The verb הִתְנַחֵץ forms the fut. יִתְנַחֵץ as well as יִתְנַחֵץ; first the latter from הִתְנַחֵץ, with the primary meaning, to bow, to bend down; then both forms as intransitive, to bend oneself to something, to be inclined to something, Arab. 't.f. (Fl.). תְּבוּנָה is here the intelligence which consists in the understanding of one's own deficiency, and of that which is necessary to meet it. The inclination of the fool goes not out after such intelligence, but (כִּי אֵם; according to Ben-Naphtali, כִּי אֵם) only that his heart, i.e. the understanding which he thinks that he already possesses, may reveal itself, show itself publicly. He thinks thereby to show himself in his true greatness, and to render a weighty service to the world. This loquacity of the fool, proceeding from self-satisfaction, without self-knowledge, has already, xii. 23, and often, been reprimanded.

The group beginning with ver. 3 terminates in two proverbs (vers. 6 and 7), related to the concluding verse of the foregoing:

Ver. 3 If a godless man cometh, then cometh also contempt;

And together with disgrace, shame.

J. D. Michaelis, and the most of modern critics, read הִשָּׁע; then, contempt etc., are to be thought of as the consequences that follow godlessness; for that הִשָּׁע means (Hitzig) disgracefulness, i.e. disgraceful conduct, is destitute of proof; הִשָּׁע always means disgrace as an experience. But not only does the Masoretic text punctuate הִשָּׁע, but also all the old translators, the Greek, Aramaic, and Latin, have done so. And is it on this account, because a coming naturally seems to be spoken of a person? The "pride cometh, then cometh shame," xi. 2, was in their recollection not less firmly, perhaps, than in ours. They read רָשָׁע, because בּוֹ does not fittingly designate the first of that which godlessness effects, but perhaps the first of that which proceeds from it. Therefore we adhere to the opinion, that the proverb names the fiends which appear in the company of the godless wherever he goes, viz. בּוֹ, contempt (Ps. xxxi. 19), which places itself haughtily above all due subordination, and reverence, and forbearance; and then, with the disgrace [turpitude], קָלֵן, which attaches itself to those who meddle with him (Isa. xxii. 18), there is united the shame, הַרְפָּה (Ps. xxxix. 9), which he has to suffer from him who has only always expected something better from him. Fleischer understands all the three words in the passive sense, and remarks, “עַם-קָלֵן חַרְפָּה, a more artificial expression for קָלֵן וְחַרְפָּה, in the Turkish quite common for the copula wāw, e.g. swylyh tbrāk, earth and water, wrylyh ar, the man and the woman.” But then the expression would be tautological; we understand בּוֹ and חַרְפָּה of that which the godless does to others by his words, and קָלֵן of that which he does to them by his conduct. By this interpretation, עַם is more than the representative of the copula.

Ver. 4 Deep waters are the words from a man's mouth,
A bubbling brook, a fountain of wisdom.

Earlier, we added to hominis the supplement sc. sapientis, but then an unnecessary word would be used, and that which is necessary omitted. Rather it might be said that אִישׁ is meant in an ideal sense; but thus meant, אִישׁ, like גִּבּוֹר, denotes the valiant man, but not man as he ought to be, or the man of honour; and besides, a man may be a man of honour without there being said of him what this proverb expresses. Ewald comes nearer the case when he translates, “deep waters are the heart-words of many.” Heart-words—what an unbiblical expression! The LXX., which translates λόγος ἐν καρδίᾳ, has not read רַבֵּי לֵב, but דַּבַּר בְּלֵב (as xx. 5, עֵצָה בְּלֵב). But that “of many” is certainly not a right translation, yet right in so far as אִישׁ (as at xii. 14) is thought of as made prominent: the proverb expresses, in accordance with the form of narrative proverbs which present an example, what occurs in actual life, and is observed. Three different things are said of the words from a man's mouth: they are deep waters, for their meaning does not lie on the surface, but can be perceived only by penetrating into the secret motives and aims of him who speaks; they are a bubbling brook, which freshly and powerfully gushes forth to him who feels this flow of words, for in this brook there never fails an always new gush of living water; it is a fountain or well of wisdom, from which wisdom flows forth, and whence wisdom is to be drawn. Hitzig supposes that the distich is antithetic; מַיִם עֲמֻקִּים, or rather מַיִם מְעֻמְקִים, "waters of the deep," are cistern waters; on the contrary, "a welling brook is a fountain of wisdom." But עֲמֻק means deep, not deepened, and deep water is the contrast of shallow water; a cistern also may be deep (cf. xxii. 14), but deep water is such as is deep, whether it be in the ocean or in a ditch. 4b also does not suggest a cistern, for thereby it would be indicated that the description, רַבְרִי פִי-אֵיֶשֶׁת, is not here continued; the "fountain of wisdom" does not form a proper parallel or an antithesis to this subject, since this much rather would require the placing in contrast of deep and shallow, of exhausted (drained out) and perennial. And: the fountain is a brook, the well a stream—who would thus express himself! We have thus neither an antithetic nor a synonymous (LXX. after the phrase ἀναπηδῶν, Jerome, Venet., Luth.), but an integral distich (vid. vol. i. p. 8) before us; and this leads us to consider what depths of thought, what riches of contents, what power of spiritual and moral advancement, may lie in the words of a man.

Ver. 5 To favour the person of the godless is not good,

And to oppress the righteous in judgment.

As ver. 4 has one subject, so ver. 5 has one predicate. The form is the same as xvii. 26. יְצַדִּיק אֶת פְּנֵי (cf. xxiv. 23), προσωποληψία, acceptio personæ, is this, that one accepts the פְּנֵי, i.e. the personal appearance of any one (πρόσωπον λαμβάνει), i.e. regards it as acceptable, respectable, agreeable, which is a thing in itself not wrong; but in a judge who ought to determine according to the facts of the case and the law, it becomes sinful partiality. הַצְדִּיק, in a forensic sense, with the accus. of the person, may be regarded in a twofold way: either as a turning aside, מְדַיֵּן, Isa. x. 2, from following and attaining unto the right, or as an oppressing, for the phrase הַצְדִּיק מְשַׁפֵּט [to pervert justice] (cf.

xvii. 23) is transferred to the person who experiences the oppression = perversion of the law; and this idea perhaps always underlies the expression, wherever, as e.g. Mal. iii. 5, no addition brings with it the other. Under xvii. 15 is a fuller explanation of לא־טוב.

Ver. 6 The lips of the fool engage in strife,

We may translate: the lips of the fool cause strife, for בוא ב, to come with anything, e.g. Ps. lxvi. 13, is equivalent to bring it (to bring forward), as also: they engage in strife; as one says בוא ברמים: to be engaged in bloodshed, 1 Sam. xxv. 26. We prefer this intrans (ingerunt se), with Schultens and Fleischer. תבאנה for יבאו, a synallage generis, to which, by means of a "self-deception of the language" (Fl.), the apparent masculine ending of such duals may have contributed. The stripes which the fool calleth for (קרא ל, like ii. 3) are such as he himself carries off, for it comes a verbis ad verbera. The LXX.: his bold mouth calleth for death (פיו ההמה מנת יקרא); למהלמות has, in codd. and old editions, the Mem raphatum, as also at xix. 29; the sing. is thus מנהלים, like מנעילי to מנעלים, for the Mem dagessatum is to be expected in the inflected מנהלים, by the passing over of the ō into ū.

Ver. 7 The mouth of the fool is to him destruction,
And his lips are a snare to his soul.

As ver. 6 corresponds to xvii. 27 of the foregoing group, so this ver. 7 corresponds to xvii. 28. Regarding ממתהילו, vid. xiii. 3. Instead of פיי בסיל, is to be written פייכסיל, according to Torath Emeth, p. 40, Cod. 1294, and old editions.

A pair of proverbs regarding the flatterer and the slothful:

Ver. 8 The words of the flatterer are as dainty morsels,
And they glide down into the innermost parts.

An "analogy, with an epexegetis in the second member" (Fl.), which is repeated in xxvi. 22. Ewald, Bertheau, Hitzig, and others, are constrained to interpret והם as introducing a contrast, and in this sense they give to מתלהמים all kinds of unwarrantable meanings. Ewald translates: as burning (להם, cogn. להב), and offers next: as whispering (להם, cogn. רעם, להם); Ch. B. Michaelis, Bertheau, and others: as sporting (להם, cogn. להה); Hitzig: like soft airs (להם, cogn. Arab. hillum, flaccus, laxus). All these interpretations are without support. The word לָהֵם has none of all these significations; it means, as the Arab. lahima warrants, deglutire. But Böttcher's explanation also: "as swallowed down, because spoken with reserve," proceeds, like those others, from the supposed syntactically fine yet false supposition, that 8b is an antithetic "dennoch" [tamen]. In that case the poet would have written וְהֵם יִרְדּוּ (cf. וְהוּא, as the beginning of a conditional clause, iii. 29, xxiii. 3). But וְהוּא, וְהֵם, with the finite following, introduces neither here nor at Deut. xxxiii. 3, Judg. xx. 34, Ps. xcv. 10, cf. Gen. xliii. 23, a conditional clause. Thus 8b continues the clause 8a by one standing on the same line; and thus we do not need to invent a meaning for כְּמַתְּלֵהִים, which forms a contrast to the penetrating into the innermost parts. The relation of the parts of the proverb is rightly given by Luther:

The words of the slanderer are stripes,
And they go through the heart of one.

He interprets לָהֵם as transposed from הֵלֵם (Rashi and others); but stripes cannot be called כְּמַתְּלֵהִים—they are called, 6b, מַתְּלָמוֹת. This interpretation of the word has always more support than that of Symmachus: ὡς ἀκέρατοι; Jerome: quasi simplicia; Aquila, xxvi. 22: γοητικοί; which last, as also that of Capellus, Clericus, and Schultens: quasi numine quodam afflata, seems to support itself on the Arab. âhm iv. inspirare. But in reality âhm does not mean afflare; it means deglutire, and nothing else. The Jewish lexicographers offer nothing worth considering; Kimchi's הֵלֵקִים, according to which the Venet. translates μαλθακιζόμενοι, is fanciful; for the Talm. הֵלֵם, striking = hitting, suitable, standing well, furnishes no transition to "smooth" and "soft." Immanuel compares âhm = בָּלַע; and Schultens, who is followed by Gesenius and others, has already, with perfect correctness, explained: tanquam quæ avidissime inglutiantur. Thus also Fleischer: things which offer themselves to be eagerly gulped down, or which let themselves be thus swallowed. But in this way can one be truly just to the Hithpa.? The Arab. âlthm (stronger form, âlthm, according to which van Dyk translates mthl ukam hlwt, like sweet morsels) means to swallow into oneself, which is not here approprivate. The Hithpa. will thus have here a passive signification : things which are greedily swallowed. Regarding  $\text{נִרְנָן}$  from  $\text{נִרְנָן}$ , vid. at xvi. 28.  $\text{וְהֵם}$  refers to the words of the flatterer, and is emphatic, equivalent to æque illa, etiam illa, or illa ipsa.  $\text{יָרַר}$  is here connected with the obj. accus. (cf. i. 12) instead of with  $\text{לֵא, vii. 27. חֲדָרֵי}$ , penetralia, we had already at vii. 27; the root-word is (Arab.) khdr, to seclude, to conceal, different from hdr, demittere, and hkh (cogn. חָזַר), to finish, circumire.  $\text{בִּצְטוֹן}$  is the inner part of the body with reference to the organs lying there, which mediate not only the life of the body, but also that of the mind,—in general, the internal part of the personality. The LXX. does not translate this proverb, but has in its stead xix. 15, in a different version, however, from that it gives there; the Syr. and the Targ. have thereby been drawn away from the Hebr. text.

Ver. 9 He also who showeth himself slothful in his business,
Is a brother to him who proceedeth to destroy.

The Hithpa.  $\text{הִתְרַפָּה}$  signifies here, as at xxiv. 10, to show oneself slack, lazy, negligent.  $\text{מְלָאכֶה}$  is properly a commission for another, as a king has a messenger, ambassador, commissioner to execute it; here, any business, whether an undertaking in commission from another, or a matter one engages in for himself. He who shows himself slack therein, produces in his way, viz. by negligence, destruction, as truly as the  $\text{בַּעַל מִשְׁחִית}$ , who does it directly by his conduct. Thus one is named, who is called, or who has his own delight in it, to destroy or overthrow. Jerome, incorrectly limiting: sua opera dissipantis. Hitzig well compares Matt. xii. 30. In the variation, xxviii. 24b, the destroyer is called  $\text{אִישׁ מִשְׁחִית}$ , the connection of the words being adject.; on the contrary, the connection of  $\text{בַּעַל מִשְׁחִית}$  is genit. (cf. xxii. 24, xxiii. 2, etc.), for  $\text{מִשְׁחִית}$  as frequently means that which destroys = destruction. Von Hofmann (Schriftbew. ii. 2, 403) understands 'אִישׁ מ' of the street robber, 'בַּעַל מ' of the captain of robbers; but the designation for the latter must be 'שָׂר מ', though at 1 Kings xi. 24 he is called by the name  $\text{שָׂר נְדָוִד}$ . The form of the word in the proverb here is more original than at xxviii. 24. There  $\text{חֲבֵיר}$  [companion] is used, here  $\text{אָח}$  [brother], a general Semitic name of him who, or of that which, is in any way related to another, cf. Job xxx. 29. Fleischer compares the Arab. proverb: âlshbht âkht alkhtyât, scepticism is the sister of sin.

Two proverbs, of the fortress of faith, and of the fortress of presumption:

Ver. 10 A strong tower is the name of Jahve:

The righteous runneth into it, and is high.

The name of Jahve is the Revelation of God, and the God of Revelation Himself, the creative and historical Revelation, and who is always continually revealing Himself; His name is His nature representing itself, and therefore capable of being described and named, before all the Tetragramm, as the Anagramm of the overruling and inworking historical being of God, as the Chiffre of His free and all-powerful government in grace and truth, as the self-naming of God the Saviour. This name, which is afterwards interwoven in the name Jesus, is מְגִד־עוֹ (Ps. lxi. 4), a strong high tower bidding defiance to every hostile assault. Into this the righteous runneth, to hide himself behind its walls, and is thus lifted (perf. consec.) high above all danger (cf. יִשְׁתָּבֵן, xxix. 25). לֵרִיבֵן means, Job xv. 26, to run against anything, רִיב, seq. acc., to invest, blockade anything, רָצַב, to hasten within; Hitzig's conjecture, יִרְוֵם [riseth up high], instead of יִרְוֵן, is a freak. רָצַב is speedily רָצַב, the idea the same as Ps. xxvii. 5, xxxi. 21.

Ver. 11 The possession of the righteous is his strong fort,

And is like a high wall in his imagination.

Line first = x. 15a. מִשְׁפָּיִת from שָׁפָה, Chald. סָפָה (whence after Megilla 14a, יִסְפָּה, she who looks), R. שָׁךְ, cogn. זָךְ, to pierce, to fix, means the image as a medal, and thus also intellectually: image (conception, and particularly the imagination) of the heart (Ps. lxxiii. 7), here the fancy, conceit; Fleischer compares (Arab.) tsuwwr, to imagine something to oneself, French se figurer. Translators from the LXX. to Luther incorrectly think on שָׁכַר (סָכַר), to entertain; only the Venet. is correct in the rendering: ἐν φαντασίᾳ αὐτοῦ; better than Kimchi, who, after Ezra viii. 12, thinks on the chamber where the riches delighted in are treasured, and where he fancies himself in the midst of his treasures as if surrounded by an inaccessible wall.

We place together vers. 12–19, in which the figure of a secure fortress returns:

Ver. 12. This proverb is connected with the preceding of the rich man who trusts in his mammon.

Before destruction the heart of man is haughty;
And humility goeth before honour.

Line first is a variation of xvi. 18*a*, and line second is similar to xv. 33*b*.

Ver. 13 If one giveth an answer before he heareth,
It is to him as folly and shame.

The part. stands here differently from what it does at xiii. 18, where it is subj., and at xvii. 14, where it is pred. of a simple sentence; it is also here, along with what appertains to it in accordance with the Semitic idiom, subj. to 13*b* (one who answers . . . is one to whom this . . .); but, in accordance with our idiom, it becomes a hypothetical antecedent (cf. vol. i. p. 282). For "to answer" one also uses הָשִׁיב without addition; but the original full expression is הָשִׁיב דְּבָר, reddere verbum, referre dictum (cf. עָנָה דְּבָר, Jer. xlv. 20, absol. in the cogn., xv. 28*a*); דָּבַר one may not understand of the word to which, but of the word with which, the reply is made. הָיָא לוֹ comprehends the meaning: it avails to him (ducitur ei), as well as it reaches to him (est ei). In Agricola's Fünfhundert Sprüchen this proverb is given thus: Wer antwortet ehe er höret, der zaiget an sein torhait vnd wirdt ze schanden [he who answers before he hears shows his folly, and it is to him a shame]. But that would require the word to be יָבוֹשׁ, pudescit; (הָיָא לוֹ) בְּלִמְוָה means that it becomes to him a ground of merited disgrace. "בְּלִמְוָה, properly wounding, i.e. shame (like atteinte à son honneur), from פָּלַם (cogn. הָלַם), to strike, hit, wound" (Fl.). Sirach (xi. 8) warns against such rash talking, as well as against the rudeness of interrupting others.

Ver. 14 The spirit of a man beareth his sickness;
But a broken spirit, who can bear it?

The breath of the Creator imparting life to man is spoken of as spiritus spirans, רוּחַ (רוּחַ הַיָּיִם), and as spiritus spiratus, נְפִשׁ (נִפְשׁ הַיָּהּ); the spirit (animus) is the primary, and the soul (anima) the secondary principle of life; the double gender of רוּחַ is accounted for thus: when it is thought of as the primary, and thus in a certain degree (vid. Psychol. p. 103 ff.) the manly principle, it is mas. (Gen. vi. 3; Ps. li. 12, etc.). Here the change of gender is in the highest degree characteristic, and  $\text{אִישׁ}$  also is intentionally used (cf. 1 Sam. xxvi. 15) instead of  $\text{אָרָם}$ , 16a: the courageous spirit of a man which sustains or endures ( $\text{בְּלִבָּל}$ , R.  $\text{בל}$ , comprehendere, prehendere; Luther, "who knows how to contain himself in his sufferings;" cf. Ps. li. 12, "may the free Spirit hold me") the sickness [Siechthum] (we understand here "siech" in the old meaning = sick) with self-control, is generis masculini; while, on the contrary, the  $\text{רוּחַ נְבִיאָה}$  (as xv. 13, xvii. 22), brought down from its manliness and superiority to disheartened passivity, is genere feminino (cf. Ps. li. 12 with ver. 19). Fleischer compares the Arab. proverb, thbât âlnfs bâlghdhâ thbât alrwih balghnâ, the soul has firmness by nourishment, the spirit by music.<sup>1</sup> The question  $\text{מִי יִשְׁאַנְנָהוּ}$  is like Mark ix. 50: if the salt becomes tasteless, wherewith shall one season it? There is no seasoning for the spice that has become insipid. And for the spirit which is destined to bear the life and fortune of the person, if it is cast down by sufferings, there is no one to lift it up and sustain it. But is not God the Most High the lifter up and the bearer of the human spirit that has been crushed and broken? The answer is, that the manly spirit, 14a, is represented as strong in God; the discouraged, 14b, as not drawing from God the strength and support he ought to do. But passages such as Isa. lxvi. 2 do not bring it near that we think of the  $\text{רוּחַ נְבִיאָה}$  as alienated from God. The spirit is  $\text{נִשְׁמָה}$ , the bearer of the personal and natural life with its functions, activities, and experiences. If the spirit is borne down to powerless and helpless passivity, then within the sphere of the human personality there is no other sustaining power that can supply its place.

Ver. 15 The heart of a man of understanding gaineth knowledge,
And the ear of the wise seeketh after knowledge.

$\text{נָבוֹן}$  may be also interpreted as an adj., but we translate it here as at xiv. 33, because thus it corresponds with the parallelism; cf.  $\text{לֵב צָדִיק}$ , xv. 28, and  $\text{לֵב הַקָּם}$ , xvi. 23, where the adjunct. interpretation is excluded. The gaining of wisdom is, after xvii. 16, referred to the heart: a heart vigorous in embracing and receiving it is above all necessary, and just such an one possesses the נבון, which knows how to value the worth and usefulness of such knowledge. The wise, who are already in possession of such knowledge, are yet at the same time constantly striving to increase this knowledge: their ear seeks knowledge, eagerly asking where it is to be found, and attentively listening when the opportunity is given of קצף, obtaining it.

Ver. 16 The gift of a man maketh room for him,
And bringeth him before the great.

That מתן may signify intellectual endowments, Hitzig supposes, but without any proof for such an opinion. Intellectual ability as the means of advancement is otherwise designated, xxii. 29. But Hitzig is right in this, that one mistakes the meaning of the proverb if he interprets מתן in the sense of שׂוּת (vid. at xvii. 8): מתן is an indifferent idea, and the proverb means that a man makes free space, a free path for himself, by a gift, i.e. by this, that he shows himself to be agreeable, pleasing where it avails, not niggardly but liberal. As a proverb expresses it:

Kommt man durchs ganze Land*

[with hat in hand one goes through the whole land], so it is said here that such liberality brings before the great, i.e. not: furnishes with introductions to them; but helps to a place of honour near the great, i.e. those in a lofty position (cf. לְפָנַי, xxii. 29; עַם, Ps. cxiii. 8). It is an important part of practical wisdom, that by right liberality, i.e. by liberal giving where duty demands it, and prudence commends it, one does not lose but gains, does not descend but rises; it helps a man over the difficulties of limited, narrow circumstances, gains for him affection, and helps him up from step to step. The א of מתן is, in a singular way (cf. מִתְּנֵה, מִתְּנֵה), treated as unchangeable.

Ver. 17 He that is first in his controversy is right;
But there cometh another and searcheth him thoroughly—

an exhortation to be cautious in a lawsuit, and not to justify without more ado him who first brings forward his cause, and supports it by reasons, since, if the second party afterwards search into the reasons of the first, they show themselves untenable. הָרֵאשׁוֹן בְּרִיבוֹ are to be taken together; the words are equivalent to אֲשֶׁר יבֹא בְרִיבוֹ בְּרֵאשׁוֹנָה: qui prior cum causa sua venit, i.e. eam ad judicem defert (Fl.). הָרֵאשׁוֹן may, however, also of itself alone be qui prior venit; and בְּרִיבוֹ will be taken with צָדִיק: justus qui prior venit in causa sua (esse videtur). The accentuation rightly leaves the relation undecided. Instead of יבֹא (יבֹא) the Keri has יָבֹא, as it elsewhere, at one time, changes the fut. into the perf. with ו (e.g. xx. 4, Jer. vi. 21); and, at another time, the perf. with ו into the fut. (e.g. Ps. x. 10, Isa. v. 29). But here, where the perf. consec. is not so admissible, as vi. 11, xx. 4, the fut. ought to remain unchanged. הָרֵעִהוּ is the other part, synon. with דִּין חִבְרוּ, Sanhedrin 7b, where the אזהרה לביהדין (admonition for the court of justice) is derived from Deut. i. 16, to hear the accused at the same time with the accuser, that nothing of the latter may be adopted beforehand. This proverb is just such an audiatur et altera pars. The status controversiæ is only brought fairly into the light by the hearing of the altera pars: then comes the other and examines him (the first) to the very bottom. הִקְיָר, elsewhere with the accus. of the thing, e.g. רִיב, thoroughly to search into a strife, Job xxix. 16, is here, as at xxviii. 11, connected with the accus. of the person: to examine or lay bare any one thoroughly; here, so that the misrepresentations of the state of the matter might come out to view along with the reasons assigned by the accuser.

Ver. 18 The lot allayeth contentions,

Aud separateth between the mighty,

i.e. erects a partition wall between them—those contending (הַפְּרִיר בֵּין), as at 2 Kings ii. 11, cf. Arab. frk byn); עֲצִימִים are not opponents who maintain their cause with weighty arguments (עֲצִמּוֹת, Isa. xli. 21), qui argumentis pollent (vid. Rashi), for then must the truth appear in the pro et contra; but mighty opponents, who, if the lot did not afford a seasonable means of reconciliation, would make good their demands by blows and by the sword (Fl.). Here it is the lot which, as the judgment of God, brings about peace, instead of the ultima ratio of physical force. The proverb refers to the lot what the Epistle to the Hebrews, vi. 16, refers to the oath, vid. at xvi. 33. Regarding מְרִינִים and its altered forms, vid. vol. i. p. 145.

Ver. 19 A brother toward whom it has been acted perfidiously resists more than a strong tower ;

And contentions are like the bar of a palace.

Luther rightly regarded the word נִשָּׁע, according to which the LXX., Vulg., and Syr. translated frater qui adjuvatur a fratre, as an incorrect reading; one would rather expect אָח כּוֹשֵׁי, “a brother who stands by,” as Luther earlier translated; and besides, נִשָּׁע does not properly mean adjuvari, but salvari. His translation—

Und Zanck helt herter, denn rigel am Palast*

[a brother wounded resisteth more than a strong city, and strife resisteth more than bolts in the palace], is one of his most happy renderings. מְקַרְיָתֵנוּ in itself only means ἰπὲρ πόλιω ὄχυράν (Venet.); the noun-adjective (cf. Isa. x. 10) to be supplied is to be understood to עָוָה הוּא or קִשְׁיָה הוּא (Kimchi). The Niph. נִשָּׁע occurs only here. If one reads נִשָּׁע, then it means one who is treated falsely = נִשָּׁע בּוֹ, like the frequently occurring קָמָה, my rising up ones = קָמָה עָלַי, those that rise up against me; but Codd. (also Baer's Cod. jaman.) and old editions have נִשָּׁע, which, as we have above translated, gives an impersonal attributive clause; the former: frater perfidiose tractatus (Fl.: mala fide offensus); the latter: perfide actum est, scil. בּוֹ in eum = in quem perfide actum. אָח is, after xvii. 17, a friend in the highest sense of the word; פָּשַׁע means to break off, to break free, with בּוֹ or עָלָיו of him on whom the action terminates. That the פָּשַׁע is to be thought of as אָח of the נִשָּׁע אָח is obvious; the translation, “brothers who break with one another” (Gesen.), is incorrect: אָח is not collective, and still less is נִשָּׁע a reciprocum. The relation of אָח is the same as that of אֶלְתָּו, xvi. 28. The Targum (improving the Peshito) translates אָחָא דְמִתְעָוִי כִּן אָחִי, which does not mean: a brother who renounces (Hitzig), but who is treated wickedly on the part of, his brother. That is correct; on the contrary, Ewald's “a brother resists more than . . .” proceeds from a meaning of פָּשַׁע which it has not; and Bertheau gives, with Schultens, an untenable<sup>1</sup> reflexive meaning to the

Niph. (which as denom. might mean "covered with crime," Venet. πλημμεληθείς), and, moreover, one that is too weak, for he translates, "a brother is more obstinate than . . ." Hitzig corrects עֲצֹרָה לְחַטָּאת, to shut up sin = to hold it fettered; but that is not correct Heb. It ought to be עֲצֹרָה, עֲצֹרָה, or רְדוּחַ. In 19a the force of the substantival clause lies in the מְאִד (more than, i.e. harder = more difficult to be gained), and in 19b in the עֲ; cf. Mic. vii. 4, where they are interchanged. The parallelism is synonymous: strifes and lawsuits between those who had been friends form as insurmountable a hindrance to their reconciliation, are as difficult to be raised, as the great bars at the gate of a castle (Fl.). The point of comparison is not only the weight of the cross-beam (from בָּרָה, crosswise, across, to go across the field), but also the shutting up of the access. Strife forms a partition wall between such as once stood near each other, and so much thicker the closer they once stood.

With ver. 19, the series of proverbs which began with that of the flatterer closes. The catchword אִם, which occurred at its commencement, 9b, is repeated at its close, and serves also as a landmark of the group following 20-24. The proverb of the breach of friendship and of contentions is followed by one of the reaction of the use of the tongue on the man himself.

Ver. 20 Of the fruit which a man's mouth bringeth is his heart satisfied;
By the revenue of his lips is he filled.

He will taste in rich measure of the consequences not merely of the good (xii. 14, cf. xiii. 2), but of whatever he has spoken. This is an oxymoron like Matt. xv. 11, that not that which goeth into the mouth, but that which cometh out of it, defileth a man. As at John iv. 34 the conduct of a man, so here his words are called his βρῶμα. Not merely the conduct (i. 31, Isa. iii. 10), but also the words are fruit-bringing; and not only do others taste of the fruit of the words as of the actions of a man, whether they be good or bad, but above all he himself does so, both in this life and in that which is to come.

Ver. 21 Death and life are in the power of the tongue;
And whoever loveth it shall eat its fruit.

The hand, יָד, is so common a metaphor for power, that as here a hand is attributed to the tongue, so e.g. Isa. xlvii. 14 to the flame, and Ps. xlix. 16 to Hades. Death and life is the great alternative which is placed, Deut. xxx. 15, before man. According as he uses his tongue, he falls under the power of death or attains to life. All interpreters attribute, 21*b*, וְאִהְבֵּיהָ to the tongue: qui eam (linguam) amant vescentur (אִכְלֵ, distrib. sing., as iii. 18, 35, etc.) fructu ejus. But “to love the tongue” is a strange and obscure expression. He loves the tongue, says Hitzig, who loves to babble. Euchel: he who guards it carefully, or: he who takes care of it, i.e. who applies himself to right discourse. Combining both, Zöckler: who uses it much, as εὐλογῶν or κακολογῶν. The LXX. translates, οἱ δὲ κρατοῦντες αὐτῆς, i.e. אִהְבֵּיהָ; but אָחַז means prehendere and tenere, not cohibere, and the tongue kept in restraint brings forth indeed no bad fruit, but it brings no fruit at all. Why thus? Does the suffix of וְאִהְבֵּיהָ, perhaps like viii. 17, Chethîb, refer to wisdom, which, it is true, is not named, but which lies everywhere before the poet’s mind? At xiv. 3 we ventured to make אֲחַזְתָּה the subject of 3*b*. Then 21*b* would be as a miniature of viii. 17–21. Or is וְאִהְבֵּיהָ a mutilation of אִהְבֵּי יְהוָה: and he who loves Jahve (Ps. xcvi. 10) enjoys its (the tongue’s) fruit?

Ver. 22 Whoso hath found a wife hath found a good thing,

As וְאִהְבֵּיהָ, 21*b*, reminds us of viii. 17, so here not only 22*b*, but also 22*a* harmonizes with viii. 35 (cf. xii. 2). A wife is such as she ought to be, as ver. 14, אִישׁ, a man is such as he ought to be; the LXX., Syr., Targ., and Vulgate supply bonam, but “gnomic brevity and force disdains such enervating adjectives, and cautious limitations of the idea” (Fl.). Besides, אִשָּׁה טוֹבָה in old Hebr. would mean a well-favoured rather than a good-dispositioned wife, which later idea is otherwise expressed, xix. 14, xxxi. 10. The Venet. rightly has γυναικα, and Luther ein Ehefrau, for it is a married woman that is meant. The first מִצָּה is perf. hypotheticum, Gesen. § 126, Anm. 1. On the other hand, Eccles. vii. 26, “I found, מִצָּה אֲנִי, more bitter than death the woman,” etc.; wherefore, when in Palestine one married a wife, the question was wont to be asked: מִצָּה אִשָּׁה מִצָּה, has he married happily (after מִצָּה of the book of Proverbs) or unhappily (after מִצָּה of Ecclesiastes) (Jebamoth 63*b*)?<sup>1</sup>

The LXX. adds a distich to ver. 22, "He that putteth away a good wife putteth away happiness; and he that keepeth an adulteress, is foolish and ungodly." He who constructed this proverb [added by the LXX.] has been guided by מַצָּא מוֹצִיא (Ezra x. 3); elsewhere ἐκβάλλειν (γυναίκα), Gal. iv. 30, Sir. xxviii. 15, is the translation of גִּירָשׁ. The Syr. has adopted the half of that distich, and Jerome the whole of it. On the other hand, vers. 23, 24, and xix. 1, 2, are wanting in the LXX. The translation which is found in some Codd. is that of Theodotion (vid. Lagarde).

Ver. 23 The poor uttereth suppliant entreaties;
And the rich answereth rudenesses.

The oriental proverbial poetry furnishes many parallels to this. It delights in the description of the contrast between a suppliant poor man and the proud and avaricious rich man; vid. e.g. Samachschari's Goldene Halsbänder, No. 58. תַּחֲנוּנִים, according to its meaning, refers to the Hithpa. הִתְחַנַּן, misericordiam alicujus pro se imploravit; cf. the old vulgar "barmen," i.e. to seek to move others to Erbarmen [compassion] (רחמים). עֲזוּזָה, dura, from עָז (synon. קָשָׁה), hard, fast, of bodies, and figuratively of an unbending, hard, haughty disposition, and thence of words of such a nature (Fl.). Both nouns are accus. of the object, as Job xl. 27, תַּחֲנוּנִים with the parallel רַכּוּת. The proverb expresses a fact of experience as a consolation to the poor to whom, if a rich man insults him, nothing unusual occurs, and as a warning to the rich that he may not permit himself to be divested of humanity by mammon. A hard wedge to a hard clod; but whoever, as the Scripture saith, grindeth the poor by hard stubborn-hearted conduct, and grindeth his bashful face (Isa. iii. 15), challenges unmerciful judgment against himself; for the merciful, only they shall obtain mercy, αὐτοὶ ἐλεηθῆσονται (Matt. v. 7).

Ver. 24 A man of many friends cometh off a loser;
But there is a friend more faithful than a brother.

Jerome translates the commencing word by vir, but the Syr., Targ. by חַיִּים, which is adopted by Hitzig, Böttcher, and others. But will a German poet use in one line "itzt" [same as jetzt = now], and in the next "jetzt"? and could the Hebrew poet prefer to חַיִּים its rarer, and here especially not altogether unambiguous form שׂנ (cf. to the contrary, Eccles. vii. 15)? We write שׂנ, because the Masora comprehends this passage, with 2 Sam. xiv. 19, Mic. vi. 10, as the שׂ סבירין י׳, i.e. as the three, where one ought to expect שׂ, and is thus exposed to the danger of falling into error in writing and reading; but erroneously שׂנ is found in all these three places in the Masora magna of the Venetian Bible of 1526; elsewhere the Masora has the defectiva scriptio with like meaning only in those two other passages. While שׂנ = שׂ, or properly שׂ, with equal possibility as שׂנ,<sup>1</sup> and it makes no material difference in the meaning of 24a whether we explain: there are friends who serve to bring one to loss: or a man of many friends comes to loss,—the inf. with לְ is used in substantival clauses as the expression of the most manifold relations, Gesen. § 132, Anm. 1 (cf. at Hab. i. 17), here in both cases it denotes the end, as e.g. Ps. xcii. 8, to which it hastens with many friends, or with the man of many friends. It is true that שׂנ (like בַּעַל) is almost always connected only with genitives of things; but as one says אִישׁ אֱלֹהִים: a man belongs to God, so may one also say אִישׁ רַעִים: a man belongs to many friends; the common language of the people may thus have named a man, to whom, because he has no definite and decided character, the rule that one knows a man by his friends is not applicable, a so-called every-man's-friend, or all-the-world's-friend. Theodotion translates ἀνὴρ ἐταιριῶν τοῦ ἐταιρεύσασθαι; and thus also the Syr., Targ., and Jerome render (and among the moderns, Hitzig) הִתְרַעַע as reflexive in the sense of to cherish social intercourse; but this reflexive is הִתְרַעַע, xxii. 24. That הִתְרַעַע is either Hithpa. of רַעַע, to exult, Ps. lx. 10, lxv. 14, according to which the Venet. translates (contrary to Kimchi) ὥστε ἀλαλάζειν: such an one can exult, but which is not true, since, according to 24b, a true friend outweighs the many; or it is Hithpa. of רַעַע, to be wicked, sinful (Fl.: sibi perniciem paraturus est); or, which we prefer, warranted by Isa. xxiv. 19, of רַעַע, to become brittle (Böttcher and others)—which not only gives a good sense, but also a similar alliteration with רַעִים, as iii. 29, xiii. 20. In contradistinction to רַעַע, which is a general, and, according to the usage of the language (e.g. 17*b*), a familiar idea, the true friend is called, in the antithetical parallel member, אֱהָבָה (xxvii. 6); and after xvii. 17, רֵבִיבָק טָאָח, one who remains true in misfortune. To have such an one is better than to have many of the so-called friends; and, as appears from the contrast, to him who is so fortunate as to have one such friend, there comes a blessing and safety. Immanuel has given the right explanation: "A man who sets himself to gain many friends comes finally to be a loser (סוֹפוֹ לְהִשָּׁבֵר), for he squanders his means, and is impoverished in favour of others." And Schultens: At est amicus agglutinatus præ fratre. Rarum et carum esse genus insinuat, ac proinde intimam illam amicitiam, quæ conglutinet compingatque corda, non per multos spargendam, sed circumspicere et ferme cum uno tantum ineundam. Thus closes this group of proverbs with the praise of friendship deepened into spiritual brotherhood, as the preceding, ver. 19, with a warning against the destruction of such a relation by a breach of trust not to be made good again.

Chap. xix. The plur. רָעִים, xviii. 24, is emphatic and equivalent to רָעִים רַבִּים. The group 1-4 closes with a proverb which contains this catchword. The first proverb of the group comes by שְׂפָתָיו into contact with xviii. 20, the first proverb of the preceding group.

Ver. 1 Better a poor man walking in his innocence,
Than one with perverse lips, and so a fool.

The contrast, xxviii. 6, is much clearer. But to correct this proverb in conformity with that, as Hitzig does, is unwarrantable. The Syr., indeed, translates here as there; but the Chald. assimilates this translation to the Heb. text, which Theodotion, and after him the Syro-Hexapl., renders by ὑπὲρ στρεβλόχειλον ἄφρονα. But does 1*a* form a contrast to 1*b*? Fleischer remarks: "From the contrast it appears that he who is designated in 1*b* must be thought of as עשיר [rich]; and Ewald, "Thus early the ideas of a rich man and of a fool, or a despiser of God, are connected together." Saadia understands כסיל [a fool], after Job xxxi. 24, of one who makes riches his בְּסֵל [confidence]. Euchel accordingly translates: the false man, although he builds himself greatly up, viz. on his riches. But כסיל designates the intellectually slothful, in whom the flesh outweighs the mind.

And the representation of the rich, which, for 1b certainly arises out of 1a, does not amalgamate with בַּסִּילִי, but with עָקַשׁ שְׂפָתָיו. Arama is on the right track, for he translates: the rich who distorts his mouth (cf. vol. i. p. 143), for he gives to the poor suppliant a rude refusal. Better Zöckler: a proud man of perverse lips and haughty demeanour. If one with haughty, scornful lips is opposed to the poor, then it is manifestly one not poor who thinks to raise himself above the poor, and haughtily looks down on him. And if it is said that, in spite of this proud demeanour, he is a fool, then this presents the figure of one proud of his wealth, who, in spite of his emptiness and nequitia, imagines that he possesses a greatness of knowledge, culture, and worth corresponding to the greatness of his riches. How much better is a poor man than such an one who walketh (vid. on חַם, vol. i. p. 79) in his innocence and simplicity, with his pure mind wholly devoted to God and to that which is good!—his poverty keeps him in humility which is capable of no malicious conduct; and this pious blameless life is of more worth than the pride of wisdom of the distinguished fool. There is in contrast to עָקַשׁ שְׂפָתָיו a simplicity, ἀπλότης, of high moral worth; but, on the other side, there is also a simplicity which is worthless. This is the connecting thought which introduces the next verse.

Ver. 2 The not-knowing of the soul is also not good,

And he who hasteneth with the legs after it goeth astray.

Fleischer renders נֶפֶשׁ as the subj. and לֹא-טוֹב as neut. pred.: in and of itself sensual desire is not good, but yet more so if it is without foresight and reflection. With this explanation the words must be otherwise accentuated. Hitzig, in conformity with the accentuation, before us: if desire is without reflection, it is also without success. But where נֶפֶשׁ denotes desire or sensuality, it is always shown by the connection, as e.g. xxiii. 2; here רַעַת, referring to the soul as knowing (cf. Ps. cxxxix. 14), excludes this meaning. But נֶפֶשׁ is certainly gen. subjecti; Luzzatto's "self-knowledge" is untenable, for this would require רַעַת נֶפֶשׁוֹ; Meiri rightly glosses רַעַת נֶפֶשׁ by שִׁכְלָה. After this Zöckler puts Hitzig's translation right in the following manner: where there is no consideration of the soul, there is no prosperity. But that also is incorrect, for it would require אֵין-טוֹב; לֹא-טוֹב is always pred., not a substantival clause.

Thus the proverb states that בלא־דעת נפש is not good, and that is equivalent to הִיִּית בלא־דעת נפש (for the subject to לא־טוב is frequently, as e.g. xvii. 26, xviii. 5, an infinitive); or also: בלא־דעת נפש is a virtual noun in the sense of the not-knowing of the soul; for to say לא־דעת was syntactically inadmissible, but the expression is בלא־דעת, not בְּלִי דַעַת (בְּבִלְיָ), because this is used in the sense unintentionally or unexpectedly. The ׀ which begins the proverb is difficult. If we lay the principal accent in the translation given above on “not good,” then the placing of ׀ first is a hyperbaton similar to that in xvii. 26, xx. 11; cf. 78, xvii. 11; 77, xiii. 10, as if the words were: if the soul is without knowledge, then also (eo ipso) it is destitute of anything good. But if we lay the principal accent on the “also,” then the meaning of the poet is, that ignorance of the soul is, like many other things, not good; or (which we prefer without on that account maintaining<sup>1</sup> the original connection of ver. 1 and ver. 2), that as on the one side the pride of wisdom, so on the other ignorance is not good. In this case ׀ belongs more to the subject than to the predicate, but in reality to the whole sentence at the beginning of which it stands. To hasten with the legs (78, as xxviii. 20) means now in this connection to set the body in violent agitation, without direction and guidance proceeding from the knowledge possessed by the soul. He who thus hastens after it without being intellectually or morally clear as to the goal and the way, makes a false step, goes astray, fails (vid. viii. 36, where הִטָּא is the contrast to בִּלְעָא).

Ver. 3 The foolishness of a man overturneth his way,
And his heart is angry against Jahve.

Regarding סָלַף, vid. at xi. 3; also the Arab. signification “to go before” proceeds from the root conception pervertere, for first a letting precede, or preceding (e.g. of the paying before the delivery of that which is paid for: salaf, a pre-numbering, and then also: advanced money), consisting in the reversal of the natural order, is meant. The way is here the way of life, the walking: the folly of a man overturns, i.e. destroys, his life's-course; but although he is himself the fabricator of his own ruin, yet the ill-humour (אָנֶן, æstuate, vid. at Ps. xi. 6) of his heart turns itself against God, and he blames (LXX. essentially correct: ἀτιμάται) God instead of himself, viz. his own madness, whereby he has turned the grace of God into lasciviousness, cast to the winds the instruction which lay in His providences, and frustrated the will of God desiring his good. A beautiful paraphrase of this parable is found at Sir. xv. 11–20; cf. Lam. iii. 39.

Ver. 4 Wealth bringeth many friends;
But the reduced—his friend separateth himself.

The very same contrast, though otherwise expressed, we had at xiv. 20. Regarding הָן, vid. vol. i. p. 63. לָךְ is the tottering, or he who has fallen into a tottering condition, who has no resources, possesses no means. The accentuation gives Mugrash to the word (according to which the Targ. translates), for it is not the subject of יִפְרָד: the reduced is separated (pass. Niph.) by his misfortunes, or must separate himself (reflex. Niph.) from his friend (מִרְעוּהוּ, as Eccles. iv. 4, præ socio suo); but subject of the virtual pred. מִרְעוּהוּ יִפְרָד: the reduced—his friend (מִרְעוּהוּ, as ver. 7) separates himself, i.e. (according to the nature of the Semitic substantival clause) he is such (of such a fate) that his friend sets himself free, whereby כִּמְנוֹי may be omitted as self-obvious; נִפְרָד means one who separates himself, xviii. 1. If we make לָךְ the subject of the separatur, then the initiative of the separation from the friend is not expressed.

In vers. 5 and 9 we have the introductory proverb of two groups, the former of which, in its close as well as its beginning, cannot be mistaken.

Ver. 5 A lying witness remaineth not unpunished;
And he who breathes out lies escapeth not.

Regarding יִפִּיחַ, vid. vol. i. p. 148: as here we read it of false witness at vi. 19, xiv. 5, 25. לֹא יִנְקָה occurs four times before, the last of which is at xvii. 5. The LXX. elsewhere translates כּוֹבֵיִם יִפִּיחַ by ἐκκαίειν ψευδῆ, to kindle lies; but here by ὁ δὲ ἐγκαλῶν ἀδίκως, and at ver. 9 by ὁ δ' ἂν ἐκαύσῃ κακίαν, both times changing only because ψευδής goes before, and instead of ψευδῆ, the choice of a different rendering commended itself.

Ver. 6 Many stroke the cheeks of the noble ;

And the mass of friends belongeth to him who gives.

The phrase "הָלֹת פְּנֵי פֶלֶא" signifies to stroke the face of any one, from the fundamental meaning of the verb הָלָה, to rub, to stroke, Arab. khala, with which the Heb., meaning to be sick, weak (viribus attritum esse), and the Arabic: to be sweet (properly lavem et politum, glabrum esse, or palatum demulcere, leniter stringere, contrast asperum esse ad gustum), are connected (Fl.). The object of such insinuating, humble suing for favour is the גִּבּוֹר (from גָּבַר, instigare), the noble, he who is easily incited to noble actions, particularly to noble-mindedness in bestowing gifts and in doing good, or who feels himself naturally impelled thereto, and spontaneously practises those things; cf. the Arab. krym, nobilis and liberalis (Fl.), and at Job xxi. 28; parall. אִישׁ מִתֵּן, a man who gives willingly, as אִישׁ חָמָה, xv. 18, one who is easily kindled into anger. Many (רַבִּים) as Job xi. 19) stroke the face of the liberal (Lat. caput mulcent or demulcent); and to him who gives willingly and richly belongs כָּל-הָרֵעַ, the mass (the totality) of good friends, cf. xv. 17; there the art. of הָרֵעַ, according to the manner of expression of the Arab. grammarians, stood for "the exhaustion of the characteristic properties of the genus": the friend who corresponds to the nature (the idea) of such an one; here it stands for "the comprehension of the individuals of the genus;" all that is only always friend. It lies near with Ewald and Hitzig to read וְכֹל רֵעַ (and every one is friend . . .) (כלו = כלה, as Jer. viii. 10, etc.); but why could not כָּל-הָרֵעַ be used as well as כָּל-הָאָדָם, perhaps with the sarcastic appearance which the above translation seeks to express? The LXX. also had וכל הרע in view, which it incorrectly translates πᾶς δὲ ὁ κακός, whereby the Syr. and the Targ. are led into error; but מִתֵּן is not one and the same with שָׂחַד, vid. xviii. 6. On the contrary, there certainly lies before us in ver. 7 a mutilated text. The tristich is, as we have shown, vol. i. p. 15, open to suspicion; and the violence which its interpretation needs in order to comprehend it, as a formal part of 7ab, places it beyond a doubt, and the LXX. confirms it that 7c is the remainder of a distich, the half of which is lost.

Ver. 7ab. We thus first confine our attention to these two lines,—

All the brethren of the poor hate him ;

How much more do his friends withdraw themselves from him ?

Regarding כִּי קָמַן, quanto magis, vid. at xi. 31, xv. 11, xvii. 7. In a similar connection xiv. 20 spake of hatred, i.e. the cooling of love, and the manifesting of this coldness. The brethren who thus show themselves here, unlike the friend who has become a brother, according to xvii. 17, are brothers-german, including kindred by blood relation. כִּל has Mercha, and is thus without the Makkeph, as at Ps. xxxv. 10 (vid. the Masora in Baer's Liber Psalmorum, 1861, p. 133). Kimchi (Michlol 205a), Norzi, and others think that cāl (with קָמַן רַחַב) is to be read as at Isa. xl. 12, where וְכָל is a verb. But that is incorrect. The case is the same as with אָת, iii. 12; Ps. xlvii. 5, lx. 2. As here ē with Mercha remains, so ō with Mercha in that twice occurring וְכָל; that which is exceptional is this, that the accentuated כָּל is written thus twice, not as the usual כָּל, but as כָּל with the Makkeph. The ground of the exception lies, as with other peculiarities, in the special character of metrical accentuation; the Mercha represents the place of the Makkeph, and כָּ thus remains in the unchanged force of a Kametz-Chatuph. The plur. רַעֲוֵי does not stamp טְרַעֲוֵי as the defectively written plur.; the suffix ēhu is always sing., and the sing. is thus, like רַעֲוֶה, 6b, meant collectively, or better: generally (in the sense of kind), which is the linguistic usage of these two words, 1 Sam. xxx. 26; Job xlii. 10. But it is worthy of notice that the Masoretic form here is not טְרַעֲוֵי, but טְרַעֲוֵי, with Sheva. The Masora adds to it the remark לִיח, and accordingly the word is thus written with Sheva by Kimchi (Michlol 202a and Lex. under the word רַעֲוֶה), in Codd., and older editions. The Venet., translating by ἀπὸ τοῦ φίλου αὐτοῦ, has not noticed that. But how? Does the punctuation טְרַעֲוֵי mean that the word is here to be derived from טְרַעֲוֶה, maleficus? Thus understood, it does not harmonize with the line of thought. From this it is much more seen that the punctuation of the inflected טְרַעֲוֶה, amicus, fluctuates. This word טְרַעֲוֶה is a formation so difficult of comprehension, that one might almost, with Olshausen, § 210; Böttcher, § 794; and Lagarde, regard the ט as the partitive טן, like the French des amis (cf. Eurip. Med. 560: πένητα φεύγει πᾶς τις ἐκποδὸν φίλος), or: something of friend, a piece of friend, while Ewald and others regard it as possible that מרע is abbreviated from מרעה. The punctuation, since it treats the Tsere in מרעהו, 4b<sup>1</sup> and elsewhere, as unchangeable, and here in מרעהו as changeable, affords proof that in it also the manner of the formation of the word was incomprehensible.

Ver. 7c Seeking after words which are vain.

If now this line belongs to this proverb, then מְרַדֵּף must be used of the poor, and לֹא-יִהְיֶה, or לֹא-יִהְיֶה (vid. regarding the 15 Kerîs, לוֹ for לָ, at Ps. c. 3), must be the attributively nearer designation of the אַמְרִים. The meaning of the Kerî would be: he (the poor man) hunts after mere words, which—but no actions corresponding to them—are for a portion to him. This is doubtful, for the principal matter, that which is not a portion to him, remains unexpressed, and the לֹא-יִהְיֶה [to him they belong] affords only the service of guarding one against understanding by the אַמְרִים the proper words of the poor. This service is not in the same way afforded by לֹא יִהְיֶה [they are not]; but this expression characterizes the words as vain, so that it is to be interpreted according to such parallels as Hos. xii. 2: words which are not, i.e. which have nothing in reality corresponding to them, verba nihili, i.e. the empty assurances and promises of his brethren and friends (Fl.). The old translators all<sup>2</sup> read לָ, and the Syr. and Targ. translate not badly: מְלֹי לָ שְׂרִיר; Symmachus, ῥήσεσιν ἀνυπάρκτοις. The expression is not to be rejected: לָ הִיָּה sometimes means to come to לָ, i.e. to nothing, Job vi. 21, Ezek. xxi. 32, cf. Isa. xv. 6; and לָ הוּא, he is not = has no reality, Jer. v. 12, אַמְרִים לָ-הֵמָּה, may thus mean words which are nothing (vain). But how can it be said of the poor whom everything forsakes, that one dismisses him with words behind which there is nothing, and now also that he pursues such words? The former supposes always a sympathy, though it be a feigned one, which is excluded by שִׂנְאֵהוּ [they hate him] and יִתְקַיְּמוּ [withdraw themselves]; and the latter, spoken of the poor, would be unnatural, for his purposed endeavour goes not out after empty talk, but after real assistance. So 7c: pursuing after words which (are) nothing, although in itself not falling under critical suspicion, yet only of necessity is connected with this proverb regarding the poor. The LXX., however, has not merely one, but even four lines, and thus two proverbs following 7b. The former of these distichs is: "Ἐννοια ἀγαθῆ τοῖς εἰδόσιν αὐτὴν ἐργαίει, ἀνὴρ δὲ φρόνιμος εὐρήσει αὐτήν; it is translated from the Hebr. (ἔννοια ἀγαθῆ, v. 2 = תוֹמָהּ), but it has a meaning complete in itself, and thus has nothing to do with the fragment 7c. The second distich is: 'Ὁ πολλὰ κακοποιῶν τελεσιουργεῖ κακίαν, ὃς δὲ ἐρεθίζει λόγους οὐ σωθήσεται. This ὃς δὲ ἐρεθίζει λόγους is, without doubt, a translation of מְרַדֵּים אִמְרִים (7c); λόγους is probably a corruption of λόγοις (thus the Complut.), not, he who pursueth words, but he who incites by words, as Homer (Il. iv. 5 f.) uses the expression ἐρεθίζεμεν ἐπέεσσι. The concluding words, οὐ σωθήσεται, are a repetition of the Heb. לֹא יִמְלֹךְ (cf. LXX. xix. 5 with xxviii. 26), perhaps only a conjectural emendation of the unintelligible הַמָּה לֹא. Thus we have before us in that ὁ πολλὰ κακοποιῶν, κ.τ.λ., the line lost from the Heb. text; but it is difficult to restore it to the Heb. We have attempted it, vol. i. p. 15. Supposing that the LXX. had before them הַמָּה לֹא, then the proverb is—

Hunting after words which are nothing;”

i.e. since this his courting the friendship of as many as possible is a hunting after words which have nothing after them and come to nothing.

Ver. 8 He that getteth understanding loveth his soul,
And he that values reasonableness will acquire good; or, more closely, since this would be the translation of וְיָצַח טוֹב, xvi. 20, xvii. 20: so it happens, or it comes to this, that he acquires good (= יָצַח לְטוֹב); the inf. with ל is here, as at xviii. 24, the expression of a fut. periphrasticum, as in the Lat. consecuturus est. Regarding לֹא יִמְלֹךְ, vid. xv. 32, and שְׂמֵר תְּבוּנָה, vol. i. p. 119. That the deportment of men is either care for the soul, or the contrary of that, is a thought which runs through the Book of Proverbs.

The group of proverbs (vers. 9-16) now following begins and closes in the same way as the preceding.

Ver. 9 A lying witness doth not remain unpunished,
And one who breathes out lies perisheth, or goeth to ruin, for נִצַּב (R. נַב, to divide, separate) signifies to lose oneself in the place of the separated, the dead (Arab. in the infinite). In ver. 5, instead of this ἀπολείται (LXX.), the negative οὐ σωθήσεται is used, or as the LXX. there more accurately renders it, οὐ διαφεύξεται.

Ver. 10 Luxury becometh not a fool ;
How much less a servant to rule over princes.

Thus also with נִצַּב לֵא (3 p. Pil. non decet, cf. the adj. xxvi. 1) xvii. 7 begins. נִצַּב רִיבִי rises here, as at ver. 7, a minori ad majus: how much more is it unbecoming = how much less is it seemly. The contrast in the last case is, however, more rugged, and the expression harsher. "A fool cannot bear luxury: he becomes by it yet more foolish; one who was previously a humble slave, but who has attained by good fortune a place of prominence and power, from being something good, becomes at once something bad: an insolent sceleratus" (Fl.). Agur, xxx. 22 f., describes such a homo novus as an unbearable calamity; and the author of the Book of Ecclesiastes, written in the time of the Persian domination, speaks, x. 7, of such. The LXX. translates, καὶ ἐὰν οἰκέτης ἄρξηται μεθ' ὑβρεως δυναστεύειν, rendering the phrase בְּשָׂרִים by μεθ' ὑβρεως, but all other translators had בְּשָׂרִים before them.

Ver. 11 The discretion of a man maketh him long-suffering,
And it is a glory for him to be forbearing toward transgression.

The Syr., Targum, Aquila, and Theodotion translate הַרְיֵךְ אִשׁוֹ by μακροθυμία, and thus read הַרְיֵךְ; but Rashi, Kimchi, and others remark that הַרְיֵךְ is here only another vocalization for הַרְיֵךְ, which is impossible. The Venet. also translates: Νοῦς ἀνθρώπου μακρυνεῖ τὸν θυμὸν ἐαυτοῦ; the correct word would be αὐτοῦ: the discretion (intellectus or intelligentia; vid. regarding שָׂבַל, iii. 4) of a man extends his anger, i.e. brings it about that it continues long before it breaks out (vid. xiv. 29). One does not stumble at the perf. in view of ver. 7, xviii. 8, xvi. 26, and the like; in the proverbial style the fut. or the particip. is more common. In the synonymous parallel member, הַמְּאַרְתִּיו points to man as such: it is an honour to him to pass by a transgression (particularly that which affects himself), to let it go aside, i.e. to forbear revenge or punishment (cf. Arab. tjâwz 'aly); thus also the divine πάρεσις (Rom. iii. 25) is designated by Mic. vii. 18; and in Amos vii. 8, viii. 2, עָבַר stands absol. for the divine remission or passing by, i.e. unavenging of sin.

Ver. 12 A murmuring as of a lion is the wrath of the king,
And as dew on plants is his favour.

Line 1 is a variation of xx. 2*a*; line 2*a* of xvi. 15*b*. הָעֵץ is not the being irritated against another, but generally ill-humour, fretfulness, bad humour; the murmuring or growling in which this state of mind expresses itself is compared to that of a lion which, growling, prepares and sets itself to fall upon its prey (vid. Isa. v. 29, cf. Amos iii. 4). Opposed to the וְעָפָה stands the beneficial effect of the רֵצֵן, i.e. of the pleasure, the delight, the satisfaction, the disposition which shows kindness (LXX. τὸ ἰλαρὸν αὐτοῦ). In the former case all are afraid; in the latter, everything lives, as when the refreshing dew falls upon the herbs of the field. The proverb presents a fact, but that the king may mirror himself in it.

Ver. 13 A foolish son is destruction for his father,
And a continual dropping are the contentions of a wife.

Regarding הֵיט, vid. at xvii. 4, cf. x. 3. Line 2*a* is expanded, xxvii. 15, into a distich. The dropping is טָרַד, properly striking (cf. Arab. tirad, from tarad III., hostile assault) when it pours itself forth, stroke (drop) after stroke = constantly, or with unbroken continuity. Lightning-flashes are called (Jer Berachoth, p. 114, Shitmir's ed.) טורדין, opp. מַפְסִיקִין, when they do not follow in intervals, but constantly flash; and b. Bechoroth 44*a*; דומעות, weeping eyes, דולפות, dropping eyes, and טורדות, eyes always flowing, are distinguished. An old interpreter (vid. R. Ascher in Pesachim II. No. 21) explains טָרַד וְדָלַף by: "which drops, and drops, and always drops." An Arab proverb which I once heard from Wetzstein, says that there are three things which make our house intolerable: âltakk (= âldhalf), the trickling through of rain; âlnakk, the contention of the wife; and âlbakk, bugs.

Ver. 14 House and riches are a paternal inheritance,
But from Jahve cometh a prudent wife.

House and riches (opulentia), which in themselves do not make men happy, one may receive according to the law of inheritance; but a prudent wife is God's gracious gift, xviii. 22. There is not a more suitable word than מְשֻׁבֶּלֶת (fem. of מְשֻׁבֵּל) to characterize a wife as a divine gift, making her husband happy. הַשְּׁבֵל (שְׁבֵל) is the property which says: "I am named modesty, which wears the crown of all virtues."<sup>1</sup>

Ver. 15 Slothfulness sinketh into deep sleep,
And an idle soul must hunger.

Regarding תְּרַחֵמָה and its root-word רָחַם, vid. at x. 5. הַפִּיל, to befall, to make to get, is to be understood after Gen. iii. 21; the obj. עַל-הָאָדָם, viz. הָעֵצָל, is naturally to be supplied. In 15*b* the fut. denotes that which will certainly happen, the inevitable. In both of its members the proverb is perfectly clear; Hitzig, however, corrects 15*a*, and brings out of it the meaning, "slothfulness gives tasteless herbs to eat." The LXX. has two translations of this proverb, here and at xviii. 8. That it should translate רַמְיָה by ἀνδρογυυος was necessary, as Lagarde remarks, for the exposition of the "works of a Hebrew Sotades." But the Hebrew literature never sunk to such works, wallowing in the mire of sensuality, and ἀνδρογυυος is not at all thus enigmatical; the Greek word was also used of an effeminate man, a man devoid of manliness, a weakling, and was, as the LXX. shows, more current in the Alexandrine Greek than elsewhere.

Ver. 16 He that keepeth the commandment keepeth his soul;
He that taketh no heed to his ways dies.

As at vi. 23, cf. Eccles. viii. 5, מִצְוָה is here the commandment of God, and thus obligatory, which directs man in every case to do that which is right, and warns him against that which is wrong. And בִּזְיוֹה רְרָבִי (according to the Masora with Tsere, as in Codd. and old editions, not בִּזְיוֹה) is the antithesis of נִצַּר רְרָבִי, xvi. 17. To despise one's own way is equivalent to, to regard it as worth no consideration, as no question of conscience whether one should enter upon this way or that. Hitzig's reading, פִּזְּוּ, "he that scattereth his ways," lets himself be drawn by the manifold objects of sensuality sometimes in one direction and sometimes in another, is supported by Jer. iii. 13, according to which it must be פִּזְּוּ; the conj. is not in the style of the Book of Proverbs, and besides is superfluous. The LXX., which is fond of a quid pro quo—it makes, 13b, a courtesan offering a sacrifice she had vowed of the wages of sin of the quarrelsome woman—has here, as the Heb. text: ὁ καταφρονῶν τῶν ἑαυτοῦ ὀδῶν ἀπολείπει. Thus after the Kerî יָמָת, as also the Targ., Syro-Hexap., and Luther; on the contrary, the Syr., Jerome, the Venet. adopt the Chethîb יָמָת: he will become dead, i.e. dies no natural death. The Kerî is more in the spirit and style of the Book of Proverbs (xv. 10, xxiii. 13, x. 21).

Vers. 17–21. These verses we take together. But we have no other reason for making a pause at ver. 21, than that ver. 22 is analogous to ver. 17, and thus presents itself to us as an initial verse.

Ver. 17 He lendeth to Jahve who is compassionate to the lowly,
And his bounty He requites to him.

As at xiv. 31, חוֹנֵן is part. Kal. The Masoretically exact form of the word is חוֹנֵן (as יִחַן, xx. 14) with Mercha on the first syllable, on which the tone is thrown back, and the העמרה on the second. The Roman legal phrase, mutui datione contrahitur obligatio, serves to explain the fundamental conception of חוֹנֵן, mutuo accipere, and חוֹנֵן, mutuum dare (vid. xxii. 7). The construction, Ex. xxii. 24, "to make any one bound as a debtor, obligare," lies at the foundation of the genitive connection חוֹנֵן ה' (not חוֹנֵן ה'). With 17b cf. xii. 14, where the subject of יָשִׁיב (Kerî) remains in the background. נָמְלוֹ (not נִמְלוֹ) is here his work done in the sense of good exhibited. "Love," Hedinger once said, "is an imperishable capital, which always bears interest." And the Archbishop Walther: nam Deo dat qui dat inopibus, ipse Deus est in pauperibus. Dr. Jonas, as Dächsel relates, once gave to a poor man, and said, "Who knows when God restores it!" There Luther interposed: "As if God had not long ago given it beforehand!" This answer of Luther meets the abuse of this beautiful proverb by the covetous.

Ver. 18. This proverb brings to view once more the pedagogic character of this Older Book of Proverbs:

Correct thy son, for yet there is hope;
But go not too far to kill him.

That כִּי is meant relatively, as at xi. 15, is seen from Job xi. 18, xiv. 7; Jer. xxxi. 16 f.; כִּי־יֵשׁ תִּקְוָה is the usual expression for etenim spes est. Though a son show obstinacy, and manifest a bad disposition, yet there is hope in the training of the youth of being able to break his self-will, and to wean him from his bad disposition; therefore his education should be carried forward with rigorous exactness, but in such a way that wisdom and love regulate the measure and limits of correction: ad eum interficiendum animam ne tollas (animum ne inducas). נִפְיֹטֶךָ is not the subject, for in that case the word would have been הַנְּפִיֹטֶךָ (2 Kings xiv. 10). It is the object: To raise the soul to something is equivalent to, to direct his desire to it, to take delight in it. The teacher should not seek correction as the object, but only as the means; he who has a desire after it, to put the child to death in the case of his guilt, changes correction into revenge, permits himself to be driven by passion from the proper end of correction, and to be pushed beyond its limits. The LXX. translates freely εἰς δὲ ὑβρίω, for ὑβρις is unrestrained abuse, מוסר אכזרי as Immanuel glosses. Besides, all the ancients and also the Venet. translate המיתו as the inf. of הָמִית. But Oetinger (for he translates: lift not thy soul to his cry, for which Euchel: let not his complaining move thy compassion) follows the derivation from הָמָה suggested by Kimchi, Meiri, and Immanuel, and preferred by Ralbag, so that הָמִיתו after the form הָמִית is equivalent to הָמִיתוּ. But leaving out of view that הָמָה means strepere, not lamentari, and that נִשָּׂא נַפְשׁוֹ means attention, not desire, xxiii. 13 points out to us a better interpretation.

Ver. 19. Another proverb with נִשָּׂא :

A man of excessive wrath must suffer punishment;

For if thou layest hold of it, hindering it, thou makest it only worse.

The LXX., Syr., and Targ. translate as if the words were נָבַר חֲמוּה (as בָּעַל חֲמוּה, xxix. 22). Theodotion, the Venet., and Luther render the Kerî נָבַר; Jerome's impatiens is colourless. The Chethîb נָבַר gives no appropriate meaning. The Arab. jarîl means lapidosus (whence נָבַר, cf. Aram. פָּפָס = ψήφος), and Schultens translates accordingly aspere scruposus iracundiæ, which is altogether after the manner of his own heavy style.

Ewald translates גָּרַל as derived from the Arab jazył, largus, grandis; but the possibility of the passing over of ר into ז, as maintained by Ewald and also by Hitzig, or the reverse, is physiologically undemonstrable, and is confirmed by no example worthy of mention. Rather it may be possible that the Heb. had an adj. גָּרַל or גְּרָל in the sense of stony, gravel-like, hard as gravel, but tow rather than gravel would be appropriate to חָמָה. Hitzig corrects גָּרַל חָמָה, "who acts in anger;" but he says שָׁלַם חָמָה, to recompense anger, Isa. lix. 18; גָּמַל חָמָה is without support. This correction, however, is incomparably more feasible than Böttcher's, "moderate inheritance bears expiation;" חָמָה = חָמָאָה must mean not only thick [curdled] milk, but also moderation, and Böttcher finds this "sound." From all these instances one sees that גָּרַל is an error in transcription; the Keri גְּרָל-חָמָה rightly improves it, a man is thus designated whose peculiarity it is to fall into a high degree of passionate anger (חָמָה גְּרָלָהּ, Dan. xi. 44): such an one has to bear עֲנִיָּה, a fine, i.e. to compensate, for he has to pay compensation or smart-money for the injury suffered, as e.g. he who in strife with another pushes against a woman with child, so that injury befalls her, Ex. xxi. 22. If we compare this passage with 2 Sam. xiv. 6, there appears for הִצִּיל the meaning of taking away of the object (whether a person or a thing) against which the passionate hothead directs himself. Therewith the meaning of הִעֲדֵר תּוֹכַף accords. The meaning is not that, הִצִּיל, once is not enough, but much rather must be repeated, and yet is without effect; but that one only increases and heightens the חָמָה thereby. It is in vain to seek to spare such a violent person the punishment into which he obstinately runs; much more advisable is it to let him rage till he ceases; violent opposition only makes the evil the greater. With כִּי אִם, "denn wenn" [for then], cf. ii. 3, "ja wenn" [yea if], and with וְעֵד in the conclusion, Job xiv. 7 (a parallelism syntactically more appropriate than Ps. cxxxix. 18).

Ver. 20 Hearken to counsel, and receive instruction,
That thou mayest become wise afterwards.

The rule of morals, xii. 15*b*, receives here the parænetic tone which is the keynote of the introduction i.-ix. Löwenstein translates: that thou mayest finally become wise. But בְּאַחֲרֵיתָךְ corresponds rather to our "hinfort" [posthac] than to "end- lich" [finally]. He to whom the warning is directed must break with the self-willed, undisciplined ראשית [beginning] of his life, and for the future (τὸν ἐπίλοιπον ἐν σαρκὶ χρόνον, 1 Pet. iv. 2) become wise. The relative contrast between the two periods of life is the same as at Job viii. 7.

Ver. 21 Many are the thoughts in a man's heart;
But Jahve's counsel, that stands.

In חֲקִיָּה lies, as at Isa. xl. 8, both: that the counsel of God (His plan of the world and of salvation) is accomplished and comes into actual fact, and that it continues. This counsel is the true reality elevated above the checkered manifoldness of human purposes, aims, and subjectivities, which penetrates and works itself out in history. The thoughts of a man thus gain unity, substance, endurance, only in so far as he subjects himself to this counsel, and makes his thoughts and actions conformable and subordinate to this counsel.

Ver. 22. The series makes a new departure with a proverb regarding the poor (cf. ver. 17):

A man's delight is his beneficence;
And better is a poor man than a liar.

The right interpretation will be that which presses upon תַּשְׁתִּיחַ no strange meaning, and which places the two parts of the verse in an inner mutual relation ethically right. In any case it lies nearer to interpret תַּשְׁתִּיחַ, in relation to man, actively than passively: that which makes man worthy of desire (Rashi), adorns and distinguishes him (Kimchi, Aben-Ezra); or, that which is desired by man, is above all things sought for (Luzzatto); and, in like manner, the Heb. meaning for חֲסִדוֹ lies nearer than the Aram. (vid. xiv. 34): the pleasure of a man is his disgrace (Rabag). Thus Bertheau's translation: the desire of a man is his charitas, must mean: that which brings to a man true joy is to act amiably. But is that, thus generally expressed, true? And if this were the thought, how much more correctly and distinctly would it be expressed by שְׂמֵחָה לְאָרְצָם עֲשׂוֹת חֲסִד (cf. xxi. 15)! Hitzig is rightly reminded by חֲסִדוֹ of the Pharisee who thanks God that he is not as other men; the word ought to have been חֲסִד to remove every trace of self-satisfaction. Hitzig therefore proposes from the LXX. and the Vulgate the text-correction מִתְּבִיאָה, and translates, "from the revenue of a man is his kind gift;" and Ewald, who is satisfied with תְּבוּאָתָא, "the gain of a man is his pious love." The latter is more judicious: חסד (love) distributed is in reality gain (according to ver. 17); but 22*b* corresponds rather with the former: "better is he who from want does not give תְּבוּאָה, than he who could give and says he has nothing." But was there then need for that καρπός of the LXX.? If a poor man is better than a lord given to lying,—for אִישׁ־אִשִׁ with שׂוֹרֵשׁ is a man of means and position,—i.e. a poor man who would give willingly, but has nothing, than that man who will not give, and therefore lies, saying that he has nothing; then 22*a* means that the will of a man (cf. תְּאוּמָה, xi. 23) is his doing good (vid. regarding הַסֵּדֵר, at iii. 3), i.e. is its soul and very essence. Euchel, who accordingly translates: the philanthropy of a man consists properly in his goodwill, rightly compares the Rabbinical proverb, וְאֶחָד הַמַּמְעִים וְבִלְבָב, אֶחָד הַמְרַבֵּה וְאֶחָד הַמְמַעֵם, i.e. one may give more or less, it all depends on the intention, the disposition.

Ver. 23 The fear of Jahve tendeth to life;

Satisfied, one spendeth the night, not visited by evil.

The first line is a variation of xiv. 27*a*. How the fear of God thus reacheth to life, i.e. helps to a life that is enduring, free from care and happy, 23*b* says: the promises are fulfilled to the God-fearing, Deut. xi. 15 and Lev. xxvi. 6; he does not go hungry to bed, and needs fear no awakening in terror out of his soft slumber (iii. 24). With וֹ explic., 23*a* is explained. לֵילֵי שָׁבַע means to spend the night (the long night) hungry, as לֵילֵי עָרוֹם, Job xxiv. 7, to pass the night in nakedness (cold). נִבְקָר, of visitation of punishment, we read also at Isa. xxix. 6, and instead of בָּרַע, as it might be according to this passage, we have here the accus. of the manner placing the meaning of the Niph. beyond a doubt (cf. xi. 15, רָע, in an evil manner). All is in harmony with the matter, and is good Heb.; on the contrary, Hitzig's ingenuity introduces, instead of שָׁבַע, an unheard of word, וְשָׂרַע, "and he stretches himself." One of the Greeks excellently translates: καὶ ἐμπλησθεὶς ἀλυσθήσεται ἄνευ ἐπισκοπῆς πονηρᾶς. The LXX., which instead of רָע, γνῶσις, translates thus, רָע, discredits itself. The Midrash—Lagarde says of its translation—varies in colour like an opal. In other words, it handles the text like wax, and forms it according to its own taste, like the Midrash with its "read not so, but so."

Ver. 24 The slothful hath thrust his hand into the dish ;
He bringeth it not again to his mouth.

This proverb is repeated in a different form, xxvi. 15. The figure appears, thus understood, an hyperbole, on which account the LXX. understand by חלץ the bosom or lap, κόλπον; Aquila and Symmachus understand by it the arm-pit, μασχάλην or μάλην; and the Jewish interpreters gloss it by קחי (Kimchi) or קרע החלץ, the slit (Ital. fenditura) of the shirt. But the domestic figure, 2 Kings xxi. 13, places before us a dish which, when it is empty, is wiped and turned upside down;<sup>1</sup> and that the slothful when he eats appears too slothful to bring his hand, e.g. with the rice or the piece of bread he has taken out of the dish, again to his mouth, is true to nature: we say of such a man that he almost sleeps when he eats. The fut. after the perf. here denotes that which is not done after the former thing, i.e. that which is scarcely and only with difficulty done; לו . . . ׀ may have the meaning of "yet not," as at Ps. cxxix. 2; but the sense of "not once" = ne . . . quidem, lies here nearer Deut. xxiii. 3.

Ver. 25 The scorner thou smitest, and the simple is prudent ;

And if one reprove the man of understanding, he gaineth knowledge

Hitzig translates in a way that is syntactically inexact: smite the scorner, so the simple becomes prudent; that would have required at least the word ויערם: fut. and fut. connected by ו is one of many modes of expression for the simultaneous, discussed by me at Hab. iii. 10. The meaning of the proverb has a complete commentary at xxi. 11, where its two parts are otherwise expressed with perfect identity of thought. In regard to the ׀, with whom denunciation and threatening bear no fruit (xiii. 1, xv. 12), and perhaps even produce the contrary effect to that intended (ix. 7), there remains nothing else than to vindicate the injured truths by means of the private justice of corporal punishment. Such words, if spoken to the right man, in the right spirit, at the right time, may affect him with wholesome terrors; but even though he is not made better thereby, yet the simple, who listens to the mockeries of such not without injury, will thereby become prudent (gain הָעֲרִיבִים = עֲרִיבָה, prudence, as at xv. 5), i.e. either arrive at the knowledge that the mockery of religion is wicked, or guard himself against incurring the same repressive measures. In 25*b* הוֹבֵחַ is neither inf. (Umbreit), which after xxi. 11*b* must be וְיִבְהוֹחֶה, nor impr. (Targ., Ewald), which according to rule is הוֹבֵחַ, but the hypothetic perf. (Syr.) with the most general subject (Merc., Hitzig): if one impart instruction to the (dat. obj. as ix. 7, xv. 2) man of understanding (vid. xvi. 21), then he acquires knowledge, i.e. gains an insight into the nature and value of that which one wishes to bring him to the knowledge of (הִבִּין דַּעַת), as xxix. 7; cf. viii. 5). That which the deterring lesson of exemplary punishment approximately effects with the wavering, is, in the case of the man of understanding, perfectly attained by an instructive word.

