis (cf. Judg. v. 7, xix. 20) depicts, far away, in every direction. The fut. energeticum with its ultima-accentuation gives intensity to the pictorial expression. The victors then turn homewards laden with rich spoils. נִיַּת בֵּית, here in a collective sense, is the wife who stays at home (Judg. v. 24) while the husband goes forth to battle. It is not: the ornament (נִיַּת as in Jer. vi. 2) of the house, which Luther, with the LXX., Vulgate, and Syriac, adopts in his version,\* but: the dweller or homely one (cf.  $\text{בֵּית}$ , a dwelling-place, Job viii. 6) of the house,  $\eta \text{ οἰκουρός}$ . The dividing of the spoil elsewhere belongs to the victors; what is meant here is the distribution of the portions of the spoil that have fallen to the individual victors, the further distribution of which is left for the housewife (Judg. v. 30 sq., 2 Sam. i. 24). Ewald now recognises in vers. 14 sq. the words of an ancient song of victory; but ver. 13b is unsuitable to introduce them. The language of address in ver. 14 is the poet's own, and he here describes the condition of the people who are victorious by the help of their God, and who again dwell peaceably in the land after the war.  $\text{בֵּית}$  passes out of the hypothetical signification into the temporal, as e.g. in Job xiv. 14 (vid. on lix. 16.) The lying down among the sheep-folds ( $\text{מִשְׁפָּתַיִם} = \text{מִשְׁפָּתַיִם}$ , cf.  $\text{שֹׁפֵט}$ ,  $\text{מִשְׁפָּט}$ , the staked-in folds or pens consisting of hurdles standing two by two over against one another) is an emblem of thriving peace, which (like vers. 8, 28) points back to Deborah's song, Judg. v. 16, cf. Gen. xlix. 14. Just such a time is now also before Israel, a time of peaceful prosperity enhanced by rich spoils. Everything shall glitter and gleam with silver and gold. Israel is God's turtle-dove, lxxiv. 19, cf. lvi. 1, Hos. vii. 11, xi. 11. Hence the new circumstances of ease and comfort are likened to the varied hues of a dove disporting itself in the sun. Its wings are as though overlaid with silver ( $\text{כְּהַרְהֵב}$ , not 3. præt., but part. fem. Niph. as predicate to  $\text{בְּנֵי}$ , cf. 1 Sam. iv. 15, Mic. iv. 11, i. 9; Ew. § 317, a), therefore like silver wings (cf. Ovid, Metam. ii. 537: Niveis argentea pennis Ales); and its pinions with gold-green,† and that, as the reduplicated \* "Hausehre," says he, is the housewife or matron as being the adornment of the house; vid. F. Dietrich, Frau und Dame, a lecture bearing upon the history of language (1864), S. 13.

† Ewald remarks, "Arabian poets also call the dove  $\text{الورقة}$ , the greenish yellow, golden gleaming one, vid. Kosegarten, Chrestom. p. 156, 5." But this Arabic poetical word for the dove signifies rather the ash-green, whity blackish one. Nevertheless the signification greenish for the Hebrew  $\text{יִרְקֵק}$  is established. Bartenoro, on Negaim xi. 4, calls the colour of the wings of the peacock  $\text{יִרְקֵק}$ ; and I am here reminded of what Wetzstein once told me, that, according to an Arab proverb, the surface of good coffee ought to be "like the neck of the dove," i.e. so oily that it gleams form implies, with the iridescent or glistening hue of the finest gold (קִרְרִין, not dull, but shining gold). Side by side with this bold simile there appears in ver. 15 an equally bold but contrastive figure, which, turning a step or two backward, likewise vividly illustrates the results of their God-given victory. The suffix of אֶרֶץ refers to the land of Israel, as in Isa. viii. 21, lxxv. 9. צִלְמוֹן, according to the usage of the language so far as it is now preserved to us, is not a common noun: deep darkness (Targum = צִלְמוֹת), it is the name of a mountain in Ephraim, the trees of which Abimelech transported in order to set fire to the tower of Shechem (Judg. ix. 48 sqq.). The Talmudic literature was acquainted with a river taking its rise there, and also somewhat frequently mentions a locality bearing a similar name to that of the mountain. The mention of this mountain may in a general way be rendered intelligible by the consideration that, like Shiloh (Gen. xlix. 10), it is situated about in the centre of the Holy Land.\* הַשִּׁלֵּיגִי signifies to bring forth snow, or even, like اثلج, to become snow-white; this Hiph. is not a word descriptive of colour, like הִלְבִּין. Since the protasis is בְּפָרֶשׁ, and not בְּפָרֶשֶׁךָ, הַשִּׁלֵּיגִי is intended to be impersonal (cf. l. 3, Amos iv. 7, Mic. iii. 6); and the voluntative form is explained from its use in apodoses of hypothetical protases (Ges. § 128, 2). It indicates the issue to which, on the supposition of the other, it must and shall come. The words are therefore to be like the eye of a peacock. A way for the transition from green to grey in aurak as the name of a colour is already, however, opened up in post-biblical Hebrew, when to frighten any one is expressed by הוֹרִיק פָּנִים, Genesis Rabba, 47a. The intermediate notion is that of fawn colour, i.e. yellowish grey. In the Talmud the plumage of the full-grown dove is called זָהוּב and צָהוּב, Chullin, 22b.

* In Tosifto Para, ch. viii., a river of the name of יוֹרְדַת הַצְּלָמוֹן is mentioned, the waters of which might not be used in preparing the water of expiation (מֵי הַטְּהָרָה), because they were dried up at the time of the war, and thereby hastened the defeat of Israel (viz. the overthrow of Barcochba). Grätz (Geschichte der Juden, iv. 157, 459 f.) sees in it the Nahar Arsuf, which flows down the mountains of Ephraim past Bethar into the Mediterranean. The village of Zalmon occurs in the Mishna, Jebamoth xvi. 6, and frequently. The Jerusalem Gemara (Maaseroth i. 1) gives pre-eminence to the carob-trees of Zalmona side by side with those of Shitta and Gadara.

rendered: then it snows on Zalmon; and the snowing is either an emblem of the glistening spoil that falls into their hands in such abundance, or it is a figure of the becoming white, whether from bleached bones (cf. Virgil, Æn. v. 865: albi ossibus scopuli; xii. 36: campi ossibus albet; Ovid, Fasti i. 558: humanis ossibus albet humus) or even from the naked corpses (2 Sam. i. 19, עַל-בְּמוֹתַיִךְ הָלַל). Whether we consider the point of comparison to lie in the spoil being abundant as the flakes of snow, and like to the dazzling snow in brilliancy, or in the white pallid corpses, at any rate בְּצִלְמוֹן is not equivalent to בְּבִצְלָמוֹן, but what follows "when the Almighty scatters kings therein" is illustrated by Zalmon itself. In the one case Zalmon is represented as the battle-ground (cf. cx. 6), in the other (which better corresponds to the nature of a wooded mountain) as a place of concealment. The protasis בפרש וגו' favours the latter; for פָּרַשׁ signifies to spread wide apart, to cause a compact whole—and the host of "the kings" is conceived of as such—to fly far asunder into many parts (Zech. ii. 10, cf. the Niph. in Ezek. xvii. 21). The hostile host disperses in all directions, and Zalmon glitters, as it were with snow, from the spoil that is dropped by those who flee. Homer also (Iliad, xix. 357-361) likens the mass of assembled helmets, shields, armour, and lances to the spectacle of a dense fall of snow. In this passage of the Psalm before us still more than in Homer it is the spectacle of the fallen and far seen glistening snow that also is brought into the comparison, and not merely that which is falling and that which covers everything (vid. Iliad, xii. 277 sqq.). The figure is the pendant of the figure of the dove.*

* Wetzstein gives a different explanation (Reise in den beiden Trachonen und um das Haurângebirge in the Zeitschrift für allgem. Erdkunde, 1859, S. 198). "Then fell snow on Zalmon, i.e. the mountain clothed itself in a bright garment of light in celebration of this joyous event. Any one who has been in Palestine knows how very refreshing is the spectacle of the distant mountain-top capped with snow. The beauty of this poetical figure is enhanced by the fact that Zalmon (ظلمان), according to its etymology, signifies a mountain range dark and dusky, either from shade, forest, or black rock. The last would well suit the mountains of Haurân, among which Ptolemæus (p. 365 and 370, Ed. Wilberg) mentions a mountain (according to one of the various readings) Ἀσαλαμανός."

Vers. 16-19. This victory of Israel over the kings of the Gentiles gives the poet the joyful assurance that Zion is the inaccessible dwelling-place of Elohim, the God of the heavenly hosts. The mention of Zalmon leads him to mention other mountains. He uses the mountains of Bashan as an emblem of the hostile powers east of Jordan. These stand over against the people of God, as the mighty mountains of Bashan rising in steep, only slightly flattened peaks, to little hill-like Zion. In the land on this side Jordan the limestone and chalk formation with intermingled strata of sandstone predominates; the mountains of Bashan, however, are throughout volcanic, consisting of slag, lava, and more particularly basalt (basanites), which has apparently taken its name from Bashan (Basan).* As a basalt range the mountains of Bashan are conspicuous among other creations of God, and are therefore called "the mountain of Elohim:" the basalt rises in the form of a cone with the top lopped off, or even towers aloft like so many columns precipitous and rugged to sharp points; hence the mountains of Bashan are called הַר יַבְבָּנִים, i.e. a mountain range (for הַר, as is well known, signifies both the single eminence and the range of summits) of many peaks = a many-peaked mountain; יַבְבָּנִי is an adjective like אֶמְלֵל רַעֲנָן. With this boldly formed mass of rock so gloomily majestic, giving the impression of antiquity and of invincibility, when compared with the ranges on the other side of unstable porous limestone and softer formations, more particularly with Zion, it is an emblem of the world and its powers standing over against the people of God as a threatening and seemingly invincible colossus. The poet asks these mountains of Bashan "why," etc.? רִצֵּד is explained from the Arabic رصد, which, in accordance with its root رص, signifies to cleave firmly to a place (firmiter inhæsit loco), properly used of a beast of prey couching down and lying in wait for prey, of a hunter on the catch, and of an enemy in ambush; hence then: to lie in wait for, lurk, ἐνδρῆναι, craftily, insidiosè (whence râsid, a lier-in-wait, tarrassud, an ambush), here: to regard enviously, invidiosè. In Arabic, just as in this instance, it is construed as a direct transitive with an accusative of the object, whereas the original signification would lead one to look for a dative of the object (רִצֵּר לְ), which does also really occur in the common Arabic. Olewejored is placed by גַּבְנִים, but what follows is not, after all, the answer: "the mountain—Elohim has chosen it as the seat of His throne," but הָהָר is the object of the interrogative clause: Quare invidiose observatis, montes cacuminosi, hunc montem (δεικτικῶς: that Zion yonder), quem, etc. (an attributive clause after a determinate substantive, as in lii. 9, lxxxix. 50, and many other instances, contrary to the Arabic rule of style). Now for the first time, in ver. 17c, follows that which is boastfully and defiantly contrasted with the proud mountains: "Jahve will also dwell for ever;" not only that Elohim has chosen Zion as the seat of His throne, it will also continue to be the seat of His throne, Jahve will continue to dwell [there] for ever. Grace is superior to nature, and the church superior to the world, powerful and majestic as this may seem to be. Zion maintains its honour over against the mountains of Bashan.

Ver. 18 now describes the kind of God, so to speak, who sits enthroned on Zion. The war-chariots of the heavenly hosts are here collectively called רֶכֶב, as in 2 Kings vi. 17. רִבְתִּים (with Dechî, not Olewejored) is a dual from רִבוּת; and this is either an abstract noun equivalent to רִבוּת (from which comes the apocopated רִבּוֹ = רִבּוֹ), a myriad, consequently רִבְתִּים, two myriads, or a contracted plural out of רִבְאוֹת, Ezra ii. 69, therefore the dual of a plural (like לְהוֹתִים, חוֹמוֹתִים): an indefinite plurality of myriads, and this again doubled (Hofmann). With this sense, in comparison with which the other is poor and meagre, also harmonizes the expression אֲלָפֵי שְׁנָאֵן, thousands of repetition (ἀπαξ λεγομ. = שְׁנָאֵן), i.e. thousands and again thousands, numberless, incalculable thousands; cf. the other and synonymous expression in Dan. vii. 10.* It is intended to give a conception of the "hosts" which Elohim is to set in array against the "kings of hosts," i.e. the martial power of the kingdom of the world, for the protection and for the triumph of His own people. Chariots of fire and horses of fire appear in 2 Kings ii. 11, vi. 17 as God's retinue; in Dan. vii. 10 it is angelic forces that thus make themselves visible. They surround Him on both sides in many myriads, in countless thousands. אֲרָטֵי בָם (with Beth raphatum*), the Lord is among them (cf. Isa. xlv. 14), i.e. they are round about Him, He has them with Him (Jer. xli. 15), and is present with them. It now becomes clear why Sinai is mentioned, viz. because at the giving of the Law Jahve revealed Himself on Sinai surrounded by "ten thousands of saints" (Deut. xxxiii. 2 sq.). But in what sense is it mentioned? Zion, the poet means, presents to the spiritual eye now a spectacle such as Sinai presented in the earlier times, although even Sinai does not belong to the giants among the mountains:† God halts there with His angel host as a protection and pledge of victory to His people. The conjectures בַּמ מַסִּינִי and בַּא מַסִּינִי (Hitzig) are of no use to us. We must either render it: Sinai is in the sanctuary, i.e. as it were transferred into the sanctuary of Zion; or: a Sinai is it in holiness, i.e. it presents a spectacle such as Sinai presented when God by His appearing surrounded it with holiness. The use of the expression בְּקִרְשׁ in ver. 25, lxxvii. 14, Ex. xv. 11, decides in favour of the latter rendering.

* Tradition (Targum, Saadia, and Abulwalid) takes שְׁנָאֵן forthwith as a synonym of מַלְאָךְ, an angel. So also the LXX. (Jerome): χιλιάδες εὐθηνούτων (שְׁנָאֵן = שְׁנָאֵן), and Symmachus, χιλιάδες ἠχοούντων (from שְׁנָאֵן?). The stem-word is, however, שְׁנָה, just as שְׁנִים, Arabic thinân, ithnân, is also formed from a singular that is to be assumed, viz. ثِن (اثن), and this from שְׁנָה, ثِنِي (cf. בְּנֵי from בְּנָה, בְּנֵי).

With ver. 19 the Psalm changes to prayer. According to vii. 8, xlvii. 6, לְמָרוֹם appears to be the height of heaven; but since in vers. 16-18 Zion is spoken of as Jahve's inaccessible dwelling-place, the connection points to מָרוֹם צִיּוֹן, Jer. xxxi. 12, cf. Ezek. xvii. 23, xx. 40. Moreover the preterites, which

* This is one of the three passages (the others being Isa. xxxiv. 11, Ezek. xxiii. 42; cf. Ew. § 93, b) in which the dageshing of the opening mute of the following word is given up after a soft final consonant, when the words are connected by a conjunctive accent or Makkeph.

† Cf. the epigram in Sadi's Garden of Roses, "Of all mountains Sinai is the smallest, and yet the greatest in rank and worth in the estimation of God," etc. On the words סִינֵי בְקִרְשׁ which follow we may to a certain extent compare the name of honour given to it in Arabic, tūr m'ana, "Sinai of pensiveness" (Pertsch, Die persischen Handschriften der Gothaer Bibliothek, 1859, S. 24).

under other circumstances we should be obliged to take as prophetic, thus find their most natural explanation as a retrospective glance at David's storming of "the stronghold of Zion" (2 Sam. v. 6-10) as the deed of Jahve Himself. But we should exceed the bounds of legitimate historical interpretation by referring לְקַחַת מַתָּנוֹת בְּאֶדָם to the Nethînim, Ezra viii. 20 (cf. Num. xvii. 6), those bondmen of the sanctuary after the manner of the Gibeonites, Josh. ix. 23. The Beth of בְּאֶדָם is not Beth substantiæ: gifts consisting of men, so that these themselves are the thing given (J. D. Michaelis, Ewald), but the expression signifies inter homines, as in lxxviii. 60, 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, Jer. xxxii. 20. עֲלִיתָ לְמָרוֹם mentions the ascending of the triumphant One; שָׁבִיתָ שָׁבִי (cf. Judg. v. 12), the subjugation of the enemy; לְקַחַת וְגו', the receiving of the gifts betokening homage and allegiance (Deut. xxviii. 38, and frequently), which have been presented to Him since He has taken possession of Zion,—there He sits enthroned henceforth over men, and receives gifts like to the tribute which the vanquished bring to the victor. These He has received among men, and even (וְאֵף, atque etiam, as in Lev. xxvi. 39-42) among the rebellious ones. Or does a new independent clause perhaps begin with וְאֵף קְוֹרְרִים? This point will be decided by the interpretation of the words that follow. Side by side with an infinitive with לְ expressing a purpose, the one following noun (here a twofold name) has the assumption against it of being the subject. Is יה אלהים then consequently the object, or is it an apostrophe? If it be taken as the language of address, then the definition of the purpose, לְשָׁבֵן, ought, as not being suited to what immediately precedes, to refer back to עליה; but this word is too far off. Thus, therefore, the construction of יה אלהים with לְשָׁבֵן, as its object, is apparently intended (Ewald, Hupfeld): and even the rebellious are to dwell (Ges. § 132, rem. 1) with Jāh Elohim (accus. as in v. 5, and frequently). This interpretation is also the one most generally adopted among the old expositors. The Targum renders: and even the rebellious who turn and repent, even upon them will the Shechîna of the glory of Jāh Elohim descend and dwell; the Syriac version: and even the rebellious will ("not" is probably to be crossed out) dwell before God (יעטרון קדם אלהא); and Jerome: insuper et non credentes inhabitare Dominum Deum. Thus Theodoret also understands the versions of the LXX. and of Aquila: "Thou hast not regarded their former disobedience, but notwithstanding their rebellion hast Thou continually been gracious to them ἕως αὐτοὺς οἰκητήριον οἰκεῖον ἀπέφηνας." The expression, however, sounds too grand to have "the rebellious ones" as its subject, and more particularly in view of ver. 7. Hence we take וְיָהוָה סְגָרָתָם with בְּמַתָּנָתָם: and even among rebellious ones (hast Thou received gifts), or: and even rebellious ones (give Thee); and לְשׂוֹן as a clause denoting the purpose, followed by the subject (as e.g. in 2 Sam. xix. 20): in order that Jāh Elohim may dwell, i.e. continue to dwell (as in ver. 17, cf. Isa. lvii. 15).

The first half of the Psalm ends here. With the words Jāh Elohim the Psalm has reached a summit upon which it takes its rest. God has broken forth on behalf of His people against their enemies, and He now triumphs over and on behalf of men. The circumstance of Elohim arising is the rise of the final glory, and His becoming manifest as Jāh Elohim is its zenith. Paul (Eph. iv. 8) gathers up the meaning of ver. 19, without following the LXX., in the following manner: ἀναβὰς εἰς ὑψὸς ἠχμαλώτευσεν αἰχμαλωσίαν καὶ ἔδωκε δόματα τοῖς ἀνθρώποις. Might he perhaps have had the Targum, with which the Syriac version agrees, in his mind at the time: וְיָהוָה יִשְׂאָר מִתְּהוֹמֵי הַיָּם לְבָנֵי נִשְׂאָר? He interprets in the light and in the sense of the history that realizes it. For the ascension of Elohim in its historical fulfilment is none other than the ascension of Christ. This latter was, however, as the Psalm describes it, a triumphal procession (Col. ii. 15); and what the Victor has gained over the powers of darkness and of death, He has gained not for His own aggrandisement, but for the interests of men. It is בְּמַתָּנָתָם, gifts which He now distributes among men, and which benefit even the erring ones. So the apostle takes the words, inasmuch as he changes ἔλαβες into ἔδωκε. The gifts are the charismata which come down from the Exalted One upon His church.* It is a distribution of gifts, a dispensing of blessing, which stands related to His victory as its primary cause; for as Victor He is also the possessor of blessing, His gifts are as it were the spoils of the victory He has gained over sin, death, and Satan.* The apostle is the more warranted in this interpretation, since Elohim in what follows is celebrated as the Lord who also brings out of death. This praise in the historical fulfilment applies to Him, who, as Theodoret observes on ver. 21, has opened up the prison-house of death, which for us had no exit, and burst the brazen doors, and broken asunder the iron bolts,† viz. to Jesus Christ, who now has the keys of Death and of Hades.

Vers. 20-28. Now begins the second circuit of the hymn. Comforted by the majestic picture of the future that he has beheld, the poet returns to the present, in which Israel is still oppressed, but yet not forsaken by God. The translation follows the accentuation, regular and in accordance with the sense, which has been restored by Baer after Heidenheim, viz. אֲרֵנִי has Zarka, and אֲרֵנִי אֲרֵנִי Olewejored preceded by the sub-distinctive Rebia parvum; it is therefore: Benedictus Dominator: quotidie bajulat nobis,—with which the Targum, Rashi, and Kimchi agree.‡ אֲרֵנִי, like אֲרֵנִי and אֲרֵנִי, unites the significations to lay a burden upon one (Zech. xii. 3, Isa. xlvi. 1, 3), and to carry a burden; with אֲרֵנִי it signifies to lay a burden upon any one, here with אֲרֵנִי to take up a burden for any one and to bear it for him. It is the burden or pressure of the hostile world that is meant, which the Lord day by day helps His church to bear, inasmuch as He is mighty by His strength in her who of herself is so feeble. The divine name אֲרֵנִי, as being the subject of the sentence, is אֲרֵנִי: God is our salvation. The music here again strikes in forte, and the same thought that is emphasized

* Just so Hölemann in the second division of his Bibelstudien (1861); whereas to Hofmann (Schriftbeweis, ii. 482 ff.) the New Testament application of the citation from the Psalm is differently brought about, because he refers neither ἱχθυοῦσιν αἰχμαλωσίαν nor κατέβη εἰς τὰ κατώτερα μέρη τῆς γῆς to the descent of the Lord into Hades.

† Just so that portion of the Gospel of Nicodemus that treats of Christ's descent into Hades; vid. Tischendorf, Evangelia Apocrypha. (1853), p. 307.

‡ According to the customary accentuation the second אֲרֵנִי has Mercha or Olewejored, and אֲרֵנִי אֲרֵנִי, Mugrash. But this Mugrash has the position of the accents of the Silluk-member against it; for although it does exceptionally occur that two conjunctives follow Mugrash (Accentsystem, xvii. § 5), yet these cannot in any case be Mahpach sarkatum and Illui.

by the music in its turn, is also repeated in ver. 21a with heightened expression: God is to us a God לְמוֹשָׁעוֹת, who grants us help in rich abundance. The pluralet. denotes not so much the many single proofs of help, as the riches of rescuing power and grace. In ver. 21b לְמִוֹת corresponds to the לָנִי; for it is not to be construed תּוֹצִיאוֹת לְמוֹת: Jahve's, the Lord, are the outgoings to death (Böttcher), i.e. He can command that one shall not fall a prey to death. תּוֹצִיאוֹת, the parallel word to מוֹשָׁעוֹת, signifies, and it is the most natural meaning, the escapings; יָצָא, evadere, as in 1 Sam. xiv. 41, 2 Kings xiii. 5, Eccles. vii. 18. In Jahve's power are means of deliverance for death, i.e. even for those who are already abandoned to death. With וְיָאֵס a joyously assuring inference is drawn from that which God is to Israel. The parallelism of the correctly divided verse shows that ראש here, as in cx. 6, signifies caput in the literal sense, and not in the sense of princeps. The hair-covered scalp is mentioned as a token of arrogant strength, and unhumiliated and impenitent pride, as in Deut. xxxii. 42, and as the Attic κομᾶν directly signifies to strut along, give one's self airs. The genitive construction is the same as in Isa. xxviii. 1b, xxxii. 13b. The form of expression refers back to Num. xxiv. 17, and so to speak inflects this primary passage very similarly to Jer. xlviii. 45. If קרקר שער be an object, then ראש ought also to be a second object (that of the member of the body); the order of the words does not in itself forbid this (cf. iii. 8 with Deut. xxxiii. 11), but would require a different arrangement in order to avoid ambiguity. In ver. 23 the poet hears a divine utterance, or records one that he has heard: "From Bashan will I bring back, I will bring back from the eddies of the sea (from צִי = צִלְצִל, to whiz, rattle; to whirl, eddy), i.e. the depths or abysses of the sea." Whom? When after the destruction of Jerusalem a ship set sail for Rome with a freight of distinguished and well-formed captives before whom was the disgrace of prostitution, they all threw themselves into the sea, comforting themselves with this passage of Scripture (Gittin 57b, cf. Echa Rabbathi 66a). They therefore took ver. 23 to be a promise which has Israel as its object;* but the clause expressing a

* So also the Targum, which understands the promise to refer to the restoration of the righteous who have been eaten by wild beasts and purpose, ver. 24, and the paraphrase in Amos ix. 2 sq., show that the foes of Israel are conceived of as its object. Even if these have hidden themselves in the most out-of-the-way places, God will fetch them back and make His own people the executioners of His justice upon them. The expectation is that the flight of the defeated foes will take a southerly direction, and that they will hide themselves in the primeval forests of Bashan, and still farther southward in the depths of the sea, i.e. of the Dead Sea (םָ as in Isa. xvi. 8, 2 Chron. xx. 2). Opposite to the hiding in the forests of the mountainous Bashan stands the hiding in the abyss of the sea, as the extreme of remoteness, that which is in itself impossible being assumed as possible. The first member of the clause expressing the purpose, ver. 24, becomes more easy and pleasing if we read תִּרְחֹץ (LXX., Syriac, and Vulgate, ut intingatur), according to lviii. 11. So far as the letters are concerned, the conjecture תִּתְחַמֵּן (from which תַּחְמֹךְ, according to Chajug', is transposed), after Isa. lxiii. 1, is still more natural (Hitzig): that thy foot may redden itself in blood. This is certainly somewhat tame, and moreover מְרַם would be better suited to this rendering than בָּרַם. As the text now stands, תִּתְחַמֵּן* is equivalent to תִּתְחַמְצֵם (them, viz. the enemies), and רַגְלֵךְ בָּרַם is an adverbial clause (setting or plunging thy foot in blood). It is, however, also possible that תִּחַץ is used like מִתְחַצֵּץ (vehementer commovere): ut concutias s. agites pedem tuam in sanguine. Can it now be that in ver. 24b from among the number of the enemies the one who goes about glorying in his sins, the רֹשֵׁעַ κατ' ἐξοχήν (cf. Isa. xi. 4, Hab. iii. 13, and other passages), is brought prominently forward by מִיָּהוּ? Hardly so; the absence of תִּלְקֵךְ (lambat) cannot be tolerated, cf.

drowned in the sea (Midrash: מִבֵּשֶׁן = מִבֵּין שְׁנֵי אַרְיֹת); cf. also the things related from the time of the Khaliphs in Jost's Geschichte des Judenthums, ii. 399, and Grätz' Gesch. der Juden, v. 347.

* The Gaja of the first closed syllable warns one to make a proper pause upon it, in order that the guttural of the second, so apt to be slurred over, may be distinctly pronounced; cf. תִּבְחָר, lxxv. 5; תִּרְחֹץ, ciii. 12. So also with the sibilants at the beginning of the second syllable, e.g. תִּרְיֵא, Gen. i. 11, in accordance with which, in xiv. 1, liii. 2, we must write תִּשְׁחִיתוּ וְהִתְעִיבוּ.

1 Kings xxi. 19, xxii. 38. It is more natural, with Simonis, to refer מְיָרֵי back to לְשׁוֹן (a word which is usually fem., but sometimes perhaps is masc., xxii. 16, Prov. xxvi. 28); and, since side by side with מְיָרֵי only מְיָרֵי occurs anywhere else (Ew. § 263, b), to take it in the signification pars ejus (מִן from מִן = מְיָרֵי, after the form מִן, מִן, מִן, of the same meaning as מְיָרֵי, מְיָרֵי, lxiii. 11), in favour of which Hupfeld also decides.

What is now described in vers. 25-28, is not the rejoicing over a victory gained in the immediate past, nor the rejoicing over the earlier deliverance at the Red Sea, but Israel's joyful celebration when it shall have experienced the avenging and redemptive work of its God and King. According to lxxvii. 14, Hab. iii. 6, הַלְלִיכוֹת appears to be God's march against the enemy; but what follows shows that the pompa magnifica of God is intended, after He has overcome the enemy. Israel's festival of victory is looked upon as a triumphal procession of God Himself, the King, who governs in holiness, and has now subjugated and humbled the unholy world; שֶׁבַע בְּקִרְיָת as in ver. 18. The rendering "in the sanctuary" is very natural in this passage, but Ex. xv. 11, Ps. lxxvii. 14, are against it. The subject of הָאֵל is all the world, more especially those of the heathen who have escaped the slaughter. The perfect signifies: they have seen, just as קִרְיָתוֹ, they have occupied the front position. Singers head the procession, after them (וְאָחֵר,* an adverb as in Gen. xxii. 13, Ex. v. 1) players upon citherns and harps (זְבָנִים, participle to זָבַן), and on either side virgins with timbrels (Spanish adufe); תּוֹפְפוֹת, apocopated part. Poel with the retention of ē (cf. שׁוֹקֵקָה, cvii. 9), from תָּפַף, to strike the תָּפ (דָּפ).

It is a retrospective reference to the song at the Sea, now again come into life, which Miriam and the women of Israel sang amidst the music of timbrels. The deliverance which is now being celebrated is the counterpart of the deliverance out of Egypt. Songs resound as in ver. 27, "in gatherings of the congregation (and, so to speak, in full choirs) praise ye Elohim." מְקַהֲלוֹת מְקַהֲלִים (מְקַהֲלִים, xxvi. 12) is the plural to קָהַל (xxii. 23), which forms none of its own (cf. post-biblical קְהָלוֹת from קָהַל). Ver. 27b is abridged from בְּרַבּוֹ אֲדֹנָי אֲשֶׁר אַתֶּם מִמְקוֹר יִשְׂרָאֵל, praise ye the Lord, ye who have Israel for your fountainhead. אֲדֹנָי, in accordance with the sense, has Mugrash. Israel is here the name of the patriarch, from whom as from its fountainhead the nation has spread itself abroad; cf. Isa. xlvi. 1, li. 1, and as to the syntax מִמֶּנּוּ, those who descend from thee, Isa. lviii. 12. In the festive assembly all the tribes of Israel are represented by their princes. Two each from the southern and northern tribes are mentioned. Out of Benjamin was Israel's first king, the first royal victor over the Gentiles; and in Benjamin, according to the promise (Deut. xxxiii. 12) and according to the accounts of the boundaries (Josh. xviii. 16 sq., xv. 7 sq.), lay the sanctuary of Israel. Thus, therefore, the tribe which, according both to order of birth (Gen. xliii. 29 sqq.) and also extent of jurisdiction and numbers (1 Sam. ix. 21), was "little," was honoured beyond the others.* Judah, however, came to the throne in the person of David, and became forever the royal tribe. Zebulun and Naphtali are the tribes highly praised in Deborah's song of victory (Judg. v. 18, cf. iv. 6) on account of their patriotic bravery. רָדָם, giving no sense when taken from the well-known verb רָדַם, falls back upon רָדָה, and is consequently equivalent to רָדָם (cf. Lam. i. 13), subduing or ruling them; according to the sense, equivalent to רָדָה בָּם (1 Kings v. 30, ix. 23, 2 Chron. viii. 10), like הִפְעִילָם, not "their leader up," but ὁ ἀναγαγὼν αὐτούς, Isa. lxxiii. 11, not = רָדָהּם (like עִיִּיָהֶם, רָאִיָהֶם), which would signify their subduer or their subduers. The verb רָדָה, elsewhere to subjugate, oppress, hold down by force, Ezek. xxxiv. 4, Lev. xxv. 53, is here used of the peaceful occupation of the leader who maintains the order of a stately and gorgeous procession. For the reference to the enemies, "their subduer," is without any coherence. But to render the parallel word רִנְתָּהֶם "their (the enemies') stoning" (Hengstenberg, Vaihinger, and others, according to Böttcher's “Proben”), is, to say nothing more, devoid of taste; moreover רָגַם does not mean to throw stones with a sling, but to stone as a judicial procedure. If we assign to the verb רָגַם the primary signification congerere, accumulare, after רָגַם VIII., and רָגַם, then רָגַם רָגַם signifies their closely compacted band, as Jewish expositors have explained it (קהלם או קבוצם). Even if we connect רָגַם with רָגַם, variegare, or compare the proper name רָגַם = רָגַם, socius (Böttcher), we arrive at much the same meaning. Hupfeld’s conjecture רָגַם רָגַם is consequently unnecessary.

Vers. 29-36. The poet now looks forth beyond the domain of Israel, and describes the effects of Jahve’s deed of judgment and deliverance in the Gentile world. The language of ver. 29a is addressed to Israel, or rather to its king (lxxxvi. 16, ex. 2): God, to whom everything is subject, has given Israel וְ, victory and power over the world. Out of the consciousness that He alone can preserve Israel upon this height of power upon which it is placed, who has placed it thereon, grows the prayer: establish (עֲנֵה with ו for ו, as is frequently the case, and with the accent on the ultima on account of the following Aleph, vid. on vi. 5), Elohim, that which Thou hast wrought for us; וְ, roborare, as in Prov. viii. 28, Eccles. vii. 19, LXX. δυναμωσον, Symmachus ἐνίσχυσον. It might also be interpreted: show Thyself powerful (cf. רָגַם, xxi. 14), Thou who (Isa. xlii. 24) hast wrought for us (פָּעַל as in Isa. xliii. 13, with ל, like ל, עָשָׂה ל, Isa. lxiv. 3); but in the other way of taking it the prayer attaches itself more sequentially to what precedes, and lxii. 12 shows that וְ can also represent the neuter. Hitzig has a still different rendering: the powerful divine help, which Thou hast given us; but although הַ— instead of הַ— in the stat. construct. is Ephraimitish style (vid. on xlv. 5), yet עֲנֵה for עֲנֵה is an unknown word, and the expression “from Thy temple,” which is manifestly addressed to Elohim, shows that פָּעַל is not the language of address to the king (according to Hitzig, to Jehoshaphat). The language of prayerful address is retained in ver. 30. From the words מִהַיְבֵל עַל יְרוּשָׁלַם there is nothing to be transported to ver. 29b (Hupfeld); for ver. 30 would thereby become stunted. The words together are the statement of the starting-point of the oblations belonging to יִזְבִּילִי: starting from Thy temple, which soars aloft over Jerusalem, may kings bring Thee, who sittest enthroned there in the Holy of holies, tributary gifts (יָשׁ as in lxxvi. 12, Isa. xviii. 7). In this connection (of prayer) it is the expression of the desire that the Temple may become the zenith or cynosure, and Jerusalem the metropolis, of the world. In this passage, where it introduces the seat of religious worship, the taking of כִּי as expressing the primary cause, "because or on account of Thy Temple" (Ewald), is not to be entertained. In ver. 31 follows a summons, which in this instance is only the form in which the prediction clothes itself. The "beast of the reed" is not the lion, of which sojourn among the reeds is not a characteristic (although it makes its home inter arundineta Mesopotamiae, Ammianus, xviii. 7, and in the thickets of the Jordan, Jer. xlix. 19, l. 44, Zech. xi. 3). The reed is in itself an emblem of Egypt (Isa. xxxvi. 6, cf. xix. 6), and it is therefore either the crocodile, the usual emblem of Pharaoh and of the power of Egypt (Ezek. xxix. 3, cf. Ps. lxxiv. 13 sq.) that is meant, or even the hippopotamus (Egyptian p-ehe-môut), which also symbolizes Egypt in Isa. xxx. 6 (which see), and according to Job. xl. 21 is more appropriately than the crocodile (הַתִּנִּין אֲשֶׁר בַּיָּם, Isa. xxvii. 1) called הֵיית קֶנֶה. Egypt appears here as the greatest and most dreaded worldly power. Elohim is to check the haughty ones who exalt themselves over Israel and Israel's God. אַבְּרִים, strong ones, are bulls (xxii. 13) as an emblem of the kings; and עֲגָלִי explains itself by the genit. epexeg. עִמָּיִם: together with (Beth of the accompaniment as in ver. 31b, lxvi. 13, and beside the plur. humanus, Jer. xli. 15) the calves, viz. the peoples, over whom those bulls rule. With the one emblem of Egypt is combined the idea of defiant self-confidence, and with the other the idea of comfortable security (vid. Jer. xlvi. 20 sq.). That which is brought prominently forward as the consequence of the menace is moulded in keeping with these emblems. מְתַרְפֵּם, which has been explained by Flaminius substantially correctly: ut supplex veniat, is intended to be taken as a part. fut. (according to the Arabic grammar, حال مقدر, lit. a predisposed condition). It thus comprehensively in the singular (like עֲבַר in viii. 9) with one stroke depicts thoroughly humbled pride; for רָפַס (cf. רָמַס) signifies to stamp, pound, or trample, to knock down, and the Hithpa. either to behave as a trampling one, Prov. vi. 3, or to trample upon one's self, i.e. to cast one's self violently upon the ground. Others explain it as conculcandum se præbere; but such a meaning cannot be shown to exist in the sphere of the Hebrew Hithpael; moreover this "suffering one's self to be trampled upon" does not so well suit the words, which require a more active sense, viz. בְּרַצֵּי-כֶסֶף, in which is expressed the idea that the riches which the Gentiles have hitherto employed in the service of God-opposed worldliness, are now offered to the God of Israel by those who both in outward circumstances and in heart are vanquished (cf. Isa. lx. 9). רֵצֵן-כֶּסֶף (from רָצַן, confringere) is a piece of uncoined silver, a bar, wedge, or ingot of silver. In בָּרַח there is a wide leap from the call נִצֵּר to the language of description. This rapid change is also to be found in other instances, and more especially in this dithyrambic Psalm we may readily give up any idea of a change in the pointing, as בָּרַח or בָּרַח (LXX. διασκόρπισον); בָּרַח, as it stands, cannot be imperative (Hitzig), for the final vowel essential to the imperat. Piel is wanting. God hath scattered the peoples delighting in war; war is therefore at an end, and the peace of the world is realized.

In ver. 32, the contemplation of the future again takes a different turn: futures follow as the most natural expression of that which is future. The form יִשְׁמְרוּ, more usually found in pause, here stands pathetically at the beginning, as in Job xii. 6. הִשְׁמְרוּ, compared with the Arabic خشم (whence خشم, a nose, a word erroneously denied by Gesenius), would signify the supercilious, contemptuous (cf. <sup>ش</sup>اشم, nasutus, as an appellation of a proud person who will put up with nothing). On the other hand, compared with حشم, it would mean the fat ones, inasmuch as this verbal stem (root حش, cf. הִשְׁרַת, 2 Sam. xxii. 12), starting from the primary signification "to be pressed together," also signifies "to be compressed, become compact," i.e. to regain one's plumpness, to make flesh and fat, applied, according to the usage of the language, to wasted men and animals. The commonly compared حشيم, vir magni famulitii, is not at all natural,—a usage which is brought about by the intransitive signification proper to the verb starting from its radical signification, “to become or be angry, to be zealous about any one or anything,” inasmuch as the nomen verbale حش signifies in the concrete sense a person, or collectively persons, for whose maintenance, safety, and honour one is keenly solicitous, such as the members of the family, household attendants, servants, neighbours, clients or protégés, guest-friends; also a thing which one ardently seeks, and over the preservation of which one keeps zealous watch (Fleischer). Here there does not appear to be any connecting link whatever in the Arabic which might furnish some hold for the Hebrew; hence it will be more advisable, by comparison of הַשְׂטַל and הַשְׂנָן, to understand by הַשְׂמִינִים, the resplendent, most distinguished ones, perillustres. The dignitaries of Egypt come to give glory to the God of Israel, and Æthiopia, disheartened by fear before Jahve (cf. Hab. iii. 7), causes his hands to run to Elohim, i.e. hastens to stretch them out. Thus it is interpreted by most expositors. But if it is הַרְיִי, why is it not also הַרְיִי? We reply, the Hebrew style, even in connection with words that stand close beside one another, does not seek to avoid either the enallage generis (e.g. Job xxxix. 3, 16), or the enall. numeri (e.g. lxii. 5). But “to cause the hands to run” is a far-fetched and easily misunderstood figure. We may avoid it, if, with Böttcher and Olshausen, we disregard the accentuation and interpret thus, “Cush—his hands cause to hasten, i.e. bring on in haste (1 Sam. xvii. 17, 2 Chron. xxxv. 13), to Elohim,” viz. propitiating gifts; הַרְיִי being the predicate to הַרְיִי, according to Ges. § 146, 3.

Ver. 33. The poet stands so completely in the midst of this glory of the end, that soaring onwards in faith over all the kingdoms of the world, he calls upon them to render praise to the God of Israel. לְרִבָּב attaches itself to the dominating notion of שִׁירֵי in ver. 33a. The heavens of heavens (Deut. x. 14) are by קָרָם described as primeval (perhaps, following the order of their coming into existence, as extending back beyond the heavens that belong to our globe, of the second and fourth day of Creation). God is said to ride along in the primeval heavens of the heavens (Deut. xxxiii. 26), when by means of the cherub (xviii. 11) He extends His operations to all parts of these infinite distances and heights. The epithet "who rideth along in the heavens of heavens of the first beginning" denotes the exalted majesty of the superterrestrial One, who on account of His immanency in history is called "He who rideth along through the steppes" (רִכַּב בְּעֵרְבוֹת, ver. 5). In יִתְּן בְּקוֹלוֹ we have a repetition of the thought expressed above in ver. 12 by יִתְּן אָמְרוֹ; what is intended is God's voice of power, which thunders down everything that contends against Him. Since in the expression נָתַן בְּקוֹל (xlvi. 7, Jer. xii. 8) the voice, according to Ges. § 138, rem. 3, note, is conceived of as the medium of the giving, i.e. of the giving forth from one's self, of the making one's self heard, we must take קוֹל not as the object (as in the Latin phrase sonitum dare), but as an apposition: * behold, He maketh Himself heard with His voice, a powerful voice. Thus let them then give God קוֹל, i.e. render back to Him in praise that acknowledges His omnipotence, the omnipotence which He hath, and of which He gives abundant proof. His glory (גְּאֻלוֹהוּ) rules over Israel, more particularly as its guard and defence; His power (קוֹל), however, embraces all created things, not the earth merely, but also the loftiest regions of the sky. The kingdom of grace reveals the majesty and glory of His redemptive work (cf. Eph. i. 6), the kingdom of nature the universal dominion of His omnipotence. To this call to the kingdoms of the earth they respond in ver. 36: "Awful is Elohim out of thy sanctuaries." The words are addressed to Israel, consequently מִקְדָּשֵׁים is not the heavenly and earthly sanctuary (Hitzig), but the one sanctuary in Jerusalem (Ezek. xxi. 7 [2]) in the manifold character of its holy places (Jer. li. 51, cf. Am. vii. 9). Commanding reverence—such is the confession of the Gentile world—doth Elohim rule from thy most holy places, O Israel, the God who hath chosen thee as His mediatorial people. The second part of the confession runs: the God of Israel giveth power and abundant strength to the people, viz. whose God He is, equivalent to

* The accentuation does not decide; it admits of our taking it in both ways. Cf. xiv. 5, xli. 2, lviii. 7, lxxviii. 28, Prov. xiii. 22, xxvii. 1.

לְעַמּוֹ, xxix. 11. Israel's might in the omnipotence of God it is which the Gentile world has experienced, and from which it has deduced the universal fact of experience, ver. 36*b*. All peoples with their gods succumb at last to Israel and its God. This confession of the Gentile world closes with בְּרִינָה אֱלֹהִים (which is preceded by Mugrash transformed out of Athnach). That which the psalmist said in the name of Israel in ver. 20, "Blessed be the Lord," now re-echoes from all the world, "Blessed be Elohim." The world is overcome by the church of Jahve, and that not merely in outward form, but spiritually. The taking up of all the kingdoms of the world into the kingdom of God, this the great theme of the Apocalypse, is also after all the theme of this Psalm. The first half closed with Jahve's triumphant ascension, the second closes with the results of His victory and triumph, which embrace the world of peoples.

PSALM LXIX.

PRAYER OUT OF THE DEPTH OF AFFLICTION BORNE FOR THE SAKE OF THE TRUTH.

- 2 SAVE me, Elohim, for the waters press upon my life.
3 I have sunk in the mud of the abyss, and there is no standing;
I am fallen into the depths of the waters and a flood overfloweth me.
- 4 I am wearied by my calling, my throat is parched,
Mine eyes have failed, I who wait for my God.
- 5 More than the hairs of my head are those who hate me without a cause,
Numerous are my destroyers, mine enemies falsely—
That which I stole not, I must then restore.
- 6 Elohim, Thou knowest of my folly,
And my guiltinesses are not hidden from Thee.
- 7 Let not those be ashamed, in me, who wait on Thee, O
Lord, Jahve of hosts,
Let not those be confounded, in me, who seek Thee, O God
of Israel!