We have now reached the close of the third chief section of the older Book of Proverbs. All the three sections begin with בֶּן הָאָדָם, x. 1, xiii. 1, xv. 20. The Introduction, i.–ix., dedicates this collection of Solomonic proverbs to youth, and the three beginnings accordingly relate to the relative duties of a son to his father and mother. We are now no longer far from the end, for xxii. 17 resumes the tone of the Introduction. The third principal part would be disproportionately large if it extended from xv. 1 to xxii. 15. But there does not again occur a proverb beginning with the words “son of man.” We can therefore scarcely go wrong if we take xix. 26 as the commencement of a fourth principal part. The Masora divides the whole Mishle into eight sedarim, which exhibit so little knowledge of the true division, that the parashas (sections) x. 1, xxii. 17 do not at all find their right place.<sup>1</sup> The MSS., however, contain evidences that this Hagiograph was also anciently divided into parashas, which were designated partly by spaces between the lines (sethumoth) and partly by breaks in the lines (phethucoth). In Baer's Cod. Jamanensis,<sup>1</sup> after vi. 19, there is the letter ב written on the margin as the mark of such a break. With vi. 20 (vid. l.c.) there indeed commences a new part of the introductory Mashal discourses. But, besides, we only seldom meet with<sup>2</sup> coincidences with the division and grouping which have commended themselves to us. In the MS. of the Græcus Venetus, xix. 11, 16, and 19 have their initial letters coloured red; but why only these verses, is not manifest. A comparison of the series of proverbs distinguished by such initials with the Cod. Jaman. and Cod. II. of the Leipzig City Library, makes it more than probable that it gives a traditional division of the Mishle, which may perhaps yet be discovered by a comparison of MSS.<sup>3</sup> But this much is clear, that a historico-literary reconstruction of the Mishle, and of its several parts, can derive no help from this comparison.

With xix. 26 there thus begins the fourth principal part of the Solomonic collection of proverbs introduced by i.-ix.

He that doeth violence to his father and chaseth his mother,
Is a son that bringeth shame and disgrace.

The right name is given in the second line to him who acts as is described in the first. שָׁרַר means properly to barricade [obstruere], and then in general to do violence to, here: to ruin one both as to life and property. The part., which has the force of an attributive clause, is continued in the finite: qui matrem fugat; this is the rule of the Heb. style, which is not φιλομέτοχος, Gesen. § 134, Anm. 2. Regarding בָּרַשׁ, vid. at x. 5; regarding the placing together of וְהַרְשִׁיר, vid. xiii. 5, where for הַרְשִׁיר, to make shame, to be scandalous, the word הַרְשִׁיר, which is radically different, meaning to bring into bad odour, is used. The putting to shame is in בָּרַשׁ (kindred with Arab.

<sup>2</sup> There are spaces within the lines after i. 7, 9, 33, ii. 22, iii. 18, 35, v. 17, 23, vi. 4, 11, 15, 19 (here a ב), 35, viii. 21, 31, 35, ix. 18, xvii. 25, xviii. 9, xxii. 19, 27, xxiii. 14, xxiv. 22, 33, xxvi. 21, xxviii. 10, 16, xxix. 17, 27, xxx. 6, 9, 14, 17, 20, 23, 28, 33, xxxi. 9.

báth) thought of as disturbatio (cf. σύγχυσις) (cf. at Ps. vi. 11), in חִפּוּר (khfr) as opertio (cf. Cicero's Cluent. 20: infamia et dedecore opertus), not, as I formerly thought, with Fürst, as reddening, blushing (vid. Ps. xxxiv. 6). Putting to shame would in this connection be too weak a meaning for חִפּוּר. The pædagogic stamp which ver. 26 impresses on this fourth principal part is made yet further distinct in the verse that now follows.

Ver. 27 Cease, my son, to hear instruction,
To depart from the words of knowledge.

Oetinger correctly: cease from hearing instruction if thou wilt make no other use of it than to depart, etc., i.e. cease to learn wisdom and afterwards to misuse it. The proverb is, as Ewald says, as "bloody irony;" but it is a dissuasive from hypocrisy, a warning against the self-deception of which Jas. i. 22-24 speaks, against heightening one's own condemnation, which is the case of that servant who knows his lord's will and does it not, Luke xii. 47. חָדַל, in the meaning to leave off doing something further, is more frequently construed with ל seq. infin. than with מִן (cf. e.g. Gen. xi. 8 with 1 Kings xv. 21); but if we mean the omission of a thing which has not yet been begun, then the construction is with ל, Num. ix. 13. Instead of לְשׁוֹנוֹת, there might have been also used מִלְשׁוֹנוֹת (omit rather . . . than . . .), and לְמַעַן שׁוֹנוֹת would be more distinct; but as the proverb is expressed, לְשׁוֹנוֹת is not to be mistaken as the subord. infin. of purpose. The LXX., Syr., Targ., and Jerome do violence to the proverb. Luther, after the example of older interpreters: instruction, that which leads away from prudent learning; but musar always means either discipline weaning from evil, or education leading to good.

Ver. 28 A worthless witness scoffeth at right;
And the mouth of the godless swalloweth up mischief.

The Mosaic law does not know the oath of witnesses; but the adjuring of witnesses to speak the truth, Lev. iv. 1, places a false statement almost in the rank of perjury. The מִשְׁפָּט, which legally and morally binds witnesses, is just their duty to state the matter in accordance with truth, and without deceitful and malicious reservation; but a worthless witness (vid. regarding בְּלִיעַל, vi. 12) despiseth what is right (לִי with accus.-

obj. like xiv. 9), i.e. scornfully disregards this duty. Under 28*b* Hitzig remarks that בָּלַע only in Kal means to devour, but in Piel, on the contrary, to absorb = annihilate; therefore he reads with the LXX. and Syr. דִּין [justice] instead of מִשְׁכָּל [mischief]: the mouth of the wicked murders that which is right, properly, swallows down his feeling of right. But בָּלַע interchanges with בָּלַע in the sense of swallowing only, without the connected idea of annihilation; cf. בִּבְלַע for the continuance [duration] of a gulp = for a moment, Num. iv. 20 with Job vii. 29; and one can thus understand 28*b* without any alteration of the text after Job xv. 16; cf. xx. 12–15, as well as with the text altered after Isa. iii. 12, by no means so that one makes אֵן the subject: mischief swallows up, i.e. destroys, the mouth of the wicked (Rashi); for when “mouth” and “to swallow” stand connected, the mouth is naturally that which swallows, not that which is swallowed (cf. Eccles. x. 12: the mouth of the fool swallows, i.e. destroys, him). Thus 28*b* means that wickedness, i.e. that which is morally perverse, is a delicious morsel for the mouth of the godless, which he eagerly devours; to practise evil is for him, as we say, “ein wahrer Genuss” [a true enjoyment].

Ver. 29 Judgments are prepared for scorners,
And stripes for the backs of fools.

שְׁפָטִים never means punishment which a court of justice inflicts, but is always used of the judgments of God, even although they are inflicted by human instrumentality (vid. 2 Chron. xxiv. 24); the singular, which nowhere occurs, is the segolate n. act. שְׁפָט = שָׁפַט, 2 Chron. xx. 9, plur. שְׁפָטִים. Hitzig's remark: “the judgment may, after ver. 25, consist in stripes,” is misleading; the stroke, הַכּוֹת, there is such as when, e.g., a stroke on the ear is applied to one who despises that which is holy, which, under the circumstances, may be salutary; but it does not fall under the category of shephuthim, nor properly under that of מַהֲלָמוֹת. The former are providential chastisements with which history itself, or God in history, visits the despiser of religion; the latter are strokes which are laid on the backs of fools by one who is instructing them, in order, if possible, to bring them to thought and understanding. נָכוֹן, here inflected as Niph., is used, as Job xv. 23, as meaning to be placed in readiness, and thus to be surely imminent. Regarding mahabūmoth, vid. at xviii. 6.

Chap. xx. 1. This proverb warns against the debauchery with which free-thinking is intimately associated.

Wine is a mocker, mead boisterous ;
And no one who is overtaken thereby is wise.

The article stands with ך. Ewald maintains that in x.-xxii. 6 the article occurs only here and at xxi. 31, and that it is here, as the LXX. shows, not original. Both statements are incorrect. The article is found, e.g., at xix. 6, xviii. 18, 17, and here the personification of "wine" requires it; but that it is wanting to שׁכר shows how little poetry delights in it; it stands once for twice. The effects of wine and mead (שׁכר from שׁכר, to stop, obstruct, become stupid) are attributed to these liquors themselves as their property. Wine is a mocker, because he who is intoxicated with it readily scoffs at that which is holy; mead is boisterous (cf. הוֹמֵיָהּ, vii. 11), because he who is inebriated in his dissolute madness breaks through the limits of morality and propriety. He is unwise who, through wine and the like, i.e. overpowered by it (cf. 2 Sam. xiii. 28), staggers, i.e. he gives himself up to wine to such a degree that he is no longer master of himself. At v. 19 we read, שָׁגָה ק, of the intoxication of love; here, as at Isa. xxviii. 7, of the intoxication of wine, i.e. of the passionate slavish desire of wine or for wine. The word "Erpicht" [avidissimus], i.e. being indissolubly bound to a thing, corresponds at least in some degree to the idea. Fleischer compares the French: être fou de quelque chose. Isa. xxviii. 7, however, shows that one has to think on actual staggering, being overtaken in wine.

Ver. 2 A roaring as of a lion is the terror of the king ;
And he that provoketh him forfeiteth his life.

Line first is a variation of xix. 12. The terror which a king spreads around (רָעַד, gen. subjecti., as, e.g., at Job ix. 34 and generally) is like the growling of a lion which threatens danger. The thought here suggested is that it is dangerous to arouse a lion. Thus מְתַעֲבֵר does not mean: he who is angry at him (Venet.: χολούμενος αὐτῷ), but he who provokes him (LXX., Syr., Targ., Jerome, Luther). הִתְעַבֵּר signifies, as we saw at xiv. 16, to be in a state of excessive displeasure, extreme anger. Here the meaning must be: he who puts him into a state of anger (LXX., ὁ παροξύνων αὐτόν, in other versions with the addition of καὶ ἐπιμιγνύμενος, who conducts himself familiarly towards him = מתערבו). But can mitharvo have this meaning? That the Hithpa. of transitive stems, e.g. הִתְחַנֵּן (1 Kings viii. 59) and הִשְׁתַּפֵּר (Mic. vi. 16), is construed with the accus. of that which any one performs for himself (cf. Ewald's Gramm. Arab. § 180), is not unusual; but can the Hithpa. of the intrans. עבר, which signifies to fall into a passion, "express with the accusative the passion of another excited thereby" (Ewald, § 282a)? There is no evidence for this; and Hitzig's conjecture, מִתְעַבֵּר (Tiphel of the Targ. הִתְעַבֵּר = עָבָרָה), is thus not without occasion. But one might suppose that הִתְעַבֵּר, as the reflexive of a Piel or Hiphil which meant to be put into a state of anger, may mean to draw forth the anger of any one, as in Arab., the viiith form (Hithpa.) of hadr, to be present, with the accus. as reflexive of the ivth form, may mean: sibi aliquid præsens sistere. Not so difficult is הִטָּא with the accus. of that which is missing, vid. viii. 36 and Hab. ii. 10.

Ver. 3 It is an honour to a man to remain far from strife;
But every fool showeth his teeth.

Or better: whoever is a fool quisquis amens, for the emphasis does not lie on this, that every fool, i.e. every single one of this sort, contends to the uttermost; but that whoever is only always a fool finds pleasure in such strife. Regarding הִתְנַלֵּעַ, vid. xvii. 14, xviii. 1. On the contrary, it is an honour to a man to be peaceable, or, as it is here expressed, to remain far from strife. The phrase may be translated: to desist from strife; but in this case the word would be pointed שָׁבַת, which Hitzig prefers; for שָׁבַת from שָׁבַת means, 2 Sam. xxiii. 7, annihilation (the termination of existence); also Ex. xxi. 19, שָׁבַתוֹ does not mean to be keeping holy day; but to be sitting, viz. at home, in a state of incapability for work. Rightly Fleischer: "ישב מן", like Arab. k'ad san, to remain sitting quiet, and thus to hold oneself removed from any kind of activity." He who is prudent, and cares for his honour, not only breaks off strife when it threatens to become passionate, but does not at all enter into it, keeps himself far removed from it.

Ver. 4 At the beginning of the harvest the sluggard plougheth not;
And so when he cometh to the reaping-time there is nothing.

Many translators (Symmachus, Jerome, Luther) and interpreters (e.g. Rashi, Zöckler) explain: propter frigus; but  $\text{קָרָה}$  is, according to its verbal import, not a synonym of  $\text{קָר}$  and  $\text{צִנָּה}$ , but means gathering = the time of gathering (synon.  $\text{הָאָסִיף}$ ), from  $\text{קָרָה}$ , carpere,<sup>1</sup> as harvest, the time of the καρπίζεω, the plucking off of the fruit; but the harvest is the beginning of the old Eastern agricultural year, for in Palestine and Syria the time of ploughing and sowing with the harvest or early rains ( $\text{יִזְרָה} = \text{הָרִיף}$ , Neh. vii. 24; Ezra ii. 18) followed the fruit harvest from October to December. The  $\text{וְ$  is thus not that of cause but of time. Thus rendered, it may mean the beginning of an event and onwards (e.g. 1 Sam. xxx. 25), as well as its termination and onwards (Lev. xxvii. 17): here of the harvest and its ingathering and onwards. In 4*b*, the Chethîb and Kerî vary as at xviii. 17. The fut.  $\text{לֹא־יִשְׁאַל}$  would denote what stands before the sluggard; the perf.  $\text{לֹא־יִשְׁאַל}$  places him in the midst of this, and besides has this in its favour, that, interpreted as perf. hypotheticalum, it makes the absence of an object to  $\text{לֹא־יִשְׁאַל}$  more tenable. The Chethîb,  $\text{לֹא־יִשְׁאַל}$ , is not to be read after Ps. cix. 10: he will beg in harvest—in vain (Jerome, Luther), to which Hitzig well remarks: Why in vain? Amid the joy of harvest people dispense most liberally; and the right time for begging comes later. Hitzig conjecturally arrives at the translation:

Seeketh to borrow in harvest, and nothing cometh of it.”

But leaving out of view the “pannier,” the meaning “to obtain something as a loan,” which  $\text{לֹא־יִשְׁאַל}$  from the connection may bear, is here altogether imaginary. Let one imagine to himself an indolent owner of land, who does not trouble himself about the tilling and sowing of his fields at the right time and with diligence, but leaves this to his people, who do only as much as is commanded them: such an one asks, when now the harvest-time has come, about the ingathering; but he receives the answer, that the land has lain unploughed, because he had not commanded it to be ploughed. When he asks, there is nothing, he asks in vain ( $\text{לֹא־יִשְׁאַל}$ , as at xiv. 6, xiii. 4). Meiri rightly explains  $\text{מִתְחַרֵּךְ}$  by  $\text{זֶמַן הַחֲרִישָׁה}$ , and 4*b* by: “so then, when he asks at harvest time, he will find nothing;” on the other hand, the LXX. and Aram. think on חרף, carpere convictis, as also in Codd. here and there is found the meaningless מִחֲרָף.

Ver. 5 The purpose in the heart of a man is deep water ;
But a man of understanding draweth it out.

“Still waters are deep.” Like such deep waters (xviii. 4) is that which a man hath secretly (Isa. xxix. 15) planned in his heart. He keeps it secret, conceals it carefully, craftily misleads those who seek to draw it out ; but the man of תְּבוּנָה, i.e. one who possesses the right criteria for distinguishing between good and bad, true and false, and at the same time has the capacity to look through men and things, draws out (the Venet. well, ἀνέλξει) the secret עֵצָה, for he penetrates to the bottom of the deep water. Such an one does not deceive himself with men, he knows how to estimate their conduct according to its last underlying motive and aim ; and if the purpose is one that is pernicious to him, he meets it in the process of realization. What is here said is applicable not only to the subtle statesman and the general, but also to the pragmatist historian and the expositor, as, e.g., of a poem such as the book of Job, the idea of which lies like a pearl at the bottom of deep water.

Ver. 6 Almost every one meeteth a man who is gracious to him ;
But a man who standeth the test, who findeth such an one ?

As צִיר אֲמוּנִים, xiii. 17, signifies a messenger in whom there is confidence, and עֵד אֲמוּנִים, xiv. 5, a witness who is altogether truthful, so אִישׁ אֲמוּנִים is a man who remains true to himself, and maintains fidelity toward others. Such an one it is not easy to find ; but patrons who make promises and awaken expectations, finally to leave in the lurch him who depends on them—of such there are many. This contrast would proceed from 6a also, if we took קָרָא in the sense of to call, to call or cry out with ostentation : multi homines sunt quorum suam quisque humanitatem proclamant (Schelling, Fleischer, Ewald, Zöckler, and also, e.g., Meiri). But אִישׁ חֲסִידוֹ is certainly to be interpreted after xi. 17, Isa. lvii. 1. Recognising this, Hitzig translates : many a man one names his dear friend ; but in point of style this would be as unsuitable as possible. Must קָרָא then mean vocat ? A more appropriate parallel word to קָרָא is קָרָה = קָרָה, according to which, with Oetinger, Heidenheim, Euchel, and Löwenstein, we explain : the greater part of men meet one who shows himself to them (to this or that man) as אִישׁ חָסֵד, a man well-affectioned and benevolent; but it is rare to find one who in his affection and its fruits proves himself to be true, and actually performs that which was hoped for from him. Luther translates, with the Syr. and Targ. after Jerome: Viel Menschen werden From gerhümbt [many men are reputed pious]; but if יִקְרָא were equivalent to יִקְרָא, then אִישׁ חָסֵד ought to have been used instead of חָסֵד. The LXX. read רַב אֲדָמָה יִקְרָא אִישׁ חָסֵד, man is something great, and a compassionate man is something precious; but it costs trouble to find out a true man. The fundamental thought remains almost the same in all these interpretations and readings: love is plentiful; fidelity, rare; therefore חָסֵד, of the right kind, after the image of God, is joined to אֱמֶת.

Ver. 7 He who in his innocence walketh as one upright, Blessed are his children after him!

We may not take the first line as a separate clause with צַדִּיק, as subject (Van Dyk, Elster) or predicate (Targ.); for, thus rendered, it does not appropriately fall in as parallel to the second line, because containing nothing of promise, and the second line would then strike in at least not so unconnectedly (cf. on the contrary, x. 9, xiv. 25). We have before us a substantial clause, of which the first line is the complex subject. But Jerome, the Venet., and Luther erroneously: the just man walking in his innocence; this placing first of the adj. is in opposition to the Hebr. syntax. We must, if the whole is to be interpreted as nom., regard צַדִּיק as permutative: one walking in his innocence, a righteous one. But, without doubt, tsedek is the accus. of the manner; in the manner of one righteous, or in apposition: as one righteous; cf. Job xxxi. 26 with Mic. ii. 7. Thus Hitzig rightly also refers to these two passages, and Ewald also refers to xxii. 11, xxiv. 15. To walk in his innocence as a righteous man, is equivalent to always to do that which is right, without laying claim to any distinction or making any boast on that account; for thereby one only follows the impulse and the direction of his heart, which shows itself and can show itself not otherwise than in unreserved devotion to God and to that which is good. The children after him are not the children after his death (Gen. xxiv. 67); but, according to Dent. iv. 40, cf. Job xxi. 21, those who follow his example, and thus those who come after him; for already in the lifetime of such an one, the benediction begins to have its fulfilment in his children.

The following group begins with a royal proverb, which expresses what a king does with his eyes. Two proverbs, of the seeing eye and the necessary opening of the eyes, close it.

Ver. 8 A king sitting on the seat of justice,
Scattereth asunder all evil with his eyes.

Excellently the Venet. ἐπὶ θρόνου δίκης, for יִן בְּפִאֲרִין is the name of the seat of rectitude (the tribunal), as the "throne of grace," Heb. iv. 17, is the name of the capporeth as the seat of mercy; the seat of the judge is merely called כִּסֵּא; on the other hand, יִן כִּסֵּאֲדִין is the contrast of בְּפִאֲרִין הַיּוֹם, Ps. xciv. 20: the seat from which the decision that is in conformity with what is right (cf., e.g., Jer. v. 28) goes forth, and where it is sought. As little here as at ver. 26 is there need for a characterizing adj. to melek; but the LXX. hits the meaning for it, understands such to רִן: ὅταν βασιλεὺς δίκαιος καθίσῃ ἐπὶ θρόνου. By the "eyes" are we then to understand those of the mind: he sifts, dignoscit, with the eyes of the mind all that is evil, i.e. distinguishes it subjectively from that which is not evil? Thus Hitzig by a comparison of Ps. xi. 4, cxxxix. 3 (where Jerome has eventilasti, the Vulg. investigasti). Scarcely correctly, for it lies nearer to think on the eyes in the king's head (vid. xvi. 15); in that case: to winnow (to sift) means to separate the good and the bad, but first mediately: to exclude the bad; finally, ver. 26 leads to the conclusion that מְזַרְהוּ is to be understood, not of a subjective, but of an actual scattering, or separating, or driving away. Thus the penetrating, fear-inspiring eyes of the king are meant, as Immanuel explains: בראייה עיניו מבריהם מפניו. ומפור אותם בכל פִּיֵּא. But in this explanation the personal rendering of פְּלִרְעָה is incorrect; for mezareh, meant of the driving asunder of persons, requires as its object a plur. (cf. 26a). Col-ra is understood as neut. like v. 14. Before the look of a king to whom it belongs to execute righteousness and justice (Isa. xvi. 5), nothing evil stands; criminal acts and devices seen through, and so also judged by these eyes, are broken up and scattered to all the winds, along with the danger that thereby threatened the community. It is the command: "put away the evil" (Deut. xiii. 6 [5]), which the king carries into effect by the powerful influence of his look. With col-ra there is connected the thought that in the presence of the heavenly King no one is wholly free from sin.

Ver. 9 Who can say I have made my heart clean,
I am pure from my sins?

It is the same thought that Solomon expresses in his prayer at the consecration of the temple, 1 Kings viii. 46: there is no man who sinneth not. To cleanse his heart (as Ps. lxxiii. 13), is equivalent to to empty it, by self-examination and earnest effort after holiness, of all impure motives and inclinations; vid. regarding זכה, to be piercing, shining brightly, cloudlessly pure, Fleischer in Levy's Chald. Wörterbuch, i. 424. The consequence of זכות is, becoming pure; and the consequence of זכות לב, i.e. of the purifying of the heart, the being pure from sinful conduct: I have become pure from my sins, i.e. from such as I might fall into by not resisting temptations; the suffix is not understood as actual, but as potential, like Ps. xviii. 24. No one can boast of this, for man's knowledge of himself and of his sins remains always limited (Jer. xvii. 9 f.; Ps. xix. 13); and sin is so deeply rooted in his nature (Job xiv. 4, xv. 14-16), that the remains of a sinful tendency always still conceal themselves in the folds of his heart, sinful thoughts still cross his soul, sinful inclinations still sometimes by their natural force overcome the moral resistance that opposes them, and stains of all kinds still defile even his best actions.

Ver. 10. This proverb passes sentence of condemnation against gross sins in action and life.

Diverse stones, diverse measures—

An abomination to Jahve are they both.

The stones are, as at xi. 1, xvi. 11, those used as weights. Stone and stone, ephah and ephah, means that they are of diverse kinds, one large and one small (the LXX., in which the sequence of the proverbs from ver. 10 is different, has μέγα καὶ μικρόν), so that one may be able deceitfully to substitute the one for the other. אִיפָה (from אָפָה, to bake) may originally have been used to designate such a quantity of meal as supplied a family of moderate wants; it corresponds to the bath (Ezek.

xlv. 11) as a measure for fluids, and stands here synecdochically instead of all the measures, including, e.g., the cor, of which the ephah was a tenth part, and the seah, which was a third part of it. 10*b* = xvii. 5, an echo of Lev. xix. 36; Deut. xxv. 13-16. Just and equal measure is the demand of a holy God; the contrary is to Him an abhorrence.

Ver. 11 Even a child maketh himself known by his conduct,
Whether his disposition be pure and whether it be right.

If מְעַלְלֵי may be here understood after the use of עוֹלֵל, to play, to pass the time with anything, then נֶאֱמָר refers thereto: even by his play (Ewald). But granting that מְעוֹלֵל [children], synon. with נֶעֱר, had occasioned the choice of the word מְעַלְלֵי (vid. Fleischer on Isa. iii. 4), yet this word never means anything else than work, an undertaking of something, and accomplishing it; wherefore Böttcher proposes מְעַלְלֵיִי, for מְעַלְלֵי may have meant play, in contradistinction to מְעַלְלֵי. This is possible, but conjectural. Thus gam is not taken along with v'amalalav. That the child also makes himself known by his actions, is an awkward thought; for if in anything else, in these he must show what one has to expect from him. Thus gam is after the syntactical method spoken of at xvii. 26, xix. 2, to be referred to נֶעֱר (also the child, even the child), although in this order it is referred to the whole clause. The verb נָרָא is, from its fundamental thought, to perceive, observe from an ἐναντιόσημον: to know, and to know as strange, to disown (vid. under Isa. iii. 9); the Hithpa. elsewhere signifies, like (Arab.) tankkar, to make oneself unknowable, but here to make oneself knowable; Symmachus, ἐπιγνωρισθήσεται, Venet. γνωσθήσεται. Or does the proverb mean: even the child dissembles in his actions (Oetinger)? Certainly not, for that would be a statement which, thus generally made, is not justified by experience. We must then interpret 11*b* as a direct question, though it has the form of an indirect one: he gives himself to be known, viz. whether his disposition be pure and right. That one may recognise his actions in the conduct of any one, is a platitude; also that one may recognise his conduct in these, is not much better. מְעַל is therefore referred by Hitzig to God as the Creator, and he interprets it in the sense of the Arab. khulk, being created = natura. We also in this way explain יִצְרָנִי, P's.

ciii. 14, as referable to God the יֵצֵר; and that poal occurs, e.g. Isa. i. 31, not merely in the sense of action, but also in that of performance or structure, is favourable to this interpretation. But one would think that poal, if thus used in the sense of the nature of man, would have more frequently occurred. It everywhere else means action or work. And thus it is perhaps also here used to denote action, but regarded as habitual conduct, and according to the root-meaning, moral disposition. The N. T. word ἔργον approaches this idea in such passages as Gal. vi. 4. It is less probable that 11b is understood with reference to the future (Luther and others); for in that case one does not see why the poet did not make use of the more intelligible phrase אַם זך ויִשֵּׁר יִהְיֶה פִעְלִי. It is like our (Germ.) proverb: Was ein Haken werden will krümmt sich bald [what means to become a hook bends itself early]; or: Was ein Dörnchen werden will spitzt sich bei Zeiten<sup>1</sup> [what means to become a thorn sharpens itself early], and to the Aram. בּוֹצִין בּוֹצִין מִקִּטְפִּיהַ יֵרִיעַ = that which will become a gourd shows itself in the bud, Berachoth 48a.

Ver. 12 The hearing ear and the seeing eye—
Jahve hath created them both.

Löwenstein, like the LXX.: the ear hears and the eye sees— it is enough to refer to the contrary to ver. 10 and xvii. 15. In itself the proverb affirms a fact, and that is its sensus simplex; but besides, this fact may be seen from many points of view, and it has many consequences, none of which is to be rejected as contrary to the meaning: (1.) It lies nearest to draw the conclusion, viâ eminentiæ, which is drawn in Ps. xciv. 9. God is thus the All-hearing and the All-seeing, from which, on the one side, the consolation arises that everything that is seen stands under His protection and government, xv. 3; and on the other side, the warning, Aboth ii. 1: "Know what is above thee; a Seeing eye and a Hearing ear, and all thy conduct is marked in His book." (2.) With this also is connected the sense arising out of the combination in Ps. xl. 7: man ought then to use the ear and the eye in conformity with the design which they are intended to subserve, according to the purpose of the Creator (Hitzig compares xvi. 4); it is not first applicable to man with reference to the natural, but to the moral life: he shall not make himself deaf and blind to that which it is his duty to hear and to see; but he ought also not to hear and to see with pleasure that from which he should turn away (Isa. xxxiii. 15),—in all his hearing and seeing he is responsible to the Creator of the ear and the eye. (3.) One may thus interpret “hearing” and “seeing” as commendable properties, as Fleischer suggests from comparison of xvi. 11: an ear that truly hears (the word of God and the lessons of Wisdom) and an eye that truly sees (the works of God) are a gift of the Creator, and are (Arab.) lillihi, are to be held as high and precious. Thus the proverb, like a polished gem, may be turned now in one direction and now in another; it is to be regarded as a many-sided fact.

Ver. 13 Love not sleep, lest thou become poor;
Open thine eyes, and have enough to eat.

What is comprehended in the first line here is presented in detail in vi. 9–11. The fut. Niph. of רָשׁ, to become poor (cf. x. 4), is formed metaplastically from יָרַשׁ, xxiii. 21, xxx. 9, as at 1 Sam. ii. 7; Hitzig compares (Arab.) ryth, which, however, means to loiter or delay, not to come back or down. The R. שׂ signifies either to be slack without support (cf. רָלַ), or to desire (cf. אֲבִיּוֹן, Arab. fkyr, properly hiscens, R. פָּקַ, as in פָּקַח, to open widely, which here follows). Regarding the second imper. 13*b*, vid. iii. 4: it has the force of a consequence, Las deine augen wacker sein, So wirstu brots gnug haben (Luth.) [Let thine eyes be open, so shalt thou have bread enough]. With these two proverbs of the eyes, the group beginning with ver. 8 rounds itself off.

The following group has its natural limit at the new point of departure at ver. 20, and is internally connected in a diversity of ways.

Ver. 14 “Bad, bad!” saith the buyer;
And going his way, he boasteth then.

Luther otherwise:

“Bad, bad!” saith one if he hath it;
But when it is gone, then he boasteth of it.

This rendering has many supporters. Geier cites the words of the Latin poet :

“Omne bonum præsens minus est, sperata videntur Magna.”

Schultens quotes the proverbs τὸ παρὸν βαρὺ and Præsentia laudato, for with Luther he refers לו ואול to the present possession (אול, as 1 Sam. ix. 7 = (Arab.) zâl, to cease, to be lost), and translates: at dilapsum sibi, tum demum pro splendido celebrat. But by this the Hithpa. does not receive its full meaning; and to extract from הִתְקַנָּה the idea to which לו ואול refers, if not unnecessary, is certainly worthless. Hakkoneh may also certainly mean the possessor, but the possessor by acquisition (LXX. and the Venet. ὁ κτώμενος); for the most part it signifies the possessor by purchase, the buyer (Jerome, emptor), as correlate of כֹּנֵן, Isa. xxiv. 2; Ezek. iv. 12. It is customary for the buyer to undervalue that which he seeks to purchase, so as to obtain it as cheaply as possible; afterwards he boasts that he has bought that which is good, and yet so cheap. That is an every-day experience; but the proverb indirectly warns against conventional lying, and shows that one should not be startled and deceived thereby. The subject to לו ואול is thus the buyer; אול with לו denotes, more definitely even than לו והלך, going from thence, s'en aller. Syntactically, the punctuation לו ואול [and he takes himself off] (perf. hypoth., Ewald, 357a) would have been near (Jerome: et cum recesserit); but yet it is not necessary, with Hitzig, thus to correct it. The poet means to say: making himself off, he then boasts. We cannot in German place the “alsdann” [then] as the אָ here, and as also, e.g. at 1 Sam. xx. 12; but Theodotion, in good Greek: καὶ πορευθεὶς τότε καυχήσεται. We may write לו ואול with Mercha on the antepenult, on which the accent is thrown back, cf. הִוֵּן, xix. 17, but not לו; for the rule for Dagesh does not here, with the retrogression of the tone, come into application, as, e.g., in אוֹבֵל לְחַמִּי, Ps. xli. 10. Singularly the Syr. and Targ. do not read רַע רַע, but לְרַע, and couple ver. 15 with 14. In the LXX., vers. 14–19 are wanting.

Ver. 15 There is indeed gold, and many pearls;

But a precious treasure are lips full of knowledge.

In order to find a connection between this proverb and that which precedes, we need only be reminded of the parable of the merchantman who sought goodly pearls, Matt. xiii. 45 f. The proverb rises to a climax: there is gold, and there are pearls in abundance, the one of which has always a higher value than the other; but intelligent lips are above all such jewels—they are a precious treasure, which gold and all pearls cannot equal. In a similar manner the N. T. places the one pearl above the many goodly pearls. So might רעת (chokma) be called the pearl above all pearls (iii. 15, viii. 11); but the lips as the organ of knowledge are fittingly compared with a precious vessel, a vessel of more precious substance than gold and pearls are.

Ver. 16 Take from him the garment, for he hath become surety for another;

And for strangers take him as a pledge.

The same proverb xxvii. 13, where קח, with the usual aphæresis, here interchanges with it the fuller form לקח, which is also found at Ezek. xxxvii. 16. To this imperative חבלהו is parallel: take him as a pledge (Theodotion, Jerome, the Venet. and Luther); it is not a substantive: his pledge (Targ.), which would require the word חבלתו (חבלו); nor is it to be read with the Syr. חבלהו, one pledges him; but it is imperative, not however of the Piel, which would be חבלהו, and would mean “destroy him;” but, as Aben Ezra rightly, the imperative of Kal of חבל, to take as a pledge, Ex. xxii. 25, for חבלהו without any example indeed except חנגני, Ps. ix. 14; cf. lxxx. 16. The first line is clear: take his garment, for he has become good for another (cf. xi. 15), who has left him in the lurch, so that he must now become wise by experience. The second line also is intelligible if we read, according to the Chethib, נברים (Jerome, the Venet.), not נברים, as Schultens incorrectly points it, and if we interpret this plur. like בנים, Gen. xxi. 7, with Hitzig following Luther, as plur. of the category: take him as a pledge, hold fast by his person, so as not to suffer injury from strange people for whom he has become surety. But the Kerî requires נבריה (according to which Theodotion and the Syr., and, more distinctly still than these, the Targ. translates), and thus, indeed, it stands written, xxvii. 13, without the Kerî, thus Bathra 173b reads and writes also here. Either נבריה is a strange woman, a prostitute, a maitresse for whom the unwise has made himself surety, or it is neut. for aliena res (LXX. xxvii. 13, τὰ ἀλλότρια), a matter not properly belonging to this unwise person. We regard נכרים in this passage as original. בער coincides with vi. 26: it does not mean ἀντί, but ὑπέρ; “for strange people” is here equivalent to for the sake of, on account of strange people (χάριν τῶν ἀλλοτρίων, as the Venet. translates it).

Ver. 17 Sweet to a man is the bread of deceit;

Yet at last his mouth is full of gravel.

“Bread of deceit” is not deceit itself, as that after which the desire of a man goes forth, and that for which he has a relish (thus, e.g., Immanuel and Hitzig); but that which is not gained by labour, and is not merited. Possession (vid. iv. 17) or enjoyment (ix. 17) obtained by deceit is thus called, as לֶחֶם בְּרִימִים, xxiii. 3, denotes bread; but for him who has a relish for it, it is connected with deceit. Such bread of lies is sweet to a man, because it has come to him without effort, but in the end not only will he have nothing to eat, but his tongue, teeth, and mouth will be injured by small stones; i.e. in the end he will have nothing, and there will remain to him only evil (Fleischer). Or: it changes itself (Job xx. 14) at last into gravel, of which his mouth is filled full, as we might say, “it lies at last in his stomach like lead.” גָּרֵץ is the Arab. hatny, gravel (Hitzig, grien = gries, coarse sand, grit), R. גַּרְץ, scindere. Similarly in Arab. hajar, a stone, is used as the image of disappointed expectations, e.g. the adulterer finds a stone, i.e. experiences disappointment.

Ver. 18 Plans are established by counsel,

And with prudent government make war.

From the conception of a thought, practically influencing the formation of our own life and the life of the community, to its accomplishment there is always a long way which does not lead to the end unless one goes forward with counsel and strength combined, and considers all means and eventualities. The Niph. of נָשָׂא means, in a passive sense: to be accomplished or realized (Ps. cxli. 2). The clause 18a is true for times of war as well as for times of peace; war is disastrous, unless it is directed with strategic skill (vid. regarding מִלְחָמָה, i. 5). Grotius compares the proverb, Γνώμαι πλέον κρατούσω ἢ σθένος χειρῶν. In xxiv. 6, the necessity of counsel is also referred to the case of war. Ewald would read [the infin.] נִשְׂא, or שׁוּׁ: with management it is that one carries on war. But why? Because to him the challenge to carry on war appears to be contrary to the spirit of proverbial poetry. But the author of the proverb does certainly mean: if thou hast to carry on war, carry it on with the skill of a general; and the imper. is protected by xxiv. 6 against that infin., which is, besides, stylistically incongruous.

Ver. 19 He that goeth out gossiping revealeth a secret;
And with the babbler have nothing to do.

Luther otherwise (like Hitzig)—

Be not complicated with him who revealeth a secret,
And with the slanderer, and with the false (better: loquacious) mouth, so that שׁוּ and the warning apply to the threefold description, a rendering which Kimchi also, and Immanuel, and others at least suggest. But in connection with xi. 13, the first line has the force of a judicium, which includes the warning to entrust nothing to a babbler which ought to be kept silent. Write שׁוּׁ, as found in Codd. and old Edd., with Munach on the penultima, on which the tone is thrown back, and Dagesh to ם, after the rule of the קחיק (Gesen. § 20, 2a), altogether like שׁוּׁ, xv. 32. 19b the Venet. translates after the first meaning of the word by Kimchi, τῷ ἀπαταιῶνι τοῖς χεῖλεσι, to him who slanders and befools, for it thus improves Theodotion's τῷ ἀπατῶντι τὰ χεῖλη αὐτοῦ. But שׁוּׁ means, Job v. 2, —cf. Hos. vii. 11, —not him who befools another, but him who is befooled, is slandered, by another (Aben Ezra: שיפתוהו אחרים), with which שׁוּׁ here does not agree. But now he who is easily befooled is called שׁוּׁ, as being open to influence (susceptible), patens; and if this particip. is used, as here, transitively, and, on account of the object שׁוּׁ standing near cannot possibly be equivalent to שׁוּׁ, the usage of the language also just noticed is against it, then it means patefaciens or dilatans (cf. שׁוּׁ, Gen. ix. 27, Targ. אִשְׁתִּי = הַרְהִיב), and places itself as synon. to שׁוּׁ, xiii. 3; thus one is called who does not close his mouth, who cannot hold his mouth, who always idly babbles, and is therefore, because he can keep nothing to himself, a dangerous companion. The Complut. rightly translates: μετὰ πλατύνοντος τὰ ἑαυτοῦ μὴ μίχθητι χεῖλη.

The following group begins, for once more the aim of this older Book of Proverbs becomes prominent, with an inculcation of the fourth<sup>1</sup> commandment.

Ver. 20 He that curseth his father and his mother,
His light is extinguished in midnight darkness.

The divine law, Ex. xxi. 17, Lev. xx. 9, condemns such an one to death. But the proverb does not mean this sentence against the criminal, which may only seldom be carried into execution, but the fearful end which, because of the righteousness of God ruling in history, terminates the life of such an unnatural son (xxx. 17). Of the godless, it has already been said that their light is extinguished, xiii. 9, there is suddenly an end to all that brightened, i.e. made happy and embellished their life; but he who acts wickedly (קָלֵל, R. קל, levem esse, synon. הִקְלִיף, Deut. xxvii. 16), even to the cursing of his father and mother, will see himself surrounded by midnight darkness (Symmachus, σκοτομήνη, moonless night), not: he will see himself in the greatest need, forsaken by divine protection (Fleischer), for Jansen rightly: Lux et lucerna in scripturis et vitæ claritatem et posteritatem et prosperitatem significat. The apple of the eye, אֵינָא, of darkness (vid. vii. 9), is that which forms the centre or centralization of darkness. The Syr. renders it correctly by bobtho, pupil [of the eye], but the Targ. retains the אֵינָא of the Keri, and renders it in Aram. by אֵינָא, which Rashi regards as an infin., Parchon as a particip. after the form אֵינָא; but it may be also an infin. substantive after the form אֵינָא, and is certainly nothing else than the abbreviated and vocally obscured אֵינָא. For the Talm. אֵינָא, to be hard, furnishes no suitable idea; and the same holds true of אֵינָא, times, Lev. xv. 25 of the Jerusalem Targ.; while the same abbreviation and the same passing over of o into u represents this as the inflected אֵינָא (= עָת). There is also no evidence for a verb אֵינָא, to be black, dark; the author of Aruch interprets אֵינָא, Bereschith Rabba, c. 33, with reference to the passage before us, of a dark bathing apartment, but only tentatively, and אֵינָא is there quoted as the Targ. of אֵל, Gen. xix. 8, which the text lying before us does not ratify. Ishon means the little man (in the eye), and neither the blackness

Ver. 21 An inheritance which in the beginning is obtained in haste,
Its end will not be blessed.

The partic. מְבֹהֵל may, after Zech. xi. 8, cf. Syr. ܘܒܗܠܐ, nauseans, mean "detested," but that affords here no sense; rather it might be interpreted after the Arab. bajila, to be avaricious, "gotten by avarice, niggardliness," with which, however, neither מְבֹהֵל, inheritance, nor, since avarice is a chronic disease, בְּרֵאשׁוֹנָה agrees. On the contrary, the Kerî מְבֹהֵלָה [hastened] perfectly agrees, both linguistically (vid. xxviii. 22; cf. xiii. 11) and actually; for, as Hitzig remarks, the words following ver. 20 fully harmonize with the idea of an inheritance, into the possession of which one is put before it is rightly due to him; for a son such as that, the parents may live too long, and so he violently deprives them of the possession (cf. xix. 26); but on such a possession there rests no blessing. Since the Piel may mean to hasten, Esth. ii. 9, so מְבֹהֵל may mean hastened = speedy, Esth. viii. 14, as well as made in haste. All the old interpreters adopt the Kerî; the Aram. render it well by מְסִרְהָבָה, from מְסִרְהָב, overturned; and Luther, like Jerome, hæreditas ad quam festinator.

Ver. 22 Say not: I will avenge the evil;
Hope in Jahve, so will He help thee.

Men ought always to act toward their neighbours according to the law of love, and not according to the jus talionis, xxiv. 29; they ought not only, by requiting good with evil (xvi. 13; Ps. vii. 5a, xxxv. 12), not to transgress this law of requital, but they ought to surpass it, by also recompensing not evil with evil (vid. regarding שָׁלֵם, and synon. to xvii. 13); and that is what the proverb means, for 22b supposes injustice suffered, which might stir up a spirit of revenge. It does not, however, say that men ought to commit the taking of vengeance to God; but, in the sense of Rom. xii. 17-19, 1 Pet. iii. 9, that, renouncing all dependence on self, they ought to commit their deliverance out of the distress into which they have fallen, and their vindication, into the hands of God; for the promise is not that He will avenge them, but that

He will help them. The jussive וישע (write וישע, according to Metheg-setzung, § 42, with Gaja as העטרדו, with the y to secure distinct utterance to the final guttural) states as a consequence, like, e.g., 2 Kings v. 10, what will then happen (Jerome, Luther, Hitzig) if one lets God rule (Ges. § 128, 2c); equally possible, syntactically, is the rendering: that He may help thee (LXX., Ewald); but, regarded as a promise, the words are more in accordance with the spirit of the proverb, and they round it off more expressively.

Ver. 23 An abomination to Jahve are two kinds of weights;
And deceitful balances are not good.

A variant to ver. 10, xi. 1. The pred. לא טוב (xvii. 26, xviii. 5, xix. 3) is conceived of as neut.; they are not good, much rather bad and pernicious, for the deceiver succeeds only in appearance; in reality he fails.

Ver. 24 The steps of a man depend on Jahve;
And a man—how can he understand his way?

Line first is from Ps. xxxvii. 23, but there, where the clause has the verbal predicate בִּינֵנִי, the meaning is that it is the gracious assistance of God, by virtue of which a man takes certain steps with his feet, while here we have before us a variation of the proverb "der Mensch denkt, Gott lenkt" [= man proposes, God disposes], xvi. 9, Jer. x. 23; for הַיְיָ, as at 2 Sam. iii. 37, Ps. cxviii. 23, denotes God in general as conditioning, as the ultimate cause. Man is indeed free to turn himself hither or thither, to decide on this course of conduct or on that, and is therefore responsible for it; but the relations co-operating in all his steps as the possible and defining conditions are God's contrivance and guidance, and the consequences which are connected with his steps and flow therefrom, lie beyond the power of man,—every one of his steps is a link of a chain, neither the beginning nor the end of which he can see; while, on the other hand, God's knowledge comprehends the beginning, middle, and end, and the wisdom of God ruling in the sphere of history, makes all human activity, the free action of man, subservient to his world-plan. The question, which has a negative answer, is applicable to man: what, i.e. how shall he understand his way? מה is like, e.g., Ex. x. 26, Job ix. 2, xix. 28, accus., and fluctuates between the functions of a governed accusative: What does he understand . . . (Job xi. 8) and an adv.: how, i.e. how so little, how even not, for it is the מ of the negative question which has become in (Arab.) mā a word of negation. The way of a man is his life's-course. This he understands in the present life only relatively, the true unravelling of it remains for the future.

Ver. 25 It is a snare to a man to cry out hastily "holy;"

And first after vows to investigate.

Two other interpretations of the first line have been proposed. The snare of a man devours, i.e. destroys the holy; but then מִן מוֹקֵשׁ must be an expression of an action, instead of an expression of an endurance, which is impossible. The same is true against the explanation: the snare of a man devours, i.e. consumes, eats up the holy, which as such is withdrawn from common use. Jerome with his devotare sanctos, and Luther with his das Heilige lestern [to calumniate the holy], give to לִיַע = בָּלַע a meaning which loses itself in the arbitrary. Accordingly, nothing is to be done with the meaning καταπιέται (Aquila, the Venet.). But לִיַע will be the abbreviated fut. of לִיַע (from יִלַע), or לַעַל (יִלַע), Job vi. 3 = (Arab.) laghá temere loqui (proloqui); and שִׁבַּח (after Hitzig: consecration, which is contrary to usage) is like κορβάν, Mark vii. 11, the exclamation to which one suddenly gives utterance, thereby meaning that this or that among his possessions henceforth no longer belongs to him, but is consecrated to God, and thus ought to be delivered up to the temple. Such a sudden vow and halting deference to the oath that has been uttered is a snare to a man, for he comes to know that he has injured himself by the alienation of his property, which he has vowed beyond that which was due from him, or that the fulfilling of his vow is connected with difficulties, and perhaps also to others, with regard to whom its disposal was not permitted to him, is of evil consequences, or it may be he is overcome by repentance and is constrained to break his oath. The LXX. hits the true meaning of the proverb with rare success: Παγίς ἀνδρὶ ταχύ τι τῶν ἰδίων ἀγιασάσαι, μετὰ δὲ τὸ εὐξασθαι μετανοεῖν γίνεται. יְרִיִם is plur. of the category (cf. 16b Chethib), and בִּקֵּר, as 2 Kings xvi. 15, Arab. bakr, examinare, inquirere, means to subject to investigation, viz. whether he ought to observe, and might observe, a vow such as this, or whether he might not and ought not rather to renounce it (Fleischer). Viewed syntactically, 25a is so difficult, that Bertheau, with Hitzig, punctuates  $\text{יֵלֵךְ}$ ; but this substantive must be formed from a verb  $\text{יָלַץ}$  (cf. Hab. iii. 13), and this would mean, after (Arab.) wala', "to long eagerly for," which is not suitable here. The punctuation shows  $\text{יֵלֵךְ}$  as the 3d. fut. What interpreters here say of the doubled accent of the word arises from ignorance: the correct punctuation is  $\text{יֵלֵךְ}$ , with Gaja to  $\text{ע}$ , to give the final guttural more force in utterance. The poet appears to place in the foreground: "a snare for a man," as a rubrum; and then continuing the description, he cries out suddenly "holy!" and after the vow, he proceeds to deliberate upon it. Fleischer rightly: post vota inquisiturus est (in ea) = יְהִי־הָ לְבַבְךָ; vid. at Hab. i. 17, which passage Hitzig also compares as syntactically very closely related.

Ver. 26 A wise king winnoweth the godless,
And bringeth over them the wheel.

A variant to xx. 8, but here with the following out of the figure of the winnowing. For  $\text{אֹפֶן}$  with  $\text{מִזְרָה}$  is, without doubt, the wheel of the threshing-cart,  $\text{עֲגֵלָה}$ , Isa. xxviii. 27 f.; and thus with  $\text{מִזְרָה}$ , the winnowing fork,  $\text{מִזְרָה}$  is to be thought of; vid. a description of them along with that of the winnowing shovel,  $\text{רֶחֶת}$ , in Wetzstein's Excursus to Isa., p. 707 ff. We are not to think of the punishment of the wheel, which occurs only as a terrible custom of war (e.g. Amos i. 3). It is only meant that a wise king, by sharp and vigorous procedure, separates the godless, and immediately visits them with merited punishment, as he who works with the winnowing shovel gives the chaff to the wind. Most ancient interpreters think on  $\text{אֹפֶן}$  (from  $\text{אָפַן}$ , vertere) in its metaphorical meaning: τρόπος (thus also Löwenstein, he deals with them according to merit), or the wheel of fortune, with reference to the constellations; thus, misfortune (Immanuel, Meiri). Arama, Oetinger, and others are, however, on the right track.

With a proverb of a light that was extinguished, ver. 20 began the group; the proverb of God's light, which here follows, we take as the beginning of a new group.

Ver. 27 A candle of Jahve is the soul of man,
Searching through all the chambers of the heart.

If the O. T. language has a separate word to denote the self-conscious personal human spirit in contradistinction to the spirit of a beast, this word, according to the usage of the language, as Reuchlin, in an appendix to Aben Ezra, remarks, is נְשָׁמָה; it is so called as the principle of life breathed immediately by God into the body (vid. at Gen. ii. 7, vii. 22). Indeed, that which is here said of the human spirit would not be said of the spirit of a beast: it is "the mystery of self-consciousness which is here figuratively represented" (Elster). The proverb intentionally does not use the word נְפֶשׁ, for this is not the power of self-consciousness in man, but the medium of bodily life; it is related secondarily to נְשָׁמָה (רוח), while נְשָׁמָה חיים (רוח) is used, נֶפֶשׁ חיים is an expression unheard of. Hitzig is in error when he understands by נְשָׁמָה here the soul in contradistinction to the spirit, and in support of this appeals to an expression in the Cosmography of Kazwini: "the soul (Arab. âl-nefs) is like the lamp which moves about in the chambers of the house;" here also en-nefs is the self-conscious spirit, for the Arab. and post-bibl. Heb. terminology influenced by philosophy reverses the biblical usage, and calls the rational soul נֶפֶשׁ, and, on the contrary, the animal soul נְשָׁמָה, רוח (Psychologie, p. 154). הַיֵּשׁ is the particip. of הִישָׁה, Zeph. i. 12, without distinguishing the Kal and Piel. Regarding הַרְרִיבֹתָן, LXX. ταμεία κοιλίας, vid. at xviii. 8: בָּטָן denotes the inner part of the body (R. בָּט, to be deepened), and generally of the personality; cf. Arab. bâtn âl-rwh, the interior of the spirit, and xxii. 18, according to which Fleischer explains: "A candle of Jahve, i.e. a means bestowed on man by God Himself to search out the secrets deeply hid in the spirit of another." But the candle which God has kindled in man has as the nearest sphere of illumination, which goes forth from it, the condition of the man himself—the spirit comprehends all that belongs to the nature of man in the unity of self-consciousness, but yet more: it makes it the object of reflection; it penetrates, searching it through, and seeks to take it up into its knowledge, and recognises the problem proposed to it, to rule it by its power. The proverb is thus to be ethically understood: the spirit is that which penetrates that which is within, even into its many secret corners and folds, with its self-testing and self-knowing light —it is, after Matt. vi. 22, the inner light, the inner eye. Man becomes known to himself according to his moral as well as his natural condition in the light of the spirit; “for what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him?” says Paul, 1 Cor. ii. 11. With reference to this Solomonic proverb, the seven-branched candlestick is an ancient symbol of the soul, e.g. on the Jewish sepulchral monuments of the Roman viâ Portuensis. Our texts present the phrase  $\text{נֵר יְהוָה}$ ; but the Talm. Pesachim 7b, 8a, the Pesikta in part 8, the Midrash Othijoth de-Rabbi Akiba, under the letter נ, Alphasi (ר"ף) in Pesachim, and others, read  $\text{נֵר אֱלֹהִים}$ ; and after this phrase the Targum translates, while the Syr. and the other old versions render by the word “Lord” (Venet.  $\delta\nu\tau\omega\tau\eta\varsigma$ ), and thus had יהוה before them.

Ver. 28 Love and truth guard the king;
And he supports his throne by love.

We have not in the German [nor in the Eng.] language a couple of words that completely cover  $\text{חֶסֶד וְאֱמֶת}$ ; when they are used of God, we translate them by grace and truth [Gnade u. Wahrheit], Ps. xl. 12 ( $\text{יִצְרִינִי}$ ); when of men, by love and truth [Liebe u. Treue], xvi. 6; and when of the two-sided divine forces, by kindness and truth, iii. 3. Love and truth are the two good spirits that guard the king. If it is elsewhere said that the king's throne is supported “with judgment and with justice,” Isa. ix. 6 [7]; here, on the other side, we see that the exercise of government must have love as its centre; he has not only to act on the line of right,  $\text{שִׁינַת הַדִּין}$ ; but, as the later proverb says, in such a way, that within this circle his conduct is determined by the central motive of love. In this sense we give the king not only the title of Grossmächtigster [most high and mighty], but also that of “Allergnädigster” [most gracious], for the king can and ought to exercise grace before other men; the virtue of condescension establishes his throne more than the might of greatness.

Ver. 29 The ornament of young men is their strength;
And the honour of the old is grey hairs.

Youth has the name  $\text{בְּחַיִּיר}$  (different from  $\text{בְּחַיִּיר}$ , chosen), of the maturity (R.  $\text{בַּחַר}$ , cogn.  $\text{בָּנָר}$ , whence Mishn.  $\text{בְּגִירוּת}$ , manhood, in contradistinction to  $\text{נְעֻרוּת}$ ) into which he enters from the bloom of boyhood; and the old man is called זָקֵן (Arab. dhikn, as Schultens says, a mento pendulo, from the hanging chin זָקֵן, (Arab.) dhakan, chin, beard on the chin). To stand in the fulness of fresh unwasted strength is to youth, as such, an ornament (תִּפְאַרֶת, cf. פָּאֲרוּר, blooming colour of the countenance); on the contrary, to the old man who has spent his strength in the duties of his office, or as it is said at xvi. 31, "in the way of righteousness," grey hairs (שֵׂיבָה, from שָׁב, Arab. shâb, canescere) give an honourable appearance (הִדָּר, from הִיר, turgidum, amplum esse, vid. at Isa. lxiii. 1).

Ver. 30 Cutting wounds cleanse away evil,
And reach the inner parts of the body.

The two words for wounds in line first stand in the st. constr.; חִבּוּרָה (from חָבַר, to be bound around with stripes, to be striped) is properly the streak, the stripe; but is here heightened by פָּצַע (from פָּצַע, to cleave, split, tear open), beyond the idea of the stripe-wound: tearing open the flesh, cuts tearing into the flesh. The pred. is after the Kerî תְּמָרוֹק; but this substantive, found in the Book of Esther, where it signifies the purification of the women for the harem (according to which, e.g., Ahron B. Joseph explains להם יפה שהוא לנשים שהוא יפה להם), is syntactically hard, and scarcely original. For if we explain with Kimchi: wounds of deep incision find their cleansing (cure) by evil, i.e. by means which bring suffering (according to which, probably the Venet. μώλωπες τραύματος λάμπουσιν ἐν κακῶ), then תְּמָרוֹק, with the pronoun pointing back, one would have expected. But the interpretation of בָּרַע, of severe means of cure, is constrained; that which lies nearest, however, is to understand רַע of evil. But if, with this understanding of the word, we translate: Vibices plagarum sunt lustratio quæ adhibetur malo (Fleischer), one does not see why בָּרַע, and not rather gen. רַע, is used. But if we read after the Chethîb תְּמָרוֹק, then all is syntactically correct; for (1.) that the word יְמָרוֹק, or תְּמָרוֹקָה, is not used, is in accordance with a well-known rule, Gesen. § 146, 3; and (2.) that תְּמָרוֹק is connected, not directly with an accus. obj., but with ב, has its analogy in הִתְעָה בְּ, Jer. xlii. 2, הִשְׁרִישׁ בְּ, Job xxxi. 12, and the like, and besides has its special ground in the metaphorical character of the cleansing. Thus, e.g., one uses Syr. ܕܘܠܝܢ of external misleading; but with

2 of moral misleading (Ewald, § 217, 2); and Arab. اِشَاد of erecting a building; but with 3 of the intellectual erection of a memorial (monument). It is the so-called Bá-álmojáz; vid. de Sacy's Chrest. Arab. i. 397. The verb מָרַק means in Talm. also, "to take away" (a metaph. of abstergere; cf. Arab. marak, to wipe off<sup>1</sup>); and that meaning is adopted, Schabbath 33a, for the interpretations of this proverb: stripes and wounds a preparedness for evil carries away, and sorrow in the innermost part of the body, which is explained by דְּרוּקוֹן (a disease appearing in diverse forms; cf. "Drachenschuss," as the name of an animal disease); but granting that the biblical מָרַק may bear this meaning, the 3 remains unaccountable; for we say מָרַק מֵעֲצָמוֹ לְעֵבְרָה, for to prepare oneself for a transgression (sin of excess), and not בְּעֵבְרָה. We have thus to abide by the primary meaning, and to compare the proverb, Berachoth 5a: "afflictive providences wash away all the transgressions of a man." But the proverb before us means, first at least, not the wounds which God inflicts, but those which human educational energy inflicts: deep-cutting wounds, i.e. stern discipline, leads to the rubbing off of evil, i.e. rubs it, washes it, cleanses it away. It may now be possible that in 30b the subject idea is permutatively continued: et verbera penetralium corporis (thus the Venet.: πληγαὶ τῶν ταμείων τοῦ γαστρὸς), i.e. quorum vis ad intimos corporis et animi recessus penetrat (Fleischer). But that is encumbered, and הִדְרִיבְטָן (cf. ver. 27, xviii. 8), as referring to the depths to which stern corporal discipline penetrates, has not its full force. וּמִפְּוֹת is either a particip.: and that as touching (ferientes) the inner chambers of the body, or הִדְרִיבְטָן is with the 3, or immediately, the second object of תְּמָרִיק to be supplied: and strokes (rub off, cleanse, make pure) the innermost part. Jerome and the Targ. also supply 3, but erroneously, as designating place: in secretioribus ventris, relatively better the LXX. and Syr.: εἰς ταμεία κοιλίας. Luther hits the sense at least, for he translates:

One must restrain evil with severe punishment,
 And with hard strokes which one feels.

Chap. xxi. 1. The group, like the preceding one, now closes with a proverb of the king.

A king's heart in Jahve's hand is like brooks of water ;
He turneth it whithersoever He will.

Brook and canal (the Quinta : ὑδραγωγοί) are both called נַחַל, or נָחַל, Job xx. 17, Arab. falaj (from נָחַל, to divide, according to which Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, διαρέσεις; Venet. διανομαί; Jerome, divisiones); Jákût has the explanation of the word : "falaj is the name given to flowing water, particularly the brook from a spring, and every canal which is led from a spring out over flat ground." Such brooks of water are the heart of a king, i.e. it is compared to such, in Jahve's hand. The second line contains the point of comparison : He inclines it, gives to it the direction (נָחַל, causat. of נָחַל, Num. xxi. 15) toward whatever He will (נָחַל denotes willing, as a bending and inclining, viz. of the will; vid. at xviii. 2). Rightly Hitzig finds it not accidental that just the expression "brooks of water" is chosen as the figure for tractableness and subjection to government. In Isa. xxxii. 2, the princes of Judah are compared to "rivers of water in a dry place" with reference to the exhaustion of the land during the oppression of the Assyrian invasion; the proverb has specially in view evidences of kindness proceeding from the heart, as at xvi. 15 the favour of the king is compared to clouds of latter rain emptying themselves in beneficent showers, and at xix. 12 to the dew refreshing the plants. But the speciality of the comparison here is, that the heart of the king, however highly exalted above his subjects, and so removed from their knowledge he may be, has yet One above it by whom it is moved by hidden influences, e.g. the prayer of the oppressed; for man is indeed free, yet he acts under the influence of divinely-directed circumstances and divine operations; and though he reject the guidance of God, yet from his conduct nothing results which the Omniscient, who is surprised by nothing, does not make subservient to His will in the world-plan of redemption. Rightly the Midrash : God gives to the world good or bad kings, according as He seeks to bless it or to visit it with punishment; all decisions that go forth from the king's mouth come לְכַתְּמֵהֶם, i.e. in their first commencement and their last reason they come from the Holy One.

The next group extends from ver. 2 to ver. 8, where it closes as it began.

Ver. 2 Every way of a man is right in his own eyes;
But a weigher of hearts is Jahve.

A proverb similar to xvi. 2 (where  $\text{יִשָּׁר}$  for  $\text{יָרָה}$ ,  $\text{וְיָה}$  for  $\text{יִשָּׁר}$ ,  $\text{לְבָבוֹת}$  for  $\text{רוּחוֹת}$ ). God is also, xvii. 3, called a trier,  $\text{בִּתְּנֵן}$ , of hearts, as He is here called a weigher,  $\text{חִבֵּן}$ . The proverb indirectly admonishes us of the duty of constant self-examination, according to the objective norm of the revealed will of God, and warns us against the self-complacency of the fool, of whom xii. 15 says (as Trimberg in "Renner"): "all fools live in the pleasant feeling that their life is the best," and against the self-deception which walks in the way of death and dreams of walking in the way of life, xiv. 12 (xvi. 25).

Ver. 3 To practise justice and right
Hath with Jahve the pre-eminence above sacrifice.

We have already (vol. i. p. 42) shown how greatly this depreciation of the works of the ceremonial cultus, as compared with the duties of moral obedience, is in the spirit of the Chokma; cf. also at xv. 8. Prophecy also gives its testimony, e.g. Hos. vi. 7, according to which also here (cf. xx. 8b with Isa. ix. 8) the practising of  $\text{צִדְקָה וּמִשְׁפָּט}$  (sequence of words as at Gen. xviii. 19, Ps. xxxiii. 5, elsewhere  $\text{צִדְקָה וּמִשְׁפָּט}$ , and yet more commonly  $\text{מִשְׁפָּט וְצִדְקָה}$ ) does not denote legal rigour, but the practising of the justum et æquum, or much rather the æquum et bonum, thus in its foundation conduct proceeding from the principle of love. The inf.  $\text{עָשָׂה}$  (like  $\text{קָנָה}$ , xvi. 16) occurs three times (here and at Gen. i. 20; Ps. ci. 3); once  $\text{עָשָׂו}$  is written (Gen. xxxi. 18), as also in the inf. absol. the form  $\text{עָשָׂה}$  and  $\text{עָשָׂו}$  interchange (vid. Norzi at Jer. xxii. 4); once  $\text{עָשָׂהוּ}$  for  $\text{עָשָׂו}$  (Ex. xviii. 18) occurs in the status conjunctus.

Ver. 4 Loftiness of eyes and swelling of heart—
The husbandry of the godless is sin.

If  $\text{נֵר}$ , in the sense of light, gives a satisfactory meaning, then one might appeal to 1 Kings xi. 36 (cf. 2 Sam. xxi. 17), where  $\text{נֵר}$  appears to signify lamp, in which meaning it is once (2 Sam. xxii. 29) written  $\text{נֵיר}$  (like  $\text{חֵיק}$ ); or since  $\text{נֵיר} = \text{נֵר}$  (ground-form, nawir, lightening) is as yet certainly established neither in the Heb. nor Syr., one might punctuate נִר instead of נִר, according to which the Greeks, Aram., and Luther, with Jerome, translate. But of the lamp of the godless we read at xiii. 9 and elsewhere, that it goeth out. We must here understand by נִר the brilliant prosperity (Bertheau and others) of the wicked, or their "proud spirit flaming and flaring like a bright light" (Zöckler), which is contrary to the use of the metaphor as found elsewhere, which does not extend to a prosperous condition. We must then try another meaning for נִר; but not that of yoke, for this is not Heb., but Aram.-Arab., and the interpretation thence derived by Lagarde: "Haughtiness and pride; but the godless for all that bear their yoke, viz. sin," seeks in vain to hide behind the "for all that" the breaking asunder of the two lines of the verse. In Heb. נִר means that which lightens (burning) = lamp, נִר, the shining (that which burns) = fire, and נִר, xiii. 23, from נִר, to plough up (Targ. 1 Sam. viii. 12, גִּמְנָר = לְחַרֵּשׁ) the fresh land, i.e. the breaking up of the fallow land; according to which the Venet. as Kimchi: νέωμα ἀσεβῶν ἀμαρτία, which as Ewald and Elster explain: "where a disposition of wicked haughtiness, of unbridled pride, prevails, there will also sin be the first-fruit on the field of action; נִר, novale, the field turned up for the first time, denotes here the first-fruits of sin." But why just the first-fruits, and not the fruit in general? We are better to abide by the field itself, which is here styled נִר, not שָׂדֶה (or as once in Jer. xxxix. 10, יִנֵּב); because with this word, more even than with שָׂדֶה, is connected the idea of agricultural work, of arable land gained by the digging up or the breaking up of one or more years' fallow ground (cf. Pea ii. 1, נִר, Arab. sikāk, opp. בֹּר, Arab. būr, Menachoth 85a, שְׂדֵה מְנִירוֹת, a fresh broken-up field, Erachin 29b, נִר, opp. הַבֵּיר, to let lie fallow), so that נִר רִשְׁעִים may mean the cultivation of the fields, and generally the husbandry, i.e. the whole conduct and life of the godless. נִר is here ethically metaph., but not like Hos. x. 12, Jer. iv. 3, where it means a new moral commencement of life; but like חָרַשׁ, arare, Job iv. 8, Hos. x. 13; cf. Prov. iii. 29. רָחַב is not adj. like xxviii. 25, Ps. ci. 5, but infin. like חָסַר, x. 21; and accordingly also רוּם is not adj. like חוּם, or past like סוּג, but infin. like Isa. x. 12. And חָטְאת is the pred. of the complex subject, which consists of רִים עֵינַיִם, a haughty looking down with the eyes, רֵחַב־לֵב, breadth of heart, i.e. excess of self-consciousness, and נִרְשָׁעִים taken as an asyn-deton summativum: pride of look, and making oneself large of heart, in short, the whole husbandry of the godless, or the whole of the field cultivated by them, with all that grows thereon, is sin.

Ver. 5 The striving of the diligent is only to advantage.

And hastening all [excessive haste] only to loss;

or in other words, and agreeably to the Heb. construction :

The thoughts of the industrious are (reach) only to gain,

And every one who hastens—it (this his hastening) is only to loss.

Vid. at xvii. 21. At x. 4, Luther translates “the hand of the diligent,” here “the plans of an expert [endelichen],” i.e. of one actively striving (xxii. 29, endelich = מְהִיר) to the end. The מָצָה, hastening overmuch, is contrasted with the diligent; Luther well: but he who is altogether too precipitant. Everywhere else in the Proverbs מָצָה has a closer definition with it, wherefore Hitzig reads אִצָּר, which must mean: he who collects together; but מָצָה along with הֲרִיץ is perfectly distinct. The thought is the same as our “Eile mit Weile” [= festina lente], and Goethe’s

Wie das Gestirn ohne Hast,

Aber ohne Rast

Drehe sich jeder

Um die eigne Last.

“Like the stars, without haste but without rest, let every one carry about his own burden,” viz. of his calling that lies upon him. The fundamental meaning of מָצָה is to throng, to urge (Ex. v. 13), here of impatient and inconsiderate rashness. While on the side of the diligent there is nothing but gain, such haste brings only loss; over-exertion does injury, and the work will want care, circumspection, and thoroughness. In the Book of Proverbs, the contrasts “gain” and “loss” frequently occur, xi. 24, xiv. 23, xxii. 16: profit (the increase of capital by interest), opp. loss (of capital, or of part thereof), as commercial terms.

Ver. 6 The gaining of treasures by a lying tongue

Is a fleeting breath of such as seek death.

One may, at any rate, after the free manner of gnomie resemblances and comparisons, regard "fleeting breath" and "such as seek death" as two separated predicates: such gain is fleeting breath, so those who gain are seeking death (Caspari's Beiträge zu Jes. p. 53). But it is also syntactically admissible to interpret the words rendered "seekers of death" as gen.; for such interruptions of the st. constr., as here by נָדָה [fleeting], frequently occur, e.g. Isa. xxviii. 1, xxxii. 13; 1 Chron. ix. 13; and that an idea, in spite of such interruption, may be thought of as gen., is seen from the Arab.<sup>1</sup> But the text is unsettled. Symmachus, Syr., Targ., the Venet., and Luther render the phrase מְבַקְשֵׁי [seekers]; but the LXX. and Jerome read מִקְשֵׁי [snares] (cf. 1 Tim. vi. 9); this word Rashi also had before him (vid. Norzi), and Kennicott found it in several Codd. Bertheau prefers it, for he translates: . . . is fleeting breath, snares of death; Ewald and Hitzig go further, for, after the LXX., they change the whole proverb into: הַבֵּל רִדְהָ אֶל-מִקְשֵׁי מִתְּמוֹת (בְּמִקְשֵׁי), with פִּעֵל in the first line. But δῶκει of the LXX. is an incorrect rendering of נָדָה, which the smuggling in of the ἐπὶ (παγίδας θανάτου) drew after it, without our concluding therefrom that אֶל-מִקְשֵׁי, or לְמוֹקְשֵׁי (Lagarde), lay before the translators; on the contrary, the word which (Cappellus) lay before them, מִקְשֵׁי, certainly deserves to be preferred to מְבַקְשֵׁי: the possession is first, in view of him who has gotten it, compared to a fleeting (נָדָה, as Isa. xlii. 2) breath (cf. e.g. smoke, Ps. lxxviii. 3), and then, in view of the inheritance itself and its consequences, is compared to the snares of death (xiii. 14, xiv. 27); for in פִּעֵל (here equivalent to עָשׂוּת, acquisitio, Gen. xxxi. 1; Dent. viii. 17) lie together the ideas of him who procures and of the thing that is procured or effected (vid. at xx. 11).

Ver. 7 The violence of the godless teareth them away,
For they have refused to do what is right.

The destruction which they prepare for others teareth or draggeth them away to destruction, by which wicked conduct brings punishment on itself; their own conduct is its own executioner (cf. i. 19); for refusing to practise what is right, they have pronounced judgment against themselves, and fallen under condemnation. Rightly Jerome, detrahent, with Aquila, κατασπάσει = j'gurrem (as Hab. i. 15), from גָּרַר; on the contrary, the LXX. incorrectly, ἐπιξενωθήσεται, from גָּרַר, to dwell, to live as a guest; and the Venet., as Luther, in opposition to the usus loq.: δεδίξεται (fut. of δεδίσσεισθαι, to terrify), from גָּרַר, to dread, fear, which also remains intrans., with the accus. following, Deut. xxxii. 27. The Syr. and the Targ. freely: robbery (Targ. נָבִינָר, perhaps in the sense of usury) will seize them, viz. in the way of punishment. In Arab. jarr (jariyratn) means directly to commit a crime; not, as Schultens explains, admittere crimen pœnam trahens, but attrahere (arripere), like (Arab.) jany (jinâyatn), contrahere crimen; for there the crime is thought of as violent usurpation, here as wicked accumulation.

Ver. 8 Winding is the way of a man laden with guilt;
But the pure—his conduct is right.

Rightly the accentuation places together “the way of a man” as subject, and “winding” as predicate: if the poet had wished to say (Schultens, Bertheau) “one crooked in his way” (quoad viam), he would have contented himself with the phrase מְגַרְגֵּר מְגַרְגֵּר. But, on the other hand, the accentuation is scarcely correct (the second Munach is a transformed Mugrash), for it interprets וְגָר as a second pred.; but וְגָר is adj. to שׂוֹאֵא. As מְגַרְגֵּר (synon. מְגַרְגֵּר, עַקְלָקֵל) is a hapax leg., so also vazar, which is equivalent to (Arab.) mawzwr, crimine onustus, from vazira, crimen committere, properly to charge oneself with a crime. The ancient interpreters have, indeed, no apprehension of this meaning before them; the LXX. obtain from the proverb a thought reminding us of Ps. xviii. 27, in which vazar does not at all appear; the Syr. and Targ. translate as if the vav of vazar introduces the conclusion: he is a barbarian (nuchrojo); Luther: he is crooked; Jerome also sets aside the syntax: perversa via viri aliena est; but, syntactically admissible, the Venet. and Kimchi, as the Jewish interpreters generally, διαστροφωτάτη ὁδὸς ἀνδρὸς καὶ ἀλλόκοτος. Fleischer here even renounces the help of the Arab., for he translates: Tortuosa est via viri criminibus onusti, qui autem sancte vivit, is recte facit; but he adds thereto the remark that “vazar thus explained, with Cappellus, Schultens, and Gesenius, would, it is true, corresponding to the Arab. wazar, have first the abstract meaning of a verbal noun from wazira;<sup>1</sup> the old explanation is therefore perhaps better: tortuosa est via viri et deflectens (scil. a recta linea, thus devia est), when the 'viri' is to be taken in the general sense of 'many, this and that one;' the closer definition is reflected from the וְיִי of the second clause." But (1) וְיִי as an adj. signifies peregrinus; one ought thus rather to expect וְיִי, degenerated, corrupt, although that also does not rightly accord; (2) the verbal noun also, e.g. 'all, passes over into a subst. and adj. signification (the latter without distinction of number and gender); (3) וְיִי, after its adj. signification, is related to (Arab.) wazyr, as וְיִי is to hakym, וְיִי to rahyb; it is of the same form as וְיִי, with which it has in common its derivation from a root of similar meaning, and its ethical signification. In 8b, וְיִי is rightly accented as subj. of the complex pred. וְיִי is the pure in heart and of a good conscience. The laden with guilt (guilty) strikes out all kinds of crooked ways; but the pure needs no stealthy ways, he does not stand under the pressure of the bondage of sin, the ban of the guilt of sin; his conduct is straightforward, directed by the will of God, and not by cunning policy. Schultens: Integer vitæ scelerisque purus non habet cur vacillet, cur titubet, cur sese contorqueat. The choice of the designation וְיִי [and the pure] may be occasioned by וְיִי (Hitzig); the expression 8b reminds us of xx. 11.

The group now following extends to ver. 18, where a new one begins with a variation of its initial verse.

Ver. 9 Better to sit on the pinnacle of a house-roof,
Than a contentious wife and a house in common.

We have neither to supplement the second line: than with a contentious wife . . . (Symmachus, Theodotion, Jerome, Luther), nor: than that one have a contentious . . . ; but the meaning is, that sitting on the roof-top better befits one, does better than a quarrelsome wife and a common house (rightly the Targ. and Venet.), i.e. in a common house; for the connecting together of the wife and the house by vav is a Semitic

hendiadys, a juxtaposition of two ideas which our language would place in a relation of subordination (Fleischer). This hendiadys would, indeed, be scarcely possible if the idea of the married wife were attached to אִשָּׁה; for that such an one has with her husband a "house of companionship, i.e. a common house," is self-evident. But may it not with equal right be understood of the imperious positive mother-in-law of a widower, a splenetic shrewish aunt, a sickly female neighbour disputing with all the world, and the like? A man must live together with his wife in so far as he does not divorce her; he must then escape from her; but a man may also be constrained by circumstances to live in a house with a quarrelsome mother-in-law, and such an one may, even during the life of his wife, and in spite of her affection, make his life so bitter that he would rather, in order that he might have rest, sit on the pinnacle or ridge of a house-roof. מִצְנֵה is the battlement (Zeph. i. 16) of the roof, the edge of the roof, or its summit; he who sits there does so not without danger, and is exposed to the storm, but that in contrast with the alternative is even to be preferred; he sits alone. Regarding the Chethîb מְרוֹיִים, Kerî מְרוֹיִים, vid. at vi. 14; and cf. the figures of the "continual dropping" for the continual scolding of such a wife, embittering the life of her husband, xix. 13.

Ver. 10 The soul of the godless hath its desire after evil;
His neighbour findeth no mercy in his eyes.

The interchange of perf. and fut. cannot be without intention. Löwenstein renders the former as perf. hypotheticum: if the soul of the wicked desires anything evil . . .; but the רָשָׁע wishes evil not merely now and then, but that is in general his nature and tendency. The perf. expresses that which is actually the case: the soul of the wicked has its desire directed (write אֲחִתָּהּ with Munach, after Codd. and old Ed., not with Makkeph) toward evil, and the fut. expresses that which proceeds from this: he who stands near him is not spared. יָהֵן is, as at Isa. xxvi. 10, Hoph. of הִיָּן, to incline, viz. oneself, compassionately toward any one, or to bend to him. But in what sense is בְּעֵינָיו added? It does not mean, as frequently, e.g. ver. 2, according to his judgment, nor, as at xx. 8, vi. 13: with his eyes, but is to be understood after the phrase הֵן בְּעֵינָיו מְצָא: his neighbour finds no mercy in his eyes, so that in these words the sympathy ruling within him expresses itself: "his eyes will not spare his friends," vid. Isa. xiii. 18.

Ver. 11 When the scorner is punished, the simple is made wise ;
And when insight is imparted to a wise man, he receives knowledge.

The thought is the same as at xix. 25. The mocker at religion and virtue is incorrigible, punishment avails him nothing, but yet it is not lost; for as a warning example it teaches the simple, who might otherwise be easily drawn into the same frivolity. On the other hand, the wise man needs no punishment, but only strengthening and furtherance: if "instruction" is imparted to him, he embraces it, makes it his own רָעַת; for, being accessible to better insight, he gains more and more knowledge. De Dieu, Bertheau, and Zöckler make "the simple" the subject also in 11*b*: and if a wise man prospers, he (the simple) gains knowledge. But הַשְׂכִּיל ל, used thus impersonally, is unheard of; wherefore Hitzig erases the ל before הַחָכָם: if a wise man has prosperity. But הַשְׂכִּיל does not properly mean to have prosperity, but only mediately: to act with insight, and on that account with success. The thought that the simple, on the one side, by the merited punishment of the mocker; on the other, by the intelligent prosperous conduct of the wise, comes to reflection, to reason, may indeed be entertained, but the traditional form of the proverb does not need any correction. הַשְׂכִּיל may be used not only transitively: to gain insight, Gen. iii. 6, Ps. ii. 10, and elsewhere, but also causatively: to make intelligent, with the accus. following, xvi. 23, Ps. xxxii. 8, or: to offer, present insight, as here with the dat.-obj. following (cf. xvii. 26). Instead of בְּעֵינַיִךְ, the Kametz of which is false, Codd. and good Edd. have, rightly, בְּעֵינַיִךְ. Hitzig, making "the wise" the subject to בְּהַשְׂכִּיל (and accordingly "the scorner" would be the subject in 11*a*), as a correct consequence reads בְּעֵינַיִךְ = בְּהַשְׂכִּיל. For us, with that first correction, this second one also fails. "Both infinitivi constr.," Fleischer remarks, "are to be taken passively; for the Semitic infin., even of transitive form, as it has no designation of gender, time, and person, is an indeterminate modus, even in regard to the generis verbi (Act. and Pass.)”<sup>1</sup> To this proverb with u-behaskil there is connected the one that follows, beginning with maskil.

Ver. 12 A righteous One marketh the house of the godless;
He hurleth the godless to destruction.

If we understand by the word צַדִּיק a righteous man, then 12a would introduce the warning which he gives, and the unexpressed subject of 12b must be God (Umbreit). But after such an introitus, יהוה ought not to be wanting. If in 12a “the righteous man” is the subject, then it presents itself as such also for the second parallel part. But the thought that the righteous, when he takes notice of the house of the godless, shows attention which of itself hurls the godless into destruction (Löwenstein), would require the sing. רשע in the conclusion; also, instead of מִסֵּלָה the fut. יִסְלֶה would have been found; and besides, the judicial סֵלָה (vid. regarding this word at xi. 3, xix. 3) would not be a suitable word for this confirmation in evil. Thus by צַדִּיק the proverb means God, and מִסֵּלָה has, as at xxii. 12, Job xii. 19, this word as its subject. “A righteous One” refers to the All-righteous, who is called, Job xxxiv. 17, “the All-just One,” and by Rashi, under the passage before us, צַדִּיקוֹ שֶׁל־עוֹלָם. Only do not translate with Bertheau and Zöckler: The Righteous One (All-righteous), for (1) this would require הַצַּדִּיק, and (2) הַצַּדִּיק is never by itself used as an attributive designation of God. Rightly, Fleischer and Ewald: a Righteous One, viz. God. It is the indetermination which seeks to present the idea of the great and dreadful: a Righteous One, and such a Righteous One!<sup>2</sup> עַל הַשִּׁבְלִי with Ps. xvi. 20, or אֶל, Ps. xli. 2, Neh. viii. 13, here with לְ, signifies to give attention to anything, to look attentively on it. The two participles stand in the same line: animus advertit . . . evertit. Hitzig changes

רָשָׁע לְבֵיתוֹ into לְבֵית רָשָׁע, and makes רָשָׁע the subject of 12*b*; but the proverb as it lies before us is far more intelligible.

Ver. 13 He that stoppeth his ear at the cry of the poor—
He also calls and is not heard.

Only the merciful find mercy, Matt. v. 7; the unmerciful rich man, who has no ear for the cry of the לָרָ, i.e. of him who is without support and means of subsistence, thus of one who is needing support, will also remain unheard when he himself, in the time of need, calls upon God for help. Cf. the parable of the unmerciful servant of the merciful king, Matt. xviii. 23 ff. מִן in מְעַקֵּת, as Isa. xxiii. 15, Gen. iv. 13, xxvii. 1; no preposition of our [German] language [nor English] expresses, as Fleischer here remarks, such a fulness of meaning as this מִן does, to which, after a verb of shutting up such as אָטַם (cf. xvii. 28), the Arab. عَم would correspond, e.g. āmy 'n āltryk: blind, so that he does not see the way.

Ver. 14 A gift in secret turneth away anger;
And a bribe into the bosom violent wrath.

Hitzig reads with Symmachus, the Targ., and Jerome, יִכְבֵּה, and translates: “extinguishes anger;” but it does not follow that they did read יִכְבֵּה; for the Talm. Heb. כִּפֶּה signifies to cover by turning over, e.g. of a vessel, Sanhedrin 77*a*, which, when it is done to a candle or a fire, may mean its extinction. But כִּפֶּה of the post-bibl. Heb. also means to bend, and thence to force out (Aram. כִּפֶּה, כִּפֶּה), according to which Kimchi hesitates whether to explain: overturns = smothers, or: bends = forces down anger. The Venet. follows the latter signification: κάμψει (for Villoison’s καλύψει rests on a false reading of the MS.). But there is yet possible another derivation from the primary signification, curvare, flectere, vertere, according to which the LXX. translates ἀνατρέπει, for which ἀποτρέπει would be yet better: כִּפֶּה, to bend away, to turn off, ἀρκεῖν, arcere, altogether like the Arab. (compared by Schultens) kfā, and kfy, ἀρκεῖν, to prevent, whence, e.g., ikfini hada: hold that away from me, or: spare me that (Fleischer); with the words hafika sharran (Lat. defendaris semper a malo) princes were anciently saluted; kfy signifies “to suffice,” because enough is there, where there is a keeping off of want. Accordingly we translate: Donum clam acceptum avertit iram, which also the

Syr. meant by mephadka (מִפְּרָק). This verb is naturally to be supplied to 14*b*, which the LXX. has recognised (it translates: but he who spares gifts, excites violent anger). Regarding שָׁחַד, vid. at xvii. 8; and regarding בָּחַב, at xvii. 23. Also here בָּח (חִי = חִיב), like Arab. jayb, 'ubb, חב, denotes the bosom of the garment; on the contrary, (Arab.) hijr, hidn, חִצֵּן, is more used of that of the body, or that formed by the drawing together of the body (e.g. of the arm in carrying a child). A present is meant which one brings with him concealed in his bosom; perhaps 13*b* called to mind the judge that took gifts, Ex. xxiii. 8 (Hitzig).

Ver. 15 It is a joy to the just to do justice,
And a terror for them that work iniquity.

To act according to the law of rectitude is to these as unto death; injustice has become to them a second nature, so that their heart strives against rectitude of conduct; it also enters so little into their plan of life, and their economy, that they are afraid of ruining themselves thereby. So we believe, with Hitzig, Elster, Zöckler, and Luther, this must be explained in accordance with our interpretation of x. 29. Fleischer and others supplement the second parallel member from the first: וַיִּפְעַל אֲנֹן מִחַתָּה לְפַעְלֵי אֲנֹן; others render 15*b* as an independent sentence: ruin falls on those who act wickedly. But that ellipsis is hard and scarcely possible; but in general מַחַתָּה, as contrasted correlate to שִׁמְחָה, can scarcely have the pure objective sense of ruin or destruction. It must mean a revolution in the heart. Right-doing is to the righteous a pleasure (cf. x. 23); and for those who have אֲנֹן, and are devoid of moral worth, and thus simply immoral as to the aim and sphere of their conduct, right-doing is something which alarms them: when they act in conformity with what is right, they do so after an external impulse only against their will, as if it were death to them.

Ver. 16 A man who wanders from the way of understanding,
Shall dwell in the assembly of the dead.

Regarding וַיִּשְׁכַּח, vid. i. 3; and regarding וַיִּפְּאֵם, ii. 18. The verb נָח means to repose, to take rest, Job iii. 13, and to dwell anywhere, xiv. 33; but originally like (Arab.) nākh and hadd, to lay oneself down anywhere, and there to come to rest; and that is the idea which is here connected with נָח, for the figurative description of יֹאבֵד or יָמוּת is formed after the designation of the subject, 16a: he who, forsaking the way of understanding, walks in the way of error, at length comes to the assembly of the dead; for every motion has an end, and every journey a goal, whether it be one that is self-appointed or which is appointed for him. Here also it is intimated that the way of the soul which loves wisdom and follows her goes in another direction than earthwards down into hades; hades and death, its background appear here as punishments, and it is true that as such one may escape them.

Ver. 17 He who loveth pleasure becometh a man of want;
He who loveth wine and oil doth not become rich.

In Arab. sanh denotes the joyful action of the "cheerful giver," 2 Cor. ix. 7; in Heb. the joyful affection; here, like farah, pleasure, delight, festival of joy. Jerome: qui diligit epulas. For feasting is specially thought of, where wine was drunk, and oil and other fragrant essences were poured (cf. xxvii. 9; Amos vi. 6) on the head and the clothes. He who loves such festivals, and is commonly found there, becomes a man of want, or suffers want (cf. Judg. xii. 2, אִישׁ רִיב, a man of strife); such an one does not become rich (הִעָשִׁיר, like x. 4, = עָשָׂה עֶשֶׂר, Jer. xvii. 11); he does not advance, and thus goes backwards.

Ver. 18 The godless becometh a ransom for the righteous;
And the faithless cometh into the place of the upright.

The thought is the same as at xi. 8. An example of this is, that the same world-commotion which brought the nations round Babylon for its destruction, put an end to Israel's exile: Cyrus, the instrument in God's hands for inflicting punishment on many heathen nations, was Israel's liberator, Isa. xliii. 3. Another example is in the exchange of places by Haman and Mordecai, to which Rashi refers. כֶּפֶר is equivalent to λύτρον, ransom; but it properly signifies price of atonement, and generally, means of reconciliation, which covers or atones for the guilt of any one; the poll-tax and "oblations" also, Ex. xxx. 15 f., Num. xxxi. 50, are placed under this point of view, as blotting out guilt: if the righteousness of God obtains satisfaction, it makes its demand against the godless, and lets the righteous go free; or, as the substantival clause 18b expresses, the faithless steps into the place of the upright, for the wrath passes by the latter and falls upon the former. Regarding בּוֹגֵד, vid. ii. 22. Thus, in contrast to the יֵשֶׁר, he is designated, who keeps faith neither with God nor man, and with evil intention enters on deceitful ways,—the faithless, the malicious, the assassin.

Ver. 19. With this verse, a doublet to ver. 9 (xxv. 24), the collector makes a new addition; in ver. 29 he reaches a proverb which resembles the closing proverb of the preceding group, in its placing in contrast the רָשָׁע and יֵשֶׁר;—

It is better to dwell in a waste land,
Than a contentious wife and vexation.

The corner of the roof, Hitzig remarks, has been made use of, and the author must look further out for a lonely seat. But this is as piquant as it is devoid of thought; for have both proverbs the same author, and if so, were they coined at the same time? Here also it is unnecessary to regard מֵאִשָּׁת as an abbreviation for מְשֻׁבַּת עִם אִשָּׁת. Hitzig supplies שָׁבֵן, by which אִשָּׁה, as the accus.-obj., is governed; but it is not to be supplied, for the proverb places as opposite to one another dwelling in a waste land (read שְׁבַת בְּאַרְץ-מִדְבָּר, with Codd. and correct Ed.) and a contentious wife (Chethûb, מְדוֹנִים; Kerî, מְדוֹנִים) and vexation, and says the former is better than the latter. For וְנָכַעַם [and vexation] is not, as translated by the ancients, and generally received, a second governed genitive to אִשָּׁה, but dependent on מֵן, follows “contentious woman” (cf. 9b): better that than a quarrelsome wife, and at the same time vexation.

Ver. 20 Precious treasure and oil are in the dwelling of the wise;
And a fool of a man squanders it.

The wise spares, the fool squanders; and if the latter enters on the inheritance which the former with trouble and care collected, it is soon devoured. The combination אוֹצֵר נְחָמֶד וְשֶׁמֶן [desirable treasure and oil] has something inconcinuate, wherefore the accentuation places אוֹצֵר by itself by Mehuppach Legarmeh; but it is not to be translated “a treasure of that which is precious, and oil,” since it is punctuated אוֹצֵר, and not אוֹצֵר; and besides, in that case מִנְחָמִים would have been used instead of נְחָמֶד. Thus by אוֹצֵר נְחָמֶד, a desirable and splendid capital in gold and things of value (Isa. xxiii. 18; Ps. xix. 11); and by שֶׁמֶן, mentioned by way of example, stores in kitchen and cellar are to be thought of, which serve him who lives luxuriously, and afford noble hospitality,—a fool of a man (בְּסִיל אָדָם, as at xv. 20), who finds this, devours it, i.e. quickly goes through it, makes, in short, a tabula rasa of it; cf. בָּלַע, Isa. xxviii. 4, with בָּלַע, 2 Sam. xx. 26, and Prov. xix. 28. The suffix of בִּלְעָנִי refers back to אוֹצָר as the main idea, or distributively also both to the treasure and the oil. The LXX. (θησαυρὸς ἐπιθυμητὸς ἀναπαύσεται ἐπὶ στόματος σοφοῦ, i.e. חָכָם בְּפֹה יִשְׁכֵּן, according to which Hitzig corrects; but the fool, he who swallows down “the precious treasure with a wise mouth,” is a being we can scarcely conceive of. His taste is not at all bad; why then a fool? Is it perhaps because he takes more in than he can at one time digest? The reading of the LXX. is corrected by 20*b*.)

Ver. 21 He that followeth after righteousness and kindness
Will obtain life, righteousness, and honour.

How we are to render צְדָקָה וְחַסֵּד is seen from the connection of xxi. 3 and Hos. vi. 7: tsedakah is conduct proceeding from the principle of self-denying compassionate love, which is the essence of the law, Mic. vi. 8; and hesed is conduct proceeding from sympathy, which, placing itself in the room of another, perceives what will benefit him, and sets about doing it (cf. e.g. Job vi. 14: to him who is inwardly melted [disheartened] חֶסֶד is due from his neighbour). The reward which one who strives thus to act obtains, is designated 21*b* by חַיִּים and כְּבוֹד. Honour and life stand together, xxii. 4, when עֵשֶׂר precedes, and here צְדָקָה stands between, which, viii. 18, Ps. xxiv. 5, is thought of as that which is distributed as a gift of heaven, Isa. xlv. 8, which has glory in its train, Isa. lviii. 8; as Paul also says, “Whom He justified, them He also glorified.” The LXX. has omitted tsedakah, because it can easily appear as erroneously repeated from 21*a*. But in reality there are three good things which are promised to those who are zealous in the works of love: a prosperous life, enduring righteousness, true honour. Life as it proceeds from God, the Living One, righteousness as it avails the righteous and those doing righteously before God, honour or glory (Ps. xxix. 3) as it is given (Ps. lxxxiv. 12) by the God of glory. Cf. with צְדָקָה, x. 2, and with צְדָקָה, especially Jas. ii. 13, κατακαυχᾶται ἔλεος κρίσεως.

Ver. 22 A wise man scaleth a city of the mighty ;
And casteth down the fortress in which they trusted.

Eccles. ix. 14 f. is a side-piece to this, according to which a single wise man, although poor, may become the deliverer of a city besieged by a great army, and destitute of the means of defence. עָלָה, seq. acc., means to climb up, Joel ii. 7 ; here, of the scaling of a fortified town, viz. its fortress. עָז is that which makes it עָזוֹ, Isa. xxvi. 1 : its armour of protection, which is designated by the genit. מִבְּטָחָהּ, as the object and ground of their confidence. The vocalization מִבְּטָחָהּ, for mibtachcha (cf. Jer. xlvi. 13 with Job xviii. 14), follows the rule Gesen. § 27,

Ann. 2b. The suff., as in לְאַתְנַנְנָהּ, Isa. xxiii. 17, is lightened, because of its mappik, Michlol 30*b* ; vid. regarding the various grounds of these formæ raphatæ pro mappicatis, Böttcher, § 418. If a city is defended by ever so many valiant men, the wise man knows the point where it may be overcome, and knows how to organize the assault so as to destroy the proud fortress. With וַיָּרֶר, he brings to ruin, cf. עַר רָרָתָהּ, Deut. xx. 20.

Ver. 23 He that guardeth his mouth and his tongue, Keepeth his soul from troubles.

xiii. 3 resembles this. He guardeth his mouth who does not speak when he does better to be silent ; and he guardeth his tongue who says no more than is right and fitting. The troubles comprehend both external and internal evils, hurtful incidents and (נֶפֶשׁ) צָרוֹת לִבָּב, Ps. xxv. 17, xxxi. 8, i.e. distress of conscience, self-accusation, sorrow on account of the irreparable evil which one occasions.

Ver. 24 A proud and arrogant man is called mocker (free-spirit) ;
One who acteth in superfluity of haughtiness.

We have thus translated (vol. i. p. 39) : the proverb defines almost in a formal way an idea current from the time of Solomon : לִזְ (properly, the distorter, vid. i. 7) is an old word ; but as with us in the west since the last century, the names of free-thinkers and esprits forts (cf. Isa. xlvi. 12) have become current for such as subject the faith of the Church to destructive criticism, so then they were called לְצִיִּים, who mockingly, as men of full age, set themselves above revealed religion and prophecy (Isa. xxviii. 9) ; and the above proverb gives the meaning of this name, for it describes in his moral character such a man. Thus we call one גָּדוֹל, haughty, and גָּדוֹל יְהִיר, i.e. destroying himself, and thus thoughtlessly haughty, who בְּעֵבְרַת זָרִין acts in superfluity or arrogance (vid. at xi. 23) of haughtiness; for not only does he inwardly raise himself above all that is worthy of recognition as true, of faith as certain, of respect as holy; but acting as well as judging frivolously, he shows reverence for nothing, scornfully passing sentence against everything. Abulwalid (vid. Gesen. Thes.) takes יהיר in the sense of obstinate; for he compares the Arab. jahr (jahar), which is equivalent to lijáj, constancy, stubbornness. But in the Targ. and Talm. (vid. at Hab. ii. 5, Levy's Chald. Wörterb. under יְהִיר) יהיר in all its offshoots and derivations has the sense of pride; we have then rather to compare the Arab. istaihara, to be insane (= dhabb 'akllh, mens ejus alienata est), perhaps also to hajjir, mutahawwir, being overthrown, præceps, so that יהיר denotes one who by his ὑπερφρονεῖν is carried beyond all σωφρονεῖν (vid. Rom. xii. 3), one who is altogether mad from pride. The Syr. madocho (Targ. מְדוּחָה), by which יהיר (Targ. יְהִיר) is rendered here and at Hab. ii. 5, is its synonym; this word also combines in itself the ideas foolhardy, and of one acting in a presumptuous, mad way; in a word, of one who is arrogant. Schultens is in the right way; but when he translates by tumidus mole cava ruens, he puts, as it is his custom to do, too much into the word; tumidus, puffed up, presents an idea which, etymologically at least, does not lie in it. The Venet.: ἀκρατῆς θρασὺς βωμολόχος τοῦνομά οἱ, which may be translated: an untractable reckless person we call a fool [homo ineptus], is not bad.

Ver. 25 The desire of the slothful killeth him;
For his hands refuse to be active.

The desire of the עָלָל, Hitzig remarks, goes out first after meat and drink; and when it takes this direction, as hunger, it kills him indeed. But in this case it is not the desire that kills him, but the impossibility of satisfying it. The meaning is simply: the inordinate desire after rest and pleasure kills the slothful; for this always seeking only enjoyment and idleness brings him at last to ruin. תַּאֲוָה means here, as in Kibroth ha-tava, Num. xi. 34, inordinate longing after enjoyments. The proverb is connected by almost all interpreters (also Ewald, Bertheau, Hitzig, Elster, Zöckler) as a tetrastich with ver. 25: he (the slothful) always eagerly desires, but the righteous giveth and spareth not. But (1) although צַדִּיק, since it designates one who is faithful to duty, might be used particularly of the industrious (cf. xv. 19), yet would there be wanting in 26a וְצַדִּיק, xiii. 4, cf. xx. 4, necessary for the formation of the contrast; (2) this older Book of Proverbs consists of pure distichs; the only tristich, xix. 7, appears as the consequence of a mutilation from the LXX. Thus the pretended tetrastich before us is only apparently such.

Ver. 26 One always desireth eagerly ;

But the righteous giveth and holdeth not back.

Otherwise Fleischer: per totam diem avet avidus, i.e. avarus; but that in הִתְאַוָּה הִתְאַוָּה the verb is connected with its inner obj. is manifest from Num. xi. 4; it is the mode of expression which is called in the Greek syntax schema etymologicum, and which is also possible without an adj. joined to the obj., as in the ὕβρις θ' ὑβρίζεις (Eurip. Herc. fur. 706), the Arab. mārāhu miryatn: he had a strife with him. Euchel impossibly: necessities will continually be appeased, which would have required הִתְאַוָּה or מִתְאַוָּה. The explanation also cannot be: each day presents its special demand, for כָּל־הַיּוֹם does not mean each day, but the whole day, i.e. continually. Thus we render הִתְאַוָּה with the most general subject (in which case the national grammarians supply הַמִּתְאַוָּה): continually one longs longing, i.e. there are demands, solicitations, wishes, importunate petitions; but still the righteous is not embarrassed in his generosity, he gives as unceasingly (cf. Isa. xiv. 6, lviii. 1) as one asks. Thus the pref. is explained, which is related hypothetically to the fut. following: though one, etc.

Ver. 27 The sacrifice of the godless is an abomination ;

How much more if it is brought for evil !

Line first = xv. 8a. Regarding the syllogistic כִּי אִם, vid. xii. 31, xv. 11; regarding אָמַר, crime, particularly the sin of lewdness (from אָמַר, to press together, to collect the thoughts upon something, to contrive, cf. raffinement de la volupté), at x. 23. אָמַר is too vaguely rendered in the LXX. by παρονόμως, falsely by Jerome, ex scelere (cf. ἐξ ἀδίκου, Sir. xxxi. 18, with Mal. i. 13). The כִּי is not meant, as at Ezek. xxii. 11, of the way and manner; for that the condition of life of the רשע is not a pure one, is not to be supposed. It is as Hitzig, rightly, that of price: for a transgression, i.e. to atone for it; one is hereby reminded, that he who had intercourse with a betrothed bondmaid had to present an ascham [trespass-offering], Lev. xix. 20–22. But frequently enough would it occur that rich sensualists brought trespass-offerings, and other offerings, in order thereby to recompense for their transgressions, and to purchase for themselves the connivance of God for their dissolute life. Such offerings of the godless, the proverb means, are to God a twofold and a threefold abomination; for in this case not only does the godless fail in respect of repentance and a desire after salvation, which are the conditions of all sacrifices acceptable to God, but he makes God directly a minister of sin.

Ver. 28 A false witness shall perish;

But he who heareth shall always speak truth.

The LXX. translate 28b by ἀνὴρ δὲ φυλασσόμενος λαλήσει. Cappellus supposes that they read לנצר for לנצל, which, however, cannot mean “taking care.” Hitzig further imagines שמע for שמע, and brings out the meaning: “the man that rejoiceth to deliver shall speak.” But where in all the world does נצר mean “to deliver”? It means, “to guard, preserve;” and to reach the meaning of “to deliver,” a clause must be added with מן, as מִרַע. When one who speaks lies (עַרְבֵיבַיִם), and a man who hears (אִישׁ שׁוֹמֵעַ), plene, and with the orthophonic Dagesh), are contrasted, the former is one who fancifully or malevolently falsifies the fact, and the latter is one who before he speaks hears in order that he may say nothing that he has not surely heard. As לֵב שֹמֵעַ, 1 Kings iii. 9, means an obedient heart, so here אִישׁ שׁוֹמֵעַ means a man who attentively hears, carefully proves. Such an one will speak לְנֶצַח, i.e. not: according to the truth, and not: for victory (Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, eis nikos), i.e. so that accomplishes it (Oetinger); for the Heb. נֶצַח has neither that Arab. nor this Aram. signification; but, with the transference of the root meaning of radiating or streaming over, to time, continuous existence (vid. Orelli, Synonyma der Zeit und Ewigkeit, pp. 95–97), thus: he will speak for continuance, i.e. either: without ever requiring to be silent, or, which we prefer: so that what he says stands; on the contrary, he who testifies mere fictions, i.e. avers that they are truth, is destroyed (28a=xix. 9b, cf. 5): he himself comes to nothing, since his testimonies are referred to their groundlessness and falsity; for שקר אין לו רגלים, the lie has no feet on which it can stand, it comes to nothing sooner or later.

Ver. 29. Another proverb with אִישׁ:—

A godless man showeth boldness in his mien;
But one that is upright—he proveth his way.

The Chethîb has יָבִין; but that the upright directeth, dirigit, his way, i.e. gives to it the right direction (cf. 2 Chron. xxvii. 6), is not a good contrast to the boldness of the godless; the Kerî, הַיָּבִין דְּרָבוֹ, deserves the preference. Aquila, Symmachus, the Syr., Targ., and Venet. adhere to the Chethîb, which would be suitable if it could be translated, with Jerome, by corrigit; Luther also reads the verb with כ, but as if it were יִבִּין (whoever is pious, his way will stand)—only the LXX. render the Kerî (συνιεί); as for the rest, the ancients waver between the Chethîb דְּרָבוֹ and the Kerî דְּרָבוֹ: the former refers to manner of life in general; the latter (as at iii. 31 and elsewhere) to the conduct in separate cases; thus the one is just as appropriate as the other. In the circumstantial designation אִישׁ רָשָׁע (cf. xi. 7) we have the stamp of the distinction of different classes of men peculiar to the Book of Proverbs. הָעֵז (to make firm, defiant) had, vii. 13, פָּנִים as accus.; the פָּ here is not that used in metaphoristic expressions instead of the accus. obj., which we have spoken of at xv. 4, xx. 30, but that of the means; for the face is thought of, not as the object of the action, but, after Gesen. § 138. 1, as the means of its accomplishment: the godless makes (shows) firmness, i.e. defiance, accessibility to no admonition, with his countenance; but the upright considers, i.e. proves (xiv. 8), his way. בִּין (הַבִּין) means a perceiving of the object in its specific peculiarity, an understanding of its constituent parts and essential marks; it denotes knowing an event analytically, as הַשְׂכִּיל, as well as synthetically (cf. Arab. shakl), and is thus used as the expression of a perception, which apprehends the object not merely immediately, but closely examines into its circumstances.

If we further seek for the boundaries, the proverbs regarding the rich and the poor, xxii. 2, 7, 16, present themselves as such, and this the more surely as xxii. 16 is without contradiction the terminus. Thus we take first together xxi. 30–xxii. 2.

Ver. 30 No wisdom and no understanding,
And no counsel is there against Jahve.

The expression might also be לִפְנֵי ה' ; but the predominating sense would then be, that no wisdom appears to God as such, that He values none as such. With לִנְגַר the proverb is more objective: there is no wisdom which, compared with His, can be regarded as such (cf. 1 Cor. iii. 19), none which can boast itself against Him, or can at all avail against Him (לִנְגַר, as Dan. x. 12; Neh. iii. 37); whence it follows (as Job xxviii. 28) that the wisdom of man consists in the fear of God the Alone-wise, or, which is the same thing, the All-wise. Immanuel interprets חֲכָמָה of theology, תְּבוּנָה of worldly science, עֵצָה of politics; but חֲכָמָה is used of the knowledge of truth, i.e. of that which truly is and continues; תְּבוּנָה of criticism, and עֵצָה of system and method; vid. at i. 2, viii. 14, from which latter passage the LXX. has substituted here נְבוּרָה instead of תְּבוּנָה. Instead of לִנְגַר ה' it translates πρὸς τὸν ἀσεβῆ, i.e. for that which is נגד ה' against Jahve.

Ver. 31 The horse is harnessed for the day of battle;
But with Jahve is the victory,

i.e. it remains with Him to give the victory or not, for the horse is a vain means of victory, Isa. xxxiii. 17; the battle is the Lord's, 1 Sam. xvii. 47, i.e. it depends on Him how the battle shall issue; and king and people who have taken up arms in defence of their rights have thus to trust nothing in the multitude of their war-horses (סוּיִם, horses, including their riders), and generally in their preparations for the battle, but in the Lord (cf. Ps. xx. 8, and, on the contrary, Isa. xxxi. 1). The LXX. translates הַתְּשׁוּעָה by ἡ βοήθεια, as if the Arab. name of victory, nasr, proceeding from this fundamental meaning, stood in the text; חֲשׂוּעָה (from יָשַׁע, Arab. ws', to be wide, to have free space for motion) signifies properly prosperity, as the contrast of distress, oppression, slavery, and victory (cf. e.g. Ps. cxliv. 10, and יִשְׁעָה, 1 Sam. xiv. 45). The post-bibl. Heb. uses נִצָּח

(נִצְחוֹן) for victory; but the O. T. Heb. has no word more fully covering this idea than תְּשׁוּעָה (ישועה).<sup>1</sup>

Chap. xxii. 1 A good name has the preference above great riches;
For more than silver and gold is grace.

The proverb is constructed chiasmically; the commencing word נִבְרָר (cf. xxi. 3), and the concluding word טוב, are the parallel predicates; rightly, none of the old translators have been misled to take together הֵן טוב, after the analogy of שָׂבַל טוב, iii. 14, xiii. 15. שָׂם also does not need טוב for nearer determination; the more modern idiom uses שָׂם טוב,<sup>2</sup> the more ancient uses שָׂם alone (e.g. Eccles. vii. 1), in the sense of ὄνομα καλόν (thus here LXX.); for being well known (renowned) is equivalent to a name, and the contrary to being nameless (Job xxx. 8); to make oneself a name, is equivalent to build a monument in honour of oneself; possibly the derivation of the word from שָׂמָה, to be high, prominent, known, may have contributed to this meaning of the word sensu eximio, for שָׂם has the same root word as שָׂמִים. Luther translates שָׂם by Das Gerücht [rumour, fame], in the same pregnant sense; even to the present day, renom, renommée, riputazione, and the like, are thus used. The parallel הֵן signifies grace and favour (being beloved); grace, which brings favour (xi. 16); and favour, which is the consequence of a graceful appearance, courtesy, and demeanour (e.g. Esth. ii. 15).

Ver. 2 The rich and the poor meet together;
The creator of them all is Jahve.

From this, that God made them all, i.e. rich and poor in the totality of their individuals, it follows that the meeting together is His will and His ordinance; they shall in life push one against another, and for what other purpose than that this relationship of mutual intercourse should be a school of virtue: the poor shall not envy the rich (iii. 31), and the rich shall not despise the poor, who has the same God and Father as himself (xiv. 31, xvii. 5; Job xxxi. 15); they shall remain conscious of this, that the intermingling of the diversities of station is for this end, that the lowly should serve the exalted, and the exalted should serve the lowly. xxix. 13 is a variation; there also for both, but particularly for the rich, lies in the proverb a solemn warning.

<sup>1</sup> In the old High German, the word for war is urlag (urlac), fate, because the issue is the divine determination, and nôt (as in "der Nibelunge Not"), as binding, confining, restraint; this nôt is the correlate to תְּשׁוּעָה, victory; as bindung corresponds most to the French guerre, which is not of Romanic, but of German origin: the Werre, i.e. the Gewirre [complication, confusion], for נִלְחָם signifies to press against one another, to be engaged in close conflict; cf. the Homeric κλύος of the turmoil of battle.

The group of proverbs beginning here terminates at ver. 7, where, like the preceding, it closes with a proverb of the rich and the poor.

Ver. 3 The prudent seeth the evil, and hideth himself;
But the simple go forward, and suffer injury.

This proverb repeats itself with insignificant variations, xxvii. 12. The Keri וַיִּסְתֵּר makes it more conformable to the words there used. The Chethib is not to be read וַיִּסְתֵּר, for this Kal is inusit., but וַיִּפְתֹּר, or much rather וַיִּפְתֹּר, since it is intended to be said what immediate consequence on the part of a prudent man arises from his perceiving an evil standing before him; he sees, e.g., the approaching overthrow of a decaying house, or in a sudden storm the fearful flood, and betimes betakes himself to a place of safety; the simple, on the contrary, go blindly forward into the threatening danger, and must bear the punishment of their carelessness. The fut. consec. 3a denotes the hiding of oneself as that which immediately follows from the being observant; the two perf. 3b, on the other hand, with or without ו, denote the going forward and meeting with punishment as occurring contemporaneously (cf. Ps. xlvi. 6, and regarding these diverse forms of construction, at Hab. iii. 10). "The interchange of the sing. and plur. gives us to understand that several or many simple ones are found for one prudent man" (Hitzig). The Niph. of עָנַשׁ signifies properly to be punished by pecuniary fine (Ex. xxi. 22) (cf. the post-bibl. עָנַשׁ, עָנַשׁ, to threaten punishment, which appears to have arisen from censere, to estimate, to lay on taxes); here it has the general meaning of being punished, viz. of the self-punishment of want of foresight.

Ver. 4 The reward of humility is the fear of Jahve,
Is riches, and honour, and life.

As עֲנִיּוּת־צְדָקָה, Ps. xlv. 5, is understood of the two virtues, meekness and righteousness, so here the three Göttingen divines (Ewald, Bertheau, and Elster), as also Dunasch, see in יְרֵאת ה' an asyndeton; the poet would then have omitted vav, because instead of the copulative connection he preferred the appositional (Schultens: præmium mansuetudinis quæ est reverentia Jehovæ) or the permutative (the reward of humility; more accurately expressed: the fear of God). It is in favour of this interpretation that the verse following (ver. 5) also shows an asyndeton. Luther otherwise: where one abides in the fear of the Lord; and Oetinger: the reward of humility, endurance, calmness in the fear of the Lord, is . . .; Fleischer also interprets יְרֵאת ה' as xxi. 4, הַטָּמֵא (lucerna impiorum vitiosa), as the accus. of the nearer definition. But then is the nearest-lying construction: the reward of humility is the fear of God, as all old interpreters understand 4a (e.g. Symmachus, ὑστερον πρᾶντητος φόβος κυρίου), a thought so incomprehensible, that one must adopt one or other of these expedients? On the one side, we may indeed say that the fear of God brings humility with it; but, on the other hand, it is just as conformable to experience that the fear of God is a consequence of humility; for actually to subordinate oneself to God, and to give honour to Him alone, one must have broken his self-will, and come to the knowledge of himself in his dependence, nothingness, and sin; and one consequence by which humility is rewarded, may be called the fear of God, because it is the root of all wisdom, or as is here said (cf. iii. 16, viii. 18), because riches, and honour, and life are in its train. Thus 4a is a concluded sentence, which in 4b is so continued, that from 4a the predicate is to be continued: the reward of humility is the fear of God; it is at the same time riches . . . Hitzig conjectures יְרֵאת ה', the beholding Jahve; but the visio Dei (beatifica) is not a dogmatic idea thus expressed in the O. T. עָקַב denotes what follows a thing, from עָקַב, to tread on the heels (Fleischer); for עָקַב (Arab. 'akīb) is the heels, as the incurvation of the foot; and עָקַב, the consequence (cf. Arab. 'akb, 'ukb, posteritas), is mediated through the v. denom. עָקַב, to tread on the heels, to follow on the heels (cf.

denominatives, such as Arab. batn, zahr, 'ân, יָע, to strike the body, the back, the eye).

Ver. 5 Thorns, snares, are on the way of the crooked ;

He that guardeth his soul, let him keep far from them.

Rightly the Venet. ἀκανθαι παγίδες ἐν ὁδῷ στρεβλοῦ. The meaning of יָעִים (plur. of יָע, or יָעָע, the same as יָעִיָעִי) and יָעָע (from יָע, Arab. fah), stands fast, though it be not etymologically verified ; the placing together of these two words (the LXX. obliterating the asyndeton : τριβόλος καὶ παγίδες) follows the scheme יָעָע יָע, Hab. iii. 11. The יָעָעִי (perverse of heart, crooked, xvii. 20, xi. 20) drives his crooked winding way, corresponding to his habit of mind, which is the contrast and the perversion of that which is just, a way in which there are thorns which entangle and wound those who enter thereon, snares which unexpectedly bring them down and hold them fast as prisoners ; the hedge of thorns, xv. 19, was a figure of the hindrances in the way of the wicked themselves. The thorn and snares here are a figure of the hindrances and dangers which go forth from the deceitful and the false in the way of others, of those who keep their souls, i.e. who outwardly and morally take heed to their life (xvi. 17, xiii. 3, pred. here subj.), who will keep, or are disposed to keep, themselves from these thorns, these snares into which the deceitful and perverse-hearted seek to entice them.

Ver. 6 Give to the child instruction conformably to His way ;

So he will not, when he becomes old, depart from it.

The first instruction is meant which, communicated to the child, should be יָעָעִי, after the measure (Gen. xliii. 7 = post-bibl. יָעָעִי and יָעָעִי) of his way, i.e. not : of his calling, which he must by and by enter upon (Bertheau, Zöckler), which יָעָעִי of itself cannot mean ; also not : of the way which he must keep in during life (Kidduschin 30a) ; nor : of his individual nature (Elster) ; but : of the nature of the child as such, for יָעָעִי is the child's way, as e.g. derek col-haarets, Gen. xix. 31, the general custom of the land ; derek Mitsrâyim, Isa. x. 24, the way (the manner of acting) of the Egyptians. The instruction of youth, the education of youth, ought to be conformed to the nature of youth ; the matter of instruction, the manner of instruction, ought to regulate itself according to the stage of life, and its peculiarities; the method ought to be arranged according to the degree of development which the mental and bodily life of the youth has arrived at. The verb הִנְיָה is a denominative like עָקַב, ver. 4; it signifies to affect the taste, הִיָּה (= הִנְיָה), in the Arab. to put date syrup into the mouth of the suckling; so that we may compare with it the saying of Horace, [Ep. i. 2, 69]: Quo semel est imbuta recens servabit odorem Testa diu. In the post-bibl. Heb. הִנְיָה denotes that which in the language of the Church is called catechizatio; סֵפֶר (לִנְעָר) הַחֲנֻךְ is the usual title of the catechisms. It is the fundamental and first requisite of all educational instruction which the proverb formulates, a suitable motto for the lesson-books of pedagogues and catechists. מִפְּנֵיהָ [from it] refers to that training of youth, in conformity with his nature, which becomes a second nature, that which is imprinted, inbred, becomes accustomed. Ver. 6 is wanting in the LXX.; where it exists in MSS. of the LXX., it is supplied from Theodotion; the Complut. translates independently from the Heb. text.

Ver. 7 A rich man will rule over the poor,

And the borrower is subject to the man who lends.

“This is the course of the world. As regards the sing. and plur. in 7a, there are many poor for one rich; and in the Orient the rule is generally in the hands of one” (Hitzig). The fut. denotes how it will and must happen, and the substantival clause 7b, which as such is an expression of continuance (Arab. thabât, i.e. of the remaining and continuing), denotes that contracting of debt brings naturally with it a slavish relation of dependence. לֹוֶה, properly he who binds himself to one se ei obligat, and מַלְוֶה, as xix. 17 (vid. l.c.), qui alterum (mutui datione) obligat, from לָוָה, Arab. lwy, to wind, turn, twist round (cog. root laff), whence with Fleischer is also to be derived the Aram. לָוִת, “into connection;” so אָל, properly “pushing against,” refers to the radically related אָלָה (= ולָה), contiguum esse. אִישׁ מַלְוֶה is one who puts himself in the way of lending, although not directly in a professional manner. The pred. precedes its subject according to rule. Luther rightly translates: and he who borrows is the lender’s servant, whence the pun on the proper names: “Borghart [= the borrower] is Lehnhart’s [= lender’s] servant.”

The group now following extends to the end of this first collection of Solomon's proverbs; it closes also with a proverb of the poor and the rich.

Ver. 8 He that soweth iniquity shall reap calamity;
And the rod of his fury shall vanish away.

“Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap” (Gal. vi. 7); he that soweth good reapeth good, xi. 18; he that soweth evil reapeth evil, Job iv. 8; cf. Hos. x. 12 f.  $\text{עֹלָה}$  is the direct contrast of  $\text{צִדְקָה}$  or  $\text{יֵשׁ}$  (e.g. Ps. cxxv. 3, cvii. 42), proceeding from the idea that the good is right, i.e. straight, rectum; the evil, that which departs from the straight line, and is crooked. Regarding  $\text{אֲסָף}$ , which means both perversity of mind and conduct, as well as destiny, calamity, vid. xii. 21. That which the poet particularly means by  $\text{עֹלָה}$  is shown in 8b, viz. unsympathizing tyranny, cruel misconduct toward a neighbour.  $\text{שֵׁבֶט עֲבָרָתוֹ}$  is the rod which he who soweth iniquity makes another to feel in his anger. The saying, that an end will be to this rod of his fury, agrees with that which is said of the despot's sceptre, Isa. xiv. 5 f.; Ps. cxxv. 3. Rightly Fleischer: baculus insolentiae ejus consumetur h. e. facultas qua pollet alios insolenter tractandi evanescet. Hitzig's objection, that a rod does not vanish away, but is broken, is answered by this, that the rod is thought of as brandished; besides, one uses  $\text{לָקַח}$  of anything which has an end, e.g. Isa. xvi. 4. Other interpreters understand “the rod of his fury” of the rod of God's anger, which will strike the  $\text{עָל}$  and  $\text{יִכְלֶה}$ , as at Ezek. v. 13; Dan. xii. 7: “and the rod of His punishment will surely come” (Ewald, and similarly Schultens, Euchel, Umbreit). This thought also hovers before the LXX.:  $\text{πληγὴν δὲ ἔργων αὐτοῦ (עֲבָרָתוֹ) συντελέσει (יִכְלֶה)}$ . But if the rod of punishment which is appointed for the unrighteous be meant, then we would have expected  $\text{יִכְלֶה}$ . Taken in the future, the  $\text{לָקַח}$  of the  $\text{שֵׁבֶט}$  is not its confectio in the sense of completion, but its termination or annihilation; and besides, it lies nearer after 8a to take the suffix of  $\text{עֲבָרָתוֹ}$  subjectively (Isa. xiv. 6, xvi. 6) than objectively. The LXX. has, after ver. 8, a distich:—

 $\text{ματαιότητα δὲ ἔργων αὐτοῦ συντελέσει.}$

The first line (2 Cor. ix. 7) is a variant translation of 9a (cf. xxi. 17), the second ( $\text{עֲבָרָתוֹ}$  וְשֵׁבֶט) is a similar rendering of 8b.

Ver. 9 He who is friendly is blessed ;
Because he giveth of his bread to the poor.

The thought is the same as at xi. 25. עֵן טוֹב (thus to be written without Makkeph, with Munach of the first word, with correct Codd., also 1294 and Jaman), the contrast of עֵן רַע, xxiii. 6, xxii. 22, i.e. the envious, evil-eyed, ungracious (post-bibl. also עֵן צַר), is one who looks kindly, is good-hearted, and as ἰλαρὸς δότης, shows himself benevolent. Such gentleness and kindness is called in the Mishna עֵן טוֹבָה (Aboth ii. 13), or עֵן יָפֵי. Such a friend is blessed, for he has also himself scattered blessings (cf. נִסְחָהוּ, xi. 25, xxi. 13); he has, as is said, looking back from the blessing that has happened to him, given of his bread (Luther, as the LXX., with partitive genitive: seines brots [= of his bread]) to the poor; cf. the unfolding of this blessing of self-denying love, Isa. viii. The LXX. has also here another distich:

Νίκην καὶ τιμὴν περιποιεῖται ὁ δῶρα δοῦς,
Τὴν μέντοι ψυχὴν ἀφαιρεῖται τῶν κεκτημένων.

The first line appears a variant translation of xix. 6*b*, and the second of i. 19*b*, according to which selfishness, in contrast to liberality, is the subject to be thought of. Ewald translates the second line:

And he (who distributes gifts) conquers the soul of the recipients.

But κεκτημένος = לְעַבְדֵּי (לְעַבְדֵּי) signifies the possessor, not the recipient of anything as a gift, who cannot also be here meant because of the μέντοι.

Ver. 10 Chase away the scorner, and contention goeth out,
And strife and reproach rest.

If in a company, a circle of friends, a society (LXX. ἔκβαλε ἐκ συνεδρίου), a wicked man is found who (vid. the definition of רָצֵל, xxi. 24) treats religious questions without respect, moral questions in a frivolous way, serious things jestingly, and in his scornful spirit, his passion for witticism, his love of anecdote, places himself above the duty of showing reverence, veneration, and respect, there will arise ceaseless contentions and conflicts. Such a man one ought to chase away; then there will immediately go forth along with him dispeace (מְרִיבֵי), there will then be rest from strife and disgrace, viz. of the strife which such a one draws forth, and the disgrace which it brings on the society, and continually prepares for it. קלון is commonly understood of the injury, abuse, which others have to suffer from the scoffer, or also (thus Fleischer, Hitzig) of the opprobria of the contentious against one another. But קלון is not so used; it means always disgrace, as something that happens, an experience, vid. at xviii. 3. The praise of one who is the direct contrast of a לץ is celebrated in the next verse.

Ver. 11 He that loveth heart-purity,

Whose is grace of lips, the king is his friend.

Thus with Hitzig, it is to be translated not: he who loveth with a pure heart,—we may interpret טהור-לב syntactically in the sense of puritate cordis or purus corde (Ralbag, Ewald, after xx. 7), for that which follows אהב and is its supplement has to stand where possible as the accus. of the object; thus not: qui amat puritatem cordis, gratiosa erunt labia ejus (de Dieu, Geier, Schultens, C. B. Michaelis, Fleischer), for between heart-purity and graciousness of speech there exists a moral relation, but yet no necessary connection of sequence; also not: he who loves purity of heart, and grace on his lips (Aben Ezra, Schelling, Bertheau), for “to love the grace of one’s own lips” is an awkward expression, which sounds more like reprehensible self-complacency than a praiseworthy endeavour after gracious speech. Excellently Luther:

“He who has a true heart and amiable speech,

טהור-לב is not adjectival, but substantival; טהור is thus not the constr. of the mas. טהור, as Job xvii. 10, but of the segolate טהר, or (since the ground-form of נָבִיהַ, 1 Sam. xvi. 7, may be נָבִיהַ as well as נִבְיָהַ) of the neut. טהור, like קָדֵשׁ, Ps. xlvi. 5, lxv. 5: that which is pure, the being pure = purity (Schultens). הוּן שְׁפָתָיו (gracefulness of his lips) is the second subject with the force of a relative clause, although not exactly thus thought of, but: one loving heart-purity, gracefulness on his lips—the king is his friend. Ewald otherwise: “he will be the king’s friend,” after the scheme xiii. 4; but here unnecessarily refined. A counsellor and associate who is governed by a pure intention, and connects therewith a gentle and amiable manner of speech and conversation, attaches the king to himself; the king is the רֵעֵה (רֵעַ), the friend of such an one, and he also is “the friend of the king," 1 Kings iv. 5. It is a Solomonic proverb, the same in idea as xvi. 13. The LXX., Syr., and Targ. introduce after אלה the name of God; but 11b does not syntactically admit of this addition. But it is worth while to take notice of an interpretation which is proposed by Jewish interpreters: the friend of such an one is a king, i.e. he can royally rejoice in him and boast of him. The thought is beautiful; but, as the comparison of other proverbs speaking of the king shows, is not intended.

Ver. 12 The eyes of Jahve preserve knowledge;
So He frustrateth the words of the false.

The phrase "to preserve knowledge" is found at v. 2; there, in the sense of to keep, retain; here, of protecting, guarding; for it cannot possibly be said that the eyes of God keep themselves by the rule of knowledge, and thus preserve knowledge; this predicate is not in accord with the eyes, and is, as used of God, even inappropriate. On the other hand, after "to preserve," in the sense of watching, guarding a concrete object is to be expected, cf. Isa. xxvi. 3. We need not thus with Ewald supply יודע; the ancients are right that דעת, knowledge, stands metonymically for איש (Meiri), or אנשי (Aben Ezra), or יודעי דעת (Arama); Schultens rightly: Cognitio veritatis ac virtutis practica fertur ad homines eam colentes ac prestantes. Where knowledge of the true and the good exists, there does it stand under the protection of God. 12b shows how that is meant, for there the perf. is continued in the second consec. modus (fut. consec.): there is thus protection against the assaults of enemies who oppose the knowledge which they hate, and seek to triumph over it, and to suppress it by their crooked policy. But God stands on the side of knowledge and protects it, and consequently makes vain the words (the outspoken resolutions) of the deceitful. Regarding סָלַף (סִלְפָּה), vid. xi. 3 and xix. 3. The meaning of סָלַף דְּבָרָי is here essentially different from that in Ex. xxiii. 8, Deut. xvi. 19: he perverteth their words, for he giveth them a bearing that is false, i.e. not leading to the end. Hitzig reads רעות [wickedness] for דעת, which Zöckler is inclined to favour: God keeps the evil which is done in His eyes, and hinders its success; but "to observe wickedness" is an ambiguous, untenable expression; the only passage that can be quoted in favour of this "to observe" is Job vii. 20. The word רעַת, handed down without variation, is much rather justified.

Ver. 13 The sluggard saith, "A lion is without,
I shall be slain in the midst of the streets."

Otherwise rendered, xxvi. 13. There, as here, the perf. אָמַר has the meaning of an abstract present, Gesen. § 126. 3. The activity of the industrious has its nearest sphere at home; but here a work is supposed which requires him to go forth (Ps. civ. 3) into the field (Prov. xxiv. 27). Therefore הַרְץ stands first, a word of wide signification, which here denotes the open country outside the city, where the sluggard fears to meet a lion, as in the streets, i.e. the rows of houses forming them, to meet a רֹצֵחַ (מְרִיצֵחַ), i.e. a murder from motives of robbery or revenge. This strong word, properly to destroy, crush, Arab. radkh, is intentionally chosen: there is designed to be set forth the ridiculous hyperbolical pretence which the sluggard seeks for his slothfulness (Fleischer). Luther right well: "I might be murdered on the streets." But there is intentionally the absence of אֵילִי [perhaps] and of כִּן [lest]. Meïri here quotes a passage of the moralists: מְמוֹפְתֵי הָעֵצֶל הַנְּבוֹאָה (propheying) belongs to the evidences of the sluggard; and Euchel, the proverb העֵצֶלִים מְתַנְּבָאִים (the sluggard's prophecy), i.e. the sluggard acts like a prophet, that he may palliate his slothfulness.

Ver. 14 A deep pit is the mouth of a strange woman;
He that is cursed of God falleth therein.

The first line appears in a different form as a synonymous distich, xxiii. 27. The LXX. translate στόμα παρανόμου without certainly indicating which word they here read, whether רַע (iv. 14), or רִשָׁע (xxix. 12), or נָלוֹחַ (iii. 32). xxiii. 27 is adduced in support of זָרוֹת (vid. ii. 16); זָנוֹת (harlots) are meant, and it is not necessary thus to read with Ewald. The mouth of this strange woman or depraved Israelitess is a deep ditch (שְׂוֹתָה עֲמֻקָּה, otherwise עֲמֻקָּה, as xxiii. 27a, where also occurs <sup>1</sup>עֲמֻקָּה), namely, a snare-pit into which he is enticed by her wanton words; the man who stands in fellowship with God is armed against this syren voice; but the 'ה עוֹמֵי, i.e. he who is an object of the divine עוֹמֵי (Venet. κεχολωμένος τῷ ὀντωτῇ), indignation, punishing evil with evil, falls into the pit, yielding to the seduction and the ruin. Schultens explains 'ה עוֹמֵי by, is in quem despumat indignabundus; but the meaning despumat is not substantiated; עוֹמֵי, cf. Arab. zaghm, is probably a word which by its sound denoted anger as a hollow roaring, and like pealing thunder. The LXX. has, after ver. 14, three tedious moralizing lines.

Ver. 15 Folly is bound to the heart of a child;
The rod of correction driveth it forth.

Folly, i.e. pleasure in stupid tricks, silly sport, and foolish behaviour, is the portion of children as such; their heart is as yet childish, and folly is bound up in it. Education first driveth forth this childish, foolish nature (for, as Menander says:

‘Ο μὴ δαρείς ἀνθρώπος οὐ παιδεύεται), and it effects this when it is unindulgently severe: the שִׁבֹּט מוֹסֵר (vid. xxiii. 13) removeth חֵלֶב הַלֵּב from the heart, for it imparts intelligence and makes wise (xxix. 15). The LXX. is right in rendering 16a: ἀνοία ἐξήπται (from ἐξάπτειν) καρδίας νέου; but the Syr. has “here mangled the LXX., and in haste has read ἀνοία ἐξίπτται: folly makes the understanding of the child fly away” (Lagarde).

Ver. 16 Whosoever oppresses the lowly, it is gain to him;
Whosoever giveth to the rich, it is only loss.

It is before all clear that לְהַרְבוֹת and לְמַחֲסוֹר, as at xxi. 5, לְמוֹתָר and לְמַחֲסוֹר, are contrasted words, and form the conclusions to the participles used, with the force of hypothetical antecedents. Jerome recognises this: qui calumniatur pauperem, ut augeat divitias suas, dabit ipse ditiori et egebit. So Rashi, who by עשיר thinks on heathen potentates. Proportionally better Euchel, referring עשיר and ליתן, not to one person, but to two classes of men: he who oppresses the poor to enrich himself, and is liberal toward the rich, falls under want. The antithetic distich thus becomes an integral one,—the antithesis manifestly intended is not brought out. This may be said also against Bertheau, who too ingeniously explains: He who oppresses the poor to enrich himself gives to a rich man, i.e. to himself, the enriched, only to want, i.e. only to lose again that which he gained unrighteously. Ralbag is on the right track, for he suggests the explanation: he who oppresses the poor, does it to his gain, for he thereby impels him to a more energetic exercise of his strength; he who gives to the rich man does it to his own loss, because the rich man does not thank him for it, and still continues to look down on him. But if one refers לו to the poor, then it lies nearer to interpret אֶךְ לְמַחֲסוֹר of the rich: he who gives presents to the rich only thereby promotes his sleepy indolence, and so much the more robs him of activity (Elster); for that which one gives to him is only swallowed up in the whirlpool of his extravagance (Zöckler). Thus Hitzig also explains, who remarks, under 17a: "Oppression produces reaction, awakens energy, and thus God on the whole overrules events" (Ex. i. 12). Similarly also Ewald, who thinks on a mercenary, unrighteous rich man: God finally lifts up the oppressed poor man; the rich man always becoming richer, on the contrary, is "punished for all his wickedness only more and more." But with all these explanations there is too much read between the lines. Since אֶךְ לְמַחֲסוֹר (xi. 24, xxi. 5) refers back to the subject: himself to mere loss, so also will it be here; and the LXX., Symmachus, Jerome (cf. also the Syr. auget malum suum) are right when they also refer לו, not to the poor man, but to the oppressor of the poor. We explain: he who extorts from the poor enriches himself thereby; but he who gives to the rich has nothing, and less than nothing, thereby—he robs himself, has no thanks, only brings himself by many gifts lower and lower down. In the first case at least, 17a, the result corresponds to the intention; but in this latter case, 17b, one gains only bitter disappointment.

FIRST APPENDIX TO THE FIRST COLLECTION OF SOLOMONIC PROVERBS.—XXII. 17-XXIV. 22.

The last group of distiches, beginning with x. 1, closed at xxii. 16 with a proverb of the poor and the rich, as that before the last, vid. at xxii. 7. In xxii. 17 ff., the law of the distich form is interrupted, and the tone of the introductory Mashals is again perceptible. Here begins an appendix to the older Book of Proverbs, introduced by these Mashals. Vid. regarding the style and proverbial form of this introduction, at pages 4 and 16 of vol. i.

xxii. 17-21, forming the introduction to this appendix, are these Words of the Wise :

- Ver. 17 Incline thine ear and hear the words of the wise,
And direct thine heart to my knowledge!
18 For it is pleasant if thou keep them in thine heart ;
Let them abide together on thy lips.
19 That thy trust may be placed in Jahve,
I have taught thee to-day, even thee !
20 Have not I written unto thee choice proverbs, Containing counsels and knowledge,
21 To make thee to know the rule of the words of truth,
That thou mightest bring back words which are truth to them that send thee ?

From x. 1 to xxii. 16 are the "Proverbs of Solomon," and not "The Words of the Wise;" thus the above παράλειψις is not an epilogue, but a prologue to the following proverbs. The perfects הוֹרַעְתִּיךָ and כָּתַבְתִּי refer, not to the Solomonic proverbial discourses, but to the appendix following them; the preface commends the worth and intention of this appendix, and uses perfects because it was written after the forming of the collection. The author of this preface (vid. pp. 23, 36, vol. i.) is no other than the author of i.-ix. The הָטָה (with Mehuppach, after Thorath Emeth, p. 27) reminds us of iv. 20, v. 1. The phrase שִׁית לִבְךָ, animum advertere, occurs again in the second appendix, xxiv. 32. נָעַם is repeated at xxiii. 8, xxiv. 4; but נָעַם with נָעַם is common in the preface, i.-ix. בִּי-נָעַם contains, as at Ps. cxxxv. 3, cxlvii. 1, its subject in itself. בִּי-תִשְׁמְרֵם is not this subject: this that thou preservest them, which would have required rather the infin. שְׁמַרְם (Ps. cxxxiii. 1) or לְשָׁמְרֵם; but it supposes the case in which appears that which is amiable and praiseworthy: if thou preservest them in thy heart, i.e. makest them thoughtfully become thy mental possession. The suffix ם— refers to the Words of the Wise, and mediately also to לְרַעְתִּי, for the author designates his practical wisdom רַעְתִּי, which is laid down in the following proverbs, which, although not composed by him, are yet penetrated by his subjectivity. Regarding בְּטֵן, which, from meaning the inner parts of the body, is transferred to the inner parts of the mind, vid. under xx. 27. The clause 18*b*, if not dependent on כִּי, would begin with וַיִּבְנֵי. The absence of the copula and the antecedence of the verb bring the optative rendering nearer. Different is the syntactical relation of v. 2, where the infin. is continued in the fin. The fut. Niph. יִבְנֵי, which, iv. 27, meant to be rightly placed, rightly directed, here means: to stand erect, to have continuance, stabilem esse. In ver. 19, the fact of instruction precedes the statement of its object, which is, that the disciple may place his confidence in Jahve, for he does that which is according to His will, and is subject to His rule. מְבַטְחֶךָ, in Codd. and correct editions with Pathach (vid. Michlol 184*b*); the ך is as virtually doubled; vid. under xxi. 22. In 19*b* the accentuation הַיּוֹם הוֹדַעְתִּיךָ הַיּוֹם is contrary to the syntax; Codd. and old editions have rightly הַיּוֹם הוֹדַעְתִּיךָ אַתָּה, for אַתָּה אַתָּה is, after Gesen. § 121. 3, an emphatic repetition of the “thee;” אַתָּה, like אַתָּה, xxiii. 15; 1 Kings xxi. 19. Hitzig knows of no contrast which justifies the emphasis. But the prominence thus effected is not always of the nature of contrast (cf. Zech. vii. 5, have ye truly fasted to me, i.e. to serve me thereby), here it is strong individualizing; the te etiam te is equivalent to, thee as others, and thee in particular. Also that, as Hitzig remarks, there does not appear any reason for the emphasizing of “to-day,” is incorrect: הַיּוֹם is of the same signification as at Ps. xcv. 7; the reader of the following proverbs shall remember later, not merely in general, that he once on a time read them, but that he to-day, that he on this definite day, received the lessons of wisdom contained therein, and then, from that time forth, became responsible for his obedience or his disobedience.

In 20*a* the Chethib שְׁלֹשׁוֹם denotes no definite date; besides, this word occurs only always along with  $\text{לְמַעַן} \text{לִמְנוּל}$  ( $\text{לְמַעַן לִמְנוּל}$ ). Umbreit, Ewald, Bertheau, however, accept this “formerly (lately),” and suppose that the author here refers to a “Book for Youths,” composed at an earlier period, without one seeing what this reference, which had a meaning only for his contemporaries, here denotes. The LXX. reads  $\text{כְּתִיבָהּ}$ , and finds in 20a, contrary to the syntax and the usus loq., the exhortation that he who is addressed ought to write these good doctrines thrice ( $\text{τρισσωδς}$ ) on the tablet of his heart; the Syr. and Targ. suppose the author to say that he wrote them three times; Jerome, that he wrote them threefold—both without any visible meaning, since threefold cannot be equivalent to manchfeltiglich (Luther) [= several times, in various ways]. Also the Keṛī  $\text{שְׁלִישִׁים}$ , which without doubt is the authentic word, is interpreted in many unacceptable ways; Rashi and Elia Wilna, following a Midrash explanation, think on the lessons of the Law, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa; Arama, on those which are referable to three classes of youth; Malbim (as if here the author of the whole Book of Proverbs, from i. to xxxi., spake), on the supposed three chief parts of the Mishle; Dächsel better, on i.—ix., as the product of the same author as this appendix. Schultens compares Eccles. iv. 12, and translates triplici filo nexa. Kimchi, Meiri, and others, are right, who gloss  $\text{שְׁלִישִׁים}$  by  $\text{דְּבָרִים}$  and  $\text{נִכְבְּדִים}$ , and compare  $\text{נִגְיִדִים}$ , viii. 6; accordingly the Veneta, with the happy quid pro quo, by τρισμαέγιστα. The LXX. translates the military  $\text{שְׁלִישִׁים}$  by τριστάρτης; but this Greek word is itself obscure, and is explained by Hesychius (as well as by Suidas, and in the Etymologicum) by Regii satellites qui ternas hastas manu tenebant, which is certainly false. Another Greek, whom Angellius quotes, says, under Ex. xv. 4, that τριστάρτης was the name given to the warriors who fought from a chariot, every three of whom had one war-chariot among them; and this appears, according to Ex. xiv. 7, xv. 4, to be really the primary meaning. In the period of David we meet with the word  $\text{שְׁלִישִׁים}$  as the name of the heroes (the Gibbórim) who stood nearest the king. The shalish-men form the élite troops that stood highest in rank, at whose head stood two triads of heroes, —Jashobeam at the head of the first trias, and thus of the shalish-men generally; Abishai at the head of the second trias, who held an honourable place among the shalish-men, but yet reached not to that first trias, 2 Sam. xxiii. 8 ff. (= 1 Chron. xi. 11 ff.). The name הַשְּׁלִישִׁים (Apoc. 2 Sam. xxiii. 8, הַשְּׁלִישִׁי, and ver. 13, 1 Chron. xxvii. 6, incorrectly הַשְּׁלִישִׁים) occurs here with reference to the threefold division of this principal host; and in regard to the use of the word in the time of Pharaoh, as well as in the time of the kings, it may be granted that shalish denoted the Three-man (triumvir), and then generally a high military officer; so that שְׁלִישִׁים here has the same relation to גְּנֵרִים, viii. 6, as ducalia to principalia. The name of the chief men (members of the chief troop) is transferred to the chief proverbs, as, Jas. ii. 8, that law which stands as a king at the head of all the others is called the "royal law;" or, as Plato names the chief powers of the soul, μέρη ἡγεμόνες. As in this Platonic word-form, so shalishim here, like negidim there, is understood neut., cf. under viii. 6, and רִיבִים, xii. 11; יִשְׂרִים, xvi. 13. The כּ of בְּמַעְצוֹת (occurring at i. 31 also) Fleischer rightly explains as the כּ of uniting or accompanying: chief proverbs which contain good counsels and solid knowledge.

In the statement of the object in ver. 21, we interpret that which follows לְהוֹרִיעֶךָ not permutat.: ut te docerem recta, verba vera (Fleischer); but קִשְׁטָא (ground-form to קִשְׁטָא, Ps. lx. 6) is the bearer of the threefold idea: rectitudinem, or, better, regulam verborum veritatis. The (Arab.) verb kasiṭa means to be straight, stiff, inflexible (synon. צָרַק, to be hard, tight, proportionately direct); and the name kist denotes not only the right conduct, the right measure (quantitas justa), but also the balance, and thus the rule or the norm. In 21b, אֲמָרִים אֲמָת (as e.g. Zech. i. 13; vid. Philippi, Status Constr. p. 86 f.) is equivalent to אֲמָרֵי אֲמַת; the author has this second time intentionally chosen the appositional relation of connection: words which are truth; the idea of truth presents itself in this form of expression more prominently. Impossible, because contrary to the usus loq., is the translation: ut respondeas verba vera iis qui ad te mittunt (Schultens, Fleischer), because שְׁלַח, with the accus. following, never means "to send any one." Without doubt הַשִּׁיב and שְׁלַח stand in correlation to each other: he who lets himself be instructed must be supposed to be in circumstances to bring home, to those that sent him out to learn, doctrines which are truth, and thus to approve himself. The subject spoken of here is not a right answer or a true report brought back to one giving a commission; and it lies beyond the purpose and power of the following proverbs to afford a universal means whereby persons sent out are made skilful. The שְׁלִיחִים [senders] are here the parents or guardians who send him who is to be instructed to the school of the teacher of wisdom (Hitzig). Yet it appears strange that he who is the learner is just here not addressed as "my son," which would go to the support of the expression, "to send to school," which is elsewhere unused in Old Hebrew, and the שְׁלִיחֵי of another are elsewhere called those who make him their mandatar, x. 26, xxv. 13; 2 Sam. xxiv. 13. The reference to the parents would also be excluded if, with Norzi and other editors, לְשַׁלְּחֵי were to be read instead of לְשַׁלְּחֵי (the Venet. 1521, and most editions). Therefore the phrase לְשַׁלְּחֵי, which is preferred by Ewald, recommends itself, according to which the LXX. translates, τοῖς προβαλλομένοις σοι, which the Syro-Hexap. renders<sup>1</sup> by להגון דאחרין לך אחרתה, i.e. to those who lay problems before thee (vid. Lagarde). The teacher of wisdom seeks to qualify him who reads the following proverbs, and permits himself to be influenced by them, to give the right answer to those who question him and go to him for counsel, and thus to become himself a teacher of wisdom.

After these ten lines of preliminary exhortation, there now begins the collection of the "Words of the Wise" thus introduced. A tetrastich which, in its contents, connects itself with the last proverb of the Solomonic collection, xxii. 16, forms the commencement of this collection:

- Ver. 22 Rob not the lowly because he is lowly;
 And oppress not the humble in the gate.
 23 For Jahve will conduct their cause,
 And rob their spoilers of life.

Though it may bring gain, as said xxii. 16a, to oppress the גַּל, the lowly or humble, yet at last the oppressor comes to ruin. The poet here warns against robbing the lowly because he is lowly, and thus without power of defence, and not to be feared; and against doing injustice to the עָנִי, the bowed down, and therefore incapable of resisting in the gate, i.e. in the court of justice. These poor men have not indeed high human patrons, but One in heaven to undertake their cause: Jahve will conduct their cause (יְרִיב רִיבָם, as at xxiii. 10), i.e. will undertake their vindication, and be their avenger. דָּקָא (דָּקָה), Aram. and Arab. dakk (cf. דָּקָא, (Arab.) dakk), signifies to crush anything so that it becomes broad and flat, figuratively to oppress, synon. עֶשֶׂק (Fleischer). The verb קבע has, in Chald. and Syr., the signification to stick, to fix (according to which Aquila here translates καθηλουν, to nail; Jerome, configere); and as root-word to קָבַעַת, the signification to be arched, like (Arab.) kab', to be humpbacked; both significations are here unsuitable. The connection here requires the meaning to rob; and for Mal. iii. 8 also, this same meaning is to be adopted, robbery and taking from one by force (Parchon, Kimchi), not: to deceive (Köhler, Keil), although it might have the sense of robbing by withholding or refraining from doing that which is due, thus of a sacrilege committed by omission or deception. The Talm. does not know the verb קבע in this meaning; but it is variously found as a dialectic word for גָּזַל.<sup>1</sup> Schultens' etymological explanation, capitium injicere (after (Arab.) kab', to draw back and conceal the head), is not satisfactory. The construction, with the double accus., follows the analogy of הִקְפִּיז נַפְשׁ and the like, Gesen. § 139. 2. Regarding the sing. נַפְשׁ, even where several are spoken of, vid. under i. 19.

<sup>1</sup> Thus Rosch ha-schana 26b: Levi came once to N.N. There a man came to meet him, and cried out קבען פלניא. Levi knew not what he would say, and went into the Madrash-house to ask. One answered him: He is a robber (גזול) said that one to thee; for it is said in the Scriptures (Mal. iii. 8), "Will a man rob God?" etc. (vid. Wissenschaft Kunst Judenthum, p. 243). In the Midrash, שוהר טוב, to Ps. lvii., R. Levi says that אתה קיבע אתה לי is used in the sense of אתה גזול לי. And in the Midrash Tanchuma, P. תרומה, R. Levi answers the question, "What is the meaning of קבע, Mal. iii. 8?"—It is an Arabic expression. An Arabian, when he wishes to say to another גזול לי, says instead of it, מה אתה קובעני. Perhaps קבע is cogn. to קבץ; the R. קב coincides in several groups of languages (also the Turkish kb) with the Lat. capere.

- Vcr. 24 Have no intercourse with an angry man,
 And with a furious man go thou not;
 25 Lest thou adopt his ways,
 And bring destruction upon thy soul.

The Piel רָעָה, Judg. xiv. 20, signifies to make or choose any one as a friend or companion (רָע, רָעָה); the Hithpa. הִתְרַעָה (cf. at xviii. 24), to take to oneself (for oneself) any one as a friend, or to converse with one; אֶל-הִתְרַעָה sounds like אֶל-הִשְׁתַּעָה, Isa. xli. 10, with Pathach of the closed syllable from the apocope. The angry man is called בָּעַל אַף, as the covetous man בָּעַל נַפֵּשׁ, xxiii. 2, and the mischievous man בָּעַל מַזְמוּת, xxiv. 8; vid. regarding בָּעַל at i. 19 and xviii. 9. אִישׁ חַמּוּת is related superlat. to אִישׁ חַמּוּה, xv. 18 (cf. xxix. 22), and signifies a hot-head of the highest degree. לֹא תְבוֹא is meant as warning (cf. xvi. 10*b*). בּוֹא אִתָּךְ, or בּוֹא עִמָּךְ, Ps. xxvi. 4, to come along with one, is equivalent to go into fellowship or companionship with one, which is expressed by הִלַּךְ אִתָּךְ, xiii. 20, as בּוֹא בְּךָ means, Josh. xxiii. 7, 12, to enter into communion with one, venire in consuetudinem. This בּוֹא אִתָּךְ is not a trace of a more recent period of the language. Also תִּפְאַלְתָּ, discas, cannot be an equivalent for it: Heb. poetry has at all times made use of Aramaisms as elegancies. אָלַף, Aram. אֲלַף, יָלַף, Arab. âlifa, signifies to be entrusted with anything = to learn (Piel אָלַף, to teach, Job xv. 15, and in Elihu's speeches), or also to become confidential with one (whence אֲלַפּוֹת, companion, confidant, ii. 17); this אָלַף is never a Heb. prose word; the bibl. אֲלַפּוֹ is only used at a later period in the sense of teacher. אֲרָחוֹת are the ways, the conduct (ii. 20, etc.), or manner of life (i. 19) which any one enters upon and follows out, thus manners as well as lot, condition. In the phrase "to bring destruction," לָקַח is used as in our phrase Schaden nehmen [to suffer injury]; the ancient language also represented the forced entrance of one into a state as a being laid hold on, e.g. Job xviii. 20, cf. Isa. xiii. 8; here מִקָּשׁ is not merely equivalent to danger (Ewald, falsely: that thou takest not danger for thy soul), but is equivalent to destruction, sin itself is a snare (xxix. 6); to bring a snare for oneself is equivalent to suffer from being ensnared. Whosoever comes into a near relation with a passionate, furious man, easily accommodates himself to his manners, and, hurried forward by him and like him to outbreaks of anger, which does that which is not right before God, falls into ruinous complications.

A third distich follows :

Ver. 26 Be not among those who strike hands,
Among those who become surety for loans.

27 If thou hast nothing to pay,
Why shall he take away thy bed from under thee ?

To strike hands is equivalent to, to be responsible to any one for another, to stake one's goods and honour for him, vi. 1, xi. 15, xvii. 18,—in a word, ערב, seq. acc., to pledge oneself for him (Gen. xliii. 9), or for the loan received by him, מִשְׁאָה, Deut. xxiv. 10 (from הִשָּׂה, with ב, of the person and accus. of the thing: to lend something to one on interest). The proverb warns against being one of such sureties (write בְּעֵרְבִים with Cod. 1294, and old impressions such as the Venice, 1521), against acting as they do; for why wouldest thou come to this, that when thou canst not pay (לֹא־יָשַׁלְתָּ, to render a full equivalent reckoning, and, generally, to pay, vi. 31),<sup>1</sup> he (the creditor) take away thy bed from under thee?—for, as xx. 16 says, thus improvident suretyships are wont to be punished.

A fourth proverb—a distich—beginning with the warning לֹא :

Ver. 28 Remove not the perpetual landmark
Which thy aucestors have set up.

28a = xxiii. 10a. Regarding the inviolability of boundaries established by the law, vid. at xv. 25. עוֹלָם נְבוּל עוֹלָם denotes “the boundary mark set up from ancient times, the removal of which were a double transgression, because it is rendered sacred by its antiquity” (Orelli, p. 76). נָסַג = סָג signifies to remove back, Hiph. to shove back, to move away. אָשַׁר has the meaning of (ὄριον) ὄ, τι, quippe quod. Instead of עוֹלָם, the Mishna reads, Pea v. 6, עוֹלָיִם, which in the Jerusalem Gemara one Rabbi understands of those brought up out of Egypt, another of the poor; for "to rise" (in the world) is a euphemism (לשון כבוד) for "to come down" (be reduced in circumstances).<sup>1</sup>

After these four proverbs beginning with אַל, a new series begins with the following tristich:

Ver. 29 Seest thou a man who is expert in his calling—
Before kings may he stand;
Not stand before obscure men;

i.e., he can enter into the service of kings, and needs not to enter into the service of mean men = he is entitled to claim the highest official post. הָיָה, in xxvi. 12 = xxix. 20, interchanging with הָיָה, is perf. hypotheticum (cf. xxiv. 10, xxv. 16): si videris; the conclusion which might begin with פִּי דַע expresses further what he who sees will have occasion to observe. Rightly Luther: Sihestu einen Man endelich (vid. at xxi. 5) in seinem geschafft, u.s.w. [=seest thou a man expert in his business, etc.]. מְהִיר denotes in all the three chief dialects one who is skilful in a matter not merely by virtue of external artistic ability, but also by means of intellectual mastery of it. הִתְיַצַּב לְפָנַי, to enter on the situation of a servant before any one; cf. Job i. 6, ii. 1. עָמַד לְפָנַי, 1 Sam. xvi. 21, 1 Kings x. 8. Along with the pausal form יִתְיַצַּב, there is also found in Codd. the form יִתְיַצַּב (the ground-form to יִתְיַצַּב, whence that pausal form is lengthened), which Ben-Bileam defends, for he reckons this word among "the pathachized pausal forms." הַשְׂפִּים, in contrast to מְלָכִים, are the obscuri = ignobiles. The Targ. translate the Heb. הָלַךְ and אָבִיוֹן by הִשְׁתַּיֵּף and הִשְׁתַּיֵּף. Kimchi compares Jer. xxxix. 10, where הָעַם הָרָלִים is translated by הַשְׂפִּים (cf. 2 Kings xxiv. 14, xxv. 12). הָלַךְ (חִלְפָה) is the old Heb. synonym in Ps. x. The poet seems here to transfer the Aram. usus loq. into the Heb.

Ver. 29, which speaks of a high position near the king, is appropriately followed by a hexastich referring to the slipperiness of the smooth ground of the king's court.