- 8 For for Thy sake have I borne reproach, Shame hath covered my face.
- 9 I am become estranged from my brethren,
And an alien to my mother's children.
- 10 For the zeal of Thy house hath consumed me,
And the reproaches of those who reproach Thee are fallen upon me.
- 11 As for me, my soul wept fasting,
And it became reproaches to me.
- 12 I made sackcloth my garment,
And became a satire to them.
- 13 Those who sit in the gate talk of me
And the music of the carousers.
- 14 Yet I, I pray to Thee, Jahve, in a time of favour,
Elohim, by reason of Thy great mercy ;
Answer me with the truth of Thy salvation !
- 15 Rescue me out of the mud, that I sink not ;
Let me be rescued from my haters and out of the depths of the waters.
- 16 Let not the flood of waters overflow me,
And let not the abyss swallow me up,
And let not the well close its mouth upon me.
- 17 Answer me, Jahve, for good is Thy loving-kindness ;
According to the abundance of Thy compassion turn Thou unto me.
- 18 And hide not Thy face from Thy servant,
For I am afraid, speedily answer me.
- 19 Draw near to my soul, redeem it,
Because of mine enemies deliver me.
- 20 Thou knowest my reproach, and my shame, and my dishonour ;
Present to Thee are all mine adversaries.
- 21 Reproach hath broken my heart, and I became sick unto
I hoped for pity, but in vain, [death ;
And for comforters—finding none.

- 22 They gave me for my meat gall,
And for my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink.
- 23 Let their table before them become a snare,
And to the unconcerned a trap.
- 24 Let their eyes be darkened that they see not,
And make their loins continually to shake.
- 25 Pour out upon them Thine indignation,
And let the burning of Thine anger seize them.
- 26 Let their village be desolate,
In their tents let there be no dweller.
- 27 For him who is smitten of Thee they persecute,
And of the pain of Thy pierced ones do they tell.
- 28 Add Thou iniquity to their iniquity,
And let them not enter into Thy righteousness.
- 29 Let them be blotted out of the book of life,
And with the righteous let them not be written down!
- 30 I, however, am afflicted and in pain,
Thy help, Elohim, shall set me up on high.
- 31 I will praise the name of Elohim with song,
And extol it with thanksgiving.
- 32 And it shall please Jahve better than young bullocks, Having horns, cleaving the hoof.
- 33 The afflicted seeing it, shall rejoice;
Ye who seek after Elohim—let your heart revive!
- 34 For observant of the needy is Jahve,
And His captives doth He not despise.
- 35 Let heaven and earth praise Him,
The seas and everything that moveth therein.
- 36 For Elohim will save Zion and build the cities of Judah,
That they may dwell there and possess them.
- 37 And the seed of His servants shall inherit them,
And those who love His name shall dwell therein.

This Psalm follows Ps. lxxviii. because in vers. 36 sq. the very same thought is expressed in unfigurative language, that we found in lxviii. 11 represented under a figure, viz. Thy creatures dwell therein. In other respects the two Psalms are as different as day and night. Ps. lxix. is not a martial and triumphal Psalm, but a Psalm of affliction which does not brighten until near the close; and it is not the church that is the speaker here, as in the preceding Psalm, but an individual. This individual, according to the inscription, is David; and if David, it is not the ideal righteous man (Hengstenberg), but David the righteous, and that when he was unjustly persecuted by Saul. The description of suffering harmonizes in many points with the Psalms belonging to the time of Saul, even the estrangement of his nearest adherents, lxix. 9, xxxi. 12 (cf. xxvii. 10); the fasting till he is thoroughly enfeebled, lxix. 11, cix. 24; the curse upon his foes, in which respect Ps. xxxv., lxix., and cix. form a fearful gradation; and the inspiring call to the saints who are his companions in suffering, lxix. 33, xxii. 27, xxxi. 25. Were there no doubt about Ps. xl. being Davidic, then the Davidic origin of Ps. lxix. would at the same time be firmly established; but instead of their inscriptions לָרוּר being mutually confirmatory, they tend, on the contrary, to shake our confidence. These two Psalms are closely related as twin-Psalms: in both the poet describes his suffering as a sinking into a miry pit; in both we meet with the same depreciation of ceremonial sacrifice; the same method of denoting a great multitude, "more than the hairs of my head," lxix. 5, xl. 13; and the same prospect of the faith of the saints being strengthened, lxix. 33, 7, xl. 17, 4.

But whilst in Ps. xl. it is more the style and in general the outward form than the contents that militate against its Davidic authorship, in Ps. lxix. it is not so much in form as in subject-matter that we find much that does not accord with David's authorship. For this reason Clericus and Vogel (in his dissertation Inscriptiones Psalmorum serius demum additas videri, 1767) have long ago doubted the correctness of the לָרוּר; and Hitzig has more fully supported the conjecture previously advanced by Seiler, von Bengel, and others, that Ps. lxix., as also Ps. xl., is by Jeremiah. The following points favour this view: (1) The martyrdom which the author endured in his zeal for the house of God, in his self-mortification, and in this consuming of himself with the scorn and deadly hostility of his foes; we may compare more particularly Jer. xv. 15-18, a confession on the part of the prophet very closely allied in spirit to both these Psalms. (2) The murderous animosity which the prophet had to endure from the men of Anathoth, Jer. xi. 18 sq., with which the complaint of the psalmist in ver. 9 fully accords. (3) The close of the Psalm, vers. 35-37, which is like a summary of that which Jeremiah foretells in the Book of the Restoration, ch. xxx.-xxxiii. (4) The peculiar character of Jeremiah's sufferings, who was cast by the princes, as being an enemy to his country, into the waterless but muddy cistern of prince Malchiah (Malkija) in the court of the guard, and there as it were buried alive. It is true, in Jer. xxxviii. 6 it is said of this cistern that there was "no water, but only mire," which seems to contradict the language of the Psalm; but since he sank into the mud, the meaning is that just then there was no water standing in it as at other times, otherwise he must at once have been drowned. Nevertheless, that he was in peril of his life is clear to us from the third kinah (Lam. ch. iii.), which in other respects also has many points of close contact with Ps. lxix.; for there in vers. 53-58 he says: "They cut off my life in the pit and cast stones at me. Waters flowed over my head; I thought: I am undone. I called upon Thy name, Jahve, out of the lowest pit. Thou didst hear my cry: Hide not Thine ear from the outpouring of my heart, from my cry for help! Thou didst draw near in the day that I cried, Thou saidst: Fear not." The view of Hitzig, that in Ps. lxix. we have this prayer out of the pit, has many things in its favour, and among them, (5) the style, which on the whole is like that of Jeremiah, and the many coincidences with the prophet's language and range of thought visible in single instances. But how could this Psalm have obtained the inscription לָרֹר? Could it be on account of the similarity between the close of Ps. lxix. and the close of Ps. xxii.? And why should not Ps. lxxi., which is to all appearance by Jeremiah, also have the inscription לָרֹר? Ps. lxix. is wanting in that imitative character by which Ps. lxxi. so distinctly points to Jeremiah. Therefore we duly recognise the instances and considerations brought forward against the Jeremianic authorship by Keil (Luth. Zeitschrift, 1860, S. 485 f.) and Kurtz (Dorpater Zeitschrift, 1865, S. 58 ff.), whilst, on the contrary, we still maintain, as formerly, that the Psalm admits of being much more satisfactorily explained from the life of Jeremiah than that of David.

The passion Psalms are the part of the Old Testament Scriptures most frequently cited in the New Testament; and after Ps. xxii. there is no Psalm referred to in so many ways as Ps. lxix. (1) The enemies of Jesus hated Him without a cause: this fact, according to John xv. 25, is foretold in ver. 5. It is more probable that the quotation by John refers to lxix. 5 than to xxxv. 19. (2) When Jesus drove the buyers and sellers out of the Temple, ver. 10a received its fulfilment, according to John ii. 17: the fierce flame of zeal against the profanation of the house of God consumes Him, and because of this zeal He is hated and despised. (3) He willingly bore this reproach, being an example to us; ver. 10b of our Psalm being, according to Rom. xv. 3, fulfilled in Him. (4) According to Acts i. 20, the imprecation in ver. 26a has received its fulfilment in Judas Iscariot. The suffixes in this passage are plural; the meaning can therefore only be that indicated by J. H. Michaelis, quod ille primus et præ reliquis hujus maledictionis se fecerit participem. (5) According to Rom. xi. 9 sq., vers. 23 sq. of the Psalm have been fulfilled in the present rejection of Israel. The apostle does not put these imprecations directly into the mouth of Jesus, just as in fact they are not appropriate to the lips of the suffering Saviour; he only says that what the psalmist there, in the zealous ardour of the prophetic Spirit—a zeal partaking of the severity of Sinai and of the spirit of Elias—invokes upon his enemies, has been completely fulfilled in those who wickedly have laid violent hands upon the Holy One of God. The typically prophetic hints of the Psalm are far from being exhausted by these New Testament quotations. One is reminded, in connection with ver. 13, of the mockery of Jesus by the soldiers in the prætorium, Matt. xxvii. 27–30; by ver. 22, of the offer of vinegar mingled with gall (according to Mark xv. 23, wine mingled with myrrh) which Jesus refused, before the crucifixion, Matt. xxvii. 34, and of the sponge dipped in vinegar which they put to the mouth of the crucified One by means of a stalk of hyssop, John xix. 29 sq. When John there says that Jesus, freely and consciously preparing Himself to die, only desired a drink in order that, according to God's appointment, the Scripture might receive its utmost fulfilment, he thereby points back to Ps. xxii. 16 and lxix. 22. And what an amount of New Testament light, so to speak, falls upon ver. 27a when we compare with it Isa. ch. liii. and Zech. xiii. 7! The whole Psalm is typically prophetic, in as far as it is a declaration of a history of life and suffering moulded by God into a factual prediction concerning Jesus the Christ, whether it be the story of a king or a prophet; and in as far as the Spirit of prophecy has even moulded the declaration itself into the language of prophecy concerning the future One.

The Psalm falls into three parts, consisting of the following strophes: (1) 3. 5. 6. 6. 7; (2) 5. 6. 7; (3) 6. 6. 6. 6. 6. Does שִׁשִּׁיִּים perhaps point to the preponderating six-line strophes under the emblem of the six-leaved lily? This can hardly be the case. The old expositors said that the Psalm was so inscribed because it treats of the white rose of the holy innocence of Christ, and of the red rose of His precious blood. רוֹזֵן properly does not signify a rose; this flower was altogether unknown in the Holy Land at the time this Psalm was written. The rose was not transplanted thither out of Central Asia until much later, and was called רוֹז (ródon); רוֹזֵן, on the other hand, is the white, and in the Holy Land mostly red, lily—certainly, as a plant, a beautiful emblem of Christ. Propter me, says Origen, qui in convalle eram, Sponsus descendit et fit lilium.

Vers. 2-14. Out of deep distress, the work of his foes, the complaining one cries for help; he thinks upon his sins, which his sufferings bring to his remembrance, but he is also distinctly conscious that he is an object of scorn and hostility for God's sake, and from His mercy he looks for help in accordance with His promises. The waters are said to rush in unto the soul (עַרְוֵנִי), when they so press upon the imperilled one that the soul, i.e. the life of the body, more especially the breath, is threatened; cf. Jonah ii. 6, Jer. iv. 10. Waters are also a figure of calamities that come on like a flood and drag one into their vortex, xviii. 17, xxxii. 6, cxxiv. 5, cf. lxvi. 12, lxxxviii. 8, 18; here, however, the figure is cut off in such a way that it conveys the impression of reality expressed in a poetical form, as in Ps. xl., and much the same as in Jonah's psalm. The soft, yielding morass is called  $\text{יִנּוּ}$ , and the eddying deep  $\text{מְעוּלָה}$ . The nomen Hophal  $\text{מְעַמְרָר}$  signifies properly a being placed, then a standing-place, or firm standing (LXX. ὑπόστασις), like  $\text{מְפָרָה}$ , that which is stretched out, extension, Isa. viii. 8.  $\text{שְׂבַלְתָּ}$  (Ephraimitish  $\text{סְבַלְתָּ}$ ) is a streaming, a flood, from  $\text{שָׂבַל}$ , سبل, to stream, flow (cf. note on lviii. 9a).  $\text{בָּאוּ אֵלַי}$ , to fall into, as in lxvi. 12, and  $\text{שָׁפַרְתָּ$  with an accusative, to overflow, as in cxxiv. 4. The complaining one is nearly drowned in consequence of his sinking down, for he has long cried in vain for help: he is wearied by continual crying ( $\text{יָגַע אֶבְרָחָם}$ , as in vi. 7, Jer. xlv. 3), his throat is parched ( $\text{יָבֵשׁוּ הַיָּרֵךְ}$  from  $\text{יָרַר}$ ; LXX. and Jerome: it is become hoarse), his eyes have failed (Jer. xiv. 6) him, who waits upon his God. The participle  $\text{מַיְיחָל}$ , equal to a relative clause, is, as in xviii. 51, 1 Kings xiv. 6, attached to the suffix of the preceding noun (Hitzig). Distinct from this use of the participle without the article is the adverbially qualifying participle in Gen. iii. 8, Cant. v. 2, cf.  $\text{יָיִן}$ , 2 Sam. xii. 21, xviii. 14. There is no necessity for the correction of the text  $\text{מִיְיחָל}$  (LXX. ἀπὸ τοῦ ἐλπίζειν με). Concerning the accentuation of  $\text{רַבִּי רַבִּי}$  vid. on xxxviii. 20. Apart from the words "more than the hairs of my head" (xl. 13), the complaint of the multitude of groundless enemies is just the same as in xxxviii. 20, xxxv. 19, cf. cix. 3, both in substance and expression. Instead of  $\text{מְצַמְיָתִי}$ , my destroyers, the Syriac version has the reading  $\text{מְעַצְמוֹתַי}$  (more numerous than my bones), which is approved by Hupfeld; but to reckon the multitude of the enemy by the number of one's own bones is both devoid of taste and unheard of. Moreover the reading of our text finds support, if it need any, in Lam. iii. 52 sq. The words, "what I have not taken away, I must then restore," are intended by way of example, and perhaps, as also in Jer. xv. 10, as a proverbial expression: that which I have not done wrong, I must suffer for (cf. Jer. xv. 10, and the similar complaint in Ps. xxxv. 11). One is tempted to take  $\text{אֲנִי}$  in the sense of "nevertheless" (Ewald), a meaning, however, which it is by no means intended to convey. In this passage it takes the place of  $\text{אֲנִי}$  (cf. οὕτως for ταῦτα, Matt. vii. 12), inasmuch as it gives prominence to the restitution desired, as an inference from a false assumption: then, although I took it not away, stole it not.

The transition from the bewailing of suffering to a confession of sin is like xl. 13. In the undeserved persecution which he endures at the hand of man, he is obliged nevertheless to recognise well-merited chastisement from the side of God. And whilst by  $\text{יָרַעַתְּ יְהוָה}$  (cf. xl. 10, Jer. xv. 15, xvii. 16, xviii. 23, and on  $\text{ל}$  as an exponent of the object, Jer. xvi. 16, xl. 2) he does not acknowledge himself to be a sinner after the standard of his own shortsightedness, but of the divine omniscience, he at the same time commends his sinful need, which with self-accusing modesty he calls  $\text{נִלְוָה}$  (xxxviii. 6) and  $\text{נִשְׁמָה}$  (2 Chron. xxviii. 10), to the mercy of the omniscient One. Should he, the sinner, be abandoned by God to destruction, then all those who are faithful in their intentions towards the Lord would be brought to shame and confusion in him, inasmuch as they would be taunted with this example.  $\text{יְיָ}$  designates the godly from the side of the  $\text{πίστις}$ , and  $\text{יְיָ קִשְׁיָהּ}$  from the side of the  $\text{ἀγάπη}$ . The multiplied names of God are so many appeals to God's honour, to the truthfulness of His covenant relationship. The person praying here is, it is true, a sinner, but that is no justification of the conduct of men towards him; he is suffering for the Lord's sake, and it is the Lord Himself who is reviled in him. It is upon this he bases his prayer in ver. 8.  $\text{יְיָ}$ , for Thy sake, as in xlv. 23, Jer. xv. 15. The reproach that he has to bear, and ignominy that has covered his face and made it quite unrecognisable (xlv. 16, cf. lxxxiii. 17), have totally estranged (xxxviii. 12, cf. lxxxviii. 9, Job xix. 13-15, Jer. xii. 6) from him even his own brethren ( $\text{אֶחָיו}$ , parallel word  $\text{אֶחָיו}$ , as in l. 20; cf., on the other hand, Gen. xlix. 8, where the interchange designedly takes another form of expression); for the glow of his zeal ( $\text{אֶחָיו}$  from  $\text{אֶחָיו}$ , according to the Arabic, to be a deep or bright red) for the house of Jahve, viz. for the sanctity of the sanctuary and of the congregation gathered about it (which is never directly called "the house of Jahve" in the Old Testament, vid. Köhler on Zech. ix. 8, but here, as in Num. xii. 7, Hos. viii. 1, is so called in conjunction with the sanctuary), as also for the honour of Him who sits enthroned therein, consumes him, like a fire burning in his bones which incessantly breaks forth and rages all through him (Jer. xx. 9, xxiii. 9), and therefore all the malice of those who are estranged from God is concentrated upon and against him.

He now goes on to describe how sorrow for the sad condition of the house of God has brought nothing but reproach to him (cf. cix. 24 sq.). It is doubtful whether נִפְשִׁי is an alternating subject to וְאִבְכָהּ (fut. consec. without being apocopated), cf. Jer. xiii. 17, or a more minutely defining accusative as in Isa. xxvi. 9 (vid. on iii. 5), or whether, together with צוֹם, it forms a circumstantial clause (et flevi dum in jejunio esset anima mea), or even whether it is intended to be taken as an accusative of the object in a pregnant construction (= בָּכָה וְנִפְשִׁי וְשָׁפַךְ נַפְשִׁי, xlii. 5, 1 Sam. i. 15): I wept away my soul in fasting. Among all these possible renderings, the last is the least probable, and the first, according to xlv. 3, lxxxiii. 19, by far the most probable, and also that which is assumed by the accentuation.* The reading of the LXX. וְאִבְכָהּ, καὶ συνέκαψα (Olshausen, Hupfeld, and Böttcher), is a very natural (xxxv. 13) exchange of the poetically bold expression for one less choice and less expressive (since עָנָה נִפְשִׁי is a phrase of the Pentateuch equivalent to צוֹם). The garb of mourning, like the fasting, is an expression of sorrow for public distresses, not, as in xxxv. 13, of personal condolence; concerning וְאִבְכָהּ, vid. on iii. 6. On account of this mourning, reproach after reproach comes upon him, and they fling gibes and raillery at him; everywhere, both in the gate, the place where the judges sit and where business is transacted, and also at carousals, he is jeered at and traduced (Lam. iii. 14, cf. v. 14, Job xxx. 9). שִׁיחַ בָּ signifies in itself fabulari de . . . without any bad secondary meaning (cf. Prov. vi. 22, confabulabitur tecum); here it is construed first with a personal and then a neuter subject (cf. Amos viii. 5), for in ver 13b neither הִיָּהִי (Job xxx. 9, Lam. iii. 14) nor אָנִי (Lam. iii. 63) is to be supplied. Ver. 14 tells us how he acts in the face of such hatred and scorn; וְאִנִּי, as in cix. 4, sarcasmis hostium suam opponit in precibus constantiam (Geier). As for himself, his prayer is directed towards Jahve at the present time, when his affliction as a witness for God gives him the assurance that He will be well-pleased to accept it (עַת רָצוֹן = בְּעַת רָצוֹן, Isa. xlix. 8). It is addressed to Him who is at the same time Jahve and Elohim,—the revealed One in connection with the history of redemption, and the absolute One in His exaltation above the world,—on the ground of the greatness and fulness of His mercy: may He then answer him with or in the truth of His salvation, i.e. the infallibility with which His purpose of mercy verifies itself in accordance with the promises given. Thus is ver. 14 to be explained in accordance with the accentuation. According to Isa. xlix. 8, it looks as though עַת רָצוֹן must be drawn to עַנִּי (Hitzig), but xxxii. 6 sets us right on this point; and the fact that בְּרַב־חַסְדְּךָ is joined to ver. 14a also finds support from v. 8. But the repetition of the divine name perplexes one, and it may be asked whether or not the accent that divides the verse into its two parts might not more properly stand beside רָצוֹן, as in xxxii. 6 beside מִצֵּיָא; so that ver. 14b runs: Elohim, by virtue of the greatness of Thy mercy hear me, by virtue of the truth of Thy salvation.

Vers. 15-22. In this second part the petition by which the first is as it were encircled, is continued; the peril grows greater the longer it lasts, and with it the importunity of the cry for help. The figure of sinking in the mire or mud and in the depths of the pit (בְּיַר, lv. 24, cf. בּוֹר, xl. 3) is again taken up, and so studiously wrought out, that the impression forces itself upon one that the poet is here describing something that has really taken place. The combination "from those who hate me and from the depths of the waters" shows that "the depths of the waters" is not a merely rhetorical figure; and the form of the prayer: let not the pit (the well-pit or covered tank) close (תִּאָּטַר with Dagesh in the Teth, in order to guard against its being read תִּאָּטַר; cf. on the signification of אָטַר, clausus = claudus, scil. manu) its mouth (i.e. its upper opening) upon me, exceeds the limits of anything that can be allowed to mere rhetoric. "Let not the water-flood overflow me" is intended to say, since it has, according to ver. 3, already happened, let it not go further to my entire destruction. The "answer me" in ver. 17a is based upon the plea that God's loving-kindness is טוֹב, i.e. good, absolutely good (as in the kindred passion-Psalm, cix. 21), better than all besides (lxiii. 4), the means of healing or salvation from all evil. On ver. 17b cf. li. 3, Lam. iii. 32. In ver. 18 the prayer is based upon the painful situation of the poet, which urgently calls for speedy help (מִיָּהֵר beside the imperative, cii. 3, cxliii. 7, Gen. xix. 22, Esth. vi. 10, is certainly itself not an imperative like הִרְבֵּה, li. 4, but an adverbial infinitive as in lxxix. 8). קִרְבָּה, or, in order to ensure the pronunciation korbah in distinction from kārbah, Deut. xv. 9, קִרְבָּה (in Baer*), is imperat. Kal; cf. the fulfilment in Lam. iii. 57. The reason assigned, "because of mine enemies," as in v. 9, xxvii. 11, and frequently, is to be understood according to xiii. 5: the honour of the all-holy One cannot suffer the enemies of the righteous to triumph over him.† The accumulation of synonyms in ver. 20 is Jeremiah's custom, ch. xiii. 14, xxi. 5, 7, xxxii. 37, and is found also in Ps. xxxi. (ver. 10) and xlv. (vers. 4, 17, 25). On הִרְפָּה שְׁבֵרָה לְבִי, cf. li. 19, Jer. xxiii. 9. The ἀπαξ γεγραμ. וְאֶנְיֹשָׁה (historical tense), from נִישׁ, is explained by אֶנְיֹשׁ from אֶנְיֹשׁ, sickly, dangerously ill, evil-disposed, which is a favourite word in Jeremiah. Moreover נָר in the signification of manifesting pity, not found elsewhere in the Psalter, is common in Jeremiah, e.g. ch. xv. 5; it signifies originally to nod to any one as a sign of a pity that sympathizes with him and recognises the magnitude of the evil. "To give wormwood for meat and מִי־רֹאשׁ to drink" is a Jeremianic (ch. viii. 14, ix. 14, xxiii. 15) designation for inflicting the extreme of pain and anguish upon one. רֹאשׁ (רֹשׁ) signifies first of all a poisonous plant with an umbellated head of flower or a capitate fruit; but then, since bitter and poisonous are interchangeable notions in the Semitic languages, it signifies gall as the bitterest of the bitter. The LXX. renders: καὶ ἔδωκαν εἰς τὸ βρώμά μου χολήν, καὶ εἰς τὴν δίψαν μου ἐπότισάν με ὄξος. Certainly בְּנִתְן־בְּ can mean to put something into something, to mix something with it, but the parallel word * Originally — was the sign for every kind of ō, hence the Masora includes the חֲטוּף also under the name קְטוּף חֲטוּף; vid. Luther. Zeitschrift, 1863, S. 412 f., cf. Wright, Genesis, p. xxix.

† Both נְבִישׁ and אֶנְיֹשׁ, contrary to logical interpunction, are marked with Munach; the former ought properly to have Dechi, and the latter Mugrash. But since neither the Athnach-word nor the Silluk-word has two syllables preceding the tone syllable, the accents are transformed according to Accentuationssystem, xviii. § 2, 4.

לְצַמְאֵי (for my thirst, i.e. for the quenching of it, Neh. ix. 15, 20) favours the supposition that the גַּ of בְּבְרִיתֵי is Beth essentialis, after which Luther renders: "they give me gall to eat." The ἄπαξ γεγραμ. בְּרִית (Lam. iv. 10 בְּרִית) signifies βρώσις, from בְּרִית, βιβρώσκειν (root βρω, Sanscrit gar, Latin vor-are).

Vers. 23-37. The description of the suffering has reached its climax in ver. 22, at which the wrath of the persecuted one flames up and bursts forth in imprecations. The first imprecation joins itself upon ver. 22. They have given the sufferer gall and vinegar; therefore their table, which was abundantly supplied, is to be turned into a snare to them, from which they shall not be able to escape, and that לְפָנֵיהֶם, in the very midst of their banqueting, whilst the table stands spread out before them (Ezek. xxiii. 41). שְׁלוֹמִים (collateral form of שְׁלָמִים) is the name given to them as being carnally secure; the word signifies the peaceable or secure in a good (lv. 21) and in a bad sense. Destruction is to overtake them suddenly, "when they say: Peace and safety" (1 Thess. v. 3). The LXX. erroneously renders: καὶ εἰς ἀνταπόδοσιν = וְלִשְׁלֹמִים. The association of ideas in ver. 24 is transparent. With their eyes they have feasted themselves upon the sufferer, and in the strength of their loins they have ill-treated him. These eyes with their bloodthirsty malignant looks are to grow blind. These loins full of defiant self-confidence are to shake (הִמְעִיר, imperat. Hiph. like הִרְחַק, Job xiii. 21, from הִמְעִיר, for which in Ezek. xxix. 7, and perhaps also in Dan. xi. 14, we find הִעִמִיר). Further: God is to pour out His wrath upon them (lxxix. 6, Hos. v. 10, Jer. x. 25), i.e. let loose against them the cosmical forces of destruction existing originally in His nature. וְעַמְּךָ has the Dagesh in order to distinguish it in pronunciation from וְעַמְּךָ. In ver. 26 טִיְרָה (from טוּר, to encircle) is a designation of an encamping or dwelling-place (LXX. ἔπαυλις) taken from the circular encampments (Arabic صيرات, sīrāt, and دوار, duār) of the nomads (Gen. xxv. 16). The laying waste and desolation of his own house is the most fearful of all misfortunes to the Semite (Job, i. 327). The poet derives the justification of such fearful imprecations from the fact that they persecute him, who is besides smitten of God, God has smitten him on account of his sins, and that by having placed him in the midst of a time in which he must be consumed with zeal and solicitude for the house of God. The suffering decreed for him by God is therefore at one and the same time suffering as a chastisement and as a witnessing for God; and they heighten this suffering by every means in their power, not manifesting any pity for him or any indulgence, but imputing to him sins that he has not committed, and requiting him with deadly hatred for benefits for which they owed him thanks.

There are also some others, although but few, who share this martyrdom with him. The psalmist calls them, as he looks up to Jahve, תְּלֵלִיךָ, Thy fatally smitten ones; they are those to whom God has appointed that they should bear within themselves a pierced or wounded heart (vid. cix. 22, cf. Jer. viii. 18) in the face of such a godless age. Of the deep grief (אֵל, as in ii. 7) of these do they tell, viz. with self-righteous, self-blinded mockery (cf. the Talmudic phrase סִפּוּר בְּלִשׁוֹן הָרַע or סִפּוּר לִשׁוֹן הָרַע, of evil report or slander). The LXX. and Syriac render יִסְפּוּ (προσέθηκαν): they add to the anguish; the Targum, Aquila, Symmachus, and Jerome follow the traditional text. Let God therefore, by the complete withdrawal of His grace, suffer them to fall from one sin into another—this is the meaning of the da culpam super culpam eorum—in order that accumulated judgment may correspond to the accumulated guilt (Jer. xvi. 18). Let the entrance into God's righteousness, i.e. His justifying and sanctifying grace, be denied to them for ever. Let them be blotted out of סִפּוּר הַיּוֹם (Ex. xxxii. 32, cf. Isa. iv. 3, Dan. xii. 1), that is to say, struck out of the list of the living, and that of the living in this present world; for it is only in the New Testament that we meet with the Book of Life as a list of the names of the heirs of the ζῶν αἰώνιος. According to the conception both of the Old and of the New Testament the צְרִיקִים are the heirs of life. Therefore ver. 29b wishes that they may not be written by the side of the righteous, who, according to Hab. ii. 4, "live," i.e. are preserved, by their faith. With אֲנִי the poet contrasts himself, as in xl. 18, with those deserving of execration. They are now on high, but in order to be brought low; he is miserable and full of poignant pain, but in order to be exalted; God's salvation will remove him from his enemies on to a height that is too steep for them (lix. 2, xci. 14). Then will he praise (הִלָּל) and magnify (גָּדַל) the Name of God with song and thankful confession. And such spiritual תודה, such thank-offering of the heart, is more pleasing to God than an ox, a bullock, i.e. a young ox (= פֶּר הַשּׁוֹר, an ox-bullock, Judg. vi. 25, according to Ges. § 113), one having horns and a cloven hoof (Ges. § 53, 2). The attributives do not denote the rough material animal nature (Hengstenberg), but their legal qualifications for being sacrificed. מִקְרָן is the name for the young ox as not being under three years old (cf. 1 Sam. i. 24, LXX. ἐν μόσχω τριετίζουτι); מִפְּרִים as belonging to the clean four-footed animals, viz. those that are cloven-footed and chew the cud, Lev. ch. xi. Even the most stately, full-grown, clean animal that may be offered as a sacrifice stands in the sight of Jahve very far below the sacrifice of grateful praise coming from the heart.

When now the patient sufferers (עֲנִיִּים) united with the poet by community of affliction shall see how he offers the sacrifice of thankful confession, they will rejoice. אֵלֶּיךָ is a hypothetical preterite; it is neither אֵלֶּיךָ (perf. consec.), nor אֵלֶּיךָ (xl. 4, lii. 8, cvii. 42, Job xxii. 19). The declaration conveying information to be expected in ver. 33b after the Waw apodoseos changes into an apostrophe of the "seekers of Elohim:" their heart shall revive, for, as they have suffered in company with him who is now delivered, they shall now also refresh themselves with him. We are at once reminded of xxii. 27, where this is as it were the exhortation of the entertainer at the thank-offering meal. It would be rash to read אֵלֶּיךָ in ver. 34, after xxii. 25, instead of אֵלֶּיךָ (Olshausen); the one object in that passage is here generalized: Jahve is attentive to the needy, and doth not despise His bound ones (cvii. 10), but, on the contrary, He takes an interest in them and helps them. Starting from this proposition, which is the clear gain of that which has been experienced, the view of the poet widens into the prophetic prospect of the bringing back of Israel out of the Exile into the Land of Promise. In the face of this fact of redemption of the future he calls upon (cf. Isa. xlv. 23) all created things to give praise to God, who will bring about the salvation of Zion, will build again the cities of Judah, and restore the land, freed from its desolation, to the young God-fearing generation, the children of the servants of God among the exiles. The feminine suffixes refer to עֲנִיִּים (cf. Jer. ii. 15, xxii. 6 Chethûb).

The tenor of Isa. lxx. 9 is similar. If the Psalm were written by David, the closing turn from ver. 34 onwards might be more difficult of comprehension than xiv. 7, li. 20 sq. If, however, it is by Jeremiah, then we do not need to persuade ourselves that it is to be understood not of restoration and re-peopling, but of continuance and completion (Hofmann and Kurtz). Jeremiah lived to experience the catastrophe he foretold; but the nearer it came to the time, the more comforting were the words with which he predicted the termination of the Exile and the restoration of Israel. Jer. xxxiv. 7 shows us how natural to him, and to him in particular, was the distinction between Jerusalem and the cities of Judah. The predictions in Jer. ch. xxxii., xxxiii., which sound so in accord with vers. 36 sq., belong to the time of the second siege. Jerusalem was not yet fallen; the strong places of the land, however, already lay in ruins.

PSALM LXX.

CRY OF A PERSECUTED ONE FOR HELP.

- 2 ELOHIM, to deliver me—
 Jahve to my help, make haste!
- 3 Let those be ashamed and confounded who seek my soul,
 Let those fall back and be put to shame who desire my
 misfortune,
- 4 Let those turn back as a reward of their shame,
 Who say: Aha, aha!
- 5 Let all those heartily rejoice in Thee who seek Thee,
 And let those continually say "Elohim be magnified" who love Thy salvation.
- 6 I, however, am needy and poor—
 Elohim, make haste unto me!
 My help and my Deliverer art Thou,
 Jahve, make no tarrying!

This short Psalm, placed after Ps. lxxix. on account of the kindred nature of its contents (cf. more especially ver. 6 with lxxix. 30), is, with but few deviations, a repetition of Ps. xl. 14

sqq. This portion of the second half of Ps. xl. is detached from it and converted into the Elohimic style. Concerning לְהַזְבִּיר, at the presentation of the memorial portion of the mincha, vid. xxxviii. 1. It is obvious that David himself is not the author of the Psalm in this stunted form. The לָרוּר is moreover justified, if he composed the original Psalm which is here modified and appropriated to a special liturgical use.

Vers. 2-4. We see at once at the very beginning, in the omission of the רָצָה (xl. 14), that what we have here before us is a fragment of Ps. xl., and perhaps a fragment that only accidentally came to have an independent existence. The לְהַזְבִּיר, which was under the government of רָצָה, now belongs to הַזְשָׁה, and the construction is without example elsewhere. In ver. 3 (= xl. 15) יָהָר and לְכַפּוֹתָהּ are given up entirely; the original is more full-toned and soaring. Instead of יִשְׁמוּ, torpescant, ver. 4a has יִשְׁבּוּ, recedant (as in vi. 11, cf. ix. 18), which is all the more flat for coming after יִסְנו אַחֲרָי. In ver. 4b, after הַמַּטְרִים the לִי, which cannot here (cf., on the contrary, xxxv. 21) be dispensed with, is wanting.

Vers. 5, 6. וַיֹּאמְרוּ instead of יֹאמְרוּ is unimportant. But since the divine name Jahve is now for once chosen side by side with Elohim, it certainly had a strong claim to be retained in ver. 5b. Instead of תִּשְׁעֶתֶךָ we have יִשְׁעֶתֶךָ here; instead of עֲזָרְתִּי, here עֲזָרִי. And instead of אֲדַעַי יִהְיֶה לִּי we have here אֲדַעַי יִהְיֶה לִּי אֱלֹהִים הַזְשָׁה לִּי,—the hope is turned into petition: make haste unto me, is an innovation in expression that is caused by the taking over of the לִי.

PSALM LXXI.

PRAYER OF A GREY-HEADED SERVANT OF GOD FOR FURTHER DIVINE AID.

- 1 IN Thee, Jahve, have I hidden, let me not be ashamed for ever.
- 2 Through Thy righteousness deliver me and rescue me,
Incline Thou Thine ear unto me and save me.

- 3 Be Thou to me a rock of habitation to take me up alway ;
Thou hast given commandment to save me,
For my rock and my fortress art Thou.
- 4 My God, rescue me out of the hand of the wicked,
Out of the grasp of the evil-doer and the violent man.
- 5 For Thou art my hope, O Lord Jahve,
My trust from my youth.
- 6 Upon Thee have I been supported from the womb, Thou art He who didst separate me from my mother's bowels,
Of Thee is my song of praise continually.
- 7 As a wonder am I to many,
But Thou art my refuge, a strong one.
- 8 My mouth shall be filled with Thy praise,
All the day long with Thy glorification.
- 9 Cast me not away in the time of old age ;
Now when my strength faileth, forsake me not !
- 10 For mine enemies speak concerning me,
And those who lie in wait for my soul take counsel together,
11 Saying : " Elohim hath forsaken him ;
Persecute and seize him, for he cannot be rescued."
- 12 Elohim, be not far from me,
My God, to my help make haste !
- 13 Let be ashamed, let vanish away, the adversaries of my soul ;
Let those be covered with reproach and dishonour who seek my hurt.
- 14 But I will hope continually,
And will yet praise Thee more and more.
- 15 My mouth shall tell of Thy righteousness,
Of Thy salvation continually, for I know not the numbers thereof.
- 16 I will come with the mighty deeds of the Lord Jahve,
I will praise Thy righteousness, Thee alone.
- 17 Elohim, Thou hast taught me from my youth up,
And until now do I declare Thy wondrous works.

- 18 Even to old age and white hairs, Elohim, forsake me not,
Till I declare Thine arm to posterity, to all that shall come Thy strength.
- 19 And Thy righteousness, Elohim, reacheth to the sky;
Thou who doest great things—Elohim, who is like Thee?!
- 20 Who hast caused us to see distresses many and sore,
Thou wilt quicken us again,
And out of the abysses of the earth Thou wilt bring us up again;
- 21 Thou wilt increase my dignity and turn Thyself to comfort me.
- 22 I will also praise Thee upon the naba, Thy truth, my God;
I will play to Thee upon the cithern, O Holy One of Israel.
- 23 My lips shall exult, when I shall harp to Thee,
And my soul, which Thou hast redeemed.
- 24 Also my tongue shall continually make known Thy righteousness,
That those are ashamed, that those are put to the blush who seek my hurt.

The Davidic Psalm lxx. is followed by an anonymous Psalm which begins like Ps. xxxi. and closes like Ps. xxxv., in which ver. 12, just like lxx. 2, is an echo of xl. 14. The whole Psalm is an echo of the language of older Psalms, which is become the mental property, so to speak, of the author, and is revived in him by experiences of a similar character. Notwithstanding the entire absence of any thorough originality, it has an individual, and in fact a Jeremianic, impress.

The following reasons decide us in considering the Psalm as coming from the pen of Jeremiah:—(1) Its relationship to Psalms of the time of David and of the earlier times of the kings, but after David, leads us down to somewhere about the age of Jeremiah. (2) This anthological weaving together of men's own utterances taken from older original passages, and this skilful variation of them by merely slight touches of his own, is exactly Jeremiah's manner. (3) In solitary instances the style of Psalm lxix., slow, loose, only sparingly adorned with figures, and here and there prosaic, closely resembles Jeremiah. also to him corresponds the situation of the poet as one who is persecuted; to him, the retrospect of a life rich in experience and full of miraculous guidings; to him, whose term of active service extended over a period of more than thirty years under Zedekiah, the transition to hoary age in which the poet finds himself; to him, the reference implied in ver. 21 to some high office; and to him, the soft, plaintive strain that pervades the Psalm, from which it is at the same time clearly seen that the poet has attained a degree of age and experience, in which he is accustomed to self-control and is not discomposed by personal misfortune. To all these correspondences there is still to be added an historical testimony. The LXX. inscribes the Psalm τῷ Δαυίδ, υἱῶν Ἰωναδάβ καὶ τῶν πρώτων αἰχμαλωτισθέντων. According to this inscription, the τῷ Δαυίδ of which is erroneous, but the second part of which is so explicit that it must be based upon tradition, the Psalm was a favourite song of the Rechabites and of the first exiles. The Rechabites are that tribe clinging to a homely nomad life in accordance with the will of their father, which Jeremiah (ch. xxxv.) holds up before the men of his time as an example of self-denying faithful adherence to the law of their father which puts them to shame. If the Psalm is by Jeremiah, it is just as intelligible that the Rechabites, to whom Jeremiah paid such a high tribute of respect, should appropriate it to their own use, as that the first exiles should do so. Hitzig infers from ver. 20, that at the time of its composition Jerusalem had already fallen; whereas in Ps. lxxix. it is only the cities of Judah that as yet lie in ashes. But after the overthrow of Jerusalem we find no circumstances in the life of the prophet, who is no more heard of in Egypt, that will correspond to the complaints of the psalmist of violence and mockery. Moreover the foe in ver. 4 is not the Chaldæan, whose conduct towards Jeremiah did not merit these names. Nor can ver. 20 have been written at the time of the second siege and in the face of the catastrophe.

Vers. 1-6. Stayed upon Jahve, his ground of trust, from early childhood up, the poet hopes and prays for deliverance out of the hand of the foe. The first of these two strophes (vers. 1-3) is taken from xxxi. 2-4, the second (vers. 4-6, with the exception of vers. 4 and 6c) from xxii. 10, 11; both, however, in comparison with Ps. lxx. exhibit the far more encroaching variations of a poet who reproduces the language of others with a freer hand. Olshausen wishes to read מָעוֹן in ver. 3, xc. 1, xci. 9, instead of מָעוֹן, which he holds to be an error in writing. But this old Mosaic, Deuteronomial word (vid. on xc. 1)—cf. the post-biblical oath הַמָּעוֹן (by the Temple!)—is unassailable. Jahve, who is called a rock of refuge in xxxi. 3, is here called a rock of habitation, i.e. a high rock that cannot be stormed or scaled, which affords a safe abode; and this figure is pursued still further with a bold remodelling of the text of xxxi. 3: לְבוֹא הַמַּיִר, constantly to go into, i.e. whither I can constantly, and therefore always, as often as it is needful, betake myself for refuge. The additional צִיִּית is certainly not equivalent to צִיָּה; it would more likely be equivalent to אֲשֶׁר צִיִּית; but probably it is an independent clause: Thou hast (in fact) commanded, i.e. unalterably determined (xliv. 5, lxxviii. 29, cxxxiii. 3), to show me salvation, for my rock, etc. To the words לְבוֹא הַמַּיִר צִיִּית corresponds the expression לְבֵית מְצוּרוֹת in xxxi. 3, which the LXX. renders καὶ εἰς οἶκον καταφυγῆς, whereas instead of the former three words it has καὶ εἰς τόπον ὄχυρόν, and seems to have read לְבֵית מְצוּרוֹת, cf. Dan. xi. 15 (Hitzig). In ver. 5, Thou art my hope reminds one of the divine name מְקוֹה יִשְׂרָאֵל in Jer. xvii. 13, l. 7 (cf. ἡ ἐλπίς ἡμῶν used of Christ in 1 Tim. i. 1, Col. i. 27). גִּסְמַמְתִּי is not less beautiful than הִשְׁלַמְתִּי in xxii. 11. In its incipient slumbering state (cf. iii. 6), and in its self-conscious continuance, He was and is the upholding prop and the supporting foundation, so to speak, of my life. And גִּוִּי instead of גְּחִי in xxii. 10, is just such another felicitous modification. It is impracticable to define the meaning of this גִּוִּי according to גָּוָה = גָּוָה, جزأ, retribuere (prop. to cut up, distribute), because גָּוָה is the representative of this Aramæo-Arabic verb in the Hebrew. Still less, however, can it be derived from גָּוָה, transire, the participle of which, if it would admit of a transitive meaning = מוֹצִיאִי (Targum), ought to be גָּוִי. The verb גָּוָה, in accordance with its radical signification of abscindere (root גָּו, synon. קָץ, קָר, קָט, and the like), denotes in this instance the separating of the child from the womb of the mother, the retrospect going back from youth to childhood, and even to his birth. The LXX. σκειπαστής (μου) is an erroneous reading for ἐκσπαστής, as is clear from xxii. 10, ὁ ἐκσπάσας με. אֶלְלֵלְךָ, xliv. 9 (cf. אֶשִׁיחַ, lxix. 13), is at the bottom of the expression in ver. 6c. The God to whom he owes his being, and its preservation thus far, is the constant, inexhaustible theme of his praise.

Vers. 7-12. Brought safely through dangers of every kind, he is become פְּמוֹיֶת, as a wonder, a miracle (Arabic أَفْت from أَفْت, cognate أَفَك, אָפַק, to bend, distort: a turning round, that which is turned round or wrenched, i.e. that which is contrary to what is usual and looked for) to many, who gaze upon him as such with astonishment (xl. 4). It is his God, however, to whom, as hitherto so also in time to come, he will look to be thus wonderfully preserved: מִמְּסִיעוֹ, as in 2 Sam. xxii. 33. יָי is a genitive, and the suffix is thrown back (vid. supra, vol. i. 274) in order that what God is to, and does for, the poet may be brought forward more clearly and independently [lit. unalloyed]. Ver. 8 tells us what it is that he firmly expects on the ground of what he possesses in God. And on this very ground arises the prayer of ver. 9 also: Cast me not away (viz. from Thy presence, li. 13, Jer. vii. 15, and frequently) in the time (לְעֵת, as in Gen. viii. 11) of old age—he is therefore already an old man (זָקֵן), though only just at the beginning of the זְקִינָה. He supplicates favour for the present and for the time still to come: now that my vital powers are failing, forsake me not! Thus he prays because he, who has been often wondrously delivered, is even now threatened by foes. Ver. 11, introduced by means of ver. 10, tells us what their thoughts of him are, and what they purpose doing. לִי, ver. 10a, does not belong to אֲוִיבֵי, as it does not in xxvii. 2 also, and elsewhere. The לִי is that of relation or of reference, as in xli. 6. The unnecessary לִי אֲמַר betrays a poet of the later period; cf. cv. 11, cxix. 82 (where it was less superfluous), and on the contrary, lxxxiii. 5 sq. The later poet also reveals himself in ver. 12, which is an echo of very similar prayers of David in xxii. 12, 20 (xl. 14, cf. lxx. 2), xxxv. 22, xxxviii. 22 sq. The Davidic style is to be discerned here throughout in other points also. In place of הִישָׁה the Keri substitutes הִישָׁה, which is the form exclusively found elsewhere.

Vers. 13-18. In view of xl. 15 (lxx. 3), xxxv. 4, 26, cix.