- xxiii. 1 When thou sittest to eat with a ruler,
Consider well whom thou hast before thee.
2 And put thy knife to thy throat
If thou art a man of good appetite.
3 Be not lustful after his dainties,
Because it is deceitful food.

The ל of לִלְחֹם is that of end: ad cibum capiendum, thus as one invited by him to his table; in prose the expression would be לִלְחֹם; לִלְחֹם; לִלְחֹם, to eat, is poet., iv. 17, ix. 5. The fut. תִּבְּרֵן clothes the admonition in the form of a wish or counsel; the inf. intens. בִּי makes it urgent: consider well him whom thou hast before thee, viz. that he is not thine equal, but one higher, who can destroy thee as well as be useful to thee. With וְשָׂמַתְּ the jussive construction begun by תִּבְּרֵן is continued. Zöckler and Dächsel, after Ewald and Hitzig, translate incorrectly: thou puttest . . ., the perf. consec. after an imperf., or, which is the same thing, a fut. meant optatively (e.g. Lev. xix. 18 with אֲלֵא, and also ver. 34 without אֲלֵא) continues the exhortation; to be thus understood, the author ought to have used the expression וְשָׂמַתְּ בִּי and not וְשָׂמַתְּ שִׁבְּרֵן. Rightly Luther: “and put a knife to thy throat,” but continuing: “wilt thou preserve thy life,” herein caught in the same mistake of the idea with Jerome, the Syr., and Targ., to which וְשָׂמַתְּ here separates itself. שִׁבְּרֵן (סִבְּרֵן) (Arab. with the assimilated a sikkîn, plur. sekâkîn, whence sekâkîni, cutler) designates a knife (R. סַךְ שַׁךְ, to stick, vid. at Isa. ix. 10). לִיָּע, from לִיָּע, to devour, is the throat; the word in Aram. signifies only the cheek, while Lagarde seeks to interpret בִּלְעָה infinitively in the sense of (Arab.) bwlw'ak, if thou longest for (from wl'a); but that would make 2b a tautology. The verb לִיָּע (cf. Arab. l'al', to pant for) shows for the substantive the same primary meaning as glutus from glutire, which was then transferred from the inner organ of swallowing (Kimchi, בֵּית הַבְּלִיעָה, Parchon: מְלִיָּעָה, oesophagus) to the external. “Put a knife to thy throat, is a proverbial expression, like our: the knife stands at his throat; the poet means to say: restrain thy too eager desire by means of the strongest threatening of danger—threaten as it were death to it” (Fleischer). In וְשָׂמַתְּ בִּיָּע, בִּיָּע means, as at xiii. 2, desire, and that desire of eating, as at vi. 30. Rightly Rashi: if thou art greedy with hunger, if thou art a glutton; cf. Sir. xxxiv. (xxxii.) 12, “If thou sittest at a great table, then open not widely thy throat (φάρυγγα), and say not: There is certainly much on it!” The knife thus denotes the restraining and moderating of too good an appetite.

In 3a the punctuation fluctuates between תִּבְּרֵן (Michlol 131a) and תַּתְּאוּ ; the latter is found in Cod. 1294, the Erfurt 2 and 3, the Cod. Jaman., and thus it is also to be written at ver. 6 and xxiv. 1 ; וַיִּתְּאוּ, 1 Chron. xi. 17 and Ps. xlv. 12, Codd. and older Edd. (e.g. Complut. 1517, Ven. 1515, 1521) write with Pathach. מִטְּעֻמוֹת, from טָעַם, signifies savoury dishes, dainties, like (Arab.) dhwâkt, from dhâk (to taste, to relish) ; cf. sapores, from sapere, in the proverb: the tit-bits of the king burn the lips (vid. Fleischer, Ali's Hundred Proverbs, etc., pp. 71, 104). With וַיִּתְּאוּ begins, as at iii. 29, a conditioning clause: since it is, indeed, the bread of deceit (the connection like עֵרֶב־כֹּזְבִים, xxi. 28), food which, as it were, deceives him who eats it, i.e. appears to secure for him the lasting favour of princes, and often enough herein deceives him ; cf. the proverb by Burckhardt and Meidani: whoever eats of the sultan's soup burns his lips, even though it may be after a length of time (Fleischer). One must come near to a king, says Calovius, hitting the meaning of the proverb, as to a fire: not too near, lest he be burned ; nor too remote, so that he may be warmed therewith.

All the forms of proverbs run through these appended proverbs. There now follows a pentastich :

- Ver. 4 Do not trouble thyself to become rich ;
 Cease from such thine own wisdom.
 5 Wilt thou let thine eyes fly after it, and it is gone ?
 For it maketh itself, assuredly it maketh itself wings,
 Like an eagle which fleeth toward the heavens.

The middle state, according to xxx. 8, is the best: he who troubleth himself (cf. xxviii. 20, hasteth) to become rich, placeth before himself a false, deceitful aim. יָנַע is essentially one with (Arab.) wajî'a, to experience sorrow, dolere, and then signifies, like πονέιν and κάμνεν, to become or to be wearied, to weary or trouble oneself, to toil and moil (Fleischer). The בִּינָה (cf. iii. 5) is just wisdom, prudence directed towards becoming rich; for striving of itself alone does not accomplish it, unless wisdom is connected with it, which is not very particular in finding out means in their moral relations ; but is so much the more crafty, and, as we say, speculative. Rightly Aquila, the Venet., Jerome, and Luther: take not pains to become rich. On the contrary, the LXX. reads אַל תִּיגַע לְהַעֲשִׂיר, stretch not thyself (if thou art poor) after a rich man ; and the Syr. and Targ. אַל תִּיגַע לְהַעֲשִׂיר, draw not near to the rich man ; but, apart from the uncertainty of the expression and the construction in both cases, poetry, and proverbial poetry too, does not prefer the article ; it never uses it without emphasis, especially as here must be the case with it not elided. These translators thought that בו וגו', ver. 5, presupposed a subject expressed in ver. 4 ; but the subject is not הָעֵשֶׂיר, but the עֵשֶׂר [riches] contained in לְהָעֵשֶׂיר. The self-intelligible it [in "it maketh wings," etc.] is that about which trouble has been taken, about which there has been speculation. That is a deceitful possession ; for what has been gained by many years of labour and search, often passes away suddenly, is lost in a moment. To let the eyes fly after anything, is equivalent to, to direct a (flying) look toward it : wilt thou let thine eyes rove toward the same, and it is gone ? i.e., wilt thou expose thyself to the fate of seeing that which was gained with trouble and craft torn suddenly away from thee ? Otherwise Luther, after Jerome : Let not thine eyes fly after that which thou canst not have ; but apart from the circumstance that בו ואֵינְנִי cannot possibly be understood in the sense of ad opes quas non potes habere (that would have required בְּאֵשֶׁר אֵינְנוּ), in this sense after the analogy of נָשָׂא נֶבֶשׂ אֶל (ל), the end aimed at would have been denoted by לו and not by בו. Better Immanuel, after Rashi : if thou doublest, i.e. shuttest (by means of the two eyelids) thine eyes upon it, it is gone, i.e. has vanished during the night ; but עוֹף, duplicare, is Aram. and not Heb. Rather the explanation is with Chajûg, after Isa. viii. 22f. : if thou veilest (darkenest) thine eyes, i.e. yieldest thyself over to carelessness ; but the noun עֵפֶפָה shows that עוֹף, spoken of the eyes, is intended to signify to fly (to rove, flutter). Hitzig too artificially (altering the expression to לְהָעֵשֶׂיר) : if thou faintest, art weary with the eyes toward him (the rich patron), he is gone,—which cannot be adopted, because the form of a question does not accord with it. Nor would it accord if ואֵינְנוּ were thought of as a conclusion : "dost thou let thy look fly toward it ? It is gone ;" for what can this question imply ? The ו of ואֵינְנוּ shows that this word is a component part of the question ; it is a question lla nakar, i.e. in rejection of the subject of the question : wilt thou cast thy look upon it, and it is gone ? i.e., wilt thou experience instant loss of that which is gained by labour and acquired by artifice? On בו, cf. Job vii. 8. 'עֵינַיָּךְ וְגו', "thou directest thine eyes to me: I am no more." We had in xii. 19 another mode of designating [viz. till I wink again] an instant. The Chethîb 'וְגו' הִתְעַוְּרָה is syntactically correct (cf. xv. 22, xx. 30), and might remain. The Kerî is mostly falsely accentuated הִתְעַוְּרָה, doubly incorrectly; for (1) the tone never retreats from a shut syllable terminating in î, e.g. לְהִתְעַוְּרָה, Isa. xl. 20; בְּהִתְעַוְּרָה, 1 Chron. i. 4; וְהִתְעַוְּרָה, Job xxiii. 8; and (2) there is, moreover, wanting here any legitimate occasion for the retrogression of the tone; thus much rather the form הִתְעַוְּרָה (with Mehuppach of the last, and Zinnorith of the preceding open syllable) is to be adopted, as it is given by Opitz, Jablonsky, Michaelis, and Reineccius.

The subject of 5b is, as of 5a, riches. That riches take wings and flee away, is a more natural expression than that the rich patron flees away,—a quaint figure, appropriate however at Nah. iii. 16, where the multitude of craftsmen flee out of Nineveh like a swarm of locusts. עָשָׂה has frequently the sense of acquirere, Gen. xii. 5, with לו, sibi acquirere, 1 Sam. xv. 1; 1 Kings i. 15; Hitzig compares Silius Ital. xvi. 351: sed tum sibi fecerat alas. The inf. intensivus strengthens the assertion: it will certainly thus happen.

In 5c all unnecessary discussion regarding the Chethîb וְעֵי is to be avoided, for this Chethîb does not exist; the Masora here knows only of a simple Chethîb and Kerî, viz. וְעֵי (read וְעֵי), not of a double one (וְעֵי), and the word is not among those which have in the middle a ' , which is to be read like ו. The manuscripts (e.g. also the Bragadin. 1615) have וְעֵי, and the Kerî וְעֵי; it is one of the ten words registered in the Masora, at the beginning of which a ' is to be read instead of the written ו. Most of the ancients translate with the amalgamation of the Kerî and the Chethîb: and he (the rich man, or better: the riches) flees heavenwards (Syr., Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, Jerome, and Luther). After the Kerî the Venet. renders: ὡς ἀετὸς πτήσεται τοῖς οὐρανοῖς (viz. ὁ πλοῦτος). Rightly the Targ.: like an eagle which flies to heaven (according to which also it is accentuated), only it is not to be translated "am Himmel" [to heaven], but "gen Himmel" [towards heaven]: הַשָּׁמַיִם is the accusative of direction—the eagle flies heavenward. Bochart, in the Hierozoicon, has collected many parallels to this comparison, among which is the figure in Lucian's Timon, where Pluto, the god of wealth, comes to one limping and with difficulty; but going away, outstrips in speed the flight of all birds. The LXX. translates ὡσπερ ἀετοῦ καὶ ὑποστρέφει εἰς τὸν οἶκον τοῦ προεστηκότος αὐτοῦ. Hitzig accordingly reads וְיָשָׁב לְבֵיתוֹ מִשְׁנֵבּוֹ, and he (the rich patron) withdraws from thee to his own steep residence. But ought not οἶκος τοῦ προεστηκότος αὐτοῦ to be heaven, as the residence of Him who administers wealth, i.e. who gives and again takes it away according to His free-will?

There now follows a proverb with unqually measured lines, perhaps a heptastich:

- Ver. 6 Eat not the bread of the jealous,
 And let not thyself lust after his dainties;
 7 For as one who calculates with himself, so is he:
 "Eat and drink," saith he to thee;
 But his heart is not with thee.
 8 Thy morsel which thou hast enjoyed wilt thou cast up,
 And hast lost thy pleasant words.

As טוֹב עַיִן, xxii. 9, benignus oculo, denotes the pleasantness and joy of social friendship; so here (cf. Deut. xv. 9; Matt. xv. 15) רָע עַיִן, malignus oculo, the envy and selfishness of egoism seeking to have and retain all for itself. The LXX. ἀνδρὶ βασκάνῳ, for the look of the evil eye, עַיִן רָע, עֵינָא בִּיזְיָא (cattivo occhio), refers to enchantment; cf. βασκαίνειν, fascinare, to bewitch, to enchant, in modern Greek, to envy, Arab. 'an, to eye, as it were, whence mā'jān, mā'in, hit by the piercing look of the envious eye, invidia, as Apuleius says, letali plaga percussus (Fleischer). Regarding תְּתַאֲוִי with Pathach, vid. the parallel line 3a. 7a is difficult. The LXX. and Syr. read שֵׁעַר [hair]. The Targ. renders רָמָא תְּרַעָא, and thus reads שֵׁעַר [fool], and thus brings together the soul of the envious person and a high portal, which promises much, but conceals only deception behind (Rablag). Joseph ha-Nakdan reads<sup>1</sup> שֵׁעַר with sîn; and Rashi, retaining the schîn, compares the "sour figs," Jer. xxix. 17.

According to this, Luther translates : like a ghost (a monster of lovelessness) is he inwardly; for, as it appears in שָׁעַר, the goat-like spectre שָׁעִיר hovered before him. Schultens better, because more in conformity with the text : quemadmodum suam ipsius animam abhorret (i.e. as he does nothing to the benefit of his own appetite) sic ille (erga alios multo magis). The thought is appropriate, but forced. Hitzig for once here follows Ewald ; he does not, however, translate : “like as if his soul were divided, so is it ;” but : “as one who is divided in his soul, so is he ;” but the verb שָׁעַר, to divide, is inferred from שָׁעַר, gate = division, and is as foreign to the extra-bibl. usus loq. as it is to the bibl. The verb שָׁעַר signifies to weigh or consider, to value, to estimate. These meanings Hitzig unites together : in similitudinem arioli et conjectoris æstimat quod ignorat, perhaps meaning thereby that he conjecturally supposes that as it is with him, so it is with others : he dissembles, and thinks that others dissemble also. Thus also Jansen explains. The thought is far-fetched, and does not cover itself by the text. The translation of the Venet. also : ὡς γὰρ ἐμέτρησεν ἐν ψυχῇ οἱ οὕτως ἐστίν (perhaps : he measures to others as penuriously as to himself), does not elucidate the text, but obscures it. Most moderns (Bertheau, Zöckler, Dächsel, etc.) : as he reckons in his soul, so is he (not as he seeks to appear for a moment before thee). Thus also Fleischer : quemadmodum reputat apud se, ita est (sc. non ut loquitur), with the remark that שָׁעַר (whence שָׁעַר, measure, market value, Arab. si'r), to measure, to tax so as to determine the price, to reckon ; and then like חשב, in general, to think, and thus also Meiri with the neut. rendering of ita est. But why this circumlocution in the expression ? The poet ought in that case just to have written בִּי לֹא כְמוֹ דִּבֶּר בְּשִׁפְתָיו כִּן הוּא שָׁעַר (Symmachus, εἰκάζων), then we have the thought adapted to the portrait that is drawn ; for like one calculating by himself, so is he, i.e. he is like one who estimates with himself the value of an object ; for which we use the expression : he reckons the value of every piece in thy mouth. However, with this understanding the punctuation also of שָׁעַר as finite may be retained and explained after Isa. xxvi. 18 : for as if he reckoned in his soul, so is he ; but in this the perf. is inappropriate; by the particip. one reaches the same end<sup>1</sup> by a smoother way. True, he says to thee: eat and drink (Song v. 1b), he invites thee with courtly words; but his heart is not with thee (בל, like xxiv. 23): he only puts on the appearance of joy if thou partakest abundantly, but there lurks behind the mask of liberal hospitality the grudging niggardly calculator, who poisons thy every bite, every draught, by his calculating, grudging look. Such a feast cannot possibly do good to the guest: thy meal (פת, from פָּתַח; cf. κλᾶν τὸν ἄρτον, Aram. פָּרַם לְחֵיבָא, to divide and distribute bread, whence פָּרַנַם, to receive alimant, is derived) which thou hast eaten thou wilt spue out, i.e. wilt vomit from disgust that thou hast eaten such food, so that that which has been partaken of does thee no good. פָּתַח is also derived from פָּתַח:<sup>2</sup> has he deceived thee (with his courtly words), but with this אֶבְרַחְתָּ, which, as the Makkeph rightly denotes, stands in an attributive relation to פָּתַח, does not agree. תְּקִיאָנָה is Hiph. of קִיאָ, as transitive: to make vomiting; in Arab. the fut. Kal of ka terminates in î. The fair words which the guest, as the perf. consec. expresses, has lavished, are the words of praise and thanks in which he recognises the liberality of the host appearing so hospitable. Regarding the penult. accenting of the perf. consec. by Mugrasch, as xxx. 9, vid. under Ps. xxvii. 1. Pinsker (Babyl.-Hebr. Punktations-system, p. 134) conjectures that the line 8b originally formed the concluding line of the following proverb. But at the time of the LXX. (which erroneously expresses וְשִׁחָה) it certainly stood as in our text.

Ver. 9. Another case in which good words are lost:

Speak not to the ears of a fool,
For he will despise the wisdom of thy words.

To speak in the ears of any one, does not mean to whisper to him, but so to speak that it is distinctly perceived. בְּקִיָּל, as we have now often explained, is the intellectually heavy and dull, like pinguis and tardus; Arab. balyd, clumsy, intellectually immoveable (cf. bld, the place where one places himself firmly down, which one makes his point of gravity). The heart of such an one is covered over (Ps. cxix. 70), as with grease, against all impressions of better knowledge; he has for the knowledge which the words spoken design to impart to him, no susceptibility, no mind, but only contempt. The construction לְ בִנְיָן has been frequently met with from vi. 30.

The following proverb forms a new whole from component parts of xxii. 28 and xxii. 22 f. :

- Ver. 10 Remove not ancient landmarks ;
 And into the fields of orphans enter thou not.
 11 For their Saviour is a mighty one ;
 He will conduct their cause against thee.

בְּבִנְיָן separates itself here to the meaning of injuste invadere et occupare; French, empiéter sur son voisin, advance not into the ground belonging to thy neighbour (Fleischer). If orphans have also no goel among their kindred (Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, ἀγγιστεύς) to redeem by purchase (Lev. xxv. 25) their inheritance that has passed over into the possession of another, they have another, and that a mighty Saviour, Redemptor, who will restore to them that which they have lost,—viz. God (Jer. l. 34),—who will adopt their cause against any one who has unjustly taken from them.

The following proverb warrants us to pause here, for it opens up, as a compendious echo of xxii. 17-21, a new series of proverbs of wisdom :

- Ver. 12 Apply thine heart to instruction,
 And thine ear to the utterances of knowledge.

We may, according as we accent in לְבוֹרֵךְ the divine origin or the human medium, translate, offer disciplinæ (Schultens), or adhibe ad disciplinam cor tuum (Fleischer). This general admonition is directed to old and young, to those who are to be educated as well as to those who are educated. First to the educator :

- Ver. 13 Withhold not correction from the child ;
 For thou wilt beat him with the rod, and he will not die.
 14 Thou beatest him with the rod,
 And with it deliverest his soul from hell.

The exhortation, 13*a*, presupposes that education by word and deed is a duty devolving on the father and the teacher with regard to the child. In 13*b*, וְ is in any case the relative conjunction. The conclusion does not mean: so will he not fall under death (destruction), as Luther also would have it, after Deut. xix. 21, for this thought certainly follows ver. 14; nor after xix. 18: so may the stroke not be one whereof he dies, for then the author ought to have written אֶל־תִּמְיֵתוֹ; but: he will not die of it, i.e. only strike if he has deserved it, thou needest not fear; the bitter medicine will be beneficial to him, not deadly. The הִנֵּה standing before the double clause, ver. 14, means that he who administers corporal chastisement to the child, saves him spiritually; for שָׁחַל does not refer to death in general, but to death falling upon a man before his time, and in his sins, vid. xv. 24, cf. viii. 26.

The following proverb passes from the educator to the pupil:

- Ver. 15 My son, if thine heart becometh wise,
 My heart also in return will rejoice;
 16 And my reins will exult
 If thy lips speak right things.

Wisdom is inborn in no one. A true Arab. proverb says, "The wise knows how the fool feels, for he himself was also once a fool;"<sup>1</sup> and folly is bound up in the heart of a child, according to xxii. 15, which must be driven out by severe discipline. 15*b*, as many others, cf. xxii. 19*b*, shows that these "words of the wise" are penetrated by the subjectivity of an author; the author means: if thy heart becomes wise, so will mine in return, i.e. corresponding to it (cf. וַיִּשְׂרַח, Gen. xx. 6), rejoice. The thought of the heart in ver. 15 repeats itself in ver. 16, with reference to the utterance of the mouth. Regarding בְּיִשְׂרָיִם, vid. i. 5. Regarding the “reins,” בְּלִיָּה (perhaps from בְּלָה, to languish, Job xix. 21), with which the tender and inmost affections are connected, vid. Psychologie, p. 268 f.

The poet now shows how one attains unto wisdom—the beginning of wisdom is the fear of God:

Ver. 17 Let not thine heart strive after sinners,
But after the fear of Jahve all the day.

18 Truly there is a future,
And thy hope shall not come to naught.

The LXX., Jerome, the Venet., and Luther, and the Arab. interpreters, render 17*b* as an independent clause: “but be daily in the fear of the Lord.” That is not a substantival clause (cf. xxii. 7), nor can it be an interjectional clause, but it may be an elliptical clause (Fleischer: from the prohibitive אִל־תִּקְנֵא is to be taken for the second parallel member the v. subst. lying at the foundation of all verbs); but why had the author omitted הָיָה? Besides, one uses the expressions, to act (עָשָׂה), and to walk (הִלֵּךְ) in the fear of God, but not the expression to be (הָיָה) in the fear of God. Thus בִּירְאָה, like בְּחַטָּאִים, is dependent on אִל־תִּקְנֵא; and Jerome, who translates: Non æmuletur cor tuum peccatores, sed in timore Domini esto tota die, ought to have continued: sed timorem Domini tota die; for, as one may say in Latin: æmulari virtutes, as well as æmulari aliquem, so also in Heb. קִנְיָא בָּ, of the envying of those persons whose fortune excites to dissatisfaction, because one has not the same, and might yet have it, iii. 31, xxiv. 1, 19, as well as of emulation for a thing in which one might not stand behind others: envy not sinners, envy much rather the fear of God, i.e. let thyself be moved with eager desire after it when its appearance is presented to thee. There is no O. T. parallel for this, but the Syr. tan and the Greek ζηλοτυποῦν are used in this double sense. Thus Hitzig rightly, and, among the moderns, Malbim; with Aben Ezra, it is necessary to take בִּירְאָה for בְּאִישׁ יִרְאָה, this proverb itself declares the fear of God to be of all things the most worthy of being coveted.

In ver. 18, Umbreit, Elster, Zöckler, and others interpret the כִּי as assigning a reason, and the אִם as conditioning: for when the end (the hour of the righteous judgment) has come; Bertheau better, because more suitable to the וַיֵּשׁ and the אִתְּחַרֵּית: when an end (an end adjusting the contradictions of the present time) comes, as no doubt it will come, then thy hope will not be destroyed; but, on the other hand, the succession of words in the conclusion (vid. at iii. 34) opposes this; also one does not see why the author does not say directly כִּי יֵשׁ אַחֲרָיִת, but expresses himself thus conditionally.<sup>1</sup> If אִם is meant hypothetically, then, with the LXX. ἐὰν γὰρ τηρήσης αὐτὰ ἔσται σοι ἔκγονα, we should supply after it תִּשְׁמַרְנָהּ, that had fallen out. Ewald's: much rather there is yet a future (Dächsel: much rather be happy there is . . .), is also impossible; for the preceding clause is positive, not negative. The particles אִם כִּי, connected thus, mean: for if (e.g. Lam. iii. 32); or also relatively: that if (e.g. Jer. xxvi. 15). After a negative clause they have the meaning of "unless," which is acquired by means of an ellipsis; e.g. Isa. lv. 10, it turns not back thither, unless it has watered the earth (it returns back not before then, not unless this is done). This "unless" is, however, used like the Lat. nisi, also without the conditioning clause following, e.g. Gen. xxviii. 17, hic locus non est nisi domus Dei. And hence the expression אִם כִּי, after the negation going before, acquires the meaning of "but," e.g. 17*b*: let not thy heart be covetous after sinners, for thou canst always be zealous for the fear of God, i.e. much rather for this, but for this. This pleonasm of אִם sometimes occurs where כִּי is not used confirmatively, but affirmatively: the "certainly if" forms the transition, e.g. 1 Kings xx. 6 (vid. Keil's Comm. l.c.), whose "if" is not seldom omitted, so that אִם כִּי has only the meaning of an affirmative "certainly," not "truly no," which it may also have, 1 Sam. xxv. 34, but "truly yes." Thus אִם כִּי is used Judg. xv. 7; 2 Sam. xv. 21 (where אִם is omitted by the Keiri); 2 Kings v. 20; Jer. li. 14; and thus it is also meant here, 18*a*, notwithstanding that אִם כִּי, in its more usual signification, "besides only, but, nisi," precedes, as at 1 Sam. xxi. 6, cf. 5. The objection by Hitzig, that with this explanation: "certainly there is a future," vers. 18 and 17 are at variance, falls to the ground, if one reflects on the Heb. idiom, in which the affirmative signification of כִּי is interpenetrated by the confirmative. אַחֲרֵיהֶם used thus pregnantly, as here (xxiv. 14), is the glorious final issue; the word in itself designates the end into which human life issues (cf. Ps. xxxvii. 37 f.); here, the end crowning the preceding course. Jeremiah (xxix. 11) in this sense connects אַחֲרֵיהֶם וְתִקְוָה [end and expectation]. And what is here denied of the תִּקְוָה, the hope (not as certain Jewish interpreters dream, the thread of life) of him who zealously strives after the fear of God, is affirmed, at Ps. xxxvii. 38, of the godless: the latter have no continuance, but the former have such as is the fulfilling of his hope.

Among the virtues which flow from the fear of God, temperance is made prominent, and the warning against excess is introduced by the general exhortation to wisdom:

- Ver. 19 Hear thou, my son, and become wise,
 And direct thy heart straight forward on the way.
 20 And be not among wine-drinkers,
 And among those who devour flesh;
 21 For the drunkard and glutton become poor,
 And sleepiness clotheth in rags.

The אִתָּהּ, connected with שָׁמַע, imports that the speaker has to do with the hearer altogether by himself, and that the latter may make an exception to the many who do not hear (cf. Job xxxiii. 33; Jer. ii. 31). Regarding אֲשֶׁר, to make to go straight out, vid. at iv. 14; the Kal, ix. 6, and also the Piel, iv. 14, mean to go straight on, and, generally, to go. The way merely, is the one that is right in contrast to the many byways. Fleischer: "the way sensu eximio, as the Oriental mystics called the way to perfection merely (Arab.) âlatryk; and him who walked therein, âlsâlak, the walker or wanderer."<sup>1</sup> אֲלֵ-תְהִי בְּ, as at xxii. 26, the "Words of the Wise," are to be compared in point of style. The degenerate and perverse son is more clearly described, Deut. xxi. 20, as וּלְלֵךְ וְכָבֵא. These two characteristics the poet distributes between 20a and 20b. כָּבֵא means to drink (whence כָּבֵא, drink = wine, Isa. i. 22) wine or other intoxicating drinks; Arab. sabâ, vinum potandi causa emere. To the יָן, here added, בְּשָׁר in the parallel member corresponds, which consequently is not the fleshly body of the gluttons themselves, but the prepared flesh which they consume at their luxurious banquets. The LXX. incorrectly as to the word, but not contrary to the sense, "be no wine-bibber, and stretch not thyself after picknicks (συμβολαῖς), and buying in of flesh (κρεῶν τε ἀγορασμοῖς)," whereby לָלוּ is translated in the sense of the Aram. לָגַי (Lagarde). לָלוּ denotes, intransitively, to be little valued (whence לָלוּ, opp. יָקָר, Jer. xv. 19), transitively to value little, and as such to squander, to lavish prodigally; thus: qui prodigi sunt carnis sibi; לָמוֹ is dat. commodi. Otherwise Gesenius, Fleischer, Umbreit, and Ewald: qui prodigi sunt carnis suæ, who destroy their own body; but the parallelism shows that flesh is meant wherewith they feed themselves, not their own flesh (לָמוֹ בְשָׂרָהּ, like לָמוֹ תַחֲתָהּ, Ps. lviii. 5), which, i.e. its health, they squander. לָלוּ also, in phrase used in Deut. xxi. 20 (cf. with Hitzig the formula φάγος καὶ οἰνοπότης, Matt. xi. 19), denotes not the dissolute person, as the sensualist, πορνοκόπος (LXX.), but the συμβολοκόπος (Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion), κρεωβόρος (Venet.), יָלוּ לָבָסַר (Onkelos), i.e. flesh-eater, ravenous person, glutton, in which sense it is rendered here, by the Syr. and Targ., by אָסוּט (אָסוּט), i.e. ἄσωτος. Regarding the metaplastic fut. Niph. שָׁרַיָהּ (LXX. πτωχεύσει), vid. at xx. 13, cf. xi. 25. נִימָה (after the form of בְּנִשָּׁה, נִימָה, נִימָה) is drowsiness, lethargy, long sleeping, which necessarily follows a life of riot and revelry. Such a slothful person comes to a bit of bread (xxi. 17); and the disinclination and unfitness for work, resulting from night revelry, brings it about that at last he must clothe himself in miserable rags. The rags are called קָרָע and ράκος, from the rending (tearing), Arab. ruk'at, from the patching, mending. Lagarde, more at large, treats of this word here used for rags.

The parainesis begins anew, and the division is open to question. Vers. 22-24 can of themselves be independent distichs; but this is not the case with ver. 25, which, in the resumption of the address and in expression, leans back on ver. 22. The author of this appendix may have met with vers. 23 and 24 (although here also his style, as conformed to that of i. 9, is noticeable, cf. 23*b* with i. 2), but vers. 22 and 25 are the form which he has given to them.

Thus 22-25 are a whole :—

- Ver. 22 Hearken to thy father, to him who hath begotten thee,
 And despise not thy mother when she has grown old.
 23 Buy the truth, and sell it not,
 Wisdom and discipline and understanding.
 24 The father of a righteous man rejoiceth greatly;
 (And) he that is the father of a wise man—he will rejoice.
 25 Let thy father and thy mother be glad;
 And her that bare thee exult.

The ostastich begins with a call to childlike obedience, for לִשְׁמַע, to listen to any one, is equivalent to, to obey him, e.g. Ps. lxxxi. 9, 14 (cf. "hearken to his voice," Ps. xciv. 7). זֶה יִקְרֶךְ is a relative clause (cf. Deut. xxxii. 18, without זֶה or אֲשֶׁר), according to which it is rightly accentuated (cf. on the contrary, Ps. lxxviii. 54). 22*b*, strictly taken, is not to be translated neve contemne cum senuerit matrem tuam (Fleischer), but cum senuerit mater tua, for the logical object to אֶל-תִּבְנֶה is attracted as subj. of תִּקְנֶה (Hitzig). There now follows the exhortation comprehending all, and formed after iv. 7, to buy wisdom, i.e. to shun no expense, no effort, no privation, in order to attain to the possession of wisdom; and not to sell it, i.e. not to place it over against any earthly possession, worldly gain, sensual enjoyment; not to let it be taken away by any intimidation, argued away by false reasoning, or prevailed against by enticements into the way of vice, and not to become unfaithful to it by swimming with the great stream (Ex. xxiii. 2); for truth, אֱמֶת, is that which endures and proves itself in all spheres, the moral as well as the intellectual. In 23*b*, in like manner as i. 3, xxii. 4, a threefold object is given to קִנְיָה instead of אֱמֶת: there are three properties which are peculiar to truth, the three powers which handle it: הִכָּמָה is knowledge solid, pressing into the essence of things; מוֹסֵר is moral culture; and בְּיָנָה the central faculty of proving and distinguishing (vid. i. 3-5). Now ver. 24 says what consequences are for the parents when the son, according to the exhortation of 23, makes truth his aim, to which all is subordinated. Because in אֱמֶת the ideas of practical and theoretical truth are inter-connected. צְדִיק and הַכֶּם are also here parallel to one another. The Chethib of 24*a* is גִּיל יָגִיל, which Schultens finds tenable in view of (Arab.) jal, fut. jajûlu (to turn round; Heb. to turn oneself for joy) but the Heb. usus loq. knows elsewhere only  $\text{יָגִיל יְגִיל}$ , as the Kerî corrects. The LXX., misled by the Chethîb, translates  $\kappa\alpha\lambda\omega\varsigma \acute{\epsilon}\kappa\tau\rho\acute{\epsilon}\phi\epsilon\iota$  (incorrect  $\acute{\epsilon}\kappa\tau\rho\upsilon\phi\acute{\eta}\sigma\epsilon\iota$ ), i.e.  $\text{יִגְדַל יְגִדַל}$ . In 24b,  $\text{וַיִּשְׂמַח}$  is of the nature of a pred. of the conclusion (cf. Gen. xxii. 24; Ps. cxv. 7), as if the sentence were: has one begotten a wise man, then (cf. xvii. 21) he has joy of him; but the Kerî effaces this Vav apodosis, and assigns it to  $\text{וַיִּגְדַל}$  as Vav copul.—an unnecessary mingling of the syntactically possible, more emphatic expression. This proverbial whole now rounds itself off in ver. 25 by a reference to ver. 22,—the Optative here corresponding to the Impr. and Prohib. there: let thy father and thy mother rejoice (LXX.  $\epsilon\upsilon\phi\rho\nu\acute{\alpha}\nu\epsilon\sigma\theta\omega$ ), and let her that bare thee exult (here where it is possible the Optat. form  $\text{וַיִּגְדַל}$ ).

Vers. 26–28. This hexastich warns against unchastity. What, in i.–ix., extended discourses and representations exhibited to the youth is here repeated in miniature pictures. It is the teacher of wisdom, but by him Wisdom herself, who speaks:

- Ver. 26 Give me, my son, thine heart;
 And let thine eyes delight in my ways.
 27 For the harlot is a deep ditch,
 And the strange woman a narrow pit.
 28 Yea, she lieth in wait like a robber,
 And multiplieth the faithless among men

We have retained Luther's beautiful rendering of ver. 26,<sup>1</sup> in which this proverb, as a warning word of heavenly wisdom and of divine love, has become dear to us. It follows, as Symmachus and the Venet., the Chethîb  $\text{תְּרַצְנָה}$  (for  $\text{תְּרַצְיָנָה}$ , like Ex. ii. 16; Job v. 12), the stylistic appropriateness of which proceeds from xvi. 7, as on the other hand the Kerî  $\text{תְּרַצְנָה}$  (cf. 1 Sam. xiv. 27) is supported by xxii. 12, cf. v. 2. But the correction is unnecessary, and the Chethîb sounds more affectionate, hence it is with right defended by Hitzig. The ways of wisdom are ways of correction, and particularly of chastity, thus placed over against "the ways of the harlot," vii. 24 ff. Accordingly the exhortation, ver. 26, verifies itself; warning, by ver. 27, cf. xxii. 14, where  $\text{עֲמֹקָה}$  was written, here as at Job xii. 22, with the long vowel  $\text{עֲמוֹקָה}$  ( $\text{עֲמֹקָה}$ ).  $\text{בְּיָר צָרָה}$  interchanges with שִׁחָה עמוקה, and means, not the fountain of sorrow (Löwenstein), but the narrow pit. בְּיָרֵךְ is fem. gen., xxvi. 21 f., and צָר means narrow, like étroit (old French, estreit), from strictus. The figure has, after xxii. 14, the mouth of the harlot in view. Whoever is enticed by her syren voice falls into a deep ditch, into a pit with a narrow mouth, into which one can more easily enter than escape from. Ver. 28 says that it is the artifice of the harlot which draws a man into such depth of wickedness and guilt. With הָאֵס, which, as at Judg. v. 29, belongs not to הָיִיתָ but to the whole sentence, the picture of terror is completed. The verb הִתָּחַף (whence Arab. hataf, death, natural death) means to snatch away. If we take הִתָּחַף as abstr.: a snatching away, then it would here stand elliptically for הִתָּחַף (בְּעַל) אִישׁ (עַבְדִּים), which in itself is improbable (vid. vii. 22, עַבְדִּים) and also unnecessary, since, as מְלִיץ, עֶבֶר, הִלָּךְ, etc. show, such abstracta can pass immediately into concreta, so that הִתָּחַף thus means the person who snatches away, i.e. the street robber, latro (cf. הִטָּחַף, (Arab.) khataf, Ps. x. 9, rightly explained by Kimchi as cogn.). In 28b, הוֹסִיף cannot mean abripit (as LXX., Theodotion, and Jerome suppose), for which the word הִתְסַפֵּה (הִתְאַסַּף) would have been used.<sup>1</sup> But this verbal idea does not harmonize with the connection; הוֹסִיף means, as always, addit (auget), and that here in the sense of multiplicat. The same thing may be said of הוֹסִיף as is said (xi. 15) of הוֹקְעִים. Hitzig's objection, "הוֹסִיף, to multiply, with the accusative of the person, is not at all used," is set aside by xix. 4. But we may translate: the faithless, or: the breach of faith she increases. Yet it always remains a question whether בְּאָדָם is dependent on בְּנוֹרִים, as Eccles. viii. 9, cf. 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, on the verb of ruling (Hitzig), or whether, as frequently בְּאָדָם, e.g. Ps. lxxviii. 60, it means inter homines (thus most interpreters). Uncleanliness leads to faithlessness of manifold kinds: it makes not only the husband unfaithful to his wife, but also the son to his parents, the scholar to his teacher and pastor, the servant (cf. the case of Potiphar's wife) to his master. The adulteress, inasmuch as she entices now one and now another into her net, increases the number of those who are faithless towards men. But are they not, above all, faithless towards God? We are of opinion that not בוגרים, but תוסף, has its complement in בארם, and needs it: the adulteress increases the faithless among men, she makes faithlessness of manifold kinds common in human society. According to this, also, it is accentuated; ובוגרים is placed as object by Mugrasch, and בארם is connected by Mercha with תוסף.

Vers. 29–35. The author passes from the sin of uncleanness to that of drunkenness; they are nearly related, for drunkenness excites fleshly lust; and to wallow with delight in the mire of sensuality, a man, created in the image of God, must first brutalize himself by intoxication. The Mashal in the number of its lines passes beyond the limits of the distich, and becomes a Mashal ode.

Ver. 29 Whose is woe? Whose is grief?

Whose are contentions, whose trouble, whose wounds without cause?

Whose is dimness of eyes?

30 Theirs, who sit late at the wine,
Who turn in to taste mixed wine.

31 Look not on the wine as it sparkleth red,
As it showeth its gleam in the cup,
Glideth down with ease.

32 The end of it is that it biteth like a serpent,
And stingeth like a basilisk.

33 Thine eyes shall see strange things,
And thine heart shall speak perverse things;

34 And thou art as one lying in the heart of the sea,
And as one lying on the top of a mast.

35 "They have scourged me—it pained me not;
They have beaten me—I perceived it not.
When shall I have wakened from sleep?
Thus on I go, I return to it again."

The repeated לָמָּי<sup>1</sup> asks who then has to experience all that; the answer follows in ver. 30. With אוי, the אָבוֹי occurring only here accords; it is not a substantive from אָבָה (whence אָבוֹיִן) after the form of אָחָה, in the sense of egestas; but, like the former [אוי], an interjection of sorrow (Venet. τίνι αἶ, τίνι φεῦ). Regarding מְדוֹנִים (Chethib מְדוֹנִים), vid. at vi. 14.

שִׁיחַ signifies (vid. at vi. 22) meditation and speech, here sorrowful thought and sorrowful complaint (1 Sam. i. 16; Ps. lv. 18; cf. הָגִיגָה, הִגָּיָה), e.g. over the exhausted purse, the neglected work, the anticipated reproaches, the diminishing strength. In the connection פָּצְעִים הֵנִם (cf. Ps. xxxv. 19) the accus. adv. חֵנָם (French gratuitement) represents the place of an adjective: strokes which one receives without being in the situation from necessity, or duty to expect them, strokes for nothing and in return for nothing (Fleischer), wounds for a long while (Oetinger). חֲבִלְלוּת עֵינַיִם is the darkening (clouding) of the eyes, from חָבַל, to be firm, closed, and transferred to the sensation of light: to be dark (vid. at Gen. xlix. 12; Ps. x. 8); the copper-nose of the drunkard is not under consideration; the word does not refer to the reddening, but the dimming of the eyes, and of the power of vision. The answer, ver. 30, begins, in conformity with the form of the question, with ל (write לְמַאֲחָרִים, with Gaja to ל, according to Metheg-Setzung, § 20, Michlol 46b): pain, and woe, and contention they have who tarry late at the wine (cf. Isa. v. 11), who enter (viz. into the wine-house, Eccles. ii. 4, the house of revelry) “to search” mingled drink (vid. at ix. 2; Isa. v. 22). Hitzig: “they test the mixing, as to the relation of the wine to the water, whether it is correct.” But לְחַקֹּר is like נִבְרָרִים, Isa. v. 22, meant in mockery: they are heroes, viz. heroes in drinking; they are searchers, such, namely, as seek to examine into the mixed wine, or also: thoroughly and carefully taste it (Fleischer).

The evil consequences of drunkenness are now registered. That one may not fall under this common sin, the poet, ver. 31, warns against the attraction which the wine presents to the sight and to the sense of taste: one must not permit himself to be caught as a prisoner by this enticement, but must maintain his freedom against it. הִתְאָדָם, to make, i.e. to show oneself red, is almost equivalent to הִתְאָרָם; and more than this, it presents the wine as itself co-operating and active by its red play of colours (Fleischer). Regarding the antiptosis (antiphonesis): Look not on the wine that is . . ., vid. at Gen. i. 3; yet here, where רָאָה means not merely “to see,” but “to look at,” the case is somewhat different. In 31b, one for the most part assumes that עֵינִי signifies the eye of the wine, i.e. the pearls which play on the surface of the wine (Fleischer). And, indeed, Hitzig's translation, after Num. xi. 7: when it presents its appearance in the cup, does not commend itself, because it expresses too little. On the other hand, it is saying too much when Böttcher maintains that עַן never denotes the mere appearance, but always the shining aspect of the object. But used of wine, עַן appears to denote not merely aspect as such, but its gleam, glance; not its pearls, for which עֵינִי would be the word used, but shining glance, by which particularly the bright glance, as out of deep darkness, of the Syro-Palestinian wine is thought of, which is for the most part prepared from red (blue) grapes, and because very rich in sugar, is thick almost like syrup. Jerome translates עֵינוּ well: (cum splenderit in vitro) color ejus. But one need not think of a glass; Böttcher has rightly said that one might perceive the glittering appearance also in a metal or earthen vessel if one looked into it. The Chethûb בְּנִים is an error of transcription; the Midrash makes the remark on this, that בְּנִים fits the wine merchant, and בְּבוֹם the wine drinker. From the pleasure of the eye, 31c passes over to the pleasures of the taste: (that, or, as it) goeth down smoothly (Luther); the expression is like Eccles. vii. 10. Instead of הַלֵּךְ (like jâry, of fluidity) there stands here הַהֲלֵךְ, commonly used of pleasant going; and instead of לְמִישְׁרִים with ל, the norm לְמִישְׁרִים with ב of the manner; directness is here easiness, facility (Arab. jur); it goes as on a straight, even way unhindered and easily down the throat.<sup>1</sup>

Ver. 32 shows how it issues with the wine, viz. with those who immoderately enjoy it. Is אֲחֵרִיתוֹ [its end] here the subject, as at v. 4? We must in that case interpret יִשְׁתֶּה and יִפְרֹשׂ as attributives, as the Syr. and Targ. translate the latter, and Ewald both. The issue which it brings with it is like the serpent which bites, etc., and there is nothing syntactically opposed to this (cf. e.g. Ps. xvii. 12); the future, in contradistinction to the participle, would not express properties, but intimations of facts. But the end of the wine is not like a serpent, but like the bite of a serpent. The wine itself, and independent of its consequences, is in and of itself like a serpent. In accordance with the matter, אחריתו may be interpreted, with Hitzig (after Jerome, in novissimo), as acc. adverb. = באחריתו, Jer. xvii. 11. But why did not the author more distinctly write this word 'בא? The syntactic relation is like xxix. 21: אחריתו is after the manner of a substantival clause, the subject to that which follows as its virtual predicate: "its end is: like a serpent it biteth = this, that it biteth like a serpent." Regarding צפּעני, serpens regulus (after Schultens, from צפּע = (Arab.) saf, to breathe out glowing, scorching), vid. at Isa. vii. 8. The Hiph. הפּריש Schultens here understands of the division of the liver, and Hitzig, after the LXX., Vulgate, and Venet., of squirting the poison; both after the Arab. farth. But הפּריש, Syr. afrés, also signifies, from the root-idea of dividing and splitting, to sting, poindre, pointer, as Rashi and Kimchi gloss, whence the Aram. פּרש, an ox-goad, with which the ancients connect פּרש (of the spur), the name for a rider, eques, and also a horse (cf. on the contrary, Fleischer in Levy, W. B. ii. 574); a serpent's bite and a serpent's sting (Lat. morsus, ictus, Varro: cum pepugerit colubra) are connected together by the ancients.<sup>1</sup>

The excited condition of the drunkard is now described. First, ver. 33 describes the activity of his imagination as excited to madness. It is untenable to interpret זרות here with Rashi, Aben Ezra, and others, and to translate with Luther: "so shall thine eyes look after other women" (circumspicient mulieres impudicas, Fleischer, for the meaning to perceive, to look about for something, to seek something with the eyes, referring to Gen. xli. 33). For זרות acquires the meaning of mulieres impudicæ only from its surrounding, but here the parallel תּהפּכות (perverse things) directs to the neut. aliena (cf. xv. 28, רעות, but not merely in the sense of unreal things (Rabag, Meiri), but: strange, i.e. abnormal, thus bizarre, mad, dreadful things. An old Heb. parable compares the changing circumstances which wine produces with the manner of the lamb, the lion, the swine, the monkey; here juggles and phantoms of the imagination are meant, which in the view and fancy of the drunken man hunt one another like monkey capers. Moreover, the state of the drunken man is one that is separated from the reality of a life of sobriety and the safety of a life of moderation, 34a: thou act like one who lies in the heart of the sea. Thus to lie in the heart, i.e. the midst, of the sea as a ship goes therein, xxx. 19, is impossible; there one must swim; but swimming is not lying, and to think on a situation like that of Jonah, i. 5, one must think also of the ship; but שָׁכַב does not necessarily mean "to sleep," and, besides, the sleep of a passenger in the cabin on the high sea is of itself no dangerous matter. Rightly Hitzig: in the depth of the sea (cf. Jonah ii. 4)—the drunken man, or the man overcome by wine (Isa. xxviii. 7), is like one who has sunk down into the midst of the sea; and thus drowned, or in danger of being drowned, he is in a condition of intellectual confusion, which finally passes over into perfect unconsciousness, cut off from the true life which passes over him like one dead, and in this condition he has made a bed for himself, as שָׁכַב denotes. With בְּלֵב בְּרָאשׁ stands in complete contrast: he is like one who lies on the top of the mast. חֲבִיל, after the forms יָשָׁלַם, הִבִּיר, is the sail-yard fastened by ropes, חֲבָלִים (Isa. xxxiii. 23). To lay oneself down on the sail-yard happens thus to no one, and it is no place for such a purpose; but as little as one can quarter him who is on the ridge of the roof, in the 'Alija, because no one is able to lie down there, so little can he in the bower [Mastkorb] him who is here spoken of (Böttcher). The poet says, but only by way of comparison, how critical the situation of the drunkard is; he compares him to one who lies on the highest sail-yard, and is exposed to the danger of being every moment thrown into the sea; for the rocking of the ship is the greater in proportion to the height of the sail-yard. The drunkard is, indeed, thus often exposed to the peril of his life; for an accident of itself not great, or a stroke, may suddenly put an end to his life.

Ver. 35. The poet represents the drunken man as now speaking to himself. He has been well cudgelled; but because insensible, he has not felt it, and he places himself now where he will sleep out his intoxication. Far from being made temperate by the strokes inflicted on him, he rejoices in the prospect, when he has awaked out of his sleep, of beginning again the life of drunkenness and revelry which has become a pleasant custom to him. חלה means not only to be sick, but generally to be, or to become, affected painfully; cf. Jer. v. 3, where חלה is not the 3d pl. mas. of חל, but of חלה. The words מתי ארתי are, it is true, a cry of longing of a different kind from Job vii. 4. The sleeping man cannot forbear from yielding to the constraint of nature: he is no longer master of himself, he becomes giddy, everything goes round about with him, but he thinks with himself: Oh that I were again awake! and so little has his appetite been appeased by his sufferings, that when he is again awakened, he will begin where he left off yesterday, when he could drink no more. מתי is here, after Nolde, Fleischer, and Hitzig, the relative quando (quum); but the bibl. usus loq. gives no authority for this. In that case we would have expected הקיצותי instead of אקיי. As the interrog. מתי is more animated than the relat., so also אוסיף אבקשנו is more animated (1 Sam. ii. 3) than אוסיף לבקש. The suffix of אבקשנו refers to the wine: raised up, he will seek that which has become so dear and so necessary to him.

After this divergence (in vers. 29–35) from the usual form of the proverb, there is now a return to the tetrastich:

- xxiv. 1 Envy not evil men,
 And desire not to have intercourse with them.
 2 For their heart thinketh of violence,
 And their lips speak mischief.

The warning, not to envy the godless, is also found at iii. 31, xxiii. 17, xxiv. 19, but is differently constructed in each of these passages. Regarding תתאו with Pathach, vid. at xxiii. 3. אֲנִישׁי רָעָה (cf. רע, xxviii. 5) are the wicked, i.e. such as cleave to evil, and to whom evil clings. The warning is grounded in this, that whoever have intercourse with such men, make themselves partners in greater sins and evil: for their heart broodeth (write שד, Munach Dechi) violence, i.e. robbery, plunder, destruction, murder, and the like. With שר (in the Mishle only here and at xxi. 7, cf. שר, xix. 26) connects itself elsewhere תמם, here (cf. Hab. i. 3) עמל, labor, molestia, viz. those who prepare it for others by means of slanderous, crafty, uncharitable talk.

Vers. 3, 4. The warning against fellowship with the godless is followed by the praise of wisdom, which is rooted in the fear of God.

- Ver. 3 By wisdom is the house builded,
 And by understanding is it established.
 4 And by knowledge shall the chambers be filled
 With all manner of precious and pleasant goods.

What is meant by the "building of the house" is explained at xiv. 1. It is wisdom, viz. that which originates from God, which is rooted in fellowship with Him, by which every household, be it great or small, prospers and attains to a successful and flourishing state; בִּינָה, as parallel word to בְּנָה (iii. 19; Hab. ii. 12), is related to it as statuere to extruere; the Hithpal (as at Num. xxi. 17) means to keep oneself in a state of continuance, to gain perpetuity, to become established. That יְסֻדָּה by Athnach has not passed over into the pausal יְסֻדָּה, arises from this, that the Athnach, by the poetical system of accents, has only the force of the prose accent Sakef; the clause completes itself only by 4b; the pausal form on that account also is not found, and it is discontinued, because the Athnach does not produce any pausal effect (vid. at Ps. xlv. 6). The form of expression in ver. 4 is like i. 13, iii. 10. But the מְדָרִים, of storerooms (LXX. as Isa. xxvi. 20, ταμεία), and נְעִים, like xxii. 18, xxiii. 8, is peculiar to this collection.

Vers. 5, 6. The praise of wisdom is continued: it brings blessings in the time of peace, and gives the victory in war.

- Ver. 5 A wise man is full of strength;
 And a man of understanding showeth great power.
 6 For with wise counsel shalt thou carry on successful war;
 And safety is where counsellors are not wanting.

The ב of בָּעוֹן (thus with Pathach in old impressions, Cod. 1294, Cod. Jaman., and elsewhere with the Masoretic note לִיח וּמְלֵא) introduces, as that of בְּבֵת, Ps. xxix. 4, the property in which a person or thing appears; the article (cf. הָעוֹבִים, ii. 13, Gesen. § 35, 2A) is that of gender. The parallel מֵאֲמִין בַּח, a Greek translates by ὑπὲρ κραταιὸν ἰσχυῖ = מֵאֲמִין בַּח (Job ix. 4; Isa. xl. 26). But after 5a it lies nearer that the poet means to express the power which lies in wisdom itself (Eccles. vii. 19), and its superiority to physical force (xxi. 22); the LXX., Syr., and Targ. also, it is true, translate 5a as if מַעֲזוֹ (præ potente) were the words used. כֹּחַ מְצַיֵּן means to strengthen the strength, and that is (Nah. ii. 2) equivalent to, to collect the strength (to take courage), here and at Amos ii. 14, to show strong (superior) strength. The reason is gathered from xx. 18b and xi. 14b. The הֵלֵךְ here added, Hitzig is determined to read הַעֲשֵׂה: for with prudent counsel the war shall be carried out by thee. The construction of the passive with ל of the subject is correct in Heb. (vid. at xiv. 20) as well as in Aram.,<sup>1</sup> and עָשָׂה frequently means, in a pregnant sense: to complete, to carry out, to bring to an end; but the phrase עָשָׂה מִלְחָמָה means always to carry on war, and nothing further. הֵלֵךְ is the dat. commod., as in לְהִלָּחֵם, to wage war (to contend) for any one, e.g. Ex. xiv. 14. Instead of בָּרַב, the LXX. reads בָּלֵב; regarding γεωργίου μεγάλου for כֹּחַ מְצַיֵּן, without doubt a corrupt reading, vid. Lagarde.

Till now in this appendix we have found only two distichs (vid. vol. i. p. 17); now several of them follow. From this, that wisdom is a power which accomplishes great things, it follows that it is of high value, though to the fool it appears all too costly.

Ver. 7 Wisdom seems to the fool to be an ornamental commodity;
He openeth not his mouth in the gate.

Most interpreters take רִמּוֹת for רִמּוֹת (written as at 1 Chron. vi. 58; cf. Zech. xiv. 10; רִשָׁשׁ, Prov. x. 4; קִנְיָן, Hos. x. 14), and translate, as Jerome and Luther: "Wisdom is to the fool too high;" the way to wisdom is to him too long and too steep, the price too costly, and not to be afforded. Certainly this thought does not lie far distant from what the poet would say; but why does he say הַכְּמוֹת, and not הַכְּמָה? This חכמות is not a numerical plur., so as to be translated with the Venet.: μετέωροι τῶ ἀφρονι αἱ ἐπιστημαί; it is a plur., as Ps. xlix. 4 shows; but, as is evident from the personification and the construction, i. 20, one inwardly multiplying and heightening, which is related to חכמה as science or the contents of knowledge is to knowledge. That this plur. comes here into view as in i.-ix. (vid. vol. i. p. 34), is definitely accounted for in these chapters by the circumstance that wisdom was to be designated, which is the mediatrix of all wisdom; here, to be designated in intentional symphony with רַאמוֹת, whose plur. ending óth shall be for that very reason, however, inalienable. Thus רַאמוֹת will be the name of a costly foreign bijouterie, which is mentioned in the Book of Job, where the unfathomableness and inestimableness of wisdom is celebrated; vid. Job xxvii. 18, where we have recorded what we had to say at the time regarding this word. But what is now the meaning of the saying that wisdom is to the fool a pearl or precious coral? Joël Brill explains: "The fool uses the sciences like a precious stone, only for ornament, but he knows not how to utter a word publicly." This is to be rejected, because רַאמוֹת is not so usual a trinket or ornament as to serve as an expression of this thought. The third of the comparison lies in the rarity, costliness, unattainableness; the fool despises wisdom, because the expenditure of strength and the sacrifices of all kinds which are necessary to put one into the possession of wisdom deter him from it (Rashi). This is also the sense which the expression has when רַאמוֹת = רַמוֹת; and probably for the sake of this double meaning the poet chose just this word, and not פְּנִינִים, or any other name, for articles of ornament (Hitzig). The Syr. has incorrectly interpreted this play upon words: sapientia abjecta stulto; and the Targumist: the fool grumbles (מְחַרְחֵם) against wisdom.<sup>1</sup> He may also find the grapes to be sour because they hang too high for him; here it is only said that wisdom remains at a distance from him because he cannot soar up to its attainment; for that very reason he does not open his mouth in the gate, where the council and the representatives of the people have their seats: he has not the knowledge necessary for being associated in counselling, and thus must keep silent; and this is indeed the most prudent thing he can do.

Ver. 8. From wisdom, which is a moral good, the following proverb passes over to a kind of σοφία δαιμονιώδης:

He that meditateth to do evil,
We call such an one an intriguer.

A verbal explanation and definition like xxi. 24 (cf. vol. i. p. 40), formed like xvi. 21 from נָבַח. Instead of בַּעַל-מְצוֹת [lord of mischief] in xii. 2, the expression is אִישׁ מְ (cf. at xxii. 24). Regarding מְצוֹת in its usual sense, vid. v. 2. Such definitions have of course no lexicographical, but only a moral aim. That which is here given is designed to warn one against gaining for himself this ambiguous title of a refined (cunning, versutus) man; one is so named whose schemes and endeavours are directed to the doing of evil. One may also inversely find the turning-point of the warning in 8b: "he who projects deceitful plans against the welfare of others, finds his punishment in this, that he falls under public condemnation as a worthless intriguer" (Elster). But מְצוֹת is a ῥῆμα μέσον, vid. v. 2; the title is thus equivocal, and the turning-point lies in the bringing out of his kernel: מְחַשֵּׁב לְהַרְעֵ = meditating to do evil.

Ver. 9. This proverb is connected by זַמַּח with ver. 8, and by אִישׁ with ver. 7; it places the fool and the mocker over against one another.

The undertaking of folly is sin;
And an abomination to men is the scorner.

Since it is certain that for 9b the subject is "the scorner," so also "sin" is to be regarded as the subject of 9a. The special meaning flagitium, as xxi. 27, זָמָה will then not have here, but it derives it from the root-idea "to contrive, imagine," and signifies first only the collection and forthputting of the thoughts towards a definite end (Job xvii. 11), particularly the refined preparation, the contrivance of a sinful act. In a similar way we speak of a sinful beginning or undertaking. But if one regards sin in itself, or in its consequences, it is always a contrivance or desire of folly (gen. subjecti), or: one that bears on itself (gen. qualitatis) the character of folly; for it disturbs and destroys the relation of man to God and man, and rests, as Socrates in Plato says, on a false calculation. And the mocker (the mocker at religion and virtue) is הוֹעֵבֵת לְאָדָם. The form of combination stands here before a word with הֵ, as at Job xviii. 2, xxiv. 5, and frequently. But why does not the poet say directly הוֹעֵבֵת אָדָם? Perhaps to leave room for the double sense, that the mocker is not only an abomination to men, viz. to the better disposed; but also, for he makes others err as to their faith, and draws them into his frivolous thoughts, becomes to them a cause of abomination, i.e. of such conduct and of such thoughts as are an abomination before God (xv. 9, 26).

Ver. 10. The last of these four distichs stands without visible connection :

Hast thou shown thyself slack in the day of adversity,
Then is thy strength small.

The perf. 10a is the hypothetic, vid. at xxii. 29. If a man shows himself remiss (xviii. 9), i.e. changeable, timorous, incapable of resisting in times of difficulty, then shall he draw therefrom the conclusion which is expressed in 10b. Rightly Luther, with intentional generalization, "he is not strong who is not firm in need." But the address makes the proverb an earnest admonition, which speaks to him who shows himself weak the judgment which he has to pronounce on himself. And the paronomasia צָרָה and צָר may be rendered, where possible, "if thy strength becomes, as it were, pressed together and bowed down by the difficulty just when it ought to show itself (viz. לְהִתְרַחֵב לָהּ), then it is limited, thou art a weakling." Thus Fleischer accordingly, translating : si segnis fueris die angustia, angustæ sunt vires tuæ. Hitzig, on the contrary, corrects after Job vii. 11, רִחֵקָה, "Klemm (klamm) ist dein Mut" [= strait is thy courage]. And why? Of כֹּחַ [strength], he remarks, one can say כָּשֵׁל [it is weak] (Ps. xxxi. 11), but scarcely צָר [strait, straitened]; for force is exact, and only the region of its energy may be wide or narrow. To this we answer, that certainly of strength in itself we cannot use the word כֹּחַ in the sense here required; the confinement (limitation) may rather be, as with a stream, Isa. lix. 19, the increasing (heightening) of its intensity. But if the strength is in itself anything definite, then on the other hand its expression is something linear, and the force in view of its expression is that which is here called צָר, i.e. not extending widely, not expanding, not inaccessible. צָר is all to which narrow limits are applied. A little strength is limited, because it is little also in its expression.

Now, again, we meet with proverbs of several lines. The first here is a hexastich :

Ver. 11 Deliver them that are taken to death,
And them that are tottering to destruction, oh stop them!

- 12 If thou sayest, "We knew not of it indeed,"—
 It is not so: The Weigher of hearts, who sees through it,
 And He that observeth thy soul, He knoweth it,
 And requiteth man according to his work.

If אֵם is interpreted as a particle of adjuration, then אֵם-תַּחֲשׁוּךְ is equivalent to: I adjure thee, forbear not (cf. Neh. xiii. 25 with Isa. lviii. 1), viz. that which thou hast to do, venture all on it (LXX., Syr., Jerome). But the parallelism requires us to take together לְהָרִג (such as with tottering steps are led forth to destruction) as object along with אֵם-תַּחֲשׁוּךְ, as well as לְקַחִים לְמוֹתָה (such as from their condition are carried away to death, cf. Ex. xiv. 11) as object to הַצֵּל, in which all the old interpreters have recognised the imper., but none the infn. (eripere . . . ne cesses, which is contrary to Heb. idiom, both in the position of the words and in the construction). אֵם also is not to be interpreted as an interrogative; for, thus expressed, an retinetis ought rather to have for the converse the meaning: thou shalt indeed not do it! (cf. e.g. Isa. xxix. 16.) And אֵם cannot be conditional: si prohibere poteris (Michaelis and others), for the fut. after אֵם has never the sense of a potential. Thus אֵם is, like לֵי, understood in the sense of utinam, as it is used not merely according to later custom (Hitzig), but from ancient times (cf. e.g. Ex. xxxii. 32 with Gen. xxiii. 13). בְּיַתְאֵמַר (reminding<sup>1</sup> us of the same formula of the Rabbinical writings) introduces an objection, excuse, evasion, which is met by הַלֵּא; introducing "so say I on the contrary," it is of itself a reply, vid. Deut. vii. 17 f. הֵן we will not have to interpret personally (LXX. τοῦτον); for, since ver. 11 speaks of several of them, the neut. rendering (Syr., Targ., Venet., Luther) in itself lies nearer, and זֶה, hoc, after יָדַע, is also in conformity with the usus loq.; vid. at Ps. lvi. 10. But the neut. זֶה does not refer to the moral obligation expressed in ver. 11; to save human life when it is possible to do so, can be unknown to no one, wherefore Jerome (as if the words of the text were אֵין לְאֵל יָרַנְי זֶה): vires non suppetunt. זֶה refers to the fact that men are led to the tribunal; only thus is explained the change of יָרַעְתִּי, which was to be expected, into יָרַעְנִי: the objection is, that one certainly did not know, viz. that matters had come to an extremity with them, and that a short process will be made with them. To this excuse, with pretended ignorance, the reply of the omniscient God stands opposed, and suggests to him who makes the excuse to consider: It is not so: the Searcher of hearts (vid. at xvi. 2), He sees through it, viz. what goes on in thy heart, and He has thy soul under His inspection (נִצֵּר, as Job vii. 20; LXX. καὶ ὁ πλάσας; וַיִּצֵּר, which Hitzig prefers, for he thinks that נִצֵּר must be interpreted in the sense of to guard, preserve; Luther rightly); He knows, viz., how it is with thy mind, He looks through it, He knows (cf. for both, Ps. cxxxix. 1-4), and renders to man according to his conduct, which, without being deceived, He judges according to the state of the heart, out of which the conduct springs. It is to be observed that ver. 11 speaks of one condemned to death generally, and not expressly of one innocently condemned, and makes no distinction between one condemned in war and in peace. One sees from this that the Chokma generally has no pleasure in this, that men are put to death by men, not even when it is done legally as punishment for a crime. For, on the one side, it is true that the punishment of the murderer by death is a law proceeding from the nature of the divine holiness and the inviolability of the divine ordinance, and the worth of man as formed in the image of God, and that the magistrate who disowns this law as a law, disowns the divine foundation of his office; but, on the other side, it is just as true that thousands and thousands of innocent persons, or at least persons not worthy of death, have fallen a sacrifice to the abuse or the false application of this law; and that along with the principle of recompensative righteousness, there is a principle of grace which rules in the kingdom of God, and is represented in the O. T. by prophecy and the Chokma. It is, moreover, a noticeable fact, that God did not visit with the punishment of death the first murderer, the murderer of the innocent Abel, his brother, but let the principle of grace so far prevail instead of that of law, that He even protected his life against any avenger of blood. But after that the moral ruin of the human race had reached that height which brought the Deluge over the earth, there was promulgated to the post-diluvians the word of the law, Gen. ix. 6, sanctioning this inviolable right of putting to death by the hand of justice. The conduct of God regulates itself thus according to the aspect of the times. In the Mosaic law the greatness of guilt was estimated not externally (cf. Num. xxxv. 31), but internally, a very flexible limitation in its practical bearings. And that under certain circumstances grace might have the precedence of justice, the parable having in view the pardon of Absalom (2 Sam. xiv.) shows. But a word from God, like Ezek. xviii. 23, raises grace to a principle, and the word with which Jesus (John viii. 11) dismisses the adulteress is altogether an expression of this purpose of grace passing beyond the purpose of justice. In the later Jewish commonwealth, criminal justice was subordinated to the principle of predominating compassion; practical effect was given to the consideration of the value of human life during the trial, and even after the sentence was pronounced, and during a long time no sentence of death was passed by the Sanhedrim. But Jesus, who was Himself the innocent victim of a fanatical legal murder, adjudged, it is true, the supremacy to the sword; but He preached and practised love, which publishes grace for justice. He was Himself incarnate Love, offering Himself for sinners, the Mercy which Jahve proclaims by Ezek. xviii. 23. The so-called Christian state ["Civitas Dei"] is indeed in manifest opposition to this. But Augustine declares himself, on the supposition that the principle of grace must penetrate the new era, in all its conditions, that began with Christianity, for the suspension of punishment by death, especially because the heathen magistrates had abused the instrument of death, which, according to divine right, they had control over, to the destruction of Christians; and Ambrosius went so far as to impress it as a duty on a Christian judge who had pronounced the sentence of death, to exclude himself from the Holy Supper. The magisterial control over life and death had at that time gone to the extreme height of bloody violence, and thus in a certain degree it destroyed itself. Therefore Jansen changes the proverb (ver. 11) with the words of Ambrosius into the admonition: Quando indulgentia non nocet publico, eripe intercessionem, eripe gratia tu sacerdos, aut tu imperator eripe subscriptionem indulgentiæ. When Samuel Romilly's Bill to abolish the punishment of death for a theft amounting to the sum of five shillings passed the English House of Commons, it was thrown out by a majority in the House of Lords. Among those who voted against the Bill were one archbishop and five bishops. Our poet here in the Proverbs is of a different mind. Even the law of Sinai appoints the punishment of death only for man-stealing. The Mosaic code is incomparably milder than even yet the Carolina. In expressions, however, like the above, a true Christian spirit rules the spirit which condemns all blood-thirstiness of justice, and calls forth to a crusade not only against the inquisition, but also against such unmerciful, cruel executions even as they prevailed in Prussia in the name of law in the reign of Friedrich Wilhelm I., the Inexorable.

Vers. 13, 14. The proverb now following stands in no obvious relation with the preceding. But in both a commencement is made with two lines, which contain, in the former, the principal thought; in this here, its reason:

- Ver. 13 My son, eat honey, for it is good,
 And honeycomb is sweet to thy taste.
 14 So apprehend wisdom for thy soul:
 When thou hast found it, there is a future,
 And thy hope is not destroyed.

After its nearest fundamental thought, טוב, Arab. tejjib, means that which smells and tastes well; honey (שֶׁבֶבֶת, from שָׁבַב, to be thick, consistent) has, besides, according to the old idea (e.g. in the Koran), healing virtue, as in general bitterness is viewed as a property of the poisonous, and sweetness that of the wholesome. וְנִפְתָּ is second accus. dependent on אֶבְבֵּי, for honey and honeycomb were then spoken of as different; נִפְתָּ (from נָפַת, to pour, to flow out) is the purest honey (virgin-honey), flowing of itself out of the comb. With right the accentuation takes 13*b* as independent, the substantival clause containing the reason, "for it is good:" honeycomb is sweet to thy taste, i.e. applying itself to it with the impression of sweetness; עַל, as at Neh. ii. 5; Ps. xvi. 6 (Hitzig).

In the 13 of 14*a*, it is manifest that ver. 13 is not spoken for its own sake. To apprehend wisdom, is elsewhere equivalent to, to receive it into the mind, i. 2, Eccles. i. 17 (cf. רָעַת בִּינָה, iv. 1, and frequently), according to which Böttcher also here explains: learn to understand wisdom. But כן unfolds itself in 14bc: even as honey has for the body, so wisdom has for the soul, beneficent wholesome effects. דעה חכמה is thus not absolute, but is meant in relation to these effects. Rightly Fleischer: talem reputa; Ewald: sic (talem) scito sapientiam (esse) animæ tuæ, know, recognise wisdom as something advantageous to thy soul, and worthy of commendation. Incorrectly Hitzig explains אַם־מִצָּתָהּ, “if the opportunity presents itself.” Apart from this, that in such a case the words would rather have been פִּי הַמִּצָּתָהּ, to find wisdom is always equivalent to, to obtain it, to make it one’s own, iii. 13, viii. 35; cf. ii. 5, viii. 9. דָּעָה<sup>1</sup> stands for דָּעָה, after the form וְדָעָה; שָׁבָה (after Böttcher, § 396, not without the influence of the following commencing sound), cf. the similar transitions of פָּ into פֿ placed together at Ps. xx. 4; the form דָּעָה is also found, but דָּעָה is the form in the Cod. Hilleli,<sup>2</sup> as confirmed by Moses Kimchi in Comm., and by David Kimchi, Michlol 101b. With וַיִּשׁ begins the apodosis (LXX., Jerome, Targ., Luther, Rashi, Ewald, and others). In itself, וַיִּשׁ (cf. Gen. xlvii. 6) might also continue the conditional clause; but the explanation, si inveneris (eam) et ad postremum ventum erit (Fleischer, Bertheau, Zöckler), has this against it, that וַיִּשׁ אֶתְהַרְיֶה does not mean: the end comes, but: there is an end, xxiii. 18; cf. xix. 18; here: there is an end for thee, viz. an issue that is a blessed reward. The promise is the same as at xxiii. 18. In our own language we speak of the hope of one being cut off; (Arab.) jaz’a, to be cut off, is equivalent to, to give oneself up to despair.

Ver. 15 Lie not in wait, oh wicked man, against the dwelling of the righteous;

Assault not his resting-place.

16 For seven times doth the righteous fall and rise again,

But the wicked are overthrown when calamity falls on them.

The אַרְבַּּ [lying in wait] and שִׁדְרָה [practising violence], against which the warning is here given, are not directed, as at i. 11, xix. 26, immediately against the person, but against the dwelling-place and resting-place (רַבֵּי, e.g. Jer. l. 6, as also נָוֶה, iii. 33) of the righteous, who, on his part, does injustice and wrong to no one; the warning is against coveting his house, Ex. xx. 17, and driving him by cunning and violence out of it. Instead of רַבֵּי, Symmachus and Jerome have incorrectly read רָשָׁע, and from this misunderstanding have here introduced a sense without sense into ver. 15; many interpreters (Löwenstein, Ewald, Elster, and Zöckler) translate with Luther appositionally: as a wicked man, i.e. "with mischievous intent," like one stealthily lurking for the opportunity of taking possession of the dwelling of another, as if this could be done with a good intent: רָשָׁע is the vocative (Syr., Targ., Venet.: ἀσεβής), and this address (cf. Ps. lxxv. 5 f.) sharpens the warning, for it names him who acts in this manner by the right name. The reason, 16a, sounds like an echo of Job v. 19. שֹׁבֵב signifies, as at Ps. cxix. 164, seven times; cf. מֵאָחַז, xvii. 10. וְקָם (not וְקָם) is perf. consec., as וְקָם, e.g. Gen. iii. 22: and he rises afterwards (notwithstanding), but the transgressors come to ruin; בְּרָעָה, if a misfortune befall them (cf. xiv. 32), they stumble and fall, and rise no more.

Vers. 17, 18. Warning against a vindictive disposition, and joy over its satisfaction.

Ver. 17 At the fall of thine enemy rejoice not,

And at his overthrow let not thine heart be glad;

18 That Jahve see it not, and it be displeasing to Him,

And He turns away His anger from Him.

The Chethîb, which in itself, as the plur. of category, אוֹיְבֶיךָ, might be tolerable, has 17b against it: with right, all interpreters adhere to the Kerî אוֹיְבֶיךָ (with i from ē in doubled close syllable, as in the like Kerî, 1 Sam. xxiv. 5). וְבִהְשִׁילֹו, for וְבִהְשִׁילֹו, is the syncope usual in the inf. Niph. and Hiph., which in Niph. occurs only once with the initial guttural (as בִּיעָטָה) or half guttural (לִלְחֹוֹת). וְרָע is not adj. here as at 1 Sam. xxv. 3, but perf. with the force of a fut. (Symmachus: καὶ μὴ ἀρέσῃ ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ). The proverb extends the duty of love even to an enemy; for it requires that we do good to him and not evil, and warns against rejoicing when evil befalls him. Hitzig, indeed, supposes that the noble morality which is expressed in ver. 17 is limited to a moderate extent by the motive assigned in 18b. Certainly the poet means to say that God could easily give a gracious turn for the better, as to the punishment of the wicked, to the decree of his anger against his enemy; but his meaning is not this, that one, from joy at the misfortune of others, ought to desist from interrupting the process of the destruction of his enemy, and let it go on to its end; but much rather, that one ought to abstain from this joy, so as not to experience the manifestation of God's displeasure thereat, by His granting grace to him against whom we rejoice to see God's anger go forth.<sup>1</sup>

Vers. 19, 20. Warning against envying the godless for their external prosperity :

Be not enraged on account of evil-doers,
Envy not the godless;

20 For the wicked men shall have no future,
The light of the godless is extinguished.

Ver. 19 is a variation of Ps. xxxvii. 1; cf. also iii. 21 (where with בכל־דרכיו following the traditional תבוהר is more appropriate than תחחר, which Hupfeld would here insert). תִּתְחַר is fut. apoc. of תִּתְחַרַּה, to be heated (to be indignant), distinguished from the Tiphel תִּתְחַרַּה, to be jealous. The ground and occasion of being enraged, and on the other side, of jealousy or envy, is the prosperity of the godless, Ps. lxxiii. 3; cf. Jer. xii. 1. This anger at the apparently unrighteous division of fortune, this jealousy at the success in which the godless rejoice, rest on short-sightedness, which regards the present, and looks not on to the end. אֲחֵרִית, merely as in the expression 'ישׁ אחר', 14*b* (cf. Ps. xxxvii. 37), always denotes the happy, glorious issue indemnifying for past sufferings. Such an issue the wicked man has not; his light burns brightly on this side, but one day it is extinguished. In 20*b* is repeated xiii. 9; cf. xx. 20.

Vers. 21, 22. A warning against rebellious thoughts against God and the king :

My son, honour Jahve and the king,

And involve not thyself with those who are otherwise disposed ;

22 For suddenly their calamity ariseth,

And the end of their years, who knoweth it?

<sup>1</sup> This proverb, according to Aboth iv. 24, was the motto of that Samuel with the surname הקטן, who formulated ברכת המינים (the interpolation in the Schemone-Esre prayer directed against the schismatics) : he thus distinguished between private enemies and the enemies of the truth.