29, and other passages, the reading of יִפְלְמוּ, with the Syriac, instead of יָבִילִי in ver. 13a commends itself; but there are also other instances in this Psalm of a modification of the original passages, and the course of the thoughts is now climactic: confusion, ruin (cf. vi. 11), and in fact ruin accompanied by reproach and shame. This is the fate that the poet desires for his deadly foes. In prospect of this he patiently composes himself, ver. 14a (cf. xxxi. 25); and when righteous retribution appears, he will find new matter and ground and motive for the praise of God in addition to all such occasion as he has hitherto had. The late origin of the Psalm betrays itself again here; for instead of the præt. Hiph. הוֹסִיף (which is found only in the Books of Kings and in Ecclesiastes), the older language made use of the præt. Kal. Without ceasing shall his mouth tell (סִפֵּר, as in Jer. li. 10) of God's righteousness, of God's salvation, for he knows not numbers, i.e. the counting over or through of them (cxxxix. 17 sq.); * the divine proofs of righteousness or salvation עֲצָמוּ מִיַּפֵּר (xl. 6), they are in themselves endless, and therefore the matter also which they furnish for praise is inexhaustible. He will tell those things which cannot be so reckoned up; he will come with the mighty deeds of the Lord Jahve, and with praise acknowledge His righteousness, Him alone. Since נִבְרוֹת, like the New Testament δυνάμεις, usually signifies the proofs of the divine נְבוּרָה (e.g. xx. 7), the Beth is the Beth of accompaniment, as e.g. in xl. 8, lxvi. 13. בוא ב, venire cum, is like (أتى) جَاءَ ب, equivalent to afferre, he will bring the proofs of the divine power, this rich material, with him. It is evident from vers. 18 sq. that בגבורת does not refer to the poet (in the fulness of divine strength), but, together with צדקתך, forms a pair of words that have reference to God. לְבִרְךָ, according to the sense, joins closely upon the suffix of צִדְקָתְךָ (cf. lxxxiii. 19): Thy righteousness (which has been in mercy turned towards me), Thine alone (te solum = tui solius). From youth up God has instructed him, viz. in His ways (xxv. 4), which are worthy of all praise, and hitherto (עֲרֵי־הַיָּהוָה), found only in this passage in the Psalter, and elsewhere almost entirely confined to prose) has he, "the taught of Jahve" (לְמוֹד ה'), had to praise the wonders of His rule and of His leadings. May God, then, not forsake him even further on עֲרֵי־זִקְנָה וְשִׁיבָה. The poet is already old (זִקֵן), and is drawing ever nearer to שִׁיבָה, silvery, hoary old age (cf. 1 Sam. xii. 2). May God, then, in this stage of life also to which he has attained, preserve him in life and in His favour, until (עַר = עֲרֵי־אֶשֶׁר, as in cxxxii. 5, Gen. xxxviii. 11, and frequently) he shall have declared His arm, i.e. His mighty interposition in human history, to posterity (דוֹר), and to all who shall come (supply אֶשֶׁר), i.e. the whole of the future generation, His strength, i.e. the impossibility of thwarting His purposes. The primary passage for this is xxii. 31 sq.

Vers. 19-24. The thought of this proclamation so thoroughly absorbs the poet that he even now enters upon the tone of it; and since to his faith the deliverance is already a thing of the past, the tender song with its uncomplaining prayer dies away into a loud song of praise, in which he pictures it all to himself. Without vers. 19-21 being subordinate to עֲרֵי־אֲנִי in ver. 18, וְצִדְקָתְךָ is coupled by close connection with גְּבוּרַתְךָ. Ver. 19a is an independent clause; and עֲרֵי־מְרוֹם takes the place of the predicate: the righteousness of God exceeds all bounds, is infinite (xxxvi. 6 sq., lvii. 11). The cry כִּי כְמוֹד, as in xxxv. 10, lxxxix. 9, Jer. x. 6, refers back to Ex. xv. 11. According to the Chetâb, the range of the poet's vision widens in ver. 20 from the proofs of the strength and righteousness of God which he has experienced in his own case to those which he has experienced in common with others in the history of his own nation. The Kerî (cf. on the other hand lx. 5, lxxxv. 7, Dent. xxxi. 17) rests upon a failing to discern how the experience of the writer are interwoven with those of the nation. הַתְּשׁוּבָה in both instances supplies the corresponding adverbial notion to the principal verb, as in lxxxv. 7 (cf. li. 4). הַתְּרוֹם, prop. a rumbling, commonly used of a deep heaving of waters, here signifies an abyss. "The abysses of the earth" (LXX. ἐκ τῶν ἀβύσσων τῆς γῆς, just as the old Syriac version renders the New Testament ἀβυσσος, e.g. in Luke viii. 31, by ܐܘܨܘܨܐ) are, like the gates of death (ix. 14), a figure of extreme perils and dangers, in the midst of which one is as it were half hidden in the abyss of Hades. The past and future are clearly distinguished in the sequence of the tenses. When God shall again raise His people out of the depth of the present catastrophe, then will He also magnify the גְּדֻלָּהּ of the poet, i.e. the dignity of his office, by most brilliantly vindicating him in the face of his foes, and will once more (תְּסוּבָה, fut. Niph. like הִשְׁוֹב above) comfort him. He on his part will also (cf. Job xl. 14) be grateful for this national restoration and this personal vindication: he will praise God, will praise His truth, i.e. His fidelity to His promises. בְּבִלְי־נְבִל instead of בְּנְבִל sounds more circumstantial than in the old poetry. The divine name "The Holy One of Israel" occurs here for the third time in the Psalter; the other passages are lxxviii. 41, lxxxix. 19, which are older in time, and older also than Isaiah, who uses it thirty times, and Habakkuk, who uses it once. Jeremiah has it twice (ch. l. 29, li. 5), and that after the example of Isaiah. In vers. 23, 24a the poet means to say that lips and tongue, song and speech, shall act in concert in the praise of God. תְּרַנְּנָה with Dagesh also in the second Nun, after the form תְּקוּנְנָה, תְּשׁוּבָנָה, side by side with which we also find the reading תְּרַנְּנָה, and the reading תְּרַנְּנָה, which is in itself admissible, after the form תְּאֲמִנָה, תְּעַנְּנָה, but is here unattested.* The cohortative after בִּי (LXX. ὄταν) is intended to convey this meaning: when I feel myself impelled to harp unto Thee. In the perfects in the closing line that which is hoped for stands before his soul as though it had already taken place. כִּי is repeated with triumphant emphasis.

* Heidenheim reads תְּרַנְּנָה with Segol, following the statement of Ibn-Bil'am in his מְעַמֵי הַמִּקְרָא and of Mose ha-Nakdan in his דְּרָבֵי הַנְּקוּד, that Segol always precedes the ending נָה, with the exception only of הִנְהָה and הִיאֲזוּנָה. Baer, on the other hand, reads תְּרַנְּנָה, following Aben-Ezra and Kimchi (Michlol 66b).

PSALM LXXII.

PRAYER FOR THE DOMINION OF PEACE OF THE ANointed ONE OF GOD.

- 1 ELOHIM, give Thy rights unto the king,
And Thy righteousness unto the king's son.
- 2 May he govern Thy people with uprightness,
And Thine afflicted with justice.
- 3 May the mountains bring peace to the people,
And the hills by righteousness.
- 4 May he judge the afflicted among the people,
Save the children of the needy, and crush the oppressor.

- 5 May they fear Thee as long as the sun,
And before the moon to all generations.
- 6 May he come down like rain upon the meadow-grass,
As showers, a heavy rain upon the earth.
- 7 In his days may the righteous flourish,
And abundance of peace, till the moon be no more.
- 8 And may he have dominion from sea to sea,
And from the river unto the ends of the earth.

- 9 Before him shall the inhabitants of the wilderness bow,
And his enemies shall lick the dust.
- 10 The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring gifts,
The kings of Saba and Meroë shall offer tribute.
- 11 And all kings shall do homage to him,
All peoples shall serve him.

- 12 For he shall deliver the needy who crieth,
And the afflicted who have no succour.
- 13 He shall deal gently with the poor and needy,
And help the souls of the needy ;
- 14 From oppression and violence he shall redeem their soul,
And precious is their blood in his eyes :
- 15 And he shall live, and he will present him with gold of Saba,
And he will pray for him always, bless him continually.

- 16 May there be abundance of corn in the land unto the top of the mountains,
May its fruit wave like Lebanon,
And may they blossom out of cities like the herbs of the earth.
- 17 May his name endure for ever,
Before the sun may his name throw out shoots.
And may they bless themselves in him, may all peoples call him blessed.
- 18 BLESSED BE JAHVE ELOHIM THE GOD OF ISRAEL, WHO ALONE DOETH WONDROUS THINGS.
- 19 AND BLESSED BE HIS GLORIOUS NAME FOR EVER, AND LET THE WHOLE EARTH BE FILLED WITH HIS GLORY.

AMEN, AND AMEN.

- 20 Ended are the prayers of David the son of Jesse.

This last Psalm of the primary collection, united to Ps. lxxi. by community of the prominent word צדקתך, appears, as we look to the superscription, lxxii. 20, to be said to be a Psalm of David; so that consequently לְשִׁלְמֹה designates Solomon as the subject, not the author. But the Lamed of לְשִׁלְמֹה here and in cxxvii. 1 cannot have any other meaning than that which the Lamed always has at the head of the Psalms when it is joined to proper names; it is then always the expression denoting that the Psalm belongs to the person named, as its author. Then in style and general character the Psalm has not the least kinship with the Psalms of David. Characteristic of Solomon, on the other hand, are the movement proverb-like, and for the most part distichic, which has less of original freshness and directness than of an artificial, reflective, and almost sluggish manner, the geographic range of view, the richness in figures drawn from nature, and the points of contact with the Book of Job, which belongs incontrovertibly to the circle of the Salomonic literature: these are coincident signs which are decisive in favour of Solomon. But if Solomon is the author, the question arises, who is the subject of the Psalm? According to Hitzig, Ptolemy Philadelphus; but no true Israelite could celebrate him in this manner, and there is no reliable example of carmina of this character having found their way into the song-book of Israel. The subject of the Psalm is either Solomon (LXX. εις Σαλωμών) or the Messiah (Targum, "O God, give Thy regulations of right to the King Messiah, אֱלֹהֵינוּ מְשִׁיחָנוּ"). Both are correct. It is Solomon himself to whom the intercession and desires of blessing of this Psalm refer. Solomon, just as David with Psalms xx. and xxi., put it into the heart and mouth of the people, probably very soon after his accession, it being as it were a church-prayer on behalf of the new, reigning king. But the Psalm is also none the less Messianic, and with perfect right the church has made it the chief Psalm of the festival of Epiphany, which has received its name of festum trium regum out of it.

Solomon was in truth a righteous, benign, God-fearing ruler; he established and also extended the kingdom; he ruled over innumerable people, exalted in wisdom and riches above all the kings of the earth; his time was the most happy, the richest in peace and joy that Israel has ever known. The words of the Psalm were all fulfilled in him, even to the one point of the universal dominion that is wished for him. But the end of his reign was not like the beginning and the middle of it. That fair, that glorious, that pure image of the Messiah which he had represented waxed pale; and with this fading away its development in relation to the history of redemption took a new turn. In the time of David and of Solomon the hope of believers, which was attached to the kingship of David, had not yet fully broken with the present. At that time, with few exceptions, nothing was known of any other Messiah than the Anointed One of God, who was David or Solomon himself. When, however, the kingship in these its two most glorious impersonations had proved itself unable to bring to full realization the idea of the Messiah or of the Anointed One of God, and when the line of kings that followed thoroughly disappointed the hope which clung to the kingship of the present,—a hope which here and there, as in the reign of Hezekiah, blazed up for a moment and then totally died out, and men were driven from the present to look onward into the future,—then, and not until then, did any decided rupture take place between the Messianic hope and the present. The image of the Messiah is now painted on the pure ethereal sky of the future (though of the immediate future) in colours which were furnished by older unfulfilled prophecies, and by the contradiction between the existing kingship and its idea; it becomes more and more, so to speak, an image, super-earthly, super-human, belonging to the future, the invisible refuge and invisible goal of a faith despairing of the present, and thereby rendered relatively more spiritual and heavenly (cf. the Messianic image painted in colours borrowed from our Psalm in Isa. ch. xi., Mic. v. 3, 6, Zech. ix. 9 sq.). In order rightly to estimate this, we must free ourselves from the prejudice that the centre of the Old Testament proclamation of salvation [or gospel] lies in the prophecy of the Messiah. Is the Messiah, then, anywhere set forth as the Redeemer of the world? The Redeemer of the world is Jahve. The appearing (parusia) of Jahve is the centre of the Old Testament proclamation of salvation. An allegory may serve to illustrate the way in which the Old Testament proclamation of salvation unfolds itself. The Old Testament in relation to the Day of the New Testament is Night. In this Night there rise in opposite directions two stars of Promise. The one describes its path from above downwards: it is the promise of Jahve who is about to come. The other describes its path from below upwards: it is the hope which rests on the seed of David, the prophecy of the Son of David, which at the outset assumes a thoroughly human, and merely earthly character. These two stars meet at last, they blend together into one star; the Night vanishes and it is Day. This one Star is Jesus Christ, Jahve and the Son of David in one person, the King of Israel and at the same time the Redeemer of the world,—in one word, the God-man.

Vers. 1-4. The name of God, occurring only once, is Elohim; and this is sufficient to stamp the Psalm as an Elohimic Psalm. מֶלֶךְ (cf. xxi. 2) and מֶלֶךְ־מֶלֶךְ are only used without the article according to a poetical usage of the language. The petition itself, and even the position of the words, show that the king's son is present, and that he is king; God is implored to bestow upon him His מִשְׁפָּטִים, i.e. the rights or legal powers belonging to Him, the God of Israel, and נְדָרָהּ, i.e. the official gift in order that he may exercise those rights in accordance with divine righteousness. After the supplicatory וְ the futures which now follow, without the Waw apodoseos, are manifestly optatives. Mountains and hills describe synecdochically the whole land of which they are the high points visible afar off. נֶשֶׁא is used in the sense of פְּרִי נֶשֶׁא Ezek. xvii. 8: may שְׂלוֹם be the fruit which ripens upon every mountain and hill; universal prosperity satisfied and contented within itself. The predicate for ver. 3*b* is to be taken from ver. 3*a*, just as, on the other hand, בְּצִדְקָה, "in or by righteousness," the fruit of which is indeed peace (Isa. xxxii. 17), belongs also to ver. 3*a*; so that consequently both members supplement one another. The wish of the poet is this: By righteousness, may there in due season be such peaceful fruit adorning all the heights of the land. Ver. 3*b*, however, always makes one feel as though a verb were wanting, like הִפְרִיחֶנָּה suggested by Böttcher. In ver. 4 the wishes are continued in plain unfigurative language. הוֹשִׁיעַ in the signification to save, to obtain salvation for, has, as is frequently the case, a dative of the object. בְּגֵי-אֶבְיֹוֹן are those who are born to poverty, just like בְּרִמְקָה, one who is born a king. Those who are born to poverty are more or less regarded, by an unrighteous government, as having no rights.

Vers. 5-8. The invocation of ver. 1 is continued in the form of a wish: may they fear Thee, Elohim, עַם-יִשְׂרָאֵל, with the sun, i.e. during its whole duration (עַם in the sense of cotemporary existence, as in Dan. iii. 33). לְבַנְיָמִן, in the moonlight (cf. Job viii. 16, לְבַנְיָשֶׁמֶשׁ, in the sunshine), i.e. so long as the moon shines. יוֹר דְּוָרִים (accusative of the duration of time, cf. cii. 25), into the uttermost generation which outlasts the other generations (like שְׁמַי הַשָּׁמַיִם of the furthest heavens which surround the other heavens). The first two periphrastic expressions for unlimited time recur in Ps. lxxxix. 37 sq., a Psalm composed after the time of Solomon; cf. the unfigurative expression in Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the Temple in 1 Kings viii. 40. The continuance of the kingship, from the operation of which such continuance of the fear of God is expected, is not asserted until ver. 17. It is capricious to refer the language of address in ver. 5 to the king (as Hupfeld and Hitzig do), who is not directly addressed either in ver. 4, or in ver. 6, or anywhere in the Psalm. With respect to God the desire is expressed that the righteous and benign rule of the king may result in the extension of the fear of God from generation to generation into endless ages. The poet in ver. 6 delights in a heaping up of synonyms in order to give intensity to the expression of the thoughts, just as in ver. 5; the last two expressions stand side by side one another without any bond of connection as in ver. 5. רַב־רַבִּים (from רַב־ב, רַב־ב, densum, spissum esse, and then, starting from this signification, sometimes multum and sometimes magnum esse) is the shower of rain pouring down in drops that are close together; nor is רַב־רַבִּים a synonym of רַב־ב, but (formed from רַב־ב, רַב־ב, to flow, by means of a rare reduplication of the first two letters of the root, Ew. § 157, d) properly the water running from a roof (cf. B. Joma 87a: "when the maid above poured out water, רַב־רַבִּים came upon his head"). רַב־ב, however, is not the meadow-shearing, equivalent to a shorn, mown meadow, any more than רַב־ב, רַב־ב, Arabic g'izza, signifies a shorn hide, but, on the contrary, a hide with the wool or feathers (e.g. ostrich feathers) still upon it, rather a meadow, i.e. grassy plain, that is intended to be mown. The closing word אֶרֶץ (accus. loci as in cxlvii. 15) unites itself with the opening word יֵרֵד: descendat in terram. In his last words (2 Sam. ch. xxiii.) David had compared the effects of the dominion of his successor, whom he beheld as by vision, to the fertilizing effects of the sun and of the rain upon the earth. The idea of ver. 6 is that Solomon's rule may prove itself thus beneficial for the country. The figure of the rain in ver. 7 gives birth to another: under his rule may the righteous blossom (expanding himself unhindered and under the most favourable circumstances), and (may there arise) salvation in all fulness יְרֵחַ עַד־בְּלֵי יָרֵחַ, until there is no more moon (cf. the similar expression in Job xiv. 12). To this desire for the uninterrupted prosperity and happiness of the righteous under the reign of this king succeeds the desire for an unlimited extension of his dominion, ver. 8. The sea (the Mediterranean) and the river (the Euphrates) are geographically defined points of issue, whence the definition of boundary is extended into the unbounded. Solomon even at his accession ruled over all kingdoms from the Euphrates as far as the borders of Egypt; the wishes expressed here are of wider compass, and Zechariah repeats them predictively (ch. ix. 10) with reference to the King Messiah.

Vers. 9-11. This third strophe contains prospects, the ground of which is laid down in the fourth. The position of the futures here becomes a different one. The contemplation passes from the home relations of the new government to its foreign relations, and at the same time the wishes are changed into hopes. The awe-commanding dominion of the king shall stretch even into the most distant corners of the desert. יָיִם is used both for the animals and the men who inhabit the desert, to be determined in each instance by the context; here they are men beyond all dispute, but in lxxiv. 14, Isa. xxiii. 13, it is matter of controversy whether men or beasts are meant. Since the LXX., Aquila, Symmachus, and Jerome here, and the LXX. and Jerome in lxxiv. 14, render Aithiopes, the nomadic tribes right and left of the Arabian Gulf seem traditionally to have been associated in the mind with this word, more particularly the so-called Ichthyophagi. These shall bend the knee reverentially before him, and those who contend against him shall be compelled at last to veil their face before him in the dust. The remotest west and south become subject and tributary to him, viz. the kings of Tartessus in the south of Spain, rich in silver, and of the islands of the Mediterranean and the countries on its coasts, that is to say, the kings of the Polynesian portion of Europe, and the kings of the Cushitish or of the Joktanitish אֲשֵׁר and of the Cushitish אֲבֵר, as, according to Josephus, the chief city of Meroë was called (vid. Genesis, S. 206). It was a queen of that Joktanitish, and therefore South Arabian Sheba,—perhaps, however, more correctly (vid. Wetzstein in my Isaiah, ii. 529) of the Cushitish (Nubian) Sheba,—whom the fame of Solomon's wisdom drew towards him, 1 Kings ch. x. The idea of their wealth in gold and in other precious things is associated with both peoples. In the expression הֵשִׁיב מִנְחָה (to pay tribute, 2 Kings xvii. 3, cf. iii. 4) the tribute is not conceived of as rendered in return for protection afforded (Maurer, Hengstenberg, and Olshausen), nor as an act repeated periodically (Rödiger, who refers to 2 Chron. xxvii. 5), but as a bringing back, i.e. repayment of a debt, referre s. reddere debitum (Hupfeld), after the same idea according to which obligatory incomings are called reditus (revenues). In the synonymous expression הִקְרִיב אֲשֵׁר the presentation appears as an act of sacrifice. אֲשֵׁר signifies in Ezek. xxvii. 15 a payment made in merchandise, here a rent or tribute due, from שָׁכַר, which in blending with the Aleph prostheticum has passed over into שָׁכַר by means of a shifting of the sound after the Arabic manner, just as in אֶשְׁכַּל the verb שָׁכַל, to interweave, passes over into שָׁכַל (Rödiger in Gesenius' Thesaurus). In ver. 11 hope breaks through every bound: everything shall submit to his world-subduing sceptre.

Vers. 12-15. The confirmation of these prospects is now given. Voluntative forms are intermingled because the prospect extending into the future is nevertheless more lyrical than prophetic in its character. The elevation of the king to the dominion of the world is the reward of his condescension; he shows himself to be the helper and protecting lord of the poor and the oppressed, who are the especial object upon which God's eye is set. He looks upon it as his task to deal most sympathizingly and most considerately (יָחֵם) just with those of reduced circumstances and with the poor, and their blood is precious in his eyes. Ver. 12 is re-echoed in Job xxix. 12. The meaning of ver. 14b is the same as cxvi. 15. Instead of יָקַר, by a retention of the Jod of the stem it is written יָקַר. Just as in xlix. 10, יִקָּר here also is followed by יָחֵי. The assertion is individualized: and he (who was threatened with death) shall live (voluntative, having reference to the will of the king). But who is now the subject to יָחֵי? Not the rescued one (Hitzig), for after the foregoing designations (vers. 11 sq.) we cannot expect to find "the gold of Sheba" (gold from Jeman or Æthiopia) in his possession. Therefore it is the king, and in fact Solomon, of whom the disposal of the gold of Sheba (Saba) is characteristic. The king's thought and endeavour are directed to this, that the poor man who has almost fallen a victim shall live or revive, and not only will he maintain his cause, he will also bestow gifts upon him with a liberal hand, and he (the poor one who has been rescued and endowed from the riches of the king) shall pray unceasingly for him (the king) and bless him at all times. The poor one is he who is restored to life and endowed with gifts, and who intercedes and blesses; the king, however, is the beneficent giver. It is left for the reader to supply the right subjects in thought to the separate verbs. That clearly marked precision which we require in rhetorical recital is alien to the Oriental style (vid. my Geschichte der jüdischen Poesie, S. 189). Maurer and Hofmann also give the same interpretation as we have done.

Vers. 16, 17. Here, where the futures again stand at the head of the clauses, they are also again to be understood as optatives. As the blessing of such a dominion after God's heart, not merely fertility but extraordinary fruitfulness may be confidently desired for the land. פֶּסֶה (ἀπ. λεγ.), rendered by the Syriac version sugo, abundance, is correctly derived by the Jewish lexicographers from פָּסַם = פִּשָּׁה (in the law relating to leprosy), Mishnic פֶּסֶה, Aramaic פֶּסֶה, Arabic فِشَا, but also فِش (vid. Job, ii. 275), to extend, expandere; so that it signifies an abundance that occupies a broad space. בְּרֵאשׁ, unto the summit, as in xxxvi. 6, xix. 5. The idea thus obtained is the same as when Hofmann (Weissagung und Erfüllung, i. 180 f.) takes פֶּסֶה (from פָּסַם = נָפַם) in the signification of a boundary line: "close upon the summit of the mountain shall the last corn stand," with reference to the terrace-like structure of the heights. פִּרְיֵי does not refer back to בֹּאֲרֵץ (Hitzig, who misleads one by referring to Joel ii. 3), but to בָּר: may the corn stand so high and thick that the fields, being moved by the wind, shall shake, i.e. wave up and down, like the lofty thick forest of Lebanon. The LXX., which renders ὑπεραρθῆσεται, takes ירעש for יראש, as Ewald does: may its fruit rise to a summit, i.e. rise high, like Lebanon. But a verb יראש is unknown; and how bombastic is this figure in comparison with that grand, but beautiful figure, which we would not willingly exchange even for the conjecture יַעֲשֶׂר (may it be rich)! The other wish refers to a rapid, joyful increase of the population: may men blossom out of this city and out of that city as the herb of the earth (cf. Job v. 25, where צִמְצִיז also accords in sound with יַעֲצִיז), i.e. fresh, beautiful, and abundant as it. Israel actually became under Solomon's sceptre as numerous "as the sand by the sea" (1 Kings iv. 20), but increase of population is also a settled feature in the picture of the Messianic time (cx. 3, Isa. ix. 2, xlix. 20, Zech. ii. 8 [4]; cf. Sir. xlv. 21). If, however, under the just and benign rule of the king, both land and people are thus blessed, eternal duration may be desired for his name. May this name, is the wish of the poet, ever send forth new shoots (יִרְיֵי Chethib), or receive new shoots (קֵרִי Kerî, from Niph. קָנַן), as long as the sun turns its face towards us, inasmuch as the happy and blessed results of the dominion of the king ever afford new occasion for glorifying his name. May they bless themselves in him, may all nations call him blessed, and that, as וַיְבָרְכוּ בוֹ * implies, so blessed that his abundance of blessing appears to them to be the highest that they can desire for themselves. To et benedicant sibi in eo we have to supply in thought the most universal, as yet undefined subject, which is then more exactly defined as omnes gentes with a second synonymous predicate. The accentuation (Athnach, Mugrash, Silluk) is blameless.

Vers. 18, 19. Closing Beracha of the Second Book of the Psalter. It is more full-toned than that of the First Book, and God is intentionally here called Jahve Elohim the God of Israel because the Second Book contains none but Elohim-Psalms, and not, as there, Jahve the God of Israel. "Who alone doeth wonders" is a customary praise of God, lxxxvi. 10, cxxxvi. 4, cf. Job ix. 8. שֵׁם כְּבוֹדוֹ is a favourite word in the language of divine worship in the period after the Exile (Neh. ix. 5); it is equivalent to the שֵׁם כְּבוֹד מְלִכּוּתוֹ in the liturgical Beracha, God's glorious name, the name that bears the impress of His glory. The closing words: and let the whole earth be full, etc., are taken from Num. xiv. 21. Here, as there, the construction of the active with a double accusative of that which fills and that which is to be filled is retained in connection with the passive; for כְּבוֹדוֹ is also accusative: let be filled with His glory the whole earth (let one make it full of it). The וַיְבָרְכוּ coupled by means of Waw is, in the Old Testament, exclusively peculiar to these doxologies of the Psalter.

Ver. 20. Superscription of the primary collection. The origin of this superscription cannot be the same as that of the doxology, which is only inserted between it and the Psalm, because it was intended to be read with the Psalm at the reading in the course of the service (Symbolæ, p. 19). בְּקִלּוֹ = בְּקִלּוֹ, like בְּהִלּוֹ in xxxvi. 13, בְּקִפּוֹ, lxxx. 11, all being Pual forms, as is manifest in the accented ultima. A parallel with this verse is the superscription "are ended the words of Job" in Job xxxi. 40, which separates the controversial speeches and Job's monologue from the speeches of God. No one taking a survey of the whole Psalter, with the many Psalms of David that follow beyond Ps. lxxii., could possibly have placed this key-stone here. If, however, it is more ancient than the doxological division into five books, it is a significant indication in relation to the history of the rise of the collection. It proves that the collection of the whole as it now lies before us was at least preceded by one smaller collection, of which we may say that it extended to Ps. lxxii., without thereby meaning to maintain that it contained all the Psalms up to that one, since several of them may have been inserted into it when the redaction of the whole took place. But it is possible for it to have contained Ps. lxxii., since at the earliest it was only compiled in the time of Solomon. The fact that the superscription following directly upon a Psalm of Solomon is thus worded, is based on the same ground as the fact that the whole Psalter is quoted in the New Testament as Davidic. David is the father of the 'שִׁיר ה', 2 Chron. xxix. 27, and hence all Psalms may be called Davidic, just as all מְשֻׁלִּים may be called Salomonic, without meaning thereby that they are all composed by David himself.

THIRD BOOK OF THE PSALTER

Ps. LXXIII.-LXXXIX.

PSALM LXXIII.

TEMPTATION TO APOSTASY OVERCOME.

- 1 VERILY good to Israel is Elohim,
To those who are of a clean heart.
- 2 But as for me—my feet had almost tottered,
My steps had well-nigh slipped.

- 3 For I was incensed at the boastful,
When I saw the prosperity of the wicked.
- 4 For they suffer no pangs,
Healthy and fat is their belly.
- 5 In the trouble of men they are not,
And not as other men are they plagued.
- 6 Therefore pride encircleth their neck,
Violence covereth them round about as a garment.

- 7 Their eyes stand out with fat,
The imaginations of the heart appear outwardly.
- 8 They mock and speak oppression in wickedness,
They speak from on high.
- 9 They set their mouth in the heavens,
And their tongue stalketh along upon the earth.
- 10 Therefore their people turn hither,
And water in abundance is swallowed down by them.

- 11 And they say: "How should God know,
And knowledge dwell in the Most High?!
- 12 Behold those are godless,
And always reckless have they attained to great power!
- 13 Only in vain have I cleansed my heart,
And washed my hands in innocence,
- 14 And yet was plagued all the day long,
And my chastisement was present every morning."—
- 15 Had I thought: I will speak thus, Behold, I should have dealt faithlessly with the generation of Thy children.
- 16 Yet when I mused in order to solve the riddle,
It was too difficult in mine eyes—
- 17 Until I went into the sanctuary of God, Until I gave good heed unto their end:
- 18 Surely in slippery places dost Thou set them,
Thou castest them down to ruins.
- 19 How are they become a desolation as in a moment,
Brought to an end, gone by reason of terrors!
- 20 As a dream, as soon as one awaketh,
O Lord, being aroused, Thou dost get rid of their image.
- 21 If my heart should grow bitter,
And I should be pricked in my reins:
- 22 Then I should be a stupid one and without understanding,
A behēmôth should I be in comparison with Thee.
- 23 But I remain continually with Thee,
Thou hast taken hold of my right hand.
- 24 According to Thy counsel wilt Thou lead me,
And afterward receive me to honour.
- 25 Whom have I in the heavens?
And if Thou art mine, the earth doth not delight me!
- 26 My flesh and my heart may fail—
The refuge of my heart and my portion is Elohim for ever.
- 27 For, lo, those who are estranged from Thee shall perish,
Thou destroyest all those who wantonly forsake Thee.

28 But as for me—to be united to Elohim is my happiness,
I make in the Lord, Jahve, my refuge,
That I may declare all Thy works.

After the one Asaph Psalm of the Second Book, Ps. 1., follow eleven more of them from Ps. lxxiii. to lxxxiii. They are all Elohimic, whereas the Korah Psalms divide into an Elohimic and a Jehovic group. Ps. lxxxiv. forms the transition from the one to the other. The Elohim-Psalms extend from Ps. xlii.—lxxxiv., and are fenced in on both sides by Jahve-Psalms.

In contents Ps. lxxiii. is the counterpart or pendant of Ps. 1. As in that Psalm the semblance of a sanctity based upon works is traced back to its nothingness, so here the seeming good fortune of the ungodly, by which the poet felt himself tempted to fall away, not into heathenism (Hitzig), but into that free-thinking which in the heathen world does not less cast off the δαισιδαιμονία than it does the belief in Jahve within the pale of Israel. Nowhere does there come to light in the national history any background that should contradict the  $\text{הַדְּבָרִים}$ , and the doubts respecting the moral order of the world are set at rest in exactly the same way as in Ps. xxxvii., xlix., and in the Book of Job. Theodicy, or the vindication of God's ways, does not as yet rise from the indication of the retribution in this present time which the ungodly do not escape, to a future solution of all the contradictions of this present world; and the transcendent glory which infinitely outweighs the suffering of this present time, still remains outside the range of vision. The steadfast faith which, gladly renouncing everything, holds fast to God, and the pure love to which this possession is more than heaven and earth, is all the more worthy of admiration in connection with such defective knowledge.

The strophe schema of the Psalm is predominantly octastichic: 4. 8. 8. 8; 8. 8. 5. Its two halves are vers. 1–14, 15–28.

Vers. 1, 2.  $\text{כִּי}$ , belonging to the favourite words of the faith that bids defiance to assault, signifies originally “thus = not otherwise,” and therefore combines an affirmative and restrictive, or, according to circumstances, even an adversative signification (vid. on xxxix. 6). It may therefore be rendered: yea good, assuredly good, or: only good, nothing but good; both renderings are an assertion of a sure, infallible relation of things. God appears to be angry with the godly, but in reality He is kindly disposed towards them, though He send affliction after affliction upon them (Lam. iii. 25). The words ישראל אלהים are not to be taken together, after Gal. vi. 16 (τὸν Ἰσραὴλ τοῦ Θεοῦ); not, "only good is it with the Israel of Elohim," but "only good to Israel is Elohim," is the right apprehension of the truth or reality that is opposed to what seems to be the case. The Israel which in every relationship has a good and loving God is limited in ver. 1b to the pure in heart (xxiv. 4, Matt. v. 8). Israel in truth are not all those who are descended from Jacob, but those who have put away all impurity of disposition and all uncleanness of sin out of their heart, i.e. out of their innermost life, and by a constant striving after sanctification (ver. 13) maintain themselves in such purity. In relation to this, which is the real church of God, God is pure love, nothing but love. This it is that has been confirmed to the poet as he passed through the conflict of temptation, but it was through conflict, for he almost fell by reason of the semblance of the opposite. The Chethâb נָטַי רַגְלִי (cf. Num. xxiv. 4) or נָטַי (cf. 2 Sam. xv. 32) is erroneous. The narration of that which is past cannot begin with a participial clause like this, and בְּמַעַט, in such a sense (non multum abfuit quin, like נִשְׁבַּח, nilil abfuit quin), always has the perfect after it, e.g. xciv. 17, cxix. 87. It is therefore to be read נָטַי (according to the fuller form for נָטַי, which is used not merely with great distinctives, as in xxxvi. 8, cxxii. 6, Num. xxiv. 6, but also with conjunctives out of pause, e.g. lvii. 2, cf. xxxvi. 9, Deut. xxxii. 37, Job xii. 6): my feet had almost inclined towards, had almost slipped backwards and towards the side. On the other hand the Chethâb שָׁפְכָה is unassailable; the feminine singular is frequently found as predicate both of a plural subject that has preceded (xviii. 35, cf. Deut. xxi. 7, Job xvi. 16) and also more especially of one that is placed after it, e.g. xxxvii. 31, Job xiv. 19. The footsteps are said to be poured out when one "flies out or slips" and falls to the ground.

Vers. 3-6. Now follows the occasion of the conflict of temptation: the good fortune of those who are estranged from

God. In accordance with the gloominess of the theme, the style is also gloomy, and piles up the dull-toned suffixes amo and emo (vid. lxxviii. 66, lxxx. 7, lxxxiii. 12, 14); both are after the example set by David. קָנָא with Beth of the object on which the zeal or warmth of feeling is kindled (xxxvii. 1, Prov. iii. 31) here refers to the warmth of envious ill-feeling. Concerning הוֹלֵל vid. v. 6. Ver. 3b tells under what circumstances the envy was excited; cf. so far as the syntax is concerned, xlix. 6, lxxvi. 11. In ver. 4 תְּרַצְבוֹת (from תְּרַצַּב = תְּרַצַּב from תְּרַצַּב, cognate עֲצַב, whence עֲצָב, pain, Arabic 'asābe, a snare, cf. תְּרַצַּב, ὠδὴς, and תְּרַצַּב, σχοινίον), in the same sense as the Latin tormenta (from torquere), is intended of pains that produce convulsive contractions. But in order to give the meaning "they have no pangs (to suffer) till their death," לָהֶם לְמוֹתָם could not be omitted (that is, assuming also that לְ, which is sometimes used for עַד, vid. lix. 14, could in such an exclusive sense signify the terminus ad quem). Also "there are no pangs for their death, i.e. that bring death to them," ought to be expressed by לָהֶם לְמוֹתָם. The clause as it stands affirms that their dying has no pangs, i.e. it is a painless death; but not merely does this assertion not harmonize with vers. 18 sq., but it is also introduced too early here, since the poet cannot surely begin the description of the good fortune of the ungodly with the painlessness of their death, and then for the first time come to speak of their healthy condition. We may therefore read, with Ewald, Hitzig, Böttcher, and Olshausen:

כִּי אֵין תְּרַצְבוֹת לָמוֹ
תָּם וּבְרִיא אֹלָם

i.e. they have (suffer) no pangs, vigorous (תָּם like תָּם, Job xxi. 23, תָּמִים, Prov. i. 12) and well-nourished is their belly; by which means the difficult לְמוֹתָם is got rid of, and the gloomy picture is enriched by another form ending with mo. אֹלָם, here in a derisive sense, signifies the body, like the Arabic <sup>5</sup>أَلَّ, <sup>5</sup>أَلَّ (from <sup>5</sup>أَلَّ, coahuit, cohasit, to condense inwardly, to gain consistency).*

* Hitzig calls to mind σῶλος, "corporeal;" but this word is Ionic and equivalent to ἄλος, solidus, the ground-word of which is the Sanscrit sarvas, whole, complete.

The observation of ver. 4a is pursued further in ver. 5: whilst one would have thought that the godly formed an exception to the common wretchedness of mankind, it is just the wicked who are exempt from all trouble and calamity. It is also here to be written עֲנִימוֹ, as in lix. 14, not אֲנִימוֹ. Therefore is haughtiness their neck-chain, and brutishness their mantle. עָנָע is a denominative from עָנַע = ἀνχέω: to hang round the neck; the neck is the seat of pride (ἀνχέειν): haughtiness hangs around their neck (like עָנָע, a neck-ornament). Accordingly in ver. 6b מְטָה is the subject, although the interpunction construes it differently, viz. "they wrap round as a garment the injustice belonging to them," in order, that is, to avoid the construction of עָטַף (vid. lxxv. 14) with לָמוֹ; but active verbs can take a dative of the object (e.g. לְרַפָּא לְ, לְאַהֲבָ לְ, לְבַפֵּסָה לְ) in the sense: to be or to grant to any one that which the primary notion of the verb asserts. It may therefore be rendered: they put on the garment of violence (שִׁית מְטָה like בְּגָדֵי נָקָם, Isa. lix. 17), or even by avoiding every enallage numeri: violence covers them as a garment; so that שִׁית is an apposition which is put forth in advance.

Vers. 7-10. The reading עֲנִימוֹ, ἡ ἀδικία αὐτῶν LXX. (cf. in Zech. v. 6 the עֵינָם, which is rendered by the LXX. in exactly the same way), in favour of which Hitzig, Böttcher, and Olshausen decide, "their iniquity presses forth out of a fat heart, out of a fat inward part," is favoured by xvii. 10, where חֲלָב obtains just this signification by combination with סָגַר, which it would obtain here as being the place whence sin issues; cf. ἐξέρχασθαι ἐκ τῆς καρδίας, Matt. xv. 18 sq.; and the parallelism decides its superiority. Nevertheless the traditional reading also gives a suitable sense; not (since fat tends to make the eyes appear to be deeper in) "their eyes come forward præ adipe," but "they stare forth ex adipe, out of the fat of their bloated visage," מִחֲלָב being equivalent to מִפְּנֵיהֶם, Job xv. 27. This is a feature of character faithfully drawn after nature. Further, just as in general τὸ περίσσευμα τῆς καρδίας wells over in the gestures and language (Matt. xii. 34), so is it also with their "views or images of the heart" (from שִׁכָּחָה, like שִׁכְּחָה, the cock with its gift of divination as speculator): the illusions of their unbounded self-confidence come forth outwardly, they overflow after the manner of a river,* viz., as ver. 8 says, in words that are proud beyond measure (Jer. v. 28). Luther: "they destroy everything" (synon. they make it as or into rottenness, from כָּקַץ). But הִקְיִי is here equivalent to the Aramaic מִיָּק (μωκαῖσθαι): they mock and openly speak בָּרַע (with ā in connection with Munach transformed from Dechlâ), with evil disposition (cf. Ex. xxxii. 12), oppression; i.e. they openly express their resolve which aims at oppression. Their fellow-man is the sport of their caprice; they speak or dictate מְפָרוֹם, down from an eminence, upon which they imagine themselves to be raised high above others. Even in the heavens above do they set (שָׁתוּ as in xlix. 15 instead of שָׁתוּ, —there, in accordance with tradition, Milel; here at the commencement of the verse Mifra) their mouth; even these do not remain untouched by their scandalous language (cf. Jude ver. 16); the Most High and Holy One, too, is blasphemed by them, and their tongue runs officiously and imperiously through the earth below, everywhere disparaging that which exists and giving new laws. תְּהַלֵּךְ, as in Ex. ix. 23, a Kal sounding much like Hithpa., in the signification grassari. In ver. 10 the Chethâb יִשִּׁיב (therefore he, this class of man, turns a people subject to him hither, i.e. to himself) is to be rejected, because הֵלֵם is not appropriate to it. עָמוֹ is the subject, and the suffix refers not to God (Stier), whose name has not been previously mentioned, but to the kind of men hitherto described: what is meant is the people which, in order that it may turn itself hither (שׁוּב, not: to turn back, but to turn one's self towards, as e.g. in Jer. xv. 19†), becomes his, i.e. this class's people (cf. for this sense of the suffix as describing the issue or event, xviii. 24, xlix. 6, lxv. 12). They gain adherents (xlix. 14) from those who leave the fear of God and turn to them; and מַי מְלֵא, water of fulness, i.e. of full measure (cf. lxxiv. 15, streams of duration = that do not dry up), which is here an emblem of their corrupt principles (cf. Job xv. 16), is quaffed or sucked in (מָצָה, root מָצַח, whence first of all מָצָח, משׁ, to suck) by these befooled ones (מְלֵא, αὐτοῖς = ὑπ' αὐτῶν). This is what is meant to be further said, and not that this band of servile followers is in fulness absorbed by them (Sachs). Around the proud free-thinkers there gathers a rabble submissive to them, which eagerly drinks in everything that proceeds from them as though it were the true water of life. Even in David's time (x. 4, xiv. 1, xxxvi. 2) there were already such stout spirits (Isa. xlv. 12) with a servūm imitatorum pecus. A still far more favourable soil for these מְלֵא was the worldly age of Solomon.

* On the other hand, Redslob (Deutsch. Morgenländ. Zeitschr. 1860, S. 675) interprets it thus: they run over the fencings of the heart, from שָׁבַח in the signification to put or stick through, to stick into (infigere), by comparing לָבַי, קִירוֹת לָבַי, Jer. iv. 19, and ἔργος ὀδόντων. He regards מְשֻׁבָּת and mosaic as one word, just as the Italian ricamare (to stitch) and רָקַם is one word. Certainly the root זָךְ, זָכ, has the primary notion of piercing (cf. זָכַר), and also the notion of purity, which it obtains, proceeds from the idea of the brilliance which pierces into the eye; but the primary notion of שָׁבַח is that of cutting through (whence שֶׁבֶן, like מַחֲלָה, a knife, from חָלָה, Judg. v. 26).

† In general שׁוּב does not necessarily signify to turn back, but, like the Arabic 'âda, Persic gash'en, to enter into a new (active or passive) state.

Vers. 11-14. The persons speaking are now those apostates who, deluded by the good fortune and free-thinking of the ungodly, give themselves up to them as slaves. Concerning the modal sense of יָדַע, quomodo sciverit, vid. xi. 3, cf. Job xxii. 13. With שִׁי the doubting question is continued. Böttcher renders thus: nevertheless knowledge is in the Most High (a circumstantial clause like Prov. iii. 28, Mal. i. 14, Judg. vi. 13); but first of all they deny God's actual knowledge, and then His attributive omniscience. It is not to be interpreted: behold, such are (according to their moral nature) the ungodly (הַיִּזְוִים, tales, like הָיָה, xlvi. 15, Deut. v. 26, cf. הִפְתָּה, Isa. lvi. 11); nor, as is more in accordance with the parallel member ver. 12*b* and the drift of the Psalm: behold, thus it befalleth the ungodly (such are they according to their lot, as in Job xviii. 21, cf. Isa. xx. 6); but, what forms a better connection as a statement of the ground of the scepticism in ver. 11, either, in harmony with the accentuation: behold, the ungodly, etc., or, since it is not הִרְשָׁעִים: behold, these are ungodly, and, ever reckless (Jer. xii. 1), they have acquired great power. With the bitter הִיָּה, as Stier correctly observes, they bring forward the obvious proof to the contrary. How can God be said to be the omniscient Ruler of the world?—the ungodly in their carnal security become very powerful and mighty, but piety, very far from being rewarded, is joined with nothing but misfortune. My striving after sanctity (cf. Prov. xx. 9), my abstinence from all moral pollution (cf. Prov. xxvi. 6), says he who has been led astray, has been absolutely (אֵס as in 1 Sam. xxv. 21) in vain; I was notwithstanding (Ew. § 345, a) incessantly tormented (cf. ver. 5), and with every morning's dawn (לְבֹקְרִים, as in ci. 8, cf. לְבֹקְרִים in Job vii. 18) my chastitive suffering was renewed. We may now supply the conclusion in thought in accordance with ver. 10: Therefore have I joined myself to those who never concern themselves about God and at the same time get on better.

Vers. 15-18. To such, doubt is become the transition to apostasy. The poet has resolved the riddle of such an unequal distribution of the fortunes of men in a totally different way. Instead of פְּמוֹ in ver. 15, to read פְּמוֹהֶם (Böttcher), or better, by taking up the following הֵנָּה, which even Saadia allows himself to do, contrary to the accents (مثل هذا), פְּמוֹ הֵנָּה (Ewald), is unnecessary, since prepositions are sometimes used elliptically (פְּעַל, Isa. lix. 18), or even without anything further (Hos. vii. 16, xi. 7) as adverbs, which must therefore be regarded as possible also in the case of פְּמוֹ (Aramaic, Arabic بِمَوْ, Æthiopic kem). The poet means to say, If I had made up my mind to the same course of reasoning, I should have faithlessly forsaken the fellowship of the children of God, and should consequently also have forfeited their blessings. The subjunctive signification of the perfects in the hypothetical protasis and apodosis, ver. 15 (cf. Jer. xxiii. 22), follows solely from the context; futures instead of perfects would signify si dicerem . . . perfide agerem. רֵוִר בְּנֵיךָ is the totality of those, in whom the filial relationship in which God has placed Israel in relation to Himself is become an inward or spiritual reality, the true Israel, ver. 1, the "righteous generation," xiv. 5. It is an appellative, as in Deut. xiv. 1, Hos. ii. 1. For on the point of the υιοθεσία the New Testament differs from the Old Testament in this way, viz. that in the Old Testament it is always only as a people that Israel is called בֶּן, or as a whole בְּנִים, but that the individual, and that in his direct relationship to God, dared not as yet call himself "child of God." The individual character is not as yet freed from its absorption in the species, it is not as yet independent; it is the time of the minor's νηπιότης, and the adoption is as yet only effected nationally, salvation is as yet within the limits of the nationality, its common human form has not as yet appeared. The verb נָגַד with אֵל signifies to deal faithlessly with any one, and more especially (whether God, a friend, or a spouse) faithlessly to forsake him; here, in this sense of malicious desertion, it contents itself with the simple accusative.

On the one side, by joining in the speech of the free-thinkers he would have placed himself outside the circle of the children of God, of the truly pious; on the other side, however, when by meditation he sought to penetrate it (לְרַעַת), the doubt-provoking phenomenon (תִּשְׁבָּה) still continued to be to him לְרַעַת, trouble, i.e. something that troubled him without any result, an unsolvable riddle (cf. Eccles. viii. 17). Whether we read תִּשְׁבָּה or תִּשְׁבָּה, the sense remains the same; the Keri תִּשְׁבָּה prefers, as in Job xxxi. 11, the attractional gender. Neither here nor in Job xxx. 26 and elsewhere is it to be supposed that תִּשְׁבָּה is equivalent to תִּשְׁבָּה (Ewald, Hupfeld). The cohortative form of the future here, as frequently (Ges. § 128, 1), with or without a conditional particle (cxxxxix. 8, 2 Sam. xxii. 38, Job xvi. 6, xi. 17, xix. 18, xxx. 26), forms a hypothetical protasis: and (yet) when I meditated; Symmachus (according to Montfaucon), εἰ ἐλογιζόμην. As Vailinger aptly observes, "thinking alone will give neither the right light nor true happiness." Both are found only in faith. The poet at last struck upon the way of faith, and there he found light and peace. The future after עָלָה frequently has the signification of the imperfect subjunctive, Job xxxii. 11, Eccles. ii. 3, cf. Prov. xii. 19 (donec nitem = only a moment); also in an historical connection like Josh. x. 13, 2 Chron. xxix. 34, it is conceived of as subjunctive (donec ulcisceretur, se sanctificarent), sometimes, however, as indicative, as in Ex. xv. 16 (donec transibat) and in our passage, where עָלָה introduces the objective goal at which the riddle found its solution: until I went into the sanctuary of God, (purposely) attended to (לְ as in the primary passage Deut. xxxii. 29, cf. Job xiv. 21) their life's end. The cohortative is used here exactly as in תִּשְׁבָּה, but with the collateral notion of that which is intentional, which here fully accords with the connection. He went into God's dread sanctuary (plural as in lxviii. 36, cf.

מִקְרָשׁ in the Psalms of Asaph, lxvii. 7, lxxviii. 69); here he prayed for light in the darkness of his conflict, here were his eyes opened to the holy plans and ways of God (lxxvii. 14), here the sight of the sad end of the evil-doers was presented to him. By "God's sanctuaries" Ewald and Hitzig understand His secrets; but this meaning is without support in the usage of the language. And is it not a thought perfectly in harmony with the context and with experience, that a light arose upon him when he withdrew from the bustle of the world into the quiet of God's dwelling-place, and there devoutly gave his mind to the matter?

The strophe closes with a summary confession of the explanation received there. שִׁיחַ is construed with Lamed inasmuch as collocare is equivalent to locum assignare (vid. ver. 6b). God makes the evil-doers to stand on smooth, slippery places, where one may easily lose one's footing (cf. xxxv. 6, Jer. xxiii. 12). There, then, they also inevitably fall; God casts them down לְמִשְׁאוֹת, into ruins, fragores = ruinæ, from שָׁא = שָׁח, to be confused, desolate, to rumble. The word only has the appearance of being from שָׁחַ: ensnarings, sudden attacks (Hitzig), which is still more ill suited to lxxiv. 3 than to this passage; desolation and ruin can be said even of persons, as הָרַם, xxviii. 5, וְנִשְׁבְּרוּ, Isa. viii. 15, נָפַץ, Jer. li. 21-23. The poet knows no other theodicy but this, nor was any other known generally in the pre-exilic literature of Israel (vid. Ps. xxxvii., xxxix., Jer. ch. xii., and the Book of Job). The later prophecy and the Chokma were much in advance of this, inasmuch as they point to a last universal judgment (vid. more particularly Mal. iii. 13 sqq.), but not one that breaks off this present state; the present state and the future state, time and eternity, are even there not as yet thoroughly separated.

Vers. 19-22. The poet calms himself with the solution of the riddle that has come to him; and it would be beneath his dignity as a man to allow himself any further to be tempted by doubting thoughts. Placing himself upon the standpoint of the end, he sees how the ungodly come to terrible destruction in a moment: they come to an end (סָפַר from סָפַר, not סָפָה), it is all over with them (תָּמוּ) in consequence of (כִּן as in lxxvi. 7, and unconnected as in xviii. 4, xxx. 4, 2 Sam. xxii. 14) frightful occurrences (בְּלִהוֹת, a favourite word, especially in the Book of Job), which clear them out of the way. It is with them as with a dream, after (וְעַתָּה as in 1 Chron. viii. 8) one is awake. One forgets the vision on account of its nothingness (Job xx. 8). So the evil-doers who boast themselves μετὰ πολλῆς φαντασίας (Acts xxv. 23) are before God a עָלֵם, phantom or unsubstantial shadow. When He, the sovereign Lord, shall awake, i.e. arouse Himself to judgment after He has looked on with forbearance, then He will despise their shadowy image, will cast it contemptuously from Him. Luther renders, So machstu HERR jr Bilde in der Stad verschmecht (So dost Thou, Lord, make their image despised in the city). But neither has the Kal בָּעִיר this double transitive signification, "to give over to contempt," nor is the mention of the city in place here. In Hos. xi. 9 also בָּעִיר in the signification in urbem gives no right sense; it signifies heat of anger or fury, as in Jer. xv. 8, heat of anguish, and Schröder maintains the former signification (vid. on Ps. cxxxix. 20), in fervore (iræ), here also; but the pointing בָּעִיר is against it. Therefore בָּעִיר is to be regarded, with the Targum, as syncopated from בְּהָעִיר (cf. לְבִיא, Jer. xxxix. 7, 2 Chron. xxxi. 10; בְּבִשְׁלוֹ, Prov. xxiv. 17, and the like); not, however, to be explained, "when they awake," viz. from the sleep of death (Targum*), or after lxxviii. 38, "when Thou awakest them," viz. out of their sleep of security (De Wette, Kurtz), but after xxxv. 23, "when Thou awakest," viz. to sit in judgment.

Thus far we have the divine answer, which is reproduced by the poet after the manner of prayer. Hengstenberg now goes on by rendering it, "for my heart was incensed;" but we cannot take יִתְחַפֵּץ according to the sequence of tenses as an imperfect, nor understand כִּי as a particle expressing the reason. On the contrary, the poet, from the standpoint of the explanation he has received, speaks of a possible return (כִּי seq. fut. = εἰάν) of his temptation, and condemns it beforehand: si exacerbaretur animus meus atque in reuibus meis pungerer.

* The Targum version is, "As the dream of a drunken man, who awakes out of his sleep, wilt Thou, O Lord, on the day of the great judgment, when they awake out of their graves, in wrath abandon their image to contempt." The text of our editions is to be thus corrected according to Bechai (on Deut. xxxiii. 29) and Nachmani (in his treatise שְׁעַר הַגְּבוּל).

הִתְחַמְצֵן, to become sour, bitter, passionate; הִשְׁתַּתְּוֵן, with the more exactly defining accusative בְּלִיחֵי, to be pricked, piqued, irritated. With וְאֲנִי begins the apodosis: then should I be . . . I should have become (perfect as in ver. 15, according to Ges. § 126, 5). Concerning לֹא יָדַע, non sapere, vid. xiv. 4. בְּהֵמוֹת can be taken as compar. decurtata for בְּבַהֲמוֹת; nevertheless, as apparently follows from Job xl. 15, the poet surely has the p-ehemou, the water-ox, i.e. the hippopotamus, in his mind, which being Hebraized is בְּהֵמוֹת,* and, as a plump colossus of flesh, is at once an emblem of colossal stupidity (Maurer, Hitzig). The meaning of the poet is, that he would not be a man in relation to God, over against God (עַם, as in lxxviii. 37, Job ix. 2, cf. עֵצ, in comparison with), if he should again give way to the same doubts, but would be like the most stupid animal, which stands before God incapable of such knowledge as He willingly imparts to earnestly inquiring man.

Vers. 23-26. But he does not thus deeply degrade himself: after God has once taken him by the right hand and rescued him from the danger of falling (ver. 2), he clings all the more firmly to Him, and will not suffer his perpetual fellowship with Him to be again broken through by such seizures which estrange him from God. Confidently does he yield up himself to the divine guidance, though he may not see through the mystery of the plan (עֲצָה) of this guidance. He knows that afterwards (אַחַר with Mugrash: adverb as in lxxviii. 26), i.e. after this dark way of faith, God will כָּבוֹד receive him, i.e. take him to Himself and take him from all suffering (לְקַח as in xlix. 16, and of Enoch, Gen. v. 24). The comparison of Zech. ii. 12 [8] is misleading; there אַחַר is rightly accented as a preposition: after glory hath He sent me forth (vid. Köhler), and here as an adverb; for although the adverbial sense of אַחַר would more readily lead one to look for the arrangement of the words וְאַחַר תִּקְחֵנִי כְבוֹד, still "to receive after glory" (cf. the reverse Isa. lviii. 8) is an awkward thought. כְּבוֹד, which as an

* The Egyptian p frequently passes over into the Hebrew b, and vice versâ, as in the name Aperiu = עֶבְרִים; p, however, is retained in פרעה = phar-aa, grand-house (ὄϊκος μέγας in Horapollo), the name of the Egyptian rulers, which begins with the sign of the plan of a house = p.

adjective "glorious" (Hofmann) is alien to the language, is either accusative of the goal (Hupfeld), or, which yields a form of expression that is more like the style of the Old Testament, accusative of the manner (Luther, "with honour"). In חַתֵּר the poet comprehends in one summary view what he looks for at the goal of the present divine guidance. The future is dark to him, but lighted up by the one hope that the end of his earthly existence will be a glorious solution of the riddle. Here, as elsewhere, it is faith which breaks through not only the darkness of this present life, but also the night of Hades. At that time there was as yet no divine utterance concerning any heavenly triumph of the church, militant in the present world, but to faith the Jahve-Name had already a transparent depth which penetrated beyond Hades into an eternal life. The heaven of blessedness and glory also is nothing without God; but he who can in love call God his, possesses heaven upon earth, and he who cannot in love call God his, would possess not heaven, but hell, in the midst of heaven. In this sense the poet says in ver. 25: whom have I in heaven? i.e. who there without Thee would be the object of my desire, the stilling of my longing? without Thee heaven with all its glory is a vast waste and void, which makes me indifferent to everything, and with Thee, i.e. possessing Thee, I have no delight in the earth, because to call Thee mine infinitely surpasses every possession and every desire of earth. If we take בְּאַרְץ still more exactly as parallel to בְּשָׁמַיִם, without making it dependent upon הַפְּצוּתִי: and possessing Thee I have no desire upon the earth, then the sense remains essentially the same; but if we allow בְּאַרְץ to be governed by הַפְּצוּתִי in accordance with the general usage of the language, we arrive at this meaning by the most natural way. Heaven and earth, together with angels and men, afford him no satisfaction—his only friend, his sole desire and love, is God. The love for God which David expresses in xvi. 2 in the brief utterance, "Thou art my Lord, Thou art my highest good," is here expanded with incomparable mystical profoundness and beauty. Luther's version shows his master-hand. The church follows it in its "Herzlich lieb hab' ich dich" when it sings—

"The whole wide world delights me not,
For heaven and earth, Lord, care I not,
If I may but have Thee;"

and following it, goes on in perfect harmony with the text of our Psalm—“Yea, though my heart be like to break, Thou art my trust that nought can shake;”* or with Paul Gerhard, [in his Passion-hymn “Ein Lämmlein geht und trägt die Schuld der Welt und ihrer Kinder,”] “Light of my heart, that shalt Thou be;

And when my heart in pieces breaks,
Thou shalt my heart remain.”

For the hypothetical perfect  $\text{הִלֵּךְ}$  expresses something in spite of which he upon whom it may come calls God his God: licet defecerit. Though his outward and inward man perish, nevertheless God remains ever the rock of his heart as the firm ground upon which he, with his ego, remains standing when everything else totters; He remains his portion, i.e. the possession that cannot be taken from him, if he loses all, even his spirit-life pertaining to the body,—and God remains to him this portion  $\text{חֵלְקִי}$ , he survives with the life which he has in God the death of the old life. The poet supposes an extreme case,—one, that is, it is true, impossible, but yet conceivable,—that his outward and inward being should sink away; even then with the merus actus of his ego he will continue to cling to God. In the midst of the natural life of perishableness and of sin, a new, individual life which is resigned to God has begun within him, and in this he has the pledge that he cannot perish, so truly as God, with whom it is closely united, cannot perish. It is just this that is also the nerve of the proof of the resurrection of the dead which Jesus advances in opposition to the Sadducees (Matt. xxii. 32).

Vers. 27, 28. The poet here once more gives expression to the great opposites into which good fortune and misfortune are seemingly, but only seemingly, divided in a manner so contradictory to the divine justice. The central point of the confirmation that is introduced with  $\text{יָי}$  lies in ver. 28. “Thy far removing ones” was to be expressed with  $\text{רָחַק}$ , which is distinct from  $\text{רָחוּק}$ .  $\text{זָנָה}$  has  $\text{מִן}$  instead of  $\text{מִתַּחַת}$  or  $\text{מֵאַחֲרַי$  after it. Those who remove themselves far from the primary fountain of life fall a prey to ruin; those who faithlessly abandon God, and choose the world with its idols rather than His love, fall a prey to destruction. Not so the poet; the nearness of God, i.e. a state of union with God, is good to him, i.e. (cf. cxix. 71 sq.) he regards as his good fortune. נִצְרָה is nom. act. after the form יִקְרָה, יִקְרָה, obedience, and נִצְרָה, a watch, cxli. 3, and of essentially the same signification with kurba (קִרְבָּה), the Arabic designation of the unio mystica; cf. Jas. iv. 8, ἐγγύσατε τῷ Θεῷ καὶ ἐγγύει ὑμῖν. Just as קרבת אלהים stands in antithesis to רחקך, so לִי טוֹב stands in antithesis to יאברו and הצמחה. To the former their alienation from God brings destruction; he finds in fellowship with God that which is good to him for the present time and for the future. Putting his confidence (מִחְסֵי, not מִחְסֵי) in Him, he will declare, and will one day be able to declare, all His מְלֵאכּוֹת, i.e. the manifestations or achievements of His righteous, gracious, and wise government. The language of assertion is quickly changed into that of address. The Psalm closes with an upward look of grateful adoration to God beforehand, who leads His own people, oftentimes wondrously indeed, but always happily, viz. through suffering to glory.

PSALM LXXIV.

APPEAL TO GOD AGAINST RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION, IN WHICH THE TEMPLE IS VIOLATED.

- 1 WHY, Elohim, hast Thou cast off for ever, Why doth Thine anger smoke against the flock of Thy pasture?
- 2 Remember Thy congregation which Thou hast purchased of old,
Which Thou hast ransomed for the tribe of Thy possession—
Of Mount Zion whereon Thou dwellest.
- 3 Oh lift up Thy footsteps unto the perpetual ruins,
Everything hath the enemy destroyed in the sanctuary.
- 4 Thine adversaries roared in the midst of Thy place of assembly,
They set up their signs as signs.

- 5 It looked as when one lifteth up on high Axes in the thicket of the wood :
- 6 And now—at its carved work altogether
With hatchet and mattocks they hewed right and left ;
- 7 They have set on fire Thy Temple,
To the earth they have defiled the dwelling-place of Thy
name ;
- 8 They said in their hearts : we will crush them altogether ;
They have burnt up all the houses of God in the land.
- 9 Our signs we see not.
There is no longer any prophet,
And among us there is no one who knoweth : until when ?—
- 10 How long, Elohim, shall the oppressor blaspheme ?
Shall the enemy scoff at Thy name for ever ?
- 11 Why dost Thou draw back Thy hand and Thy right hand ?
Out of the midst of Thy bosom bring it forth, destroy !—
- 12 And yet Elohim is my King from the days of old, Working deliverances in the midst of the earth.
- 13 THOU hast divided the sea by Thy power,
Thou hast broken the heads of the dragons upon the waters.
- 14 THOU hast broken in pieces the heads of leviathan, Thou gavest him as food to a people : to the creatures of the desert.
- 15 THOU hast cleft fountains and brooks,
THOU hast dried up never-failing rivers.
- 16 Thine is the day, also Thine the night,
THOU hast prepared the star of night and the sun.
- 17 THOU hast established all the borders of the earth,
Summer and winter hast THOU formed.
- 18 Remember this : the enemy revileth Jahve,
And a foolish people scoffeth at Thy name.
- 19 Give not over to the wild beast the soul of Thy turtle-dove,
Thy poor creatures forget not for ever.
- 20 Look upon the covenant,
For the corners of the land are full of the habitations of violence.

- 21 Let not the disheartened turn back ashamed,
 Let the afflicted and the needy praise Thy name.
- 22 Arise, Elohim, fight out Thy cause,
 Remember Thy reproach from the foolish continually!
- 23 Forget not the cry of Thine adversaries,
 The tumult of those who rise up against Thee which ascendeth ever!!

The מזמור lxxiii. is here followed by a Maskil (vid. xxxii. 1) which, in common with the former, has the prominent, rare word מִשְׁחָזוֹת (lxxiv. 3, lxxiii. 18), but also the old Asaphic impress. We here meet with the favourite Asaphic contemplation of Israel as a flock, and the predilection of the Asaphic Psalms for retrospective references to Israel's early history (lxxiv. 13-15). We also find the former of these two characteristic features in Ps. lxxix., which reflects the same circumstances of the times.

Moreover Jeremiah stands in the same relationship to both Psalms. In Jer. x. 25, Ps. lxxix. 6 sq. is repeated almost word for word. And one is reminded of Ps. lxxiv. by Lam. ii. 2 (cf. lxxiv. 7), ii. 7 (cf. lxxiv. 4), and other passages. The lament "there is no prophet any more" (lxxiv. 9) sounds very much like Lam. ii. 9. In connection with Jeremiah's reproductive manner, and his habit of allowing himself to be prompted to new thoughts by the original passages by means of the association of ideas (cf. בְּיוֹם מוֹעֵד, Lam. ii. 7, with בְּקֶרֶב מוֹעֵד of the Psalm), it is natural to assign the priority in age to the two Asaphic national lamentation Psalms.

But the substance of both Psalms, which apparently brings us down not merely into the Chaldæan, but even into the Maccabæan age, rises up in opposition to it. After his return from the second Egyptian expedition (170 B.C.) Antiochus Epiphanes chastised Jerusalem, which had been led into revolt by Jason, in the most cruel manner, entered the Temple accompanied by the court high priest Menalaus, and carried away the most costly vessels, and even the gold of the walls and doors, with him. Myriads of the Jews were at that time massacred or sold as slaves. Then during the fourth Egyptian expedition (168) of Antiochus, when a party favourably disposed towards the Ptolemies again arose in Jerusalem, he sent Apollonius to punish the offenders (167), and his troops laid the city waste with fire and sword, destroyed houses and walls, burnt down several of the Temple-gates and razed many of its apartments. Also on this occasion thousands were slain and led away captive. Then began the attempt of Antiochus to Hellenize the Jewish nation. An aged Athenian was entrusted with the carrying out of this measure. Force was used to compel the Jews to accept the heathen religion, and in fact to serve Olympian Zeus (Jupiter): on the 15th of Chislev a smaller altar was erected upon the altar of burnt-offering in the Temple, and on the 25th of Chislev the first sacrifice was offered to Olympian Zeus in the Temple of Jahve, now dedicated to him. Such was the position of affairs when a band of faithful confessors rallied around the Asmonæan (Hasmonæan) priest Mattathias.

How strikingly does much in both Psalms, more particularly in Ps. lxxiv., harmonize with this position of affairs! At that time it was felt more painfully than ever that prophecy had become dumb, 1 Macc. iv. 46, ix. 27, xiv. 41. The confessors and martyrs who bravely declared themselves were called, as in Ps. lxxix. 2, חסידים, Ἀσιδαῖοι. At that time "they saw," as 1 Macc. iv. 38 says, "the sanctuary desolate, and the altar profaned, and the gates burnt up, and shrubs growing in the courts as in a forest, or as in one of the mountains, yea, and the priests' chambers pulled down." The doors of the Temple-gates were burned to ashes (cf. 2 Macc. viii. 33, i. 8). The religious אֲוֹתוֹת (lxxiv. 4) of the heathen filled the place where Jahve was wont to reveal Himself. Upon the altar of the court stood the βδέλυγμα ἐρημώσεως; in the courts they had planted trees, and likewise the "signs" of heathendom; and the אֲשָׁפוֹרִיָּה (παστοφόρια) lay in ruins. When later on, under Demetrius Soter (161), Alcimus (an apostate whom Antiochus had appointed high priest) and Bacchides advanced with promises of peace, but with an army at the same time, a band of scribes, the foremost of the Ἀσιδαῖοι of Israel, went forth to meet them to intercede for their nation. Alcimus, however, seized sixty of them, slaughtered them in one day, and that, as it is added in 1 Macc. vii. 16 sq., "according to the word which he wrote: The flesh of Thy saints and their blood have they shed round about Jerusalem, and there was none to bury them." The formula of citation κατὰ τὸν λόγον ὃν (τοὺς λόγους οὗς) ἔγραψε, and more particularly the ἔγραψε,—which as being the aorist cannot have the Scripture (ἡ γραφή), and, since the citation is a prayer to God, not God, but only the anonymous psalmist, as its subject (vid., however, the various readings in Grimm on this passage),—sounds as though the historian were himself conscious that he was quoting a portion of Scripture that had taken its rise among the calamities of that time. In fact, no age could be regarded as better warranted in incorporating some of its songs in the Psalter than the Maccabæan, the sixty-third week predicted by Daniel, the week of suffering bearing in itself the character of the time of the end, this strictly martyr age of the Old Covenant, to which the Book of Daniel awards a high typical significance in relation to the history of redemption.

But unbiassed as we are in the presence of the question whether there are Maccabæan Psalms, still there is, on the other hand, much, too, that is against the referring of the two Psalms to the Maccabæan age. In Ps. lxxix. there is nothing that militates against referring it to the Chaldæan age, and lxxix. 11 (cf. cii. 21, lxix. 34) is even favourable to this. And in Ps. lxxiv., in which vers. 4*b*, 8*b*, 9*b* are the most satisfactorily explained from the Maccabæan age, there are, again, other parts which are better explained from the Chaldæan. For what is said in ver. 7*a*, "they have set Thy Temple on fire," applies just as unconditionally as it runs to the Chaldæans, but not to the Syrians. And the cry of prayer, lxxiv. 3, "lift up Thy footsteps to the eternal ruins," appears to assume a laying waste that has taken place within the last few years at least, such as the Maccabæan age cannot exhibit, although at the exaltation of the Maccabees Jerusalem was ἀοίκητος ὡς ἔρημος (1 Macc. iii. 45). Hitzig, it is true, renders: raise Thy footsteps for sudden attacks without end; but both the passages in which תִּשָׁעֵב occurs mutually secure to this word the signification "desolations" (Targum, Symmachus, Jerome, and Saadia). If, however, the Chaldæan catastrophe were meant, then the author of both Psalms, on the ground of Ezra ii. 41, Neh. vii. 44 (cf. xi. 22), might be regarded as an Asaphite of the time of the Exile, although they might also be composed by any one in the Asaphic style. And as regards their relation to Jeremiah, we ought to be contented with the fact that Jeremiah, whose peculiarity as a writer is otherwise so thoroughly reproductive, is, notwithstanding, also reproduced by later writers, and in this instance by the psalmist.

Nothing is more certain than that the physiognomy of these Psalms does not correspond to any national misfortune prior to the Chaldæan catastrophe. Vaihinger's attempt to comprehend them from the time of Athaliah's reign of terror, is at issue with itself. In the history of Israel instances of the sacking of Jerusalem and of the Temple are not unknown even prior to the time of Zedekiah, as in the reign of Jehoram, but there is no instance of the city being reduced to ashes. Since even the profanation of the Temple by the Persian general Bagoses (Josephus, Ant. xi. 7), to which Ewald formerly referred this Psalm, was not accompanied by any injury of the building itself, much less its reduction to ashes, there remains only the choice between the laying waste of Jerusalem and of the Temple in the year 588 and in the year 167. We have reserved to ourselves the liberty of acknowledging some insertions from the time of the Maccabees in the Psalter; supra, vol. i. pp. 11-14. Now since in both Psalms, apart from the מִשְׁאוֹת נֶזֶח, everything accords with the Maccabæan age, whilst when we refer them to the Chaldæan period the scientific conscience is oppressed by many difficulties (more especially in connection with lxxiv. 4, 8, 9, lxxix. 2, 3), we yield to the force of the impression and base both Psalms upon the situation of the Jewish nation under Antiochus and Demetrius. Their contents coincide with the prayer of Judas Maccabæus in 2 Macc. viii. 1-4.

Vers. 1-3. The poet begins with the earnest prayer that God would again have compassion upon His church, upon which His judgment of anger has fallen, and would again set up the ruins of Zion. Why for ever (ver. 10, lxxix. 5, lxxxix. 47, cf. xiii. 2)? is equivalent to, why so continually and, as it seems, without end? The preterite denotes the act of casting off, the future, ver. 1*b*, the lasting condition of this casting off. לְמָה, when the initial of the following word is a guttural, and particularly if it has a merely half-vowel (although in other instances also, Gen. xii. 19, xxvii. 45, Cant. i. 7), is deprived of its Dagesh and accented on the ultima, in order (as Mose ha-Nakdan expressly observes) to guard against the swallowing up of the ah; cf. on x. 1. Concerning the smoking of anger, vid. xviii. 9. The characteristically Asaphic expression זָאֵן מְרַעֲתִי is not less Jeremianic, Jer. xxiii. 1. In ver. 2 God is reminded of what He has once done for the congregation of His people. קָדַם, as in xliv. 2, points back into the Mosaic time of old, to the redemption out of Egypt, which is represented in קָנָה (Ex. xv. 17) as a purchasing, and in נָאֵל (lxxvii. 16, lxxviii. 35, Ex. xv. 13) as a ransoming (redemptio). שִׁבְטֵי נַחֲלֹתָךְ is a factitive object; שִׁבְטֵי is the name given to the whole nation in its distinctness of race from other peoples, as in Jer. x. 16, li. 19, cf. Isa. lxiii. 17. זָה (ver. 2*b*) is rightly separated from הֲרַעֲיוֹן (Mugrash); it stands directly for אֲשֶׁר, as in civ. 8, 26, Prov. xxiii. 22, Job xv. 17 (Ges. § 122, 2). The congregation of the people and its central abode are, as though forgotten of God, in a condition which sadly contrasts with their election. מִשְׁאוֹת נִצָּה are ruins (vid. lxxiii. 18) in a state of such total destruction, that all hope of their restoration vanishes before it; נִצָּה here looks forward, just as עֹלָם (חרבות), Isa. lviii. 12, lxi. 4, looks backwards. May God then lift His feet up high (פָּעָמִים poetical for רַגְלָיִם, cf. lviii. 11 with lxxviii. 24), i.e. with long hurried steps, without stopping, move towards His dwelling-place that now lies in ruins, that by virtue of His interposition it may rise again. Hath the enemy made merciless havoc—he hath ill-treated (הֲרַע, as in xliv. 3) everything (בָּל, as in viii. 7, Zeph. i. 2, for הַבָּל or אֶת-בָּל) in the sanctuary—how is it possible that this sacrilegious vandalism should remain unpunished!

Vers. 4-8. The poet now more minutely describes how the enemy has gone on. Since קִדָּשׁ in ver. 3 is the Temple, מוֹעֲדָיִךְ in ver. 4 ought likewise to mean the Temple with reference to the several courts; but the plural would here (cf. ver. 8*b*) be misleading, and is, too, only a various reading. Baer has rightly decided in favour of מוֹעֲדָךְ; * מוֹעֵד, as in Lam. ii. 6 sq., is the instituted (Num. xvii. 19 [4]) place of God's inter-

* The reading מוֹעֲדָיִךְ is received, e.g., by Elias Hutter and Nissel; the Targum translates it, Kimchi follows it in his interpretation, and Abraham of Zante follows it in his paraphrase; it is tolerably widely known, but, according to the LXX. and Syriac versions and mss., it is to be rejected.

course with His congregation (cf. معياد, a rendezvous). What Jeremiah says in Lam. ii. 7 (cf. שאג, Jer. ii. 15) is here more briefly expressed. By אֹתוֹתָם (ver. 4b) we must not understand military insignia; the scene of the Temple and the supplanting of the Israelitish national insignia to be found there, by the substitution of other insignia, requires that the word should have the religious reference in which it is used of circumcision and of the Sabbath (Ex. xxxi. 13); such heathen אֹתוֹת, which were thrust upon the Temple and the congregation of Jahve as henceforth the lawful ones, were those which are set forth in 1 Macc. i. 45-49, and more particularly the so-called abomination of desolation mentioned in ver. 54 of the same chapter. With יִרַע (ver. 5) the terrible scene which was at that time taking place before their eyes (lxxix. 10) is introduced. בְּמַבְיֵא is the subject; it became visible, tangible, noticeable, i.e. it looked, and one experienced it, as if a man caused the axe to enter into the thicket of the wood, i.e. struck into or at it right and left. The plural קְרִדְמוֹת forces itself into the simile because it is the many heathen warriors who are, as in Jer. xlv. 22 sq., likened to these hewers of wood. Norzi calls the Kametz of בַּמְבָּרֶעַץ Kametz chatuph; the combining form would then be a contraction of כְּבֵף (Ewald, Olshausen), for the long ā of כְּבֵף does not admit of any contraction. According to another view it is to be read bi-sbāch-etz, as in Esth. iv. 8 kēthāb-hadāth (with counter-tone Metheg beside the long vowel, as e.g. עֵץ-הַיָּזֵן, Gen. ii. 16). The poet follows the work of destruction up to the destroying stroke, which is introduced by the ועת (perhaps ועתה, Kerī), which arrests one's attention. In ver. 5 the usual, unbroken quiet is depicted, as is the heavy Cyclopean labour in the Virgilian illi inter sese, etc.; in jahlomūn, ver. 6b (now and then pointed jahlomūn), we hear the stroke of the uplifted axes, which break in pieces the costly carved work of the Temple. The suffix of פְּתוּחֵיהֶּ (the carved works thereof) refers, according to the sense, to מוֹעֵד. The LXX., favouring the Maccabæan interpretation, renders: ἐξέκοψαν τὰς θύρας αὐτῆς (פְּתוּחֵיהֶּ). This shattering of the panelling is followed in ver. 7 by the burning, first of all, as we may suppose, of this panelling itself so far as it consists of wood. The guaranteed reading here is מִקְרִשָּׁךְ, not מִקְרִשֶׁךְ. שָׂלַח בְּאֵשׁ signifies to set on fire, immittere igni, differing from בָּ אֵשׁ, to set fire to, immittere ignem. On לְאָרֶץ הַלְלִי, cf. Lam. ii. 2, Jer. xix. 13. Hitzig, following the LXX., Targum, and Jerome, derives the exclamation of the enemies נִינָם from נִין: their whole generation (viz. we will root out)! But נִין is posterity, descendants; why therefore only the young and not the aged? And why is it an expression of the object and not rather of the action, the object of which would be self-evident? נִינָם is fut. Kal of יָנָה, here = Hiph. הוֹנָה, to force, oppress, tyrannize over, and like אָנָם, to compel by violence, in later Hebrew. נִינָם (from יָנָה, like יִיפָה) is changed in pause into נִינָם; cf. the future forms in Num. xxi. 30, Ex. xxxiv. 19, and also in Ps. cxviii. 10-12. Now, after mention has been made of the burning of the Temple framework, מוֹעֲדֵי־אֵל cannot denote the place of the divine manifestation after its divisions (Hengstenberg), still less the festive assemblies (Böttcher), which the enemy could only have burnt up by setting fire to the Temple over their heads, and כֹּל does not at all suit this. The expression apparently has reference to synagogues (and this ought not to be disputed), as Aquila and Symmachus render the word. For there is no room for thinking of the separate services conducted by the prophets in the northern kingdom (2 Kings iv. 23), because this kingdom no longer existed at the time this Psalm was written; nor of the בְּמֹת, the burning down of which no pious Israelite would have bewailed; nor of the sacred places memorable from the early history of Israel, which are nowhere called מוֹעֲדִים, and after the founding of the central sanctuary appear only as the seats of false religious rites. The expression points (like בַּיִת וְעַר, Sota ix. 15) to places of assembly for religious purposes, to houses for prayer and teaching, that is to say, to synagogues—a weighty instance in favour of the Maccabæan origin of the Psalm.

Vers. 9-11. The worst thing the poet has to complain of is that God has not acknowledged His people during this time of suffering as at other times. "Our signs" is the direct antithesis to "their signs" (ver. 4), hence they are not to be understood, after lxxxvi. 17, as signs which God works. The suffix demands, besides, something of a perpetual character; they are the instituted ordinances of divine worship by means of which God is pleased to stand in fellowship with His people, and which are now no longer to be seen because the enemies have set them aside. The complaint "there is no prophet any more" would seem strange in the period immediately after the destruction of Jerusalem, for Jeremiah's term of active service lasted beyond this. Moreover, a year before (in the tenth year of Zedekiah's reign) he had predicted that the Babylonian domination, and relatively the Exile, would last seventy years; besides, six years before the destruction Ezekiel appeared, who was in communication with those who remained behind in the land. The reference to Lam. ii. 9 (cf. Ezek. vii. 26) does not satisfy one; for there it is assumed that there were prophets, a fact which is here denied. Only perhaps as a voice coming out of the Exile, the middle of which (cf. Hos. iii. 4, 2 Chron. xv. 3, and besides Canticum trium puerorum, ver. 14: καὶ οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν τῷ καιρῷ τούτῳ ἄρχων καὶ προφήτης καὶ ἡγούμενος) was truly thus devoid of signs or miracles, and devoid of the prophetic word of consolation, can ver. 9 be comprehended. The seventy years of Jeremiah were then still a riddle without any generally known solution (Dan. ch. ix.). If, however, synagogues are meant in ver. 8b, ver. 9 now too accords with the like-sounding lament in the calamitous times of Antiochus (1 Macc. iv. 46, ix. 27, xiv. 41). In ver. 10 the poet turns to God Himself with the question "How long?" how long is this (apparently) endless blaspheming of the enemy to last? Why dost Thou draw back (viz. מִפָּנֵינוּ, from us, not עֲלֵינוּ, lxxxi. 15) Thy hand and Thy right hand? The conjunction of synonyms "Thy hand and Thy right hand" is, as in xliv. 4, Sirach xxxiii. 7, a fuller expression for God's omnipotent energy. This is now at rest; ver. 11b calls upon it to give help by an act of judgment. "Out of the midst of Thy bosom, destroy," is a pregnant expression for, "drawing forth out of Thy bosom the hand that rests inactive there, do Thou destroy." The Chethib חֹק has perhaps the same meaning; for חֹק, חֹקִים, signifies, like חֵיק, חֵיקִים, the act of encompassing, then that which encompasses. Instead of מִחֵיקָה (Ex. iv. 7) the expression is מִקְרֹב חֵיק, because there, within the realm of the bosom, the punitive justice of God for a time as it were slumbers. On the בְּלֵיה, which outwardly is without any object, cf. lix. 14.

Vers. 12-17. With this prayer for the destruction of the enemies by God's interposition closes the first half of the

Psalm, which has for its subject-matter the crying contradiction between the present state of things and God's relationship to Israel. The poet now draws comfort by looking back into the time when God as Israel's King unfolded the rich fulness of His salvation everywhere upon the earth, where Israel's existence was imperilled. בְּקֶרֶב הָאָרֶץ, not only within the circumference of the Holy Land, but, e.g., also within that of Egypt (Ex. viii. 18 [22]). The poet has Egypt directly in his mind, for there now follows first of all a glance at the historical (vers. 13-15), and then at the natural displays of God's power (vers. 16, 17). Hengstenberg is of opinion that vers. 13-15 also are to be understood in the latter sense, and appeals to Job xxvi. 11-13. But just as Isaiah (ch. li. 9, cf. xxvii. 1) transfers these emblems of the omnipotence of God in the natural world to His proofs of power in connection with the history of redemption which were exhibited in the case of a worldly power, so does the poet here also in vers. 13-15. The תַּיִם (the extended saurian) is in Isaiah, as in Ezekiel (הַתַּיִם, ch. xxix. 3, xxxii. 2), an emblem of Pharaoh and of his kingdom; in like manner here the leviathan is the proper natural wonder of Egypt. As a water-snake or a crocodile, when it comes up with its head above the water, is killed by a powerful stroke, did God break the heads of the Egyptians, so that the sea cast up their dead bodies (Ex. xiv. 30). The צִיִּים, the dwellers in the steppe, to whom these became food, are not the Æthiopians (LXX., Jerome), or rather the Ichthyophagi (Bochart, Hengstenberg), who according to Agatharcides fed ἐκ τῶν ἐκριπτομένων εἰς τὴν χέρσον κητῶν, but were no cannibals, but the wild beasts of the desert, which are called עַם, as in Prov. xxx. 25 sq. the ants and the rock-badgers. לְצִיִּים is a permutative of the notion לְעַם, which was not completed: to a (singular) people, viz. to the wild animals of the steppe. Ver. 15 also still refers not to miracles of creation, but to miracles wrought in the course of the history of redemption; ver. 15a refers to the giving of water out of the rock (lxxviii. 15), and ver. 15b to the passage through the Jordan, which was miraculously dried up (רוֹבַץ, as in Josh. ii. 10, iv. 23, v. 1). The object מַעְיֵן וְנַחַל is intended as referring to the result: so that the water flowed out of the cleft after the manner of a fountain and a brook. נַחֲלֹת are the several streams of the one Jordan; the attributive genitive אֵיתָן describes them as streams having an abundance that does not dry up, streams of perennial fulness. The God of Israel who has thus marvellously made Himself known in history is, however, the Creator and Lord of all created things. Day and night and the stars alike are His creatures. In close connection with the night, which is mentioned second, the moon, the מָאוֹר of the night, precedes the sun; cf. viii. 4, where בּוֹיָן is the same as הֵיָיִן in this passage. It is an error to render thus: bodies of light, and more particularly the sun; which would have made one expect מְאוֹרוֹת before the specializing Waw. גְּבוּלוֹת are not merely the bounds of the land towards the sea, Jer. v. 22, but, according to Deut. xxxii. 8, Acts xvii. 26, even the boundaries of the land in themselves, that is to say, the natural boundaries of the inland country. קִיץ וְחֹרֶף are the two halves of the year: summer including spring (אָבִיב), which begins in Nisan, the spring-month, about the time of the vernal equinox, and autumn including winter (חֹרֶף), after the termination of which the strictly spring vegetation begins (Cant. ii. 11). The seasons are personified, and are called God's formations or works, as it were the angels of summer and of winter.

Vers. 18-23. The poet, after he has thus consoled himself by the contemplation of the power of God which He has displayed for His people's good as their Redeemer, and for the good of the whole of mankind as the Creator, rises anew to prayer, but all the more cheerfully and boldly. Since ever present facts of creation have been referred to just now, and the historical mighty deeds of God only further back, זָמַח refers rather forwards to the blaspheming of the enemies which He suffers now to go on unpunished, as though He took no cognizance of it. חָרַף has Pasek after it in order to separate the word, which signifies reviling, from the most holy Name. The epithet עַם-נִבְלָל reminds one of Deut. xxxii. 21. In ver. 19a according to the accents חַיָּה is the absolute state (the primary form of חַיָּה, vid. on lxi. 1): give not over, abandon not to the wild beast (beasts), the soul of Thy turtle-dove. This is probably correct, since לְחַיָּה נֶפֶשׁ, "to the eager wild beast," this inversion of the well-known expression נֶפֶשׁ חַיָּה, which on the contrary yields the sense of vita animæ, is an improbable and exampleless expression. If נֶפֶשׁ were intended to be thus understood, the poet might have written חַיָּה תוֹרֵךְ, “give not Thy turtle-dove over to the desire of the wild beast.” Hupfeld thinks that the “old, stupid reading” may be set right at one stroke, inasmuch as he reads אל תתן לנפש חיה חורך, and renders it “give not to rage the life Thy turtle-dove;” but where is any support to be found for this לנפש, “to rage,” or rather (Psychology, S. 202; tr. p. 239) “to eager desire?” The word cannot signify this in such an isolated position. Israel, which is also compared to a dove in lxviii. 14, is called a turtle-dove (תור). In ver. 19b תִּית has the same signification as in ver. 19a, and the same sense as lxviii. 11 (cf. lxi. 37): the creatures of Thy miserable ones, i.e. Thy poor, miserable creatures—a figurative designation of the ecclesia pressa. The church, which it is the custom of the Asaphic Psalms to designate with emblematical names taken from the animal world, finds itself now like sheep among wolves, and seems to itself as if it were forgotten by God. The cry of prayer הִבַּט לְבָרִית comes forth out of circumstances such as were those of the Maccabæan age. בְּרִית is the covenant of circumcision (Gen. ch. xvii.); the persecution of the age of the Seleucidæ put faith to the severe test, that circumcision, this sign which was the pledge to Israel of God’s gracious protection, became just the sign by which the Syrians knew their victims. In the Book of Daniel, ch. xi. 28, 30, cf. Ps. xxii. 32, ברית is used directly of the religion of Israel and its band of confessors. The confirmatory clause ver. 20b also corresponds to the Maccabæan age, when the persecuted confessors hid themselves far away in the mountains (1 Macc. ii. 26 sqq., 2 Macc. vi. 11), but were tracked by the enemy and slain,—at that time the hiding-places (κρύφου, 1 Macc. i. 53) of the land were in reality full of the habitations of violence. The combination נְאוֹת חָמָס is like נְאוֹת הַשָּׁלוֹם, Jer. xxv. 37, cf. Gen. vi. 11. From this point the Psalm draws to a close in more familiar Psalm-strains. אֱלֹהֵי־יִשְׂרָאֵל, ver. 21, viz. from drawing near to Thee with their supplications. “The reproach of the foolish all the day” is that which incessantly goes forth from them. עֲלֶה תָמִיד, “going up (1 Sam. v. 12, not: increasing, 1 Kings xxii. 35) perpetually,” although without the article, is not a predicate, but attributive (vid. on lvii. 3). The tone of the prayer is throughout temperate; this the ground upon which it bases itself is therefore all the more forcible.

PSALM LXXV.

THE NEARNESS OF THE JUDGE WITH THE CUP OF WRATH

- 2 WE give thanks unto Thee, Elohim, we give thanks,
And near is Thy Name:
Men declare Thy wondrous works.
- 3 For "I will seize the moment,
I, in uprightness will I judge.
4 If the earth and all its inhabitants are dissolving—
I, even I set up its pillars." (Sela.)
5 "I say to the boastful: Boast not!
And to the evil-doers: Lift not up the horn!
6 Lift not up on high your horn,
Speak not impudence with a stiff neck!"
- 7 For not from the rising and not from the setting,
And not from the desert of the mountain-heights—
8 Nay, Elohim judgeth the cause,
He putteth down one, and setteth up another.
9 For a cup is in the hand of Jahve,
And it foameth with wine, it is full of mixture;
And He poureth out from it, yea the dregs thereof
Must all the wicked of the earth sip, drink up.
- 10 And I, even I will proclaim for ever,
I will sing praises to the God of Jacob;
11 And all the horns of the wicked will I smite down,
The horns of the righteous shall be exalted.