The verb שָׁנָה, proceeding from the primary idea of folding (compicare, duplicare), signifies transitively to do twice, to repeat, xvii. 9, xxvi. 11, according to which Kimchi here inappropriately thinks on relapsing; and intransitively, to change, to be different, Esth. i. 7, iii. 8. The Syr. and Targ. translate the word שָׁנָה, fools; but the Kal (שָׁנָה) occurs, indeed, in the Syr., but not in the Heb., in the meaning alienata est (mens ejus); and besides, this meaning, alieni, is not appropriate here. A few, however, with Saadia (cf. Deutsch-Morgenländische Zeitschr. xxi. 616), the dualists (Manichees), understand it in a dogmatic sense; but then שֹׁנִים must be denom. of שָׁנָה, while much more it is its root-word. Either שֹׁנִים means those who change, novantes = novarum rerum studiosi, which is, however, exposed to this objection, that the Heb. שָׁנָה, in the transitive sense to change, does not elsewhere occur; or it means, according to the usus loq., diversos = diversum sentientes (C. B. Michaelis and others), and that with reference to 21a: המַּמְרִים דְּבַרֵיהֶם וּמַצּוֹתָם (Meiri, Immanuel), or מַשְׁנִים מִנְהַג הַחֻמָּה (Ahron b. Joseph). Thus they are called (for it is a common name of a particular class of men) dissidents, oppositionists, or revolutionaries, who recognise neither the monarchy of Jahve, the King of kings, nor that of the earthly king, which perhaps Jerome here means by the word detractoribus (= detractoribus). The Venet. incorrectly, σὺν τοῖς μισσοῦσι, i.e. שֹׁנִים. With ב at xiv. 10, הִתְעַרְבָה meant to mix oneself up with something, here with עַם, to mix oneself with some one, i.e. to make common cause with him.

The reason assigned in ver. 22 is, that although such persons as reject by thought and action human and divine law may for a long time escape punishment, yet suddenly merited ruin falls on them. אִיר is, according to its primary signification, weighty, oppressive misfortune, vid. i. 27. In יָקָם it is thought of as hostile power (Hos. x. 14); or the rising up of God as Judge (e.g. Isa. xxxiii. 10) is transferred to the means of executing judgment. פִּיר (= פָּוֵר of פֹּר or פִּיר, Arab. fād, fut. jafīdu or jafīdu, a stronger power of bād, cogn. אָבַד) is destruction (Arab. feid, fīd, death); this word occurs, besides here, only thrice in the Book of Job. But to what does שְׁנִיָּהּ refer? Certainly not to Jahve and the king (LXX., Schultens, Umbreit, and Bertheau), for in itself it is doubtful to interpret the genit. after פִּיר as designating the subject, but improper to comprehend God and man under one cipher. Rather it may refer to two, of whom one class refuse to God, the other to the king, the honour that is due (Jerome, Luther, and at last Zöckler); but in the foregoing, two are not distinguished, and the want of reverence for God, and for the magistrates appointed by Him, is usually met with, because standing in interchangeable relationship, in one and the same persons. Is there some misprint then in this word? Ewald suggests שְׁנִיָּהִם, i.e. of those who show themselves as שׁוֹנִים (altercatores) towards God and the king. In view of קִמְיָהֶם, Ex. xxxii. 25, this brevity of expression must be regarded as possible. But if this were the meaning of the word, then it ought to have stood in the first member (אִיר (שְׁנִיָּהֶם), and not in the second. No other conjecture presents itself. Thus שְׁנִיָּהֶם is perhaps to be referred to the שׁוֹנִים, and those who engage with them: join thyself not with the opposers; for suddenly misfortune will come upon them, and the destruction of both (of themselves and their partisans), who knows it? But that also is not satisfactory, for after the address שְׁנִיָּהֶם was to have been expected, 22b. Nothing remains, therefore, but to understand שְׁנִיָּהֶם, with the Syr. and Targ., as at Job xxxvi. 11; the proverb falls into rhythms פִּיר פִּירָהֶם and שׁוֹנִים, שְׁנִיָּהֶם. But “the end of their year” is not equivalent to the hour of their death (Hitzig), because for this פִּירָהֶם (cf. Arab. feid and fid, death) was necessary; but to the expiring, the vanishing, the passing by of the year during which they have succeeded in maintaining their ground and playing a part. There will commence a time which no one knows beforehand when all is over with them. In this sense, “who knoweth,” with its object, is equivalent to “suddenly ariseth,” with its subject. In the LXX., after xxiv. 22, there follow one distich of the relations of man to the word of God as deciding their fate, one distich of fidelity as a duty towards the king, and the duty of the king, and one pentastich or hexastich of the power of the tongue and of the anger of the king. The Heb. text knows nothing of these three proverbs. Ewald has, Jahrb. xi. 18 f., attempted to translate them into Heb., and is of opinion that they are worthy of being regarded as original component parts of i.-xxix., and that they ought certainly to have come in after xxiv. 22. We doubt this originality, but recognise their translation from the Heb. Then follows in the LXX. the series of Proverbs, xxx. 1-14, which in the Heb. text bear the superscription of "the Words of Agur;" the second half of the "Words of Agur," together with the "Words of Lemuel," stand after xxiv. 34 of the Heb. text. The state of the matter is this, that in the copy from which the Alexandrines translated the Appendix xxx.-xxxv. 9, stood half of it, after the "Words of the Wise" [which extend from xxii. 17 to xxiv. 22], and half after the supplement headed "these also are from wise men" [xxiv. 23-34], so that only the proverbial ode in praise of the excellent matron [xxxv. 10] remains as an appendix to the Book of Hezekiah's collection, xxv.-xxix.

SECOND SUPPLEMENT TO THE FIRST SOLOMONIC
COLLECTION.—XXIV. 23-34.

There now follows a brief appendix to the older Book of Proverbs, bearing the superscription, 23a, "These also are from wise men," i.e. also the proverbs here following originate from wise men. The old translators (with the exception of Luther) have not understood this superscription; they mistake the Lamed auctoris, and interpret the ל as that of address: also these (proverbs) I speak to wise men, sapientibus (LXX., Syr., Targ., Jerome, Venet.). The formation of the superscription is like that of the Hezekiah collection, xxv. 1, and from this and other facts we have concluded (vid. vol. i. pp. 26, 27) that this second supplement originated from the same source as the extension of the older Book of Proverbs, by the appending of the more recent, and its appendices. The linguistic complexion of the proverbs here and there resembles that of the first appendix (cf. 29b with 12d, and נָעַם, 25a, with נָעַם, xxii. 18, xxiii. 8, xxiv. 4); but, on the other hand, 23b refers back to xxviii. 21 of the Hezekiah collection, and in ver. 33 f. is repeated vi. 10 f. This appendix thus acknowledges its secondary character; the poet in minute details stands in the same relation to the Solomonic Mashal as that in which in general he stands to the author of the Introduction, i.-ix. That 23*b* is not in itself a proverb, we have already (vol. i. p. 6) proved; it is the first line of a hexastich (vid. vol. i. p. 16).

Vers. 23*b*-25. The curse of partiality and the blessing of impartiality:

Respect of persons in judgment is by no means good:

24 He that saith to the guilty, "Thou art in the right,"
Him the people curse, nations detest.

25 But to them who rightly decide, it is well,
And upon them cometh blessing with good.

Partiality is either called שְׂאֵת פְּנִים, xviii. 5, respect to the person, for the partisan looks with pleasure on the פְּנֵי, the countenance, appearance, personality of one, by way of preference; or הִפְרָר פְּנִים, as here and at xxviii. 21, for he places one person before another in his sight, or, as we say, has a regard to him; the latter expression is found in Deut. i. 17, xvi. 19. הִפְרָר (vid. xx. 11) means to regard sharply, whether from interest in the object, or because it is strange. בַּל Heidenheim regards as weaker than לֹא; but the reverse is the case (vid. vol. i. p. 204), as is seen from the derivation of this negative (= balj, from בָּלַה, to melt, to decay); thus it does not occur anywhere else than here with the pred. adj. The two supplements delight in this בַּל, xxii. 29, xxiii. 7, 35. The thesis 23*b* is now confirmed in vers. 24 and 25, from the consequences of this partiality and its opposite: He that saith (אָמַרְוּ, with Mehuppach Legarmeh from the last syllable, as rightly by Athias, Nissel, and Michaelis, vid. Thorath Emeth, p. 32) to the guilty: thou art right, i.e. he who sets the guilty free (for רִשָּׁע and צְדִיק have here the forensic sense of the post-bibl. הַיָּב and הַצֵּדִיק), him they curse, etc.; cf. the shorter proverb, xvii. 15, according to which a partial, unjust judge is an abomination to God. Regarding נָקַב (קָבַב) here and at xi. 26, Schultens, under Job iii. 8, is right; the word signifies figere, and hence to distinguish and make prominent by distinguishing as well as by branding; cf. defigere, to curse, properly, to pierce through. Regarding וָעָם, vid. at xxii. 14. לְאַפְיִם and עַפְיִם (from עָפָם and לָאָם, which both mean to bind and combine) are plur. of categ.: not merely individuals, not merely families, curse such an unrighteous judge and abhor him, but the whole people in all conditions and ranks of society; for even though such an unjust judge bring himself and his favourites to external honour, yet among no people is conscience so blunted, that he who absolves the crime and ennobles the miscarriage of justice shall escape the vox populi. On the contrary, it goes well (יָעַם, like ii. 10, ix. 17, but here with neut. indef. subj. as יֵטֵב, Gen. xii. 13, and frequently) with those who place the right, and particularly the wrong, fully to view; כּוֹזֵבֵי־הַיָּמִינִים is he who mediates the right, Job ix. 33, and particularly who proves, censures, punishes the wrong, ix. 7, and in the character of a judge as here, Amos v. 10; Isa. xxix. 21. The genitive connection בְּרִצְת־טוֹב is not altogether of the same signification as יַיִן הַטּוֹב, wine of a good sort, Song vii. 10, and אִשָּׁת רָע, a woman of a bad kind, vi. 24, for every blessing is of a good kind; the gen. טוב thus, as at Ps. xxi. 4, denotes the contents of the blessing; cf. Eph. i. 3, "with all spiritual blessings," in which the manifoldness of the blessing is presupposed.

Ver. 26. Then follows a distich with the watchword בְּנִבְהִים :

He kisseth the lips

Who for the end giveth a right answer.

The LXX., Syr., and Targ. translate: one kisseth the lips who, or: of those who . . .; but such a meaning is violently forced into the word (in that case the expression would have been שִׁפְתֵי מְשִׁיבִים or שִׁפְתֵי מְשִׁיבִים). Equally impossible is Theodotion's χείλεσι καταφιληθήσεται, for יִשָּׁק cannot be the fut. Niph. Nor is it: lips kiss him who . . . (Rashi); for, to be thus understood, the word ought to have been לְמִשִּׁיבִים. מְשִׁיבִים is naturally to be taken as the subj., and thus it supplies the meaning: he who kisseth the lips giveth an excellent answer, viz. the lips of him whom the answer concerns (Jerome, Venet., Luther). But Hitzig ingeniously, "the words reach from the lips of the speaker to the ears of the hearer, and thus he kisses his ear with his lips." But since to kiss the ear is not a custom, not even with the Florentines, then a welcome answer, if its impression is to be compared to a kiss, is compared to a kiss on the lips. Hitzig himself translates: he commends himself with the lips who . . .; but לְשִׁקֵּן may mean to join oneself, Gen.

xli. 40, as kissing is equivalent to the joining of the lips ; it does not mean intrans. to cringe. Rather the explanation : he who joins the lips together . . . ; for he, viz. before reflecting, closed his lips together (suggested by Meïri) ; but נשק, with שפתים, brings the idea of kissing, labra labris jungere, far nearer. This prevails against Schultens' armatus est (erit) labia, besides נשק, certainly, from the primary idea of connecting (laying together) (vid. Ps. lxxviii. 9), to equip (arm) oneself therewith ; but the meaning arising from thence : with the lips he arms himself . . . is direct nonsense. Fleischer is essentially right, Labra osculatur (i.e. quasi osculum oblatum reddit) qui congrua respondet. Only the question has nothing to do with a kiss ; but if he who asks receives a satisfactory answer, an enlightening counsel, he experiences it as if he received a kiss. The Midrash incorrectly remarks under דְּבָרִים נְכֹחִים, “words of merited denunciation,” according to which the Syr. translates. Words are meant which are corresponding to the matter and the circumstances, and suitable for the end (cf. viii. 9). Such words are like as if the lips of the inquirer received a kiss from the lips of the answerer.

Ver. 27. Warning against the establishing of a household where the previous conditions are wanting :

Set in order thy work without,

And make it ready for thyself beforehand in the fields,—

After that then mayest thou build thine house.

The interchange of בְּחַיִּן and בְּשָׂדֵה shows that by מְלֶאכֶת הַשָּׂדֵה field-labour, 1 Chron. xxvii. 26, is meant. הַכֵּן, used of arrangement, procuring, here with מְלֶאכֶה, signifies the setting in order of the work, viz. the cultivation of the field. In the parallel member, עֲתִדָּה, carrying also its object, in itself is admissible : make preparations (LXX., Syr.) ; but the punctuation עֲתִדָּה (Targ., Venet.; on the other hand, Jerome and Luther translate as if the words were וְעִתְדָה הַשָּׂדֵה) is not worthy of being contended against : set it (the work) in the fields in readiness, i.e. on the one hand set forward the present necessary work, and on the other hand prepare for that which next follows ; thus : do completely and circumspectly what thy calling as a husbandman requires of thee,—then mayest thou go to the building and building up of thy house (vid. at ver. 3, xiv. 1), to which not only the building and setting in order of a convenient dwelling, but also the bringing home of a housewife and the whole setting up of a household belongs; prosperity at home is conditioned by this—one fulfils his duty without in the fields actively and faithfully. One begins at the wrong end when he begins with the building of his house, which is much rather the result and goal of an intelligent discharge of duty within the sphere of one's calling. The perf., with ו after a date, such as אחר כעט, עור כעט, and the like, when things that will or should be done are spoken of, has the fut. signification of a perf. consec., Gen. iii. 5; Ex. xvi. 6 f., xvii. 4; Ewald, § 344b.

Ver. 28. Warning against unnecessary witnessing to the disadvantage of another:

Never be a causeless witness against thy neighbour;
And shouldest thou use deceit with thy lips?

The phrase ער־תִּבֶּן does not mean a witness who appears against his neighbour without knowledge of the facts of the case, but one who has no substantial reason for his giving of testimony; ער־תִּבֶּן means groundless, with reference to the occasion and motive, iii. 30, xxiii. 29, xxvi. 2. Other designations stood for false witnesses (LXX., Syr., Targ.). Rightly Jerome, the Venet., and Luther, without, however, rendering the gen. connection ער־תִּבֶּן, as it might have been by the adj.

In 28b, Chajûg derives הַפְתִּיתָ from פָּתַת, to break in pieces, to crumble; for he remarks it might stand, with the passing over of ô into î, for הַפְתִּיתָ [and thou wilt whisper]. But the ancients had no acquaintance with the laws of sound, and therefore with naïve arbitrariness regarded all as possible; and Böttcher, indeed, maintains that the Hiphil of פָּתַת may be הַפְתִּיתָ as well as הַפְתוּתָ; but the former of these forms with î could only be metaplastically possible, and would be הַפְתִּיתָ (vid. Hitzig under Jer. xi. 20). And what can this Hiph. of פָּתַת mean? "To crumble" one's neighbours (Chajûg) is an unheard of expression; and the meanings, to throw out crumbs, viz. crumbs of words (Böttcher), or to speak with a broken, subdued voice (Hitzig), are extracted from the rare Arab. fatâfit (fatafit), for which the lexicographers note the meaning of a secret, moaning sound. When we see הַפְתִּיתָ standing along with בְּשִׁפְתֶיךָ, then before all we are led to think of פתח [to open], xx. 19; Ps. lxxiii. 36. But we stumble at the interrog. הֲ, which nowhere else appears connected with ו. Ewald therefore purposes to read הֲוִיִּיִּי [and will open wide] (LXX. μηδὲ πλατύνου): “that thou usest treachery with thy lips;” but from פתח, to make wide open, Gen. ix. 27, “to use treachery” is, only for the flight of imagination, not too wide a distance. On הֲוִיִּי, et num, one need not stumble; הֲוִיִּי, 2 Sam. xv. 35, shows that the connection of a question by means of ו is not inadmissible; Ewald himself takes notice that in the Arab. the connection of the interrogatives هـ and هَلْ with و, and ف is quite common;<sup>1</sup> and thus he reaches the explanation: wilt thou befool then by thy lips, i.e. pollute by deceit, by inconsiderate, wanton testimony against others? This is the right explanation, which Ewald hesitates about only from the fact that the interrog. הֲ comes in between the ו consec. and its perf., a thing which is elsewhere unheard of. But this difficulty is removed by the syntactic observation, that the perf. after interrogatives has often the modal colouring of a conj. or optative, e.g. after the interrog. pronoun, Gen. xxi. 7, quis dixerit, and after the interrogative particle, as here and at 2 Kings xx. 9, iveritne, where it is to be supplied (vid. at Isa. xxxviii. 8). Thus: et num persuaseris (deceperis) labiis tuis, and shouldst thou practise slander with thy lips, for thou bringest thy neighbour, without need, by thy uncalled for rashness, into disrepute? “It is a question, âl'nakar (cf. xxiii. 5), for which هـ (not هَلْ), in the usual Arab. interrogative: how, thou wouldest? one then permits the inquirer to draw the negative answer: “No, I will not do it” (Fleischer).

Ver. 29. The following proverb is connected as to its subject with the foregoing: one ought not to do evil to his neighbour without necessity; even evil which has been done to one must not be requited with evil:

Say not, “As he hath done to me, so I do to him:
I requite the man according to his conduct.”

On the ground of public justice, the talio is certainly the nearest form of punishment, Lev. xxiv. 19 f.; but even here the Sinaitic law does not remain in the retortion of the injury according to its external form (it is in a certain manner practicable only with regard to injury done to the person and to property), but places in its stead an atonement measured and limited after a higher point of view. On pure moral grounds, the jus talionis ("as thou to me, so I to thee") has certainly no validity. Here he to whom injustice is done ought to commit his case to God, xx. 22, and to oppose to evil, not evil but good; he ought not to set himself up as a judge, nor to act as one standing on a war-footing with his neighbour (Judg. xv. 11); but to take God as his example, who treats the sinner, if only he seeks it, not in the way of justice, but of grace (Ex. xxxiv. 6 f.). The expression 29*b* reminds of xxiv. 12. Instead of אָרָם, there is used here, where the speaker points to a definite person, the phrase אִישׁ. Jerome, the Venet., and Luther translate: to each one, as if the word were vocalized thus, אִישׁ (Ps. lxii. 13).

A Mashal ode of the slothful, in the form of a record of experiences, concludes this second supplement (vid. vol. i. p. 17):

- Ver. 30 The field of a slothful man I came past,
 And the vineyard of a man devoid of understanding.
 31 And, lo! it was wholly filled up with thorns;
 Its face was covered with nettles;
 And its wall of stones was broken down.
 32 But I looked and directed my attention to it;
 I saw it, and took instruction from it:
 33 "A little sleep, a little slumber,
 A little folding of the hands to rest.
 34 Then cometh thy poverty apace,
 And thy want as an armed man."

The line 29*b* with אִישׁ is followed by one with אִישׁ. The form of the narrative in which this warning against drowsy slothfulness is clothed, is like Ps. xxxvii. 35 f. The distinguishing of different classes of men by אִישׁ and אָרָם (cf. xxiv. 20) is common in proverbial poetry. עֲבֹרָתִי, at the close of the first parallel member, retains its Pathach unchanged. The description: and, lo! (וְהִנֵּה), with Pazer, after Thorath Emeth, p. 34, Ann. 2) it was . . . refers to the vineyard, for נָרַר אֲבָנָיו

(its stone wall, like Isa. ii. 20, "its idols of silver") is, like Num. xxii. 24, Isa. v. 5, the fencing in of the vineyard. עלה בלו, totus excreverat (in carduos), refers to this as subject, cf. in Ausonius: apex vitibus assurgit; the Heb. construction is as Isa. v. 6, xxxiv. 13; Gesen. § 133, 1, Anm. 2. The sing. קפשונין of קפשונין does not occur; perhaps it means properly the weed which one tears up to cast it aside, for (Arab.) kumâsh is matter dug out of the ground.<sup>1</sup> The ancients interpret it by urticæ; and חריל, plur. חרלים (as from חרל), R. חר, to burn, appears, indeed, to be the name of the nettle; the botanical name (Arab.) khullar (beans, pease, at least a leguminous plant) is from its sound not Arab., and thus lies remote.<sup>2</sup> The Pual קפשונין sounds like Ps. lxxx. 11 (cf. בלי, Ps. lxxii. 20); the position of the words is as this passage of the Psalm; the Syr., Targ., Jerome, and the Venet. render the construction actively, as if the word were קפשו.

In ver. 32, Hitzig proposes to read וְאָחֲזָה: and I stopped (stood still); but אָחַז is trans., not only at Eccles. vii. 9, but also at ii. 15: to hold anything fast; not: to hold oneself still. And for what purpose the change? A contemplating and looking at a thing, with which the turning and standing near is here connected, manifestly includes a standing still; רָאִיתִי, after וְאָחֲזָה, is, as commonly after הָבִיט (e.g. Job xxxv. 5, cf. Isa. xlii. 18), the expression of a lingering looking at an object after the attention has been directed to it. In modern impressions, וְאָחֲזָה אֲנִי are incorrectly accentuated; the old editions have rightly וְאָחֲזָה with Rebîa; for not אֲנִי, but אֲשִׁיחַ are connected. In viii. 17, this prominence of the personal pronoun serves for the expression of reciprocity; elsewhere, as e.g. Gen. xxi. 24, 2 Kings vi. 3, and particularly, frequently in Hosea, this circumstantiality does not make the subject prominent, but the action; here the suitable extension denotes that he rightly makes his comments at leisure (Hitzig). וְשִׁית לִבְּךָ is, as at xxii. 17, the turning of attention and reflection; elsewhere לקח מוסר, to receive a moral, viii. 10, Jer. vii. 28, is here equivalent to, to abstract, deduce one from a fact, to take to oneself a lesson from it. In vers. 33 and 34 there is a repetition of vi. 9, 10. Thus, as ver. 33 expresses, the sluggard speaks to whom the neglected piece of ground belongs, and ver. 34 places before him the result. Instead of בְּמַהֲלָה of the original passage [vi. 9, 10], here מַתְהַלֵּךְ, of the coming of poverty like an avenging Nemesis; and instead of וַיִּמְתְּכֶרֶךְ, here וַיִּמְתְּכֶרֶךְ (the Cod. Jaman. has it without the ו), which might be the plene written pausal form of the sing. (vid. at vi. 3, cf. vi. 11), but is more surely regarded as the plur.: thy deficits, or wants; for to thee at one time this, and at another time that, and finally all things will be wanting. Regarding the variants רָאִישׁ and רִישׁ (with א in the original passage, here in the borrowed passage with ו), vid. at x. 4. בְּאִישׁ מִגֵּן is translated in the LXX. by ὄσπερ ἀγαθὸς δρομεύς (vid. at vi. 11); the Syr. and Targ. make from it אַבְרָא מַבְלָרָא, tabellarius, a letter-carrier, coming with the speed of a courier.

SECOND COLLECTION OF SOLOMONIC PROVERBS.—
XXV.-XXIX.

The older Solomonian Book of Proverbs, with its introduction, i. 9, and its two supplements, (1) xxii. 17-xxiv. 22, (2) xxiv. 23-34, is now followed by a more modern Solomonian Book of Proverbs, a second extensive series of בְּשֵׁלֵי שְׁלֹמֹה, which the collector has introduced with the superscription:

xxv. 1 These also are proverbs of Solomon,

Which the men of Hezekiah the king of Judah have collected.

Hezekiah, in his concern for the preservation of the national literature, is the Jewish Pisistratos, and the "men of Hezekiah" are like the collectors of the poems of Homer, who were employed by Pisistratos for that purpose. בְּשֵׁלֵי שְׁלֹמֹה is the subject, and in Cod. 1294, and in the editions of Bomberg 1515, Hartmann 1595, Nissel, Jablonsky, Michaelis, has Declâ. This title is like that of the second supplement, xxiv. 23. The form of the name הַזְּקִינִי, abbreviated from יְהוֹזְקִינִי (הַזְּקִינִי), is not favourable to the derivation of the title from the collectors themselves. The LXX. translates: Αὐται αἱ παιδεῖαι Σαλωμῶντος αἱ ἀδιάκριτοι (cf. Jas. iii. 17), ἃς ἐξεγράψαντο οἱ φίλοι Ἐζεκίου, for which Aquila has ἃς μετήραν ἄνδρες Ἐζεκίου, Jerome, transtulerunt. קִטְוֵהּ signifies, like (Arab.) nsah, קִטַּף, to snatch away, to take away, to transfer from another place; in later Heb. : to transcribe from one book into another, to translate from one language into another : to take from another place and place together; the Whence? remains undetermined : according to the anachronistic rendering of the Midrash מִגִּנְזֵהָ, i.e. from the Apocrypha; according to Hitzig, from the mouths of the people; more correctly Euchel and others : from their scattered condition, partly oral, partly written. Vid. regarding קִטְוֵהּ, Zunz, in Deutsch - Morgenl. Zeitsch. xxv. 147 f., and regarding the whole title, vol. i. pp. 5, 6; regarding the forms of proverbs in this second collection, vol. i. p. 17; regarding their relation to the first, and their end and aim, vol. i. pp. 25, 26. The first Collection of Proverbs is a Book for Youth, and this second a Book for the People.

Ver. 2. It is characteristic of the purpose of the book that it begins with proverbs of the king :

It is the glory of God to conceal a thing ;
And the glory of the king to search out a matter.

That which is the glory of God and the glory of the king in itself, and that by which they acquire glory, stand here contrasted. The glory of God consists in this, to conceal a matter, i.e. to place before men mystery upon mystery, in which they become conscious of the limitation and insufficiency of their knowledge, so that they are constrained to acknowledge, Deut. xxix. 28, that "secret things belong unto the Lord our God." There are many things that are hidden and are known only to God, and we must be contented with that which He sees it good to make known to us.<sup>1</sup> The honour of kings, on the contrary, who as pilots have to steer the ship of the state (xi. 14), and as supreme judges to administer justice (1 Kings iii. 9), consists in this, to search out a matter, i.e. to place in the light things that are problematical and subjects of controversy, in conformity with their high position, with surpassing intelligence, and, in conformity with their responsibility, with conscientious zeal. The thought that it is the glory of God to veil Himself in secrecy (Isa. lv. 15; cf. 1 Kings viii. 12), and of the king, on the contrary, not to surround himself with an impenetrable nimbus, and to withdraw into inaccessible remoteness,—this thought does not, immediately at least, lie in the proverb, which refers that which is concealed, and its contrary, not to the person, but to a matter. Also that God, by the concealment of certain things, seeks to excite to activity human research, is not said in this proverb; for 2*b* does not speak of the honour of wise men, but of kings; the searching out, 2*b*, thus does not refer to that which is veiled by God. But since the honour of God at the same time as the welfare of men, and the honour of the king as well as the welfare of his people, is to be thought of, the proverb states that God and the king promote human welfare in very different ways,—God, by concealing that which sets limits to the knowledge of man, that he may not be uplifted; and the king, by research, which brings out the true state of the matter, and thereby guards the political and social condition against threatening danger, secret injuries, and the ban of offences unatoned for. This proverb, regarding the difference between that which constitutes the honour of God and of the king, is followed by one which refers to that in which the honour of both is alike.

Ver. 3 The heavens in height, and the earth in depth,
And the heart of kings are unsearchable.

This is a proverb in the priamel-form, vid. p. 13. The praeambulum consists of three subjects to which the predicate אֵין חִקֵר [= no searching out] is common. "As it is impossible to search through the heavens and through the earth, so it is also impossible to search the hearts of common men (like the earth), and the hearts of kings (like the heavens)" (Fleischer). The meaning, however, is simple. Three unsearchable things are placed together: the heavens, with reference to their height, stretching into the impenetrable distance; the earth, in respect to its depth, reaching down into the immeasurable abyss; and the heart of kings—it is this third thing which the proverb particularly aims at—which in themselves, and especially with that which goes on in their depths, are impenetrable and unsearchable. The proverb is a warning against the delusion of being flattered by the favour of the king, which may, before one thinks of it, be withdrawn or changed even into the contrary; and a counsel to one to take heed to his words and acts, and to see to it that he is influenced by higher motives than by the fallacious calculation of the impression on the view and disposition of the king. The  $\text{ל}$  in both cases is the expression of the reference, as e.g. at 2 Chron. ix. 22.  $\text{לְמַלְכֵךְ}$ , not =  $\text{לְמַלְכֵךְ}$ , but like Isa. xxvi. 19, lxv. 17, for  $\text{לְמַלְכֵךְ}$ , which generally occurs only in the st. constr.

There now follows an emblematic (vid. vol. i. p. 10) tetrastich :

- Ver. 4 Take away the dross from silver,
 So there is ready a vessel for the goldsmith ;
 5 Take away the wicked from the king,
 And his throne is established by righteousness.

The form  $\text{הִגֵּן}$  (cf. the inf.  $\text{הִגֵּן}$ , Isa. lix. 13) is regarded by Schultens as showing a ground-form  $\text{הִגֵּן}$ ; but there is also found e.g.  $\text{עָשׂוּ}$ , whose ground-form is  $\text{עָשׂוּ}$ ; the verb  $\text{הִגֵּן}$ , R.  $\text{הִגֵּן}$  (whence Arab. hajr, discedere), cf.  $\text{יָגַה}$  (whence  $\text{הִגֵּן}$ , semovit, 2 Sam. xx. 13 = Syr. âwagy, cf. Arab. âwjay, to withhold, to abstain from), signifies to separate, withdraw; here, of the separation of the  $\text{פְּסִימִים}$ , the refuse, i.e. the dross (vid. regarding the plena scriptio, Baer's krit. Ausg. des Jesaia, under i. 22); the goldsmith is designated by the word  $\text{צֹרֵף}$ , from  $\text{צָרַף}$ , to turn, change, as he who changes the as yet drossy metal by means of smelting, or by purification in water, into that which is pure. In 5a  $\text{הִגֵּן}$  is, as at Isa. xxvii. 8, transferred to a process of moral purification; what kind of persons are to be removed from the neighbourhood of the king is shown by Isa. i. 22, 23. Here also (as at Isa. l.c.) the emblem or figure of ver. 4 is followed in ver. 5 by its moral antitype aimed at. The punctuation of both verses is wonderfully fine and excellent. In ver. 4,  $\text{וַיִּצָּא}$  is not pointed  $\text{וַיִּצָּא}$ , but as the consecutive modus  $\text{וַיִּצָּא}$ ; this first part of the proverb refers to a well-known process of art: the dross is separated from the silver (inf. absol., as xii. 7, xv. 22), and so a vessel (utensil) proceeds from the goldsmith, for he manufactures pure silver; the ל is here similarly used as the designation of the subject in the passive, xiii. 13, xiv. 20. In ver. 5, on the contrary, וַיִּבֹן (וַיִּבֵן) is not the punctuation used, but the word is pointed indicatively וַיִּבֹן; this second part of the proverb expresses a moral demand (inf. absol. in the sense of the imperative, Gesen. § 131, 4b like xvii. 12, or an optative or concessive conjunction): let the godless be removed, לִפְנֵי מַלְךְ, i.e. not from the neighbourhood of the king, for which the words are מִלִּפְנֵי מַלְךְ; also not those standing before the king, i.e. in his closest neighbourhood (Ewald, Bertheau); but since, in the absolute, הִנֵּה, not an act of another in the interest of the king, but of the king himself, is thought of: let the godless be removed from before the king, i.e. because he administers justice (Hitzig), or more generally: because after that Psalm (ci.), which is the "mirror of princes," he does not suffer him to come into his presence. Accordingly, the punctuation is בְּצַדִּיק, not בְּצַדִּיק (xvi. 12); because such righteousness is meant as separates the רָשָׁע from it and itself from him, as Isa. xvi. 5 (vid. Hitzig), where the punctuation of בְּהִסָּר denotes that favour towards Moab seeking protection. There now follows a second proverb with מַלְךְ, as the one just explained was a second with מַלְכִים: a warning against arrogance before kings and nobles.

Ver. 6 Display not thyself before the king,

And approach not to the place of the great.

7 For better that one say to thee, "Come up hither,"

Than that they humble thee before a prince,

Whom thine eyes had seen.

The גְּדֹלִים are those, like xviii. 16, who by virtue of their descent and their office occupy a lofty place of honour in the court and in the state. גְּדֹלִים (vid. under viii. 16) is the noble in disposition and the nobleman by birth, a general designation which comprehends the king and the princes. The Hithpa. הִתְהַדָּר is like the reflex forms xii. 9, xiii. 7, for it signifies to conduct oneself as הִדָּר or הִתְהַדָּר (vid. xx. 29), to play the part of one highly distinguished. עָמַר has, 6b, its nearest signification: it denotes, not like נָצַב, standing still, but approaching to, e.g. Jer. vii. 2. The reason given in ver. 7 harmonizes with the rule of wisdom, Luke xiv. 10 f.: better is the saying to thee, i.e. that one say to thee (Ewald, § 304b), עֲלֵה־הֵנָּה (so the Olewejored is to be placed), προσανάβηθι ἀνώτερον (thus in Luke), than that one humble thee לִפְנֵי נָרִיב, not : because of a prince (Hitzig), for לִפְנֵי nowhere means either pro (xvii. 18) or propter, but before a prince, so that thou must yield to him (cf. xiv. 19), before him whom thine eyes had seen, so that thou art not excused if thou takest up the place appropriate to him. Most interpreters are at a loss to explain this relative. Luther : "which thine eyes must see," and Schultens : ut videant oculi tui. Michaelis, syntactically admissible : quem videre gestiverunt oculi tui, viz. to come near to him, according to Bertheau, with the request that he receives some high office. Otherwise Fleischer : before the king by whom thou and thine are seen, so much the more felt is the humiliation when it comes upon one after he has pressed so far forward that he can be perceived by the king. But נָרִיב is not specially the king, but any distinguished personage whose place he who has pressed forward has taken up, and from which he must now withdraw when the right possessor of it comes and lays claim to his place. אֲשֶׁר is never used in poetry without emphasis. Elsewhere it is equivalent to ὄντινα, quippe quem, here equivalent to ὄνπερ, quem quidem. Thine eyes have seen him in the company, and thou canst say to thyself, this place belongs to him, according to his rank, and not to thee,—the humiliation which thou endurest is thus well deserved, because, with eyes to see, thou wert so blind. The LXX., Syr., Symmachus (who reads δα, לָרִיב, εἰς πλῆθος), and Jerome, refer the words "whom thine eyes had seen" to the proverb following; but אֲשֶׁר does not appropriately belong to the beginning of a proverb, and on the supposition that the word לָרִיב is generally adopted, except by Symmachus, they are also heterogeneous to the following proverb :

- Ver. 8 Go not forth hastily to strife,
That it may not be said, "What wilt thou do in the end thereof,
When now thy neighbour bringeth disgrace upon thee?"
9 Art thou striving with thy neighbour? strive with him,
But disclose not the secret of another;
10 That he who heareth it may not despise thee,
And thine evil name depart no more.

Whether רִיב in לָרִיב is infin., as at Judg. xxi. 22, or subst., as at 2 Chron. xix. 8, is not decided: ad litigandum and ad litem harmonize. As little may it be said whether in אֶל-תֵּצֵא [go not forth], a going out to the gate (court of justice), or to the place where he is to be met who is to be called to account, is to be thought of; in no respect is the sense metaphorical: let not thyself transgress the bounds of moderation, ne te laisse pas emporter; יֵצֵא לָרֹב is correlate to בּוֹא לָרֹב, Judg. xxi. 22. The use of פֶּן in 8b is unprecedented. Euchel and Löwenstein regard it as an imper.: reflect upon it (test it); but פֶּן־נָה does not signify this, and the interjectional הִם does not show the possibility of an imper. Kal פֶּן, and certainly not פֶּן (פֶּן). The conj. פֶּן is the connecting form of an original subst. (= panj), which signifies a turning away. It is mostly connected with the future, according to which Nolde, Oetinger, Ewald, and Bertheau explain מה indefinite, something, viz. unbecoming. In itself, it may, perhaps, be possible that פֶּן־מָה was used in the sense of ne quid (Venet. μήποτε τι); but “to do something,” for “to commit something bad,” is improbable; also in that case we would expect the words to be thus: פֶּן־תַּעֲשֶׂה מָה. Thus מָה will be an interrogative, as at 1 Sam. xx. 10 (vid. Keil), and the expression is brachylogical: that thou comest not into the situation not to know what thou oughtest to do (Rasbi: פֶּן חָבַא לִי־דִי לֹא תִרְעַע (מה לעשות), or much rather anakoluth.; for instead of saying פֶּן־לֹא תִרְעַע מֵה־לַּעֲשׂוֹת, the poet, shunning this unusual לֹא, adopts at once the interrogative form: that it may not be said at the end thereof (viz. of the strife): what wilt thou do? (Umbreit, Stier, Elster, Hitzig, and Zöckler.) This extreme perplexity would occur if thy neighbour (with whom thou disputest so eagerly and unjustly) put thee to shame, so that thou standest confounded (בלם, properly to hurt, French blesser). If now the summons 9a follows this warning against going out for the purpose of strife: fight out thy conflict with thy neighbour, then רִיבֶךָ, set forth with emphasis, denotes not such a strife as one is surprised into, but that into which one is drawn, and the tuam in causam tuam is accented in so far as 9b localizes the strife to the personal relation of the two, and warns against the drawing in of an אֲחֵר, i.e. in this case, of a third person: and expose not the secret of another אֶל-תִּגְלֶה (after Michlol 130a, and Ben-Bileam, who places the word under the פֶּתַח־בַּסִּפֵּר, is vocalized with Pathach on ג, as is Cod. 1294, and elsewhere in correct texts). One ought not to bring forward in a dispute, as material of proof and means of acquittal, secrets entrusted to him by another, or secrets which one knows regarding the position and conduct of another; for such faithlessness and gossiping affix a stigma on him who avails himself of them, in the public estimation, ver. 10; that he who hears it may not blame thee (חַפֵּר = Aram. חַפֵּר, vid. under xiv. 34), and the evil report concerning thee continue without recall. Fleischer: ne infamia tua non recedat i. e. nunquam desinat per ora hominum propagari, with the remark, “in רִבְיָה, which properly means a stealthy creeping on of the rumour, and in שׁוֹב lies a (Arab.) tarshyh,” i.e. the two ideas stand in an interchangeable relation with a play upon the words: the evil rumour, once put in circulation, will not again retrace its steps; but, on the contrary, as Virgil says:

In fact, every other can sooner rehabilitate himself in the public estimation than he who is regarded as a prattler, who can keep no secret, or as one so devoid of character that he makes public what he ought to keep silent, if he can make any use of it in his own interest. In regard to such an one, the words are continually applicable, hic niger est, hunc tu, Romane, caveto, xx. 19. The LXX. has, instead of וּרְבַתְךָ 10*b*, read וּמְרִיבֶתְךָ, and translated it with the addition of a long appendix: “They quarrel, and hostilities will not cease, but will be to thee like death. Kindness and friendship deliver, let these preserve thee, that thou mayest not become one meriting reproaches (Jerome: ne exprobrabilis fias), but guard thy ways, εὐσυναλλάκτως.”

The first emblematical distich of this collection now follows:

Ver. 11 Golden apples in silver salvers.

A word spoken according to its circumstances.

The Syr. and Jerome vocalize רִבְיָה דְבָר, and the Targ. דְבָר דְבָר; both are admissible, but the figure and that which is represented are not placed in so appropriate a relation as by דְבָר דְבָר דְבָר; the wonderfully penetrating expression of the text, which is rendered by the traditional nikkud, agrees here with the often occurring דְבָר (= מְדַבֵּר), also its passive דְבִינֵי. The defective writing is like, e.g., בָּטָח, Ps. cxii. 7, and gives no authority to prefer דָּבָר = דְּבָרָה (Böttcher). That דְּבָרָה, corresponding to the plur. תְּפִלָּה, is not used, arises from this, that דָּבָר is here manifestly not a word without connection, but a sentence of motive, contents, and aim united. For עַל-אֲנִי, the meaning of אֲנִי presents itself from xv. 23, according to which, among the old interpreters, Symmachus, Jerome, and Luther render “at its time.” Abulwalîd compared the Arab. âiffan (âibban, also 'iffan, whence 'aly 'iffanîhî, justo tempore), which, as Orelli has shown in his Synon. der Zeitbegriffe, p. 21 f., comes from the roots af ab, to drive (from within) going out, time as consisting of individual moments, the one of which drives on the other, and thus denotes time as a course of succession. One may not hesitate as to the prep. עַל, for אֲנִי would, like עֲתוֹת, denote the circumstances, the relations of the time, and לְעַל would, as e.g. in אֲנִי-עַל and אֲנִי-עַל-דְּבָרָה, have the meaning of κατά. But the form אֲנִי, which like אֲנִי, Lev. xvi. 12, sounds dualistic, appears to oppose this. Hitzig supposes that אֲנִי may designate the time as a circle, with reference to the two arches projecting in opposite directions, but uniting themselves together; but the circle which time describes runs out from one point, and, moreover, the Arab. names for time âfaf, âîfaf, and the like, which interchange with âiffan, show that this does not proceed from the idea of circular motion. Ewald and others take for אֲנִי the meaning of wheels (the Venet., after Kimchi, ἐπὶ τῶν τροχῶν αὐτῆς), whereby the form is to be interpreted as dual of אֲנִי = אֲנִי, “a word driven on its wheels,”—so Ewald explains: as the potter quickly and neatly forms a vessel on his wheels, thus a fit and quickly framed word. But דָּבָר signifies to drive cattle and to speak = to cause words to follow one another (cf. Arab. syâk, pressing on = flow of words), but not to drive = to fashion in that artisan sense. Otherwise Böttcher, “a word fitly spoken, a pair of wheels perfect in their motion,” to which he compares the common people “in their jesting,” and adduces all kinds of heterogeneous things partly already rejected by Orelli (e.g. the Homeric ἐπιτροχάδην, which is certainly no commendation). But “jesting” is not appropriate here; for what man conceives of human speech as a carriage, one only sometimes compares that of a babbler to a sledge, or says of him that he shoves the cart into the mud.<sup>1</sup> Is it then thus decided that פְּנִים is a dual? It may be also like פְּנֵי, the plur. especially in the adverbial expression before us, which readily carried the abbreviation with it (vid. Gesen. Lehrgebr. § 134, Anm. 17). On this supposition, Orelli interprets פְּנֵי from פָּנָה, to turn, in the sense of turning about, circumstances, and reminds of this, that in the post.-bibl. Heb. this word is used as indefinitely as τρόπος, e.g. באופן מה, quodammodo (vid. Reland's Analecta Rabbinica, 1723, p. 126). This late Talm. usage of the word can, indeed, signify nothing as to the bibl. word; but that פְּנֵי, abbreviated פְּנִים, can mean circumstances, is warranted by the synonym אֲזוּרוֹת. Aquila and Theodotion appear to have thus understood it, for their ἐπὶ ἀρμόζουσιν αὐτῶ, which they substitute for the colourless οὕτως of the LXX., signifies: under the circumstances, in accordance therewith. So Orelli thus rightly defines: “אֲזוּרוֹת denote the âhwâl, circumstances and conditions, as they form themselves in each turning of time, and those which are ascribed to דָּבָר by the suffix are those to which it is proper, and to which it fits in. Consequently a word is commended which is spoken whenever the precise time arrives to which it is adapted, a word which is thus spoken at its time as well as at its place (van Dyk, fay mahllah), and the grace of which is thereby heightened.” Aben Ezra's explanation, על פְּנֵי, in the approved way, follows the opinion of Abulwalîd and Parchon, that אֲזוּרוֹת is equivalent to פְּנֵי (cf. aly wajhihi, sua ratione), which is only so far true, that both words are derived from R. פָּנָה, to turn. In the figure, it is questionable whether by תְּפִיחֵי זָהָב, apples of gold, or gold-coloured apples, are meant (Luther: as pomegranates and citrons); thus oranges are meant, as at Zech. iv. 12. הַזָּהָב denotes golden oil. Since בַּסָּף, besides, signifies a metallic substance, one appears to be under the necessity of thinking of apples of gold; cf. the brazen pomegranates. But (1) apples of gold of natural size and massiveness are obviously too great to make it probable that such artistic productions are meant; (2) the material of the emblem is usually not of less value than that of which it is the emblem (Fleischer); (3) the Scriptures are fond of comparing words with flowers and fruits, x. 31, xii. 14, xiii. 2, xviii. 20, and to the essence of the word which is rooted in the spirit, and buds and grows up to maturity through the mouth and the lips, the comparison with natural fruits corresponds better in any case than with artificial. Thus, then, we interpret "golden apples" as the poetic name for oranges, aurea mala, the Indian name of which with reference to or (gold) was changed into the French name orange, as our pomeranze is equivalent to pomum aurantium. מִשְׁבִּיחַ is the plur. of מִשְׁבִּיחַ, already explained, xviii. 11; the word is connected neither with שָׁבַע, to twist, wreath (Ewald, with most Jewish interpreters<sup>1</sup>), nor with שָׁבַע, to pierce, infigere (Redslob, vid. under Ps. lxxiii. 7); it signifies medal or ornament, from שָׁבַע, to behold (cf. שָׁבַע, θέα = θέαμα, Isa. ii. 6), here a vessel which is a delight to the eyes. In general the Venet. rightly, ἐν μορφώμασιν ἀργύρου; Symmachus and Theodotion, more in accordance with the fundamental idea, ἐν περιβλέπτοις ἀργύρου; the Syr. and Targ. specially: in vessels of embossed work (בְּנִיחֵי, from נָחַ, to draw, to extend); yet more specially the LXX., ἐν ὀρμίσκῳ σαρδίου, on a chain of cornelian stone, for which, perhaps, ἐν φορμίσκῳ (Jäger) ἀργυρίου, in a little silver basket, is the original phrase. Aquila, after Bereschith rabba c. 93, translates by μῆλα χρύσου ἐν δίσκοις ἀργυρίου. Jerome: in lectis argenteis, appears to have fallen into the error of taking מִשְׁבַּח for מִשְׁבַּח, lectus. Hitzig here emends a self-made ἄπαξ λεγ. Luther's "golden apples in silver baskets" is to be preferred.<sup>2</sup> A piece of sculpture which represents fruit by golden little disks or points within groups of leaves is not meant,—for the proverb does not speak of such pretty little apples,—but golden oranges are meant. A word in accordance with the circumstances which occasion it, is like golden oranges which are handed round in silver salvers or on silver waiters. Such a word is, as adopting another figure we might say, like a well-executed picture, and the situation into which it appropriately fits is like its elegant frame. The comparison with fruit is, however, more significant; it designates the right word as a delightful gift, in a way which heightens its impression and its influences.

Ver. 12. Another proverb continues the commendation of the effective word; for it represents, in emblem, the interchangeable relation of speaker and hearer :

A golden earring and an ornament of fine gold—
A wise preacher to an ear that heareth ;

i.e., as the former two ornaments form a beautiful ensemble, so the latter two, the wise preacher of morality and an attentive ear, form a harmonious whole : על, down upon, is explained by Deut. xxxii. 2. נָזַן, at xi. 12, standing along with באף, meant a ring for the nose; but here, as elsewhere, it means an earring (LXX., Jerome, Venet.), translated by the Syr. and Targ. by קְרָשָׁא, because it serves as a talisman. A ring for the nose<sup>1</sup> cannot also be here thought of, because this ornament is an emblem of the attentive ear: willingly accepted chastisement or instruction is an ear-ornament to him who hears (Stier). But the gift of the wise preacher, which consists in rightly dividing the word of truth, 2 Tim. ii. 15, is as an ornament for the neck or the breast קְלִי (= Arab. khaly, fem. קְלִיָּה = hilyt), of fine gold (בְּתָם, jewel, then particularly precious gold, from בְּתָם, Arab. katam, recondere).<sup>2</sup> The Venet. well: κόσμος ἀπυρο-χρῦσον (fine gold); on the contrary (perhaps in want of another name for gold), כהם is translated, by the LXX. and Syr., by sardine; by the Targ., by emerald; and by Jerome, by margaritum.<sup>1</sup> It looks well when two stand together, the one of whom has golden earrings, and the other wears a yet more precious golden necklace—such a beautiful mutual relationship is formed by a wise speaker and a hearer who listens to his admonitions.

<sup>2</sup> Hitzig compares Arab. kumêt; but this means bayard, as Lagarde remarks, the Greek κόμαιθος; and if by בְּתָם gold foxes (gold money) are to be thought of, yet they have nothing whatever to do with bayards (red-brown horses); cf. Boehmer, de colorum nominibus equinorum, in his Roman. Stud. Heft 2, 1872, p. 285.

Ver. 13. The following comparative tristich refers to faithful service rendered by words:

Like the coolness of snow on a harvest day
Is a faithful messenger to them that send him:
He refresheth the soul of his master.

The coolness (יָנִיף from יָנַף, יָנַף, to be cool) of snow is not that of a fall of snow, which in the time of harvest would be a calamity, but of drink cooled with snow, which was brought from Lebanon or elsewhere, from the clefts of the rocks; the peasants of Damascus store up the winter's snow in a cleft of the mountains, and convey it in the warm months to Damascus and the coast towns. Such a refreshment is a faithful messenger (vid. regarding יָרִי, xiii. 17, here following יָרִי as a kind of echo) to them that send him (vid. regarding this plur. at x. 26, cf. xxii. 21); he refreshes, namely (i) explicativum, as e.g. Ezek. xviii. 19, etenim filius, like the i et quidem, Mal. i. 11, different from the i of conditional clause xxiii. 3), the soul of his master; for the answer which he brings to his master refreshes him, as does a drink of snow-cooled water on a hot harvest day.

Ver. 14. This proverb relates to the word which promises much, but remains unaccomplished:

Clouds and wind, and yet no rain—
A man who boasteth with a false gift.

Incorrectly the LXX. and Targ. refer the predicate contained in the concluding word of the first line to all the three subjects; and equally incorrectly Hitzig, with Heidenheim, interprets מַתַּת שְׁקָר, of a gift that has been received of which one boasts, although it is in reality of no value, because by a lying promise a gift is not at all obtained. But as לחם כזבים, xxiii. 3, is bread which, as it were, deceives him who eats it, so מתת שקר is a gift which amounts to a lie, i.e. a deceitful pretence. Rightly Jerome: vir gloriosus et promissa non complens. In the Arab. salid, which Fleischer compares, the figure 14*a* and its counterpart 14*b* are amalgamated, for this word signifies both a boaster and a cloud, which is, as it were, boastful, which thunders much, but rains only sparsely or not at all. Similar is the Arab. khullab, clouds which send forth lightning, and which thunder, but yet give no rain; we say to one, magno promissor hiatu: thou art (Arab.) kabarakn khullabin, i.e. as Lane translates it: "Thou art only like lightning with which is no rain." Schultens refers to this proverbial Arabic, fulmen nubis infecundæ. Liberality is called (Arab.) nadnay, as a watering, cf. xi. 25. The proverb belongs to this circle of figures. It is a saying of the German peasants, "Wenn es sich wolket, so will es regnen" [when it is cloudy, then there will be rain]; but according to another saying, "nicht alle Wolken regnen" [it is not every cloud that yields rain]. "There are clouds and wind without rain."

Three proverbs follow, which have this in common, that they exhort to moderation:

Ver. 15 By forbearance is a judge won over,
And a gentle tongue breaketh the bone.

יָרַךְ (vid. vi. 7) does not denote any kind of distinguished person, but a judge or a person occupying a high official position. And פָּתַח does not here mean, to talk over or delude; but, like Jer. xx. 7, to persuade, to win over, to make favourable to one; for אִישׁ אֵינִי (vid. xiv. 29) is dispassionate calmness, not breaking out into wrath, which finally makes it manifest that he who has become the object of accusation, suspicion, or of disgrace, is one who nevertheless has right on his side; for indecent, boisterous passion injures even a just cause; while, on the contrary, a quiet, composed, thoughtful behaviour, which is not embarrassed by injustice, either experienced or threatened, in the end secures a decision in our favour. "Patience overcomes" is an old saying. The soft, gentle tongue (cf. אָרַךְ, xv. 1) is the opposite of a passionate, sharp, coarse one, which only the more increases the resistance which it seeks to overcome. "Patience," says a German proverb, "breaks iron;" another says, "Patience is stronger than a diamond." So here: a gentle tongue breaketh the bone (נֶרְךָ = עֲצָעָה, as at xvii. 22), it softens and breaks to pieces that which is hardest. Sudden anger makes the evil still worse; long-suffering, on the contrary, operates convincingly; cutting, immoderate language, embitters and drives away; gentle words, on the contrary, persuade, if not immediately, yet by this, that they remain as it were unchangeable.

Ver. 16. Another way of showing self-control:

Hast thou found honey? eat thy enough,
Lest thou be surfeited with it, and vomit it up.

Honey is pleasant, salutary, and thus to be eaten sparingly, xxiv. 13, but ne quid nimis. Too much is unwholesome, 27a: αὐτοῦ καὶ μέλιτος τὸ πλεόν ἐστὶ χολή, i.e. even honey enjoyed immoderately is as bitter as gall; or, as Freidank says: des honges süeze erdriuzet só mans ze viel geniuzet [the sweetness of honey offends when one partakes too much of it]. Eat if thou hast found any in the forest or the mountains, כֹּפֶר, thy enough (LXX. τὸ ἱκανόν; the Venet. τὸ ἀρκούν σοι), i.e. as much as appeases thine appetite, that thou mayest not become surfeited and vomit it out (וּמִתְקַדְדִּי with Tsere, and נִקְוֶה, as at 2 Sam. xiv. 10; vid. Michlol 116a, and Parchon under כֹּפֶר). Fleischer, Ewald, Hitzig, and others, place vers. 16 and 17 together, so as to form an emblematic tetrastich; but he who is surfeited is certainly, in ver. 16, he who willingly enjoys, and in 17, he to whom it is given to enjoy without his will; and is not, then, ver. 16 a sentence complete in itself in meaning? That it is not to be understood in a purely dietetic sense (although thus interpreted it is a rule not to be despised), is self-evident. As one can suffer injury from the noblest of food if he overload his stomach therewith, so in the sphere of science, instruction, edification, there is an injurious overloading of the mind; we ought to measure what we receive by our spiritual want, the right distribution of enjoyment and labour, and the degree of our ability to change it in succum et sanguinem,—else it at last awakens in us dislike, and becomes an evil to us.

Ver. 17. This proverb is of a kindred character to the foregoing. "If thy comrade eats honey," says an Arabic proverb quoted by Hitzig, "do not lick it all up." But the emblem of honey is not continued in this verse :

Make rare thy foot in thy neighbour's house,
Lest he be satiated with thee, and hate thee.

To make one's foot rare or dear from a neighbour's house is equivalent to: to enter it seldom, and not too frequently; הוֹקֵר includes in itself the idea of keeping at a distance (Targ. הִוָּקֵר; פָּלַח הַרְגֵּלָה; Symmachus, ὑπόστειλον; and another: φίμωσον πόδα σου), and הוֹקֵר has the sense of the Arab. 'an, and is not the comparative, as at Isa. xiii. 12: regard thy visit dearer than the house of a neighbour (Heidenheim). The proverb also is significant as to the relation of friend to friend, whose reciprocal love may be turned into hatred by too much intercourse and too great fondness. But הוֹקֵר is including a friend, any one with whom we stand in any kind of intercourse. "Let him who seeks to be of esteem," says a German proverb, "come seldom;" and that may be said with reference to him whom his heart draws to another, and also to him who would be of use to another by drawing him out of the false way and guiding on the right path,—a showing of esteem, a confirming of love by visiting, should not degenerate into forwardness which appears as burdensome servility, as indiscreet self-enjoyment; nor into a restless impetuosity, which seeks at once to gain by force that which one should allow gradually to ripen.

Vers. 18–22. This group of proverbs has the word רָע in each of them, connecting them together. The first of the group represents a false tongue :

Ver. 18 A hammer, and a sword, and a sharp arrow—

A man that beareth false witness against his neighbour.

An emblematic, or, as we might also say, an iconological proverb; for 18a is a quodlibet of instruments of murder, and 18b is the subscription under it: that which these weapons of murder accomplish, is done to his neighbour by a man who bears false witness against him—he ruins his estate, takes away his honour, but yet more: he murders him, at one time more grossly, at another time with more refinement; at one time slowly, at another time more quickly. מַרְפֵּיץ, from מַרֵץ, is equivalent to מַפִּיָּן, and מַפִּיָּן from נַפִּיָּן; the Syr. and Targ. have instead פְּרִיעָא (פְּרִיעָא) from פְּרִיעָא = פְּרִיעָא; the word פְּרִיעָא, on which Hitzig builds a conjecture, is an error of transcription (vid. Lagarde and Levy). The expression, 18*b*, is from the decalogue, Ex. xx. 16; Deut. v. 17. It is for the most part translated the same here as there: he who speaks against his neighbour as a false witness. But rightly the LXX., Jerome, the Venet., and Luther: false testimony. As אֱלֹהִים signifies both that which is mighty = power, and Him who is mighty = God, so עֵר signifies both him who bears testimony and the testimony that is borne, properly that which repeats itself and thereby strengthens itself; accordingly we say עֵר עָנָה, to give testimony in reply,—viz. to the judge who asks,—or generally to offer testimony (even unasked); as well as עָנָה לְעֵר, Deut. xxxi. 21, i.e. as evidence (Jerome, pro testimonio). The prep. כִּי with this עָנָה has always the meaning of contra, also at 1 Sam. xii. 3; Gen. xxx. 33 is, however, open to question.

Ver. 19 A worthless tooth and an unsteady foot—

Trust in a faithless man in the day of need.

The form רָעָה (with Mercha on the antepenult), Isa. xxix. 19, takes the place of an inf. absol.; רָעָה here (about the tone syllable of which Dechî does not decide, thus without doubt Milra) is certainly not a subst.: tooth of breaking (Gesén.); for how strange such a designation of a worthless tooth! רָעָה is indeed mas. in 1 Sam. xiv. 5, but it can also be used as fem., as רָעָה, which is for the most part fem., also occurs as mas., Böttch. § 650. Böttcher, in the new Aehrenlese, and in the Lehrbuch, takes רָעָה as fem. of an adj. רָעָה, after the form הָלָה; but הָלָה is not an adj., and does not form a fem., although it means not merely profanity, but that which is profane; this is true also of the Aram. הָלָה; for הָלָה, Esth. ii. 9, Targ., is a female name mistaken by Buxtorf. Are we then to read רָעָה, with Hitzig, after the LXX.?—an unimportant change. We interpret the traditional רָעָה, with Fleischer, as derived from רָעָה, from רָעָה, breaking to pieces (crumbling), in an intransitive sense. The form מְרָעָה is also difficult. Böttcher regards it as also, e.g. Aben Ezra after the example of Gecatilia as part. Kal. = מְרָעָה, “only on account of the pausal tone and the combination of the two letters מע with û instead of ô.” But this vocal change, with its reasons, is merely imaginary. מוֹעֲדָה is the part. Pual, with the preformative ה struck out, Ewald 169d. The objection that the part. Pual should be מְמַעֵר, after the form מְבַעֵר, does not prove anything to the contrary; for מוֹעֲדָה cannot be the fem. so as not to coincide with the fem. of the part. Kal., cf. besides to the long û the form without the Dagesh וּמְעִיָּה, Eccles. ix. 12 = מְעִיָּה (Arnheim, Gramm. p. 139). רֵגֶל מוֹעֲדָה is a leg that has become tottering, trembling. He who in a time of need makes a faithless man his ground of confidence, is like one who seeks to bite with a broken tooth, and which he finally crushes, and one who supports himself on a shaking leg, and thus stumbles and falls. The gen. connection מִבְּטָח בּוֹגֵר signifies either the ground of confidence consisting in a faithless man, or the confidence placed in one who is faithless. But, after the Masora, we are to read here, as at Ps. lxxv. 6, מִבְּטָח, which Michlol 184a also confirms, and as it is also found in the Venice 1525, Basel 1619, and in Norzi. This מִבְּטָח is constr. according to Kimchi, notwithstanding the Kametz; as also מְשַׁקֵּל, Ezra viii. 30 (after Abulwalid, Kimchi, and Norzi). In this passage before us, מִבְּטָח בּוֹגֵר may signify a deceitful ground of confidence (cf. Hab. ii. 5), but the two other passages present a genit. connection of the words. We must thus suppose that the ך of מִבְּטָח and מְשַׁקֵּל, in these three passages, is regarded as fixed, like the â of the form (Arab.) mif'âl.

The above proverb, which connects itself with ver. 18, not only by the sound רע, but also by שן, which is assonant with שנון, is followed by another with the catchword רע:

Ver. 20 He that layeth aside his coat on a day of frost, vinegar on nitre,

And he who welcomes with songs a dejected heart.

Is not this intelligible, sensible, ingenious? All these three things are wrong. The first is as wrong as the second, and the third, which the proverb has in view, is morally wrong, for one ought to weep with those that weep, Rom. xii. 15; he, on the contrary, who laughs among those who weep, is, on the most favourable judgment, a fool. That which is wrong in 20a, according to Böttcher in the Aehrenlese, 1849, consists in this, that one in severe cold puts on a fine garment. As if there were not garments which are at the same time beautiful, and keep warm! In the new Aehrenlese he prefers the reading מִשְׁנָה: if one changes his coat. But that surely he might well enough do, if the one were warmer than the other! Is it then impossible that מְעֵרָה, in the connection, means transire faciens = removens? The Kal עָרָה, transiit, occurs at Job xxviii. 8. So also, in the poetic style, הַעֲרָה might be used in the sense of the Aram. אַעֲרִי. Rightly Aquila, Symmachus, περιαιρῶν; the Venet. better, ἀφαιρούμενος (Mid.). בִּגְדֵי is an overcoat or mantle, so called from covering, as לְבַשׁ (R. לָב, to fasten, fix), the garment lying next the body, vid. at Ps. xxii. 19. Thus, as it is foolish to lay off upper clothing on a frosty day, so it is foolish also to pour vinegar on nitre; carbonic acid nitre, whether it be mineral (which may be here thought of) or vegetable, is dissolved in water, and serves diverse purposes (vid. under Isa. i. 25); but if one pours vinegar on it, it is destroyed. עַל-לֵב-רָע<sup>1</sup> is, at xxvi. 23 and elsewhere, a heart morally bad, here a heart badly disposed, one inclined to that which is evil; for שִׂי is the contrast of קִינָה קִינָה, and always the consequence of a disposition joyfully excited; the inconsistency lies in this, that one thinks to cheer a sorrowful heart by merry singing, if the singing has an object, and is not much more the reckless expression of an animated pleasure in view of the sad condition of another. עַל שִׂיר signifies, as at Job xxxiii. 27, to sing to any one, to address him in singing; cf. רָבַר עַל, Jer. vi. 10, and particularly עַל-לֵב, Hos. ii. 16; Isa. xl. 2. The ב of בְּשִׂירִים is neither the partitive, ix. 5, nor the transitive, xx. 30, but the instrumental; for, as e.g. at Ex. vii. 20, the obj. of the action is thought of as its means (Gesen. § 138, Anm. 3*); one sings “with songs,” for definite songs underlie his singing. The LXX., which the Syr., Targ., and Jerome more or less follow, has formed from this proverb one quite different: “As vinegar is hurtful to a wound, so an injury to the body makes the heart sorrowful; as the moth in clothes, and the worm in wood, so the sorrow of a man injures his heart.” The wisdom of this pair of proverbs is not worth much, and after all inquiry little or nothing comes of it. The Targ. at least preserves the figure 20*b*: as he who pours vinegar (Syr. chalo) on nitre; the Peshito, however, and here and there also the Targum, has jathro (arrow-string) instead of nethro (nitre). Hitzig adopts this, and changes the tristich into the distich:

He that meeteth archers with arrow on the string,
Is like him who singeth songs with a sad heart.

The Hebrew of this proverb of Hitzig's (מְרִים קָרָה עַל־יָתֶר) is unhebraic, the meaning dark as an oracle, and its moral contents nil.

Ver. 21 If thine enemy hunger, feed him with bread;
And if he thirst, give him water to drink.

Ver. 22 For thereby thou heapest burning coals on his head,
And Jahve will recompense it to thee.

The translation of this proverb by the LXX. is without fault; Paul cites therefrom Rom. xii. 20. The participial construction of 22*a*, the LXX., rightly estimating it, thus renders: for, doing this, thou shalt heap coals on his head. The expression, "thou shalt heap" (σωρεύσεις), is also appropriate; for קָרָה certainly means first only to fetch or bring fire (vid. vi. 27); but here, by virtue of the constructio prægnans with על, to fetch, and hence to heap up,—to pile upon. Burning pain, as commonly observed, is the figure of burning shame, on account of undeserved kindness shown by an enemy (Fleischer). But how burning coals heaped on the head can denote burning shame, is not to be perceived, for the latter is a burning on the cheeks; wherefore Hitzig and Rosenmüller explain: thou wilt thus bring on him the greatest pain, and appease thy vengeance, while at the same time Jahve will reward thy generosity. Now we say, indeed, that he who rewards evil with good takes the noblest revenge; but if this doing of good proceed from a revengeful aim, and is intended sensibly to humble an adversary, then it loses all its moral worth, and is changed into selfish, malicious wickedness. Must the proverb then be understood in this ignoble sense? The Scriptures elsewhere say that guilt and punishment are laid on the head of any one when he is made to experience and to bear them. Chrysostom and others therefore explain after Ps. cxl. 10 and similar passages, but thereby the proverb is morally falsified, and ver. 22 accords with ver. 21, which counsels not to the avenging of oneself, but to the requital of evil with good. The burning of coals laid on the head must be a painful but wholesome consequence; it is a figure of self-accusing repentance (Augustine, Zöckler), for the producing of which the showing of good to an enemy is a noble motive. That God rewards such magnanimity may not be the special motive; but this view might contribute to it, for otherwise such promises of God as Isa. lviii. 8-12 were without moral right. The proverb also requires one to show himself gentle and liberal toward a needy enemy, and present a twofold reason for this: first, that thereby his injustice is brought home to his conscience; and, secondly, that thus God is well-pleased in such practical love toward an enemy, and will reward it;—by such conduct, apart from the performance of a law grounded in our moral nature, one advances the happiness of his neighbour and his own.

The next group of proverbs extends from ver. 23 to ver. 28.

Ver. 23 Wind from the north produceth rain;
And a secret tongue a troubled countenance.

The north is called  $\text{רָפָד}$ , from  $\text{רָפַד}$ , to conceal, from the firmament darkening itself for a longer time, and more easily, like the old Persian apâkhtara, as (so it appears) the starless, and, like aquilo, the north wind, as bringing forward the black clouds. But properly the “fathers of rain” are, in Syria, the west and the south-west; and so little can  $\text{רָפָד}$  here mean the pure north wind, that Jerome, who knew from his own experience the changes of weather in Palestine, helps himself, after Symmachus (διαλύει βροχήν), with a quid pro quo out of the difficulty: ventus aquilo dissipat pluvias; the Jewish interpreters (Aben Ezra, Joseph Kimchi, and Meiri) also thus explain, for they connect together  $\text{לְרוּחַ$ , in the meaning  $\text{מַנְהוּ$ , with the unintelligible  $\text{הַלֵּיל}$  (far be it!). But  $\text{רָפָד}$  may also, perhaps like ζόφος (Deutsch. Morgenl. Zeitsch. xxi. 600 f.), standing not without connection therewith, denote the north-west; and probably the proverb emphasized the northern direction of the compass, because, according to the intention of the similitude, he seeks to designate such rain as is associated with raw, icy-cold weather, as the north wind (xxvii. 16, LXX., Sir. xliiii. 20) brings along with it. The names of the winds are gen. fem., e.g. Isa. xliiii. 6.  $\text{לְרוּחַ}$  (Aquila, ὠδίσει;

cf. viii. 24, ὠδινήθη) has in Codd., e.g. the Jaman., the tone on the penult, and with Tsere Metheg (Thorath Emeth, p. 21) serving as העמרה. So also the Arab. nataj is used of the wind, as helping the birth of the rain-clouds. Manifestly פָּנִים נֹעֲמִים, countenances manifesting extreme displeasure (vid. the Kal פָּנִים, xxiv. 24), are compared to rain. With justice Hitzig renders פָּנִים, as e.g. John ii. 6, in the plur. sense; because, for the influence which the tongue slandering in secret (Ps. ci. 5) has on the slandered, the "sorrowful countenance" would not be so characteristic as for the influence which it exercises on the mutual relationships of men: the secret babblers, the confidential communication throwing suspicion, now on this one and now on that one, behind their backs, excites men against one another, so that one shows to another a countenance in which deep displeasure and suspicion express themselves.

Ver. 24 Better to sit on the top of a roof,
Than a quarrelsome woman and a house in common.

A repetition of xxi. 9.

Ver. 25 Fresh water to a thirsty soul;
And good news from a far country.

Vid. regarding the form of this proverb, vol. i. p. 9; we have a similar proverb regarding the influence of good news at xv. 30. Fresh cold water is called at Jer. xviii. 14 מַיִם קְרִיִם; vid. regarding קָר, xviii. 27. "עָרָה, cogn. יַעֲרָה and עָרָה, properly to become darkened, therefore figuratively like (Arab.) gushiya 'alyh, to become faint, to become feeble unto death, of the darkness which spreads itself over the eyes" (Fleischer).

This proverb, with the figure of "fresh water," is now followed by one with the figure of a "fountain":

Ver. 26 A troubled fountain and a ruined spring—
A righteous man yielding to a godless man.

For the most part, in מַקְוֶה one thinks of a yielding in consequence of being forced. Thus e.g. Fleischer: as a troubled ruined spring is a misfortune for the people who drink out of it, or draw from it, so is it a misfortune for the surrounding of the righteous, when he is driven from his dwelling or his possession by an unrighteous man. And it is true: the righteous can be compared to a well (מַעְיִן, well-spring, from עָיַן, a well, as an eye of the earth, and מַקְוֶה, fountain, from קָוָה, R. קָר, כר, to round out, to dig out), with reference to the blessing which flows from it to its surroundings (cf. x. 11 and John vii. 38). But the words "yielding to" (contrast "stood before," 2 Kings x. 4, or Josh. vii. 12), in the phrase "yielding to the godless," may be understood of a spontaneous as well as of a constrained, forced, wavering and yielding, as the expression in the Psalm בל־אֵמוֹט [non movebor, Ps. x. 6] affirms the certainty of being neither inwardly nor outwardly ever moved or shaken. The righteous shall stand fast and strong in God without fearing the godless (Isa. li. 12 f.), unmoveable and firm as a brazen wall (Jer. i. 17 f.). If, however, he is wearied with resistance, and from the fear of man, or the desire to please man, or from a false love of peace he yields before it, and so gives way,—then he becomes like to a troubled fountain (רִפְשׁ, cogn. רָמַם, Ezek. xxxiv. 18; Isa. xli. 25; Jerome: fons turbatus pede), a ruined spring; his character, hitherto pure, is now corrupted by his own guilt, and now far from being a blessing to others, his wavering is a cause of sorrow to the righteous, and an offence to the weak—he is useful no longer, but only injurious. Rightly Lagarde: "The verse, one of the most profound of the whole book, does not speak of the misfortune, but of the fall of the righteous, whose sin compromises the holy cause which he serves, 2 Sam. xii. 14." Thus also e.g. Löwenstein, with reference to the proverb Sanhedrin 92b: also in the time of danger let not a man disown his honour. Bachja, in his Ethics, referring to this figure, 26a, thinks of the possibility of restoration: the righteous wavers only for the moment, but at last he comes right (מתמוטט ועולה). But this interpretation of the figure destroys the point of the proverb.

Ver. 27. This verse, as it stands, is scarcely to be understood. The Venet. translates 27b literally: ἔρηνά τε δόξας αὐτῶν δόξα; but what is the reference of this בְּבָרָם? Eichel and others refer it to men, for they translate: "to set a limit to the glory of man is true glory;" but the "glory of man" is denoted by the phrase בְּבַר אָדָם, not by בְּבָרָם; and, besides, קָקַר does not mean measure and limit. Oetinger explains: "To eat too much honey is not good; whereas the searching after their glory, viz. of pleasant and praiseworthy things, which are likened to honey, is glory, cannot be too much done, and is never without utility and honour;" but how can כְּבֹדֵם be of the same meaning as כְּבֹד הַדְּבָרִים אֲשֶׁר or הַנְּמוּשָׁלִים כְּרִבְשׁ—such an abbreviation of the expression is impossible. Schultens, according to Rashi: vestigatio gravitatis eorum est gravitas, i.e. the searching out of their difficulty is a trouble; better Vitringa (since כְּבֹד nowhere occurs in this sense of gravitas molesta ac pondere oppressura): investigatio præstantiæ eorum est gloriosa; but Vitringa, in order to gain a connection to 27a, needs to introduce etiãmsi, and in both explanations the reference of the כְּבֹדֵם is imaginary, and it by no means lies near, since the Scripture uses the word כְּבֹד of God, and His kingdom and name, but never of His law or His revelation. This also is an argument against Bertheau, who translates: the searching out of their glory (viz. of the divine law and revelation) is a burden, a strenuous occupation of the mind, since חָקֵר does not in itself mean searching out, and is equivocally, even unintelligibly, expressed, since כְּבֹד denotes, it is true, here and there, a great multitude, but never a burden (as כְּבֹד). The thought which Jerome finds in 27b: qui scrutator est majestatis opprimetur a gloria, is judicious, and connects itself synonym. with 27a; but such a thought is unwarranted, for he disregards the suff. of כְּבֹדֵם, and renders כְּבֹד in the sense of difficulty (oppression). Or should it perhaps be vocalized כְּבֹדֵם (Syr., Targ., Theodotion, δεδοξασμένα = נִכְבְּדוֹת)? Thus vocalized, Umbreit renders it in the sense of honores; Elster and Zöckler in the sense of difficultates (difficilia); but this plur., neither the biblical, nor, so far as I know, the post-bibl. usage of the word has ever adopted. However, the sense of the proverb which Elster and Zöckler gain is certainly that which is aimed at. We accordingly translate:

To surfeit oneself in eating honey is not good,
But as an inquirer to enter on what is difficult is honour.

We read כְּבֹדֵם instead of כְּבֹדֵם. This change commends itself far more than כְּבֹד מְכֹבֹד (וְחָקֵר), according to which Gesenius explains: nimum studium honoris est sine honore—impossible, for חָקֵר does not signify nimum studium, in the sense of striving, but only that of inquiry: one strives after honour, but does not study it. Hitzig and Ewald, after the example of J. D. Michaelis, Arnoldi, and Ziegler, betake themselves therefore to the Arabic; Ewald explains, for he leaves the text unchanged: "To despise their honour (that is, of men) is honour (true, real honour);" Hitzig, for he changes the text like Gesenius: "To despise honour is more than honour," with the ingenious remark: To obtain an order [insigne ordinis] is an honour, but not to wear it then for the first time is its bouquet. Nowhere any trace either in Hebrew or in Aramaic is to be found of the verb הקיר, to despise (to be despised), and so it must here remain without example.<sup>1</sup> Nor have we any need of it. The change of פְּבָדָם into פְּבָדָם is enough. The proverb is an antithetic distich; 27a warns against inordinate longing after enjoyments, 27b praises earnest labour. Instead of רִבֵּשׁ הַרְבוּת, if honey in the mass were intended, the words would have been רִבֵּשׁ הַרְבֵּה (Eccles. v. 11; 1 Kings x. 10), or at least רִבֵּשׁ הַרְבוּת (Amos iv. 9); הַרְבוּת can only be a n. actionis, and אָכַל רִבֵּשׁ its inverted object (cf. Jer. ix. 4), as Böttcher has discerned: to make much of the eating of honey, to do much therein is not good (cf. ver. 16). In 27b Luther also partly hits on the correct rendering: "and he who searches into difficult things, to him it is too difficult," for which it ought to be said: to him it is an honour. פְּבָדָם, viz. רַבְרִים, signifies difficult things, as רִיקִים, xii. 11, vain things. The Heb. פְּבָדָם, however, never means difficult to be understood or comprehended (although more modern lexicons say this),<sup>2</sup> but always only burdensome and heavy, gravis, not difficilis. כְּבָדָם are also things of which the הַקִּיר, i.e. the fundamental searching into them (xviii. 17, xxv. 2 f.), costs an earnest effort, which perhaps, according to the first impression, appears to surpass the available strength (cf. Ex. xviii. 18). To overdo oneself in eating honey is not good; on the contrary, the searching into difficult subjects is nothing less than an eating of honey, but an honour. There is here a paronomasia. Fleischer translates it: explorare gravia grave est; but we render grave

Ver. 28. This verse, counselling restraint as to the spirit, is connected with the foregoing, which counsels to self-control as to enjoyment :

A city broken through, now without walls—
A man without self-control over his spirit.