That for which Ps. lxxiv. prays: Arise, Jahve, plead Thine own cause (vers. 22 sq.), Ps. lxxv. beholds; the judgment of God upon the proud sinners becomes a source of praise and of a triumphant spirit to the psalmist. The prophetic picture stands upon a lyrical groundwork of gold; it emerges out of the depth of feeling, and it is drawn back again into it. The inscription: To the Precentor, (after the measure:) Destroy not (vid. on lvii. 1), a Psalm by Asaph, a Song, is fully borne out.

The Sela shows that the Psalm, as מזמור שיר says, is appointed to be sung with musical accompaniment; and to the לאספה corresponds its thoroughly Asaphic character, which calls Ps. l. to mind with especial force. But from this Psalm Ps. lxxv. differs, however, in this particular, viz. that a more clearly defined situation of affairs manifests itself through the hope of the judicial interposition of God which is expressed in it with prophetic certainty. According to appearances it is the time of the judgment of the nations in the person of Assyria; not, however, the time immediately following the great catastrophe, but prior to this, when Isaiah's prophecy concerning the shattering of the Assyrian power against Jerusalem had gone forth, just as Hengstenberg also regards this Psalm as the lyrical companion of the prophecies which Isaiah uttered in the presence of the ruin which threatened from Assyria, and as a testimony to the living faith with which the church at that time received the word of God. Hitzig, however, assigns both Ps. lxxv. and lxxvi. to Judas Maccabæus, who celebrates the victory over Apollonius in the one, and the victory over Seron in the other: "we may imagine that he utters the words of lxxv. 11 whilst he brandishes the captured sword of the fallen Apollonius." But the probability that it refers to the Assyrian period is at least equally balanced with the probability that it refers to the Maccabæan (vid. lxxv. 7, lxxvi. 5-7); and if the time of Hezekiah were to be given up, then we might sooner go back to the time of Jehoshaphat, for both songs are too original to appear as echoes and not much rather as models of the later prophecy. The only influence that is noticeable in Ps. lxxv. is that of the Song of Hannah.

Vers. 2-6. The church in anticipation gives thanks for the judicial revelation of its God, the near approach of which He Himself asserts to it. The connection with יְקָרוֹב שְׁמֶךָ in יְקָרוֹב presents a difficulty. Neither here nor anywhere else is it to be supposed that יְקָרוֹב is synonymous with קָרַב; but at any rate even כִּי might stand instead of it. For Hupfeld's attempt to explain it: and "near is Thy name" Thy wonders have declared; and Hitzig's: and Thou whose Name is near, they declare Thy wondrous works,—are past remedy. Such a personification of wonders does not belong to the spirit of Hebrew poetry, and such a relative clause lies altogether beyond the bounds of syntax. If we would, however, take וקרוב שמך, after l. 23, as a result of the thanksgiving (Campensis), then that for which thanks are rendered would remain undefined; neither will it do to take קרוב as referring to the being inwardly present (Hengstenberg), since this, according to Jer. xii. 2 (cf. Dent. xxx. 14), would require some addition, which should give to the nearness this reference to the mouth or to the heart. Thus, therefore, nothing remains for us but to connect the nearness of the Name of God as an outward fact with the earnest giving of thanks. The church has received the promise of an approaching judicial, redemptive revelation of God, and now says, "We give Thee thanks, we give thanks and near is Thy Name;" it welcomes the future act of God with heartfelt thanksgiving, all those who belong to it declare beforehand the wonders of God. Such was really the position of matters when in Hezekiah's time the oppression of the Assyrians had reached its highest point—Isaiah's promises of a miraculous divine deliverance were at that time before them, and the believing ones saluted beforehand, with thanksgiving, the "coming Name of Jahve" (Isa. xxx. 27). The קי which was to be expected after הודינו (cf., e.g., c. 4 sq.) does not follow until ver. 3. God Himself undertakes the confirmation of the forthcoming thanksgiving and praise by a direct announcement of the help that is hailed and near at hand (lxxxv. 10). It is not to be rendered, "when I shall seize," etc., for ver. 3b has not the structure of an apodosis. קי is confirmatory, and whatever interpretation we may give to it, the words of the church suddenly change into the words of God. מועד in the language of prophecy, more especially of the apocalyptic character, is a standing expression for the appointed time of the final judgment (vid. on Hab. ii. 3). When this moment or juncture in the lapse of time shall have arrived, then God will seize or take possession of it (לקח in the unweakened original sense of taking hold of with energy, cf. xviii. 17, Gen. ii. 15): He Himself will then interpose and hold judgment according to the strictly observed rule of right (במישרים, adverbial accusative, cf. ix. 9, and frequently). If it even should come to pass that the earth and all its inhabitants are melting away (cf. Isa. xiv. 31, Ex. xv. 15, Josh. ii. 9), i.e. under the pressure of injustice (as is to be inferred from ver. 3*b*), are disheartened, scattered asunder, and are as it were in the act of dissolution, then He (the absolute I, אֲנִי) will restrain this melting away; He setteth in their places the pillars, i.e. the internal shafts (Job ix. 6), of the earth, or without any figure: He again asserts the laws which lie at the foundation of its stability. הַבְּנֵי is a mood of certainty, and ver. 4*a* is a circumstantial clause placed first, after the manner of the Latin ablative absolute. Hitzig appropriately compares Prov. xxix. 9; Isa. xxiii. 15 may also be understood according to this bearing of the case.

The utterance of God is also continued after the Sela. It is not the people of God who turn to the enemies with the language of warning on the ground of the divine promise (Hengstenberg); the poet would then have said אֲמַרְנִי, or must at least have said עַל־כֵּן אֲמַרְתִּי. God Himself speaks, and His words are not yet peremptorily condemning, as in l. 16 sqq., cf. xlvi. 11, but admonitory and threatening, because it is not He who has already appeared for the final judgment who speaks, but He who announces His appearing. With אֲמַרְתִּי He tells the braggarts who are captivated with the madness of supposed greatness, and the evil-doers who lift up the horn or the head,* what He will have once for all said to them, and what they are to suffer to be said to them for the short space of time till the judgment. The poet, if we have assigned the right date to the Psalm, has Rabshakeh and his colleagues before his mind, cf. Isa. xxxvii. 23. The הָ, as in that passage, and like לָ in Zech. ii. 4 (vid. Köhler), has the idea of a hostile tendency. לָ rules also over ver. 6*b*: "speak not insolence with a raised neck." It is not to be construed בְּצוּאָר עֲתָק, with a stiff neck. Parallel passages like xxxi. 19, xciv. 4, and more especially the primary passage 1 Sam. v. 3, show that עֲתָק is an object-notion, and that בְּצוּאָר by itself (with which, too, the accentuation harmonizes, since Munach here is the vicarius of a distinctive), according to Job xv. 26, has the sense of τραχηλιῶτες or ὑπεραυχοῦντες.

* The head is called in Sanscrit çiras, in Zend çaranh, = κάρα; the horn in Sanscrit, çringa, i.e. (according to Burnouf, Etudes, p. 19) that which proceeds from and projects out of the head (çiras), Zend çrva = κέρως, קָרְן (karn).

Vers. 7-9. The church here takes up the words of God, again beginning with the פִּי of ver. 3 (cf. the פִּי in 1 Sam. ii. 3). A passage of the Midrash says כל הרים שבמקרא הרים הוּן מזה (everywhere where harim is found in Scripture it signifies harim, mountains, with the exception of this passage), and accordingly it is explained by Rashi, Kimchi, Alshêch, and others, that man, whithersoever he may turn, cannot by strength and skill attain great exaltation and prosperity.* Thus it is according to the reading מִמְדָּבָר, although Kimchi maintains that it can also be so explained with the reading מִמְדָּבָר, by pointing to מְרַמֵּם (Isa. x. 6) and the like. It is, however, difficult to see why, in order to express the idea "from anywhere," three quarters of the heavens should be used and the north left out. These three quarters of the heavens which are said to represent the earthly sources of power (Hupfeld), are a frame without the picture, and the thought, "from no side (viz. of the earth) cometh promotion"—in itself whimsical in expression—offers a wrong confirmation for the dissuasive that has gone before. That, however, which the church longs for is first of all not promotion, but redemption. On the other hand, the LXX., Targum, Syriac, and Vulgate render: a deserto montium (desertis montibus); and even Aben-Ezra rightly takes it as a Palestinian designation of the south, when he supplements the aposiopesis by means of מִי שְׂוִיעֵם (more biblically עָרְנִי יְבֵא, cf. cxxi. 1 sq.). The fact that the north is not mentioned at all shows that it is a northern power which arrogantly, even to blasphemy, threatens the small Israelitish nation with destruction, and against which it looks for help neither from the east and west, nor from the reed-staff of Egypt (Isa. xxxvi. 6) beyond the desert of the mountains of Arabia Petræa, but from Jahve alone, according to the watchword of Isaiah: ה' שֶׁפָּטָנוּ (Isa. xxxiii. 22). The negative thought is left unfinished, the discourse hurrying on to the opposite affirmative thought. The close connection of the two thoughts is strikingly expressed by the rhymes הָרִים and יָרִים. The פִּי of ver. 8 gives the confirmation of the negation from the opposite, that which is denied; the פִּי of ver. 9 confirms this confirmation.

* E.g. Bamidbar Rabba ch. xxii. ; whereas according to Berêshith Rabba ch. lii. הָרִים is equivalent to יָרוּם.

If it were to be rendered, "and the wine foams," it would then have been  $\text{הִיָּזָה}$ ;  $\text{מִסָּךְ}$ , which is undoubtedly accusative, also shows that  $\text{הִיָּזָה}$  is also not considered as anything else: and it (the cup) foams ( $\text{הִיָּזָה}$  like  $\text{اختمر}$ , to ferment, effervesce) with wine, is full of mixture. According to the ancient usage of the language, which is also followed by the Arabic, this is wine mixed with water in distinction from merum, Arabic chamr memzûge. Wine was mixed with water not merely to dilute it, but also to make it more pleasant; hence  $\text{מִסָּךְ}$  signifies directly as much as to pour out (vid. Hitzig on Isa. v. 22). It is therefore unnecessary to understand spiced wine (Talmudic  $\text{קוֹנְדִּיטוֹן}$ , conditum), since the collateral idea of weakening is also not necessarily associated with the admixture of water.  $\text{מִנְיָה}$  refers to  $\text{בֹּסֵם}$ , which is used as masculine, as in Jer. xxv. 15; the word is feminine elsewhere, and changes its gender even here in  $\text{שְׂמִרְיָהָ}$  (cf. Ezek. xxiii. 34). In the fut. consec.  $\text{וַיִּזְרַח}$  the historical signification of the consecutive is softened down, as is frequently the case.  $\text{וַיִּזְרַח}$  affirms the whole assertion that follows. The dregs of the cup—a dira necessitas—all the wicked of the earth shall be compelled to sip (Isa. li. 17), to drink out: they shall not be allowed to drink and make a pause, but, compelled by Jahve, who has appeared as Judge, they shall be obliged to drink it out with involuntary eagerness even to the very last (Ezek. xxiii. 34). We have here the primary passage of a figure, which has been already hinted at in lx. 5, and is filled in on a more and more magnificent and terrible scale in the prophets. Whilst Obadiah (ver. 16, cf. Job xxi. 20) contents himself with a mere outline sketch, it is found again, in manifold applications, in Isaiah, Habakkuk, and Ezekiel, and most frequently in Jeremiah (ch. xxv. 27 sq., xlvi. 26, xlix. 12), where in ch. xxv. 15 sqq. it is embodied into a symbolical act. Jahve's cup of intoxication (inasmuch as  $\text{הַמָּה$  and  $\text{הַמֵּר}$ , the burning of anger and intoxicating, fiery wine, are put on an equality) is the judgment of wrath which is meted out to sinners and given them to endure to the end.

Vers. 10, 11. The poet now turns back thankfully and cheerfully from the prophetically presented future to his own actual present. With  $\text{וַיִּזְרַח}$  he contrasts himself as a member of the now still oppressed church with its proud oppressors: he will be a perpetual herald of the ever memorable deed of redemption. לְעוֹלָם, says he, for, when he gives himself up so entirely to God the Redeemer, for him there is no dying. If he is a member of the ecclesia pressa, then he will also be a member of the ecclesia triumphans; for εἰ ὑπομένομεν, καὶ συμβασιλεύσομεν (2 Tim. ii. 12). In the certainty of this συμβασιλεύειν, and in the strength of God, which is even now mighty in the weak one, he measures himself in ver. 11 by the standard of what he expresses in ver. 8 as God's own work. On the figure compare Deut. xxxiii. 17, Lam. ii. 3, and more especially the four horns in the second vision of Zechariah, ch. ii. 1 sq. [i. 18 sq.]. The plural is both קַרְנֹת and קַרְנַי, because horns that do not consist of horn are meant. Horns are powers for offence and defence. The spiritual horns maintain the sovereignty over the natural. The Psalm closes as subjectively as it began. The prophetic picture is set in a lyric frame.

PSALM LXXVI.

PRAISE OF GOD AFTER HIS JUDGMENT HAS GONE FORTH.

- 2 IN Judah is Elohim become known,
 In Israel is His name great.
- 3 He pitched His tabernacle in Salem,
 And His dwelling-place in Zion.
- 4 There brake He the lightnings of the bow,
 Shield and sword and weapons of war. (Sela.)
- 5 Brilliant art Thou, glorious before the mountains of prey!
 6 Spoiled were the stout-hearted;
 They fell asleep in their sleep,
 And none of the valiant ones found their hands.
- 7 Before Thy rebuke, O God of Jacob,
 Both chariot and horse became deeply stupefied.
- 8 Thou, terrible art Thou,
 And who can stand before Thee when Thy wrath beginneth?
- 9 From heaven didst Thou cause judgment to sound forth—
 The earth feared and became silent,
- 10 At the rising of Elohim to judgment,
 To save all the afflicted of the land. (Sela.)

- 11 For the wrath of man is to Thee as praise, Seeing Thou with the remainder of the fulness of wrath
 dost gird Thyself.
- 12 Vow and pay unto Jahve, your God, Let all who are round about Him bring offerings to the terrible One.
- 13 He cutteth down the snorting of despots,
 He is terrible to the kings of the earth.

No Psalm has a greater right to follow Ps. lxxv. than this, which is inscribed To the Precentor, with accompaniment of stringed instruments (vid. iv. 1), a Psalm by Asaph, a song. Similar expressions (God of Jacob, lxxv. 10, lxxvi. 7; saints, wicked of the earth, lxxv. 9, lxxvi. 10) and the same impress throughout speak in favour of unity of authorship. In other respects, too, they form a pair: Ps. lxxv. prepares the way for the divine deed of judgment as imminent, which Ps. lxxvi. celebrates as having taken place. For it is hardly possible for there to be a Psalm the contents of which so exactly coincide with an historical situation of which more is known from other sources, as the contents of this Psalm confessedly (LXX. πρὸς τὸν Ἀσσύριον) does with the overtbrow of the army of Assyria before Jerusalem and its results. The Psalter contains very similar Psalms which refer to a similar event in the reign of Jehoshaphat, viz. to the defeat at that time of the allied neighbouring peoples by a mutual massacre, which was predicted by the Asaphite Jahaziel (vid. on Ps. xlv. and lxxxiii.). Moreover in Ps. lxxvi. the "mountains of prey," understood of the mountains of Seir with their mounted robbers, would point to this incident. But just as in Ps. lxxv. the reference to the catastrophe of Assyria in the reign of Hezekiah was indicated by the absence of any mention of the north, so in Ps. lxxvi. both the מַצְרַיִם in ver. 4 and the description of the catastrophe itself make this reference and no other natural. The points of contact with Isaiah, and in part with Hosea (cf. ver. 4 with Hos. ii. 20) and Nahum, are explicable from the fact that the lyric went hand in hand with the prophecy of that period, as Isaiah predicts for the time when Jahve shall discharge His fury over Assyria, ch. xxx. 29, "Your song shall re-echo as in the night, in which the feast is celebrated."

The Psalm is hexastichic, and a model of symmetrical strophe-structure.

Vers. 2-4. In all Israel, and more especially in Judah, is Elohim known (here, according to ver. 2*b*, participle, whereas in ix. 17 it is the finite verb), inasmuch as He has made Himself known (cf. יָעִי, Isa. xxxiii. 13). His Name is great in Israel, inasmuch as He has proved Himself to be a great One and is praised as a great One. In Judah more especially, for in Jerusalem, and that upon Zion, the citadel with the primeval gates (xxiv. 7), He has His dwelling-place upon earth within the borders of Israel. יְשׁלֵם is the ancient name of Jerusalem; for the Salem of Melchizedek is one and the same city with the Jerusalem of Adonizedek, Josh. x. 1. In this primeval Salem God has סִבְבוֹ, His tabernacle (= יְשׁוּבוֹ, Lam. ii. 6, = סִבְבוֹ, as in xxvii. 5), there מְעוֹנָתוֹ, His dwelling-place,—a word elsewhere used of the lair of the lion (civ. 22, Am. iii. 4); cf. on the choice of words, Isa. xxxi. 9. The future of the result יִיָּהּ is an expression of the fact which is evident from God's being known in Judah and His Name great in Israel. Ver. 4 tells what it is by which He has made Himself known and glorified His Name. יָשָׁה, thitherwards, in that same place (as in fact the accusative, in general, is used both in answer to the question where? and whither?), is only a fuller form for יָשָׁה, as in Isa. xxii. 18, lxxv. 9, 2 Kings xxiii. 8, and frequently; יָשָׁה (יָשָׁה) and יָשָׁה (from יָשָׁה) confirm the accusative value of the ah. יָשָׁה (with Phœ raphatum, cf. on the other hand, Cant. viii. 6*) are the arrows swift as lightning that go forth (Job xli. 20 [28]) from the bow; side by side with these, two other weapons are also mentioned, and finally everything that pertains to war is gathered up in the word מִלְחָמָה (cf. Hos. ii. 20 [18]). God has broken in pieces the weapons of the worldly power directed against Judah, and therewith this power itself (Isa. xiv. 25), and consequently (in accordance with the prediction Hos. i. 7, and Isa. ch. x., xiv. xvii., xxix., xxxi., xxxiii., xxxvii., and more particularly xxxi. 8) has rescued His people by direct interposition, without their doing anything in the matter.

Vers. 5-7. The "mountains of prey," for which the LXX. has ὄρέων αἰωνίων (מַטְרִי?), is an emblematical appellation for the haughty possessors of power who also plunder every one that comes near them,* or the proud and despoiling worldly powers. Far aloft beyond these towers the glory of God. He is נְאֻרִי, illustris, prop. illumined; said of God: light-encircled, fortified in light, in the sense of Dan. ii. 22, 1 Tim. vi. 16. He is the נְאֻרִי, to whom the Lebanon of the hostile army of the nations must succumb (Isa. x. 34). According to Solinus (ed. Mommsen, p. 124) the Moors call Atlas Addirim. This succumbing is described in vers. 6 sq. The strong of heart or stout-hearted, the lion-hearted, have been despoiled, disarmed, exuti; אֲשֶׁתֹּלְלִי † is an Aramaizing præter. Hithpo. (like אֲתַחֲבֵר, 2 Chron. xx. 35, cf. Dan. iv. 16, Isa. lxiii. 3) with a passive signification. From ver. 6ac we see that the beginning of the catastrophe is described, and therefore נָמְנוּ (perhaps on that account accented on the ult.) is meant inchoatively: they have fallen into their sleep, viz. the eternal sleep (Jer. li. 39, 57), as Nahum says (ch. iii. 18): thy shepherds sleep, O king of Assyria, thy valiant ones rest. In ver. 6c we see them lying in the last throes of death, and making a last effort to spring up again. But they cannot find their hands, which they have lifted up threateningly against Jerusalem: these are lamed, motionless, rigid and dead; cf. the phrases in Josh. viii. 20, 2 Sam. vii. 27, and the Talmudic phrase, "he did not find his hands and feet in the school-house," i.e. he was entirely disconcerted and stupefied.‡ This field of corpses is the effect of the omnipotent energy of the word of the God of Jacob; cf. וַיַּעַר בּוֹ, Isa. xvii. 13. Before His threatening both war-chariot and horse (?!-) are sunk into motionlessness and unconsciousness—an allusion to Ex. ch. xv., as in Isa. xliii. 17: who bringeth out chariot and horse, army and heroes—together they faint away, they shall never rise; they have flickered out, like a wick they are extinguished.

Vers. 8-10. Nahum also (ch. i. 6) draws the same inference from the defeat of Sennacherib as the psalmist does in ver. 8. מִצְּאֵזָא (cf. Ruth ii. 7, Jer. xlv. 18), from the decisive turning-point onwards, from the אָז in ii. 5, when Thine anger breaks forth. God sent forth His judiciary word from heaven into the midst of the din of war of the hostile world: immediately (cf. on the sequence of the tenses xlvi. 6, and on Hab. iii. 10) it was silenced, the earth was seized with fear, and its tumult was obliged to cease, when, namely, God arose on behalf of His disquieted, suffering people, when He spoke as we read in Isa. xxxiii. 10, and fulfilled the prayer offered in extreme need in Isa. xxxiii. 2.

Vers. 11-13. The fact that has just been experienced is substantiated in ver. 11 from a universal truth, which has therein become outwardly manifest. The rage of men shall praise Thee, i.e. must ultimately redound to Thy glory, inasmuch as to Thee, namely (ver. 11*b* as to syntax like lxxiii. 3*b*), there always remains a שְׂאֵרִית, i.e. a still unexhausted remainder, and that not merely of חֵמָה, but of חֵמַת, with which Thou canst gird, i.e. arm, Thyself against such human rage, in order to quench it. שְׂאֵרִית חֵמַת is the infinite store of wrath still available to God after human rage has done its utmost. Or perhaps still better, and more fully answering to the notion of שְׂאֵרִית: it is the store of the infinite fulness of wrath which still remains on the side of God after human rage (חֵמָה) has spent itself, when God calmly, and laughing (ii. 4), allows the Titans to do as they please, and which is now being poured out. In connection with the interpretation: with the remainder of the fury (of hostile men) wilt Thou gird Thyself, i.e. it serves Thee only as an ornament (Hupfeld), the alternation of חֵמָה and חֵמַת is left unexplained, and תִּתְקַר is alienated from its martial sense (Isa. lix. 17, li. 9, Wisd. v. 21 [20]), which is required by the context. Ewald, like the LXX., reads תִּתְקַר, ἐορτάσει σοι, in connection with which, apart from the high-sounding expression, שְׂאֵרִית חֵמַת (ἐγκατάλειμμα ἐνθυμίου) must denote the remainder of malignity that is suddenly converted into its opposite; and one does not see why what ver. 11*a* says concerning rage is here limited to its remainder. Such an inexhaustiveness in the divine wrath-power has been shown in what has just recently been experienced. Thus, then, are those who belong to the people of God to vow and pay, i.e. (inasmuch as the preponderance falls upon the second imperative) to pay their vows; and all who are round about Him, i.e. all peoples dwelling round about Him and His people (בְּלִפְתֵּי הַיְיָ, the subject to what follows, in accordance with which it is also accented), are to bring offerings (lxviii. 30) to God, who is מוֹרָא, i.e. the sum of all that is awe-inspiring. Thus is He called in Isa. viii. 13; the summons accords with Isaiah's prediction, according to which, in consequence of Jahve's deed of judgment upon Assyria, Æthiopia presents himself to Him as an offering (ch. xviii.), and with the fulfilment in 2 Chron. xxxii. 23. Just so does ver. 13*a* resemble the language of Isaiah; cf. Isa. xxv. 1-5, xxxiii. 11, xviii. 5: God treats the snorting of the princes, i.e. despots, as the vine-dresser does the wild shoots or branches of the vine-stock: He lops it, He cuts it off, so that it is altogether ineffectual. It is the figure that is sketched by Joel iv. [iii.] 13, then filled in by Isaiah, and embodied as a vision in Apoc. xiv. 17-20, which is here indicated. God puts an end to the defiant, arrogant bearing of the tyrants of the earth, and becomes at last the feared of all the kings of the earth—all kingdoms finally become God's and His Christ's.

PSALM LXXVII.

COMFORT DERIVED FROM THE HISTORY OF THE PAST
DURING YEARS OF AFFLICTION.

- 2 I CALL unto Elohim, and will cry,
I call unto Elohim, that He may hearken unto me.
- 3 In the day of my distress do I seek the Lord;
My hand is stretched out in the night without ceasing,
My soul refuseth to be comforted.
- 4 If I remember Elohim, I must groan;
If I muse, my spirit languisheth. (Sela.)

- 5 Thou holdest mine eyelids open,
I am tossed to and fro, and I am speechless.
- 6 I consider the days of old,
The years of ancient times;
- 7 I will remember my music in the night,
I will commune with my own heart, and my spirit maketh diligent search.
- 8 Will the Lord cast off for ever,
And will He be favourable no more?
- 9 Is, then, His mercy passed away for ever,
Is it at an end with His promise to all generations?
- 10 Hath God forgotten to be gracious,
Or hath He drawn in in anger His tender mercies?! (Sela.)
- 11 Thereupon say I to myself: my decree of affliction is this,
The years of the right hand of the Most High.
- 12 With praise do I remember the deeds of Jāh, Yea, I will call to mind Thy wondrous doing from olden times,
- 13 And meditate on all Thy work,
And will muse over Thy doings.
- 14 Elohim, in holiness is Thy way:
Where is there a God, great as Elohim?
- 15 Thou art God alone, doing wonders,
Thou hast revealed Thy might among the peoples.
- 16 Thou hast with uplifted arm redeemed Thy people,
The sons of Jacob and Joseph. (Sela.)
- 17 The waters saw Thee, Elohim,
The waters saw Thee, they writhed,
The depths also trembled.
- 18 The clouds poured out waters,
The skies rumbled,
Thine arrows also went to and fro.
- 19 Thy thunder resounded in the whirlwind,
The lightnings lightened the world,
The earth trembled and shook.
- 20 In the sea was Thy way,
And Thy path in great waters,
And Thy footsteps were not to be discerned.

21 Thou hast led Thy people like a flock
By the hand of Moses and Aaron.

“The earth feared and became still,” says Ps. lxxvi. 9; the earth trembled and shook, says Ps. lxxvii. 19: this common thought is the string on which these two Psalms are strung. In a general way it may be said of Ps. lxxvii., that the poet flees from the sorrowful present away into the memory of the years of olden times, and consoles himself more especially with the deliverance out of Egypt, so rich in wonders. As to the rest, however, it remains obscure what kind of national affliction it is which drives him to find his refuge from the God who is now hidden in the God who was formerly manifest. At any rate it is not a purely personal affliction, but, as is shown by the consolation sought in the earlier revelations of power and mercy in connection with the national history, an affliction shared in company with the whole of his people. In the midst of this hymnic retrospect the Psalm suddenly breaks off, so that Olshausen is of opinion that it is mutilated, and Tholuck that the author never completed it. But as Ps. lxxvii. and lxxxii. show, it is the Asaphic manner thus to close with an historical picture without the line of thought recurring to its commencement. Where our Psalm leaves off, Hab. ch. iii. goes on, taking it up from that point like a continuation. For the prophet begins with the prayer to revive that deed of redemption of the Mosaic days of old, and in the midst of wrath to remember mercy; and in expression and figures which are borrowed from our Psalm, he then beholds a fresh deed of redemption by which that of old is eclipsed. Thus much, at least, is therefore very clear, that Ps. lxxvii. is older than Habakkuk. Hitzig certainly calls the psalmist the reader and imitator of Hab. ch. iii.; and Philipponson considers even the mutual relationship to be accidental and confined to a general similarity of certain expressions. We, however, believe that we have proved in our Commentary on Habakkuk (1843), S. 118–125, that the mutual relationship is one that is deeply grounded in the prophetic type of Habakkuk, and that the Psalm is heard to re-echo in Habakkuk, not Habakkuk in the language of the psalmist; just as in general the Asaphic Psalms are full of boldly sketched outlines to be filled in by later prophetic writers. We also now further put this question: how was it possible for the gloomy complaint of Ps. lxxvii., which is turned back to the history of the past, to mould itself after Hab. ch. iii., that joyous looking forward into a bright and blessed future? Is not the prospect in Hab. ch. iii. rather the result of that retrospect in Ps. lxxvii., the confidence in being heard which is kindled by this Psalm, the realizing as present, in the certainty of being heard, of a new deed of God in which the deliverances in the days of Moses are antitypically revived?

More than this, viz. that the Psalm is older than Habakkuk, who entered upon public life in the reign of Josiah, or even as early as in the reign of Manasseh, cannot be maintained. For it cannot be inferred from ver. 16 and ver. 3, compared with Gen. xxxvii. 35, that one chief matter of pain to the psalmist was the fall of the kingdom of the ten tribes which took place in his time. Nothing more, perhaps, than the division of the kingdom which had already taken place seems to be indicated in these passages. The bringing of the tribes of Joseph prominently forward is, however, peculiar to the Asaphic circle of songs.

The task of the precentor is assigned by the inscription to Jeduthun (Chethib: Jedithun), for ל (xxxix. 1) alternates with על (lxii. 1); and the idea that ידוּתוֹן denotes the whole of the Jeduthunites ("overseer over . . .") might be possible, but is without example.

The strophe schema of the Psalm is 7. 12. 12. 2. The first three strophes or groups of stichs close with Sela.

Vers. 2-4. The poet is resolved to pray without intermission, and he prays; for his soul is comfortless and sorely tempted by the vast distance between the former days and the present times. According to the pointing, יְהוָהּ appears to be meant to be imperative after the form הִקְטִיל, which occurs instead of הִקְטִיל and הִקְטִילָהּ, cf. xciv. 1, Isa. xliii. 8, Jer. xvii. 18, and the mode of writing הִקְטִיל, cxlii. 5, 2 Kings viii. 6, and frequently; therefore et audi = ut audias (cf. 2 Sam. xxi. 3). But such an isolated form of address is not to be tolerated; יְהוָהּ has been regarded as perf. consec. in the sense of ut audiat, although this modification of יְהוָהּ into יְהוָהּ in connection with the appearing of the Waw consec. cannot be supported in any other instance (Ew. § 234, e), and Kimchi on this account tries to persuade himself to that which is impossible, viz. that  $\text{הַלַּיְלָה}$  in respect of sound stands for  $\text{לַיְלָה}$ . The preterites in ver. 3 express that which has commenced and which will go on. The poet labours in his present time of affliction to press forward to the Lord, who has withdrawn from him; his hand is diffused, i.e. stretched out (not: poured out, for the radical meaning of  $\text{נָגַר}$ , as the Syriac shows, is protrahere), in the night-time without wearying and leaving off; it is fixedly and stedfastly ( $\text{לִפְנֵי הַמָּוֶה}$ , as it is expressed in Ex. xvii. 12) stretched out towards heaven. His soul is comfortless, and all comfort up to the present rebounds as it were from it (cf. Gen. xxxvii. 35, Jer. xxxi. 15). If he remembers God, who was once near to him, then he is compelled to groan (cf. lv. 18, 3; and on the cohortative form of a Lamed He verb, cf. Ges. § 75, 6), because He has hidden Himself from him; if he muses, in order to find Him again, then his spirit veils itself, i.e. it sinks into night and feebleness ( $\text{הִתְעַמְּרָה}$  as in cvii. 5, cxlii. 4, cxliii. 4). Each of the two members of ver. 4 are protasis and apodosis; concerning this emotional kind of structure of a sentence, vid. Ewald, § 357, b.

Vers. 5-10. He calls his eyelids the "guards of my eyes." He who holds these so that they remain open when they want to shut together for sleep, is God; for his looking up to Him keeps the poet awake in spite of all overstraining of his powers. Hupfeld and others render thus: "Thou hast held, i.e. caused to last, the night-watches of mine eyes,"—which is affected in thought and expression. The preterites state what has been hitherto and has not yet come to a close. He still endures, as formerly, such thumps and blows within him, as though he lay upon an anvil ( $\text{עַל הַמַּלְחָה}$ ), and his voice fails him. Then silent soliloquy takes the place of audible prayer; he throws himself back in thought to the days of old (cxliii. 5), the years of past periods (Isa. li. 9), which were so rich in the proofs of the power and loving-kindness of the God who was then manifest, but is now hidden. He remembers the happier past of his people and his own, inasmuch as he now in the night purposely calls back to himself in his mind the time when joyful thankfulness impelled him to the song of praise accompanied by the music of the harp ( $\text{בְּלִילָה}$  belongs according to the accents to the verb, not to  $\text{נְגִינָתִי}$ , although that construction certainly is strongly commended by parallel passages like xvi. 7, xlii. 9, xcii. 3, cf. Job xxxv. 10), in place of which, crying and sighing and gloomy silence have now entered. He gives himself up to musing "with his heart," i.e. in the retirement of his inmost nature, inasmuch as he allows his thoughts incessantly to hover to and fro between the present and the former days, and in consequence of this (fut. consec. as in xlii. 6) his spirit betakes itself to scrupulizing (what the LXX. reproduces with σκάλλειν, Aquila with σκαλεύειν)—his conflict of temptation grows fiercer. Now follow the two doubting questions of the tempted one: he asks in different applications, vers. 8-10 (cf. lxxxv. 6), whether it is then all at an end with God's loving-kindness and promise, at the same time saying to himself, that this nevertheless is at variance with the unchangeableness of His nature (Mal. iii. 6) and the inviolability of His covenant. סָפַס (only occurring as a 3. præt.) alternates with נָמַר (xii. 2). הַנּוֹת is an infinitive construct formed after the manner of the Lamed He verbs, which, however, does also occur as infinitive absolute (שָׁמַוּת, Ezek. xxxvi. 3, cf. on xvii. 3); Gesenius and Olshausen (who doubts this infinitive form, § 245, f) explain it, as do Aben-Ezra and Kimchi, as the plural of a substantive הַנּוֹה, but in the passage cited from Ezekiel (vid. Hitzig) such a substantial plural is syntactically impossible. קָפַץ הַרְחָמִים is to draw together or contract and draw back one's compassion, so that it does not manifest itself outwardly, just as he who will not give shuts (יָקַפְּ) his hand (Deut. xv. 7; cf. supra, xvii. 10).

Vers. 11-16. With וְאִמַּר the poet introduces the self-encouragement with which he has hitherto calmed himself when such questions of temptation were wont to intrude themselves upon him, and with which he still soothes himself. In the rendering of הַלִּחְתִּי (with the tone regularly drawn back before the following monosyllable) even the Targum wavers between מִצְרַעְתִּי (my affliction) and בְּעִתִּי (my supplication); and just in the same way, in the rendering of ver. 11b, between אִשְׁתַּחֲוִי (have changed) and שָׁנָי (years). שָׁנָה cannot possibly signify "change" in an active sense, as Luther renders: "The right hand of the Most High can change everything," but only a having become different (LXX. and the Quinta ἀλλοίωσις, Symmachus ἐπιδευτέρωσις), after which Maurer, Hupfeld, and Hitzig render thus: my affliction is this, that the right hand of the Most High has changed. But after we have read שנת in ver. 6 as a poetical plural of שנה, a year, we have first of all to see whether it may not have the same signification here. And many possible interpretations present themselves. It can be interpreted: "my supplication is this: years of the right hand of the Most High" (viz. that years like to the former ones may be renewed); but this thought is not suited to the introduction with נאמתי. We must either interpret it: my sickness, viz. from the side of God, i.e. the temptation which befalls me from Him, the affliction ordained by Him for me (Aquila ἀρρώστια μου), is this (cf. Jer. x. 19); or, since in this case the unambiguous נאמתי would have been used instead of the Piel: my being pierced, my wounding, my sorrow is this (Symmachus τρωσίς μου, inf. Kal from נלתי, cix. 22, after the form תנות from נתן)—they are years of the right hand of the Most High, i.e. those which God's mighty hand, under which I have to humble myself (1 Pet. v. 6), has formed and measured out to me. In connection with this way of taking ver. 11b, ver. 12a is now suitably and easily attached to what has gone before. The poet says to himself that the affliction allotted to him has its time, and will not last for ever. Therein lies a hope which makes the retrospective glance into the happier past a source of consolation to him. In ver. 12a the Chethib אזכיר is to be retained, for the כי in ver. 12b is thus best explained: "I bring to remembrance, i.e. make known with praise or celebrate (Isa. lxiii. 7), the deeds of Jāh, for I will remember Thy wondrous doing from days of old." His sorrow over the distance between the present and the past is now mitigated by the hope that God's right hand, which now casts down, will also again in His own time raise up. Therefore he will now, as the advance from the indicative to the cohortative (cf. xvii. 15) imports, thoroughly console and refresh himself with God's work of salvation in all its miraculous manifestations from the earliest times. יה is the most concise and comprehensive appellation for the God of the history of redemption, who, as Habakkuk prays, will revive His work of redemption in the midst of the years to come, and bring it to a glorious issue. To Him who then was and who will yet come the poet now brings praise and celebration. The way of God is His historical rule, and more especially, as in Hab. iii. 6, הליכות, His redemp-tive rule. The primary passage Ex. xv. 11 (cf. Ps. lxxviii. 25) shows that שְׁכִינָה is not to be rendered "in the sanctuary" (LXX. ἐν τῷ ἁγίῳ), but "in holiness" (Symmachus ἐν ἀγίασμῳ). Holy and glorious in love and in anger, God goes through history, and shows Himself there as the incomparable One, with whose greatness no being, and least of all any one of the beingless gods, can be measured. He is אֱלֹהִים, the God, God absolutely and exclusively, a miracle-working (אֱלֹהֵי פִלְאָה, not אֱלֹהֵי פִלְאָה, cf. Gen. i. 11*) God, and a God who by these very means reveals Himself as the living and supra-mundane God. He has made His omnipotence known among the peoples, viz., as ver. 16 says, by the redemption of His people, the tribes of Jacob and the double tribe of Joseph, out of Egypt,—a deed of His arm, i.e. the work of His own might, by which He has proved Himself to all peoples and to the whole earth to be the Lord of the world and the God of salvation (Ex. ix. 16, xv. 14). בְּרִיחַ, brachio scil. extenso (Ex. vi. 6, Deut. iv. 34, and frequently), just as in lxxv. 6, בְּצִוְיָא, collo scil. erecto. The music here strikes in; the whole strophe is an overture to the following hymn in celebration of God, the Redeemer out of Egypt.

Vers. 17-20. When He directed His glance towards the Red Sea, which stood in the way of His redeemed, the waters immediately fell as it were into pangs of travail (יְהִיִּי, as in Hab. iii. 10, not יַיִחִיִּי), also the billows of the deep trembled; for before the omnipotence of God the Redeemer, which creates a new thing in the midst of the old creation, the rules of the ordinary course of nature become unhinged. There now follow in vers. 18, 19 lines taken from the picture of a thunder-storm. The poet wishes to describe how all the powers of nature became the servants of the majestic revelation of Jahve, when He executed judgment on Egypt and delivered Israel. זָרַם, Poel of זָרַם (cognate זָרַב, זָרַף, Æthiopic זָרַם, to rain), signifies inten-

* The joining of the second word, accented on the first syllable and closely allied in sense, on to the first, which is accented on the ultima (the tone of which, under certain circumstances, retreats to the penult., נִסּוּג אֶחָד) or monosyllabic, by means of the hardening Dagesh (the so-called דְּהִיט), only takes place when that first word ends in הַּ or הָ, not when it ends in הֶ.

sively: to stream forth in full torrents. Instead of this line, Habakkuk, with a change of the letters of the primary passage, which is usual in Jeremiah more especially, has זָרַם מַיִם עֲבָרָה. The rumbling which the שִׁחָקִים* cause to sound forth (נִתְנוּ, cf. lxviii. 34) is the thunder. The arrows of God (חֲצִצְדִּים, in Habakkuk חֲצִצְדֵי) are the lightnings. The Hithpa. (instead of which Habakkuk has יִהְלִכֵי) depicts their busy darting hither and thither in the service of the omnipotence that sends them forth. It is open to question whether גִּלְגֵּל denotes the roll of the thunder (Aben-Ezra, Maurer, Böttcher): the sound of Thy thunder went rolling forth (cf. xxix. 4),—or the whirlwind accompanying the thunder-storm (Hitzig); the usage of the language (lxxxiii. 14, also Ezek. x. 13, Syriac golgolo) is in favour of the latter. On ver. 19*bc* cf. the echo in xcvi. 4. Amidst such commotions in nature above and below Jahve strode along through the sea, and made a passage for His redeemed. His person and His working were invisible, but the result which attested His active presence was visible. He took His way through the sea, and cut His path (Chethlâb plural, שְׁבִילָיִךְ, as in Jer. xviii. 15) through great waters (or, according to Habakkuk, caused His horses to go through), without the footprints (עֲקֵבוֹת with Dag. dirimens) of Him who passes and passed through being left behind to show it.

* We have indicated on xviii. 12, xxxvi. 6, that the שִׁחָקִים are so called from their thinness, but passages like xviii. 12 and the one before us do not favour this idea. One would think that we have more likely to go back to سَاحِقٌ, to be distant (whence suhk, distance; sahik, distant), and that שִׁחָקִים signifies the distances, like שָׁמַיִם, the heights, from שִׁחָק = suhk, in distinction from שִׁחָק, an atom (Wetzstein). But the Hebrew affords no trace of this verbal stem, whereas سَاحِقٌ, شَحَقٌ, contundere, comminuer (Neshwân: to pound to dust, used e.g. of the apothecary's drugs), is just as much Hebrew as Arabic. And the word is actually associated with this verb by the Arabic mind, inasmuch as سَكَابٌ سَاحِقٌ (nubes tenues, nubila tenuia) is explained by سَكَابٌ رَقِيقٌ. Accordingly שִׁחָקִים, according to its primary notion, signifies that which spreads itself out thin and fine over a wide surface, and, according to the usage of the language, in contrast with the thick and heavy פְּנֵי הָאָרֶץ, the uppermost stratum of the atmosphere, and then the clouds, as also أَعْنََانٌ, and the collective عَنَنٌ and عَنَانٌ (vid. Isaiah, i. 156, note 1), is not first of all the clouds, but the surface of the sky that is turned to us (Fleischer).

Ver. 21. If we have divided the strophes correctly, then this is the refrain-like close. Like a flock God led His people by Moses and Aaron (Num. xxxiii. 1) to the promised goal. At this favourite figure, which is as it were the monogram of the Psalms of Asaph and of his school, the poet stops, losing himself in the old history of redemption, which affords him comfort in abundance, and is to him a prophecy of the future lying behind the afflictive years of the present.

PSALM LXXVIII.

THE WARNING-MIRROR OF HISTORY FROM MOSES TO DAVID.

- 1 GIVE ear, O my people, to my teaching,
Incline your ear to the utterances of my mouth.
- 2 I will open my mouth with a parable,
I will pour forth riddles out of the days of old.
- 3 What we have heard, and become conscious of,
And our fathers have told us,
- 4 We will not hide from their children ;
Telling to the generation to come the glorious deeds of Jahve,
And His proof of power and His wonders, which He hath done.
- 5 He hath established a testimony in Jacob
And laid down a law in Israel,
Which He hath commanded our fathers
To make it known unto their children ;
- 6 In order that the generation to come might know it, the children born afterwards,
That they might arise and tell it again to their children,
- 7 And might place their confidence in Elohim,
And might not forget the deeds of God,
And might keep His commandments—

- 8 And might not become as their fathers a stubborn and rebellious generation,
A generation that set not its heart aright,
And whose spirit was not faithful towards God.
- 9 The sons of Ephraim, the bow-equipped archers, Turned back in the day of battle.
- 10 They kept not the covenant of Elohim,
And in His law they refused to walk.
- 11 And they forgot His works
And His wonders, which He showed them.
- 12 In the sight of their fathers He proved Himself to be a miracle-worker,
In the land of Egypt, in the field of Zoan.
- 13 He divided the sea, and led them through,
And piled the waters up as a heap ;
- 14 And led them in the cloud by day,
And the whole night in a fiery light.
- 15 He clave rocks in the desert,
And gave them as it were the floods of the sea to drink abundantly,
- 16 And brought forth streams out of the rock,
And caused the waters to flow down like rivers.
- 17 They, however, continued further to sin against Him,
To act rebelliously towards the Most High in a parched land.
- 18 They tempted God in their heart
To desire food for their soul,
- 19 And spake against Elohim, they said :
“ Will God be able to prepare a table in the desert ?
- 20 Behold He smote rock, and waters gushed out,
And streams dashed along—
Will He also be able to give bread,
Or to provide flesh for His people ? ”
- 21 Therefore, hearing this, Jahve was wroth,
And fire kindled in Jacob,
And anger also ascended against Israel
- 22 For they believed not in Elohim,
And trusted not in His salvation.

- 23 Nevertheless He commanded the clouds above,
And the doors of heaven He opened;
24 He rained upon them manna to eat,
And corn of heaven gave He unto them.
25 Bread of angels did man eat,
Meat He sent them in superabundance.
- 26 He caused the east wind to blow in the heaven,
And by His power brought on the south wind,
27 And rained flesh upon them like the dust,
And winged fowls as the sand of the seas.
28 And it fell within the circuit of its camp,
Round about its tents.
29 Then they did eat and were well filled,
And their desire He fulfilled to them.
- 30 Still they were not estranged from their desire,
The food was still in their mouth,
31 Then the anger of Elohim went up against them,
And slew among their fat ones,
And smote down the young men of Israel.
32 For all this they sinned still more,
And believed not in His wonders.
33 Then He made their days vanish in a breath,
And their years in sudden haste.
- 34 When He slew them, they inquired after Him,
They turned back and sought God diligently,
35 And remembered that Elohim was their rock,
And God the Most High their Redeemer.
36 They appeased Him with their mouth,
And with their tongue they lied unto Him;
37 But their heart was not stedfast with Him,
And they did not prove faithful in His covenant.
- 38 Nevertheless He is full of compassion—
He forgiveth iniquity and doth not destroy,
And hath oftentimes restrained His anger,
And stirred not up all His fury.

- 39 He remembered that they were flesh,
A breath of wind that passeth by and returneth not.
- 40 How oft did they provoke Him in the desert,
Did they grieve Him in the wilderness!
- 41 And again and again they sought God,
And vexed the Holy One of Israel.
- 42 They remembered not His hand,
The day when He delivered them from the oppressor,
- 43 When He set His signs in Egypt
And His remarkable deeds in the field of Zoan.
- 44 He turned their Niles into blood,
And their running waters they could not drink.
- 45 He sent gad-flies against them, which devoured them,
And frogs, which brought destruction upon them.
- 46 He gave the fruit of their field to the cricket,
And their labour to the locust;
- 47 He smote down their vine with hail,
And their sycamore-trees with hail-stones;
- 48 And He gave over their cattle to the hail,
And their flocks to the lightnings.
- 49 He let loose upon them the burning of His anger, Indignation and fury and distress,
An embassy of angels of misfortune;
- 50 He made plain a way for His anger,
He spared not their soul from death,
And their life He gave over to the pestilence.
- 51 He smote all the first-born in Egypt,
The firstlings of manly strength in the tents of Ham.
- 52 Then He made His own people to go forth like sheep,
And guided them like a flock in the desert;
- 53 And He led them safely without fear,
But their enemies the sea covered.
- 54 He brought them to His holy border,
To the mountain, which His right hand had acquired;
- 55 He drove out nations before them,

And allotted them as a marked out inheritance,
And settled the tribes of Israel in their tents.

56 Nevertheless they tempted and provoked Elohim the Most High,

And His testimonies they kept not.

57 They turned back and fell away like their fathers,
They turned aside like a deceitful bow.

58 They incensed Him by their high places,
And by their idols they excited His jealousy.

59 Elohim heard and was wroth,
And became greatly wearied with Israel.

60 Then He cast off the tabernacle of Shiloh,
The tent which He had pitched among men ;

61 He gave His might into captivity,
And His glory into the oppressor's hand.

62 He gave over His people to the sword,
And was wroth concerning His inheritance.

63 Their young men fire devoured,
And for their maidens they sang no bridal song.

64 Their priests, by the sword they fell,
And their widows could not mourn.

65 Then the Lord awaked as one sleeping,
As a hero, shouting from wine,

66 And smote their oppressors behind,
Eternal reproach did He put upon them—

67 And He despised the tent of Joseph,
And the tribe of Ephraim He chose not.

68 He chose the tribe of Judah,
The mount Zion, which He hath loved.

69 And He built, as the heights of heaven, His sanctuary,
Like the earth which He hath founded for ever.

70 And He chose David His servant,
And took him from the sheep-folds ;

71 Following the ewes that gave suck He took him away
To pasture Jacob His people,
And Israel His inheritance.

72 And he pastured them according to the integrity of his heart,
 And with judicious hands he led them.

In the last verse of Ps. lxxvii. Israel appears as a flock which is led by Moses and Aaron; in the last verse of Ps. lxxviii. as a flock which is led by David, of a pure heart, with judicious hands. Both Psalms also meet in thoughts and expressions, just as the מִשְׁכֵּל of both leads one to expect. Ps. lxxviii. is called Maskil, a meditation. The word would also be appropriate here in the signification "a didactic poem." For the history of Israel is recapitulated here from the leading forth out of Egypt through the time of the Judges down to David, and that with the practical application for the present age that they should cleave faithfully to Jahve, more faithfully than the rebellious generation of the fathers. After the manner of the Psalms of Asaph the Ephraimites are made specially prominent out of the whole body of the people, their disobedience as well as the rejection of Shiloh and the election of David, by which it was for ever at an end with the supremacy of Ephraim and also of his brother-tribe of Benjamin.

The old Asaphic origin of the Psalm has been contested:—
 (1) Because ver. 9 may be referred to the apostasy of Ephraim and of the other tribes, that is to say, to the division of the kingdom. But this reference is capriciously imagined to be read in ver. 9. (2) Because the Psalm betrays a malice, indeed a national hatred against Ephraim, such as is only explicable after the apostasy of the ten tribes. But the alienation and jealousy between Ephraim and Judah is older than the rupture of the kingdom. The northern tribes, in consequence of their position, which was more exposed to contact with the heathen world, had already assumed a different character from that of Judah living in patriarchal seclusion. They could boast of a more excited, more martial history, one richer in exploit; in the time of the Judges especially, there is scarcely any mention of Judah. Hence Judah was little thought of by them, especially by powerful Ephraim, which regarded itself as the foremost tribe of all the tribes. From the beginning of Saul's persecution of David, however, when the stricter principle of the south came first of all into decisive conflict for the mastery with the more lax principle of the Ephraimites, until the rebellion of Jeroboam against Solomon, there runs through the history of Israel a series of facts which reveal a deep rift between Judah and the other tribes, more especially Benjamin and Ephraim. Though, therefore, it were true that a tone hostile to Ephraim is expressed in the Psalm, this would not be any evidence against its old Asaphic origin, since the psalmist rests upon facts, and, without basing the preference of Judah upon merit, he everywhere contemplates the sin of Ephraim, without any Judæan boasting, in a connection with the sin of the whole nation, which involves all in the responsibility. Nor is ver. 69 against Asaph the cotemporary of David; for Asaph may certainly have seen the building of the Temple of Solomon as it towered upwards to the skies, and Caspari in his Essay on the Holy One of Israel (Luther. Zeitschrift, 1844, 3) has shown that even the divine name יְהוָה יִשְׂרָאֵל does not militate against him. We have seen in connection with Ps. lxxvi. how deeply imbued Isaiah's language is with that of the Psalms of Asaph. It cannot surprise us if Asaph is Isaiah's predecessor in the use of the name "the Holy One of Israel." The fact, however, that the writer of the Psalm takes the words and colours of his narration from all five books of the Pentateuch, with the exception of Leviticus, is not opposed to our view of the origin of the Pentateuch, but favourable to it. The author of the Book of Job, with whom in ver. 64 he verbally coincides, is regarded by us as younger; and the points of contact with other Psalms inscribed "by David," "by the sons of Korah," and "by Asaph," do not admit of being employed for ascertaining his time, since the poet is by no means an unindifferent imitator.

The manner of representation which characterizes the Psalm becomes epical in its extension, but is at the same time concise after the sententious style. The separate historical statements have a gnome-like finish, and a gem-like elegance. The whole falls into two principal parts, vers. 1-37, 38-72; the second part passes over from the God-tempting unthankfulness of the Israel of the desert to that of the Israel of Canaan. Every three strophes form one group.

Vers. 1-11. The poet begins very similarly to the poet of

Ps. xlix. He comes forward among the people as a preacher, and demands for his tóra a willing, attentive hearing.  $\text{וְהוֹרָה}$  is the word for every human doctrine or instruction, especially for the prophetic discourse which sets forth and propagates the substance of the divine teaching. Asaph is a prophet, hence ver. 2 is quoted in Matt. xiii. 34 sq. as  $\text{ῥῆθὲν διὰ τοῦ προφήτου}$ .\* He here recounts to the people their history  $\text{מִיְמֵי מִצְרָיִם}$ , from that Egyptæo-Sinaitic age of yore to which Israel's national independence and specific position in relation to the rest of the world goes back. It is not, however, with the external aspect of the history that he has to do, but with its internal teachings.  $\text{לְפָנָי}$  is an allegory or parable, παραβολή, more particularly the apophthegm as the characteristic species of poetry belonging to the Chokma, and then in general a discourse of an elevated style, full of figures, thoughtful, pithy, and rounded.  $\text{וְהִתְקַדְּמָה}$  is that which is entangled, knotted, involved, perplexæ dictum. The poet, however, does not mean to say that he will literally discourse gnomic sentences and propound riddles, but that he will set forth the history of the fathers after the manner of a parable and riddle, so that it may become as a parable, i.e. a didactic history, and its events as marks of interrogation and nota-be e's to the present age. The LXX. renders thus: ἀνοίξω ἐν παραβολαῖς τὸ στόμα μου, φθέγξομαι προβλήματα ἀπ' ἀρχῆς. Instead of this the Gospel by Matthew has: ἀνοίξω ἐν παραβολαῖς τὸ στόμα μου, ἐρεύξομαι κεκρυμμένα ἀπὸ καταβολῆς (κόσμου), and recognises in this language of the Psalm a prophecy of Christ; because it is moulded so appropriately for the mouth of Him who is the Fulfiller not only of the Law and of Prophecy, but also of the vocation of the prophet. It is the object-clause to  $\text{וְהִתְקַדְּמָה}$ , and not a relative clause belonging to the "riddles out of the age of yore," that follows in ver. 3 with  $\text{וְשִׁירָם}$ , for that which has been heard only becomes riddles by the appropriation and turn the poet gives to it. Ver. 3 begins a new period (cf. lxix. 27, Jer. xiv. 1, and frequently): What we have heard, and in consequence thereof known, and what our fathers have told us (word for word, like xlv. 2,

* The reading διὰ Ἡσαΐου τοῦ προφήτου is, although erroneous, nevertheless ancient; since even the Clementine Homilies introduce this passage as the language of Isaiah.

Judg. vi. 13), that will we not hide from their children (cf. Job xv. 18). The accentuation is perfectly correct. The Rebîa by מְבַיְנֵהם has a greater distinctive force than the Rebîa by אַחֲרָיו (לְדֹר); it is therefore to be rendered: telling to the later generation (which is just what is intended by the offspring of the fathers) the glorious deeds of Jahve, etc. The fut. consec. וַיִּקָּם joins on to אֲשֶׁר עָשָׂה. Glorious deeds, proofs of power, miracles hath He wrought, and in connection therewith set up an admonition in Jacob, and laid down an order in Israel, which He commanded our fathers, viz. to propagate by tradition the remembrance of those mighty deeds (Ex. xiii. 8, 14, Deut. iv. 9, and other passages). לְהוֹדִיעֵם has the same object as וְהוֹרַעְתֶּם in Deut. iv. 9, Josh. iv. 22. The matter in question is not the giving of the Law in general, as the purpose of which, the keeping of the laws, ought then to have been mentioned before anything else, but a precept, the purpose of which was the further proclamation of the magnalia Dei, and indirectly the promotion of trust in God and fidelity to the Law; cf. lxxx. 5 sq., where the special precept concerning the celebration of the Feast of the Passover is described as a עֲרִיבָה laid down in Joseph. The following generation, the children, which shall be born in the course of the ages, were to know concerning His deeds, and also themselves to rise up (וַיִּקְוִמוּ, not: come into being, like the יִבְאִי of the older model-passage xxii. 32) and to tell them further to their children, in order that these might place their confidence in God (שִׁים בְּפִסֵּל), like שִׁית מַחֲסֶה in lxxxiii. 28), and might not forget the mighty deeds of God (lxxvii. 12), and might keep His commandments, being warned by the disobedience of the fathers. The generation of the latter is called סוֹרֵר וּמֹרֵה, just as the degenerate son that is to be stoned is called in Deut. xxi. 18. הִדְבִּין לְבָבוֹ, to direct one's heart, i.e. to give it the right direction or tendency, to put it into the right state, is to be understood after ver. 37, 2 Chron. xx. 33, Sir. ii. 17.

Ver. 9, which comes in now in the midst of this description, is awkward and unintelligible. The supposition that "the sons of Ephraim" is an appellation for the whole of Israel is refuted by vers. 67 sq. The rejection of Ephraim and the election of Judah is the point into which the historical retrospect runs out; how then can "the sons of Ephraim" denote Israel as a whole? And yet what is here said of the Ephraimites also holds good of the Israelites in general, as ver. 57 shows. The fact, however, that the Ephraimites are made specially conspicuous out of the "generation" of all Israel, is intelligible from the special interest which the Psalms of Asaph take in the tribes of Joseph, and here particularly from the purpose of practically preparing the way for the rejection of Shiloh and Ephraim related further on. In vers. 10 and 11 the Ephraimites are also still spoken of; and it is not until ver. 12, with the words "in sight of their fathers," that we come back again to the nation at large. The Ephraimites are called נִשְׁקֵי רֹמֵי-קֶשֶׁת in the sense of נִשְׁקֵי קֶשֶׁת רֹמֵי קֶשֶׁת; the two participial construct forms do not stand in subordination but in co-ordination, as in Jer. xlvi. 9, Deut. xxxiii. 19, 2 Sam. xx. 19, just as in other instances also two substantives, of which one is the explanation of the other, are combined by means of the construct, Job xx. 17, cf. 2 Kings xvii. 13 Keri. It is therefore: those who prepare the bow, i.e. those arming themselves therewith (נִשְׁקֵי as in 1 Chron. xii. 2, 2 Chron. xvii. 17), those who cast the bow, i.e. those shooting arrows from the bow (Jer. iv. 29), cf. Böttcher, § 728. What is predicated of them, viz. "they turned round" (יָשָׁבוּ as in Judg. xx. 39, 41), stands in contrast with this their ability to bear arms and to defend themselves, as a disappointed expectation. Is what is meant thereby, that the powerful warlike tribe of Ephraim grew weary in the work of the conquest of Canaan (Judg. ch. i.), and did not render the services which might have been expected from it? Since the historical retrospect does not enter into details until ver. 12 onwards, this special historical reference would come too early here; the statement consequently must be understood more generally and, according to ver. 57, figuratively: Ephraim proved itself unstable and faint-hearted in defending and in conducting the cause of God, it gave it up, it abandoned it. They did not act as the covenant of God required of them, they refused to walk (לָלְכוּ, cf. לָלְכוּ, Eccles. i. 7) within the limit and track of His Tôra, and forgot the deeds of God of which they had been eye-witnesses under Moses and under Joshua, their comrades of the same family.

Vers. 12-25. It is now related how wonderfully God led the fathers of these Ephraimites, who behaved themselves so badly as the leading tribe of Israel, in the desert; how they again and again ever indulged sinful murmuring, and still He continued to give proofs of His power and of His loving-kindness. The (according to Num. xiii. 22) very ancient Zoan (Tanis), ancient Egyptian Zane, Coptic G'ane, on the east bank of the Tanitic arm of the Nile, so called therefrom—according to the researches to which the Turin Papyrus No. 112 has led, identical with Avaris (vid. on Isa. xix. 11) *—was the seat of the Hyksos dynasties that ruled in the eastern Delta, where after their overthrow Rameses II., the Pharaoh of the bondage, in order to propitiate the enraged mass of the Semitic population of Lower Egypt, embraced the worship of Baal instituted by King Apophis. The colossal sitting figure of Rameses II. in the pillared court of the Royal Museum in Berlin, says Brugsch (Aus dem Orient ii. 45), is the figure which Rameses himself dedicated to the temple of Baal in Tanis and set up before its entrance. This mighty colossus is a cotemporary of Moses, who certainly once looked upon this monument when, as Ps. lxxviii. says, he “wrought wonders in the land of Egypt, in the field of Zoan.” The psalmist, moreover, keeps very close to the Tōra in his reproduction of the history of the Exodus, and in fact so close that he must have had it before him in the entirety of its several parts, the Deuteronomic, Elohimistic, and Jehovistic. Concerning the rule by which it is pointed ‘*a*sa phéle, vid. on lii. 5. The primary passage to ver. 13*b* (cf. נִזְלִים ver. 16) is Ex. xv. 8. נַי is a pile, i.e. a piled up heap or mass, as in xxxiii. 7. And ver. 14 is the abbreviation of Ex. xiii. 21. In vers. 15 sq. the writer condenses into one the two instances of the giving of water from the rock, in the first year of the Exodus (Ex. ch. xvii.) and in the fortieth year (Num. ch. xx.). The Piel יִבְקַע and the plural יִצְרִים correspond to this compression. רָבָה is not an adjective (after the analogy of רָבָה (תְּהוֹם)), but an adverb as in lxii. 3; for the giving to drink needs a qualificative, but תְּהוֹמָה does not need any enhancement. יִצְרֵא has î instead of ē as in cv. 43.

* The identity of Avaris and Tanis is in the meanwhile again become doubtful. Tanis was the Hyksos city, but Pelusium = Avaris the Hyksos fortress; vid. Petermann's Mittheilungen, 1866, S. 296-298.

The fact that the subject is continued in ver. 17 with וַיִּסְפַּד without mention having been made of any sinning on the part of the generation of the desert, is explicable from the consideration that the remembrance of that murmuring is closely connected with the giving of water from the rock to which the names Massah u-Meribah and Meribath-Kadesh (cf. Num. xx. 13 with xxvii. 14, Deut. xxxii. 51) point back: they went on (עוֹר) sinning against Him, in spite of the miracles they experienced. לְמִרּוֹת is syncopated from לְהִמְרוֹת as in Isa. iii. 8. The poet in ver. 18 condenses the account of the manifestations of discontent which preceded the giving of the quails and manna (Ex. ch. xvi.), and the second giving of quails (Num. ch. xi.), as he has done the two cases of the giving of water from the rock in ver. 15. They tempted God by unbelievably and defiantly demanding (לְשׂאֵל, postulando, Ew. § 280, d) instead of trustfully hoping and praying. בְּלִבְבָם points to the evil fountain of the heart, and לְנַפְשָׁם describes their longing as a sensual eagerness, a lusting after it. Instead of allowing the miracles hitherto wrought to work faith in them, they made the miracles themselves the starting-point of fresh doubts. The poet here clothes what we read in Ex. xvi. 3, Num. xi. 4 sqq., xxi. 5, in a poetic dress. In לְעִמּוֹ the unbelief reaches its climax, it sounds like self-irony. On the co-ordinating construction "therefore Jahve heard it and was wroth," cf. Isa. v. 4, xii. 1, l. 2, Rom. vi. 17. The allusion is to the wrath-burning at Taberah (Tab'ēra), Num. xi. 1-3, which preceded the giving of the quails in the second year of the Exodus. For it is obvious that ver. 21 and Num. xi. 1 coincide, וַיַּעֲבֵר וַאֲשׁ here being suggested by the וַחֲבַעְרִיבִם אִשׁ of that passage, and הִיא עָלָה being the opposite of וַתִּשְׁקַע הָאֵשׁ in ver. 2. A conflagration broke out at that time in the camp, at the same time, however, with the breaking out of God's anger. The nexus between the anger and the fire is here an outward one, whereas in Num. xi. 1 it is an internal one. The ground upon which the wrathful decree is based, which is only hinted at there, is here more minutely given in ver. 22: they believed not in Elohim (vid. Num. xiv. 11), i.e. did not rest with believing confidence in Him, and trusted not in His salvation, viz. that which they had experienced in the redemption out of Egypt (Ex. xiv. 13, xv. 2), and which was thereby guaranteed for time to come.

Now, however, when Taberah is here followed first by the giving of the manna, vers. 23-25, then by the giving of the quails, vers. 26-29, the course of the events is deranged, since the giving of the manna had preceded that burning, and it was only the giving of the quails that followed it. This putting together of the two givings out of order was rendered necessary by the preceding condensation (in vers. 18-20) of the clamorous desire for a more abundant supply of food before each of these events. Notwithstanding Israel's unbelief, He still remained faithful: He caused manna to rain down out of the opened gates of heaven (cf. "the windows of heaven," Gen. vii. 11, 2 Kings vii. 2, Mal. iii. 10), that is to say, in richest abundance. The manna is called corn (as in cv. 40, after Ex. xvi. 4, it is called bread) of heaven, because it descended in the form of grains of corn, and supplied the place of bread-corn during the forty years. לֶחֶם אֱמִירִים the LXX. correctly renders ἄρτον ἀγγέλων (אֱמִירִים = לֶחֶם אֱמִירִים, ciii. 20). The manna is called "bread of angels" (Wisd. xvi. 20) as being bread from heaven (ver. 24, cv. 40), the dwelling-place of angels, as being mann es-semâ, heaven's gift, its Arabic name,—a name which also belongs to the vegetable manna which flows out of the Tamarix mannifera in consequence of the puncture of the Coccus manniparus, and is even at the present day invaluable to the inhabitants of the desert of Sinai. אִישׁ is the antithesis to אַבְרָהָם; for if it signified "every one," אִישׁ אֵלֶיךָ would have been said (Hitzig). אִישׁ אֵלֶיךָ as in Ex. xii. 39; לֶשְׁבֹּעַ as in Ex. xvi. 3, cf. 8.

Vers. 26-37. Passing over to the giving of the quails, the poet is thinking chiefly of the first occasion mentioned in Ex. ch. xvi., which directly preceded the giving of the manna. But the description follows the second: יָסַע (He caused to depart, set out) after Num. xi. 31. "East" and "south" belong together: it was a south-east wind from the Ælanitic Gulf. "To rain down" is a figurative expression for a plentiful giving or dispensing from above. "Its camp, its tents," are those of Israel, Num. xi. 31, cf. Ex. xvi. 13. The תַּאֲוָה, occurring twice, vers. 29, 30 (of the object of strong desire, as in xxi. 3), points to Kibroth-hattaavah, the scene of this carnal lusting; הִבִּיֵּא is the transitive of the בִּיאָה in Prov. xiii. 12. In vers. 30, 31 even in the construction the poet closely follows Num. xi.

33 (cf. also וַיִּרָא with אֲוֵרָה, aversion, loathing, Num. xi. 20). The Waw unites what takes place simultaneously; a construction which presents the advantage of being able to give special prominence to the subject. The wrath of God consisted in the breaking out of a sickness which was the result of immoderate indulgence, and to which even the best-nourished and most youthfully vigorous fell a prey. When the poet goes on in ver. 32 to say that in spite of these visitations (בְּכָל־זִמָּתָם) they went on sinning, he has chiefly before his mind the outbreak of "fat" rebelliousness after the return of the spies, cf. ver. 32*b* with Num. xiv. 11. And ver. 33 refers to the judgment of death in the wilderness threatened at that time to all who had come out of Egypt from twenty years old and upward (Num. xiv. 28-34). Their life devoted to death vanished from that time onwards בְּהִבָּהֶבֶת, in breath-like instability, and בְּבִהְהָהָה, in undurable precipitancy; the mode of expression in xxxi. 11, Job xxxvi. 1 suggests to the poet an expressive play of words. When now a special judgment suddenly and violently thinned the generation that otherwise was dying off, as in Num. xxi. 6 sqq., then they inquired after Him, they again sought His favour, those who were still preserved in the midst of this dying again remembered the God who had proved Himself to be a "Rock" (Deut. xxxii. 15, 18, 37) and to be a "Redeemer" (Gen. xlviii. 16) to them. And what next? Vers. 36,* 37 tell us what effect they gave to this disposition to return to God. They appeased Him with their mouth, is meant to say: they sought to win Him over to themselves by fair speeches, inasmuch as they thus anthropopathically conceived of God, and with their tongue they played the hypocrite to Him; their heart, however, was not sincere towards Him (עַל־לִבָּם like אֵין in ver. 8), i.e. not directed straight towards Him, and they proved themselves not steadfast (πιστοί, or properly βέβαιοι) in their covenant-relationship to Him.

Vers. 38-48. The second part of the Psalm now begins. God, notwithstanding, in His compassion restrains His anger; but Israel's God-tempting conduct was continued, even after the journey through the desert, in Canaan, and the miracles of judgment amidst which the deliverance out of Egypt had been effected were forgotten. With יהוה in ver. 38* begins an adversative clause, which is of universal import as far as יִשְׁחִית, and then becomes historical. Ver. 38b expands what lies in רָחַם: He expiates iniquity and, by letting mercy instead of right take its course, arrests the destruction of the sinner. With הִרְבָּה (Ges. § 142, 2) this universal truth is supported out of the history of Israel. As this history shows, He has many a time called back His anger, i.e. checked it in its course, and not stirred up all His glowing anger (cf. Isa. xlii. 13), i.e. His anger in all its fulness and intensity. We see that ver. 38cd is intended historically, from the fact more particularly that if the whole of ver. 38 were intended as abstract, ver. 39 would inadequately express the result which accrued to Israel from this conduct of God. If, however, ver. 38cd refers to His conduct towards Israel, then ver. 39 follows with the ground of the determination, and that in the form of an inference drawn from such conduct towards Israel. He moderated His anger against Israel, and consequently took human frailty and perishableness into consideration. The fact that man is flesh (which not merely affirms his physical fragility, but also his moral weakness, Gen. vi. 3, cf. viii. 21), and that, after a short life, he falls a prey to death, determines God to be long-suffering and kind; it was in fact sensuous desire and loathing by which Israel was beguiled time after time. The exclamation "how oft!" ver. 40, calls attention to the praiseworthiness of this undeserved forbearance.

But with ver. 41 the record of sins begins anew. There is nothing by which any reference of this ver. 41 to the last example of insubordination recorded in the Pentateuch, Num. xxv. 1-9 (Hitzig), is indicated. The poet comes back once more to the provocations of God by the Israel of the wilderness in order to expose the impious ingratitude which revealed itself

* According to B. Kiddushin 30a, this ver. 38 is the middle one of the 5896 פְּסוּקֵי שְׁמִינִי, στίχοι, of the Psalter. According to B. Maccoth 22b, Ps. lxxviii. 38, and previously Deut. xxviii. 58, 59, xxix. 8 [9], were recited when the forty strokes of the lash save one, which according to 2 Cor. xi. 24 Paul received five times, were being counted out to the culprit.

in this conduct. הִתְנַחֵם is the causative of תָּנַח = תָּנַח, תָּנַח, to repent, to be grieved, LXX. παρώξυναν. The miracles of the time of redemption are now brought before the mind in detail, ad exaggerandum crimen tentationis Dei cum summa ingratitude conjunctum (Venema). The time of redemption is called יוֹם, as in Gen. ii. 4 the hexahemeron. שֵׁים אֹתוֹ (synon. עָשָׂה, גָּתַן) is used as in Ex. x. 2. We have already met with כְּמִצְרַיִם in xlv. 11. The first of the plagues of Egypt (Ex. vii. 14-25), the turning of the waters into blood, forms the beginning in ver. 44. From this the poet takes a leap over to the fourth plague, the עֲרֵב (LXX. κυσόμυια), a grievous and destructive species of fly (Ex. viii. 16-28 [20-32]), and combines with it the frogs, the second plague (Ex. vii. 26 [viii. 1]-viii. 11 [15]). צִפְרִידֵי is the lesser Egyptian frog, Rana Mosaica, which is even now called ضفدع, dofda. Next in ver. 46 he comes to the eighth plague, the locusts, תְּסִיל (a more select name of the migratory locusts than אֲרֵבָה), Ex. x. 1-20; the third plague, the gnats and midges, בְּנִים, is left unmentioned in addition to the fourth, which is of a similar kind. For the chastisement by means of destructive living things is now closed, and in ver. 47 follows the smiting with hail, the seventh plague, Ex. ix. 13-35. הַחֲמַל (with pausal á, not a, cf. in Ezek. viii. 2 the similarly formed הַחֲשִׁמְלָה) in the signification hoar-frost (πάχνη, LXX., Vulgate, Saadia, and Abulwalíd), or locusts (Targum פְּרוֹזְבָּא = הַנֶּבֶן), or ants (J. D. Michaelis), does not harmonize with the history; also the hoar-frost is called בְּפוֹר, the ant נְמִלָּה (collective in Arabic neml). Although only conjecturing from the context, we understand it, with Parchon and Kimchi, of hail-stones or hail. With thick lumpy pieces of ice He smote down vines and sycamore-trees (Fayum was called in ancient Egyptian "the district of the sycamore"). הָרַג proceeds from the Biblical conception that the plant has a life of its own. The description of this plague is continued in ver. 48. Two mss. present לִבְרָב instead of לִבְרָר; but even supposing that רִשְׁפִים might signify the fever-burnings of the pestilence (vid. on Hab. iii. 5), the mention of the pestilence follows in ver. 50, and the devastation which, according to Ex. ix. 19-22, the hail caused among the cattle of the Egyptians is in its right place here. Moreover it is expressly said in Ex. ix. 24 that there was conglomerate fire among the hail; רָשָׁפִים are therefore flaming, blazing lightnings.

Vers. 49-59. When these plagues rose to the highest pitch, Israel became free, and removed, being led by its God, into the Land of Promise; but it continued still to behave there just as it had done in the desert. The poet in vers. 49-51 brings the fifth Egyptian plague, the pestilence (Ex. ix. 1-7), and the tenth and last, the smiting of the first-born (מִצְבַּח בְּבֵרֹת), Ex. ch. xi., xii., together. Ver. 49*a* sounds like Job xx. 23 (cf. below ver. 64). מַלְאֲכֵי רָעִים are not wicked angels, against which view Hengstenberg refers to the scriptural thesis of Jacobus Ode in his work De Angelis, Deum ad puniendos malos homines mittere bonos angelos et ad castigandos pios usurpare malos, but angels that bring misfortune. The mode of construction belongs to the chapter of the genitival subordination of the adjective to the substantive, like אֲשֶׁת רָע, Prov. vi. 24, cf. 1 Sam. xxviii. 7, Num. v. 18, 24, 1 Kings x. 15, Jer. xxiv. 2, and the Arabic مسجد الجامع, the mosque of the assembling one, i.e. the assembling (congregational) mosque, therefore: angels (not of the wicked ones = wicked angels, which it might signify elsewhere, but) of the evil ones = evil, misfortune-bringing angels (Ew. § 287, a). The poet thus paraphrases the מַלְאֲכֵי רָעִים that is collectively conceived in Ex. xii. 13, 23, Heb. xi. 28. In ver. 50*a* the anger is conceived of as a stream of fire, in ver. 50*b* death as an executioner, and in 50*c* the pestilence as a foe. רָאשֵׁית אוֹנִים (Gen. xlix. 3, Dent. xxi. 17) is that which had sprung for the first time from manly vigour (plur. intensivus). Egypt is called מִצְרַיִם as in Ps. cv. and cxi. according to Gen. x. 6, and is also called by themselves in ancient Egyptian Kemi, Coptic Chêmi, Kême (vid. Plutarch, De Iside et Osiride, ch. xxxiii.). When now these plagues which softened their Pharaoh went forth upon the Egyptians, God procured for His people a free departure, He guided flock-like (בְּעֶרְךָ like בְּעֶרְךָ, Jer. xxxi. 24, with Dag. implicitum), i.e. as a shepherd, the flock of His people (the favourite figure of the Psalms of Asaph) through the desert,—He led them safely, removing all terrors out of the way and drowning their enemies in the Red Sea, to His holy territory, to the mountain which (הַר) His right hand had acquired, or according to the accents (cf. supra, vol.

i. 169): to the mountain there (הַיְיָ), which, etc. It is not Zion that is meant, but, as in the primary passage Ex. xv. 16 sq., in accordance with the parallelism (although this is not imperative) and the usage of the language, which according to Isa. xi. 9, lvii. 13, is incontrovertible, the whole of the Holy Land with its mountains and valleys (cf. Deut. xi. 11). בְּהַבֵּל גְּחֵלָהּ is the poetical equivalent to בְּנִתְחֵלָהּ, Num. xxxiv. 2, xxxvi. 2, and frequently. The Beth is Beth essentiae (here in the same syntactical position as in Isa. xlvi. 10, Ezek. xx. 41, and also Job xxii. 24 surely): He made them (the heathen, viz., as in Josh. xxiii. 4 their territories) fall to them (viz., as the expression implies, by lot, בְּנוֹרָל) as a line of inheritance, i.e. (as in cv. 11) as a portion measured out as an inheritance. It is only in ver. 56 (and not so early as ver. 41) that the narration passes over to the apostate conduct of the children of the generation of the desert, that is to say, of the Israel of Canaan. Instead of עֲדוּתָיו from עֲדוּת, the word here is עֲדוּתָיו from עָרָה (a derivative of עָרָה, not יָעַר). Since the apostasy did not gain ground until after the death of Joshua and Eleazar, it is the Israel of the period of the Judges that we are to think of here. קִשְׁתֵּי רָמִיָהּ, ver. 57, is not: a bow of slackness, but: a bow of deceit; for the point of comparison, according to Hos. vii. 16, is its missing the mark: a bow that discharges its arrow in a wrong direction, that makes no sure shot. The verb רָמָהּ signifies not only to allow to hang down slack (cogn. רָפָה), but also, according to a similar conception to spe dejicere, to disappoint, deny. In the very act of turning towards God, or at least being inclined towards Him by His tokens of power and loving-kindness, they turned (Jer. ii. 21) like a bow that misses the mark and disappoints both aim and expectation. The expression in ver. 58 is like Deut. xxxii. 16, 21. שָׁמַע refers to their prayer to the Ba'ālim (Judg. ii. 11). The word הִתְעַבֵּר, which occurs three times in this Psalm, is a word belonging to Deuteronomy (ch. iii. 26). Ver. 59 is purposely worded exactly like ver. 21. The divine purpose of love spurned by the children just as by the fathers, was obliged in this case, as in the former, to pass over into angry provocation.

Vers. 60-72. The rejection of Shiloh and of the people worshipping there, but later on, when the God of Israel is again overwhelmed by compassion, the election of Judah, and of Mount Zion, and of David, the king after His own heart. In the time of the Judges the Tabernacle was set up in Shiloh (Josh. xviii. 1); there, consequently, was the central sanctuary of the whole people,—in the time of Eli and Samuel, as follows from 1 Sam. ch. i.-iii., it had become a fixed temple building. When this building was destroyed is not known; according to Judg. xviii. 30 sq., cf. Jer. vii. 12-15, it was probably not until the Assyrian period. The rejection of Shiloh, however, preceded the destruction, and practically took place simultaneously with the removal of the central sanctuary to Zion; and was, moreover, even previously decided by the fact that the Ark of the covenant, when given up again by the Philistines, was not brought back to Shiloh, but set down in Kirjath Jearîm (1 Sam. vii. 2). The attributive clause שֵׁבִן בְּאֶרְדֵם uses שֵׁבִן as הִשְׁפִּיץ is used in Josh. xviii. 1. The pointing is correct, for the words do not suffice to signify “where He dwelleth among men” (Hitzig); consequently שֵׁבִן is the causative of the Kal, Lev. xvi. 16, Josh. xxii. 19. In ver. 61 the Ark of the covenant is called the might and glory of God (אֲרוֹן עֹז, cxxxii. 8, cf. קְבוּר, 1 Sam. iv. 21 sq.), as being the place of their presence in Israel and the medium of their revelation. Nevertheless, in the battle with the Philistines between Eben-ezer and Aphek, Jahve gave the Ark, which they had fetched out of Shiloh, into the hands of the foe in order to visit on the high-priesthood of the sons of Ithamar the desecration of His ordinances, and there fell in that battle 30,000 footmen, and among them the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, the priests (1 Sam. ch. iv.). The fire in ver. 63 is the fire of war, as in Num. xxi. 28, and frequently. The incident mentioned in 1 Sam. vi. 19 is reasonably (vid. Keil) left out of consideration. By לֹא הִלְלוּ (LXX. erroneously, οὐκ ἐπέθυσαν = הוֹלִלוּ = הִלְלוּ) are meant the marriage-songs (cf. Talmudic הַלְלוֹת, the nuptial tent, and בֵּית הַלְלוֹת the marriage-house). “Its widows (of the people, in fact, of the slain) weep not” (word for word as in Job xxvii. 15) is meant of the celebration of the customary ceremony of mourning (Gen. xxiii. 2): they survive their husbands (which, with the exception of such a case as that recorded in 1 Sam. xiv. 19-22, is presupposed), but without being able to show them the last signs of honour, because the terrors of the war (Jer. xv. 8) prevent them.

With ver. 65 the song takes a new turn. After the punitive judgment has sifted and purified Israel, God receives His people to Himself afresh, but in such a manner that He transfers the precedence of Ephraim to the tribe of Judah. He awakes as it were from a long sleep (xliv. 24, cf. lxxiii. 20); for He seemed to sleep whilst Israel had become a servant to the heathen; He aroused Himself, like a hero exulting by reason of wine, i.e. like a hero whose courage is heightened by the strengthening and exhilarating influence of wine (Hengstenberg). הִתְרוֹןֵן is not the Hithpal. of רָן in the Arabic signification, which is alien to the Hebrew, to conquer, a meaning which we do not need here, and which is also not adapted to the reflexive form (Hitzig, without any precedent, renders thus: who allows himself to be conquered by wine), but Hithpo. of רָן: to shout most heartily, after the analogy of the reflexives הִתְאוּנֵן, הִתְנוּרֵן, הִתְרוּעֵן. The most recent defeat of the enemy which the poet has before his mind is that of the Philistines. The form of expression in ver. 66 is moulded after 1 Sam. v. 6 sqq. God smote the Philistines most literally in posteriora (LXX., Vulgate, and Luther). Nevertheless ver. 66 embraces all the victories under Samuel, Saul, and David, from 1 Sam. ch. v. and onwards. Now, when they were able to bring the Ark, which had been brought down to the battle against the Philistines, to a settled resting-place again, God no longer chose Shiloh of Ephraim, but Judah and the mountain of Zion, which He had loved (xlvii. 5), of Benjamitish-Judæan (Josh. xv. 63, Judg. i. 8, 21)—but according to the promise (Deut. xxxiii. 12) and according to the distribution of the country (vid. on lxviii. 28) Benjamitish—Jerusalem.* There God built His Temple בְּמִוֹרָתָיִם. Hitzig proposes instead of this to read בְּמַרְוֹמַיִם; but if גְּעִימַיִם, xvi. 6, signifies amæna, then גְּמַיִם may signify excelsa (cf. Isa. xlv. 2 הַדְּרִיִּים, Jer. xvii. 6 הַחֲרִיִּים) and be poetically equivalent to מַרְוֹמַיִם: lasting as the heights of heaven, firm as the earth, which He hath founded for ever. Since the eternal duration of heaven and of the earth is quite consistent with a radical change in the manner of its duration, and that not less in the sense of the Old Testament than of the New (vid. e.g. Isa. lxxv. 17), so the לְעוֹלָם applies not to the stone building, but rather to the place where Jahve reveals Himself, and to the promise that He will have such a dwelling-place in Israel, and in fact in Judah. Regarded spiritually, i.e. essentially, apart from the accidental mode of appearing, the Temple upon Zion is as eternal as the kingship upon Zion with which the Psalm closes. The election of David gives its impress to the history of salvation even on into eternity. It is genuinely Asaphic that it is so designedly portrayed how the shepherd of the flock of Jesse (Isai) became the shepherd of the flock of Jahve, who was now to pasture old and young in Israel with the same care and tenderness as the ewe-lambs after which he went (עֲלוֹת as in Gen. xxxiii. 13, and עֲלוֹתָ, cf. 1 Sam. xvi. 11, xvii. 34, like עֲלוֹתָ and the like). The poet is also able already to glory that he has fulfilled this vocation with a pure heart and with an intelligent mastery. And with this he closes. From the decease of David lyric and prophecy are retrospectively and prospectively turned towards David.

* According to B. Menachoth 53b, Jedidiah (Solomon, 2 Sam. xii. 25) built the Temple in the province of Jedidiah (of Benjamin, Deut. xxxiii. 12).

PSALM LXXIX.

SUPPLICATORY PRAYER IN A TIME OF DEVASTATION, OF BLOODSHED, AND OF DERISION.

- 1 ELOHIM, the heathen have pressed into Thine inheritance,
They have defiled Thy holy Temple,
They have turned Jerusalem into a heap of stones.
- 2 They have given the dead bodies of Thy servants for food to the birds of the heaven,
The flesh of Thy saints to the beasts of the land ;
- 3 They have poured out their blood like water
Round about Jerusalem, and no one burieth them.
- 4 We are become a reproach to our neighbours,
A mockery and derision to those who are round about us.
- 5 How long, Jahve, wilt Thou be angry for ever, Shall Thy jealousy burn like fire ?!
- 6 Pour out Thy fury upon the heathen who know Thee not,
And over the kingdoms, which call not upon Thy name !

- 7 For they devour Jacob,
And have laid waste his dwelling-place.
- 8 Remember not against us the iniquities of the forefathers;
Speedily let Thy tender mercies come to meet us,
For we are brought very low.
- 9 Help us, O God of our salvation, for the glory of Thy Name,
And deliver us, and expiate our sins for Thy Name's sake!
- 10 Wherefore shall the heathen say: where is now their God?—
Let there be made known among the heathen before our eyes
The avenging of the blood of Thy servants, which is shed.
- 11 Let the sighing of the prisoners come before Thee, According to the greatness of Thine arm spare the children of death.
- 12 And render unto our neighbours sevenfold into their bosom
Their reproach, wherewith they have reproached Thee, O Lord!
- 13 And we, Thy people and the flock of Thy pasture,
We will give Thee thanks for ever,
In all generations will we tell forth Thy praise.

This Psalm is in every respect the pendant of Ps. lxxiv. The points of contact are not merely matters of style (cf. lxxix. 5, how long for ever? with lxxiv. 1, 10; lxxix. 10, עָרִיב, with lxxiv. 5; lxxix. 2, the giving over to the wild beasts, with lxxiv. 19, 14; lxxix. 13, the conception of Israel as of a flock, in which respect Ps. lxxix. is judiciously appended to Ps. lxxviii. 70–72, with Ps. lxxiv. 1, and also with lxxiv. 19). But the mutual relationships lie still deeper. Both Psalms have the same Asaphic stamp, both stand in the same relation to Jeremiah, and both send forth their complaint out of the same circumstances of the time, concerning a destruction of the Temple and of Jerusalem, such as only the age of the Seleucidæ (1 Macc. i. 31, iii. 45, 2 Macc. viii. 3) together with the Chaldæan period* can exhibit, and in conjunction with a defiling of the Temple and a massacre of the servants of God, of the Chasidim (1 Macc. vii. 13, 2 Macc. xiv. 6), such as the age of the Seleucidæ exclusively can exhibit. The work of the destruction of the Temple which was in progress in Ps. lxxiv., appears in Ps. lxxix. as completed, and here, as in the former Psalm, one receives the impression of the outrages, not of some war, but of some persecution: it is straightway the religion of Israel for the sake of which the sanctuaries are destroyed and the faithful are massacred.

Apart from other striking accords, vers. 6, 7 are repeated verbatim in Jer. x. 25. It is in itself far more probable that Jeremiah here takes up the earlier language of the Psalm than that the reverse is the true relation; and, as Hengstenberg has correctly observed, this is also favoured by the fact that the words immediately before, viz. Jer. x. 24, originate out of Ps. vi. 2, and that the connection in the Psalm is a far closer one. But since there is no era of pre-Maccabæan history corresponding to the complaints of the Psalm,* Jeremiah is to be regarded in this instance as the example of the psalmist; and in point of fact the borrower is betrayed in vers. 6, 7 of the Psalm by the fact that the correct עַל of Jeremiah is changed into אֶל, the more elegant מִשְׁפָּחֹת into מְמִלְכוֹת, and the plural אֱלֹהֵי into אֱלֹהִים, and the soaring exuberance of Jeremiah's expression is impaired by the omission of some of the words.

Vers. 1-4. The Psalm begins with a plaintive description, and in fact one that makes complaint to God. Its opening sounds like Lam. i. 10. The defiling does not exclude the reducing to ashes, it is rather spontaneously suggested in lxxiv. 7 in company with wilful incendiarism. The complaint in ver. 1c reminds one of the prophecy of Micah, ch. iii. 12, which in its time excited so much vexation (Jer. xxvi. 18); and ver. 2, Deut. xxviii. 26. עֲבָרֶיךָ confers upon those who were massacred the honour of martyrdom. The LXX. renders מַיִל by εἰς ἐπωροφυλάκιον, a flourish taken from Isa. i. 8. Concerning the quotation from memory in 1 Macc. vii. 16 sq., vid. the introduction to Ps. lxxiv. The translator of the originally Hebrew First Book of the Maccabees even in other instances betrays an acquaintance with the Greek Psalter (cf. 1 Macc. i. 37, καὶ ἐξέχεαν αἷμα ἀθῶον κύκλω τοῦ ἀγιάσματος). "As water," i.e. (cf. Deut. xv. 23) without setting any value upon it and without any scruple about it. Ps. xlv. 14 is repeated in ver. 4. At the time of the Chaldæan catastrophe this applied more particularly to the Edomites.

Vers. 5-8. Out of the plaintive question how long? and whether endlessly God would be angry and cause His jealousy to continue to burn like a fire (Deut. xxxii. 22), grows up the prayer (ver. 6) that He would turn His anger against the heathen who are estranged from and hostile towards Him, and of whom He is now making use as a rod of anger against His people. The taking over of vers. 6 and 7 from Jer. x. 25 is not betrayed by the looseness of the connection of thought; but in themselves these four lines sound much more original in Jeremiah, and the style is exactly that of this prophet, cf. Jer. vi. 11, ii. 3, and frequently, xlix. 20. The לֹא, instead of לַע, which follows אֲשֶׁר is incorrect; the singular לֹא gathers all up as in one mass, as in Isa. v. 26, xvii. 13. The fact that such power over Israel is given to the heathen world has its ground in the sins of Israel. From ver. 8 it may be inferred that the apostasy which raged earlier is now checked. אֲשֶׁר is not an adjective (Job xxxi. 28, Isa. lix. 2), which would have been expressed by עוֹנֵתֵינוּ הַרְאֵשִׁים, but a genitive: the iniquities of the forefathers (Lev. xxvi. 14, cf. 39). On ver. 8c cf. Judg. vi. 6. As is evident from ver. 9, the poet does not mean that the present generation, itself guiltless, has to expiate the guilt of the fathers (on the contrary, Deut. xxiv. 16, 2 Kings xiv. 6, Ezek. xviii. 20); he prays as one of those who have turned away from the sins of the fathers, and who can now no longer consider themselves as placed under wrath, but under sin-pardoning and redeeming grace.