A "city broken down" is one whose wall is "broken," 2 Chron. xxxii. 5, whether it has met with breaches (פְּרָצִים), or is wholly broken; in the former case also the city is incapable of being defended, and it is all one as if it had no wall. Such a city is like a man "who hath no control over his own spirit" (for the accentuation of the Heb. words here, vid. Thorath Emeth, p. 10) : cujus spiritui nulla cohibitio (Schultens), i.e. qui animum suum cohibere non potest (Fleischer : עָצָר, R. צָר, to press together, to oppress, and thereby to hold back). As such a city can be plundered and laid waste without trouble, so a man who knows not to hold in check his desires and affections is in constant danger of blindly following the impulse of his unbridled sensuality, and of being hurried forward to outbreaks of passion, and thus of bringing unhappiness upon himself. There are sensual passions (e.g. drunkenness), intellectual (e.g. ambition), mingled (e.g. revenge); but in all of these a false ego rules, which, instead of being held down by the true and better ego, rises to unbounded supremacy.<sup>1</sup> Therefore the expression used is not לְפָשׁוּ, but לְרַחֵוּ; desire has its seat in the soul, but in the spirit it grows into passion, which in the root of all its diversities is selfishness (Psychol. p. 199); self-control is accordingly the ruling of the spirit, i.e. the restraining (keeping down) of the false enslaved ego-life by the true and free, and powerful in God Himself.

xxvi. 1. There now follows a group of eleven proverbs of the fool; only the first of the group has after it a proverb of different contents, but of similar form :

As snow in summer, and rain in harvest;
So honour befitteth not a fool.

If there is snow in high summer (זָרָק, to be glowing hot), it is contrary to nature; and if there is rain in harvest, it is (according to the alternations of the weather in Palestine) contrary to what is usually the case, and is a hindrance to the ingathering of the fruits of the field. Even so a fool and respect, or a place of honour, are incongruous things; honour will only injure him (as according to xix. 10, luxury); he will make unjust use of it, and draw false conclusions from it; it will strengthen him in his folly, and only increase it. נָאוֹה (= נָאוֹי) is the adj. to the Pil. נָאוֹה, Ps. xciii. 5 (plur. נָאוֹה); נָאוֹה, xix. 10, and נָאוֹה, xvii. 7, are also masc. and fem. of the adj., according to which, that which is said under xix. 10 is to be corrected. Symmachus and Theodotion have translated οὐκ ἐπρεψεν, and have therefore read נָאוֹה. The root word is נָאוֹה (as נָאוֹה to נָאוֹה) = נָאוֹה, to aim at something (vid. Hupfeld under Ps. xxiii. 2).

Ver. 2. This verse is formed quite in the same way as the preceding:

As the sparrow in its fluttering, as the swallow in its flying,
So the curse that is groundless: it cometh not.

This passage is one of those fifteen (vid. under Ps. c. 3) in which the לָל of the text is changed by the Keri into לֵל; the Talm., Midrash, and Sohar refer this לֵל partly to him who utters the curse himself, against whom also, if he is a judge, such inconsiderate cursing becomes an accusation by God; partly to him who is cursed, for they read from the proverb that the curse of a private person also (הַרְיוֹת, ἰδιώτης) is not wont to fall to the ground, and that therefore one ought to be on his guard against giving any occasion for it (vid. Norzi). But Aben Ezra supposes that לָל and לֵל interchange, as much as to say that the undeserved curse falls on him (לֵל) who curses, and does not fall (לָל) on him who is cursed. The figures in 2a harmonize only with לָל, according to which the LXX., the Syr., Targ., Venet., and Luther (against Jerome) translate, for the principal matter, that the sparrow and the swallow, although flying out (xxvii. 8), return home again to their nest (Rabag), would be left out of view in the comparison by לֵל. This emphasizes the fluttering and flying, and is intended to affirm that a groundless curse is a פְּרִיחַ בְּאֵייר, aimless, i.e. a thing hovering in the air, that it fails and does not take effect. Most interpreters explain the two Lameds as declaring the destination: ut passer (sc. natus est) ad vagandum, as the sparrow, through necessity of nature, roves about . . . (Fleischer). But from xxv. 3 it is evident that the Lamed in both cases declares the reference or the point of comparison: as the sparrow in respect to its fluttering about, etc. The names of the two birds are, according to Aben Ezra, like dreams without a meaning; but the Romanic exposition explains rightly צפור by passereau, and דרור by hirondelle, for צפור (Arab. 'usfuwr), twitterer, designates at least preferably the sparrow, and דרור the swallow, from its flight shooting straight out, as it were radiating (vid. under Ps. lxxxiv. 4); the name of the sparrow, dûrî (found in courtyards), which Wetstein, after Saadia, compares to דרור, is etymologically different.<sup>1</sup> Regarding חָפֵץ, vid. under xxiv. 28. Rightly the accentuation separates the words rendered, "so the curse undeserved" (חָפֵץ, after Kimchi, Michlol 79b, חָפֵץ), from those which follow; לֹא תִבָּא is the explication of כֵּן: thus hovering in the air is a groundless curse—it does not come (בוא, like e.g. Josh. xxi. 43). After this proverb, which is formed like ver. 1, the series now returns to the "fool."

Ver. 3 A whip for the horse, a bridle for the ass,
And a rod for the back of fools.

J. D. Michaelis supposes that the order should be reversed: a bridle for the horse, a whip for the ass; but Arnoldi has here discovered the figure of speech merismus (cf. x. 1); and Hitzig, in the manner of the division, the rhythmical reason of the combination (cf. שֵׁם יפת והם for שֵׁם חם ויפת): whip and bridle belong to both, for one whips a horse (Neh. iii. 2) and also bridles him; one bridles an ass (Ps. xxxii. 9) and also whips him (Num. xxii. 28 f.). As whip and bridle are both serviceable and necessary, so also serviceable and necessary is a rod, לֵיגוֹ בַּסִּילִים, x. 13, xix. 29.

Ver. 4 Answer not the fool according to his folly,
Lest thou thyself also become like unto him.

After, or according to his folly, is here equivalent to recognising the foolish supposition and the foolish object of his question, and thereupon considering it, as if, e.g., he asked why the ignorant man was happier than the man who had much knowledge, or how one may acquire the art of making gold; for "a fool can ask more than ten wise men can answer." He who recognises such questions as justifiable, and thus sanctions them, places himself on an equality with the fool, and easily himself becomes one. The proverb that follows affirms apparently the direct contrary :

Ver. 5 Answer the fool according to his folly,
Lest he regard himself as wise.

Ver. 6 He cutteth off the feet, he drinketh injury,
Who transacteth business by a fool.

He cutteth off, i.e. his own feet, as we say: he breaks his neck, il se casse le cou; Lat. frangere brachium, crus, coxam; frangere navem (Fleischer). He thinks to supplement his own two legs by those of the messenger, but in reality he cuts them off; for not only is the commission not carried out, but it is even badly carried out, so that instead of being refreshed (xiii.

17, xxv. 13) by the quick, faithful execution of it, he has to swallow nothing but damage; cf. Job xxxiv. 7, where, however, drinking scorn is meant of another (LXX.), not his own; on the contrary, חָמָס here refers to injury suffered (as if it were חָמָסוֹ, for the suff. of חָמָס is for the most part objective); cf. the similar figures x. 26. So שְׁלַח בְּיַד, to accomplish anything by the mediation of another, cf. Ex. iv. 13; with דְּבַר (דְּבָרִים), 2 Sam. xv. 36. The reading מְקַצֵּה (Jerome, Luther, claudus) is unnecessary; since, as we saw, מְקַצֵּה includes it in the sibi. The Syr. reads, after the LXX. (the original text of which was ἐκ τῶν ποδῶν ἑαυτοῦ), מְקַצֵּה, for he errs, as also does the Targumist, in thinking that מְקַצֵּה can be used for מְקַצֵּן; but Hitzig adopts this reading, and renders: “from the end of the legs he swallows injury who sends messages by a fool.” The end of the legs are the feet, and the feet are those of the foolish messenger. The proverb in this form does not want in boldness, but the wisdom which Hitzig finds in it is certainly not mother-wit.<sup>1</sup> Böttcher, on his part, also with מְקַצֵּה, renders: “from the end of his feet he drinks in that which is bitter . . .” —that also is too artificial, and is unintelligible without the explanation of its discoverer. But that he who makes a fool his messenger becomes himself like unto one who cuts off his own legs, is a figure altogether excellent.

Ver. 7 The hanging down of the legs of a lame man ;
And a proverb in a fool's mouth.

With reference to the obscure רָלִי, the following views have been maintained:—(1) The form as punctuated appears directly as an imperative. Thus the LXX. translate, the original text of which is here: ἀφελού πορείαν κυλλῶν (conj. Lagarde's) καὶ παροιμίαν ἐκ στόματος ἀφρόνων, which the Syr. (with its imitator, the Targ.) has rendered positively: “If thou canst give the power of (sound) going to the lame, then wilt thou also receive (prudent) words from the mouth of a fool.” Since Kimchi, רָלִי has been regarded by many as the softening of the Imp. Piel רָלִי, according to which the Venet. translates: ἐπάρατε κνήμας χωλοῦ; and Bertheau and Zöckler explain: always take away his legs from the lame, since they are in reality useless to him, just as a proverb in the mouth of the fool is useless,—something that without loss might be never there.” But why did not the poet write הָרִיטוֹ, or הָסִירוֹ, or קָח, or the like? לָקַח, to carry away, to dispense with, is Syriac (Targ. Jer. I., under Deut. xxxii. 50), but not Hebrew. And how meaningless is this expression! A lame man would withstand a surgeon (as he would a murderer) who would amputate his legs; for lame legs are certainly better than none, especially since there is a great distinction between a lame man (קַצֵּב, from קָצַב, luxare; cf. (Arab.) fasaḥ, luxare, vid. Schultens) who halts or goes on crutches (2 Sam. iii. 29), and one who is maimed (paralytic), who needs to be carried. It comes to this, that by this rendering of 7a one must, as a consequence, with the LXX., regard לְשׂוֹן [and a proverb] as object. accus. parallel to רַגְלָיו [legs]; but “to draw a proverb from one’s mouth” is, after xx. 5, something quite different from to tear a proverb away from him, besides which, one cannot see how it is to be caught. Rather one would prefer: attollite crura claudi (ut incedat, et nihil promovebitis); but the קָ of קַצֵּב does not accord with this, and 7b does not connect itself with it. But the explanation: “take away the legs from a lame man who has none, at least none to use, and a proverb in the mouth of fools, when there is none,” is shattered against the “leg-taking-away,” which can only be used perhaps of frogs’ legs. (2) Symmachus translates: ἐξέλιπον κνήμαι ἀπὸ χωλοῦ; and Chajûg explains לָקַח as 3 pret. Kal, to which Kimchi adds the remark, that he appears to have found לָקַח, which indeed is noted by Norzi and J. H. Michaelis as a variant. But the Masoretic reading is לָקַח, and this, after Gesenius and Böttcher (who in this, without any reason, sees an Ephraimitic form of uttering the word), is a softened variation from לָקַח. Only it is a pity that this softening, while it is supported by alius = ἄλλος, folium = φύλλον, faillir = fallere, and the like, has yet not a single Hebrew or Semitic example in its favour. (3) Therefore Ewald finds, “all things considered,” that it is best to read לָקַח, “the legs are too loose for the lame man to use them.” But, with Dietrich, we cannot concur in this, nor in the more appropriate translation: "the legs of the lame hang down loose," to say nothing of the clearly impossible: "high are the legs of the lame (one higher than the other)," and that because this form  $\text{נָלִי}$  for  $\text{נָלִי}$  also occurs without pause, Ps. lvii. 2, lxxiii. 2, cxxii. 6, Isa. xxi. 12; but although thus, as at Ps. xxxvi. 9, lxxviii. 32, at the beginning of a clause, yet always only in connection, never at the beginning of an address. (4) It has also been attempted to interpret  $\text{רָלִי}$  as abstr., e.g. Euchel: "he learns from a cripple to dance, who seeks to learn proverbs from the mouth of a fool."  $\text{רָלִי שְׁקוֹם}$  must mean the lifting up of the legs = springing and dancing. Accordingly Luther translates:

"As dancing to a cripple,
So does it become a fool to speak of wisdom."

The thought is agreeable, and according to fact; but these words do not mean dancing, but much rather, as the Arabic shows (vid. Schultens at xx. 5, and on the passage before us), a limping, waddling walk, like that of ducks, after the manner of a well-bucket dangling to and fro. And  $\text{רָלִי}$ , after the form  $\text{מָלַי}$ , would be an unheard-of Aramaism. For forms such as  $\text{שָׁחַי}$ , swimming, and  $\text{שָׁלַי}$ , security, Ps. xxx. 7, on which C. B. Michaelis and others rest, cannot be compared, since they are modified from sachw, salw, while in  $\text{רָלִי}$  the  $\text{u}$  ending must be, and besides the Aramaic  $\text{רָלִי}$  must in st. constr. be  $\text{רָלִיָּת}$ . Since none of these explanations are grammatically satisfactory, and besides  $\text{רָלִי} = \text{רָלִיָּת} = \text{רָלִי}$  gives a parallel member which is heterogeneous and not conformable to the nature of an emblematical proverb, we read  $\text{רָלִי}$  after the forms  $\text{צָפַי}$ ,  $\text{שָׁקַי}$  (cf. תּוֹבַי, vi. 10, xxiv. 33), and this signifies loose, hanging down, from  $\text{רָלַי}$ , to hang at length and loosely down, or transitively: to hang, particularly of the hanging down at length of the bucket-rope, and of the bucket itself, to draw water from the well. The  $\text{ן}$  is similar to that of Job xxviii. 4, only that here the connecting of the hanging down, and of that from which it hangs down, is clear. Were we to express the purely nominally expressed emblematical proverb in the form of a comparative one, it would thus stand as Fleischer translates it: ut laxa et flaccida dependent (torpent) crura a claudo, sic sententia in ore stultorum (sc. torpet h. e. inutilis est). The fool can as little make use of an intelligent proverb, or moral maxim (dictum sententiosum), as a lame man can of his feet; the word, which in itself is full of thought, and excellent, becomes halting, lame, and loose in his mouth (Schultens: deformiter claudicat); it has, as spoken and applied by him, neither hand nor foot. Strangely, yet without missing the point, Jerome: quomodo pulcras frustra habet claudus tibias, sic indecens est in ore stultorum parabola. The lame man possibly has limbs that appear sound; but when he seeks to walk, they fail to do him service,—so a bon-mot comes forth awkwardly when the fool seeks to make use of it. Hitzig's conjecture: as leaping of the legs on the part of a lame man . . ., Böttcher has already shown sufficient reasons for rejecting; leaping on the part of any one, for the leaping of any one, were a court style familiar to no poet.

Ver. 8. This proverb presents to us a new difficulty.

As one binds a stone in a sling,
So is he who giveth honour to a fool.

This translation is warranted by tradition, and is in accordance with the actual facts. A sling is elsewhere called קָלָע; but that קִרְיָמָה also in the passage before us signifies a sling (from קָרַם, to throw with stones = to stone or to throw stones = to sling, cf. Targ. Esth. v. 14 קָרַם, of David's slinging stones against Goliath), is supported by the LXX., Syr., and Targ. on the one side, and the Jewish Glossists on the other (Rashi: fronde, Ital. frombola). Rightly the LXX. renders קִרְיָמָה as a verb: ὡς ἀποδεσμεύει; on the contrary, the Syr. and Targ. regard it as a substantive: as a piece of stone; but צִרֹר as a substantive does not mean a piece, as one would put into a sling to use as a weapon, but a grain, and thus a little piece, 2 Sam. xvii. 13; cf. Amos ix. 9. Erroneously Ewald: "if one binds to the sling the stone which he yet seeks to throw, then all his throwing and aiming are in vain; so it is in vain to give to a fool honour which does not reach him." If one seeks to sling a stone, he must lay the lapis missilis so in the sling that it remains firm there, and goes forth only by the strong force of the slinging; this fitting in (of the stone), so that it does not of itself fall out, is expressed by צִרֹרָה (cf.

xxx. 4; Job xxvi. 8). The giving is compared to the binding, the stones to the honour, and the sling to the fool: the fool is related to the honour which one confers on him, as the stone to the sling in which one lays it—the giving of honour is a slinging of honour. Otherwise (after Kimchi) the Venet. ὡς συνδεσμὸς λίθου ἐν λιθάδι, i.e. as Fleischer translates: ut qui crumenam gemmarum plenam in acervum lapidum conjicit. Thus also Ralbag, Ahron b. Josef, and others, and lastly Zöckler. The figure is in the form of an address, and מְרַגְמָה (from רָגַם, accumulare, congerere, vid. under Ps. lxvii. 28) might certainly mean the heaping of stones. But אֶבֶן יְקָרָה (precious stone); also one does not see why one precious stone is not enough as the figure of honour, and a whole heap is named; but in the third place, בְּנֵי נֹתֵן requires for כְּצֹרֵר a verbal signification. Therefore Jerome translates: sicut qui mittit lapidem in acervum Mercurii; in this the echo of his Jewish teacher, for the Midrash thus explains literally: every one who gives honour to a fool is like one who throws a stone on a heap of stones consecrated to Mercury. Around the Hermes (ἑρμαί), i.e. pillars with the head of Mercury (statuæ mercuriales or viales), were heaps of stones (ἑρμακες), to which the passer-by was wont to throw a stone; it was a mark of honour, and served at the same time to improve the way, whose patron was Mercurius (מְרַקוּלִים). It is self-evident that this Græco-Roman custom to which the Talm. make frequent reference, cannot be supposed to have existed in the times of Solomon. Luther translates independently, and apparently rendering into German that in acervum Mercurii: that is as if one threw a precious stone on the “Rabenstein,” i.e. the heap of stones raised at the foot of the gallows. This heap of stones is more natural and suitable to the times of Solomon than the heap of stones dedicated to Mercury, if, like Gussetius, one understands מְרַגְמָה of a heap of stones, supra corpus lapidatum. But against this and similar interpretations it is enough to remark that כְּצֹרֵר cannot signify sicut qui mittit. Had such a meaning been intended, the word would have been בְּהַשְׁלִיךְ or בְּמַשְׁלִיךְ. Still different is the rendering of Joseph Kimchi, Aben Ezra, and finally Löwenstein: as when one wraps up a stone in a piece of purple stuff. But אֶרְגָּמָן, purple, has nothing to do with the verb רָגַם; it is, as the Aramaic אַרְגָּן shows, a compound word; the supposition of a denom. מְרַגְמָה thus proceeds from a false etymological supposition. And Hitzig's combination of מְרַגְמָה with (Arab.) munjam, handle and beam of a balance (he translates: as a stone on the beam of a balance, i.e. lies on it), is nothing but refined ingenuity, since we have no need at all of such an Arab. word for a satisfactory clearing up of מְרַגְמָה. We abide by the rendering of the sling. Böttcher translates: a sling that scatters; perhaps מְרַגְמָה in reality denotes such a sling as throws many stones at once. Let that, however, be as it may: that he who confers a title of honour, a place of honour, and the like, on a fool, is like one who lays a stone in a sling, is a true and intelligibly formed thought: the fool makes the honour no honour; he is not capable of maintaining it; that which is conferred on him is uselessly wasted.

Ver. 9 A thorn goeth into the hand of a drunkard,
And a proverb in a fool's mouth;

i.e., if a proverb falls into a fool's mouth, it is as if a thorn entered into the hand of a drunken man; the one is as dangerous as the other, for fools misuse such a proverb, which, rightly used, instructs and improves, only to the wounding and grieving of another, as a drunken man makes use of the pointed instrument which he has possession of for coarse raillery, and as a welcome weapon of his strife. The LXX., Syr. (Targ. ?), and Jerome interpret עָלָה in the sense of shooting up, i.e. of growing; Böttcher also, after xxiv. 31 and other passages, insists that the thorn which has shot up may be one that has not grown to perfection, and therefore not dangerous. But thorns grow not in the hand of any one; and one also does not perceive why the poet should speak of it as growing in the hand of a drunken man, which the use of the hand with it would only make worse. We have here עָלָה בְיָדִי, i.e. it has come into my hand, commonly used in the Mishna, which is used where anything, according to intention, falls into one's hands, as well as where it comes accidentally and unsought for, e.g. Nazir 23a, מִי שֶׁנִּתְכוּן לְעֹלֹת בִּידוֹ, בֶּשֶׁר חֲזִיר וְעֹלֹת בִּידוֹ בֶּשֶׁר טָלָה, he who designs to obtain swine's flesh and (accidentally) obtains lamb's flesh. Thus rightly Heidenheim, Löwenstein, and the Venet.: ἄκανθα ἀνέβη εἰς χείρα μεθύοντος. חֵן signifies a thorn bush, 2 Kings xiv. 9,<sup>1</sup> as well as a thorn, Song ii. 2, but where not the thorns of the rose, and indeed no rose at all, is meant. Luther thinks of the rose with the thorn when he explains: "When a drunkard carries and brandishes in his hand a thorn bush, he scratches more with it than allows the roses to be smelled—so a fool with the Scriptures, or a right saying, often does more harm than good." This paraphrase of Luther's interprets עֵלָה בִּיר more correctly than his translation does; on the other hand, the latter more correctly is satisfied with a thorn twig (as a thorn twig which pierces into the hand of a drunken man); the roses are, however, assumed contrary to the text. This holds good also against Wessely's explanation: "the Mashal is like a rose not without thorns, but in the mouth of a fool is like a thorn without a rose, as when a drunken man seeks to pluck roses and gains by his effort nothing but being pierced by thorns." The idea of roses is to be rejected, because at the time when this proverb was formed there were no roses in Palestine. The proverb certainly means that a right Mashal, i.e. an ingenious excellent maxim, is something more and better than a חֵן (the prick as of the Jewish thorn, Zizyphus vulgaris, or the Christus-thorn, the Ziz. spina Christi); but in the mouth of a fool such a maxim becomes only a useless and a hurtful thing; for the fool so makes use of it, that he only embarrasses others and recklessly does injury to them. The LXX. translates מַשָּׁל by δουλεία, and the Aram. by שְׂמִיחָא; how the latter reached this "folly" is not apparent; but the LXX. vocalized מַשָּׁל, according to which Hitzig, at the same time changing שְׂבוּר into שְׂבוּר, translates: "thorns shoot up by the hand of the hireling, and tyranny by the mouth of fools." Although a hired labourer, yet, on this account, he is not devoid of conscience; thus 9a so corrected has something in its favour: one ought, as far as possible, to do all with his own hand; but the thought in 9b is far-fetched, and if Hitzig explains that want of judgment in the state councils creates despotism, so, on the other hand, xxiv. 7 says that the fool cannot give counsel in the gate, and therefore he holds his mouth.

Ver. 10. All that we have hitherto read is surpassed in obscurity by this proverb, which is here connected because of the resemblance of ושכר to שכור. We translate it thus, vocalizing differently only one word:

Much bringeth forth from itself all;

But the reward and the hirer of the fool pass away.

The LXX. translates πολλὰ χειμάζεται πᾶσα σὰρξ ἀφρόνων (all the flesh of fools suffers much), συντριβήσεται γὰρ ἡ ἔκστασις αὐτῶν, which is in Hebrew:

רב מחולל כל בשׁר כסיל
ישׁבר עֲבָרָתָם.

An unfortunate attempt so to rectify the words that some meaning might be extracted from them. The first line of this translation has been adopted by the Syr. and Targ., omitting only the כל, in which the self-condemnation of this deciphering lies (for כל בשׁר means elsewhere, humanity, not the whole body of each individual); but they translate the second line as if the words were:

ישׁבר עֲבָר ים

i.e., and the drunken man sails over the sea (עברים is separated into עבר ים, as בבקרים, Amos vi. 12, is to be separated into בַּבְּקָר ים); but what does that mean? Does it mean that to a drunkard (but שׁכור, the drunken man, and not סִבָּא, the drunkard, is used) nothing remains but to wander over the sea? or that the drunken man lets his imagination wander away over the sea, while he neglects the obligation that lies upon him? Symmachus and Theodotion, with the Midrash (Rashi) and Saadia (Kimchi), take שׁכר in 10*b* = סגר (like Isa. xix. 10, שׁכָר = embankment, cf. סִפְרִין, Kelim, xxiii. 5); the former translates by καὶ ὁ φράσσων ἄφρονα ἐμφράσσει τὰς ὀργὰς αὐτοῦ, the latter by καὶ φιμῶν ἄφρονα φιμοῖ χόλους, yielding to the imagination that עֲבָרִים, like עֲבָרוֹת, may be the plur. of עֲבָרָה, anger. Jerome punctuates רב as, xxv. 8, רב, and interprets, as Symmachus and Theodotion, שׁכָר both times = סִגְר, translating: Judicium determinat causas, et qui imponit stulto silentium iras mitigat; but רב does not mean judicium, nor מחולל determinat, nor כל causas. As Gussetius, so also Ralbag (in the first of his three explanations), Meïri, Elia

Wilna interpret the proverb as a declaration regarding quarrelsome persons: he causeth woe to all, and hireth fools, hireth transgressors, for his companions; but in that case we must read  $\text{רָב}$  for  $\text{רָב}$ ;  $\text{מְחַוֵּל}$ , bringing woe, would be either the Po. of  $\text{הָלַל}$ , to bore through, or Pilel of  $\text{הָיַל}$  ( $\text{הוֹלַל}$ ), to put into distress (as with pangs); but  $\text{עֲבָרִים}$ , transgressors = sinners, is contrary to the O. T. usus loq., xxii. 3 (xxvii. 12) is falsely cited in its favour; besides, for  $\text{רָב}$  there should have been at least  $\text{רַב־שָׂר}$ , and why  $\text{וְשִׁבְרֵי}$  is repeated remains inexplicable. Others take  $\text{מְחַוֵּל}$  as the name of God, the creator of all men and things; and truly this is the nearest impression of these two words, for  $\text{הוֹלֵל}$  is the usual designation for divine production, e.g. Ps. xc. 2. Accordingly Kimchi explains: The Lord is the creator of all, and He gives to fools and to transgressors their maintenance; but  $\text{עֲבָרִים}$ , transgressors, is Mishnic, not bibl.; and  $\text{שִׁבַר}$  means to hire, but not to supply with food. The proverb is thus incapable of presenting a thought like Matt. v. 45 (He maketh His sun to rise on the evil and on the good). Others translate: "The Lord is creator of all, and takes fools, takes idlers, into His service." Thus rendered, the proverb is offensive; wherefore Rashi, Moses Kimchi, Arama, and others regard the Mashal as in the mouth of fools, and thus they take vers. 9 and 10 together as a tetrastich. Certainly this second collection of proverbs contains also tetrastiches; but vers. 9 and 10 cannot be regarded as together forming a tetrastich, because  $\text{רָב}$  (which is valid against Kimchi also) cannot mean God the Lord:  $\text{רָב}$ , Lord, is unheard of in bibl. Heb., and at least the word  $\text{הָרַב}$  must be used for God. The Venet. on this account does not follow Kimchi, but translates, "Ἀρχὸν πλάττει πάντα, καὶ μισθοῦται μωρὸν καὶ μισθοῦται ὡς παραβύτης (ought to have been παραβάτας); but who could this cunning man be? Perhaps the Venet. is to be understood, after Gecatilia (in Rashi): a great (rich) man performs all manner of things; but if he hires a fool, it is as if he hired the first best who pass along the way. But that  $\text{הוֹלֵל}$  is used in the general sense of to execute, to perform, is without example, and improbable. Also the explanation: a ruler brings grief, i.e. severe oppression, upon all (Abulwalid, Immanuel, Aben Ezra, who, in his smaller grammar, explains  $\text{רָב} = \text{רַב}$  after Isa. xlix. 9;

C. B. Michaelis: dolore afficit omnes), does not recommend itself; for חולל, whether it be from חלל, Isa. li. 9 (to bore through), or from חיל, Ps. xxix. 9 (to bring on the pangs of birth), is too strong a word for hurting; also the clause, thus generally understood, is fortunately untrue. Translated as by Euchel: “the prominent persons destroy all; they keep fools in pay, and favour vagabonds,”—it sounds as if it had been picked up in an assembly of democrats. On the other hand, the proverb, as translated by Luther:

A good master maketh a thing right;
But he who hireth a bungler, by him it is spoiled, is worthy of the Book of Proverbs. The second line is here freely rendered, but it is also appropriate, if we abide closer by the words of the text, in this connection. Fleischer: Magister (artifex peritus) effingit omnia (i.e. bene perficit quæcunque ei committuntur); qui autem stultum conducit, conducit transeuntes (i.e. idem facit ac si homines ignotos et forte transeuntes ad opus gravius et difficilius conduceret). Thus also Gesenius, Böttcher, and others, who all, as Gecatilia above, explain עבירים, τὸς τυχόντας, the first best. But we are reluctantly constrained to object to this thought, because רב nowhere in bibl. Hebrew signifies a master; and the ו of the second וְשִׂבַר cannot bear that rendering, ac si. And if we leave it out, we nevertheless encounter a difficulty in חולל, which cannot be used of human production. Many Christian interpreters (Cocceius, Schultens, Schelling, Ewald, Bertheau, Stier, Zöckler) give to רב a meaning which is found in no Jewish interpreter, viz. sagittarius, from רַבֵּב (רַבֵּב), Gen. xlix. 23 (and perhaps Ps. xviii. 15), after the forms צַר, שִׁר, the plur. of which, רַבִּים, is found at Job xvi. 13, Jer. l. 29, but in a connection which removes all doubt from the meaning of the word. Here also רב may be more closely defined by מְחַוֵּל; but how then does the proverb stand? “an archer who wounds everything, and he who hires a fool, and hires passers-by” (Ewald: street-runners), i.e. they are alike. But if the archer piercing everything is a comic Hercules furens, then, in order to discover the resemblance between the three, there is need of a portion of ingenuity, such as is only particularly assigned to the favoured. But it is also against the form and the usage of the word to interpret עברים simply of rogues and vagabonds. Several interpreters have supposed that רב and כל must stand in a certain interchangeable relation to each other. Thus, e.g., Ahron b. Josef: "Much makes amazement to all, but especially one who hires a fool. . . ." But this "especially" (before all) is an expression smuggled in. Agreeing with Umbreit and Hitzig, we translate line first; but in translating line second, we follow our own method:

Much bringeth all out of it;

i.e., where there is much, then one has it in his power, if he begins right, to undertake everything. רב has by כל the definition of a neuter, so as to designate not only many men, Ex. xix. 21, but also much ability in a pecuniary and facultative sense (cf. the subst. רב, Isa. lxiii. 7; Ps. cxlv. 7); and of the much which bringeth forth all out of itself, effects all by itself, לול with equal right might be used, as xxv. 23, of the north wind. The antithesis 10b takes this form:

But the reward (read וְשֹׁכֵר) and the master (who hires him for wages) of the fool pass away,

i.e. perish; עֲבָרִים, as if עֲבָרָה, is used of chaff, Isa. xxix. 5; of stubble, Jer. xiii. 24; of shadow, Ps. cxlv. 4. That which the fool gains passes away, for he squanders it; and he who took him into his service for wages is ruined along with him, for his work is only pernicious, not useful. Although he who possesses much, and has great ability, may be able to effect everything of himself, yet that is not the case when he makes use of the assistance therein of foolish men, who not only do not accomplish anything, but, on the contrary, destroy everything, and are only ruinous to him who, with good intention, associates them with himself in his work. That the word must be more accurately וְשֹׁכֵר, instead of וְשֹׁכֵרָה, one may not object, since וְשֹׁכֵר is perfectly unambiguous, and is manifestly the object.

Ver. 11. The series of proverbs regarding fools is continued:

Like a dog which returneth to his vomit,
Is a fool who cometh again with his folly.

שׁוֹכֵר is like שׁוֹכֵרָה, particip.; only if the punctuation were כִּבְלֵב, ought "which returneth to his vomit" to be taken as a relative clause (vid. under Ps. xxxviii. 14). Regarding  $\text{בַּי}$  as designating the terminus quo with verbs of motions, vid. Köhler under Mal. iii. 24. On  $\text{סָר} = \text{סָר}$ , cf. xxiii. 8. Luther rightly: as a dog devours again his vomit. The LXX. translate: ὡσπερ κύων ὅταν ἐπέλθῃ ἐπὶ τὸν ἑαυτοῦ ἔμετον; the reference in 2 Pet. ii. 22: κύων ἐπιστρέψας ἐπὶ τὸ ἴδιον ἐξέραμα, is thus not from the LXX.; the Venet. is not connected with this N. T. citation, but with the LXX., if its accordance with it is not merely accidental. To devour again its vomit is common with the dog.<sup>1</sup> Even so, it is the manner of fools to return again in word and in deed to their past folly (vid. regarding  $\text{שׁוּב}$  with  $\text{ב}$  of the object, xvii. 9); as an Aram. popular saying has it: the fool always falls back upon his foolish conduct.<sup>2</sup> He must needs do so, for folly has become to him a second nature; but this "must" ceases when once a divine light shines forth upon him. The LXX. has after ver. 11 a distich which is literally the same as Sir. iv. 21.

Ver. 12 Seest thou a man who is wise in his own eyes?

The fool hath more hope than he.

Regarding the perf. lypotheticum  $\text{יִרְאֶה}$ , vid. at xxii. 29. Line second is repeated, xxix. 20, unchanged.  $\text{כִּי־יִרְאֶה}$ , præ eo, is equivalent to the Mishnic  $\text{כִּי־יִרְאֶה}$ , plus quam ei. As the conversion of a sinner, who does not regard himself as righteous, is more to be expected than that of a self-righteous man (Matt. ix. 12 f.), so the putting right of a fool, who is conscious that he is not wise (cf. xxiv. 7), is more likely to be effected than that of one deeming himself wise; for the greatest hindrance to any turning toward that which is better lies in the delusion that he does not need it.<sup>3</sup> Thus far the group of proverbs regarding fools.

There follows now a group of proverbs regarding the slothful:

Ver. 13 The slothful saith there is a lion without,
A lion in the midst of the streets;

cf. the original of this proverb, xxii. 13. שָׁעַל, to say nothing of שָׁחַל, is not the jackal; שָׁחַל is the bibl. name for the lion. בֵּין is the more general expression for בֵּתְקָרֵב, Isa. v. 25; by the streets he thinks of the rows of houses that form them.

Ver. 14 The door turneth on its hinges,
And the sluggard on his bed.

The comparison is clear. The door turns itself on its hinges, on which it hangs, in and out, without passing beyond the narrow space of its motion; so is the fool on his bed, where he turns himself from the one side to the other. He is called עָצֵל, because he is fast glued to the place where he is (Arab. 'azila), and cannot be free (contrast of the active, cf. Arab. hafyf, moving nimbly, agilis). But the door offers itself as a comparison, because the diligent goes out by it to begin his work without (xxiv. 27; Ps. civ. 23), while the sluggard rolls himself about on his bed. The hook, the hinge, on which the door is moved, called צִיר, from צָוַר, to turn,<sup>1</sup> has thus the name of הַפּוֹבֵב.

Ver. 15 The slothful has thrust his hand into the dish,
It is hard for him to bring it back to his mouth again.

A variation of xix. 24; the fut. יִשְׁיבְנָה there, is here explained by נִלְאָה לְהַשִּׁיבָהּ.

Ver. 16 The sluggard is wise in his own eyes,
More than seven men who give an excellent answer.

Between slothfulness and conceit there exists no inward necessary mutual relation. The proverb means that the sluggard as such regards himself as wiser than seven, who all together answer well at any examination: much labour—he thinks with himself—only injures the health, blunts men for life and its joys, leads only to over-exertion; for the most prudent is, as a general rule, crack-brained. Böttcher's "maulfaule" [slow to speak] belongs to the German style of thinking; עָטַל in Syr. is not he who is slow to speak, but he who has a faltering tongue.<sup>1</sup> Seven is the number of manifoldness in completed unfolding (ix. 1). Meiri thinks, after Ezra vii. 14, on the council of seven of the Asiatic ruler. But seven is a round number of plurality, ver. 25, xxiv. 16, vi. 31. Regarding טָעַם, vid. at xi. 22.

A series of proverbs which recommend the love of peace, for they present caricatures of the opposite :

Ver. 17 He seizeth by the ears a dog passing by,
Who is excited by a strife which concerns him not.

According to the accentuation in the text, the proverb is to be translated with Fleischer: Qualis est quiprehendit aures canis, talis est qui forte transiens ira abripitur propter rixam alienam (eique temere se immiscet). Since he is cautioned against unwarranted interference, the expression מְתַעֲבֵר בְּרִיז might have been used (xiv. 10), according to which the Syr. translates; but עֲלֵרִיב substantiates the originality of מְתַעֲבֵר (vid. xiv. 16, xx. 2). On the other hand, the placing together, without any connection of the two participles, is perplexing; why not עֲבֵר וּמְתַעֲבֵר? For it is certainly not meant, that falling into a passion he passes by; but that passing by, he falls into a passion; for he stands to this object. The Targumist, feeling this also, renders עֲבֵר in the sense of being angry, but contrary to the usus loq. Wherefore the conjecture of Euchel and Abramsohn commends itself, that עֲבֵר belongs to בָּלַב—the figure thereby becomes more distinct. To seize one's own dog by the ear is not dangerous, but it is not advisable to do this with a strange dog. Therefore עֲבֵר belongs as a necessary attribute to the dog. The dog accidentally passing by corresponds to the strife to which one stands in no relation (רִיב לֹא־לוֹ, vid. regarding the Makkeph, Baer's Genesis, p. 85, not. 9). Whoever is excited to passion about a strife that does not belong to him, is like one who lays hold by the ears (the LXX. arbitrarily: by the tail) of a dog that is passing by—to the one or to the other it happens right when he brings evil upon himself thereby.

Vers. 18, 19. These verses form a tetrastich :

Ver. 18 As a man who casteth brands,
And arrows, and death ;

19 So is the man who deceiveth his neighbour,
And saith : I only make sport.

The old translations of מתלהלה are very diverse. Aquila has rendered it by κακοηθιζόμενος; Symmachus: πειρώμενοι; the Syr.: the vainglorious; the Targ.: מתחת (from נחת), a successor (spiritually); Jerome: noxius (injurious; for which Luther: secret). There is thus no traditional translation. Kimchi explains the word by השתגע (Venet. ἐξεστώς); Aben Ezra by השתמה (from שמה), to behave thoughtlessly, foolishly; but both erroneously, confounding with it תלה, Gen. xlvii. 13, which is formed from תלה and not from תלה, and is related to תלה, according to which מתלהלה would designate him who exerts himself (Rashi, המתניע), or who is worn out (Saadia: who does not know what to do, and in weariness passes his time). The root תלה (תלה, whence the reflex form התלהלה, like התמהמה, from תמה, תמה) leads to another primary idea. The root תלה presents in (Arab.) âlîha (vid. Fleischer in the Comm. zur Genesis, p. 57), walîha, and talîha, formed from the 8th form of this verb (aittalah), the fundamental meaning of internal and external unrest; these verbs are used of the effect of fear (shrinking back from fear), and, generally, the want of self-command; the Syr. otlahlah, to be terrified, obstupescere, confirms this primary conception, connecting itself with the R. לה. Accordingly, he who shoots every possible death-bringing arrow, is thought of as one who is beside himself, one who is of confused mind, in which sense the passive forms of (Arab.) âlah and talah are actually used. Schultens' reference to (Arab.) lâh micare, according to which כמתלהלה must mean sicut ludicram micationem exercens (Böttcher: one who exerts himself; Malbim: one who scoffs, from התלה), is to be rejected, because מתלהלה must be the direct opposite of משחק; and Ewald's comparison of (Arab.) wâh and akhkh, to be entangled, distorted, lâh, to be veiled, confounds together heterogeneous words. Regarding תלה (from תלה), burning arrows, vid. under Isa. l. 11. Death stands third, not as comprehensive (that which is deadly of every kind), but as a climax (yea, even death itself). The תלה of the principal sentence, correlate to תלה of the contiguous clause, has the Makkeph in our editions; but the laws of the metrical Makkeph require תלה (with Munach), as it occurs e.g. in Cod. 1294. A man who gives vent to his malice against his neighbour, and then says: seest thou not that . . . (סָלַף, like Arab. álá), i.e. I am only jesting, I have only a joke with thee: he exhibits himself as being mad, who in blind rage scatters about him deadly arrows.

There now follow proverbs regarding the nirgân, the slanderer (vid. regarding the formation and import of this word at xvi. 28):

Ver. 20 Where the wood faileth, the fire goeth out;
And where no tale-bearer, discord cometh to silence.

Wood, as material for building or for burning, is called, with the plur. of its product, עֵצִים. Since עֵצִים is the absolute end of a thing, and thus expresses its no longer existing, so it was more appropriate to wood (Fleischer: consumtis lignis) than to the tale-bearer, of whom the proverb says the same thing as xxii. 10 says of the mocker.

Ver. 21 Black coal to burning coal, and wood to fire;
And a contentious man to stir up strife.

The Venet. translates עֵצִים by καρβόν, and גִּחְלִית by ἄνθραξ; the former (from עֵצִים, Arab. fahuma, to be deep black) is coal in itself; the latter (from גִּחַל, jaham, to set on fire, and intrans. to burn), coal in a glowing state (e.g. xxv. 22; Ezek. i. 13). Black coal is suited to glowing coal, to nourish it; and wood to the fire, to sustain it; and a contentious man is suited for and serves this purpose, to kindle up strife. חָרָר signifies to be hot, and the Pilpel חִרְחַר, to heat, i.e. to make hot or hotter. The three—coal, wood, and the contentious man—are alike, in that they are a means to an end.

Ver. 22 The words of the tale-bearer are like dainty morsels;
And they glide down into the innermost parts.

A repetition of xviii. 8.

The proverbs next following treat of a cognate theme, hypocrisy (the art of dissembling), which, under a shining [gleissen] exterior,<sup>1</sup> conceals hatred and destruction:

Ver. 23 Dross of silver spread over an earthen vessel—
Lips glowing with love and a base heart.

Dross of silver is the so-called glätte (French, litharge), a combination of lead and oxygen, which, in the old process of producing silver, was separated (Luther: silberschaum, i.e. the silver litharge; Lat. spuma argenti, having the appearance of foam). It is still used to glaze over potter's ware, which here (Greek, κέραμος) is briefly called הַרֶשׁ for הַרְשִׁי; for the vessel is better in appearance than the mere potsherd. The glossing of the earthenware is called צָפָה עַל-הַרֶשׁ, which is applicable to any kind of covering (צָפָה, R. פָּצַח, to spread or lay out broad) of a less costly material with that which is more precious. 23a contains the figure, and 23b its subscription: שִׁפְתַיִם דְּלִקִּים וְלֵב רָע. Thus, with the taking away of the Makkeph after Codd., to be punctuated: burning lips, and therewith a base heart; burning, that is, with the fire of love (Meîri, אֵשׁ הַחֶשֶׁק), while yet the assurances of friendship, sealed by ardent kisses, serve only to mask a far different heart. The LXX. translate דְּלִקִּים [burning] by λεῖα, and thus have read הַלְקִים [smooth], which Hitzig without reason prefers; burning lips (Jerome, incorrectly: tumentia; Luther, after Deut. xxxii. 33, חמת: Gifftiger mund = a poisonous mouth) are just flattering, and at the same time hypocritical<sup>1</sup> lips. Regarding שִׁפְתַיִם as masc., vid. vol. i. p. 119; לֵב רָע means, at xxv. 20, animus mæstus; here, inimicus. The figure is excellent: one may regard a vessel with the silver gloss as silver, and it is still earthen; and that also which gives forth the silver glance is not silver, but only the refuse of silver. Both are suitable to the comparison: the lips only glitter, the heart is false (Heidenheim).

Vers. 24 and 25 form a tetrastich.

Ver. 24 With his lips the hater dissembleth,

And in his heart he museth deceit.

25 If he maketh his voice agreeable, believe him not,

For seven abominations are in his heart.

<sup>1</sup> Schultens explains the labia flagrantia by volubiliter prompta et disertia. But one sees from the Arab. dhalukā, to be loose, lightly and easily moved (vid. in Fleischer's Beiträgen zur arab. Sprachkunde the explanation of the designation of the liquid expressed with the point of the tongue by dhal-kiyyt, at i. 26, 27; cf. de Sacy's Grammar), and dalk, to draw out (of the sword from its scabbard), to rinse (of water), that the meaning of the Heb. דָּלַק, to burn, from R. דָּלַ, refers to the idea of the flickering, tongue-like movement of the flame.

All the old translators (also the Venet. and Luther) give to נִכְרַח the meaning, to become known; but the Niph. as well as the Hithpa. (vid. at xx. 11; Gen. xlvii. 7) unites with this meaning also the meaning to make oneself known: to make oneself unknown, unrecognisable = (Arab.) tanakkr, e.g. by means of clothing, or by a changed expression of countenance.<sup>1</sup> The contrast demands here this latter signification: labiis suis alium se simulat osor, intus in pectore autem reconditum habet dolum (Fleischer). This rendering of יֵשִׁית מְרֵמָה is more correct than Hitzig's ("in his breast) he prepares treachery;" for שִׁית מְרֵמָה is to be rendered after עֲצוֹת שִׁית, Ps. xiii. 3 (vid. Hupfeld's and also our comm. on this passage), not after Jer. ix. 7; for one says שִׁית מוֹקְשִׁים, to place snares, שִׁית אֲרֵב, to lay an ambush, and the like, but not to place or to lay deceit. If such a dissembler makes his voice agreeable (Piel of הִנֵּן only here, for the form Ps. ix. 14 is, as it is punctuated, Kal), trust not thyself to him (הֶאֱמִין, with ב: to put firm trust in anything, vid. Genesis, p. 312<sup>2</sup>); for seven abominations, i.e. a whole host of abominable thoughts and designs, are in his heart; he is, if one may express it, after Matt. xii. 45, possessed inwardly of seven devils. The LXX. makes a history of 24a: an enemy who, under complaints, makes all possible allowances, but in his heart κταίνεται δόλους. The history is only too true, but it has no place in the text.

Ver. 26 Hatred may conceal itself behind deceit:

Its wickedness shall be exposed in the assembly.

Proverbs which begin with the fut. are rarely to be found, it is true; yet, as we have seen, xii. 26, they are sometimes to be met with in the collection. This is one of the few that are of such a character; for that the LXX. and others translate  $\acute{o}$   $\kappa\rho\acute{\upsilon}\pi\tau\omega\nu$ , which gives for  $\text{עָתָּה}$  a more appropriate reference, does not require us to agree with Hitzig in reading  $\text{הַבְּפָה}$  (xii. 16, 23),—the two clauses rendered fut. stand in the same syntactical relation, as e.g. Job xx. 24. Still less can the rendering of  $\text{בְּמִשְׁאֵן}$  by  $\sigma\upsilon\nu\iota\sigma\tau\eta\sigma\iota$   $\delta\acute{o}\lambda\omicron\nu$ , by the LXX., induce us to read with Hitzig  $\text{הַרְשָׁה}$ , especially since it is doubtful whether the Heb. words which floated before those translators (the LXX.) have been fallen upon.  $\text{מִשְׁאֵן}$  (beginning and ending with a formative syllable) is certainly a word of rare formation, to be compared only to  $\text{מִכְרָרִין}$ , Judg. iii. 23; but since the nearest-lying formation  $\text{מִשְׂפָּה}$  signifies usury (from  $\text{שָׂפָה}$ , to credit) (according to which Symmachus,  $\delta\iota\acute{\alpha}$   $\lambda\acute{\eta}\mu\mu\alpha\tau\alpha$ , to desire gain), it is obvious that the language preferred this double formation for the meaning deceiving, illusion, or, exactly: fraud. It may also be possible to refer it, like  $\text{מִשְׁאֵן}$  (vid. under Ps. xxiii. 18), to  $\text{שׁוּן}$  =  $\text{שָׂפָה}$ , to be confused, waste, as this is done by Parchon, Kimchi (Venet. év éρημιά), Ralbag, and others;  $\text{מִשְׁאֵן}$ , in this sense of deepest concealment, certainly says not a little as the contrast of  $\text{קָהָל}$  [an assembly], but  $\text{יְשִׁימוֹן}$  [a desert] stood ready for the poet to be used in this sense; he might also have expressed himself as Job xxx. 3, xxxviii. 27. The selection of this rare word is better explained if it denotes the superlative of deceit,—a course of conduct maliciously directed toward the deception of a neighbour. That is also the impression which the word has made on Jerome (fraudulenter), the Targ. ( $\text{בְּמִוְרָסְתָּה}$ , in grinding), Luther (to do injury), and according to which it has already been explained, e.g. by C. B. Michaelis and Oetinger (“with dissembled, deceitful nature”). The punctuation of  $\text{תַּכְּסֵה}$ , Codd. and editions present in three different forms. Buxtorf in his Concordance (also Fürst), and the Basel Biblia Rabbinica, have the form  $\text{תַּכְּפֵה}$ ; but this is a mistake. Either  $\text{תַּכְּסֵה}$  (Niph.) or  $\text{תַּכְּפֵה}$  (Hitpa., with the same assimilation of the preformative ת as in  $\text{הַכְּפֵה}$ , Lev. xiii. 55;  $\text{נִכְפֵר}$ , Deut. xxi. 8) is to be read; Kimchi, in his Wörterbuch, gives  $\text{תַּכְּפֵה}$ , which is certainly better supported. A surer contrast of  $\text{בְּמִשְׁאֵן}$  and  $\text{בְּקָהָל}$  remains in our interpretation; only we translate not as Ewald: "hatred seeks to conceal itself by hypocrisy," but: in deceitful work. Also we refer רָעוּת, not to בְּמִשְׁחָן, but to שְׂנְאָה, for hatred is thought of in connection with its personal representative. We see from 26b that hatred is meant which not only broods over evil, but also carries it into execution. Such hatred may conceal itself in cunningly-contrived deception, yet the wickedness of the hater in the end comes out from behind the mask with the light of publicity.

Ver. 27 He who diggeth a pit falleth therein ;

And he that rolleth up a stone, upon himself it rolleth back.

The thought that destruction prepared for others recoils upon its contriver, has found its expression everywhere among men in divers forms of proverbial sayings; in the form which it here receives, 27a has its oldest original in Ps. vii. 16, whence it is repeated here and in Eccles. x. 8, and Sir. xxvii. 26. Regarding בְּרָה, vid. at xvi. 27. הָפָה here has the sense of in eam ipsam; expressed in French, the proverb is: celui qui creuse la fosse, y tombera; in Italian: chi cava la fossa, caderà in essa. The second line of this proverb accords with Ps. vii. 17 (vid. Hupfeld and Riehm on this passage). It is natural to think of the rolling as a rolling upwards; cf. Sir. xxvii. 25, ὁ βάλλον λίθον εἰς ὑψος ἐπὶ κεφαλῆν αὐτοῦ βάλλει, i.e. throws it on his own head. וְיִלְלֵךְ אִתּוֹ is to be syntactically judged of like xviii. 13.

Ver. 28 The lying tongue hateth those whom it bruiseseth ;

And a flattering mouth causeth ruin.

The LXX., Jerome, the Targ., and Syr. render יִשְׂנֵא רְכוּי in the sense of non amat veritatem; they appear by רְכוּי to have thought of the Aram. רְכִּיָּא, that which is pure; and thus they gain nothing else but an undeniable plain thought. Many Jewish interpreters gloss: מוֹכִיחַי, also after the Aram.: רְכִּיָּא = מְרַכְּבִי; but the Aram. רְכִּיָּא does not mean pure in the sense of being right, therefore Elia Wilna understands him who desires to justify himself, and this violent derivation from the Aram. thus does not lead to the end. Luther, translating: "a false tongue hates those who punish it," explains, as also Gesenius, conterentes = castigantes ipsam; but רָיָה signifies, according to the usage of the language before us, "bruised" (vid. Ps. ix. 10), not: bruising; and the thought that the liar hates him who listens to him, leads ad absurdum; but that he does not love him who bruises (punishes) him, is self-evident. Kimchi sees in רָפִי another form of רָפָא; and Meiri, Jona Gerundi in his ethical work (שַׁעֲרֵי הַשׁוּבָה = The gates of Repentance), and others, accordingly render רָפִי in the sense of עָנָו (עָנָוִי): the lying tongue hates—as Löwenstein translates—the humble [pious]; also that for רָפִי, by the omission of ו, רָפִי = וְרָפִי may be read, is supposable; but this does not harmonize with the second half of the proverb, according to which לְשׁוֹן שֶׁקֶר must be the subject, and יִשְׁנֵא רָפִי must express some kind of evil which proceeds from such a tongue. Ewald: “the lying tongue hates its master (אֲרֹנִי),” but that is not in accordance with the Heb. style; the word in that case should have been בְּעֵלָיו. Hitzig countenances this אֲרֹנִי, with the remark that the tongue is here personified; but personified, the tongue certainly means him who has it (Ps. cxx. 3). Böttcher’s conjecture יִשְׁנֵא רָפִי, “confounds their talk,” is certainly a curiosity. Spoken of the sea, those words would mean, “it changes its surge.” But is it then at all necessary to uncover first the meaning of 28a? Rashi, Arama, and others refer רָפִי to רָפִים = נְרַפְאִים (מְרַפִּים). Thus also perhaps the Venet., which translates τὸς ἐπιτριμμοὺς (not: ἐπιτριμμένους) αὐτῆς. C. B. Michaelis: Lingua falsitatis odio habet contritos suos, h. e. eos quos falsitate ac mendacio lædit contritosque facit. Hitzig objects that it is more correct to say: conterit perosos sibi. And certainly this lay nearer, on which account Fleischer remarks: in 28a there is to be supposed a poetic transposition of the ideas (Hypallage): homo qui lingua ad calumnias abutitur conterit eos quos odit. The poet makes יִשְׁנֵא the main conception, because it does not come to him so readily to say that the lying tongue bruises those against whom it is directed, as that it is hatred, which is active in this. To say this was by no means superfluous. There are men who find pleasure in repeating and magnifying scandalously that which is depreciatory and disadvantageous to their neighbour unsubstantiated, without being at all conscious of any particular ill-will or personal enmity against him; but this proverb says that such untruthful tongue-thrashing proceeds always from a transgression of the commandment, “Thou shalt not hate thy brother,” Lev. xix. 17, and not merely from the want of love, but from a state of mind which is the direct opposite of love (vid. x. 18). Ewald finds it incongruous that 28a speaks of that which others have to suffer from the lying tongue, whereas the whole connection of this proverb requires that the tongue should here be regarded as bringing ruin upon its owner himself. But of the destruction which the wicked tongue prepares for others many proverbs also speak, e.g. xii. 13, cf. xvii. 4, לִשׁוֹן הָיִת; and 28b does not mention that the smooth tongue (written נִפְּה־הֶלֶק with Makkeph) brings injury upon itself (an idea which must be otherwise expressed; cf. xiv. 32), but that it brings injury and ruin on those who have pleasure in its flatteries (הִלְקוֹת, Ps. xii. 3; Isa. xxx. 10), and are befooled thereby: os blandiloquum (blanditiis dolum tegens) ad casum impellit, sc. alios (Fleischer).

xxvii. In the group 1-6 of this chapter every two proverbs form a pair. The first pair is directed against unseemly boasting:

Ver. 1 Boast not thyself of to-morrow,
For thou knowest not what a day bringeth forth.

The ב of יוֹם is like, e.g. that in xxv. 14, the ב of the ground of boasting. One boasts of to-morrow when he boasts of that which he will then do and experience. This boasting is foolish and presumptuous (Luke xii. 20), for the future is God's; not a moment of the future is in our own power, we know not what a day, this present day or to-morrow (Jas. iv. 13), will bring forth, i.e. (cf. Zeph. ii. 2) will disclose, and cannot therefore order anything beforehand regarding it. Instead of לֹא-תִדְרֹע (with Kametz and Mugrash), לֹא-תִדְרֹע (thus e.g. the Cod. Jaman) is to be written; the Masora knows nothing of that pausal form. And instead of מַה-יִלְךָ יוֹם, we write מָה יִלְךָ יוֹם with Zinnorith. יִלְךָ before יוֹם has the tone thrown back on the penult., and consequently a shortened ult.; the Masora reckons this word among the twenty-five words with only one Tsere.

Ver. 2 Let another praise thee, and not thine own mouth;
A stranger, and not thine own lips.

The negative לֹא is with פִּיךָ, as in (Arab.) ghyra fyk, bound into one compact idea: that which is not thine own mouth (Fleischer), "not thine own lips," on the other hand, is not to be interpreted as corresponding to it, like אֶל-מִוֶּת, xii. 28; since after the prohibitive אַל, יְהַלְלִיךָ [praise thee] easily supplies itself. רַי is properly the stranger, as having come from a distance, and נִכְרִי he who comes from an unknown country, and is himself unknown (vid. under xxvi. 24); the idea of both words, however, passes from advena and alienigena to alius. There is certainly in rare cases a praising of oneself, which is authorized because it is demanded (2 Cor. xi. 18), which, because it is offered strongly against one's will, will be measured by truth (x. 13); but in general it is improper to applaud oneself, because it is a vain looking at oneself in a glass; it is indecent, because it places others in the shade; imprudent, because it is of no use to us, but only injures, for propria laus sordet, and as Stobäus says, οὐδὲν οὕτως ἄκουσμα φορτικὸν ὡς ὁ καθ' αὐτοῦ ἔπαινος. Compare the German proverb, "Eigenlob stinkt, Freundes Lob linkt, fremdes Lob klinget" [=self-praise stinks, a friend's praise is lame, a stranger's praise sounds].

The second pair of proverbs designates two kinds of violent passion as unbearable :

Ver. 3 The heaviness of a stone, the weight of sand—
A fool's wrath is heavier than both.

We do not translate : Gravis est petra et onerosa arena, so that the substantives stand for strengthening the idea, instead of the corresponding adjective (Fleischer, as the LXX., Jerome, Syr., Targum); the two pairs of words stand, as 4a, in genit. relation (cf. on the contrary, xxxi. 30), and it is as if the poet said : represent to thyself the heaviness of a stone and the weight of sand, and thou shalt find that the wrath of a fool compared thereto is still heavier, viz. for him who has to bear it; thus heavier, not for the fool himself (Hitzig, Zöckler, Dächsel), but for others against whom his anger goes forth. A Jewish proverb (vid. Tendlau, No. 901) says, that one knows a man by his wine-glass (כּוּס), his purse (בֵּיס), and his anger (בַּעַס), viz. how he deports himself in the tumult; and another says that one reads what is in a man בּוֹיִם בַּעַסוֹ, when he is in an ill-humour. Thus also בַּעַס is to be here understood : the fool in a state of angry, wrathful excitement is so far not master of himself that the worst is to be feared; he sulks and shows hatred, and rages without being appeased; no one can calculate what he may attempt, his behaviour is unendurable. Sand, חול,<sup>1</sup> as it appears, as to the number of its grains innumerable, so as to its mass (in weight) immeasurable, Job vi. 3; Sir. xxii. 13. לַטֵּל the Venet. translates, with strict regard to the etymology, by ἄρμα.

Ver. 4 The madness of anger, and the overflowing of wrath—
And before jealousy who keeps his place!

Here also the two pairs of words 4a stand in connection; אֲבִירִית (for which the Cod. Jaman has incorrectly אֲבִירִית) is the connecting form; vid. regarding אֲבִירִי, v. 9. Let one imagine the blind, relentless rage of extreme excitement and irritation, a boiling over of anger like a water-flood, which bears everything down along with it—these paroxysms of wrath do not usually continue long, and it is possible to appease them; but jealousy is a passion that not only rages, but reckons calmly; it incessantly ferments through the mind, and when it breaks forth, he perishes irretrievably who is its object. Fleischer generalizes this idea: “enmity proceeding from hatred, envy, or jealousy, it is difficult or altogether impossible to withstand, since it puts into operation all means, both secretly and openly, to injure the enemy.” But after vi. 34 f., cf. Song viii. 8, there is particularly meant the passion of scorned, mortified, deceived love, viz. in the relation of husband and wife.

The third pair of proverbs passes over from this special love between husband and wife to that subsisting between friends:

Ver. 5 Better is open accusation
Than secret love.

An integral distich; מִתְּחִילָה has Munach, and instead of the second Metheg Tarcha, after Thorath Emeth, p. 11. Zöckler, with Hitzig, incorrectly: better than love which, from false indulgence, keeps concealed from his neighbour his faults, when he ought to tell him of them. That would require the phrase אֵהָבָה מִסְתַּתֵּר, not מִסְתַּתֵּר. Dächsel, in order to accommodate the text to this meaning, remarks: concealed censure is concealed love; but it is much rather the neglected duty of love,—love without mutual discipline is weak, faint-hearted, and, if it is not too blind to remark in a friend what is worthy of blame, is altogether too forbearing, and essentially without conscience; but it is not "hidden and concealed love." The meaning of the proverb is different: it is better to be courageously and sternly corrected—on account of some fault committed—by any one, whether he be a foe or a friend, than to be the object of a love which may exist indeed in the heart, but which fails to make itself manifest in outward act. There are men who continually assure us of the reality and depth of their friendship; but when it is necessary for them to prove their love to be self-denying and generous, they are like a torrent which is dry when one expects to drink water from it (Job vi. 15). Such "secret" love, or, since the word is not נִסְתָּרָה, but מְסֻתָּרָה, love confined to the heart alone, is like a fire which, when it burns secretly, neither lightens nor warms; and before such a friend, any one who frankly and freely tells the truth has by far the preference, for although he may pain us, yet he does us good; while the former deceives us, for he leaves us in the lurch when it is necessary to love us, not merely in word and with the tongue, but in deed and in truth (1 John iii. 18). Rightly Fleischer: Præstat correptio aperta amicitia tectæ, i.e. nulla re probatæ.

Ver. 6 Faithful are the wounds of a friend,

And overloaded [plentiful] the kisses of an enemy.

The contrast to נִאֲמָנִים, true, i.e. honourable and good (with the transference of the character of the person to his act), would be fraudulenta (Jerome), or נִהַפְכוֹת, i.e. false (Ralbag); Ewald seeks this idea from עָתַר, to stumble, make a false step;<sup>1</sup> Hitzig, from עָתַר = (Arab.) dadhr, whence dâdhir, perfidus, to gain from; but (1) the comparison does not lie near, since usually the Arab. عَدُو corresponds to the Heb. שׂ, and the Arab. ذ to the Heb. ז; (2) the Heb. עָתַר has already three meanings, and it is not advisable to load it with yet another meaning assumed for this passage, and elsewhere not found. The three meanings are the following: (a) to smoke, Aram. עֲטַר, whence  $\text{עָרַן}$ , vapour, Ezek. viii. 11, according to which the Venet., with Kimchi's and Parchon's Lex., translates: the kisses of an enemy  $\text{συνωμίχλωνται}$ , i.e. are fog; (b) to sacrifice, to worship, Arab. atar; according to which Aquila:  $\text{ἰκετικά}$  (as, with Grabe, it is probably to be read for  $\text{ἐκούσια}$  of the LXX.); and agreeably to the Niph., but too artificially, Arama: obtained by entreaties = constrained; (c) to heap up, whence Hiph.  $\text{הִעָרַר}$ , Ezek. xxxv. 13, cf. Jer. xxxiii. 6, according to which Rashi, Meiri, Gesenius, Fleischer, Bertheau, and most explain, cogn. with  $\text{עָרַר}$ , whose Aram. form is  $\text{עָרַר}$ , for  $\text{עָרַר}$  is properly a heap of goods or treasures.<sup>1</sup> This third meaning gives to the kisses of an enemy a natural adjective: they are too abundant, so much the more plentiful to veil over the hatred, like the kisses by means of which Judas betrayed his Lord, not merely denoted by  $\text{φιλεῖν}$ , but by  $\text{καταφιλεῖν}$ , Matt. xxvi. 49. This, then, is the contrast, that the strokes inflicted by one who truly loves us, although they tear into our flesh ( $\text{פָּצַע}$ , from  $\text{פָּצַע}$ , to split, to tear open), yet are faithful (cf. Ps. cxli. 5); on the contrary, the enemy covers over with kisses him to whom he wishes all evil. Thus also  $\text{נִעְרַרְתָּ}$  forms an indirect contrast to  $\text{נִאֲמָנִים}$ .

In 7-10 there is also visible a weaving of the external with the internal. First, there are two proverbs, in each of which there is repeated a word terminating with  $\text{נ}$ .

Ver. 7 A satisfied soul treadeth honeycomb under foot;

And a hungry soul—everything bitter is (to it) sweet.

It is unnecessary to read  $\text{תְּבַחֵנּוּ}$  (Hitzig);  $\text{תְּבַחֵנּוּ}$  is stronger; "to tread with the feet" is the extreme degree of scornful despite. That satiety and hunger are applicable to the soul, vid. under x. 3. In 7b, the adverb  $\text{לֵבָרֵךְ}$ , relative to the nomin. absol., like xxviii. 7, but not xiii. 18. "Hunger is the best cook," according to a German proverb; the Hebrew proverb is so formed that it is easily transferred to the sphere of the soul. Let the man whom God has richly satisfied with good things guard himself against ingratitude towards the Giver, and against an undervaluing of the gifts received; and if they are spiritual blessings, let him guard himself against self-satisfaction and self-contentment, which is, in truth, the worst poverty, Rev. iii. 17; for life without God is a constant hunger and thirst. There is in worldly things, even the most pleasing, a dissatisfaction felt, and a dissatisfaction awakening disgust; and in spiritual life, a satiety which supposes itself to be full of life, but which is nothing else than the decay of life, than the changing of life into death.

Ver. 8 As a bird that wandereth from her nest,
So is a man that wandereth from his home.

It is not a flying out that is meant, from which at any moment a return is possible, but an unwilling taking to flight (LXX. 8b: ὅταν ἀποξενωθῆ; Venet.: πλανούμενον . . . πλανούμενος); for עוף נורר, Isa. xvi. 2, cf. Jer. iv. 25, birds that have been frightened; and נרר, xxi. 15 f., designates the fugitive; cf. נע ונר, Gen. iv. 14, and above, xxvi. 2, where נר designates aimless roving about. Otherwise Fleischer: "warning against unnecessary roaming about, in journeyings and wanderings far from home: as a bird far from its nest is easily wounded, caught, or killed, so, on such excursions, one easily comes to injury and want. One may think of a journey in the East. The Arabs say, in one of their proverbs: âlsafar ka't at man âlklyym (= journeying is a part of the pains of hell)." But נר here is not to be understood in the sense of a libere vagari. Rightly C. B. Michaelis: qui vagatur extorris et exul a loco suo sc. natali vel habitationis ordinariæ. This proverb mediately recommends the love of one's fatherland, i.e. "love to the land in which our father has his home; on which our paternal mansion stands; in which we have spent the years of our childhood, so significant a part of one's whole life; from which we have derived our bodily and intellectual nourishment; and in which home we recognise bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh."<sup>1</sup> But next it says, that to be in a strange land must be an unhappiness, because a man never feels better than at home, as the bird in its nest. We say: Heimat [home]—this beautiful word becomes the German language, which has also coined the expressive idea of Heimweh [longing for home]; the

Heb. uses, to express the idea of home, the word מְקוֹמִי; and of fatherland, the word אֶרְצִי or אֶדְמוֹתִי. The Heb. עֲבוֹת corresponds<sup>1</sup> to the German Elend, but = Ellend, elilenti, of another land, strange.

The two following proverbs have in common the catchword עַל, and treat of the value of friendship :—

Ver. 9 Oil and frankincense rejoice the heart ;

And the sweet discourse of a friend from a counselling of soul.

Regarding the perfuming with dry aromas, and sprinkling with liquid aromas, as a mark of honour towards guests, and as a

<sup>1</sup> The translators transfer to this place a note from vol. ii. p. 191 f. of the author's larger Comm. u. den Psalter, to which Delitzsch refers the reader :—"The modern High German adj. elend, middle High German ellende, old High German alilandi, elilendi, or elilenti, is composed of ali and land. The adj. ali occurs only in old High German in composition. In the Gothic it is found as an independent adj., in the sense of alius and ἄλλος (vid. Ulfilas, Gal. v. 10). The primary meaning of elilenti is consequently : of another country, foreign. In glosses and translations it is rendered by the Lat. words peregrinus, exul, advena, also captivus. In these meanings it occurs very frequently. In the old High German translation of Ammonius, Diatessaron, sive Harmoniæ in quatuor Evangelica, the word proselytism, occurring in Matt. xxiii. 15, is rendered by elilantan. To the adj. the old High German subst. corresponds. This has the meaning exilium, transmigration, captivitas. The connection in elilenti or elilentes, used adverbially, is rendered by the Lat. peregre. In the middle High German, however, the proper signification of both words greatly predominates. But as, in the old High German, the idea of miser is often at the same time comprehended in the proper signification : he who is miserable through banishment, imprisonment, or through sojourning in a strange land ; thus, in several places of the middle High German, this derived idea begins to separate itself from the fundamental conception, so that ellende comes in general to be called miser. In the new High German this derived conception is almost alone maintained. Yet here also, in certain connections, there are found traces of the original idea, e.g. in's Elend schicken, for to banish. Very early also the word came to be used, in a spiritual sense, to denote our present abode, in contrast to paradise or the heavenly kingdom. . . . Thus, e.g. in one of Luther's hymns, when we pray to the Holy Ghost :

" Das er vns behüte, an vnserm ende,
Wenn wir heim farn aus diesem elende."

[That He guard us to our end
When we go home from this world.]

—RUD. VON RAUMER.

means of promoting joyful social fellowship, vid. at vii. 16 f., xxi. 17. The pred. שִׁמְחֵה־יֵשׁוּבֵי comprehends frankincense or oil as the two sides of one and the same thing; the LXX. introduces, from Ps. civ. 15, also wine. It also reads ומתק רעה as one word, וּמִתְקַרְעָה: καταρρήγνυται δὲ ὑπὸ συμπτωμάτων ψυχῆ, which Hitzig regards as original; for he translates, understanding מַעֲצָה after Ps. xiii. 3, "but the soul is torn by cares." But why מתקרעה, this Hithpa. without example, for וְנִקְרְעָה? and now connected with מִן in the sense of ὑπό! And what does one gain by this Alexandrian wisdom [of the LXX.]—a contrast to 9a which is altogether incongruous? Döderlein's rendering accords far better with 9a: "but the sweetness of a friend surpasses fragrant wood." But although this rendering of the word [עֲצֵה] by "fragrant wood" is found in Gesen. Lex., from one edition to another, yet it must be rejected; for the word signifies wood as the contents of trees, the word for aromatic wood must be עֵצִים; and if the poet had not intentionally aimed at dubiety, he ought to have written עֲצֵי בָשָׂם, since נֶפֶשׁ, with the exception of Isa. iii. 20, where it is beyond doubt, nowhere means fragrance. If we read עֲצָה and נֶפֶשׁ together, then we may suppose that the latter designates the soul, as at Ps. xiii. 3; and the former, counsel (from the verb עָצָה). But to what does the suffix of רֵעֵהי refer? One may almost conjecture that the words originally were נֶפֶשׁ מַעֲצָה רֵעֵהי, and the sweetness of the soul (i.e. a sweet relish for it, cf. ver. 7 and xvi. 24) consists in the counsel of a friend, according to which Jerome translates: et bonis amici consiliis anima dulcoratur. By this transposition רֵעֵהי refers back to נֶפֶשׁ; for if nephesh denote a person or a living being, it can be construed ad sensum as masc., e.g. Num. xxxi. 28. But the words may remain in the order in which they are transmitted to us. It is possible that רֵעֵהי is (Böttcher refers to Job xii. 4) of the same meaning as הֵרֵעַ (the friend of one = the friend), as כֹּלֵי denotes directly the whole; הַצֵּי, the half; עֵתוֹ, the right time. Recognising this, Cocceius, Umbreit, Stier, and Zöckler explain: sweetness, i.e. the sweet encouragement (מִתְקָה, in the sense of "sweetness (grace) of the lips," xvi. 21) of a friend, is better than one's own counsel, than prudence seeking to help oneself, and trusting merely to one's own resources; thus also Rashi: better than what one's own soul advises him. But (1) נפש cannot mean one's own person (oneself) in contrast to another person; and (2) this does not supply a correct antithesis to 9a. Thus מן will not express the preference, but the origin. Accordingly Ewald, e.g., explains: the sweetness of a friend whom one has proceedeth from the counsel of soul, i.e. from such counsel as is drawn from a deep, full soul. But no proof can be brought from the usage of the language that עצה-נפש can be so meant; these words, after the analogy of רעה נפש, xix. 2, mean ability to give counsel as a quality of the soul (viii. 14; Job xii. 13), i.e. its ability to advise. Accordingly, with Bertheau, we explain ישמח-לב as the common predicate for 9a and 9b: ointment and perfume rejoice the heart, and (the Syr., Targ., well: even so) the sweet exhortation of a friend, from a soul capable of rendering counsel; also, this and this, more than that fragrance. This proverb is formed in the same way as xxvi. 9, 14. In this explanation רעה is well referred back to לב: and (more than) the sweet advice of his friend. But not so that רעה is equivalent to רע הלב, for one does not thus speak; but the construction is as when we say, in the German language: Nichts thut einem Herzen woler als wenn sein Freund es mitfühlend tröstet [nothing does more good to a heart than when a friend sympathizingly comforts it]; or: Zage nicht, tief betrübtes Herz! Dein Freund lebt und wird dir bald sich zeigen [Be not dismayed, deeply-troubled heart! thy friend lives, and will soon show himself to thee]. In such cases the word "Herz" [heart] does not designate a distinct part of the person, but, synecdochically, it denotes the whole person.

Ver. 10. Another proverb, consisting of three lines, in commendation of friendship:

Thine own friend and the friend of thy father forsake not,
 And into thy brother's house go not in the day of thy misfortune—
 Better is a near neighbour than a far-off brother.

In our editions רעה is incorrectly pointed with Pasek after it, so that the accent is Asla Legarmeh; the Pasek is, after the example of older editions, with Norzi, to be cancelled, so that only the conjunctive Asla remains; "thine own and the friend of thy father" denotes the family friend, like some family heirloom, descending from father to son. Such an old tried friend one must certainly not give up. The Keri changes the second ורעה into ורע, but ורעה (which, after the Masora in st. constr., retains its segol, Ewald, § 211e) is also admissible, for a form of comparison (Hitzig) this ורעה is not, but the fuller form of the abbreviated ורע, from ורעה, to take care of, to tend, to pasture—an infinitive formation (= ורעי) like the cogn. راع a participial. Such a proved friend one ought certainly not to give up, and in the time of heavy trial (vid. regarding ורע, i. 26) one should go to him and not to a brother's house—it is by this supposed that, as xviii. 24 says, there is a degree of friendship (cf. xvii. 17) which in regard to attachment stands above that of mere fraternal relationship, and it is true; blood-relationship, viewed in itself, stands as a relationship of affection on natural grounds below friendship, which is a relationship of life on moral grounds. But does blood-relationship exclude friendship of soul? cannot my brother be at the same time my heart-friend? and is not friendship all the firmer when it has at the same time its roots in the spirit and in natural grounds? The poet seems to have said this, for in 10c, probably a popular saying (cf. "Besser Nachbar an der Wand als Bruder über Land" [Better a neighbour by one's side than a brother abroad]), he gives to his advice a foundation, and at the same time a limitation which modifies its ruggedness. But Dächsel places (like Schultens) in קרוב and רחוק meanings which the words do not contain, for he interprets them of inward nearness and remoteness; and Zöckler reads between the lines, for he remarks, a "near neighbour" is one who is near to the oppressed to counsel and help them, and a "distant brother" is one who with an unamiable disposition remains far from the oppressed. The state of the matter is simple. If one has a tried friend in neighbourly nearness, so in the time of distress, when he needs consolation and help, he must go to this friend, and not first to the house of a brother dwelling at a distance, for the former certainly does for us what the latter probably may and probably may not do for us.

Ver. 11. This proverb has, in common with the preceding tristich, the form of an address:

Become wise, my son, and make my heart rejoice,
That I may give an answer to my accusers.

Better than "be wise" (Luther), we translate "become wise" (LXX. σοφὸς γίνου); for he who is addressed might indeed be wise, though not at present so, so that his father is made to listen to such deeply wounding words as these, "Cursed be he who begat, and who educated this man" (Malbim). The cohortative clause 11*b* (cf. Ps. cxix. 42) has the force of a clause with a purpose (Ges. § cxxviii. 1): ut habeam quod iis qui me conviciantur regerere possim; it does not occur anywhere in the Hezekiah collection except here.

Ver. 12. ערום appears to lean on חכם.

The prudent man seeth the misfortune, hideth himself;
The simple pass on, suffer injury.

= xxii. 3, where וַעֲנִישִׁי for וְנִסְתָּר, וְנִסְתָּר for וְנִסְתָּר, and וְנִסְתָּר for וְנִסְתָּר; the three asyndeta make the proverb clumsy, as if it counted out its seven words separately to the hearer. Ewald, § 349*a*, calls it a "Steinschrift" [an inscription on a stone]. The perfects united in pairs with, and yet more without, Vav, express the coincidence<sup>1</sup> as to time.

Ver. 13. ערום alliterates with ערב.

Take from him the garment, for he hath become surety for another,
And for the sake of a strange matter put him under bonds.

=: xx. 16, vid. there. וְנִכְרְיָהּ we interpret neut. (LXX. τὰ ἀλλότρια; Jerome, pro alienis), although certainly the case occurs that one becomes surety for a strange woman (Aquila, Theodotion, περὶ ξένης), by whose enticements and flatteries he is taken, and who afterwards leaves him in the lurch with the debts for which he had become security, to show her costly favour to another.

Ver. 14. This proverb, passing over the three immediately intervening, connects itself with vers. 9 and 10. It is directed against cringing, noisy complimenting:

He who blesseth his neighbour with a loud voice, rising early in the morning,

It is reckoned as a curse to him.

The first line is intentionally very heavy, in order to portray the empressement of the maker of compliments: he calls out to another his good wishes with a loud voice, so as to make the impression of deep veneration, of deeply felt thankfulness, but in reality to gain favour thereby, and to commend himself to greater acts of kindness; he sets himself to meet him, having risen up (הַשְּׁמֵימִים, adverbial inf. abs.; cf. Jer. xlv. 4 with xxv. 4) early in the morning, to offer his captatio benevolentiae as speedily as possible; but this salutation of good wishes, the affected zeal in presenting which is a sign of a selfish, calculating, servile soul, is reckoned to him as קִלְקִילָה, viz. before God and every one who can judge correctly of human nature, also before him who is complimented in so ostentatious and troublesome a manner, the true design of which is thus seen. Others understand the proverb after the example of Berachoth 14a, that one ought to salute no one till he has said his morning's prayer, because honour is due before all to God (the Book of Wisdom, x. 28); and others after Erachin 16a, according to which one is meant who was invited as a guest of a generous lord, and was liberally entertained, and who now on the public streets blesses him, i.e. praises him for his nobility of mind—such blessing is a curse to him whom it concerns, because this trumpeting of his praise brings upon him a troublesome, importunate crowd. But plainly the particularity of בְּקוֹל גָּדוֹל lays the chief emphasis on the servility manifested; and one calls to mind the case of the clients besieging the doors of their patrons, those clientes matutini, each of whom sought to be the first in the salutatio of his distinguished wealthy patron.

Ver. 15. This proverb passes from the complimentarius to its opposite, a shrewish wife:

A continual dropping in a rainy day
And a contentious woman are alike.

Thus we have already translated (vol. i. p. 9), where, when treating of the manifold forms of parabolic proverbs, we began with this least poetic, but at the same time remarked that vers. 15 and 16 are connected, forming a tetrastich, which is certainly the case according to the text here lying before us. In verse 15, xix. 13<sup>b</sup> is expanded into a distich, and made a complete verse. Regarding טוֹרֵר רָגַלָּהּ, vid. the explanation there given. The noun טַנְרִיר, which the Syr. translates by ܛܢܪܝܪ, but the Targumist retains, because it is in common use in the post.-bibl. Heb. (Bereschith rabba, c. 1) and the Jewish Aramaic, signifies violent rain, after the Jewish interpreters, because then the people remain shut up in their houses; more correctly, perhaps, from the unbroken continuousness and thickness (cf. the Arab. insajara, to go behind each other in close column) with which the rain pours down. Regarding מְדוּנִים, Keri מְדוּנִים, vid. vi. 14; the genit. connection of מְדוּנֵי מֵ אֵשׁתָּהּ we had already at xxi. 9. The form נִשְׁתָּהּ is doubtful. If accented, with Löwenstein and others, as Mibra, then we would have a Nithkatal before us, as at Num. i. 47, or a Hothkatal—a passive form of the Kal, the existence of which, however, is not fully established. Rather this word is to be regarded as נִשְׁתָּהּ (Nithpa. as Dent. xxi. 8; Ezek. xxiii. 48) without the dagesh, and lengthened; the form of the word נִשְׁתָּהּ, as found in the Cod. Jaman., aims at this. But the form נִשְׁתָּהּ is better established, e.g. by Cod. 1294, as Milel. Kimchi, Michlol 131a (cf. Ewald, § 132c), regards it as a form without the dagesh, made up of the Niph. and Hithpa., leaving the penultima toning unexplained. Bertheau regards it as a voluntative: let us compare (as נִשְׁתָּהּ, Isa. xli. 23); but as he himself says, the reflexive form does not accord with this sense. Hitzig has adopted the right explanation (cf. Olshausen, § 275, and Böttcher, § 1072, who, however, registers it at random as an Ephraimitism). נִשְׁתָּהּ is a Niph. with a transposition of consonants for נִשְׁתָּהּ, since נִשְׁתָּהּ passes over into נִשְׁתָּהּ. Such is now the genus in the arrangement; the Mibra form would be as masc. syntactically inaccurate. “The finite following the subjects is regulated by the gender and number of that which is next before it, as at 2 Sam. iii. 22, xx. 20; Ps. lv. 6; Job xix. 15" (Hitzig).

Ver. 16. This verse stands in close connection with the preceding, for it speaks of the contentious woman:

He that restraineth her restraineth the wind,
And oil meeteth his right hand.

The connection of the plur. subject  $\text{צָפְנֶיהָ}$  = quicumque eam colibet, with a sing. predicate, is not to be disputed (vid. iii. 18 and xxviii. 16, Chethâb); but can  $\text{צָפַן}$  gain from the meaning of preserving, laying up, also the meanings of keeping, of confining, and shutting up?—for these meanings we have  $\text{כָּלָא}$  and  $\text{עָצַר}$  (cf.  $\text{צָרַר}$ , xxx. 4). In 16*b* it lies nearer to see in  $\text{יְמִינוֹ}$  the object of the clause (oil meeteth his right hand) than the subject (his right hand meeteth oil), for the gender of  $\text{יָמִין}$  directs to  $\text{יָ}$  (e.g. Ezek. xv. 6*b*; cf. 6*a*, where  $\text{נִאֲדָרִי}$  is as to gender indifferent): it is fem., while on the contrary  $\text{שָׁמֶן}$  is generally masc. (cf. Song i. 3). There is no reason for regarding  $\text{יְמִינוֹ}$  as an adverbial accus. (he meets oil with his right hand), or, with Hitzig, as a second subject (he meets oil, his right hand); the latter, in the order of the words lying before us, is not at all possible. We suppose that  $\text{יָקְרָא}$ , as at Gen. xlix. 1, is equivalent to  $\text{יָקָרָה}$  (Ewald, § 116*c*), for the explanation oleum dexteræ ejus præconem agit (Cocceius, Schultens) does not explain, but only darkens; and oleum dexterâ suâ legit, i.e. colligit (Fleischer), is based on an untenable use of the word. As one may say of person to person,  $\text{קָרָה}$ , occurrit tibi, Num. xxv. 18, so also  $\text{יָקְרָא}$  ( $\text{יָקָרָה}$ ), of a thing that meets a man or one of his members; and if we compare  $\text{לְקָרְאָה}$  and  $\text{קָרִי}$ , then for 16*b* the meaning is possible: oil meets his right hand; the quarrelsome woman is like oil that cannot be held in the hand, which struggles against that which holds it, for it always glides out of the hand. Thus also Luther: "and seeks to hold oil with his hand," as if he read  $\text{יָקְמָן}$ . In fact, this word was more commonly used as the expression of untenableness than the colourless and singular word  $\text{יָקָרָא}$ , which, besides, is so ambiguous, that none of the old translators has thought on any other  $\text{קָרָא}$  than that which signifies "to call," "to name." The Jewish interpreters also adhere to this nearest lying  $\text{קָרָא}$ , and, moreover, explain, as the Syr., Targ., Aquila, Symmachus, Jerome, and the Venet.,  $\text{שָׁמֶן יְמִינוֹ}$ , according to the accentuation as genit. connected, e.g. Rashi: he calls for oil to his right hand, viz. as the means of purification from leprosy, Lev. viii. 14 [xiv. 16]; and Aben Ezra: even when he calls for oil to his right hand, i.e. would move them to silence with the precious anointing oil. Perhaps ver. 16 was originally an independent proverb as follows:

צפני הון צפן רוח
ושמן ימינו יקרא

He who layeth up riches in store layeth up the wind,
And he nameth them the fat of his right hand;

i.e., he sees in them that which makes his right hand fat and strong (שמן), as at Ps. cix. 24, opp. Zech. xi. 17; cf. במשמןי, Isa. x. 16, and regarding Ἑσμούν, the Phœnician god of health, at Isa. lix. 10), and yet it is only the wind, i.e. something that is worthless and transient, which he stored up (צפן, as at xiii. 22, and in מצפני, Obad. ver. 6). הון is used as it frequently occurs in the Book of Proverbs, e.g. xi. 4, and the whole proverb expresses by another figure the same as xviii. 11. The fact that צפן (רוח), xxv. 23, and as a contrast thereto in the compass ימן (the south), hovered before the poet, may not have been without its influence on the choice of the words and expression here.

Ver. 17. This proverb expresses the influence arising from the intercourse of man with man:

Iron is sharpened by iron,
And a man may sharpen the appearance of another.

When the Masora reads יחד, Ewald remarks, it interprets the word as denoting "at the same time," and the further meaning of the proverb must then accord therewith. Accordingly he translates: "iron together with iron! and one together with the face of another!" But then the prep. ב or עם is wanting after the second יחד—for יחד is, in spite of Ewald, § 217*h*, never a prep.—and the "face," 17*b*, would be a perplexing superfluity. Hitzig already replies, but without doing homage to the traditional text-punctuation, that such a violence to the use of language, and such a darkening of the thought, is not at all to be accepted. He suggests four ways of interpreting יחד: (1) the adverb יחד, united, properly (taken accusat.) union; (2) יחד, Ps. lxxxvi. 11, imper. of the Piel יחד, unite; (3) יחד, Job iii. 6, jussive of the Kal הָרָה, gaudeat; and (4) as Kinchi, in Michlol 126a, jussive of the Kal הָרָה (= הָרַד) acuere, after the form הָרַח, Mic. iv. 11. וַיְהַרַץ, Gen. xxxii. 8, etc. in p. יָהַר, after the form הָרַח, Job xxiii. 9. וַיְהַלֵּל, 2 Kings i. 2 (= וַיְהַלֵּל, 2 Chron. xvi. 12). If we take יָהַר with בְּרִיָּקָה, then it is à priori to be supposed that in יָהַר the idea of sharpening lies; in the Arab. iron is simply called hadyda = הָרַדִּי, that which is sharpened, sharp; and a current Arab. proverb says: alhadyd balhadyd yuflah = ferrum ferro diffinditur (vid. Freytag under the word falah). But is the traditional text-punctuation thus understood to be rightly maintained? It may be easily changed in conformity with the meaning, but not so that with Böttcher we read יָהַר and יָהַר, the fut. Kal of הָרַד: "iron sharpeneth itself on iron, and a man sharpeneth himself over against his neighbour"—for פָּנִי after a verb to be understood actively, has to be regarded as the object—but since יָהַר is changed into יָהַר (fut. Hiph. of הָרַד), and יָהַר into יָהַר or יָהַר (fut. Hiph. of הָרַד, after the form הָרַח, incipiam, Deut. ii. 25, or אָהַל, profanabo, Ezek. xxxix. 7; Num. xxx. 3). The passive rendering of the idea 17a and the active of 17b thus more distinctly appear, and the unsuitable jussive forms are set aside: ferrum ferro exacuitur, et homo exacuit faciem amici sui (Jerome, Targ., the Venet.). But that is not necessary. As יָעַל may be the fut. of the Hiph. (he brought up) as well as of the Kal (he went up), so יָהַר may be regarded as fut. Kal, and יָהַר as fut. Hiph. Fleischer prefers to render יָהַר also as Hiph.: aciem exhibet, like יָעֲשִׂיר, divitias acquirit, and the like; but the jussive is not favourable to this supposition of an intransitive (inwardly transitive) Hiph. It may indeed be said that the two jussives appear to be used, according to poetic licence, with the force of indicatives (cf. under xii. 26), but the repetition opposes it. Thus we explain: iron is sharpened [gewetzt, Luther uses this appropriate word] by iron (בּ of the means, not of the object, which was rather to be expected in 17b after xx. 30), and a man whets פָּנִי, the appearance, the deportment, the nature, and manner of the conduct of his neighbour. The proverb requires that the intercourse of man with man operate in the way of sharpening the manner and forming the habits and character; that one help another to culture and polish of manner, rub off his ruggedness, round his corners, as one has to make use of iron when he sharpens iron and seeks to make it bright. The jussive form is the oratorical form of the expression of that which is done, but also of that which is to be done.

The following three proverbs are connected with 17 in their similarity of form :—

Ver. 18 Whosoever watcheth the fig-tree will enjoy its fruit ;
And he that hath regard to his master attaineth to honour.

The first member is, as in ver. 17, only the means of contemplating the second ; as faithful care of the tree has fruit for a reward, so faithful regard for one's master, honour ; נִצֵּר is used as at Isa. xxvii. 3, שָׁמֵר as at Hos. iv. 10, etc.—the proverb is valid in the case of any kind of master up to the Lord of lords. The fig-tree presented itself, as Heidenheim remarks, as an appropriate figure ; because in the course of several years' training it brings forth its fruit, which the language of the Mishna distinguishes as פִּגִּין, unripe, בֹּחֵל, half ripe, and צֶמֶל, fully ripe. To fruit in the first line corresponds honour in the second, which the faithful and attentive servant attains unto first on the part of his master, and then also from society in general.

Ver. 19 As it is with water, face correspondeth to face,
So also the heart of man to man.

Thus the traditional text is to be translated ; for on the supposition that כְּמַיִם must be used for כְּבָמִים, yet it might not be translated : as in waters face corresponds to face (Jerome : quomodo in aquis resplendent vultus respicientium), because כְּ (instar) is always only a prep. and never conj. subordinating to itself a whole sentence (vid. under Ps. xxxviii. 14). But whether כְּמַיִם, “like water,” may be an abridgment of a sentence: “like as it is with water,” is a question, and the translation of the LXX. (Syr., Targ., Arab.), ὡσπερ οὐχ ὁμοια πρόσωπα προσώποις, κ.τ.λ., appears, according to Böttcher's ingenious conjecture, to have supposed בְּאִשֶּׁר בְּמִים, from which the LXX. derived כְּמַיִם דְּמִיָּן, sicut non pares. The thought is beautiful : as in the water-mirror each one beholds his own face (Luther : der Scheme = the shadow), so out of the heart of another each sees his own heart, i.e. he finds in another the dispositions and feelings of his own heart (Fleischer)—the face finds in water its reflection, and the heart of a man finds in man its echo; men are ὁμοιοπαθεῖς, and it is a fortunate thing that their heart is capable of the same sympathetic feelings, so that one can pour into the heart of another that which fills and moves his own heart, and can there find agreement with it, and a re-echo. The expression with ל is extensive: one corresponds to another, one belongs to another, is adapted to the other, turns to the other, so that the thought may be rendered in manifold ways; the divinely-ordained mutual relationship is always the ground-thought. This is wholly obliterated by Hitzig's conjecture בְּמִיָּה, "what a mole on the face is to the face, that is man's heart to man," i.e. the heart is the dark spot in man, his partie honteuse. But the Scripture nowhere speaks of the human heart after this manner, at least the Book of Proverbs, in which ל frequently means directly the understanding. Far more intelligible and consistent is the conjecture of Mendel Stern, to which Abrahamsohn drew my attention: בְּמִיָּה הַפְּנִיִּים לְפְנֵיִם, like water (viz. flowing water), which directs its course always forward, thus (is turned) the heart of man to man. This conjecture removes the syntactic harshness of the first member without changing the letters, and illustrates by a beautiful and excellent figure the natural impulse moving man to man. It appears, however, to us, in view of the LXX., more probable that בְּמִיָּה is abbreviated from the original כִּאֲשֶׁר בְּמִיָּה (cf. xxiv. 29).

The following proverb has, in common with the preceding, the catchword הָאֵדָם, and the emphatic repetition of the same expression:

Ver. 20 The under-world and hell are not satisfied,
And the eyes of man are not satisfied.

nature of a proper name, is already found in its full form אַבְרֹן at xv. 11, along with שְׂאֵל; the two synonyms are, as was there shown, not wholly alike in the idea they present, as the underworld and realm of death, but are related to each other almost the same as Hades and Gehenna; אַבְרֹן is what is called<sup>1</sup> in the Jonathan-Targum בֵּית אַבְרֹן, the place of destruction, i.e. of the second death (מִוְתָא תִּנְיָנָא). The proverb places Hades and Hell on the one side, and the eyes of man on the other, on the same line in respect of their insatiableness. To this Fleischer adds the remark: cf. the Arab. al'ayn l'a tam'laha all'a al'rab, nothing fills the eyes of man but at last the dust of the grave—a strikingly beautiful expression! If the dust of the grave fills the open eyes, then they are full—fearful irony! The eye is the instrument of seeing, and consequently in so far as it always looks out farther and farther, it is the instrument and the representation of human covetousness. The eye is filled, is satisfied, is equivalent to: human covetousness is appeased. But first “the desire of the eye,” 1 John ii. 16, is meant in the proper sense. The eyes of men are not satisfied in looking and contemplating that which is attractive and new, and no command is more difficult to be fulfilled than that in Isa. xxxiii. 15, “. . . that shutteth his eyes from seeing evil.” There is therefore no more inexhaustible means, impia speculationis, than the desire of the eyes.

There follow here two proverbs which have in common with each other the figures of the crucible and the mortar:

Ver. 21 The crucible for silver and the furnace for gold,
And a man according to the measure of his praise;

i.e., silver and gold one values according to the result of the smelting crucible and the smelting furnace; but a man, according to the measure of public opinion, which presupposes that which is said in xii. 8, “according to the measure of his wisdom is a man praised.” מְהֵלֵל is not a ῥῆμα μέσον like our Leumund [renown], but it is a graduated idea which denotes fame down to evil Lob [fame], which is only Lob [praise] per antiphrasin. Ewald otherwise: “according to the measure of his glorying;” or Hitzig better: “according to the measure with which he praises himself,” with the remark: “מְהֵלֵל is not the act, the glorifying of self, but the object of the glorying (cf. מַבְטֵחַ, מְרוֹן), i.e. that in which he places his glory." Böttcher something further: "one recognises him by that which he is generally wont to praise in himself and others, persons and things." Thus the proverb is to be understood; but in connection with xii. 8 it seems to us more probable that מַהֲלֵל is thought of as going forth from others, and not as from himself. In line first, xvii. 3a is repeated; the second line there is conformable to the first, according to which it should be here said that the praise of a man is for him what the crucible and the furnace is for metal. The LXX., Syr., Targ., Jerome, and the Venet. read לִפֵּי מַהֲלֵל, and thereby obtain more concinnity. Luther accordingly translates:

A man is tried by the mouth of his praise,
As silver in the crucible and gold in the furnace.

Others even think to interpret man as the subject examining, and so they vocalize the words. Thus e.g. Fleischer: Qualis est catinus argento et fornax auro, talis sit homo ori a quo laudatur, so that "mouth of his praise" is equivalent to the man who praises him with his mouth. But where, as here, the language relates to relative worth, the supposition for לִפֵּי, that it denotes, as at xii. 8, pro ratione, is tenable. And that the mouth of him who praises is a smelting crucible for him who is praised, or that the praised shall be a crucible for the mouth of him who praises, would be a wonderful comparison. The LXX. has here also an additional distich which has no place in the Heb. text.

Ver. 22 Though thou bruise a fool in a mortar among grit with a pestle, Yet would not his folly depart from him.

According to the best accredited accentuations, אִם-תִּבְחֹשׁ has Illuj. and בַּמִּכְתִּישׁ has Pazer, not Rebia, which would separate more than the Dechi, and disturb the sequence of the thoughts. The first line is long; the chief disjunctive in the sphere of the Athnach is Dechi of הַר, this disjoins more than the Pazer of בַּמִּ, and this again more than the Legarmeh of אֶת-הָאוֹיֵל. The הַ of הַרְפוּת does not belong to the stem of the word (Hitzig), but is the article; רַפוּת (from רוּף, to shake, to break; according to Schultens, from רָפַת, to crumble, to cut in pieces, after the form קִטְטוֹר, which is improbable) are bruised grains of corn (peeled grain, grit), here they receive this name in the act of being bruised: rightly Aquila and Theodotion, ἐν μέσῳ ἐμπτισσομένων (grains of corn in the act of being pounded or bruised), and the Venet. μέσον τῶν πτισανῶν.<sup>1</sup> In בְּעֵלִי (thus to be written after Michlol 43b, not בְּעֵלִי, as Heidenheim writes it without any authority) also the article is contained. מַכַּחַשׁ is the vessel, and the ב of בְּעֵלִי is Beth instrumenti; עֵלִי (of lifting up for the purpose of bruising) is the club, pestle (Luther: stempffel = pounder); in the Mishna, Beza i. 5, this word denotes a pounder for the cutting out of flesh. The proverb interprets itself: folly has become to the fool as a second nature, and he is not to be delivered from it by the sternest discipline, the severest means that may be tried; it is not indeed his substance (Hitzig), but an inalienable accident of his substance.

Vers. 23–27. An exhortation to rural industry, and particularly to the careful tending of cattle for breeding, forms the conclusion of the foregoing series of proverbs, in which we cannot always discern an intentional grouping. It is one of the Mashalodes spoken of vol. i. p. 12. It consists of 11 = 4 + 7 lines.

- Ver. 23 Give heed to the look of thy small cattle,
Be considerate about the herds.
24 For prosperity continues not for ever;
And does the diadem continue from generation to generation?
25 (But) the hay is gone, and the after-growth appears,
And the grass of the mountains is gathered:
26 Lambs serve to clothe thee,
And goats are the price of a field.
27 And there is plenty of goats' milk for thy nourishment,
And for the nourishment of thy house,
And subsistence for thy maidens.

The beginning directs to the fut., as is not common in these proverbs, vid. xxvi. 26. With יָרַע, to take knowledge, which is strengthened by the inf. intensivus, is interchanged לֵב שִׁית לֵב, which means at xxiv. 32 to consider well, but here, to be careful regarding anything. צֹאן is the small or little cattle, thus sheep and goats. Whether לְעֶרְרִים (here and at Isa. xvii. 2) contains the article is questionable (Ges. § 35. 2 A), and, since the herds are called הַעֲרִיָּם, is not probable; thus: direct thy attention to the herds, that is, to this, that thou hast herds. פְּנֵי is the external side in general; here, the appearance which the sheep present; thus their condition as seen externally. In ver. 24 I formerly regarded נֵר as a synonym of נֶזֶק, to be understood of the produce of wool, or, with Hitzig, of the shearing of the meadow, and thus the produce of the meadow. But this interpretation of the word is untenable, and ver. 25 provides for ver. 24, thus understood, no natural continuation of thought. That חֵסֶן signifies a store, fulness of possessions, property, and abundance, has already been shown under xv. 6; but נֵר is always the mark of royal, and generally of princely dignity, and here denotes, per meton. signi pro re signata, that dignity itself. With the negative expression in 24a the interrogative in 24b is interchanged as at Job xl. 9, with the implied negative answer; וְאֵי, of an oath ("and truly not," as at Isa. lxii. 8), presents the same thought, but with a passionate colouring here unnecessary. Rightly Fleischer: "ready money, moveable property, and on the other hand the highest positions of honour, are far more easily torn away from a man, and secure to him far less of quiet prosperity, than husbandry, viewed particularly with respect to the rearing of cattle." In other words: the possession of treasures and of a lofty place of power and of honour has not in itself the security of everlasting duration; but rural economy, and particularly the rearing of cattle, gives security for food and clothing. The Chethîb לָדוֹר דּוֹר is found, e.g. at Ex. iii. 15; the Kerî לָדוֹר וְדוֹר substitutes the more usual form. If ver. 25 was an independent whole (Hitzig: grass vanishes and fresh green appears, etc.), then the meaning here and onward would be that in the sphere of husbandry it is otherwise than is said in ver. 24: there that which is consumed renews itself, and there is an enlarging circulation. But this contrast to ver. 24 must be expressed and formed unambiguously. The connection is rather this, that ver. 23 commends the rearing of cattle, ver. 24 confirms it, and 25 ff. discuss what real advantages, not dependent on the accidents of public and social life, it brings.

I rejoice to agree with Fleischer in the opinion that the perfects of ver. 25 form a complex hypothetical antecedent to ver.

26: *Quum evanuerit gramen (sc. vetus) et apparuerint herbæ recentes et collecta fuerint pabula montium, agni vestitui tuo (inservient) et pretium agri (sc. a te emendi) erunt hirci, i.e. then wilt thou nourish thy herds of sheep and goats with the grass on thy fields, and with the dried gathered hay; and these will yield for thee, partly immediately and partly by the money derived therefrom (viz. from the valuable goats not needed for the flocks), all that is needful for thy life. He also remarks, under נָלִיתָ, that it means to make a place void, empty (viz. to quit the place, évacuer la forteresse); hence to leave one's fatherland or home, to wander abroad; thus, rhetorically and poetically of things and possessions: to disappear. הָצִיר (from הָצִיר, to be green) is hay, and הַשָּׂא the after-growing second crop (after-grass); thus a meadow capable of being mowed a second time is thought of. עֲשֵׂבוֹת הָרִים (with Dag. dirimens, as e.g. עֲנִי, Deut. xxxii. 32) are the herbage of the mountains. The time when one proceeds to sheep-shearing, ver. 25 cannot intend to designate; it sets before us an interesting rural harvest scene, where, after a plentiful ingathering of hay, one sees the meadows again overspread with new grass (Ewald); but with us the shearing of sheep takes place in the month of May, when the warm season of the year is just at hand. The poet means in general to say, that when the hay is mown and now the herbage is grown up, and also the fodder from the mountains (Ps. cvi. 20) has been gathered home, when thus the barns are filled with plenty, the husbandman is guaranteed against the future on all sides by his stock of cattle. הָלֵב (from הָלֵב, Arab. halyb, with halab) is the usual metaplastic connecting form of הָלָב, milk. הֵי (from הֵי, like הֵי from הֵי), generally connected with the genitive of the person or thing, for which anything is sufficient (e.g. xxv. 16, הֵי, to which Fleischer compares Arab. hasbuha, tassuha kifayuha), has here the genitive of the thing of which, or in which, one has enough. The complex subject-conception is limited by Rebia, and the governing הֵי has the subordinated disjunctive Legarmeh. עֵי is a word of two genders (epicoenum), Gesen. § 107, 1d. In הֵי the influence of the ל still continues; one does not need to supply it meanwhile, since all that maintains and nourishes life can be called הֵי (vita = victus), e.g. iii. 22. The LXX. translates בֵּיתָהּ by* σῶν θεραπόντων, and omits (as also the Syr., but not the Syro-Hexap.) the last line as now superfluous; but that the maids attending to the cattle—by whom we particularly think of milkers—are especially mentioned, intentionally presents the figure of a well-ordered household, full of varied life and activity (Job xl. 29).

This Mashal-ode, commending the rearing of cattle, is a boundary. The series of proverbs beginning with the next chapter is not, however, a commencement, like that at xxii. 17; and Hitzig's supposition, that xxviii. 1-16 and xxii. 17 ff. have one and the same author, stands on a false foundation. The second proverb of the twenty-eighth chapter shows directly that this new series of proverbs is subordinated to the aim of the Hezekiah-collection beginning with xxv., and thus has to be regarded as an original component part of it. The traces of the post-exilian period which Hitzig discovers in xxviii. 1-16 are not sufficient to remove the origin of the proverbs so far down from the times of Hezekiah. We take the first group, xxviii. 1-11, together; for מבין and יבינו, pervading these eleven proverbs, gives to them, as a whole, a peculiar colouring; and xxviii. 12 presents itself as a new beginning, going back to ver. 2, which ver. 1 precedes as a prelude.

xxviii. 1 The godless flee without any one pursuing them;
But the righteous are bold like a lion.

We would misinterpret the sequence of the accents if we supposed that it denoted רשע as obj.; it by no means takes ואִירִירֶה as a parenthesis. רשע belongs thus to נָסוּ as collective sing. (cf. e.g. Isa. xvi. 4b);<sup>1</sup> in לב, יִבְטַח, as comprehensive or distributive (individualizing) singular, follows the plur. subject. One cannot, because the word is vocalized כִּפְפִיר and not כִּפְפִיר, regard יבטח as an attributive clause thereto (Ewald, like Jerome, quasi leo confidens); but the article, denoting the idea of kind, does not certainly always follow כ. We say, indifferently, כִּפְפִיר or כִּפְפִיר, or כִּפְפִיר, and always כִּפְפִיר, not כִּפְפִיר. In itself, indeed, יבטח may be used absolutely: he is confident, undismayed, of the lion as well as of the leviathan, Job xl. 23. But it is suitable thus without any addition for the righteous, and נסו and יבטח correspond to each other as predicates, in accordance with the parallelism; the accentuation is also here correct. The perf. נסו denotes that which is uncaused, and yet follows: the godless flee, pursued by the terrible images that arise in their own wicked consciences, even when no external danger threatens. The fut. יבטח denotes that which continually happens: the righteous remains, even where external danger really threatens, bold and courageous, after the manner of a young, vigorous lion, because feeling himself strong in God, and assured of his safety through Him.

Ver. 2. There now follows a royal proverb, whose key-note is the same as that struck at xxv. 2, which states how a country falls into the οὐκ ἀγαθόν of the rule of the many:

Through the wickedness of a land the rulers become many;

And through a man of wisdom, of knowledge, authority continues.

If the text presented בַּפְּשָׁע as Hitzig corrects, then one might think of a political revolt, according to the usage of the word, 1 Kings xii. 19, etc.; but the word is בַּפְּשָׁע,<sup>1</sup> and פָּשַׁע (from פָּשַׁע, dirumpere) is the breaking through of limits fixed by God, apostasy, irreligion, e.g. Mic. i. 5. But that many rulers for a land arise from such a cause, shows a glance into the Book of Hosea, e.g. vii. 16: "They return, but not to the Most High (sursum); they are become like a deceitful bow; their princes shall then fall by the sword;" and viii. 4: "They set up kings, but not by me; they have made princes, and I knew it not." The history of the kingdom of Israel shows that a land which apostatizes from revealed religion becomes at once the victim of party spirit, and a subject of contention to many would-be rulers, whether the fate of the king whom it has rejected be merited or not. But what is now the contrast which 2b brings forward? The translation by Bertheau and also by Zöckler is impossible: "but through intelligent, prudent men, he (the prince) continueth long." For 2a does not mean a frequent changing of the throne, which in itself may not be a punishment for the sins of the people, but the appearance at the same time of many pretenders to the throne, as was the case in the kingdom of Israel during the interregnum after the death of Jeroboam II., or in Rome at the time of the thirty tyrants; מְרַבִּים must thus refer to one of these "many" who usurp for a time the throne. מְרַבִּים may also mean, xxiii. 28, inter homines; but מְרַבִּים, with adjective following, e.g. xi. 7, xii. 23, xvii. 18, xxi. 16, always denotes one; and that translation also changes the בֵּן into a "so," "then" introducing the concluding clause, which it altogether disregards as untranslatable. But equally impossible is Böttcher's: "among intelligent, prudent people, one continues (in the government)," for then the subject-conception on which it depends would be slurred over. Without doubt בֵּן is here a substantive, and just this subject-conception. That it may be a substantive has been already shown at xi. 19. There it denoted integrity (properly that which is right or genuine); and accordingly it means here, not the status quo (Fleischer: idem rerum status), but continuance, and that in a full sense: the jurisdiction (properly that which is upright and right), i.e. this, that right continues and is carried on in the land. Similarly Heidenheim, for he glosses בֵּן by מְכוֹן הָאָרֶץ; and Umbreit, who, however, unwarned by the accent, subordinates this בֵּן [in the sense of "right"] to יָדַע as its object. Zöckler, with Bertheau, finds a difficulty in the asyndeton יָדַע מִבֵּן. But these words also, Neh. x. 29, stand together as a formula; and that this formula is in the spirit and style of the Book of Proverbs, passages such as xix. 25, xxix. 7<sup>1</sup> show. A practical man, and one who is at the same time furnished with thorough knowledge, is thus spoken of, and prudence and knowledge of religious moral character and worth are meant. What a single man may do under certain circumstances is shown in xxi. 22; Eccles. ix. 15. Here one has to think of a man of understanding and spirit at the helm of the State, perhaps as the nearest counsellor of the king. By means of such an one, right continues long (we do not need to supply לְהַיּוֹת after "continues long"). If, on the one side, the State falls asunder by the evil conduct of the inhabitants of the land, on the other hand a single man who unites in himself sound understanding and higher knowledge, for a long time holds it together.

Ver. 3. A proverb of a tyrant here connects itself with that of usurpers :

A poor man and an oppressor of the lowly—
A sweeping rain without bringing bread.

Thus it is to be translated according to the accents. Fleischer otherwise, but also in conformity with the accents: Quales sunt vir pauper et oppressor miserorum, tales sunt pluvia omnia secum abripiens et qui panem non habent, i.e. the relation between a poor man and an oppressor of the needy is the same as that between a rain carrying all away with it and a people robbed thereby of their sustenance; in other words: a prince or potentate who robs the poor of their possessions is like a pouring rain which floods the fruitful fields—the separate members of the sentence would then correspond with each other after the scheme of the chiasmus. But the comparison would be faulty, for נָבֵר רֶשַׁע and אִין לָחֶם fall together, and then the explanation would be idem per idem. A “sweeping rain” is one which has only that which is bad, and not that which is good in rain, for it only destroys instead of promoting the growth of the corn; and as the Arab, according to a proverb compared by Hitzig, says of an unjust sultan, that he is a stream without water, so an oppressor of the helpless is appropriately compared to a rain which floods the land and brings no bread. But then the words, “a poor man and an oppressor of the lowly,” must designate one person, and in that case the Heb. words must be accentuated, נָבֵר רֶשַׁע וְעֵשֶׂק רְלִים (cf. xxix. 4a). For, that the oppressor of the helpless deports himself toward the poor man like a sweeping rain which brings no bread, is a saying not intended to be here used, since this is altogether too obvious, that the poor man has nothing to hope for from such an extortioner. But the comparison would be appropriate if 3a referred to an oppressive master; for one who belongs to a master, or who is in any way subordinated to him, has before all to expect from him that which is good, as a requital for his services, and as a proof of his master’s condescending sympathy.

It is thus asked whether "a poor man and an oppressor of the lowly" may be two properties united in the person of one master. This is certainly possible, for he may be primarily a poor official or an upstart (Zöckler), such as were the Roman proconsuls and procurators, who enriched themselves by impoverishing their provinces (cf. LXX. xxviii. 15); or a hereditary proprietor, who seeks to regain what he has lost by extorting it from his relatives and workmen. But רש (poor) is not sufficient to give this definite feature to the figure of the master; and what does this feature in the figure of the master at all mean? What the comparison 3b says is appropriate to any oppressive ruler, and one does not think of an oppressor of the poor as himself poor; he may find himself in the midst of shattered possessions, but he is not poor; much rather the oppressor and the poor are, as e.g. at xxix. 13, contrasted with each other. Therefore we hold, with Hitzig, that רש of the text is to be read rosk, whether we have to change it into ראש, or to suppose that the Jewish transcriber has here for once slipped into the Phœnician writing of the word;<sup>1</sup> we do not interpret, with Hitzig, גְּבֹרֵי רֹאשׁ in the sense of ἀνθρώπος δυνάστης, Sir. viii. 1, but explain: a man (or master = גְּבֹרֵי) is the head (cf. e.g. Judg. xi. 8), and oppresses the helpless. This rendering is probable, because גְּבֹרֵי רֹשׁ, a poor man, is a combination of words without a parallel; the Book of Proverbs does not once use the expression אִישׁ רֹשׁ, but always simply רֹשׁ (e.g. xxviii. 6, xxix. 13); and גְּבֹרֵי is compatible with הָקָם and the like, but not with רֹשׁ. If we stumble at the isolated position of ראש, we should consider that it is in a certain measure covered by רלים; for one has to think of the גבר, who is the ראש, also as the ראש of these רלים, as one placed in a high station who numbers poor people among his subordinates. The LXX. translates ἀνδρείος ἐν ἀσεβείαις as if the words of the text were גְּבֹרֵי רֹשׁ (cf. the interchange of גְּבֹרֵי and גְּבוֹרֵי in both texts of Ps. xviii. 26), but what the LXX. read must have been גְּבוֹרֵי לְהַרְשִׁיעַ (Isa. v. 22); and what can גְּבוֹרֵי here mean? The statement here made refers to the ruinous conduct of a גְּבֹרֵי, a man of standing, or גְּבִירֵי, a high lord, a "wicked ruler," xxviii. 15. On the contrary, what kind of rain the rule of an ideal governor is compared to, Ps. lxxii. 1-8 tells.

Ver. 4 They who forsake the law praise the godless ;

But they who keep the law become angry with them,

viz. the godless, for רָשָׁע is to be thought of collectively, as at ver. 1. They who praise the godless turn away from the revealed word of God (Ps. lxxiii. 11-15); those, on the contrary, who are true to God's word (xxix. 18) are aroused against them (vid. regarding גִּירָה, xv. 18), they are deeply moved by their conduct, they cannot remain silent and let their wickedness go unpunished ; הִתְגַּבְּרָה is zeal (excitement) always expressing itself, passing over into actions (syn. הִתְעוֹרֵר, Job xvii. 8).

Ver. 5. A similar antithetic distich :

Wicked men understand not what is right ;

But they who seek Jahve understand all.

Regarding the gen. expression אֲנִישֵׁי־רָע, vid. under ii. 14. He who makes wickedness his element, falls into the confusion of the moral conception ; but he whose end is the one living God, gains from that, in every situation of life, even amid the greatest difficulties, the knowledge of that which is morally right. Similarly the Apostle John (1 John ii. 20) : "ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things" (οἶδατε πάντα) ; i.e., ye need to seek that knowledge which ye require, and which ye long after, not without yourselves, but in the new divine foundation of your personal life ; from thence all that ye need for the growth of your spiritual life, and for the turning away from you of hostile influences, will come into your consciences. It is a potential knowledge, all-comprehensive in its character, and obviously a human relative knowledge, that is here meant.

Ver. 6. What is stated in this proverb is a conclusion from the preceding, with which it is also externally connected, for רָשָׁ (= ראש), רָשָׁע, רָע, and now רָשָׁ, follow each other :

Better a poor man who walketh in his innocence,

Than a double-going deceiver who is rich thereby.

A variation of xix. 1. Stainlessness, integritas vitæ, as a consequence of unreserved devotion to God, gives to a man with poverty a higher worth and nobility than riches connected with falsehood which "halts between two opinions" (1 Kings xviii. 21), and appears to go one way, while in reality it goes another. The two ways דְּרָכַיִם (cf. Sir. ii. 12, οὐαὶ ἀμαρτωλῶ . . . ἐπιβαίνοντι ἐπὶ δύο τρίβους) are, as ver. 18, not ways going aside to the right or to the left of the right way, but the evil way which the deceiver truly walks in, and the good way which he pretends to walk in (Fleischer); the two ways of action placed over against one another, by one of which he masks the other.

Ver. 7 He who keepeth instruction is a wise sou ;
But he that is a companion of profligates bringeth his father into shame.

We have translated תורה at ver. 4 by "law;" here it includes the father's instruction regarding the right way of life. נוֹצֵר תוֹרָה, according to the nearest lying syntax, has to be taken as pred. וְנִלְלִים are such as squander their means and destroy their health, vid. under xxiii. 20 f. רָעָה signifies, as frequently from the idea of (cf. xxix. 3) pasturing, or properly of tending, to take care of, and to have fellowship with. יְכַלִּים [shall put to shame] denotes both that he himself does disgrace to him, and that he brings disgrace to him on the part of others.

Ver. 8. This verse continues a series of proverbs (commencing in ver. 7) beginning with a participle :

He who increaseth his wealth by interest and usury,
Gathereth it for one who is benevolent toward the lowly.

Wealth increased by covetous plundering of a neighbour does not remain with him who has scraped it together in so relentless a manner, and without considering his own advantage; but it goes finally into the possession of one who is merciful towards the poor, and thus it is bestowed in a manner that is pleasing to God (cf. xiii. 22, Job xxii. 16 f.). The Keri, which drops the second ב, appears to wish to mitigate the sharpness of the distinction of the second idea supposed in its repetition. But Lev. xxv. 35-37, where an Israelite is forbidden to take usury and interest from his brother, the two are distinguished; and Fleischer rightly remarks that there נֶשֶׁךְ means usury or interest taken in money, and תְּרִבִּית usury or interest taken in kind; i.e., of that which one has received in loan, such as grain, or oil, etc., he gives back more than he has received. In other words: נשך is the name of the interest for the capital that is lent, and מְרִבִּית, or, as it is here called תְּרִבִּית, the more, the addition thereto, the increase (Luther: vbersatz). This meaning of gain by means of lending on interest remains in נשך; but תְּרִבִּית, according to the later usus loq., signifies gain by means of commerce, thus business-profit, vid. Baba Mezîa, v. 1. Instead of יִקְבְּצֵנִי, more recent texts have the Kal<sup>1</sup> יִקְבְּצֵנִי לְחֹנֶן. also is, as xiv. 31, xix. 17, part. Kal, not inf. Poel: ad largiendum pauperibus (Merc., Ewald, Bertheau), for there the person of him who presents the gift is undefined; but just this, that it is another and better-disposed, for whom, without having it in view, the collector gathers his stores, is the very point of the thought.

Ver. 9 He who turneth away his ear not to hear of the law,
Even his prayer is an abomination.

Cf. xv. 8 and the argument 1 Sam. xv. 22. Not only the evil which such an one does, but also the apparent good is an abomination, an abomination to God, and eo ipso also in itself: morally hollow and corrupt; for it is not truth and sincerity, for the whole soul, the whole will of the suppliant, is not present: he is not that for which he gives himself out in his prayer, and does not earnestly seek that which he presents and expresses a wish for in prayer.

Ver. 10. A tristich beginning with a participle:

He who misleads the upright into an evil way,
He shall fall into his own pit;
But the innocent shall inherit that which is good.

In the first case, xxvi. 27 is fulfilled: the deceiver who leads astray falls himself into the destruction which he prepared for others, whether he misleads them into sin, and thus mediately prepares destruction for them, or that he does this immediately by enticing them into this or that danger; for  $\text{בְּיָרֵךְ רָע}$  may be understood of the way of wicked conduct, as well as of the experience of evil, of being betrayed, robbed, or even murdered. That those who are misled are called  $\text{יִשְׁרִים}$ , explains itself in the latter case: that they are such as he ought to show respect towards, and such as deserved better treatment, heightens the measure of his guilt. If we understand being morally led astray, yet may we not with Hitzig here find the "theory" which removes the punishment from the just and lays it on the wicked. The clause xi. 8 is not here applicable. The first pages of the Scripture teach that the deceiver does not by any means escape punishment; but certainly the deceiver of the upright does not gain his object, for his diabolical joy at the destruction of such an one is vain, because God again helps him with the right way, but casts the deceiver so much the deeper down. As the idea of  $\text{רַךְ רָע}$  has a twofold direction, so the connections of the words may be genitival (via mali) as well as adjectival (via malu).  $\text{בְּשִׁחָתוֹ}$  is not incorrectly written for  $\text{בְּשִׁחָתוֹ}$ , for  $\text{שָׁחַת}$  occurs (only here) with  $\text{שִׁחָתוֹ}$  as its warrant both from  $\text{שָׁחַת}$ , to bend, to sink; cf.  $\text{לְזוֹת}$  under iv. 24. In line third, opposite to "he who misleads," stand "the innocent" (pious), who, far from seeking to entice others into the evil way and bring them to ruin, are unreservedly and honestly devoted to God and to that which is good; these shall inherit good (cf. iii. 35); even the consciousness of having made no man unhappy makes them happy; but even in their external relations there falls to them the possession of all good, which is the divinely ordained reward of the good.

Ver. 11 A rich man deems himself wise;

But a poor man that hath understanding searcheth him out, or, as we have translated, xviii. 17, goes to the bottom of him, whereby is probably thought of the case that he seeks to use him as a means to an ignoble end. The rich man appears in his own eyes to be a wise man, i.e. in his self-delusion he thinks that he is so; but if he has anything to do with a poor man who has intelligence, then he is seen through by him. Wisdom is a gift not depending on any earthly possession.

We take vers. 12-20 together. A proverb regarding riches closes this group, as also the foregoing is closed, and its commencement is related in form and in its contents to ver. 2 :

Ver. 12 When righteous men triumph, the glory is great ;
And when the godless rise, the people are searched for.

The first line of this distich is parallel with xxix. 2 ; cf. xi. 10a, 11a : when the righteous rejoice, viz. as conquerors (cf. e.g. Ps. lx. 8), who have the upper hand, then  $\text{הַפְּאָרָה}$ , bright prosperity, is increased ; or as Fleischer, by comparison of the Arab. yawm alazynt (day of ornament = festival day), explains : so is there much festival adornment, i.e. one puts on festival clothes, signum pro re signata : thus all appears festal and joyous, for prosperity and happiness then show themselves forth.  $\text{רָבָה}$  is adj. and pred. of the substantival clause ; Hitzig regards it as the attribute : "then is there great glory ;" this supposition is possible (vid. vii. 26, and under Ps. lxxxix. 51), but here it is purely arbitrary. 28a is parallel with 12b : if the godless arise, attain to power and prominence, these men are spied out, i.e. as we say, after Zeph. i. 12, they are searched for as with lamps.  $\text{אֲנָחַתְּ שֶׁאֵינְךָ}$  is to be understood after Obadiah, ver. 6, cf. ii. 4 : men are searched out, i.e. are plundered (in which sense Heidenheim regards  $\text{שֶׁאֵינְךָ}$  as here a transposition from  $\text{הַשָּׂחַד}$ ), or, with reference to the secret police of despotism : they are subjected to an espionage. But a better gloss is  $\text{אֲנָחַתְּ אֲנָחַתְּ}$ . 28a : the people let themselves be sought for, they keep themselves concealed in the inside of their houses, they venture not out into the streets and public places (Fleischer), for mistrust and suspicion oppress them all ; one regards his person and property nowhere safer than within the four walls of his house ; the lively, noisy, variegated life which elsewhere rules without, is as if it were dead.

Ver. 13 He that denieth his sin shall not prosper ;
But he that acknowledgeth and forsaketh it shall obtain mercy.

Thus is this proverb translated by Luther, and thus it lives in the mouth of the Christian people. He who falsely disowns, or with self-deception excuses, if he does not altogether justify his sins, which are discernible as  $\text{פְּשָׁעֶיךָ}$ , has no success ; he remains, after Ps. xxxii., in his conscience and life burdened with a secret ban ; but he who acknowledges (the LXX. has  $\epsilon\xi\eta\gamma\omicron\upsilon\mu\epsilon\nu\omicron\varsigma$ instead of ἐξομολογούμενος, as it ought to be) and forsakes (for the remissio does not follow the confessio, if there is not the accompaniment of nova obedientia) will find mercy (ירחם, as Hos. xiv. 4). In close connection therewith stands the thought that man has to work out his salvation "with fear and trembling" (Phil. ii. 12).

Ver. 14 Well is it with the man who feareth always ;

But he that is stiff-necked shall fall into mischief.

The Piel פִּיַּח occurs elsewhere only at Isa. li. 13, where it is used of the fear and dread of men ; here it denotes the anxious concern with which one has to guard against the danger of evil coming upon his soul. Aben Ezra makes God the object ; but rather we are to regard sin as the object, for while the truly pious is one that "fears God," he is at the same time one that "feareth evil." The antithesis extends beyond the nearest lying contrast of fleshly security ; this is at the same time more or less one who hardens or steels his heart (מִקְשָׁה לִבּוֹ), viz. against the word of God, against the sons of God in his heart, and against the affectionate concern of others about his soul, and as such rushes on to his own destruction (יפול בְּרָעָה), as at xvii. 20).

This general ethical proverb is now followed by one concerning the king :

Ver. 15 A roaring lion and a ravening bear

Is a foolish ruler over a poor people,

i.e. a people without riches and possessions, without lasting sources of help,—a people brought low by the events of war and by calamities. To such a people a tyrant is a twofold terror, like a ravenous monster. The LXX. translate מוֹשֵׁל רָשָׁע by δὲ τυραννεί πτωχὸς ὄν, as if רש had been transferred to this place from ver. 3. But their translation of רשע, xxix. 7, wavers between ἀσεβής and πτωχός, and of the bear they make a wolf אַב, dialectical גַּיב. שׁוֹקֵק designates a bear as lingering about, running hither and thither, impelled by extreme hunger (Venet. ἐπιούσα), from קָשַׁף = שׁוֹק, to drive, which is said of nimble running, as well as of urging impulses (cf. under Gen. iii. 16), viz. hunger.

Ver. 16. Another proverb of the king :

O prince devoid of understanding and rich in oppression !

He that hateth unrighteous gain continueth long.

The old interpreters from the LXX. interpret וְרִבְּ מִעֲשָׂקוֹת as pred. (as also Fleischer: princeps qui intelligentiæ habet parum idem oppressionis exercet multum); but why did not the author use the word הוֹיָא or הוֹיָא instead of this ambiguous inconvenient וְ? Hitzig regards the first term as a nominative absolute, which does not assume a suffix in the second line. But examples such as 27a, xxvii. 7b, are altogether of a different sort; there occurs a reference that is in reality latent, and only finds not expression; the clause following the nominative is related to it as its natural predicate, but here 15b is an independent clause standing outside of any syntactical relation to 15a. Heidenheim has acknowledged that here there lies before us a proverb not in the form of a mere declaration, but of a warning address, and thus also it is understood by Ewald, Bertheau, Elster, and Zöckler. The accentuation seems to proceed on the same supposition. It is the only passage in the Book of Proverbs where נְגִיד, of the supreme ruler of the people, and where the plur. תְּבַיְנוֹת, occur; it is not therefore at all strange if the proverb also has something strange in its formation. Often enough, proverbs are in the form of an address to a son, and generally to their reader; why not also one at least to the king? It is a proverb as when I say: Oh thou reckless, merry fellow! he who laughs much will sometimes weep long. Thus here the address is directed to the prince who is devoid of all wisdom and intelligence, which are necessary for a prince; but on this account the more earnest in exhortation to say to him that only one who hates defrauding the people attains an old age; thus that a prince who plunders the people wantonly shortens his life as a man, and his position as a ruler (cf. שִׁנְיָהֶם, xxiv. 22). The Keri שָׁנָא has the tone thrown back on the penult., as the Chethib שָׁנָא would also have it, cf. לְמִנְיָא, viii. 9. The relation of a plur. subj. to a sing. pred. is as at xxvii. 16. Regarding בָּנֵעַ, vid. under i. 19. A confirmation of this proverb directing itself to princes is found in Jer. xxii. 13-19, the woe pronounced upon Jehoiakim. And a glance at the woe pronounced in Hab. ii. 12, shows how easily ver. 17 presents itself in connection.

Ver. 17 A man burdened with the guilt of blood upon his soul
Fleeth to the pit; let no one detain him.

Luther translates: "A man that doeth violence to the blood of any one," as if he had read the word עָשַׁק. Löwenstein persuades himself that עָשַׁק may mean "having oppressed," and for this refers to לְבוֹשׁ, having clothed, in the Mishna נָשׂוּי, רָכוּב, Lat. coenatus, juratus; but none of all these cases are of the same nature, for always the conduct designated is interpreted as a suffering of that which is done, e.g. the drawing on, as a being clothed; the riding, as a being ridden, etc. Of עָשַׁק, in the sense of the oppression of another, there is no such part. pass. as throws the action as a condition back upon the subject. This is valid also against Aben Ezra, who supposes that עָשַׁק means oppressing after the forms אָגוּר, שָׁדוּר, שָׁבֵן, for of שָׁבֵן, settled = dwelling, that which has just been said is true; that אָגוּר is equivalent to אָגַר, cf. regarding it under xxx. 1, and that שָׁדוּר, Ps. cxxxvii. 8, is equivalent to שָׁדַר, is not true. Kimchi adds, under the name of his father (Joseph Kimchi), also שָׁחוּט, Jer. ix. 7 = שׁוּחַט; but that "slaughtered" can be equivalent to slaughtering is impossible. Some mss. have the word עָשַׁק, which is not inadmissible, but not in the sense of "accused" (Löwenstein), but: persecuted, exposed to war; for עָשַׁק signifies to treat hostilely, and post-bibl. generally to aspire after or pursue anything, e.g. עָסוּק בְּדַבְּרֵי תוֹרָה, R. עֵשׂ (whence Piel contractare, cf. Isa. xxiii. 2, according to which עָשַׁק appears to be an intensifying of this עָשָׂה). However, there is no ground for regarding עָשַׁק<sup>1</sup> as not original, nor in the sense of "hard pressed;" for it is not used of avenging persecution, but: inwardly pressed, for Isa. xxxviii. 14 עָשָׁקָה also signifies the anguish of a guilty conscience. Whoever is inwardly bowed down by the blood of a man whom he has murdered, betakes himself to a ceaseless flight to escape the avenger of blood, the punishment of his guilt, and his own inward torment; he flees and finds no rest, till at last the grave (בּוֹר according to the Eastern, i.e. the Babylonian, mode of writing בַּר) receives him, and death accomplishes the only possible propitiation of the murderer. The exhortation, "let no one detain him," does not mean that one should not lay hold on the fugitive; but, since תִּכְמֶה does not mean merely to hold fast, but to hold right, that one should not afford him any support, any refuge, any covering or security against the vengeance which pursues him; that one should not rescue him from the arm of justice, and thereby invade and disturb the public administration of justice, which rests on moral foundations; on the other side, the Book of Proverbs, xxiv. 11 f., has uttered its exhortation to save a human life whenever it is possible to do so. The proverb lying before us cannot thus mean anything else than that no one should give to the murderer, as such, any assistance; that no one should save him clandestinely, and thereby make himself a partaker of his sin. Grace cannot come into the place of justice till justice has been fully recognised. Human sympathy, human forbearance, under the false title of grace, do not stand in contrast to this justice. We must, however, render אֶל-יִתְמָכוּבו not directly as an admonition against that which is immoral; it may also be a declaration of that which is impossible: only let no one support him, let no one seek to deliver him from the unrest which drives him from place to place. This is, however, in vain; he is unceasingly driven about to fulfil his lot. But the translation: nemine eum sustinente (Fleischer), is inadmissible; a mere declaration of a fact without any subjective colouring is never לֹא seq. fut.

Ver. 18 He who walketh blamelessly is helped,

And he who is perverse in a double way suddenly perisheth.

The LXX. translate תָּמִים by δικαίως (as the accusative of manner), Aquila and Theodotion by τέλειος; but it may also be translated τέλειον or τελειότητα, as the object accus. of ii. 7. Instead of עָקַשׁ דְּרָכָיִם, ver. 6, there is here נִעְקַשׁ דְּרָכָיִם, obliquely directed in a double way, or reflex bending himself. At ver. 6 we have interpreted the dual דְּרָכָיִם rightly, thus בְּאַחַת cannot refer back to one of these two ways; besides, דְּרָכָיִם as fem. is an anomaly, if not a solecism. בְּאַחַת signifies, like the Aram. בְּאַחַת, either all at once (for which the Mish. בְּאַחַת, Aram. בְּאַחַת), or once (= בְּפַעַם אַחַת), and it signifies in the passage before us, not: once, aliquando, as Nolde, with Flacius, explains, but: all at once, i.e. as Geier explains: penitus, sic ut pluribus casibus porro non sit opus. Schultens compares:

Rightly Fleischer : repente totus concidet.

Ver. 19 He who cultivateth his land is satisfied with bread,
And he that graspeth after vanities is satisfied with poverty.

A variation of xii. 11. The pred. here corresponds to its contrast. On רִישׁ (here and at xxxi. 7), instead of the more frequent רִאשׁ, cf. x. 4.

To this proverb of the cultivation of the land as the sure source of support, the next following stands related, its contents being cognate :

Ver. 20 A strong, upright man is enriched with blessings;
But he that hastens to become rich remains not unpunished.

אִישׁ אֲמוּנִים, xx. 6, as well as אֲמוּנוֹת 'א, denotes a man bonæ fidei; but the former expression refers the description to a constancy and certainty in the relations of favour and of friendship, here to rectitude or integrity in walk and conduct; the plur. refers to the all-sidedness and the ceaselessness of the activity. בְּרִכוֹת is related, as at x. 6: the idea comprehends blessings on the side of God and of man, thus benedictio rei and benedictio voti. On the contrary, he who, without being careful as to the means, is in haste to become rich, remains not only unblessed, but also is not guiltless, and thus not without punishment; also this לֹא יִנְקָה (e.g. vi. 29), frequently met in the Mishle, is, like בְּרִיחוֹת, the union of two ideas, for generally the bibl. mode of conception and language comprehends in one, sin, guilt, and punishment.

With a proverb, in the first half of which is repeated the beginning of the second appendix, xxiv. 23, a new group commences :

Ver. 21 Respect of persons is not good;
And for a morsel of bread a man may become a transgressor.

Line first refers to the administration of justice, and line second—the special generalized—to social life generally. The “morsel of bread,” as example of a bribe by means of which the favour of the judge is purchased, is too low a conception. Hitzig well : “even a trifle, a morsel of bread (1 Sam. ii. 36), may, as it awakens favour and dislike within us, thus in general call forth in the will an inclination tending to draw one aside from the line of strict rectitude.” Geier compares A. Gellius' Noct.

Att. i. 15, where Cato says of the Tribune Cœlius: Frusto panis conduci potest vel ut taceat vel ut loquatur.

Ver. 22 The man of an evil eye hasteneth after riches,
And knoweth not that want shall come upon him.

Hitzig renders אִישׁ וְנֵי [the man of an evil eye] as appos. of the subject; but in that case the phrase would have been אִישׁ רָע עֵין נִבְהָל לְהֵן (cf. e.g. xxix. 1). רָע עֵין (xxiii. 6) is the jealous, envious, grudging, and at the same time covetous man. It is certainly possible that an envious man consumes himself in ill-humour without quietness, as Hitzig objects; but as a rule there is connected with envy a passionate endeavour to raise oneself to an equal height of prosperity with the one who is the object of envy; and this zeal, proceeding from an impure motive, makes men blind to the fact that thereby they do not advance, but rather degrade themselves, for no blessing can rest on it; discontentedness loses, with that which God has assigned to us, deservedly also that which it has. The pret. נִבְהָל, the expression of a fact; the part. נִבְהָל, the expression of an habitual characteristic action; the word signifies præceps (qui præceps fertur), with the root-idea of one who is unbridled, who is not master of himself (vid. under Ps. ii. 5, and above at xx. 21). The phrase wavers between נִבְהָל (Kimchi, under נִבְהָל; and Norzi, after Codd. and old editions) and נִבְהָל (thus, e.g., Cod. Jaman); only at Ps. xxx. 8 נִבְהָל stands unquestioned. חָסַר [want] is recognised by Symmachus, Syr., and Jerome. To this, as the authentic reading, cf. its ingenious rendering in Bereschith Rabba, c. 58, to Gen. xxiii. 14. The LXX. reads, from 22*b*, that a חָסַר, ἐλεήμων, will finally seize the same riches, according to which Hitzig reads חָסַר, disgrace, shame (cf. xxv. 10).

Ver. 23 He that reproveth a man who is going backwards, Findeth more thanks than the flatterer.

It is impossible that aj can be the suffix of אֲחֵרֵי; the Talmud, Tamid 28*a*, refers it to God; but that it signifies: after my (Solomon's) example or precedence (Aben Ezra, Ahron b. Josef, Venet., J. H. Michaelis), is untenable — such a name given by the teacher here to himself is altogether aimless. Others translate, with Jerome: Qui corripit hominem gratiam postea inveniet apud eum magis, quam ille qui per linguæ blandi- menta decipit, for they partly purpose to read אֲחֲרֵי־כֵן, partly to give to אֲחֵר the meaning of postea. אֲחֲרֵי, Ewald says, is a notable example of an adverb. Hitzig seeks to correct this adv. as at Neh. iii. 30 f., but where, with Keil, אֲחֲרָיו is to be read; at Josh. ii. 7, where אֲחֵרִי is to be erased; and at Deut. ii. 30, where the traditional text is accountable. This אֲחֲרֵי may be formed like אֲחֵר and אֲחֵרֵי; but if it had existed, it would not be a ἀπαξ λεγ. The accentuation also, in the passage before us, does not recognise it; but it takes אֲחֲרֵי and אָדָם together, and how otherwise than that it appears, as Ibn-Jachja in his Grammar, and Immanuel<sup>1</sup> have recognised it, to be a noun terminating in aj. It is a formation, like לִפְנֵי, 1 Kings vi. 10 (cf. Olshansen's Lehrb. p. 428 f.), of the same termination as אֲחֵרֵי, אֲחֵרֵי, and in the later Aram.-Heb. אֲחֵרֵי, and the like. The variant אֲחֵרֵי, noticed by Heidenheim, confirms it; and the distinction between different classes of men (vid. vol. i. p. 39) which prevails in the Book of Proverbs favours it. A אָדָם אֲחֵרֵי is defined, after the manner of Jeremiah (vii. 24): a man who is directed backwards, and not לִפְנֵי, forwards. Not the renegade—for מִוִּכֵּחַ, opp. מִחֲלִיק לְשָׁן, does not lead to so strong a conception—but the retrograder is thus called in German: Rüchkläufige [one who runs backwards] or Rückwendige [one who turns backwards], who turns away from the good, the right, and the true, and always departs the farther away from them (Immanuel: going backwards in his nature or his moral relations). This centrifugal direction, leading to estrangement from the fear of Jahve, or, what is the same thing, from the religion of revelation, would lead to entire ruin if unreserved and fearless denunciation did not interpose and seek to restrain it; and he who speaks<sup>2</sup> so truly, openly, and earnestly home to the conscience of one who is on the downward course, gains for himself thereby, on the part of him whom he has directed aright, and on the part of all who are well disposed, better thanks (and also, on the part of God, a better reward, James v. 19 f.) than he who, speaking to him, smooths his tongue to say to him who is rich, or in a high position, only that which is agreeable. Laudat adulator, sed non est verus amator. The second half of the verse consists, as often (Ps. lxxiii. 8; Job xxxiii. 1; cf. Thorath Emeth, p. 51), of only two words, with Mercha Silluk.

Ver. 24 He who robbeth his father and mother, and saith: It is no wrong,

Is a companion of the destroyer.

The second line is related to xviii. 9b. Instead of dominus perditionis there found, there is here אִישׁ מְשֻׁחֵתִית, vir perdens (perditor); the word thus denotes a man who destroys, not from revenge, but from lust, and for the sake of the life of men, and that which is valuable for men; thus the spoiler, the incendiary, etc. Instead of אָחַד there, here we have מְבַרֵךְ in the same sense. He who robs his parents, i.e. takes to himself what belongs to them, and regards his doing so as no particular sin,<sup>1</sup> because he will at last come to inherit it all (cf. xx. 21 with xix. 26), is to be likened to a man who allows himself in all offences against the life and property of his neighbour; for what the deed of such a son wants in external violence, it makes up in its wickedness, because it is a rude violation of the tenderest and holiest demands of duty.

Ver. 25 The covetous stirreth up strife;

But he that trusteth in Jahve is richly comforted.

Line first is a variation of xv. 18a; רָחֵב-נֶפֶשׁ is not to be interchanged with רָחֵב-לֵב, xxi. 4. He is of a wide heart who haughtily puffs himself up, of a wide soul (cf. with Schultens הרחוב נפש, of the opening up of the throat, or of revenge, Isa. v. 14; Hab. ii. 5) who is insatiably covetous; for לֵב is the spiritual, and נֶפֶשׁ the natural, heart of man, according to which the widening of the heart is the overstraining of self-consciousness, and the widening of the soul the overstraining of passion. Rightly the LXX., according to its original text: ἀπληστος ἀνὴρ κινεῖ (thus with Hitzig for κρινεῖ) νεῖκη. Line second is a variation of xvi. 20, xxix. 25. Over against the insatiable is he who trusts in God (יָבִט, with Gaja to the vocal, concluding the word, for it follows a word accented on the first syllable, and beginning with a guttural; cf. 'אָ, xxix. 2; 'עַ, xxix. 18), that He will bestow upon him what is necessary and good for him. One thus contented is easily satisfied (compare with the word xi. 25, xiii. 4, and with the matter, x. 3, xiii. 24), is externally as well as internally appeased; while that other, never contented, has no peace, and creates dispeace around him.

Ver. 26 He that trusteth in his own heart is a fool;
But he that walketh in wisdom shall escape.

From the promise in the second line, Hitzig concludes that a courageous heart is meant, but when by itself לֵב never bears this meaning. He who trusteth in his own heart is not merely one who is guided solely "by his own inconsiderate, defiant impulse to act" (Zöckler). The proverb is directed against a false subjectivity. The heart is that fabricator of thoughts, of which, as of man by nature, nothing good can be said, Gen. vi. 5, viii. 21. But wisdom is a gift from above, and consists in the knowledge of that which is objectively true, that which is normatively godlike. הַלֵּךְ בְּחָכְמָה is he who so walks that he has in wisdom a secure authority, and has not then for the first time, when he requires to walk, need to consider, to reckon, to experiment. Thus walking in the way of wisdom, he escapes dangers to which one is exposed who walks in foolish confidence in his own heart and its changeful feelings, thoughts, imaginations, delusions. One who thoughtlessly boasts, who vainly dreams of victory before the time, is such a person; but confidence in one's own heart takes also a hundred other forms. Essentially similar to this proverb are the words of Jer. ix. 22 f., for the wisdom meant in 26b is there defined at ver. 23.

Ver. 27 He that giveth to the poor suffereth no want;
But he that covereth his eyes meeteth many curses.

In the first line the pronoun לוֹ, referring back to the subject noun, is to be supplied, as at xxvii. 7 לָהּ. He who gives to the poor has no want (מִחוֹסֵר), for God's blessing reimburses him richly for what he bestows. He, on the other hand, who veils (מַעְלִים, cf. the Hithpa., Isa. lviii. 7) his eyes so as not to see the misery which calls forth compassion, or as if he did not see the misery which has a claim on his compassion; he is (becomes) rich in curses, i.e. is laden with the curses of those whose wants he cared not for; curses which, because they are deserved, change by virtue of a divine requital (vid. Sir. iv. 5f.; Tob. iv. 7) into all kinds of misfortunes (opp. רַב־פְּרָבוֹת, 20a). מְאַרָה is constructed after the form מְקַרָה, מְגַרָה from אָרַר.

The following proverb resembles the beginnings xxviii. 2, 12. The proverbs xxviii. 28, xxix. 1, 2, 3, form a beautiful square grasp, in which the first and third, and the second and fourth, correspond to one another.

Ver. 28 When the godless rise up, men hide themselves;
And when they perish, the righteous increase.

Line first is a variation of 12*b*. Since they who hide themselves are merely called men, people, the meaning of יְרֵבוֹ is probably not this, that the righteous then from all sides come out into the foreground (Hitzig), but that they prosper, multiply, and increase as do plants, when the worms, caterpillars, and the like are destroyed (Fleischer); Löwenstein glosses יְרֵבוֹ by יִגְדְלוּ, they become great = powerful, but that would be Elihu's style, Job xxxiii. 12, which is not in common use; the names of masters and of those in authority, רַב, רֶבִי, רֶבֶן, רַבָּנִית, are all derived from רָבַב, not from רָבָה. The increase is to be understood of the prosperous growth (to become great = to increase, as perhaps also Gen. xxi. 10) of the congregation of the righteous, which gains in the overthrow of the godless an accession to its numbers; cf. xxix. 2, and especially 16.

xxix. 1. A general ethical proverb here follows:

A man often corrected who hardeneth his neck,
Shall suddenly go to ruin without remedy.

Line second = vi. 15*b*. The connection אִישׁ תּוֹכַחְוֹת must make the nearest impression on a reader of the Book of Proverbs that they mean a censurer (reprehender), but which is set aside by what follows, for the genit. after אִישׁ is, xvi. 29, xxvi. 21, xxix. 10, xiii. 20, the designation of that which proceeds from the subject treated. And since תּוֹכַחְוֹת, Ps. xxxvii. 15, Job xxiii. 4, denotes counter evidence, and generally rejoinders, thus in the first line a reasoner is designated who lets nothing be said to him, and nothing be shown to him, but contradicts all and every one. Thus e.g. Fleischer: vir qui correptus contradicit et cervicem obdurat. But this interpolated correptus gives involuntary testimony of this, that the nearest lying impression of the 'אִישׁ תו' suffers a change by מְקַשֶּׁה עָרַף: if we read הקשה (לב) ערף with 'תו', the latter then designates the correptio, over against which is placed obstinate boldness (Syr., Targ., Jerome, Luther), and 'תו' shows itself thus to be gen. objecti, and we have to compare the gen. connection of אִישׁ, as at xviii. 23, xxi. 17, or rather at 1 Kings xx. 42 and Jer. xv. 10. But it is unnecessary, with Hitzig, to limit 'תו' to divine infliction of punishment, and after Hos. v. 9, Isa. xxxvii. 3, to read תוֹכַחְתּוֹ [punishment], which occurs, Ps. cxlix. 7, in the sense of punishment inflicted by man.<sup>1</sup> Besides, we must think first not of actual punishment, but of chastening, reproving words; and the man to whom are spoken the reproving words is one whose conduct merits more and more severe censure, and continually receives correction from those who are concerned for his welfare. Hitzig regards the first line as a conditional clause: "Is a man of punishment stiff-necked?" . . . This is syntactically impossible. Only ערף מְקַשֶּׁה could have such force: a man of punishment, if he . . . But why then did not the author rather write the words הוּא מְקַשֶּׁה עָרַף? Why then could not מְקַשֶּׁה עָרַף be a co-ordinated further description of the man? Cf. e.g. Ex. xvii. 21. The door of penitence, to which earnest, well-meant admonition calls a man, does not always remain open. He who with stiff-necked persistence in sin and in self-delusion sets himself in opposition to all endeavours to save his soul, shall one day suddenly, and without the prospect and possibility of restoration (cf. Jer. xix. 11), become a wreck. Audi doctrinam si vis vitare ruinam. The general ethical proverb is here followed by one that is political:

Ver. 2 When the righteous increase, the people rejoice;
And when a godless man ruleth, the people mourn.

Regarding בְּרִבּוֹת צֶדֶק (Aquila rightly, ἐν τῷ πληθύναι δικαίους), vid. at xxviii. 28. If the righteous form the majority, or are in such numbers that they are the party that give the tone, that form the predominant power among the people (Fleischer, cum incrementa capiunt justi), then the condition of the people is a happy one, and their voice joyful (xi. 10); if, on the contrary, a godless man or (after xxviii. 1) godless men rule, the people are made to sigh (עִנְיָן, with the Gaja, according to rule). "There is reason," as Hitzig remarks, "why עִנְיָן should be placed first with, and then without, the article." In the first case it denotes the people as those among whom there is such an increase of the righteous; in the second case, the article is wanting, because it is not generally used in poetry; and, besides, its absence makes the second line consist of nine syllables, like the first. This political proverb is now followed by one of general ethics:

Ver. 3 A man who loveth wisdom delighteth his father;
And he who keepeth company with harlots spendeth his substance.

Line first is a variation of x. 1. אִישׁ-אָהָב has, according to rule, the Metheg, cf. 9a. אִישׁ is man, without distinction of age, from childhood (Gen. iv. 1) up to ripe old age (Isa. lxvi. 13); love and dutiful relation towards father and mother never cease. Line second reminds of xxviii. 7 (cf. xiii. 20).

A series of six proverbs follows, beginning with a proverb of the king:

Ver. 4 A king by righteousness bringeth the land to a good condition;
But a man of taxes bringeth it down.

The Hiph. הִעֲמִיד signifies to make it so that a person or matter comes to stand erect and stand fast (e.g. 1 Kings xv. 4); הָרַם, to tear down, is the contrary of building up and extending (Ps. xxviii. 5), cf. נִהַרַם, opp. רוּם, of the state, xi. 11. By אִישׁ-הָרַם is meant the king, or a man of this kind; but it is questionable whether as a man of gifts, i.e. one who lets gifts be made to him (Grotius, Fleischer, Ewald, Bertheau, Zöckler), or as a man of taxes, i.e. who imposes them (Midrash, Aben Ezra, Ralbag, Rosenmüller, Hitzig). Both interpretations are possible, for 'הָרַם means tax (lifting, raising = dedicating), free-will offerings, as well as gifts that are obligatory and required by the laws of nature. Since the word, in the only other place where it occurs, Ezek. xlv. 13–16, is used of the relation of the people to the prince, and denotes a legally-imposed tax, so it appears also here, in passing over from the religious sphere to the secular, to be meant of taxes, and that according to its fundamental conception of gifts, i.e. such taxes as are given on account of anything, such as the produce of the soil, manufactures, heritages. Thus also is to be understood Aquila's and Theodotion's ἀνὴρ ἀφαιρεμάτων, and the rendering also of the Venet. ἐράνων. A man on the throne, covetous of such gifts, brings the land to ruin by exacting contributions; on the contrary, a king helps the land to a good position, and an enduring prosperity, by the exercise of right, and that in appointing a well-proportioned and fit measure of taxation.

Ver. 5 A man who flattereth his neighbour
Spreadeth a net for his steps.

Fleischer, as Bertheau: vir qui alterum blanditiis circumvenit; but in the עַל there does not lie in itself a hostile tendency, an intention to do injury; it interchanges with אֶל, Ps. xxxvi. 3, and what is expressed in line second happens also, without any intention on the part of the flatterer: the web of the flatterer before the eyes of a neighbour becomes, if he is caught thereby, a net for him in which he is entangled to his own destruction (Hitzig). הַחֲלִיקַת signifies also, without any external object, xxviii. 23, ii. 16, as internally transitive: to utter that which is smooth, i.e. flattering. פְּעֻמָּיו is, as Ps. lvii. 7 = רַגְלָיו, for which it is the usual Phœnician word.

Ver. 6 In the transgression of the wicked man lies a snare;
But the righteous rejoiceth [jubelt] and is glad.

Thus the first line is to be translated according to the sequence of the accents, Mahpach, Munach, Munach, Athnach, for the second Munach is the transformation of Dechi; אִישׁ רָע thus, like אֲנִישֵׁי־רָע, xxviii. 5, go together, although the connection is not, like this, genitival, but adjectival. But there is also this sequence of the accents, Munach, Dechi, Munach, Athnach, which separates רָע and אִישׁ. According to this, Ewald translates: "in the transgression of one lies an evil snare;" but in that case the word ought to have been מִקְשֵׁי רָע, as at xii. 13; for although the numeral רַבִּים sometimes precedes its substantive, yet no other adjective ever does; passages such as Isa.

xxviii. 21 and x. 30 do not show the possibility of this position of the words. In this sequence of accents the explanation must be: in the wickedness of a man is the evil of a snare, i.e. evil is the snare laid therein (Böttcher); but a reason why the author did not write רע מוקש רע would also not be seen there, and thus we must abide by the accentuation רע איש רע. The righteous also may fall, yet he is again raised by means of repentance and pardon; but in the wickedness of a bad man lies a snare into which having once fallen, he cannot again release himself from it, xxiv. 16. In the second line, the form ירון, for ירן, is defended by the same metaplastic forms as ישיר, Ps. xci. 6; ירין, Isa. xlii. 4; and also that the order of the words is not ירון וישמה וירון (LXX. ἐν χαρᾷ καὶ ἐν εὐφροσύνῃ; Luther: frewet sich und hat wonne [rejoices and has pleasure]), is supported by the same sequence of ideas, Zech. ii. 14, cf. Jer. xxxi. 7: the Jubeln is the momentary outburst of gladness; the Freude [gladness], however, is a continuous feeling of happiness. To the question as to what the righteous rejoiceth over [jubelt] and is glad [frewet] because of, the answer is not: because of his happy release from danger (Zöckler), but: because of the prosperity which his virtue procures for him (Fleischer). But the contrast between the first and second lines is not clear and strong. One misses the expression of the object or ground of the joy. Cocceius introduces into the second line a si lapsus fuerit. Schultens translates, justus vel succumbens triumphabit, after the Arab. rân f. o., which, however, does not mean succumbere, but subigere (vid. under Ps. lxxviii. 65). Hitzig compares Arab. raym f. i., discedere, relinquere, and translates: "but the righteous passeth through and rejoiceth." Böttcher is inclined to read יראה ושמח, he sees it (what?) and rejoiceth. All these devices, however, stand in the background compared with Pinsker's proposal (Babylon.-Heb. Punktationssystem, p. 156):

"On the footsteps of the wicked man lie snares, But the righteous runneth and is glad,"

i.e. he runneth joyfully (like the sun, Ps. xix. 6) on the divinely-appointed way (Ps. cxix. 132), on which he knows himself threatened by no danger. The change of בפשע into בפשע has xii. 13 against it; but ירון may be regarded, after iv. 12, cf. xviii. 10, as the original from which ירן is corrupted.