Vers. 9-12. The victory of the world is indeed not God's aim; therefore His own honour does not suffer that the world of which He has made use in order to chasten His people should for ever haughtily triumph. אֲשֶׁר is repeated with emphasis at the end of the petition in ver. 9, according to the figure epanaphora. עֲלֵ-דָבָר = לְמַעַן, as in xlv. 5, cf. vii. 1, is a usage even of the language of the Pentateuch. Also the motive, "wherefore shall they say?" occurs even in the Tôra (Ex. xxxii. 12, cf. Num. xiv. 13-17, Deut. ix. 28). Here (cf. cxv. 2) it originates out of Joel ii. 17. The wish expressed in ver. 10bc is based upon Deut. xxxii. 43. The poet wishes in company with his cotemporaries, as eye-witnesses, to experience what God has promised in the early times, viz. that He will avenge the blood of His servants. The petition in ver. 11 runs like cii. 21, cf. xviii. 7. אֲנִי individually is those who are carried away captive and incarcerated; בְּנֵי הַמִּוֹתָהּ are those who, if God does not preserve them by virtue of the greatness (גְּדֹלָה, cf. גְּדֹלָה Ex. xv. 16) of His arm, i.e. of His far-reaching omnipotence, succumb to the power of death as to a patria potestas.* That the petition in ver. 12 recurs to the neighbouring peoples is explained by the fact, that these, who might most readily come to the knowledge of the God of Israel as the one living and true God, have the greatest degree of guilt on account of their reviling of God. The bosom is mentioned as that in which one takes up and holds that which is handed to him (Luke vi. 38); אֶל הַיָּשִׁיב (שָׁלֵם) (עַל-חַיִּים), as in Isa. lxxv. 7, 6, Jer. xxxii. 18. A sevenfold requital (cf. Gen. iv. 15, 24) is a requital that is fully carried out as a criminal sentence, for seven is the number of a completed process.

Ver. 13. If we have thus far correctly hit upon the parts of which the Psalm is composed (9. 9. 9), then the lamentation closes with this tristichic vow of thanksgiving.

PSALM LXXX.

PRAYER FOR JAHVE'S VINE.

2 SHEPHERD of Israel, Oh give ear,
 Thou who ledest Joseph like a flock,
 Who sittest enthroned above the cherubim, Oh appear!

---

* The Arabic has just this notion in an active application, viz. beni el-nôt = the heroes (destroyers) in the battle.

- 3 Before Ephraim and Benjamin and Manasseh
 Stir up Thy warrior-strength,
 And come to our help!
- 4 Elohim, restore us,
And cause Thy face to shine, then shall we be helped!
- 5 Jahve Elohim Tsebaôth,
 How long wilt Thou be angry when Thy people pray?!
 6 Thou gavest them to eat bread of tears,
 And gavest them to drink tears in great measure.
 7 Thou madest us a strife to our neighbours,
 And our enemies carry on their mockery.
 8 Elohim Tsebaôth, restore us,
And cause Thy face to shine, then shall we be helped!
- 9 Thou broughtest a vine out of Egypt,
 Thou didst drive out nations and plant it;
 10 Thou hast made a space before it,
 And it struck roots and filled the earth.
 11 Mountains were covered by its shadow,
 And by its boughs, the cedars of God.
 12 It spread its branches unto the sea,
 And towards the river its young shoots.
- 13 Why hast Thou broken down its hedges,
 That all who pass by the way do pluck it?
 14 The boar out of the forest doth devour it,
 And that which roameth the field doth feed upon it.
 15 Elohim Tsebaôth, Oh look again from heaven and behold,
 And accept this vine!
 16 And be the protection of that which Thy right hand hath planted,
 And over the son, whom Thou hast firmly chosen for Thyself.
- 17 Burnt with fire, swept away,
 Before the threatening of Thy countenance they perish.
 18 Oh hold Thy hand over the man of Thy right hand, Over the son of man whom Thou hast chosen for Thyself;

- 19 And we will not go back from Thee—
 Quicken us, and we will celebrate Thy Name.
 20 Jahve Elohim Tsebaóth, restore us,
Cause Thy face to shine, then shall we be helped!

With the words We are Thy people and the flock of Thy pasture, Ps. lxxix. closes; and Ps. lxxx. begins with a cry to the Shepherd of Israel. Concerning the inscription of the Psalm: To be practised after the "Lilies, the testimony . . .," by Asaph, a Psalm, vid. on xlv. 1, supra, p. 76 sq. The LXX. renders, εἰς τὸ τέλος (unto the end), ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀλλοιωθησομένων (which is unintelligible and ungrammatical = מִן־שִׁשְׁלֵשׁ), μαρτύριον τῷ Ἀσάφ (as the accentuation also unites these words closely by Tarcha), ψαλμὸς ὑπὲρ τοῦ Ἀσσυρίου (cf. lxxvi. 1), perhaps a translation of מִן־שִׁשְׁלֵשׁ, an inscribed note which took the "boar out of the forest" as an emblem of Assyria. This hint is important. It solves the riddle why Joseph represents all Israel in ver. 2, and why the tribes of Joseph in particular are mentioned in ver. 3, and why in the midst of these Benjamin, whom like descent from Rachel and chagrin, never entirely overcome, on account of the loss of the kingship drew towards the brother-tribes of Joseph. Moreover the tribe of Benjamin had only partially remained to the house of David since the division of the kingdom,* so that this triad is to be regarded as an expansion of the "Joseph" (ver. 2). After the northern kingdom had exhausted its resources in endless feuds with Damascene Syria, it succumbed to the world-wide dominion of Assyria in the sixth year of Hezekiah, in consequence of the heavy visitations which are closely associated with the names

---

* It is true we read that Benjamin stood on the side of Rehoboam with Judah after the division of the kingdom (1 Kings xii. 21), Judah and Benjamin appear as parts of the kingdom of Judah (2 Chron. xi. 3, 23, xv. 8 sq., and frequently); but if, according to 1 Kings xi. 13, 32, 36, only שִׁבְטֵי יְהוּדָה remains to the house of David, this is Judah, inasmuch as Benjamin did not remain entirely under the Davidic sceptre, and Simeon is to be left out of account (cf. Genesis, S. 603); the Benjamitish cities of Bethel, Gilgal, and Jericho belonged to the northern kingdom, but, as in the case of Rama (1 Kings xv. 21 sq.), not without being contested (cf. e.g. 2 Chron. xiii. 19); the boundaries were therefore fluctuating, vid. Ewald, Geschichte des Volkes Israel (3d ed.), S. 439-441.

of the Assyrian kings Pul, Tiglath-pileser, and Shalmaneser. The psalmist, as it seems, prays in a time in which the oppression of Assyria rested heavily upon the kingdom of Ephraim, and Judah saw itself threatened with ruin when this bulwark should have fallen. We must not, however, let it pass without notice that our Psalm has this designation of the nation according to the tribes of Joseph in common with other pre-exilic Psalms of Asaph (lxxvii. 16, lxxviii. 9, lxxxi. 6). It is a characteristic belonging in common to this whole group of Psalms. Was Asaph, the founder of this circle of songs, a native, perhaps, of one of the Levite cities of the province of the tribe of Ephraim or Manasseh?

The Psalm consists of five eight-line strophes, of which the first, second, and fifth close with the refrain, "Elohim, restore us, let Thy countenance shine forth, then shall we be helped!" This prayer grows in earnestness. The refrain begins the first time with Elohim, the second time with Elohim Tsebaôth, and the third time with a threefold Jahve Elohim Tsebaôth, with which the second strophe (ver. 5) also opens.

Vers. 2-4. The first strophe contains nothing but petition. First of all the nation is called Israel as springing from Jacob; then, as in lxxxi. 6, Joseph, which, where it is distinct from Jacob or Judah, is the name of the kingdom of the ten tribes (vid. Caspari on Obad. ver. 18), or at least of the northern tribes (lxxvii. 16, lxxviii. 67 sq.). Ver. 3 shows that it is also these that are pre-eminently intended here. The fact that in the blessing of Joseph, Jacob calls God a Shepherd (רֹעֶה), Gen. xlvi. 15, xlix. 24, perhaps has somewhat to do with the choice of the first two names. In the third, the sitting enthroned in the sanctuary here below and in the heaven above blend together; for the Old Testament is conscious of a mutual relationship between the earthly and the heavenly temple (היכל) until the one merges entirely in the other. The cherûbim, which God enthrones, i.e. upon which He sits enthroned, are the bearers of the chariot (מרכבה) of the Ruler of the world (vid. xviii.

11). With הוֹפִיעָה (from יפֵע, יפֵע, eminere, emicare, as in the Asaph Psalm l. 2) the poet prays that He would appear in His splendour of light, i.e. in His fiery bright, judging, and rescuing doxa, whether as directly visible, or even as only recognisable by its operation. Both the comparison "after the manner of a flock" and the verb נָהַג are Asaphic, lxxviii. 52, cf. 26. Just so also the names given to the nation. The designation of Israel after the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh attaches itself to the name Joseph; and the two take the brother after the flesh into their midst, of whom the beloved Rachel was the mother as well as of Joseph, the father of Ephraim and Manasseh. In Num. ch. ii. also, these three are not separated, but have their camp on the west side of the Tabernacle. May God again put into activity—which is the meaning of עוֹרֵר (excitare) in distinction from הִעִיר (expergefacerere)—His גְבוּרָה, the need for the energetic intervention of which now makes itself felt, before these three tribes, i.e. by becoming their victorious leader. לָבֵה is a summoning imperative.* Concerning יִשְׁעָתָה vid. on iii. 3; the construction with Lamed says as little against the accusative adverbial rendering of the ah set forth there as does the Beth of בְּהַרְשֵׁה (in the wood) in 1 Sam. xxiii. 15, vid. Böttcher's Neue Aehrenlese, Nos. 221, 384, 449. It is not a bringing back out of the Exile that is prayed for by הַשִּׁיבֵנוּ, for, according to the whole impression conveyed by the Psalm, the people are still on the soil of their fatherland; but in their present feebleness they are no longer like themselves, they stand in need of divine intervention in order again to attain a condition that is in harmony with the promises, in order to become themselves again. May God then cause His long hidden countenance to brighten and shine upon them, then shall they be helped as they desire (וַיִּנְשָׁעָה).

Vers. 5-8. In the second strophe there issues forth bitter complaint concerning the form of wrath which the present assumes, and, thus confirmed, the petition rises anew. The transferring of the smoking (עָשָׂן) of God's nostrils = the hard breathing of anger (lxxiv. 1, Deut. xxix. 19 [20]), to God Himself is bold, but in keeping with the spirit of the Biblical

* Not a pronoun: to Thee it belongs to be for salvation for us, as the Talmud, Midrash, and Masora (vid. Norzi) take it; wherefore in J. Succa 54c it is straightway written לָךְ. Such a לָבֵה = לָךְ is called in the language of the Masora, and even in the Midrash (Exod. Rabba, fol. 121), לָבֵה וְרֵאיוֹת (vid. Buxtorf, Tiberias, p. 245).

view of the wrath of God (vid. on xviii. 9), so that there is no need to avoid the expression by calling in the aid of the Syriac word עָשָׂה, to be strong, powerful (why art Thou hard, why dost Thou harden Thyself . . .). The perfect after עָרַמְתִּי has the sense of a present with a retrospective glance, as in Ex. x. 3, cf. עָרַמְתָּהּ, Ex. xvi. 28, Hab. i. 2. The construction of עָשָׂה with אֵל is not to be understood after the analogy of אֵל אֶרְרָה (to kindle = to be angry against any one), for the prayer of the people is not an object of wrath, but only not a means of turning it aside. While the prayer is being presented, God veils Himself in the smoke of wrath, through which it is not able to penetrate. The LXX. translators have read בתפלה עבדיך, for they render ἐπι τὴν προσευχὴν τῶν δούλων σου (for which the common reading is τοῦ δούλου σου). Bread of tears is, according to xlii. 4, bread consisting of tears; tears, running down in streams upon the lips of the praying and fasting one, are his meat and his drink. הַשָּׂה with an accusative signifies to give something to drink, and followed by Beth, to give to drink by means of something, but it is not to be translated: potitandum das eis cum lacrymis trientem (De Dieu, von Ortenberg, and Hitzig). שְׁלִישׁ (Talmudic, a third part) is the accusative of more precise definition (Vatablus, Gesenius, Olshausen, and Hupfeld): by thirds (LXX. ἐν μέτρῳ, Symmachus μέτρῳ); for a third of an ephah is certainly a very small measure for the dust of the earth (Isa. xl. 12), but a large one for tears. The neighbours are the neighbouring nations, to whom Israel is become מְרוֹן, an object, a butt of contention. In לָמוֹ is expressed the pleasure which the mocking gives them.

Vers. 9-20. The complaint now assumes a detailing character in this strophe, inasmuch as it contrasts the former days with the present; and the ever more and more importunate prayer moulds itself in accordance therewith. The retrospective description begins, as is rarely the case, with the second modus, inasmuch as "the speaker thinks more of the bare nature of the act than of the time" (Ew. § 136, b). As in the blessing of Jacob (Gen. xlix. 22) Joseph is compared to the layer (בֵּן) of a fruitful growth (פֶּרֶה), whose shoots (בְּנוֹת) climb over the wall: so here Israel is compared to a vine (Gen. xlix. 22; גֵּפֶן פֶּרֶה, cxxviii. 3), which has become great in Egypt and been transplanted thence into the Land of Promise. הַפִּיעַ, LXX.

μεταίρειν, as in Job xix. 10, perhaps with an allusion to the מסעים of the people journeying to Canaan (lxxxviii. 52).* Here God made His vine a way and a place (פָּנָה, to clear, from פָּנָה, to turn, turn aside, Arabic faniya, to disappear, pass away; root פָּנ, to urge forward), and after He had secured to it a free soil and unchecked possibility of extension, it (the vine) rooted its roots, i.e. struck them ever deeper and wider, and filled the earth round about (cf. the antitype in the final days, Isa. xxvii. 6). The Israelitish kingdom of God extended itself on every side in accordance with the promise. הַשָּׂלָח (cf. Ezek. xvii. 6, and vegetable שָׁלַח, a shoot) also has the vine as its subject, like הַשָּׂרֵשׁ. Vers. 11 and 12 state this in a continued allegory, by the "mountains" pointing to the southern boundary, by the "cedars" to the northern, by the "sea" to the western, and by the "river" (Euphrates) to the eastern boundary of the country (vid. Deut. xi. 24 and other passages). אֲלֵהָ and עֲנִיָּיהָ are accusatives of the so-called more remote object (Ges. § 143, 1). קָצִיר is a cutting = a branch; יִנְקָה, a (vegetable) sucker = a young, tender shoot; אֲרֵז־אֵל, the cedars of Lebanon as being living monuments of the creative might of God. The allegory exceeds the measure of the reality of nature, inasmuch as this is obliged to be extended according to the reality of that which is typified and historical. But how unlike to the former times is the present! The poet asks "wherefore?" for the present state of things is a riddle to him. The surroundings of the vine are torn down; all who come in contact with it pluck it (אָרָה, to pick off, pluck off, Talmudic of the gathering of figs); the boar out of the wood (מִיעַר with עֵץ תְּלִייהָ, suspended Ajin†) cuts it off (בְּרָסָם, formed out of רָסָם

* Exod. Rabba, ch. xliv., with reference to this passage, says: "When husbandmen seek to improve a vine, what do they do? They root (עוקרין) it out of its place and plant (שותלין) it in another." And Levit. Rabba, ch. xxxvi., says: "As one does not plant a vine in a place where there are great, rough stones, but examines the ground and then plants it, so didst Thou drive out peoples and didst plant it," etc.

† According to Kiddushin, 30a, because this Ajin is the middle letter of the Psalter as the Waw of נחון, Lev. xi. 42, is the middle letter of the Tóra. One would hardly like to be at the pains of proving the correctness of this statement; nevertheless in the seventeenth century there lived one Laymaris, a clergyman, who was not afraid of this trouble, and found = נִיָּז *), viz. with its tusks; and that which moves about the fields (vid. concerning נִי, l. 11), i.e. the untractable, lively wild beast, devours it. Without doubt the poet associates a distinct nation with the wild boar in his mind; for animals are also in other instances the emblems of nations, as e.g. the leviathan, the water-serpent, the behemoth (Isa. xxx. 6), and flies (Isa. vii. 18) are emblems of Egypt. The Midrash interprets it of Seir-Edom, and נִי שְׂרִי, according to Gen. xvi. 12, of the nomadic Arabs.

In ver. 15 the prayer begins for the third time with three-fold urgency, supplicating for the vine renewed divine providence, and a renewal of the care of divine grace. We have divided the verse differently from the accentuation, since שׁוֹבֵב־נָא הַיָּבֵט is to be understood according to Ges. § 142. The junction by means of ׀ is at once opposed to the supposition that וַיִּבְנֶה in ver. 16 signifies a slip or plant, plantum (Targum, Syriac, Aben-Ezra, Kimchi, and others), and that consequently the whole of ver. 16 is governed by וַיִּפְקֵר. Nor can it mean its (the vine's) stand or base, בֵּן (Böttcher), since one does not plant a "stand." The LXX. renders וּבְנָה: καὶ κατάρτισαι, which is imper. aor. 1. med., therefore in the sense of בְּנִינָה.† But the alternation of עַל (cf. Prov. ii. 11, and جَن عَلِي, to cover over) with the accusative of the object makes it more natural to derive בְּנָה, not from בָּנָה = בָּן, but from בָּנָה = כָּן, to cover, conceal, protect (whence כֵּן, a covering, shelter, hiding-place):

* Saadia appropriately renders it يَقْرُضُهَا, by referring, as does Dunash also, to the Talmudic קִרְסָם, which occurs of ants, like قَرُض of rodents. So Peah ii. § 7, Menachoth 71b, on which Rashi observes, "the locust (חַגַב) is accustomed to eat from above, the ant tears off the corn-stalk from below." Elsewhere קִרְסָם denotes the breaking off of dry branches from the tree, as וְרָדָה the removal of green branches.

† Perhaps the Caph majusculum is the result of an erasure that required to be made, vid. Geiger, Urschrift, S. 295. Accordingly the Ajin suspensum might also be the result of a later inserted correction, for there is a Phœnician inscription that has יַר (wood, forest); vid. Levy, Phœnizisches Wörterbuch, S. 22.

and protect him whom . . . or: protect what Thy right hand has planted. The pointing certainly seems to take כנה as the feminine of כן (LXX., Dan. xi. 7, φυτόν); for an imperat. paragog. Kal of the form כנה does not occur elsewhere, although it might have been regarded by the punctuists as possible from the form כל, volve, cxix. 22. If it is regarded as impossible, then one might read כנה. At any rate the word is imperative, as the following אֲשֶׁר, eum quem, also shows, instead of which, if כנה were a substantive, one would expect to find a relative clause without אשר, as in ver. 16b. Moreover ver. 16b requires this, since אֲשֶׁר can only be used of visiting with punishment. And who then would the slip (branch) and the son of man be in distinction from the vine? If we take כנה as imperative, then, as one might expect, the vine and the son of man are both the people of God. The Targum renders ver. 16b thus: "and upon the King Messiah, whom Thou hast established for Thyself," after Ps. ii. and Dan. vii. 13; but, as in the latter passage, it is not the Christ Himself, but the nation out of which He is to proceed, that is meant. אֲשֶׁר has the sense of firm appropriation, as in Isa. xlv. 14, inasmuch as the notion of making fast passes over into that of laying firm hold of, of seizure. Rosenmüller well renders it: quem adoptatum tot nexibus tibi adstrinxisti. The figure of the vine, which rules all the language here, is also still continued in ver. 17; for the part. fem. refer to כנה,—the verb, however, may take the plural form, because those of Israel are this "vine," which combusta igne, succisa (as in Isa. xxxiii. 12; Aramaic, to cut off, tear off, in ver. 13 the Targum word for ארה; Arabic, كسح, to clear away, peel off), is just perishing, or hangs in danger of destruction (ארה) before the threatening of the wrathful countenance of God. The absence of anything to denote the subject, and the form of expression, which still keeps within the circle of the figure of the vine, forbid us to understand this ver. 17 of the extirpation of the foes. According to the sense על תהיירד*

* The תהי has Gaja, like עאזומרה (lxxx. 3), בנינכר (cxliv. 7), and the like. This Gaja beside the Shebâ (instead of beside the following vowel) belongs to the peculiarities of the metrical books, which in general, on account of their more melodious mode of delivery, have many such a Gaja coincides with the supplicatory על בנה. It is Israel that is called בן in ver. 16, as being the son whom Jahve has called into being in Egypt, and then called out of Egypt to Himself and solemnly declared to be His son on Sinai (Ex. iv. 22, Hos. xi. 1), and who is now, with a play upon the name of Benjamin in ver. 3 (cf. ver. 16), called אִישׁ יִמִּינֶךָ, as being the people which Jahve has preferred before others, and has placed at His right hand* for the carrying out of His work of salvation; who is called, however, at the same time בְּנֵי-אָדָם, because belonging to a humanity that is feeble in itself, and thoroughly conditioned and dependent. It is not the more precise designation of the "son of man" that is carried forward by וְלֹא-נָסוּךְ, "and who has not drawn back from Thee" (Hupfeld, Hitzig, and others), but it is, as the same relation which is repeated in ver. 19b shows, the apodosis of the preceding petition: then shall we never depart from Thee; נָסוּךְ being not a participle, as in xliv. 19, but a plene written voluntative: recedamus, vowing new obedience as thanksgiving for the divine preservation. To the prayer in ver. 18 corresponds, then, the prayer תְּהַיְיָ, which is expressed as future (which can rarely be avoided, Ew. § 229), with a vow of thanksgiving likewise following: then will we call with Thy name, i.e. make it the medium and matter of solemn proclamation. In ver. 20 the refrain of this Psalm, which is laid out as a trilogy, is repeated for the third time. The name of God is here threefold.

beside Shebâ, which does not occur in the prose books. Thus, e.g., יהוה and אֱלֹהִים always have Gaja beside the Shebâ when they have Rebiâ magnum without a conjunctive, probably because Rebiâ and Dechî had such a fulness of tone that a first stroke fell even upon the Shebâ-letters.

* Pinsker punctuates thus: Let Thy hand be upon the man, Thy right hand upon the son of man, whom, etc.; but the impression that יִמִּינֶךָ and אִישׁ יִמִּינֶךָ coincide is so strong, that no one of the old interpreters (from the LXX. and Targum onwards) has been able to free himself from it.

PSALM LXXXI.

EASTER FESTIVAL SALUTATION AND DISCOURSE.

- 2 CAUSE shouts of joy to resound unto Elohim, our safe retreat,
Make a joyful noise unto the God of Jacob.
- 3 Raise a song and sound the timbrel,
The pleasant cithern together with the harp.
- 4 Blow the horn at the new moon,
At the full moon, in honour of the day of our feast.
- 5 For a statute for Israel is it,
An ordinance of the God of Jacob.
- 6 A testimony hath He laid it down in Joseph,
When He went forth over the land of Egypt—
A language of one not known did I hear.
- 7 I have removed his back from the burden,
His hands were freed from the task-basket.
- 8 In distress didst thou cry, and I delivered thee,
I answered thee in a covering of thunder,
I proved thee at the waters of Meribah. (Sela.)
- 9 Hear, O my people, and I will testify unto thee;
Israel, Oh that thou wouldst hearken unto Me!—
- 10 Let there be among thee no strange god,
And do not thou worship a god of a foreign country.
- 11 I, I am Jahve thy God,
Who led thee up out of the land of Egypt—
Open wide thy mouth, and I will fill it.
- 12 But My people hearkened not unto My voice,
And Israel did not obey Me.
- 13 Then I cast them forth to the hardness of their heart,
They went on in their own counsels.
- 14 Oh that My people would be obedient unto Me,
That Israel would walk in My ways!
- 15 Suddenly would I humble their enemies,
And against their oppressors turn My hand.
- 16 The haters of Jahve should submit themselves to Him,

And their time should endure for ever.

- 17 He fed them with the fat of wheat,
And with honey out of the rock did I satisfy thee.

Ps. lxxx., which looks back into the time of the leading forth out of Egypt, is followed by another with the very same Asaphic thoroughly characteristic feature of a retrospective glance at Israel's early history (cf. more particularly lxxx. 11 with lxxx. 9). In Ps. lxxx. the lyric element of Ps. lxxvii. is combined with the didactic element of Ps. lxxviii. The unity of these Psalms is indubitable. All three have towards the close the appearance of being fragmentary. For the author delights to ascend to the height of his subject and to go down into the depth of it, without returning to the point from which he started. In Ps. lxxvii. Israel as a whole was called "the sons of Jacob and Joseph;" in Ps. lxxviii. we read "the sons of Ephraim" instead of the whole nation; here it is briefly called "Joseph." This also indicates the one author. Then Ps. lxxx., exactly like lxxix., is based upon the Pentateuchal history in Exodus and Deuteronomy. Jahve Himself speaks through the mouth of the poet, as He did once through the mouth of Moses—Asaph is κατ' ἐξοχήν the prophet (נָבִי) among the psalmists. The transition from one form of speech to another which accompanies the rapid alternation of feelings, what the Arabs call talwîn el-chitâb, "a colouring of a speech by a change of the persons," is also characteristic of him, as later on of Micah (e.g. vi. 15 sq.).

This Ps. lxxx. is according to ancient custom the Jewish New Year's Psalm, the Psalm of the Feast of Trumpets (Num. xxix. 1), therefore the Psalm of the first (and second) of Tishri; it is, however, a question whether the blowing of the horn (shophar) at the new moon, which it calls upon them to do, does not rather apply to the first of Nisan, to the ecclesiastical New Year. In the weekly liturgy of the Temple it was the Psalm for the Thursday.

The poet calls upon them to give a jubilant welcome to the approaching festive season, and in vers. 7 sqq. Jahve Himself makes Himself heard as the Preacher of the festival. He reminds those now living of His loving-kindness towards ancient Israel, and admonishes them not to incur the guilt of like unfaithfulness, in order that they may not lose the like tokens of His loving-kindness. What festive season is it? Either the Feast of the Passover or the Feast of Tabernacles; for it must be one of these two feasts which begin on the day of the full moon. Because it is one having reference to the redemption of Israel out of Egypt, the Targum, Talmud (more particularly Rosh ha-Shana, where this Psalm is much discussed), Midrash, and Sohar understand the Feast of Tabernacles; because vers. 2-4a seem to refer to the new moon of the seventh month, which is celebrated before other new moons (Num. x. 10) as יום התרועה (Num. xxix. 1, cf. Lev. xxiii. 24), i.e. to the first of Tishri, the civil New Year; and the blowing of horns at the New Year is, certainly not according to Scripture, but yet according to tradition (vid. Maimonides, Hilchoth Shophar i. 2), a very ancient arrangement. Nevertheless we must give up this reference of the Psalm to the first of Tishri and to the Feast of Tabernacles, which begins with the fifteenth of Tishri:—(1) Because between the high feast-day of the first of Tishri and the Feast of Tabernacles on the fifteenth to the twenty-first (twenty-second) of Tishri lies the great day of Atonement on the tenth of Tishri, which would be ignored, by greeting the festive season with a joyful noise from the first of Tishri forthwith to the fifteenth. (2) Because the remembrance of the redemption of Israel clings far more characteristically to the Feast of the Passover than to the Feast of Tabernacles. This latter appears in the oldest law-giving (Ex. xxiii. 16, xxxiv. 22) as חג האסיף, i.e. as a feast of the ingathering of the autumn fruits, and therefore as the closing festival of the whole harvest; it does not receive the historical reference to the journey through the desert, and therewith its character of a feast of booths or arbours, until the addition in Lev. xxiii. 39-44, having reference to the carrying out of the celebration of the feasts in Canaan; whereas the feast which begins with the full moon of Nisan has, it is true, not been entirely free of all reference to agriculture, but from the very beginning bears the historical names פסח and חג המצות. (3) Because in the Psalm itself, viz. in ver. 6b, allusion is made to the fact which the Passover commemorates.

Concerning על־הגתית vid. on viii. 1. The symmetrical, stichic plan of the Psalm is clear: the schema is 11. 12. 12.

Vers. 2-6. The summons in ver. 2 is addressed to the whole congregation, inasmuch as הַרְרִיעִי is not intended of the clanging of the trumpets, but as in Ezra iii. 11, and frequently. The summons in ver. 3 is addressed to the Levites, the appointed singers and musicians in connection with the divine services, 2 Chron. v. 12, and frequently. The summons in ver. 4 is addressed to the priests, to whom was committed not only the blowing of the two (later on a hundred and twenty, vid. 2 Chron. v. 12) silver trumpets, but who appear also in Josh. vi. 4 and elsewhere (cf. xlvii. 6 with 2 Chron. xx. 28) as the blowers of the shophar. The Talmud observes that since the destruction of the Temple the names of instruments שׁוֹפָרָא and חֲצוֹצְרֶתָא are wont to be confounded one for the other (B. Sabbath 36a, Succa 34a), and, itself confounding them, infers from Num. x. 10 the duty and significance of the blowing of the shophar (B. Erachin 3b). The LXX. also renders both by σάλπιγγξ; but the Biblical language mentions שׁוֹפָר and חֲצוֹצְרֶתָא, a horn (more especially a ram's horn) and a (metal) trumpet, side by side in xcviii. 6, 1 Chron. xv. 28, and is therefore conscious of a difference between them. The Tôra says nothing of the employment of the shophar in connection with divine service, except that the commencement of every fiftieth year, which on this very account is called שְׁנַת הַיְבֵל, annus buccinæ, is to be made known by the horn signal throughout all the land (Lev. xxv. 9). But just as tradition by means of an inference from analogy derives the blowing of the shophar on the first of Tishri, the beginning of the common year, from this precept, so on the ground of the passage of the Psalm before us, assuming that בְּחֹדֶשׁ, LXX. ἐν νεομηνίᾳ, refers not to the first of Tishri but to the first of Nisan, we may suppose that the beginning of every month, but, in particular, the beginning of the month which was at the same time the beginning of the ecclesiastical year, was celebrated by a blowing of the shophar, as, according to Josephus, Bell. iv. 9, 12, the beginning and close of the Sabbath was announced from the top of the Temple by a priest with the salpinx. The poet means to say that the Feast of the Passover is to be saluted by the congregation with shouts of joy, by the Levites with music, and even beginning from the new moon (neomenia) of the Passover month with blowing of shophars, and that this is to be continued at the Feast of the Passover itself. The Feast of the Passover, for which Hupfeld devises a gloomy physiognomy,* was a joyous festival, the Old Testament Christmas. 2 Chron. xxx. 21 testifies to the exultation of the people and the boisterous music of the Levite priests, with which it was celebrated. According to Num. x. 10, the trumpeting of the priests was connected with the sacrifices; and that the slaying of the paschal lambs took place amidst the Tantaratan of the priests (long-drawn notes interspersed with sharp shrill ones, תקיעה תרועה ותקיעה), is expressly related of the post-exilic service at least.†

The phrase נתן קול proceeds from the phrase נתן, according to which נתן directly means: to attune, strike up, cause to be heard. Concerning בְּסָפָה (Prov. vii. 20 בְּסָפָה) tradition is uncertain. The Talmudic interpretation (B. Rosh ha-Shana 8b, Betza 16a, and the Targum which is taken from it), according to which it is the day of the new moon (the first of the month), on which the moon hides itself, i.e. is not to be seen at all in the morning, and in the evening only for a short time immediately after sunset, and the interpretation that is adopted by a still more imposing array of authorities (LXX., Vulgate, Menahem, Rashi, Jacob Tam, Aben-Ezra, Parchon, and others), according to which a time fixed by computation (from בְּסָפָה = בְּסָפָה, computare) is so named in general, are outweighed by the usage of the Syriac, in which kese denotes the full moon as the moon with covered, i.e. filled-up orb, and therefore the fifteenth of the month, but also the time from that point onwards, perhaps because then the moon covers itself, inasmuch as its shining surface appears each day less large (cf. the Peshîto, 1 Kings xii. 32 of the fifteenth day of the eighth month, 2 Chron. vii. 10 of the twenty-third day of the seventh month, in both instances of the Feast of Tabernacles), after which, too, in the passage before us it is rendered wa-b-kese, which a Syro-Arabic glossary (in Rosenmüller) explains festâ quæ sunt in medio mensis. The Peshîto here, like the Targum, proceeds from the reading תְּהִינִי, which, following the LXX. and the best texts, is to be rejected in comparison with the singular תְּהִי. If, however, it is to be read תְּהִינִי, and תְּהִינִי (according to Kimchi with Segol not merely in the second syllable, but with double Segol תְּהִינִי, after the form טָנָא = טָנָא) signifies not inter-lunium, but plenilunium (instead of which also Jerome has in medio mense, and in Prov. vii. 20, in die plenæ lunæ, Aquila ἡμέρα πανσελήνου), then what is meant is either the Feast of Tabernacles, which is called absolutely תְּהִינִי in 1 Kings viii. 2 (2 Chron. v. 3) and elsewhere, or the Passover, which is also so called in Isa. xxx. 29 and elsewhere. Here, as ver. 5 will convince us, the latter is intended, the Feast of unleavened bread, the porch of which, so to speak, is עֶרְבַּ פֶּסַח together with the לַיְל שְׁמֵרִים (Ex. xii. 42), the night from the fourteenth to the fifteenth of Nisan. In vers. 2, 3 they are called upon to give a welcome to this feast. The blowing of the shophar is to announce the commencement of the Passover month, and at the commencement of the Passover day which opens the Feast of unleavened bread it is to be renewed. The לְ of לַיְלִים is not meant temporally, as perhaps in Job xxi. 30: at the day = on the day; for why was it not בַּיּוֹם? It is rather: towards the day, but בכֹּסֶף assumes that the day has already arrived; it is the same Lamed as in ver. 2, the blowing of the shophar is to concern this feast-day, it is to sound in honour of it.

Vers. 5 and 6 now tell whence the feast which is to be met with singing and music has acquired such a high significance: it is a divine institution coming from the time of the redemption by the hand of Moses. It is called חֹק as being a legally sanctioned decree, כְּטִשְׁבֵּט as being a lawfully binding appointment, and עֲרִירָה as being a positive declaration of the divine will. The לְ in לַיְשׂוּרָאֵל characterizes Israel as the receiver, in לְאֱלֹהֵי the God of Israel as the Owner, i.e. Author and Lawgiver. By בְּצִוְתוֹ the establishing of the statute is dated back to the time of the Exodus; but the statement of the time of its being established, “when He went out over the land of Egypt,” cannot be understood of the exodus of the people out of Egypt, natural as this may be here, where Israel has just been called יְהוֹסֵף (pathetic for יוֹסֵף), by a comparison with Gen. xli. 45, where Joseph is spoken of in the same words. For this expression does not describe the going forth out of a country, perhaps in the sight of its inhabitants, Num. xxxiii. 3, cf. Ex. xiv. 8 (Hengstenberg), but the going out over a country. Elohim is the subject, and צאת is to be understood according to Ex. xi. 4 (Kimchi, De Dieu, Dathe, Rosenmüller, and others): when He went out for judgment over the land of Egypt (cf. Mic. i. 3). This statement of the time of itself at once decides the reference of the Psalm to the Passover, which commemorates the sparing of Israel at that time (Ex. xii. 27), and which was instituted on that very night of judgment. The accentuation divides the verse correctly. According to this, שִׁפְתַי לֹא-דָרַעְתִּי אִשְׁמַע, is not a relative clause to מִצְרַיִם: where I heard a language that I understood not (cxiv. 1). Certainly יָדַע שִׁפְתַי, "to understand a language," is an expression that is in itself not inadmissible (cf. יָדַע סֵפֶר, to understand writing, to be able to read, Isa. xxix. 11 sq.), the selection of which instead of the more customary phrase שָׁמַע לִשְׁוֹן (Deut. xxviii. 49, Isa. xxxiii. 19, Jer. v. 15) might be easily intelligible here beside אִשְׁמַע; but the omission of the שָׁמַע (אִשְׁמַע) is harsh, the thought is here purposeless, and excluded with our way of taking בְּצִאֲתִי. From the speech of God that follows it is evident that the clause is intended to serve as an introduction of this divine speech, whether it now be rendered sermonem quem non novi (cf. xviii. 44, populus quem non novi), or alicujus, quem non novi (Ges. § 123, rem. 1), both of which are admissible. Is it now in some way an introduction to the following speech of God as one which it has been suddenly given to the psalmist to hear: "An unknown language, or the language of one unknown, do I hear"? Thus Döderlein explains it: Subitanea et digna poetico impetu digressio, cum vates sese divino adflatu subito percussus sentit et oraculum audire sibi persuadet; and in the same way De Wette, Olshausen, Hupfeld, and others. But the oracle of God cannot appear so strange to the Israelitish poet and seer as the spirit-voice to Eliphaz (Job iv. 16); and moreover אִשְׁמַע after the foregoing historical predicates has the presumption of the imperfect signification in its favour. Thus, then, it will have to be interpreted according to Ex. vi. 2 sq. It was the language of a known, but still also unknown God, which Israel heard in the redemption of that period. It was the God who had been made manifest as יְהוָה only, so to speak, by way of prelude hitherto, who now appeared at this juncture of the patriarchal history, which had been all along kept in view, in the marvelous and new light of the judgment which was executed upon Egypt, and of the protection, redemption, and election of Israel, as being One hitherto unknown, as the history of salvation actually then, having arrived at Sinai, receives an entirely new form, inasmuch as from this time onwards the congregation or church is a nation, and Jahve the King of a nation, and the bond of union between them a national law educating it for the real, vital salvation that is to come. The words of Jahve that follow are now not the words heard then in the time of the Exodus. The remembrance of the words heard forms only a transition to those that now make themselves heard. For when the poet remembers the language which He who reveals Himself in a manner never before seen and heard of spoke to His people at that time, the Ever-living One Himself, who is yesterday and to-day the same One, speaks in order to remind His people of what He was to them then, and of what He spake to them then.

Vers. 7-11. It is a gentle but profoundly earnest festival discourse which God the Redeemer addresses to His redeemed people. It begins, as one would expect in a Passover speech, with a reference to the סְבִלֹת of Egypt (Ex. i. 11-14, v. 4, vi. 6 sq.), and to the דָּר, the task-basket for the transport of the clay and of the bricks (Ex. i. 14, v. 7 sq.).\* Out of such distress did He free the poor people who cried for deliverance (Ex. ii. 23-25); He answered them בְּסִתְּךָ רַעַם, i.e. not (according to xxii. 22, Isa. xxxii. 2): affording them protection against the storm, but (according to xviii. 12, lxxvii. 17 sq.): out of the thunder-clouds in which He at the same time revealed and veiled Himself, casting down the enemies of Israel with His lightnings, which is intended to refer pre-eminently to the passage through the Red Sea (vid. lxxvii. 19); and He proved them אֶבְרָתְךָ with  $\sigma$  contracted from  $\bar{o}$ , cf. on Job xxxv. 6) at the waters of Meribah, viz. whether they would trust Him further on after such glorious tokens of His power and loving-kindness. The name “Waters of Meribah,” which properly is borne only by Meribath Kadesh, the place of the giving of water in the fortieth year (Num. xx. 13, xxvii. 14, Deut. xxxii. 51, xxxiii. 8), is here transferred to the place of the giving of water in the first year, which was named Massah u-Meribah (Ex. xvii. 7), as the remembrances of these two miracles, which took place under similar circumstances, in general blend together (vid. on xcv. 8 sq.). It is not now said that Israel did not act in response to the expectation of God, who had so wondrously verified Himself; the music, as Sela imports, here rises, and makes a long and forcible pause in what is being said. What now follows further, are, as the further progress of ver. 12 shows, the words of God addressed to the Israel of the desert, which at the same time with its faithlessness are brought to the remembrance of the Israel of the present. הָעִירָךְ, as in l. 7, Deut. viii. 19, to bear testimony that concerns him against any one. מִסֵּ (according to the sense, o si, as in Ps. xcv. ver. 7, which is in many ways akin to this Psalm) properly opens a searching question which wishes that the thing asked may come about (whether thou wilt indeed give me a willing hearing?!). In ver. 10 the key-note of the revelation of the Law from Sinai is struck: the fundamental command which opens the decalogue demanded fidelity to Jahve and forbade idol-worship as the sin of sins. אֱלֹהֵי יָדֶיךָ is an idol in opposition to the God of Israel as the true God; and אֱלֹהֵי זָרִים, a strange god in opposition to the true God as the God of Israel. To this one God Israel ought to yield itself all the more undividedly and heartily as it was more manifestly indebted entirely to Him, who in His condescension had chosen it, and in His wonder-working might had redeemed it (הַמַּעֲלֶדָה, part. Hiph. with the eh elided, like הַפְּדִיָה, Deut. xiii. 6, and אֲבִלְהָה, from בְּלָהָה, Ex. xxxiii. 3); and how easy this submission ought to have been to it, since He desired nothing in return for the rich abundance of His good gifts, which satisfy and quicken body and soul, but only a wide-opened mouth, i.e. a believing longing, hungering for mercy and eager for salvation (cxix. 131)!

Vers. 12-17. The Passover discourse now takes a sorrowful and awful turn: Israel's disobedience and self-will frustrated the gracious purpose of the commandments and promises of its God. “My people” and “Israel” alternate as in the complaint in Isa. i. 3. לֹא־אָזְבָה followed by the dative, as in Deut. xiii. 9 ([8], οὐ συνθελήσεις αὐτῶ). Then God made their sin their punishment, by giving them over judicially (שָׁלַח as in Job viii. 4) into the obduracy of their heart, which rudely shuts itself up against His mercy (from שָׁרַר, Aramaic שָׁרַר, Arabic سَرَّ, to make firm = to cheer, make glad), so that they went on (cf. on the sequence of tense, lxi. 8) in their, i.e. their own, egotistical, God-estranged determinations; the suffix is thus accented, as e.g. in Isa. lxxv. 2, cf. the borrowed passage Jer. vii. 24, and the same phrase in Mic. vi. 16. And now, because this state of unfaithfulness in comparison with God's faithfulness has remained essentially the same even to to-day, the exalted Orator of the festival passes over forthwith to the generation of the present, and that, as is in accordance with the cheerful character of the feast, in a charmingly alluring manner. Whether we take לֹא in the signification of si (followed by the participle, as in 2 Sam. xviii. 12), or like אִם above in ver. 9 as expressing a wish, o si (if but!), vers. 15 sqq. at any rate have the relation of the apodosis to it. From כִּמְעַט (for a little, easily) it may be conjectured that the relation of Israel at that time to the nations did not correspond to the dignity of the nation of God which is called to subdue and rule the world in the strength of God. הִשִּׁיב signifies in this passage only to turn, not: to again lay upon. The meaning is, that He would turn the hand which is now chastening His people against those by whom He is chastening them (cf. on the usual meaning of the phrase, Isa. i. 25, Amos i. 8, Jer. vi. 9, Ezek. xxxviii. 12). The promise in ver. 16 relates to Israel and all the members of the nation. The haters of Jahve would be compelled reluctantly to submit themselves to Him, and their time would endure for ever. "Time" is equivalent to duration, and in this instance with the collateral notion of prosperity, as elsewhere (Isa. xiii. 22) of the term of punishment. One now expects that it should continue with וְאִתְּיָלֵהוּ, in the tone of a promise. The Psalm, however, closes with an historical statement. For וְאִתְּיָלֵהוּ cannot signify et cibaret eum; it ought to be pronounced וְאִתְּיָלֵהוּ. The pointing, like the LXX., Syriac, and Vulgate, takes ver. 17a (cf. Deut. xxxii. 13 sq.) as a retrospect, and apparently rightly so. For even the Asaphic Psalms lxxvii. and lxxviii. break off with historical pictures. Ver. 17*b* is, accordingly, also to be taken as retrospective. The words of the poet in conclusion once more change into the words of God. The closing word runs אֵלֹהִים, as in l. 8, Deut. iv. 31, and (with the exception of the futt. Hiph. of Lamed He verbs ending with ekka) usually. The Babylonian system of pointing nowhere recognises the suffix-form ekka. If the Israel of the present would hearken to the Lawgiver of Sinai, says ver. 17, then would He renew to it the miraculous gifts of the time of the redemption under Moses.

PSALM LXXXII.

GOD'S JUDGMENT UPON THE GODS OF THE EARTH.

- 1 ELOHIM standeth in the congregation of God,
Among the elohim doth He judge.
- 2 "How long will ye judge unjustly,
And take the side of the wicked? (Sela.)
- 3 Do justice to the destitute and fatherless, Acquit the afflicted and the poor!
- 4 Deliver the destitute and needy,
Rescue out of the hand of the wicked!"—
- 5 "They know not, and understand not,
In darkness they walk to and fro;
All the foundations of the land totter.
- 6 I have said: Ye are elohim,
And sons of the Most High are ye all.
- 7 Yet as men shall ye die,
And as one of the princes shall ye fall."
- 8 Arise, Elohim, oh judge the earth,
For Thou hast a claim upon all nations.

As in Ps. lxxxi., so also in this Psalm (according to the Talmud the Tuesday Psalm of the Temple liturgy) God is inroduced as speaking after the manner of the prophets. Ps. lviii. and xciv. are similar, but more especially Isa. iii. 13–15. Asaph the seer beholds how God, reproving, correcting, and threatening, appears against the chiefs of the congregation of His people, who have perverted the splendour of majesty which He has put upon them into tyranny. It is perfectly characteristic of Asaph (Ps. l., lxxv., lxxxii.) to plunge himself into the contemplation of the divine judgment, and to introduce God as speaking. There is nothing to militate against the Psalm being written by Asaph, David's cotemporary, except the determination not to allow to the אַנְגֵּל of the inscription its most natural sense. Hupfeld, understanding "angels" by the elohim, as Bleek has done before him, inscribes the Psalm: "God's judgment upon unjust judges in heaven and upon earth." But the angels as such are nowhere called elohim in the Old Testament, although they might be so called; and their being judged here on account of unjust judging, Hupfeld himself says, is "an obscure point that is still to be cleared up." An interpretation which, like this, abandons the usage of the language in order to bring into existence a riddle that it cannot solve, condemns itself. At the same time the assertion of Hupfeld (of Knobel, Graf, and others), that in Ex. xxi. 6, xxii. 7 sq., 27,* אֱלֹהִים denotes God Himself, and not directly the authorities of the nation as being His earthly representatives, finds its most forcible refutation in the so-called and mortal elohim of this Psalm (cf. also xlv. 7, lviii. 2).

By reference to this Psalm Jesus proves to the Jews (John x. 34–36) that when He calls Himself the Son of God, He does not blaspheme God, by an argumentatio a minori ad majus. If the Law, so He argues, calls even those gods who are officially invested with this name by a declaration of the divine will promulgated in time (and the Scripture cannot surely, as in general, so also in this instance, be made invalid), then it cannot surely be blasphemy if He calls Himself the Son of God, whom not merely a divine utterance in this present time has called to this or to that worldly office after the image of God, but who with His whole life is ministering to the accomplishment of a work to which the Father had already sanctified Him when He came into the world. In connection with ἡγίασε one is reminded of the fact that those who are called elohim in the Psalm are censured on account of the unholiness of their conduct. The name does not originally belong to them, nor do they show themselves to be morally worthy of it. With ἡγίασε καὶ ἀπέστειλεν Jesus contrasts His divine sonship, prior to time, with theirs, which began only in this present time.

Vers. 1-4. God comes forward and makes Himself heard first of all as censuring and admonishing. The "congregation of God" is, as in Num. xxvii. 17, xxxi. 16, Josh. xxii. 16 sq., "the congregation of (the sons of) Israel," which God has purchased from among the nations (lxxiv. 2), and upon which as its Lawgiver He has set His divine impress. The psalmist and seer sees Elohim standing in this congregation of God. The part. Niph. (as in Isa. iii. 13) denotes not so much the suddenness and unpreparedness, as, rather, the statue-like immobility and terrifying designfulness of His appearance. Within the range of the congregation of God this holds good of the elohim. The right over life and death, with which the administration of justice cannot dispense, is a prerogative of God. From the time of Gen. ix. 6, however, He has transferred the execution of this prerogative to mankind, and instituted in mankind an office wielding the sword of justice, which also exists in His theocratic congregation, but here has His positive law as the basis of its continuance and as the rule of its action. Everywhere among men, but here pre-eminently, those in authority are God's delegates and the bearers of His image, and therefore as His representatives are also themselves called elohim, "gods" (which the LXX. in Ex. xxi. 6 renders τὸ κριτήριο τοῦ Θεοῦ, and the Targums here, as in Ex. xxii. 7, 8, 27 uniformly, אֱלֹהִים). The God who has conferred this exercise of power upon these subordinate elohim, without their resigning it of themselves, now sits in judgment in their midst. שָׁפַט of that which takes place before the mind's eye of the psalmist. How long, He asks, will ye judge unjustly? שָׁפַט עוֹל is equivalent to עֲשֵׂה עוֹלָהּ, Lev. xix. 15, 35 (the opposite is מִיִּשְׁרָיִם שָׁפַט, lviii. 2). How long will ye accept the countenance of the wicked, i.e. incline to accept, regard, favour the person of the wicked? The music, which here becomes forte, gives intensity to the terrible sternness (das Niederdonnernde) of the divine question, which seeks to bring the "gods" of the earth to their right mind. Then follow admonitions to do that which they have hitherto left undone. They are to cause the benefit of the administration of justice to tend to the advantage of the defenceless, of the destitute, and of the helpless, upon whom God the Law-giver especially keeps His eye. The word שָׁרַף (שֹׂאֵף), of which there is no evidence until within the time of David and Solomon, is synonymous with אֲבִיּוֹן לַל with יִתוּם is pointed לָל, and with וְאֲבִיּוֹן, on account of the closer notional union, לָל (as in lxxii. 13). They are words which are frequently repeated in the prophets, foremost in Isaiah (ch. i. 17), with which is enjoined upon those invested with the dignity of the law, and with jurisdiction, justice towards those who cannot and will not themselves obtain their rights by violence.

Vers. 5-7. What now follows in ver. 5 is not a parenthetical assertion of the inefficiency with which the divine correction rebounds from the judges and rulers. In connection with this way of taking ver. 5, the manner in which the divine language is continued in ver. 6 is harsh and unadjusted. God Himself speaks in ver. 5 of the judges, but reluctantly alienated from them; and confident of the futility of all attempts to make them better, He tells them their sentence in vers. 6 sq. The verbs in ver. 5a are designedly without any object: complaint of the widest compass is made over their want of reason and understanding; and יִרְעוּ takes the perfect form in like manner to ἐγνώκασι, noverunt, cf. xiv. 1, Isa. xlv. 18. Thus, then, no result is to be expected from the divine admonition: they still go their ways in this state of mental darkness, and that, as the Hithpa. implies, stalking on in carnal security and self-complacency. The commands, however, which they transgress are the foundations (cf. xi. 3), as it were the shafts and pillars (lxxv. 4, cf. Prov. xxix. 4), upon which rests the permanence of all earthly relationships which are appointed by creation and regulated by the Tōra. Their transgression makes the land, the earth, to totter physically and morally, and is the prelude of its overthrow. When the celestial Lord of the domain thinks upon this destruction which injustice and tyranny are bringing upon the earth, His wrath kindles, and He reminds the judges and rulers that it is His own free declaratory act which has clothed them with the god-like dignity which they bear. They are actually elohim, but not possessed of the right of self-government; there is a Most High (עֶלְיוֹן) to whom they as sons are responsible. The idea that the appellation elohim, which they have given to themselves, is only sarcastically given back to them in ver. 1 (Ewald, Olshausen), is refuted by ver. 6, according to which they are really elohim by the grace of God. But if their practice is not an Amen to this name, then they shall be divested of the majesty which they have forfeited; they shall be divested of the prerogative of Israel, whose vocation and destiny they have belied. They shall die off כַּאֲדָמָה, like common men not rising in any degree above the mass (cf. מִי אֲדָמָה, opp. מִי אֱלֹהִים, iv. 3, xlix. 3); they shall fall like any one (Judg. xvi. 7, Obad. ver. 11) of the princes who in the course of history have been cast down by the judgment of God (Hos. vii. 7). Their divine office will not protect them. For although justitia civilis is far from being the righteousness that avails before God, yet injustitia civilis is in His sight the vilest abomination.

Ver. 8. The poet closes with the prayer for the realization of that which he has beheld in spirit. He implores God Himself to sit in judgment (שֹׁפֵט as in Lam. iii. 59), since judgment is so badly exercised upon the earth. All peoples are indeed His נַחֲלָה, He has an hereditary and proprietary right among (LXX. and Vulgate according to Num. xviii. 20; and frequently), or rather in (אֵל as in אֵל אֱלֹהִים, instead of the accusative of the object, Zech. ii. 16), all nations (ἔθνη)—may He then be pleased to maintain it judicially. The inference drawn from this point backwards, that the Psalm is directed against the possessors of power among the Gentiles, is erroneous. Israel itself, in so far as it acts inconsistently with its theocratic character, belies its sanctified nationality, is a גוֹי like the גוֹיִם, and is put into the same category with these. The judgment over the world is also a judgment over the Israel that is become conformed to the world, and its God-stranged chiefs.

PSALM LXXXIII.

BATTLE-CRY TO GOD AGAINST ALLIED PEOPLES.

- 2 ELOHIM, let there be no repose to Thee,
Be not silent and rest not, O God!
- 3 For lo Thine enemies make a tumult,
And Thy haters carry the head high.
- 4 Against Thy people they meditate a crafty design,
And take counsel together against Thy protegés.
- 5 They say: "Up! we will destroy them from among the peoples,
And the name of Israel shall not be remembered any more!"
- 6 For they take counsel together with one mind,
Against Thee they make a covenant:
- 7 The tents of Edom and of the Ishmaelites,
Moab and the Hagarenes;
- 8 Gebâl and Ammon and Amalek,
Philistia, with the inhabitants of Tyre;
- 9 Also Asshur hath joined itself to them,
They lend their arm to the sons of Lot. (Sela.)
- 10 Do unto them as unto Midian,
As unto Sisera, as unto Jabin at the brook Kishon!
- 11 They were destroyed at Endor,
They became as dung for the land;
- 12 Make them, their nobles, like Oreb and Zeëb,
And like Zebach and Zalmunna all their princes,
- 13 Who said:
"Let us take possession of the habitations of Elohim!"
- 14 My God, make them like the whirlwind,
As stubble before the wind!
- 15 As fire, burning a forest,
And as flame, singeing mountains:
- 16 Thus do Thou pursue them with Thy tempest,

- And with Thy hurricane overthrow them !
 17 Fill their face with shame,
 That they may seek Thy name, Jahve !
- 18 Let them be ashamed and overthrown for ever,
 And let them be confounded and perish ;
 19 And let them know that Thou, Thy Name, Jahve, Thou alone,
 Art the Most High over all the earth.

The close of this Psalm is in accord with the close of the preceding Psalm. It is the last of the twelve Psalms of Asaph of the Psalter. The poet supplicates help against the many nations which have allied themselves with the descendants of Lot, i.e. Moab and Ammon, to entirely root out Israel as a nation. Those who are fond of Maccabæan Psalms (Hitzig and Olshausen), after the precedent of van Til and von Bengel, find the circumstances of the time of the Psalm in 1 Macc. ch. v., and Grimm is also inclined to regard this as correct; and in point of fact the deadly hostility of the ἔθνη κυκλόθεν which we there see breaking forth on all sides,* as it were at a given signal, against the Jewish people, who have become again independent, and after the dedication of the Temple doubly self-conscious, is far better suited to explain the Psalm than the hostile efforts of Sanballat, Tobiah, and others to hinder the rebuilding of Jerusalem, in the time of Nehemiah (Vaihinger, Ewald, and Dillmann). There is, however, still another incident beside that recorded in 1 Macc. ch. v. to which the Psalm may be referred, viz. the confederation of the nations for the extinction of Judah in the time of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. ch. xx.), and, as it seems to us, with comparatively speaking less constraint. For the Psalm speaks of a real league, whilst in 1 Macc. ch. v. the several nations made the attack without being allied and not jointly; then, as the Psalm assumes in ver. 9, the sons of Lot, i.e. the Moabites and Ammonites, actually were at the head at that time, whilst in * Concerning the στοὶ Βαϊζάν (Beni Baijân), 1 Macc. v. 4, the difficulty respecting which is to the present time unsolved, vid. Wetzstein's Excursus II., at the end of this volume.

1 Macc. ch. v. the sons of Esau occupy the most prominent place; and thirdly, at that time, in the time of Jehoshaphat, as is recorded, an Asaphite, viz. Jahaziël, did actually interpose in the course of events, a circumstance which coincides remarkably with the לְאֶסָף. The league of that period consisted, according to 2 Chron. xx. 1, of Moabites, Ammonites, and a part of the מְעִינִים (as it is to be read after the LXX.). But ver. 2 (where without any doubt מֵאֶרֶם is to be read instead of מֵאֶרֶם) adds the Edomites to their number, for it is expressly stated further on (vers. 10, 22, 23) that the inhabitants of Mount Seïr were with them. Also, supposing of course that the "Ishmaelites" and "Hagarenes" of the Psalm may be regarded as an unfolding of the מְעִינִים, which is confirmed by Josephus, Antiq. ix. 1. 2; and that Gebâl is to be understood by the Mount Seïr of the chronicler, which is confirmed by the جَبَال still in use at the present day, there always remains a difficulty in the fact that the Psalm also names Amalek, Philistia, Tyre, and Asshur, of which we find no mention there in the reign of Jehoshaphat. But these difficulties are counter-balanced by others that beset the reference to 1 Macc. ch. v., viz. that in the time of the Seleucidæ the Amalekites no longer existed, and consequently, as might be expected, are not mentioned at all in 1 Macc. ch. v.; further, that there the Moabites, too, are no longer spoken of, although some formerly Moabitish cities of Gileaditis are mentioned; and thirdly, that אֲשׁוּר = Syria (a certainly possible usage of the word) appears in a subordinate position, whereas it was, however, the dominant power. On the other hand, the mention of Amalek is intelligible in connection with the reference to 2 Chron. ה. xx., and the absence of its express mention in the chronicler does not make itself particularly felt in consideration of Gen. xxxvi. 12. Philistia, Tyre, and Asshur, however, stand at the end in the Psalm, and might also even be mentioned with the others if they rendered aid to the confederates of the south-east without taking part with them in the campaign, as being a succour to the actual leaders of the enterprise, the sons of Lot. We therefore agree with the reference of Ps. lxxxiii. (as also of Ps. xlviii.) to the alliance of the neighbouring nations against Judah in the reign of Jehoshaphat, which has been already recognised by Kimchi and allowed by Kail, Hengstenberg, and Movers.

Vers. 2-5. The poet prays, may God not remain an inactive looker-on in connection with the danger of destruction that threatens His people.  $\text{הָרַמִּי}$  (with which  $\text{יְהִי}$  is to be supplied) is the opposite of alertness;  $\text{הָרַשׁ}$  the opposite of speaking (in connection with which it is assumed that God's word is at the same time deed);  $\text{שָׁקַט}$  the opposite of being agitated and activity. The energetic future jehemajûn gives outward emphasis to the confirmation of the petition, and the fact that Israel's foes are the foes of God gives inward emphasis to it. On  $\text{נִשְׂאָה רֹאשׁ}$ , cf. cx. 7.  $\text{סוֹד}$  is here a secret agreement; and  $\text{יַעֲרִימוּ}$ , elsewhere to deal craftily, here signifies to craftily plot, devise, bring a thing about.  $\text{יִבְנֶינִי}$  is to be understood according to xxvii. 5, xxxi. 21. The Hithpa.  $\text{הִתְיַעַן}$  alternates here with the more ancient Niph. (ver. 6). The design of the enemies in this instance has reference to the total extirpation of Israel, of the separatist-people who exclude themselves from the life of the world and condemn it.  $\text{כְּגוֹי}$ , from being a people = so that it may no longer be a people or nation, as in Isa. vii. 8, xvii. 1, xxv. 2, Jer. xlvi. 42. In the borrowed passage, Jer. xlvi. 2, by an interchange of a letter it is  $\text{נִכְרִיתָנָה}$ . This Asaph Psalm is to be discerned in not a few passages of the prophets; cf. Isa. lxii. 6 sq. with ver. 2, Isa. xvii. 12 with ver. 3.

Vers. 6-9. Instead of  $\text{לֵב אֶחָד}$ , 1 Chron. xii. 38, it is deliberant corde unâ, inasmuch as  $\text{יְחָדוּ}$  on the one hand gives intensity to the reciprocal signification of the verb, and on the other lends the adjectival notion to  $\text{לֵב}$ . Of the confederate peoples the chronicler (2 Chron. ch. xx.) mentions the Moabites, the Ammonites, the inhabitants of Mount Seir, and the Me'unim, instead of which Josephus, Antiq. ix. 1. 2, says: a great body of Arabians. This crowd of peoples comes from the other side of the Dead Sea,  $\text{מֵאֲרָם}$  (as it is to be read in ver. 2 in the chronicler instead of  $\text{מֵאֲרָם}$ , cf. on lx. 2); the territory of Edom, which is mentioned first by the poet, was therefore the rendezvous. The tents of Edom and of the Ishmaelites are (cf.  $\text{أهل}$ , people) the people themselves who live in tents. Moreover, too, the poet ranges the hostile nations according to their geographical position. The seven first-named from Edom to Amalek, which still existed at the time of the psalmist (for the final destruction of the Amalekites by the Simeonites, 1 Chron. iv. 42 sq., falls at an indeterminate period prior to the Exile), are those out of the regions east and south-east of the Dead Sea. According to Gen. xxv. 18, the Ishmaelites had spread from Higâz through the peninsula of Sinai beyond the eastern and southern deserts as far up as the countries under the dominion of Assyria. The Hagarenes dwelt in tents from the Persian Gulf as far as the east of Gilead (1 Chron. v. 10) towards the Euphrates. גַּבְלֵי, جبال, is the name of the people inhabiting the mountains situated in the south of the Dead Sea, that is to say, the northern Seïritish mountains. Both Gebâl and also, as it appears, the Amalek intended here according to Gen. xxxvi. 12 (cf. Josephus, Antiq. ii. 1. 2: 'Αμαληκίτις, a part of Idumæa), belong to the wide circuit of Edom. Then follow the Philistines and Phœnicians, the two nations of the coast of the Mediterranean, which also appear in Amos ch. i. (cf. Joel ch. iv. [iii.]) as making common cause with the Edomites against Israel. Finally Asshur, the nation of the distant north-east, here not as yet appearing as a principal power, but strengthening (vid. concerning זְרֹעַ, an arm = assistance, succour, Gesenius, Thesaurus, p. 433b) the sons of Lot, i.e. the Moabites and Ammonites, with whom the enterprise started, and forming a powerful reserve for them. The music bursts forth angrily at the close of this enumeration, and imprecations discharge themselves in the following strophe.

Vers. 10-13. With בְּכִתְיֹן reference is made to Gideon's victory over the Midianites, which belongs to the most glorious recollections of Israel, and to which in other instances, too, national hopes are attached, Isa. ix. 3 [4], x. 26, cf. Hab. iii. 7; and with the asyndeton בְּסִיָּרָא (בְּסִיָּרָא, as Norzi states, who does not rightly understand the placing of the Metheg) to the victory of Barak and Deborah over Sisera and the Canaanitish king Jabin, whose general he was. The Beth of בְּנַחַל is like the Beth of בְּרִקְקֵי in ex. 7: according to Judg. v. 21 the Kishon carried away the corpses of the slain army. 'Endôr, near Tabor, and therefore situated not far distant from Taanach and Megiddo (Judg. v. 19), belonged to the battle-field. אֶרְצָהּ, starting from the radical notion of that which flatly covers anything, which lies in רָם, signifying the covering of earth lying flat over the globe, therefore humus (like אֶרֶץ, terra, and תְּבֵל, tellus), is here (cf. 2 Kings ix. 37) in accord with דָּמָן (from דָּמַן), which is in substance akin to it. In ver. 12 we have a retrospective glance at Gideon's victory. 'Oreb and Zeëb were שָׂרִים of the Midianites, Judg. vii. 25; Zebach and Tsalmunna', their kings, Judg. viii. 5 sqq.* The pronoun precedes the word itself in שִׁיתָמוּ, as in Ex. ii. 6; the heaped-up suffixes ēmo (émo) give to the imprecation a rhythm and sound as of rolling thunder. Concerning נָסִיף, vid. on ii. 6. So far as the matter is concerned, 2 Chron. xx. 11 harmonizes with ver. 13. Canaan, the land which is God's and which He has given to His people, is called נְאוֹת אֱלֹהִים (cf. lxxiv. 20).

Vers. 14-17. With the אֶלְהֵי, which constrains God in faith, the "thundering down" begins afresh. גִּלְגֵּל signifies a wheel and a whirling motion, such as usually arises when the wind changes suddenly, then also whatever is driven about in the whirling, Isa. xvii. 13. † קֵשׁ (from קִישׁ, aridum esse) is the dry corn-stalks, whether as left standing or, as in this instance, as straw upon the threshing-floor or upon the field. Like a fire that spreads rapidly, laying hold of everything, which burns up the forest and singes off the wooded mountain so that only a bare cone is left standing, so is God to drive them before Him in the raging tempest of His wrath and take them unawares. The figure in ver. 15 is fully worked up by * The Syriac Hexapla has (Hos. x. 14) צַלְמוֹנַע instead of שַׁלְמוֹנַע, a substitution which is accepted by Geiger, Deutsch. Morgenländ. Zeitschr. 1862, S. 729 f. Concerning the signification of the above names of Midianitish princes, vid. Nöldeke, Ueber die Amalekiter, S. 9.

† Saadia, who renders the גִּלְגֵּל in lxxvii. 19 as an astronomical expression with كَالْغُرَابِلةِ, the sphere of the heavens, here has professedly كَالْغُرَابِلةِ, which would be a plural form expanded out of غُرَابِيل, "sieves" or "tam-bourines;" it is, however, to be read, as in Isa. xvii. 13, Codex Oxon., كَالْغُرَابِالَةِ. The verb غَرَبَلَ, "to sift," is transferred to the wind, e.g. in Mutanabbi (edited with Wahidi's commentary by Dieterici), p. 29, l. 5 and 6: "it is

Isaiah, ch. x. 16–19; לָהֵט as in Deut. xxxii. 22. In the apodosis, ver. 16, the figure is changed into a kindred one: wrath is a glowing heat (חַרֹּן) and a breath (נִשְׁמָה, Isa. xxx. 33) at the same time. In ver. 17*b* it becomes clear what is the final purpose towards which this language of cursing tends: to the end that all, whether willingly or reluctantly, may give the glory to the God of revelation. Directed towards this end the earnest prayer is repeated once more in the tetrastichic closing strain.

Vers. 18, 19. The aim of the wish is that they in the midst of their downfall may lay hold upon the mercy of Jahve as their only deliverance: first they must come to nought, and only by giving Jahve the glory will they not be utterly destroyed. Side by side with אֲתָהּ, ver. 19*a*, is placed שְׁמִי as a second subject (cf. xlv. 3, lxix. 11). In view of ver. 17*b* וַיִּרְעֵי (as in lix. 14) has not merely the sense of perceiving so far as the justice of the punishment is concerned; the knowledge which is unto salvation is not excluded. The end of the matter which the poet wishes to see brought about is this, that Jahve, that the God of revelation (שֵׁמֶךְ), may become the All-exalted One in the consciousness of the nations.

as though the dust of this region, when the winds chase one another therein, were sifted," <sup>مغربل</sup> (i.e. caught up and whirled round); and with other notional and constructional applications in Makkarî, i. p. 102, l. 18: "it is as though its soil had been cleansed from dust by sifting," <sup>غربلت</sup>

(i.e. the dust thereof swept away by a whirlwind). Accordingly <sup>غربالة</sup> signifies first, as a nom. vicis, a whirling about (of dust by the wind), then in a concrete sense a whirlwind, as Saadia uses it, inasmuch as he makes use of it twice for <sup>مغربل</sup>. So Fleischer in opposition to Ewald, who renders "like the sweepings or rubbish."

EXCURSUS BY J. G. WETZSTEIN.

I.—THE SYMBOLICAL MEANING OF THE WASH-POT AND OF THE SHOE.

On Ps. lx. 10 (pp. 199 sq.).

THE most natural interpretation of the words Moab is my wash-pot, and upon Edom I cast my shoe, seems to me, according to the conception in Syria at the present day, to be: Moab is the vessel in which I wash my face and hands clean, i.e. the country and people in which I acquire to myself (by its conquest) splendour and renown, and Edom I degrade to the place whither I throw my cast-off shoes,* i.e. I cause Edom to endure the most humiliating treatment, that of a helot. The idea is still the same, if the poet conceived of Edom as a person at whom he casts his shoe as an insult. It is surely not to be doubted that these first two members of the verse—according to the apprehension of the whole Psalm—refer to a conquest of the two nations either as already completed or as near at hand, since the third member of the verse, having reference to the Philistines, speaks with certainty of such a conquest; החרעעי

* In the old Arabic نَعَلٌ is both singular and collective; and so, too, it will be in Hebrew, and the occurrence of the dual is not opposed to this. The modern language still has the nomen unitatis نَعْلَانِ, but the Beduins are very glad to avoid both words on account of their accord with لُعْنَةٌ, “a curse,” a terrible word to them; still they use the former when they intend the latter, and say ‘alêh en-na’la, “the shoe upon him!” (or the horse-shoe, for na’al also has this meaning) in the sense of “the curse upon him!” Upon this, too, is based the proverb: el-weled el-charâ jegîb li-ak’lûh en-na’la, “the dirty child brings to his [family] the shoe,” i.e. a bad child brings a curse upon his [family] (cf. Tantawi’s Traité, p. 119). The word na’al is still found now-a-days, but almost exclusively among the nomads and the karâvîna (the inhabitants of the villages of the desert). The shoe together with the latches or thongs is cut out of the raw hide of a slaughmay be understood of a battle-cry (when the fight is at hand) or a cry for vengeance (after the conquest).

The pregnant language of poetry is satisfied with the mention of the wash-pot in order to bring before the mind the figure so familiar to the Semite of "washing one's self white," i.e. to acquire a reputation. In the Arabian poets the metaphor not unfrequently is "to wash one's self white in the blood of the enemies" (بَيِّضَ وَجْهَهُ بِدَمِ الْعَدَا). In the language of common life بَيَاضُ الْوَجْهِ (candor faciei) is a broad notion, for everything good and beautiful that a man does or receives makes his face white (يَبْيِضُ وَجْهَهُ). Now, since the one or the other is often taking place, one also very frequently hears the expression made use of. We see from Isa. i. 16-18, Job ix. 30, and Prov. xxx. 12, that among the Hebrews too the figurative phrase of washing one's self white had a far more extended application than it might seem according to Ps. li. 9; and a conquest of the Moabites must have furnished an Israelitish king with the بَيَاضُ الْوَجْهِ before his people. The opposite is the سُوَادُ الْوَجْهِ (nigror faciei), which is brought about by everything bad and ugly that one does or suffers. Since the denying of a request, unsuccessful mediation between disputants, the non-acceptance of a present, and the not returning of a greeting blackens the face (يَسْوَدُ وَجْهَهُ) of the petitioner, of the tered or fallen camel, and while moist fitted on to the foot, in order that in drying it may receive the shape of the foot. The Syrian peasantry in the present day wear the red or yellow gezma a handbreadth high, a kind of boot; and the poorer inhabitants of the towns the red surmeia reaching to the ankle, a real shoe; whilst the more prosperous wear a yellow under-shoe (kalshîn) and a red over-shoe (bâbûga, collective bâbûg and bawâbig). These four foreign words lead one to infer that the thing itself is of foreign origin; yet the simple surmeia, which is also called merkûb (مِرْكُوب), is very old in the cities of Syria and of Palestine. According to Amos ii. 6, viii. 6, it is scarcely to be doubted that the real leathern shoe was also understood among the Hebrews by the word נַעֲלָא.

mediator, of the giver, and of him who greets, it comes to pass that in a Syrian town one almost daily meets with the expression, as with the “blackened” individual himself; cf. Burckhardt, Arabic Proverbs, pp. 48 sq.; Freytag, Prov. Arab. iii. p. 239 (No. 1435 and No. 1436),* and p. 534.

As to the second member of the verse, the shoe, as being the commonest part of one's clothing, is the figure of vileness and despicableness; and one would no more think of mentioning the shoe than the indecent word charâ, “dung,” without saving one's self in the presence of the hearer by the addition of the words agellak Allâh, “may God glorify thee!” The proverb adhall min en-nâ<sup>â</sup>l, “more common than the shoe,” is found in Freytag, Prov. Arab. i. 514; the same in meaning with this is adhall min el-ḥidhâ, ibid. p. 516. On the first Meidânî quotes two verses of poetry. The one runs thus: “The cheek of the Kulêbites more easily undergoes the disgracing touch than the shoe” (which the feet tread in the dirt); the other is: “Accustomed to many years' disgrace, they accommodate themselves more easily to the footsteps than does the shoe.” Here belongs, too, jâ habbadhâ el-muntâlimûna kiâmâ (in Freytag, iii. 513)—“Oh what a nice thing it is to draw on one's shoes standing!” i.e. to associate with the common people without making one's self common.† If it is a disgrace to be compared to the shoe, it is a still greater disgrace to be struck with one. Being warned of the presence of a foe, the Arab, in order to express the greatest possible contempt of this foe, cries: bâbûgî 'alâ ra'suh,‡ “my shoe upon his head,” i.e. it only requires a few blows with my shoe to be rid of him. A discharged bad servant sends to ask his master to take him on again, and the master answers the intermediary: jegî wa-jâ'chodh surmeiatî 'alâ kafâh, “he may come if he

* Freytag has here erroneously translated the word sawâd by opes. The proverb is: misfortune upon misfortune makes the heart blind, i.e. breaks the spirit and energy. In Damascus they say الطفر يعمى القلب, “poverty makes the heart blind.”

† The anecdote given on this proverb by Meidânî is one of those bad jokes such as the Arabs have on a great many of their proverbs.

‡ Instead of bâbûgî they also say surmeiatî, and in the country always gezmatî. This swaggering phrase is very frequent among the common people; I have, however, never seen it put into practice.

wishes to have my shoe upon his head," i.e. I would drive him away again in the most disgraceful manner. The Khaliph Mutewekkil sent to the Imâm Aḥmed (Ibn Ḥanbal) to ask him to pray for one of the maidens of his palace who had epilepsy: the imâm took off his shoe (na'âl), gave it to the messenger, and said: Go, place it at the bed-head of the maiden and say, "Aḥmed sends to ask whether thou wilt depart from the maiden or have seventy counted out with this shoe?" The messenger did as he was told, and the evil spirit (el-mârid) answered through the mouth of the maiden: "I obey! If Aḥmed had commanded me to leave the 'Irâk, I would do it." And he came out of her and fled, and the maiden was made whole, etc. (MSS. in the Royal Library in Berlin, Section Wetzstein, ii. No. 355, folio 113a). In Damascus they say of a cunning, wicked man, proverbially: ḍarab esh-Shêtân alf bâbûga, "he struck Satan a thousand times with his shoe," i.e. Satan was his disciple, but was such a bungler in comparison with his master that he treated him in the most contemptible manner, and sought to discipline him by means of the vilest kind of punishment. Another Damascene proverb runs: el-gehennam bèn el-bawâbig, "Hell is among the shoes." The reception-room of houses in the city is divided into two parts; the very much larger part is furnished with carpets and divans, and here the guests sit; the lesser part, called 'ataba, is from one to three steps lower, and here the attendants, slaves, and all contemptible people who do not dare to go up higher, stand. Here, too, stand the over-shoes of those who sit in the upper part. The proverb therefore signifies, that the feeling of being unhonoured and condemned, of being obliged to stand in the place where the others set their shoes, resembles the pains of hell.* This proverb seems to me to illustrate the first of the two interpretations of Ps. lx. 10b indicated above as possible; whilst in support of the second we may call to mind that enactment of El-Hâkim bi'amr-Allah, according to which in Syria and Egypt the Christians were compelled to hang wooden crosses and the Jews wooden shoes about their necks, which they were not allowed to take off even in the bath. That this was designed solely as a mark of disgrace, is clear from the further points of that enactment, viz. that both parties were allowed to wear only black turbans; not to ride upon horses, but only upon donkeys without saddle-cloths; not to have any Moslem servants, etc. (MSS. in the Royal Library in Berlin, Section Wetzstein, ii. No. 351, fol. 167r).

* As is well known, the Arabs are not so sensitive to anything as they are to outward distinctions; and the words of the poet Abû Farrâs: lanâ eṣ-ṣadr au el-ḡabr, "we desire the seat of honour or the grave," are uttered by every Arab from the very soul.

The supposition of many expositors, that the taking possession of Edom is to be understood by the casting of the shoe upon it, I hold to be incorrect. In his work on the Psalms (ii. 33) Hitzig observes in its favour: "The shoe may be regarded as the symbol of a thing that has a master, for one says of a divorced woman, 'she was my slipper, and I have cast her off' (Burckhardt, Notes on the Bedouins, 1831, p. 113); to take it off may therefore mean to give up a property, according to Deut. xxv. 9, Ruth iv. 7 sq., and to cast it upon or at something may mean to take possession of it." Here I must first show that the quotation from Burckhardt is a phrase of which variations are to be met with. The figure of the shoe as symbolizing rejection is used only by the common people, and only by these when any one is aroused by offensive reproaches, or when filled with hatred against the divorced or her family. The dweller in Haurân in this case says in opposition to the reproach: thôbî wa-shalahtuh, "it was my shirt, and I have taken it off." A father or a brother who (and this is a custom of the country) has slain his daughter or sister that has, as a virgin, been seduced, turns aside the reproaches of strangers with the standing phrase: isbâ'î wa-kata'tuh, "it was my own finger, and I have cut it off," or: isbâ'î wa-'âb, kata'tuh, "it was my own finger, and it became unsound, so I cut it off," i.e. it was my own flesh and blood, not that of a stranger, what right have you therefore to call me to account? But the two Scripture passages only favour that interpretation in a very slight degree. In Deut. xxv. 9, where the despised widow takes off the shoe of her brother-in-law and spits into his face, she means simply to disgrace him. If the right of determining for one's self were transferred to her together with the shoe, then the act of taking off the shoe ought not to have been performed by her, but by him, since she cannot herself take this right upon herself. And when the man was called “barefoot” from this time forth, this epithet would no longer be a stigma upon him, which it is evidently intended to be, but would signify nothing more than “the possessionless one,” which would have no meaning. The taking off of the shoe is, however, here designed to say: As thou despisest thy deceased brother and his widow, so shalt thou be like those despised and destitute ones who have not the meanest article of clothing, the shoe, and who are obliged to walk barefooted upon the sharp and hot stones, and in snow, in rain, and in dirt.

Ruth iv. 7, 8 is very different from this passage. Here one man delivers his shoe to another man certainly as the sign of the transfer of a right, yet without the unclean shoe as such being in general the symbol of ownership or property. For this no authenticated evidence is to be found. It is rather that his handing over the shoe is only the visible sign of the act of delivering up and taking possession (of the teslām and tesellum), by means of which a sale, exchange, renunciation, or presentation becomes an established fact (לְקַיֵּם כְּלֵי-דָבָר). If an article of clothing be chosen for this purpose, because thereby one would seemingly part with an actual possession, then it might also be some other article. If, however, we may argue from the simple clothing of the inhabitants of Haurân at the present day, and of the whole of the country east of the Jordan, concerning the clothing of the ancient Scripture times, then there would frequently, especially in the country, only be the mantle besides the shoe at one’s disposal; and even this a person would not always have with him in the hot season. This is apart from the consideration that the choice of the shoe was favoured by its meanness, which would say that one lightly parted with the object given up, and gave it heartily to the other.

II.—CONCERNING THE viò Baïáv IN I MACC. V. 4.

On Ps. lxxxiii. (p. 406, note).

THE viò Baïáv were a small tribe, by name בְּנֵי בַּיָּא. In the Arabian genealogies the word <sup>بَيَان</sup>بَيَان not unfrequently occurs, as a name of men; even the Kāmūs under بين has an أبو على بن بيان. Its appellative signification is that of the proper names فَارُوق and فَيْصَل, viz. discernens seu ratione seu gladio.

With respect to the abode of the Benî Baijân, from the fact that Judas found it to be the best opportunity of inflicting upon them the appointed chastisement for highway robberies when he had surprised and smitten the Edomites in the valley of the 'Araba, it may be inferred that they took up their abode in the neighbourhood of much-frequented highroads in the valley of the 'Araba. An important junction of the roads of that district is the Ghamr-well (الغمر),* which has an abundant supply of water, and is frequently mentioned in the annals of Islam. It is situated on the western side of the 'Araba, distant two caravan marches north of Aila, and the same distance from the ruins of Şoghar in the south-west of the Dead Sea. For here the main road leading from Aila to Hebron and Jerusalem intersects the road which led from Egypt to Petra and farther east. The caravans going from Aila to Ghazza certainly did not touch at Ghamr, since, as at the present day, they used to take the more westerly direction farther south, but they were always obliged to halt at the drinking-places of the Wādî el-Lahjâna, which lie scarcely ten hours south-west of Ghamr. They therefore likewise remained within the range of the robbers, if these inhabited the mountains which lie between Ghamr and that wâdî. This mountain range is, however, called Gebel el-Baijâna (جبل البَيَّانَة), which is synonymous with Gebel Benî Baijân; for ever since the Arabic language has given up the use of the plural in ûn and în for gentile nouns, البَيَّانِيّ, "the Baijânite," takes the form البَيَّانَة, "the Baijânites."† Burckhardt (Travels in Syria and the Holy Land, London 1822, 4to, p. 444), setting out * Usually called Ghamr el-'Arabât in distinction from another watering-place and highroad-station of the same name between Mâ ân and Têmâ.

† For the most part, as one will be aware, the gentile noun is fond of the broken plural, e.g. الجوابرة (from the singular جَابِرِيّ), "the Benî from 'Ain es-Sâlika at the northern end of Gebel Sherâh towards Egypt, crossed the 'Araba south of Ghamr. His language in reference to the matter in hand is as follows: "We were one hour and a half in crossing the Araba, direction W. by N. In some places the sand is very deep, but it is firm, and the camels walk over it without sinking. . . . There is not the slightest appearance of a road or of any other work of human art in this part of the valley. On the other side we ascended the western chain of mountains. The mountain opposite to us appeared to be the highest point of the whole Gâbir" (Burckhardt, Travels in Syria, p. 405); الصوالحة (from the singular صالحى), "the Benî Sâlih" (ibid. p. 489); compare besides, المقدسة, العنابكة, البوانة, the inhabitants of Jerusalem, of Beirût, of Antioch. By analogy one would expect to meet with a plural البيانة from البيانى; but such a plural is not possible on phonetic grounds, and therefore, too, the بني سيال (a tribe in the Trachonitis) is called only السیالة, and not السیالة. Also from a plural بيانة one could not with certainty infer a singular بيانى, since the ن of the final syllable in the pluralis fractus of gentilia is very frequently a servile letter, e.g. in الليانة (from the singular الليتى), the Benî Leith (Burckhardt, Syria, p. 420), الغوارنة (from the singular الغورى), "the dwellers in the Ghor" (Burckhardt, ibid. p. 391); cf. besides, الكمصنة and الصوارنة (from the singular الحمصى and الصورى), "the inhabitants of Emesa and Tyre." Since the form فعالة is become a very favourite collective of فعال (cf. hassâda, the mowers; reggâda, the reapers; derrâsa, the threshers; keijâla, the measurers of the corn; tarrâba, the tillers of the ground; lebbâna, the brickmakers, etc.), it is natural simply to foist the name of ancestor of the tribe Baijân on the collective Baijâna as the singular. This supposition is, however, unnecessary, since in connection with other word-formations too the ي of the nisba disappears in the collective; cf. العنزة, الكسنة, السبعة, الفرجة, all of which are names of nomadic tribes, the singulars of which are فرياجى, سبيعى, حسيني, عديزى.

chain, as far as I could see N. and S.; it is called Djebel Beyane (جبل بيانه); the height of this chain, however, is not half that of the eastern mountains. It is intersected by numerous broad Wadys in which the Talh tree grows; the rock is entirely silicious, of the same species as that of the desert which extends from hence to Suez. . . . After an hour and a half of gentle ascent we arrived at the summit of the hills. . . .” The article is wanting before Beyâne in Burckhardt; perhaps the name given to the mountain to him by some of his attendants was G. Beyân, “mountain of the (Benî) Baijân,” and by others G. el-Beyâne, “mountain of the Baijânites,” so that he regarded the absence of the article in the one and the form of the other as the more correct. One of those “broad wadys,”—perhaps the one on which was situated the fortress destroyed by Judas,—is called, according to Robinson (Biblical Researches in Palestine, 2d edition, i. 182, 1st ed. i. 269, etc.), the “Wadi of the Baijânites” [el-Beyâneh] (وادي البيانة). Here also belongs a statement in the Geographical Lexicon of Abû Obeid el-Bekrî (died 487 of the Hîgra), which Juynboll unfortunately gives incompletely in his edition of كتاب المراد (vol. iv. p. 416), as follows: بيان بالفتح والتشديد موضع مجاور للغمر المنح: “Baijân with double a and a doubled Jod is a locality in the neighbourhood of Ghamr, etc.” Probably in the original text used by Bekrî it stood خربة بيان or جبل بيان (the ruins of Baijân, or the mountain of Baijân). Bekrî, however, imagining that in بيان he had the proper name not of a people but of a locality, substituted for the خربة or جبل standing before it the word موضع, which had at one time become stereotyped, and by which those compilers described everything when possible.

PROFESSOR GODET'S WORKS.

In Three Volumes, 8vo, price 31s. 6d.,

A COMMENTARY ON THE GOSPEL OF ST. JOHN.

By F. GODET, D.D.,

PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY, NEUCHÂTEL.

'This work forms one of the battle-fields of modern inquiry, and is itself so rich in spiritual truth that it is impossible to examine it too closely; and we welcome this treatise from the pen of Dr. Godet. We have no more competent exegete, and this new volume shows all the learning and vivacity for which the Author is distinguished.'—Freeman.

In Two Volumes, 8vo, price 21s.,

THE GOSPEL OF ST. LUKE.

Translated from the Second French Edition.

'Marked by clearness and good sense, it will be found to possess value and interest as one of the most recent and copious works specially designed to illustrate this Gospel.'—Guardian.

In Two Volumes, 8vo, price 21s.,

ST. PAUL'S EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.

'We have looked through it with great care, and have been charmed not less by the clearness and fervour of its evangelical principles than by the carefulness of its exegesis, its fine touches of spiritual intuition, and its appositeness of historical illustration.'—Baptist Magazine.

In crown 8vo, Second Edition, price 6s.,

DEFENCE OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITH.

TRANSLATED BY THE

HON. AND REV. CANON LYTTTELTON, M.A.,

RECTOR OF HAGLEY.

'This volume is not unworthy of the great reputation which Professor Godet enjoys. It shows the same breadth of reading and extent of learning as his previous works, and the same power of eloquent utterance.'—Church Bells.

'Professor Godet is at once so devoutly evangelical in his spirit, and so profoundly intelligent in his apprehension of truth, that we shall all welcome these contributions to the study of much-debated subjects with the utmost satisfaction.'—Christian World.

In demy 8vo, Fourth Edition, price 10s. 6d.,

MODERN DOUBT AND CHRISTIAN BELIEF.

A Series of Apologetic Lectures addressed to Earnest Seekers after Truth.

By THEODORE CHRISTLIEB, D.D.,

UNIVERSITY PREACHER AND PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY AT BONN.

Translated, with the Author's sanction, chiefly by the Rev. H. U. WEITBRECHT, Ph.D., and Edited by the Rev. T. L. KINGSBURY, M.A.

'We recommend the volume as one of the most valuable and important among recent contributions to our apologetic literature. . . . We are heartily thankful both to the learned Author and to his translators.'—Guardian.

'We express our unfeigned admiration of the ability displayed in this work, and of the spirit of deep piety which pervades it; and whilst we commend it to the careful perusal of our readers, we heartily rejoice that in these days of reproach and blasphemy so able a champion has come forward to contend earnestly for the faith which was once delivered to the saints.'—Christian Observer.

DR. LUTHARDT'S WORKS.

In Three handsome crown 8vo Volumes, price 6s. each.

'We do not know any volumes so suitable in these times for young men entering on life, or, let us say, even for the library of a pastor called to deal with such, than the three volumes of this series. We commend the whole of them with the utmost cordial satisfaction. They are altogether quite a specialty in our literature.'—Weekly Review.

APOLOGETIC LECTURES ON THE FUNDAMENTAL TRUTHS OF CHRISTIANITY.

Sixth Edition.

By C. E. LUTHARDT, D.D., LEIPZIG.

'From Dr. Luthardt's exposition even the most learned theologians may derive invaluable criticism, and the most acute disputants supply themselves with more trenchant and polished weapons than they have as yet been possessed of.'—Bell's Weekly Messenger.

APOLOGETIC LECTURES ON THE SAVING TRUTHS OF CHRISTIANITY.

Fourth Edition.

'Dr. Luthardt is a profound scholar, but a very simple teacher, and expresses himself on the gravest matters with the utmost simplicity, clearness, and force.'—Literary World.

APOLOGETIC LECTURES ON THE MORAL TRUTHS OF CHRISTIANITY.

Third Edition.

'The ground covered by this work is, of course, of considerable extent, and there is scarcely any topic of specifically moral interest now under debate in which the reader will not find some suggestive saying. The volume contains, like its predecessors, a truly wealthy apparatus of notes and illustrations.'—English Churchman.

In Three Volumes, 8vo, price 31s. 6d.,

ST. JOHN'S GOSPEL DESCRIBED AND EXPLAINED ACCORDING TO ITS PECULIAR CHARACTER.

'Full to overflowing with a ripe theology and a critical science worthy of their great theme.'—Irish Ecclesiastical Gazette.

In demy 8vo, price 9s.,

ST. JOHN THE AUTHOR OF THE FOURTH GOSPEL.

By PROFESSOR C. E. LUTHARDT,
Author of 'Fundamental Truths of Christianity,' etc.

Translated and the Literature enlarged by C. R. GREGORY, Leipzig.

'A work of thoroughness and value. The translator has added a lengthy Appendix, containing a very complete account of the literature bearing on the controversy respecting this Gospel. The indices which close the volume are well ordered, and add greatly to its value.'—Guardian.

'There are few works in the later theological literature which contain such a wealth of sober theological knowledge and such an invulnerable phalanx of objective apologetical criticism.'—Professor Guericke.

Crown 8vo, 5s.,

LUTHARDT, KAHNIS, AND BRUCKNER.

The Church: Its Origin, its History, and its Present Position.

'A comprehensive review of this sort, done by able hands, is both instructive and suggestive.'—Record.