Ver. 7 The righteous knoweth the cause of the poor,
But the godless understandeth no knowledge.

The righteous knoweth and recogniseth the righteous claims of people of low estate, i.e. what is due to them as men, and in particular cases; but the godless has no knowledge from which such recognition may go forth (cf. as to the expression, xix. 25). The proverb begins like xii. 10, which commends the just man's compassion to his cattle; this commends his sympathy with those who are often treated as cattle, and worse even than cattle. The LXX. translates 7*b* twice: the second time reading רש instead of רשע, it makes nonsense of it.

Ver. 8 Men of derision set the city in an uproar,
But wise men allay anger.

Isa. xxviii. shows what we are to understand by אֲנָשֵׁי לְעֵזֶן: men to whom nothing is holy, and who despise all authority. The Hiphil יִפְיֵחוּ does not signify irretiunt, from פָּתַח (Venet. παργιδιούσι, after Kimchi, Aben Ezra, and others), but sufflant, from פָּח (Rashi: יִלְהִיבוּ): they stir up or excite the city, i.e. its inhabitants, so that they begin to burn as with flames, i.e. by the dissolution of the bonds of mutual respect and of piety, by the letting loose of passion, they disturb the peace and excite the classes of the community and individuals against each other; but the wise bring it about that the breathings of anger that has broken forth, or is in the act of breaking forth, are allayed. The anger is not that of God, as it is rendered by Jerome and Luther, and as יִפְיֵחוּ freely translated might mean. The Aram. err in regard to יִפְיֵחוּ in passages such as vi. 19.

Ver. 9 If a wise man has to contend with a fool,
He [the fool] rageth and laugheth, and hath no rest.

Among the old translators, Jerome and Luther take the "wise man" as subject even of the second line, and that in all its three members: vir sapiens si cum stulto contenderit, sive irascatur sive rideat, non inveniet requiem. Thus Schultens, C. B. Michaelis, Umbreit, Ewald, Elster, and also Fleischer: "The doubled Vav is correlative, as at Ex. xxi. 16, Lev. v. 3, and expresses the perfect sameness in respect of the effect, here of the want of effect. If the wise man, when he disputes with a fool, becomes angry, or jests, he will have no rest, i.e. he will never bring it to pass that the fool shall cease to reply; he yields the right to him, and thus makes it possible for him to end the strife." But the angry passion, and the bursts of laughter alternating therewith, are not appropriate to the wise man affirming his right; and since, after Eccles. ix. 17, the words of the wise are heard בְּנִחָה, the נִחָה [and there is no rest] will cause us to think of the fool as the logical subject. So far correctly, but in other respects inappropriately, the LXX. ἀνὴρ σοφὸς κρινεῖ ἔθνη (after the expression עַם, i.e. עַמ, instead of אַם), ἀνὴρ δὲ φαύλος (which לֵאמֹר אִישׁ does not mean) ὀργιζόμενος καταγελάται καὶ οὐ καταπτήσσει (as if the words were וְלֹא יִתֵּן).<sup>1</sup> The syntactical relation would be simpler if טָשַׁף in 9a were vocalized as a hypothetical perfect. But we read for it the past טָשַׁף. Ewald designates 9a as a conditional clause, and Hitzig remarks that the Lat. viro sapiente disceptante cum stulto corresponds therewith. It marks, like 1 Sam. ii. 13, Job i. 16, the situation from which there is a departure then with perf. consec.: if a wise man in the right is in contact with a fool, he starts up, and laughs, and keeps not quiet (supply לוֹ as at xxviii. 27), or (without לוֹ): there is no keeping quiet, there is no rest. The figure is in accordance with experience. If a wise man has any controversy with a fool, which is to be decided by reasonable and moral arguments, then he becomes boisterous and laughs, and shows himself incapable of quietly listening to his opponent, and of appreciating his arguments.

We now group together vers. 10–14. Of these, vers. 10 and 11 are alike in respect of the tense used; vers. 12–14 have in common the pronoun pointing back to the first member.

Ver. 10 Men of blood hate the guiltless
And the upright; they attempt the life of such

The nearest lying translation of the second line would certainly be: the upright seek his soul (that of the guiltless). In accordance with the contrasted יִשְׁנֹאוּ, the Aram. understand the seeking of earnest benevolent seeking, but disregarding the נִפְשׁ

<sup>1</sup> According to this the Targum וְלֹא מִתְחַבֵּר (he remains obstinate), according to which the וְלֹא מִתְחַפֵּיר (he does not lose his wits) of the Peshito is perhaps to be corrected. The distribution of the subjects is obscure.

in לַנֶּפֶשׁ;<sup>1</sup> Symmachus (ἐπιζητήσουσι), Jerome (quærent), and Luther thus also understand the sentence; and Rashi remarks that the phrase is here לָשׁוֹן הַבָּהּ, for he rests; but mistrusting himself, refers to 1 Sam. xxi. 23. Abron b. Josef glosses: to enter into friendship with him. Thus, on account of the contrast, most moderns, interpreting the phrase sensu bono, also Fleischer: probi autem vitam ejus conservare student. The thought is, as xii. 6 shows, correct; but the usus loq. protests against this rendering, which can rest only on Ps. cxlii. 5, where, however, the poet does not say יֵאָזֵן דִּירֵשׁ נַפְשִׁי, but, as here also the usus loq. requires, לַנֶּפֶשׁ. There are only three possible explanations which Aben Ezra enumerates: (1) they seek his, the bloody man's, soul, i.e. they attempt his life, to take vengeance against him, according to the meaning of the expressions as generally elsewhere used, e.g. at Ps. lxiii. 10; (2) they revenge his, the guiltless man's, life (LXX. ἐκζητήσουσιν), which has fallen a victim, after the meaning in which elsewhere only בָּקַשׁ דָּם and דָּרַשׁ נַפְשׁ, Gen. ix. 5, occur. This second meaning also is thus not in accordance with the usage of the words, and against both meanings it is to be said that it is not in the spirit of the Book of Proverbs to think of the ישרים [the upright, righteous] as executors of the sentences of the penal judicature. There thus remains<sup>2</sup> the interpretation (3): the upright—they (the bloody men) seek the soul of such an one. The transition from the plur. to the sing. is individualizing, and thus the arrangement of the words is like Gen. xlvii. 21: "And the people (as regards them), he removed them to the cities," Gesen. § 145. 2. This last explanation recommends itself by the consideration that תָּם and ישרים are cognate as to the ideas they represent,—let one call to mind the common expression תָּם וְיֵשֶׁר [perfect and upright, e.g. Job i. 1, 8, ii. 3],—that the same persons are meant thereby, and it is rendered necessary by this, that the thought, "bloody men hate the guiltless," is incomplete; for the same thing may also be said of the godless in general. One expects to hear that just against the guiltless, i.e. men walking in their innocence, the bloody-mindedness of such men is specially directed, and 10*b* says the same thing; this second clause first brings the contrast to the point aimed at. Lutz is right in seeking to confute Hitzig, but he does so on striking grounds.

Ver. 11 All his wrath the fool poureth out ;

But the wise man husheth it up in the background.

That רוחו is not meant here of his spirit (Luther) in the sense of quæcunque in mente habet (thus e.g. Fleischer) the contrast shows, for יִשְׁבְּחָנָה does not signify cohibet, for which יִחְשְׁבָנָה (LXX. ταμειύεται) would be the proper word : רוח thus is not here used of passionate emotion, such as at xvi. 31 ; Isa. xxv. 4, xxxiii. 11. שָׁבַח is not here equivalent to Arab. sabbah, αἰνεῖν (Imman., Venet., and Heidenheim), which does not supply an admissible sense, but is equivalent to Arab. sabbakh, to quiet (Ahron b. Josef : קטפיהון = καταπαύειν), the former going back to the root-idea of extending (amplificare), the latter to that of going to a distance, putting away : sabbakh, procul recessit, distitit, hence שָׁבַח, Ps. lxxxix. 10, and here properly to drive off into the background, synonym. הִשְׁבִּיחַ (Fleischer). But בְּאָחוּר (only here with ב) is ambiguous. One might with Rashi explain : but the wise man finally, or afterwards (Symmachus, ἐπ' ἐσχάτων; Venet. κατόπιω = κατόπισθε), appeaseth the anger which the fool lets loose ; i.e., if the latter gives vent to his anger, the former appeases, subdues, mitigates it (cf. בְּאָחוּר, לְאָחוּר, Isa. xlii. 23). But it lies still nearer to refer the antithesis to the anger of the wise man himself ; he does not give to it unbridled course, but husheth it in the background, viz. in his heart. Thus Syr. and Targ. reading בְּרֵעֵינָה, the former, besides יִחְשְׁבָנָה (reputat eam), so also Aben Ezra : in the heart as the background of the organ of speech. Others explain : in the background, afterward, retrosum, e.g. Nolde, but to which compescit would be more appropriate than sedat. Hitzig's objection, that in other cases the expression would be בְּקִרְבּוֹ, is answered by this, that with בְּאָחוּר the idea of pressing back (of אָחוּר) is connected. The order of the words also is in favour of the meaning in recessu (cordis). Iræ dilatio mentis pacatio (according to an old proverb).

Ver. 12 A ruler who listens to deceitful words,
All his servants are godless.

They are so because they deceive him, and they become so; for instead of saying the truth which the ruler does not wish to hear, they seek to gain his favour by deceitful flatteries, misrepresentations, exaggerations, falsehoods. Audiat rex quæ præcipit lex. He does not do this, as the saying is, sicut rex ita grex (Sir. x. 2), in the sense of this proverb of Solomon.

Ver. 13 The poor man and the usurer meet together—
Jahve lighteneth the eyes of both.

A variation of xxii. 2, according to which the proverb is to be understood in both of its parts. That אִישׁ תְּכַבֵּים is the contrast of שָׂר, is rightly supposed in Temura 16b; but Rashi, who brings out here a man of moderate learning, and Saadia, a man of a moderate condition (thus also the Targ. בְּרִיא מְעֻפָּא, after Buxtorf, homo mediocris fortunæ), err by connecting the word with תָּרָה. The LXX. δανειστοῦ καὶ χρεωφειλέτου (ἀλλήλοις συνελθόντων), which would be more correct inverted, for אִישׁ תְּכַבֵּים is a man who makes oppressive taxes, high previous payments of interest; the verbal stem תָּרָה, Arab. tak, is a secondary to R. wak, which has the meanings of pressing together, and pressing firm (whence also the middle is named; cf. Arab. samym alaklab, the solid = the middle point of the heart). תָּרָה, with the plur. תְּכַבֵּים, scarcely in itself denotes interest, τόκος; the designation אִישׁ תְּכַבֵּים includes in it a sensible reproach (Syr. afflictor), and a rentier cannot be so called (Hitzig). Luther: Reiche [rich men], with the marginal note: "who can practise usury as they then generally all do?" Therefore Löwenstein understands the second line after 1 Sam. ii. 7: God enlighteneth their eyes by raising the lowly and humbling the proud. But this line, after xxii. 2b, only means that the poor as well as the rich owe the light of life (Ps. xiii. 4) to God, the creator and ruler of all things,—a fact which has also its moral side: both are conditioned by Him, stand under His control, and have to give to Him an account; or otherwise rendered: God maketh His sun to rise on the low and the high, the evil and the good (cf. Matt. v. 45)—an all-embracing love full of typical moral motive.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> מֵאִיר has, by Löwenstein, Mehuppach Legarmeh, but incorrectly, since after Legarmeh two conjunctives cannot occur. Also Norzi with Mehuppach Mercha is irregular, since Ben-Asher recognises only two examples of

Ver. 14 A king who judgeth the poor with truth,
His throne shall stand for ever.

בִּאֲמַת, as at Isa. xvi. 5 (synon. בִּמְיֻשָּׁרִים, בִּאֲמוֹנָה), is equivalent to fidelity to duty, or a complete, full accomplishment of his duty as a ruler with reference to the dispensing of justice; in other words: after the norm of actual fact, and of the law, and of his duty proceeding from both together. מֶלֶךְ has in Codd., e.g. Jaman., and in the Venetian 1517, 21, rightly Rebia. In that which follows, בִּאֲמַת שׁוֹפֵט are more closely related than בִּאֲמַת וְדָלִים, for of two conjunctives standing together the first always connects more than the second. מֶלֶךְ שׁוֹפֵט בִּאֲמַת דָּלִים is the truest representation of the logical grammatical relation. To 14b compare the proverb of the king, xvi. 12, xxv. 5.

A proverb with שִׁבֹּט, ver. 15, is placed next one with שׁוֹפֵט, but it begins a group of proverbs regarding discipline in the house and among the people:

Ver. 15 The rod and reproof give wisdom;

But an undisciplined son is a shame to his mother.

With שִׁבֹּט [a rod], which xxii. 15 also commends as salutary, תּוֹכַחַת refers to discipline by means of words, which must accompany bodily discipline, and without them is also necessary; the construction of the first line follows in number and gender the scheme xxvii. 9, Zech. vii. 7; Ewald, § 339c. In the second line the mother is named, whose tender love often degenerates into a fond indulgence; such a darling, such a mother's son, becomes a disgrace to his mother. Our "ausgelassen," by which Hitzig translates מִשְׁלַח, is used of joyfulness unbridled and without self-restraint, and is in the passage before us too feeble a word; שְׁלַח is used of animals pasturing at liberty, wandering in freedom (Job xxxix. 5; Isa. xvi. 2); יָעַר מִשְׁלַח is accordingly a child who is kept in by no restraint and no punishment, one left to himself, and thus undisciplined (Luther, Gesenius, Fleischer, and others).

Ver. 16 When the godless increase, wickedness increaseth;

But the righteous shall see their fall.

this double accentuation to which this מֵאִיר does not belong; vid. Thorath Emeth, p. 12. That the penultima toning מֵאִיר in several editions is false scarcely needs to be remarked. Jablonski rightly points with Mehuppach on the ult., and Zinnorith on the preceding open syllable.

The LXX. translation is not bad: πολλῶν ὄντων ἀσεβῶν πολλὰ γίνονται ἁμαρτίαι (vid. regarding  $\text{רָבָה}$ , ver. 2, xxviii. 28); but in the main it is only a Binsenwahrheit, as they say in Swabia, i.e. a trivial saying. The proverb means, that if among a people the party of the godless increases in number, and at the same time in power, wickedness, i.e. a falling away into sins of thought and conduct, and therewith wickedness, prevails. When irreligion and the destruction of morals thus increase, the righteous are troubled; but the conduct of the godless carries the judgment in itself, and the righteous shall with joy perceive, in the righteous retribution of God, that the godless man will be cast down from his power and influence. This proverb is like a motto to Ps. xii.

Ver. 17 Correct thy son, and he will give thee delight,
And afford pleasure to thy soul.

The LXX. well translates  $\text{ויניח}$  by  $\text{καὶ ἀναπαύσει σε}$ ; <sup>1</sup>  $\text{הניח}$  denotes rest properly, a breathing again,  $\text{ἀνάψυξις}$ ; and then, with an obliteration of the idea of restraint so far, generally (like the Arab. arah, compared by Fleischer) to afford pleasure or delight. The post.-bibl. language uses for this the words  $\text{נָחַת רִיחַ}$ , and says of the pious that he makes  $\text{נָחַת רִיחַ}$  to his Creator, Berachoth 17a; and of God, that He grants the same to them that fear Him, Berach. 29b; in the morning prayer of the heavenly spirits, that they hallow their Creator  $\text{בְּנַחַת רִיחַ}$  (with inward delight). Write with Codd. (also Jaman.) and older editions  $\text{וַיְנַיֵּחַ}$ , not  $\text{וַיְנַיֵּחַ}$ ; for, except in verbs  $\text{ל"ה}$ , the suffix of this Hiphil form is not dageshed, e.g.  $\text{אִמְיִתֶּךָ}$ , 1 Kings ii. 26; cf. also 1 Kings xxii. 16 and Ps. l. 8.  $\text{מְעֻרְנִים}$  the LXX. understands, after 2 Sam. i. 24 ( $\text{עַם-עֲרֵנִים}$ ,  $\text{μετὰ κόσμου}$ ), also here, of ornament; but the word signifies dainty dishes—here, high spiritual enjoyment. As in vers. 15 and 16 a transition was made from the house to the people, so there now follows the proverb of the discipline of children, a proverb of the education of the people:

Ver. 18 Without a revelation a people becomes ungovernable;
But he that keepeth the law, happy is he.

Regarding the importance of this proverb for estimating the relation of the Chokma to prophecy, vid. vol. i. p. 41. חֵיוֹן is, according to the sense, equivalent to נְבִיאָה, the prophetic revelation in itself, and as the contents of that which is proclaimed. Without spiritual preaching, proceeding from spiritual experience, a people is unrestrained (פָּרַע, vid. regarding the punctuation at xxviii. 25, and regarding the fundamental meaning, at i. 25); it becomes פָּרַע, disorderly, Ex. xxxii. 25; wild vnd wüst, as Luther translates. But in the second line, according to the unity of the antithesis, the words are spoken of the people, not of individuals. It is therefore not to be explained, with Hitzig: but whoever, in such a time, nevertheless holds to the law, it is well with him! Without doubt this proverb was coined at a time when the preaching of the prophets was in vogue; and therefore this, "but whoever, notwithstanding," is untenable; such a thought at that time could not at all arise; and besides this, תורה is in the Book of Proverbs a moveable conception, which is covered at least by the law in contradistinction to prophecy. Tōra denotes divine teaching, the word of God; whether that of the Sinaitic or that of the prophetic law (2 Chron. xv. 3, cf. e.g. Isa. i. 10). While, on the one hand, a people is in a dissolute condition when the voice of the preacher, speaking from divine revelation, and enlightening their actions and sufferings by God's word, is silent amongst them (Ps. lxxiv. 9, cf. Amos viii. 12); on the other hand, that same people are to be praised as happy when they show due reverence and fidelity to the word of God, both as written and as preached. That the word of God is preached among a people belongs to their condition of life; and they are only truly happy when they earnestly and willingly subordinate themselves to the word of God which they possess and have the opportunity of hearing. אִשְׁרָהּ (defective for אִשְׁרֵיהּ) is the older, and here the poetic kindred form to אִשְׁרֵי, xiv. 21, xvi. 20. From the discipline of the people this series of proverbs again returns to the discipline of home:

Ver. 19 With words a servant will not let himself be bettered;
For he understandeth them, but conformeth not thereto.

The Niph. נוֹפֵר becomes a so-called tolerative, for it connects with the idea of happening that of reaching its object: to become truly bettered (taught in wisdom, corrected), and thus to let himself be bettered. With mere words this is not reached; the unreasonable servant needs, in order to be set right, a more radical means of deliverance. This assertion demands confirmation; therefore is the view of von Hofmann (Schriftbew. ii. 2. 404) improbable, that 19*b* has in view a better-disposed servant: supposing that he is intelligent, in which case he is admonished without cause, then the words are also lost: he will let them pass over him in silence without any reply. This attempted explanation is occasioned by this, that מַעֲנֶה can signify nothing else than a response in words. If this were correct, then without doubt its fundamental meaning would correspond with כִּי; for one explains, with Löwenstein, "for he perceives it, and may not answer," i.e. this, that a reply cut off frustrates the moral impression. Or also: for he understands it, but is silent,—in præfractum se silentium configit (Schultens); and thus it is with the ancients (Rashi). But why should not מַעֲנֶה יָמִין itself be the expression of this want of any consequences? מַעֲנֶה cannot certainly mean humiliation<sup>1</sup> (Meîri, after Ex. x. 3, הַכְנַעַה), but why as an answer in words and not also a response by act (Stuart: a practical answer)? Thus the LXX. ἐὰν γὰρ καὶ νοήσῃ, ἀλλ' οὐχ ὑπακούσεται, according to which Luther: for although he at once understands it, he does not yet take it to himself. That מַעֲנֶה may mean obedience, the Aram. so understood, also at xvi. 4. It denoted a reply in the most comprehensive meaning of the word, vid. at xvi. 1. The thought, besides, is the same as if one were to explain: for he understands it, and is silent, i.e. lets thee speak; or: he understands it, but that which he perceives finds no practical echo.

Ver. 20 Seest thou a man hasty in his words?

The fool hath more hope than he.

Cf. xxvi. 12. Such an one has blocked up against himself the path to wisdom, which to the fool, i.e. to the ingenuous, stands open; the former is perfect, of the latter something may yet be made. In this passage the contrast is yet more precise, for the fool is thought of as the dull, which is the proper meaning of כָּסִיל, vid. under xvii. 24. There is more hope for the fool than for him, although he may be no fool in himself, who overthrows himself by his words. "The προπετής ἐν λόγῳ αὐτοῦ (Sir. ix. 18) has, in the existing case, already overleaped the thought; the כָּסִיל has it still before him, and comes at length, perhaps with his slow conception, to it" (Hitzig); for the ass, according to the fable, comes at last farther than the greyhound. Hence, in words as well as in acts, the proverb holds good, "Eile mit Weile" [= festina lente]. Every word, as well as act, can only be matured by being thought out, and thought over. From this proverb, which finds its practical application to the affairs of a house, and particularly also to the relation to domestics, the group returns to the subject of instruction, which is its ground-tone.

Ver. 21 If one pampers his servant from youth up,
He will finally reach the place of a child.

The LXX. had no answer to the question as to the meaning of מָנַן. On the other hand, for מְנַן, the meaning to fondle, delicatus enutrire, is perfectly warranted by the Aram. and Arab. The Talmud, Succa 52*b*, resorts to the alphabet אט"בה in order to reach a meaning for מָנַן. How the Targ. comes to translate the word by מְנַחֵם (outrooted) is not clear; the rendering of Jerome: postea sentiet eum contumacem, is perhaps mediated by the ἔσται γογγυσμός of Symmachus, who combines מָנַן with מָנַח, Niph. γογγύζειν. The ὀθνηθήσεται of the LXX., with the Syr., von Hofmann has sought to justify (Schriftbew. ii. 2. 404), for he derives מָנַן = מְנַחֵם from מְנַחֵם. We must then punctuate מָנַן; but perhaps the LXX. derived the word from מְנַחֵם = מְנַחֵם, whether they pronounced it מְנַחֵם (cf. מְנַחֵם = מְנַחֵם) or מְנַחֵם. To follow them is not wise, for the formation of the word is precarious; one does not see what the speaker of this proverb, to whom the language presented a fulness of synonyms for the idea of complaint, meant by using this peculiar word. Linguistically these meanings are impossible: of Jerome, dominus = מְנַחֵם (Ahron b. Josef, Meiri, and others); or: the oppressed = מְנַחֵם, from מְנַחֵם (Johson); or: one who is sick = מְנַחֵם (Euchel). And Ewald's "undankbar" [unthankful], derived from the Arabic, is a mere fancy, since (Arab.) manuwan does not mean one who is unthankful, but, on the contrary, one who upbraids good deeds shown.<sup>1</sup> The ancients are in the right track, who explain מִנּוֹן after the verb נָנ, Ps. lxxii. 17 = נָן = נָן; the Venet., herein following Kimchi, also adopts the nominal form, for it translates (but without perceptible meaning) γόνωσις. Luther's translation is fortunate:

“If a servant is tenderly treated from youth up,
He will accordingly become a Junker [squire].”

The ideas represented in modern Jewish translations: that of a son (e.g. Solomon: he will at last be the son) and that of a master (Zunz), are here united. But how the idea of a son (from the verb נָן), at the same time that of a master, may arise, is not to be perceived in the same way as with Junker and the Spanish infante and hidalgo; rather with מִנּוֹן, as the ironical naming of the son (little son), the idea of a weakling (de Wette) may be connected. The state of the matter appears as follows:—The verb נָן has the meanings of luxuriant growth, numerous propagation; the fish has from this the Aram. name of נָן, like the Heb. נָן, from נָן, which also means luxuriant, exuberant increase (vid. at Ps. lxxii. 17). From this is derived נָן, which designates the offspring as a component part of a kindred, as well as מִנּוֹן, which, according as the מ is interpreted infin. or local, means either this, that it sprouts up luxuriantly, the abundant growth, or also the place of luxuriant sprouting, wanton growing, abundant and quick multiplication: thus the place of hatching, spawning. The subject in נָן might be the fondled one; but it lies nearer, however, to take him who fondles as the subject, as in 21a. אֲחַר־יָתוֹ is either adv. accus. בְּאַחֲרֵיתוֹ, or, as we preferred at xxiii. 32, it is the subj. in-roducing, after the manner of a substantival clause, the following sentence as its virtual predicate: "one has fondled his servant from his youth up, and his (that of the one who fondles) end is: he will become a place of increase." The master of the house is thought of along with his house; and the servant as one who, having become a man, presents his master with יְלִדֵי בַיִת, who are spoilt scapegraces, as he himself has become by the pampering of his master. There was used in the language of the people, נֶן for נֶן, in the sense in which we name a degenerate son a "Schönes Früchtchen" [pretty little fruit]; and מִנְוֶן is a place (house) where many נִינִים are; and a man (master of a house) who has many of them is one whose family has increased over his head. One reaches the same meaning if מִנְוֶן is rendered more immediately as the place or state of growing, increasing, luxuriating. The sense is in any case: he will not be able, in the end, any more to defend himself against the crowd which grows up to him from this his darling, but will be merely a passive part of it.

The following group begins with a proverb which rhymes by מִרְוֶן, with מִנְוֶן of the foregoing, and extends on to the end of this Hezekiah collection:

Ver. 22 A man of anger stirreth up strife;

And a passionate man aboundeth in transgression.

Line first is a variation of xv. 18a and xxviii. 25a. אִישׁ and בַּעַל as here, but in the reverse order at xxii. 24.<sup>1</sup> אִישׁ here means anger, not the nose, viz. the expanded nostrils (Schultens). In רַב־פְּשָׁע the פְּשָׁע is, after xiv. 29, xxviii. 16, xx. 27, the governed genitive; Hitzig construes it in the sense of רַב־פְּשָׁע, Ps. xix. 2, with יַגְרָה, but one does not say יַגְרָה פְּשָׁע; and that which is true of רַבִּים, that, after the manner of a numeral, it can precede its substantive (vid. under Ps. vii. 26, lxxxix. 51), cannot be said of רַב. Much (great) in wickedness denotes one who heaps up many wicked actions, and burdens himself with greater guilt (cf. פְּשָׁע, ver. 16). The wrathful man stirreth up (vid. under xv. 18) strife, for he breaks through the mutual relations of men, which rest on mutual esteem and love, and by means of his passionate conduct he makes enemies of those against whom he thinks that he has reason for being angry; that on account of which he is angry can be settled without producing such hostility, but passion impels him on, and misrepresents the matter; it embitters hearts, and tears them asunder. The LXX. has, instead of רב, ἐξώρουξεν, of dreaming, ברה (xvi. 27).

Ver. 23 passes from anger to haughtiness :

A man's pride will bring him low ;
But the lowly attaineth to honour.

Thus we translate הַתְּמַנֶּה בְּבוֹד (Lat. honorem obtinet) in accord with xi. 16, and שִׁפְלֵ-רוּחַ with xvi. 19, where, however, שִׁפְלֵ is not adj. as here, but inf. The haughty man obscures the honour which he has by this, that he boasts immeasurably of it, and aspires yet more after it; the lowly man, on the other hand, obtains honour without his seeking it, honour before God and before men, which would be of no worth were it not connected with the honour before God. The LXX.: τοὺς δὲ ταπεινόφρονας ἐρείδει δόξη κύριος. This κύριος is indeed not contrary to the sense, but it is opposed to the style. Why the 24th verse should now follow is, as regards the contents and the expression, hard to say; but one observes that vers. 22–27 follow each other, beginning with the successive letters of the alphabet א (ב), ג, ד, ה, ו, ז, ח (ת).

Ver. 24 He that taketh part with a thief hateth himself;
He heareth the oath and confesseth not.

Hitzig renders the first member as the pred. of the second: "he who does not bring to light such sins as require an atonement (Lev. v. 1 ff.), but shares the secret of them with the sinner, is not better than one who is a partner with a thief, who hateth himself." The construction of the verse, he remarks, is not understood by any interpreter. It is not, however, so cross,—for, understood as Hitzig thinks it ought to be, the author should have expressed the subject by שִׂמַע אֱלֹהֵי גֵיר וְלֹא יִגִּיד—but is simple as the order of the words and the verbal form require it. The oath is, after Lev. v. 1, that of the judge who adjures the partner of the thief by God to tell the truth; but he conceals it, and burdens his soul with a crime worthy of death, for from a concealer he becomes in addition a perjured man.

Ver. 25 Fear of man bringeth a snare with it ;
But he that trusteth in Jahve is advanced.

It sounds strange, Hitzig remarks, that here in the Book of an Oriental author one should be warned against the fear of man. It is enough, in reply to this, to point to Isa. li. 12f. One of the two translations in the LXX. (cf. Jerome and Luther) has found this "strange" thought not so strange as not to render it, and that in the gnomic aorist: φοβηθέντες καὶ αἰσχυθέντες ἀνθρώπους ὑπεσκελίσθησαν. And why should not הַרְדָּה אֲדָם be able to mean the fear of man (cowardice)? Perhaps not so that אֲדָם is the gen. objecti, but so that הֲרַדָּה אֲדָם means to frighten men, as in 1 Sam. xiv. 15. חֲרַדַּת אֱלֹהִים, a trembling of God; cf. Ps. lxiv. 2; פֶּחַד אֵיב, the fear occasioned by the enemy, although this connection, after Deut. ii. 25, can also mean fear of the enemy (gen. objecti). To יָהֵן, occasioned = brings as a consequence with it, cf. x. 10, xiii. 15; the synalage generis is as at xii. 25a: it is at least strange with fem. infinit. and infinitival nouns, xvi. 16, xxv. 14; Ps. lxxiii. 28; but הַרְדָּה (trembling) is such a nom. actionis, Ewald, § 238a. Regarding יִשָּׁן (for which the LXX.<sup>1</sup> σωθήσεται, and LXX.<sup>2</sup> εὐφρανθήσεται = יִשְׂמַח), vid. at xviii. 10. He who is put into a terror by a danger with which men threaten him, so as to do from the fear of man what is wrong, and to conceal the truth, falls thereby into a snare laid by himself—it does not help him that by this means he has delivered himself from the danger, for he brands himself as a coward, and sins against God, and falls into an agony of conscience (reproach and anguish of heart) which is yet worse to bear than the evil wherewith he was threatened. It is only confidence in God that truly saves. The fear of man plunges him into yet greater suffering than that from which he would escape; confidence in God, on the other hand, lifts a man internally, and at last externally, above all his troubles.

Ver. 26. A similar gen. connection that between הֲרַדָּה אֲדָם exists between מִשְׁפַּט־אִישׁ :

Many seek the countenance of the ruler ;
Yet from Jahve cometh the judgment of men.

Line first is a variation of xix. 6a, cf. 1 Kings x. 24. It lies near to interpret שׂא as gen. obj.: the judgment regarding any one, i.e. the estimating of the man, the decision regarding him; and it is also possible, for מִשְׁפָּטִי, Ps. xvii. 2, may be understood of the judgment which I have, as well as of the judgment pronounced regarding me (cf. Lam. iii. 59). But the usage appears to think of the genit. after מִשְׁפָּט always as subjective, e.g. xvi. 33, of the decision which the lot brings, Job xxxvi. 6, the right to which the poor have a claim; so that thus in the passage before us מִשְׁפָּט־אִישׁ means the right of a man, as that which is proper or fitting to him, the judgment of a man, as that to which as appropriate he has a claim (LXX. τὸ δίκαιον ἀνδρὶ). Whether the genit. be rendered in the one way or the other, the meaning remains the same: it is not the ruler who finally decides the fate and determines the worth of a man, as they appear to think who with eye-service court his favour and fawn upon him.

Ver. 27 An abomination to a righteous man is a villanous man;

And an abomination to the godless is he who walketh uprightly.

In all the other proverbs which begin with תוֹעֵבָה, e.g. xi. 20, יהוה follows as genit., here צַדִּיקִים, whose judgment is like that of God. אִישׁ עָלַי is an abhorrence to them, not as a man, but just as of such a character; עָלַי is the direct contrast to יִשְׁרָאֵל. The righteous sees in the villanous man, who boldly does that which is opposed to morality and to honour, an adversary of his God; on the other hand, the godless sees in the man that walketh uprightly (יִשְׁרָר־דָּרָה), as at Ps. xxxvii. 14) his adversary, and the condemnation of himself.

With this doubled  $\eta$  the Book of Proverbs, prepared by the men of Hezekiah, comes to an end. It closes, in accordance with its intention announced at the beginning, with a proverb concerning the king, and a proverb of the great moral contrasts which are found in all circles of society up to the very throne itself.

FIRST APPENDIX TO THE SECOND SOLOMONIC COLLECTION OF PROVERBS.—CHAP. XXX.

The title of this first appendix, according to the text lying before us, is:

“The words of Agur the son of Jakeh, the utterance.”

This title of the following collection of proverbs is limited by Olewejored; and אַגוּר בֶּן־יָכֶחַ, separated from the author's name by Rebia, is interpreted as a second inscription, standing on one line with אַגוּר, as particularizing that first. The old synagogue tradition which, on the ground of the general title i. 1, regarded the whole Book of Proverbs as the work of Solomon, interpreted the words, “Agur the son of Jakeh,” as an allegorical designation of Solomon, who appropriated the words of the Tōra to the king, Deut. xvii. 17, and again rejected them, for he said: God is with me, and I shall not do it (viz. take many wives, without thereby suffering injury), Schemōth rabba, c. 6. The translation of Jerome: Verba congregantis filii Vomentis, is the echo of this Jewish interpretation. One would suppose that if “Agur” were Solomon's name, “Jakeh” must be that of David; but another interpretation in Midrash Mishle renders בֶּן (“son”) as the designation of the bearer of a quality, and sees in “Agur” one who girded (אָגַר = הִגַּר) his loins for wisdom; and in “son of Jakeh” one free from sin (בֶּן־יָכֶחַ חַטָּא וְעַתָּה). In the Middle Ages this mode of interpretation, which is historically and linguistically absurd, first began to prevail; for then the view was expressed by several (Aben Ezra, and Meiri the Spaniard) that Agur ben Jakeh was a wise man of the time of Solomon. That of Solomon's time, they thence conclude (blind to xxv. 1) that Solomon collected together these proverbs of the otherwise unknown wise man. In truth, the age of the man must remain undecided; and at all events, the time of Hezekiah is the fixed period from which, where possible, it is to be sought. The name “Agur” means the gathered (vi. 8, x. 5), or, after the predominant meaning of the Arab. âjar, the bribed, mercede conductum; also the collector (cf. אֶקֶיֶשׁ, fowler); or the word might mean, perhaps, industrious in collecting (cf. ’alwak, attached to, and other examples in Mühlau, p. 36).

Regarding בַּן = binj (usual in בְּנֵי-בָנִים), and its relation to the Arab. ibn, vid. Genesis, p. 555. The name Jakeh is more transparent. The noun יָקֵה, xxx. 17, Gen. xlix. 10, means the obedient, from the verb יָקַה; but, formed from this verbal stem, the form of the word would be יָקֵה (not יָקֵה). The form יָקֵה is the participial adj. from יָקַה, like יָפֵה from יָפַה; and the Arab. wakay, corresponding to this יָקַה, viii. ittakay, to be on one's guard, particularly before God; the usual word for piety regarded as εὐλάβεια. Mühlau (p. 37) rightly sees in the proper names Eltekeh [Josh. xix. 44] and Eltekon [Josh. xv. 59] the secondary verbal stem יָקַה, which, like e.g. יָקַה (הָאָה), יָקַה, יָקַה, has originated from the reflexive, which in these proper names, supposing that לֵא is subj., means to take under protection; not: to give heed = cavere. All these meanings are closely connected. In all these three forms—יָקַה, יָקַה, יָקַה—the verb is a synonym of שָׁמַר; so that יָקַה denotes<sup>1</sup> the pious, either as taking care, εὐλαβής, or as keeping, i.e. observing, viz. that which is commanded by God.

In consequence of the accentuation, מִשְׁשָׁן is the second designation of this string of proverbs, and is parallel with רַבְרִי. But that is absolutely impossible. מִשְׁשָׁן (from מִשְׁשָׁן, to raise, viz. the voice, to begin to express) denotes the utterance, and according to the usage of the words before us, the divine utterance, the message of God revealed to the prophet and announced by him, for the most part, if not always (vid. at Isa. xiii. 1), the message of God as the avenger. Accordingly Jewish interpreters (e.g. M<sup>c</sup>îri and Arama) remark that מִשְׁשָׁן designates what follows, as רַבְרִי בְּבוֹאֵי, i.e. an utterance of the prophetic spirit. But, on the other hand, what follows begins with the confession of human weakness and short-sightedness; and, moreover, we read proverbs not of a divine but altogether of a human and even of a decaying spiritual stamp, besides distinguished from the Solomonic proverbs by this, that the I of the poet, which remains in the background, here comes to the front. This משנ of prophetic utterances does not at all harmonize with the following string of proverbs. It does not so harmonize on this account, because one theme does not run through these proverbs which the sing. משנ requires. It comes to this, that משנ never occurs by itself in the sense of a divine, a solemn utterance, without having some more clearly defining addition, though it should be only a demonstrative הִנֵּה (Isa. xiv. 28). But what author, whether poet or prophet, would give to his work the title of משנ, which in itself means everything, and thus nothing! And now: the utterance—what can the article at all mean here? This question has remained unanswered by every interpreter. Ewald also sees himself constrained to clothe the naked word; he does it by reading together המשנ הננ, and translating the “sublime saying which he spoke.” But apart from the consideration that Jer. xxiii. 31 proves nothing for the use of this use of הננ, the form ננ (הגבר) is supported by 2 Sam. xxiii. 1 (cf. ver. 5 with 2 Sam. xxii. 31); and besides, the omission of the אשר, and in addition of the relative pronoun (אשר), would be an inaccuracy not at all to be expected on the brow of this gnology (vid. Hitzig). If we leave the altogether unsuspected הננ undisturbed, המשנ will be a nearer definition of the name of the author. The Midrash has a right suspicion, for it takes together Hamassa and Agur ben Jakeh, and explains: of Agur the son of Jakeh, who took upon himself the yoke of the most blessed. The Græcus Venetus comes nearer what is correct, for it translates: λόγοι Ἀγούρου υἱέως Ἰακέως τοῦ Μασσίου. We connect xxxi. 1, where לְמוֹאֵל מֶלֶךְ, “Lemuel (the) king,” is a linguistic impossibility, and thus, according to the accentuation lying before us, מֶלֶךְ מִשָּׁנ also are to be connected together; thus it appears that מֶלֶךְ מִשָּׁנ must be the name of a country and a people. It was Hitzig who first made this Columbus-egg to stand. But this is the case only so far as he recognised in לְמוֹאֵל מֶלֶךְ מִשָּׁנ a Lemuel, the king of Massa, and recognised this Massa also in xxx. 1 (vid. his dissertation: Das Königreich Massa [the kingdom of Massa], in Zeller's Theolog. Jahrb. 1844, and his Comm.), viz. the Israelitish Massa named in Gen. xxv. 14 (= 1 Chron. i. 30) along with Dumah and Tema. But he proceeds in a hair-splitting way, and with ingenious hypothesis, without any valid foundation. That this Dumah is the Dumat el-jendel (cf. under Isa. xxi. 11) lying in the north of Nejed, near the southern frontiers of Syria, the name and the founding of which is referred by the Arabians to Dûm the son of Ishmael, must be regarded as possible, and consequently Massa is certainly to be sought in Northern Arabia. But if, on the ground of 1 Chron. iv. 42 f., he finds there a Simeonitic kingdom, and finds its origin in this, that the tribe of Simeon originally belonging to the ten tribes, and thus coming from the north settled in the south of Judah, and from thence in the days of Hezekiah, fleeing before the Assyrians, were driven farther and farther in a south-east direction towards Northern Arabia; on the contrary, it has been shown by Graf (The Tribe of Simeon, a contribution to the history of Israel, 1866) that Simeon never settled in the north of the Holy Land, and according to existing evidences extended their settlement from Negeb partly into the Idumean highlands, but not into the highlands of North Arabia. Hitzig thinks that there are found traces of the Massa of Agur and Lemuel in the Jewish town<sup>1</sup> of טילמאס, of Benjamin of Tudela, lying three days' journey from Chebar, and in the proper name (Arab.) Malsâ (smooth), which is given to a rock between Tema and Wady el-Kora (vid. Kosegarten's Chrestom. p. 143); but how notched his ingenuity here is need scarcely be shown. By means of more cautious combinations Mùhlau has placed the residence of Agur and Lemuel in the Hauran mountain range, near which there is a Dumah, likewise a Têmdâ; and in the name of the town Mismûje, lying in the Lejâ, is probably found the Mishma which is named along with Massa, Gen. xxv. 14; and from this that is related in 1 Chron. v. 9 f., 18–22, of warlike expeditions on the part of the tribes lying on the east of the Jordan against the Hagarenes and their allies Jetur, Nephish, and Nodab,<sup>2</sup> it is with certainty concluded that in the Hauran, and in the wilderness which stretches behind the Euphrates towards it, Israelitish tribes have had their abode, whose territory had been early seized by the trans-Jordanic tribes, and was held "until the captivity," 1 Chron. v. 22, i.e. till the Assyrian deportation. This designation of time is almost as unfavourable to Mührlau's theory of a Massa in the Hauran, inhabited by Israelitish tribes from the other side, as the expression "to Mount Seir" (1 Chron. iv. 42) is to Hitzig's North Arabian Massa inhabited by Simeonites. We must leave it undecided whether Dumah and Têmâ, which the Toledoth of Ismael name in the neighbourhood of Massa, are the east Hauran districts now existing; or as Blau (Deut. Morgl. Zeit. xxv. 539), with Hitzig, supposes, North Arabian districts (cf. Genesis, p. 377, 4th ed.).<sup>1</sup> "Be it as it may, the contents and the language of this difficult piece almost necessarily point to a region bordering on the Syro-Arabian waste. Ziegler's view (Neue Uebers. der Denksprüche Salomo's, 1791, p. 29), that Lemuel was probably an emir of an Arabian tribe in the east of Jordan, and that a wise Hebrew translated those proverbs of the emir into Hebrew, is certainly untenable, but does not depart so far from the end as may appear at the first glance" (Mührlau).<sup>2</sup> If the text-punctuation lying before us rests on the false supposition that Massa, xxx. 1, xxxi. 1, is a generic name, and not a proper name, then certainly the question arises whether מַסָּא should not be used instead of מַסָּא, much more מַסָּא, which is suggested as possible in the article "Sprüche," in Herzog's Encycl. xiv. 694. Were מַסָּא, Gen. x. 30, the region Μεσσηνη, on the northern border of the Persian Gulf, in which Apamea lay, then it might be said in favour of this, that as the histories of Muhammed and of Benjamin of Tudela prove the existence of an old Jewish occupation of North Arabia, but without anything being heard of a מַסָּא, the Talmud bears testimony<sup>3</sup> to a Jewish occupation of Mesene, and particularly of Apamea; and by the mother of Lemuel, the king of Mesha, one may think<sup>1</sup> of Helena, celebrated in Jewish writings, queen of Adiabene, the mother of Monabaz and Izates. But the identity of the Mesha of the catalogue of nations with Μεσώνη is uncertain, and the Jewish population of that place dates at least from the time of the Sassanides to the period of the Babylonian exile. We therefore hold by the Ishmaelite Massa, whether North Arabian or Hauranian; but we by no means subscribe Mühlau's non possumus non negare, Agurum et Lemuëlem proselytos e paganis, non Israelitas fuisse. The religion of the tribes descended from Abraham, so far as it had not degenerated, was not to be regarded as idolatrous. It was the religion which exists to the present day among the great Ishmaelite tribes of the Syrian desert as the true tradition of their fathers under the name of Din Ibrâhîm (Abraham's religion); which, as from Wetzstein, we have noted in the Commentary on Job (p. 387 and elsewhere), continues along with Mosaism among the nomadic tribes of the wilderness; which shortly before the appearance of Christianity in the country beyond the Jordan, produced doctrines coming into contact with the teachings of the gospel; which at that very time, according to historic evidences (e.g. Mêjâsinî's chronicles of the Kâ'be), was dominant even in the towns of Hiçâz; and in the second century after Christ, was for the first time during the repeated migration of the South Arabians again oppressed by Greek idolatry, and was confined to the wilderness; which gave the mightiest impulse to the rise of Islam, and furnished its best component part; and which towards the end of the last century, in the country of Neged, pressed to a reform of Islam, and had as a result the Wahabite doctrine. If we except xxx. 5 f., the proverbs of Agur and Lemuel contain nothing which may not be conceived from a non-Israelitish standpoint on which the author of the Book of Job placed himself. Even xxx. 5 f. is not there (cf. Job vi. 10, xxiii. 12) without parallels. When one compares Deut. iv. 2, xiii. 1, and 2 Sam. xxii. 31 = Ps. xviii. 31 (from which ver. 5 of the proverbs of Agur is derived, with the change of יהוה into אלהים), Agur certainly appears as one intimately acquainted with the revealed religion of Israel, and with their literature. But must we take the two Massites therefore, with Hitzig, Mühlau, and Zöckler, as born Israelites? Since the Bible history knows no Israelitish king outside of the Holy Land, we regard it as more probable that King Lemuel and his countryman Agur were Ishmaelites who had raised themselves above the religion of Abraham, and recognised the religion of Israel as its completion.

<sup>2</sup> Mùhlau combines Nodab with Nudêbe to the south-east of Bosra; Blau (Deut. Morg. Zeit. xxv. 566), with the Ναβδαῖοι of Eupolemos named along with the Ναβαταῖοι. The Kamûs has Nadab as the name of a tribe.

If we now return to the words of xxx. 1a, Hitzig makes Agur Lemuel's brother, for he vocalizes אָגוּר בְּרֵי יִקְהָה מַשָּׁא, i.e. Agur the son of her whom Massa obeys. Ripa and Björck of Sweden, and Stuart of America, adopt this view. But supposing that יִקְהָה is connected with the accusative of him who is obeyed, בֵּן, as the representative of such an attributive clause, as of its virtual genitive, is elsewhere without example; and besides, it is unadvisable to explain away the proper name יִקְהָה, which speaks for itself. There are two other possibilities of comprehending אָגוּר, without the change, or with the change of a single letter. Wetzstein, on xxxi. 1, has said regarding Mühlau's translation "King of Massa:" "I would more cautiously translate, 'King of the Massans,' since this interpretation is unobjectionable; while, on the contrary, this is not terra Massa, nor urbs Massa. It is true that the inhabitants of Massa were not pure nomads, after xxx. and xxxi., but probably, like the other tribes of Israel, they were half nomads, who possessed no great land as exclusive property, and whose chief place did not perhaps bear their name. The latter may then have been as rare in ancient times as it is in the present day. Neither the Sammar, the Harb, the Muntefik, nor other half nomads whom I know in the southern parts of the Syrian desert, have any place which bears their name. So also, it appears, the people of Uz (עוּז), which we were constrained to think of as a dominant, firmly-settled race, since it had so great a husbandman as Job, possessed no קְרִית עוּז. Only in certain cases, where a tribe resided for many centuries in and around a place, does the name of this tribe appear to have remained attached to it. Thus from נוּף דּוּמָה, 'the low-country of the Dumahns,' or קְרִית דּוּמָה, 'the city of Dumahns,' as also from קְרִית תֵּמָנָה, 'the city of the Temans,' gradually there arose (probably not till the decline and fall of this tribe) a city of Dumah, a haven of Midian, and the like, so that the primary meaning of the name came to be lost." It is clear that, from the existence of an Ishmaelite tribe  $\text{מִשְׁנָה}$ , there does not necessarily follow a similar name given to a region. The conj.  $\text{מִמִּשְׁנָה}$ , for  $\text{הַמִּשְׁנָה}$  (vid. Herzog's Encycl. xiv. 702), has this against it, that although it is good Heb., it directly leads to this conclusion (e.g. 2 Sam. xxiii. 20, 29, cf. 1 Kings xvii. 1). Less objectionable is Bunsen's and Böttcher's  $\text{הַמִּשְׁנָה}$ . But perhaps  $\text{הַמִּשְׁנָה}$  may also have the same signification; far rather at least this than that which Malbim, after  $\text{הַיִּשָּׁר הַמִּשְׁנָה}$ , 1 Chron. xv. 27, introduced with the LXX.  $\alpha\rho\chi\omega\nu \tau\acute{\omega}\nu \acute{\alpha}\delta\delta\acute{\omega}\nu$ : "We ought then to compare 2 Sam. xxiii. 24,  $\text{וַיְרִידוּ בֵּית לָחֶם}$ , a connection in which, after the analogy of such Arabic connections as kaysu 'aylana, Kais of the tribe of 'Ailân (Ibn Coteiba, 13 and 83), or Ma'nu Tayyin, Ma'n of the tribe of Tay, i.e. Ma'n belonging to this tribe, as distinguished from other men and families of this name (Schol. Hamasee 144. 3),  $\text{בֵּית לָחֶם}$  is thought of as genit."<sup>1</sup> (Mühlau). That  $\text{בֵּית לָחֶם}$  (instead of  $\text{בֵּית הַלְחָמִי}$ ) is easily changed, with Thenius and Wellhausen, after 1 Chron. xi. 26, into  $\text{מִבֵּית לָחֶם}$ , and in itself it is not altogether homogeneous, because without the article. Yet it may be supposed that instead of  $\text{מִשְׁנָה}$ , on account of the appellat. of the proper name (the lifting up, elatio), the word  $\text{הַמִּשְׁנָה}$  might be also employed. And since  $\text{בְּנֵי יָקִיָּה}$ , along with  $\text{אֲגוּר}$ , forms, as it were, one compositum, and does not at all destroy<sup>2</sup> the regulating force of  $\text{אֲגוּר}$ , the expression is certainly, after the Arabic usus loq., to be thus explained: The words of Agur the son of Jakeh, of the tribe (the country) of Massa.

The second line of this verse, as it is punctuated, is to be rendered :

The saying of the man to Ithiel, to Ithiel and Uchal, not Ukkal; for, since Athias and van der Hooght, the incorrect form  $\text{וְאִכָּל}$  has become current. J. H. Michaelis has the right form of the word  $\text{וְאִכָּל}$ . Thus, with  $\text{כ}$  rophatum, it is to be read after the Masora, for it adds to this word the remark  $\text{לִית}$

<sup>1</sup> In  $\text{הָעַם וְגו'$ , Jer. viii. 5,  $\text{יְרִישׁ}$  is thought of as genit., although it may be also nom., after the scheme of apposition instead of annexion. That it is genit., cf. Philippi's St. Const. pp. 192-195.

<sup>2</sup> We say, in Arab., without any anomaly, e.g. Alju-bnu-Muhammadin Tajjün, i.e. the Ali son of Muhammed, of the tribe (from the tribe) of Tay; cf. Josh. iii. 11; Isa. xxviii. 1, lxiii. 11; and Deut. iii. 13.

וּחֶסֶד, and counts it among the forty-eight words sometimes written defectively without ו (vid. this list in the Masora finalis, 27b, Col. 4); and since it only remarks the absence of the letter lengthening the word where no dagesh follows the vocal, it thus supposes that the ו has no dagesh, as it is also found in Codd. (also Jaman.) written with the Raphe. לְאִתִּיאל is doubly accented; the Tarcha represents the Metheg, after the rule Thorath Emeth, p. 11. The ל after נָאִם is, in the sense of the punctuation, the same dat. as in לְאִרְנֵי, Ps. cx. 1, and has an apparent right in him who asks כִּי תִרְעֵנִי in the 4th verse. Ithiel and Uchal must be, after an old opinion, sons, or disciples, or contemporaries, of Agur. Thus, e.g., Gesenius, in his Lex. under אִתִּיאל, where as yet his reference to Neb. xi. 7 is wanting. אִתִּיאל is rendered by Jefet and other Karaites, “there is a God” = אִתִּי אל; but it is perhaps equivalent to אֵל אִתִּי, “God is with me;” as for אִתִּי, the form אִתִּי is also found. אָכַל (אֶכְל) nowhere occurs as a proper name; but in the region of proper names, everything, or almost everything, is possible.<sup>1</sup> Ewald sees in 1b–14 a dialogue: in vers. 2–4 the הַגִּבּוֹר, i.e. as the word appears to him, the rich, haughty mocker, who has worn out his life, speaks; and in 5–14 the “Mitmirgott” [= God with me], or, more fully, “Mitmirgott-sobinichstark” [= God with me, so am I strong], i.e. the pious, humble man answers. “The whole,” he remarks, “is nothing but poetical; and it is poetical also that this discourse of mockery is called an elevated strain.” But (1) גִּבּוֹר is a harmless word; and in נָאִם הַגִּבּוֹר, Num. xxiv. 3, 15, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1, it is a solemn, earnest one; (2) a proper name, consisting of two clauses connected by Vav, no matter whether it be an actual or a symbolical name, is not capable of being authenticated; Ewald, § 274b, recognises in וְנִדְּלַתִּי וְגוֹ, 1 Chron. xxv. 4, the naming, not of one son of Heman, but of two; and (3) it would be a very forced, inferior poetry if the poet placed one half of the name in one line, and then, as if constrained to take a new breath, gave the other half of it in a second line. But, on the other hand, that אִתִּיאל and אָכַל are the names of two different persons, to whom the address of the man is directed, is attested by the, in this case aimless, anadiplosis, the here unpoetical parallelism with reservation. The repetition, as Fleischer remarks, of the name Ithiel, which may rank with Uchal, as the son or disciple of Agur, has probably its reason only in this, that one placed a second more extended phrase simply along with the shorter. The case is different; but Fleischer's supposition, that the poet himself cannot have thus written, is correct. We must not strike out either of the two לְאִתִּיאל; but the supposed proper names must be changed as to their vocalization into a declaratory clause. A principal argument lies in ver. 2, beginning with כִּי: this כִּי supposes a clause which it established; for, with right, Mühlau maintains that כִּי, in the affirmative sense, which, by means of aposiopesis, proceeds from the confirmative, may open the conclusion and enter as confirmatory into the middle of the discourse (e.g. Isa. xxxii. 13), but cannot stand abruptly at the commencement of a discourse (cf. under Isa. xv. 1 and vii. 9). But if we now ask how it is to be vocalized, there comes at the same time into the sphere of investigation the striking phrase נָאִם הַגִּבֹּר. This phrase all the Greek interpreters attest by their rendering, τὰδε λέγει ὁ ἀνὴρ (Venet. φησὶν ἀνὴρ); besides, this is to be brought forward from the wilderness of the old attempts at a translation, that the feeling of the translators strives against the recognition in נָאִם of a second personal name: the Peshito omits it; the Targ. translates it, after the Midrash, by וְאִנִּי (I may do it); as Theodotion, καὶ δυνήσομαι, which is probably also meant by the καὶ συνήσομαι (from συνίεναι, to be acquainted with) of the Venet.; the LXX. with καὶ παύομαι; and Aquila, καὶ τέλεσον (both from the verb כָּלָה). As an objection to נָאִם הַגִּבֹּר is this, that it is so bald without being followed, as at Num. xxiv. 3, 15, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1, with the attributive description of the man. Luther was determined thereby to translate: discourse of the man Leithiel . . . And why could not לְאִתִּיאל be a proper-name connection like אֲנִי לְאִתִּיאל (אֲנִי לְאִתִּיאל)? Interpreted in the sense of "I am troubled concerning God," it might be a symbolical name of the φιλόσοφος, as of one who strives after the knowledge of divine things with all his strength. But (1) אֲנִי, with the accus. obj., is not established, and one is rather inclined to think of a name such as אֲנִי לְאִתִּיאל, after Ps. lxxxiv. 3; (2) moreover, לְאִתִּיאל cannot be at one time a personal name, and at another time a declarative sentence—one must both times transform it into לָאִיתִי אֵל; but אֵל has to be taken as a vocative, not as accus., as is done by J. D. Michaelis, Hitzig, Bunsen, Zöckler, and others, thus: I have wearied myself, O God! . . . The nakedness of הַנִּבְרֵר is accordingly not covered by the first Leithiel. Mühlau, in his work, seeks to introduce מַמְשֵׁה changed into מַמְשֵׁה: “The man from Massa,” and prefers to interpret הַנִּבְרֵר generically:<sup>1</sup> “proverb (confession) of the man (i.e. the man must confess): I have wearied myself, O God! . . .” Nothing else in reality remains. The article may also be retrospective: the man just now named, whose “words” are announced, viz. Agur. But why was not the expression נַאֲמַר אַגוּר then used? Because it is not poetical to say: “the (previously named) man.” On the other hand, what follows applies so that one may understand, under הַנִּבְרֵר, any man you choose. There are certainly among men more than too many who inquire not after God (Ps. xiv. 2 f.). But there are also not wanting those who feel sorrowfully the distance between them and God. Agur introduces such a man as speaking, for he generalizes his own experience. Ps. xxxvi. 2 (vid. under this passage) shows that a proper name does not necessarily follow נַאֲמַר. With נַאֲמַר הַנִּבְרֵר Agur then introduces what the man has to confess—viz. a man earnestly devoted to God; for with נַאֲמַר the ideas of that which comes from the heart and the solemnly earnest are connected. If Agur so far generalizes his own experience, the passionate anadiplosis does not disturb this. After long contemplation of the man, he must finally confess: I have troubled myself, O God! I have troubled myself, O God! . . . That the trouble was directed toward God is perhaps denoted by the alliteration of לָאִיתִי with אֵל. But what now, further? וְאֵבֶל is read as וְאֵבֶל, וְאֵבֶל, וְאֵבֶל, וְאֵבֶל, and it has also been read as וְאֵבֶל. The reading וְאֵבֶל no one advocates; this that follows says the direct contrary, et potui (pollui). Geiger (Urschrift, p. 61) supports the reading וְאֵבֶל, for he renders it interrogatively: “I wearied myself in vain about God, I wearied myself in vain about God; why should I be able to do it?" But since one may twist any affirmative clause in this way, and from a yes make a no, one should only, in cases of extreme necessity, consent to such a question in the absence of an interrogative word. Böttcher's לֹא־אֵיתִי, I have wearied myself out in vain, is not Hebrew. But at any rate the expression might be אֵל־לֹא, if only the Vav did not stand between the words! If one might transpose the letters, then we might gain לֹא־אֵל, according to which the LXX. translates: οὐ δυνήσομαι. At all events, this despairing as to the consequence of further trouble, "I shall be able to do nothing (shall bring it to nothing)," would be better than וְאֵלֵךְ (and I shall withdraw—become faint), for which, besides, וְאֵלֵךְ should be used (cf. xxii. 8 with Job xxxiii. 21). One expects, after לֹא־אֵיתִי, the expression of that which is the consequence of earnest and long-continued endeavour. Accordingly Hitzig reads וְאֵלֵךְ, and I have become dull—suitable to the sense, but unsatisfactory on this account, because כָּלֵל, in the sense of the Arab. kall, hebescere, is foreign to the Heb. usus loq. Thus וְאֵלֵךְ will be a fut. consec. of בָּלָה. J. D. Michaelis, and finally Böttcher, read it as fut. consec. Piel וְאֵלֵךְ or וְאֵלֵךְ (vid. regarding this form in pause under xxv. 9), "and I have made an end;" but it is not appropriate to the inquirer here complaining, when dissatisfaction with his results had determined him to abandon his research, and let himself be no more troubled. We therefore prefer to read with Dahler, and, finally, with Mühlau and Zöckler, וְאֵלֵךְ, and I have withdrawn. The form understood by Hitzig as a pausal form is, in the unchangeableness of its vocals, as accordant with rule as those of יָחַד, xxvii. 17, which lengthen the — of their first syllables in pause. And if Hitzig objects that too much is said, for one of such meditation does not depart, we answer, that if the inquiry of the man who speaks here has completed itself by the longing of his spirit and his soul (Ps. lxxxiv. 3, cxliii. 7), he might also say of himself, in person, כָּלֵלִי or וְאֵלֵךְ. An inquiry proceeding not merely from intellectual, but, before all, from practical necessity, is meant—the doubled לֹא־אֵיתִי means that he applied thereto the whole strength of his inner and his outer man; and וְאֵלֵךְ, that he nevertheless did not reach his end, but wearied himself in vain. By this explanation which we give to 1a, no change of its accents is required; but 1b has to be written:

נֶאֱמַר הִנְבֵּר לְאִתִּי אֵל
לְאִתִּי אֵל וְאֵבֶל: <sup>1</sup>

Vers. 2, 3. The כי now following confirms the fruitlessness of the long zealous search:

For I am without reason for a man,
And a man's understanding I have not.

3 And I have not learned wisdom,

That I may possess the knowledge of the All-Holy.

He who cannot come to any fixed state of consecration, inasmuch as he is always driven more and more back from the goal he aims at, thereby brings guilt upon himself as a sinner so great, that every other man stands above him, and he is deep under them all. So here Agur finds the reason why in divine things he has failed to attain unto satisfying intelligence, not in the ignorance and inability common to all men—he appears to himself as not a man at all, but as an irrational beast, and he misses in himself the understanding which a man properly might have and ought to have. The מִן of מֵאִישׁ is not the partitive, like Isa. xliv. 11, not the usual comparative: than any one (Böttcher), which ought to be expressed by מִכָּל-אִישׁ, but it is the negative, as Isa. lii. 14; Fleischer: rudior ego sum quam ut homo appeller, or: brutus ego, hominis non similis. Regarding בַּעַר, vid. under xii. 1.<sup>2</sup> Ver. 3 now says that he went into no school of wisdom, and for that reason in his wrestling after knowledge could attain to nothing, because the necessary conditions to this were wanting to him. But then the question arises: Why this complaint? He must first go to school in order to obtain, according to the word “To him who hath is given,” that for which he strove. Thus לְמַדְתִּי refers to learning in the midst of wrestling; but

<sup>2</sup> According to the Arab. בַּעַר is not a beast as grazing, but as dropping stercus (ba'r, camel's or sheep's droppings); to the R. בַּר, Mühlau rightly gives the meanings of separating, whence are derived the meanings of grazing as well as of removing (cleansing) (cf. Pers. thak karadu, to make clean = to make clean house, tabula rasa).

לְמַד, spiritually understood, signifies the acquiring of a kennens [knowledge] or könnens [knowledge=ability]: he has not brought it out from the deep point of his condition of knowledge to make wisdom his own, so that he cannot adjudge to himself knowledge of the all-holy God (for this knowledge is the kernel and the star of true wisdom). If we read לֹא אָדַע בֶּב, this would be synchronistic, nesciebam, with לְמַדְתִּי standing on the same line. On the contrary, the positive אָדַע subordinates itself to וְלֹא-לְמַדְתִּי, as the Arab. fāa' lama, in the sense of (ita) ut scirem scientiam Sanctissimi, thus of a conclusion, like Lam. i. 19, a clause expressive of the intention, Ewald, § 347a. קִדְשִׁים is, as at ix. 10, the name of God in a superlative sense, like the Arab. el-kuddūs.

Ver. 4 Who hath ascended to the heavens and descended?

Who hath grasped the wind in his fists?

Who hath bound up the waters in a garment?

Who hath set right all the ends of the earth?

What is his name, and what his son's name, if thou knowest?

The first question here, מִי וְגו', is limited by Pazer; עֲלֵה-שָׁמַיִם has Metheg in the third syllable before the tone. The second question is at least shut off by Pazer, but, contrary to the rule, that Pazer does not repeat itself in a verse; Cod. Erfurt. 2, and several older editions, have for בַּחֲפָנָיו more correctly בַּחֲפָנָיו with Rebia. So much for the interpunction. הַפְּנִיִּים are properly not the two fists, for the fist—that is, the hand gathered into a ball, pugnus—is called אֶגְרִיף; while, on the contrary, הַפֶּן (in all the three dialects) denotes the palm of the hand, vola (vid. Lev. xvi. 12); yet here the hands are represented after they have seized the thing as shut, and thus certainly as fists. The dual points to the dualism of the streams of air produced by the disturbance of the equilibrium; he who rules this movement has, as it were, the north or east wind in one fist, and the south or west wind in the other, to let it forth according to his pleasure from this prison (Isa. xxiv. 22). The third question is explained by Job xxvi. 8; the שְׂמָלָה (from שָׂמַל, comprehendere) is a figure of the clouds which contain the upper waters, as Job xxxviii. 37, the bottles of heaven. "All the ends of the earth" are as at five other places, e.g. Ps. xxii. 28, the most distant, most remote parts of the earth; the setting up of all these most remote boundaries (margins) of the earth is equivalent to the making fast and forming the limits to which the earth extends (Ps. lxxiv. 17), the determining of the compass of the earth and the form of its figures.  $\text{מִי הָיָה}$  is in symphony with Job xxxviii. 5, cf. 18. The question is here formed as it is there, when Jahve brings home to the consciousness of Job human weakness and ignorance. But there are here two possible significations of the fourfold question. Either it aims at the answer: No man, but a Being highly exalted above all creatures, so that the question  $\text{מִה־שֵׁמוֹ} [what\ his\ name?]$  refers to the name of this Being. Or the question is primarily meant of men: What man has the ability?—if there is one, then name him! In both cases  $\text{מִי עָלָה}$  is not meant, after xxiv. 28, in the modal sense, quis ascenderit, but as the following  $\text{יִרָד}$  requires, in the nearest indicative sense, quis ascendit. But the choice between these two possible interpretations is very difficult. The first question is historical: Who has gone to heaven and (as a consequence, then) come down from it again? It lies nearest thus to interpret it according to the consecutio temporum. By this interpretation, and this representation of the going up before the descending again, the interrogator does not appear to think of God, but in contrast to himself, to whom the divine is transcendent, of some other man of whom the contrary is true. Is there at all, he asks, a man who can comprehend and penetrate by his power and his knowledge the heavens and the earth, the air and the water, i.e. the nature and the inner condition of the visible and invisible world, the quantity and extent of the elements, and the like? Name to me this man, if thou knowest one, by his name, and designate him to me exactly by his family—I would turn to him to learn from him what I have hitherto striven in vain to find. But there is no such an one. Thus: as I feel myself limited in my knowledge, so there is not at all any man who can claim limitless können and kennen [ability and knowledge]. Thus casually Aben Ezra explains, and also Rashi, Arama, and others, but without holding fast to this in its purity; for in the interpretation of the question, “Who hath ascended?” the reference to Moses is mixed up with it, after the Midrash and Sohar (Parasha,  $\text{וַיַּקְהֵל}$ , to Ex. xxxv. 1), to pass by other obscurities and difficulties introduced. Among the moderns, this explanation, according to which all aims at the answer, "there is no man to whom this appertains," has no exponent worth naming. And, indeed, as favourable as is the quis ascendit in cœlos ac rursus descendit, so unfavourable is the quis constituit omnes terminos terræ, for this question appears not as implying that it asks after the man who has accomplished this; but the thought, according to all appearance, underlies it, that such an one must be a being without an equal, after whose name inquiry is made. One will then have to judge עלה and וירד after Gen. xxviii. 12; the ascending and descending are compared to our German "auf und nieder" [up and down], for which we do not use the phrase "nieder und auf;" and is the expression of free, expanded, unrestrained presence in both regions; perhaps, since וירד is historical, as Ps. xviii. 10, the speaker has the traditional origin of the creation in mind, according to which the earth arose into being earlier than the starry heavens above.

Thus the four questions refer (as e.g. also Isa. xl. 12) to Him who has done and who does all that, to Him who is not Himself to be comprehended as His works are, and as He shows Himself in the greatness and wonderfulness of these, must be exalted above them all, and mysterious. If the inhabitant of the earth looks up to the blue heavens streaming in the golden sunlight, or sown with the stars of night; if he considers the interchange of the seasons, and feels the sudden rising of the wind; if he sees the upper waters clothed in fleecy clouds, and yet held fast within them floating over him; if he lets his eye sweep the horizon all around him to the ends of the earth, built up upon nothing in the open world-space (Job xxvi. 7): the conclusion comes to him that he has before him in the whole the work of an everywhere present Being, of an all-wise omnipotent Worker—it is the Being whom he has just named as אֵל, the absolute Power, and as קְרִשִׁים, exalted above all created beings, with their troubles and limitations; but this knowledge gained viâ causalitatis, viâ eminentiæ, and viâ negationis, does not satisfy yet his spirit, and does not bring him so near to this Being as is to him a personal necessity, so that if he can in some measure answer the fourfold מַי, yet there always presses upon him the question מה שמו, what is his name, i.e. the name which dissolves the secret of this Being above all beings, and unfolds the mystery of the wonder above all wonders. That this Being must be a person the fourfold מי presupposes; but the question, "What is his name?" expresses the longing to know the name of this supernatural personality, not any kind of name which is given to him by men, but the name which covers him, which is the appropriate personal immediate expression of his being. The further question, "And what the name of his son?" denotes, according to Hitzig, that the inquirer strives after an adequate knowledge, such as one may have of a human being. But he would not have ventured this question if he did not suppose that God was not a monas [unity] who was without manifoldness in Himself. The LXX. translates: ἡ τὸ ὄνομα τοῖς τέκνοῖς αὐτοῦ (קנין), perhaps not without the influence of the old synagogue reference testified to in the Midrash and Sohar of בנו to Israel, God's first-born; but this interpretation is opposed to the spirit of this הירה (intricate speech, enigma). Also in general the interrogator cannot seek to know what man stands in this relation of a son to the Creator of all things, for that would be an ethical question which does not accord with this metaphysical one. Geier has combined this ומה שם-בנו with viii.; and that the interrogator, if he meant the הכמה, ought to have used the phrase ומה שם-בתי, says nothing against this, for also in אמן, viii. 30, whether it means foster-child or artifex, work-master, the feminine determination disappears. Not Ewald alone finds here the idea of the Logos, as the first-born Son of God, revealing itself, on which at a later time the Palestinian doctrine of מימרא דיהיה imprinted itself in Alexandria;<sup>1</sup> but also J. D. Michaelis felt himself constrained to recognise here the N. T. doctrine of the Son of God announcing itself from afar. And why might not this be possible? The Rig-Veda contains two similar questions, x. 81, 4: "Which was the primeval forest, or what the tree from which one framed the heavens and the earth? Surely, ye wise men, ye ought in your souls to make inquiry whereon he stood when he raised the wind!" And i. 164, 4: "Who has seen the first-born? Where was the life, the blood, the soul of the world? Who came thither to ask this from any one who knew it?"<sup>1</sup> Jewish interpreters also interpret בּנו of the causa media of the creation of the world. Arama, in his work עקדת יצחק, sect. xvi., suggests that by בּנו we are to understand the primordial element, as the Sankhya-philosophy understands by the first-born there in the Rig, the Prakṛiti, i.e. the primeval material. R. Levi b. Gerson (Ralbag) comes nearer to the truth when he explains בּנו as meaning the cause caused by the supreme cause, in other words: the principium principiatum of the creation of the world. We say: the inquirer meant the demiurgic might which went forth from God, and which waited on the Son of God as a servant in the creation of the world; the same might which in chap. viii. is called Wisdom, and is described as God's beloved Son. But with the name after which inquiry is made, the relation is as with the "more excellent name than the angels," Heb. i. 4.<sup>2</sup> It is manifestly not the name בּן, since the inquiry is made after the name of the בּן; but the same is the case also with the name חכמה, or, since this does not harmonize, according to its grammatical gender, with the form of the question, the name רבּר (רַבִּי); but it is the name which belongs to the first and only-begotten Son of God, not merely according to creative analogies, but according to His true being. The inquirer would know God, the creator of the world, and His Son, the mediator in the creation of the world, according to their natures. If thou knowest, says he, turning himself to man, his equal, what the essential names of both are, tell them to me! But who can name them! The nature of the Godhead is hidden, as from the inquirer, so from every one else. On this side of eternity it is beyond the reach of human knowledge.

The solemn confession introduced by נאם is now closed.

<sup>2</sup> The Comm. there remarks: It is the heavenly whole name of the highly exalted One, the שם הַמְפֹרֶשׁ, nomen explicitum, which here on this side has entered into no human heart, and can be uttered by no human tongue, the ἄνομα ὃ οὐδεὶς οἶδεν εἰ μὴ ὁ αὐτός, Rev. xix. 12.

Ewald sees herein the discourse of a sceptical mocker at religion; and Elster, the discourse of a meditating doubter; in ver. 5, and on, the answer ought then to follow, which is given to one thus speaking: his withdrawal from the standpoint of faith in the revelation of God, and the challenge to subordinate his own speculative thinking to the authority of the word of God. But this interpretation of the statement depends on the symbolical rendering of the supposed personal names אִתִּיאל and אַבְל, and, besides, the dialogue is indicated by nothing; the beginning of the answer ought to have been marked, like the beginning of that to which it is a reply. The confession, 1b-4, is not that of a man who does not find himself in the right condition, but such as one who is thirsting after God must renounce: the thought of a man does not penetrate to the essence of God (Job xi. 7-9); even the ways of God remain inscrutable to man (Sir. xviii. 3; Rom. xi. 33); the Godhead remains, for our thought, in immeasurable height and depth; and though a relative knowledge of God is possible, yet the dogmatic thesis, Deum quidem cognoscimus, sed non comprehendimus, i.e. non perfecte cognoscimus quia est infinitus,<sup>1</sup> even over against the positive revelation, remains unchanged. Thus nothing is wanting to make 1-4 a complete whole; and what follows does not belong to that section as an organic part of it.

Ver. 5 Every word of Eloah is pure;

A shield is He for those who hide themselves in Him.

6 Add thou not to His words,

Lest He convict thee and thou becomest a liar.

Although the tetrastich is an independent proverb, yet it is connected to the foregoing N'ûm [utterance, ver. 1]. The more limited a man is in his knowledge of God,—viz. in that which presents itself to him lumine naturæ,—so much the more thankful must he be that God has revealed Himself in history, and so much the more firmly has he to hold fast by the pure word of the divine revelation. In the dependent relation of ver. 5 to Ps. xviii. 31 (2 Sam. xxii. 31), and of ver. 6 to Deut. iv. 2, there is no doubt the self-testimony of God given to Israel, and recorded in the book of the Tôra, is here meant. כָּל־אִמְרַת is to be judged after πάσα γραφή, 2 Tim. iii. 16, not: every declaration of God, wherever promulgated, but: every declaration within the revelation lying before us. The primary passage [Ps. xviii. 31] has not כל here, but, instead of it, לְבַל הַחֲסִים, and instead of אִמְרַת אֱלֹהִים it has אִמְרַת יְהוָה; his change of the name of Jahve is also not favourable to the opinion that ver. 5 f. is a part of the N<sup>e</sup>úm, viz. that it is the answer thereto. The proverb in this contains traces of the Book of Job, with which in many respects that N<sup>e</sup>úm harmonizes; in the Book of Job, אֱלֹהִים (with שְׂרִי) is the prevailing name of God; whereas in the Book of Proverbs it occurs only in the passage before us. Mühlau, p. 41, notes it as an Arabism. צָרַף (Arab. šaraf, to turn, to change) is the usual word for the changing process of smelting; צָרִיף signifies solid, pure, i.e. purified by separating: God's word is, without exception, like pure, massive gold. Regarding חָסָה, to hide oneself, vid. under Ps. ii. 12: God is a shield for those who make Him, as revealed in His word, their refuge. The part. חָסָה occurs, according to the Masora, three times written defectively,—xiv. 32; 2 Sam. xxii. 31; Neh. i. 7; in the passage before us it is to be written לְחֹסִים; the proverbs of Agur and Lemuel have frequently the plena scriptio of the part. act. Kal, as well as of the fut. Kal, common to the Book of Job (vid. Mühlau, p. 65).

In 6a, after Aben Ezra's Moznajim 2b (11b of Heidenheim's edition), and Zachoth 53a (cf. Lipmann's ed.), and other witnesses (vid. Norzi), t sp (the ה with dagesh) is to be written,—the Cod. Jaman. and others defect. without ו, —not tôsf; for, since תּוֹסֵף (Ex. x. 28) is yet further abbreviated in this way, it necessarily loses<sup>1</sup> the aspiration of the tenuis, as in יִלְרֵת (= יִלְרֵת). The words of God are the announcements of His holy will, measured by His wisdom; they are then to be accepted as they are, and to be recognised and obeyed. He who adds anything to them, either by an overstraining of them or by repressing them, will not escape the righteous judgment of God: God will convict him of falsifying His word (הוֹכִיחַ, Ps. l. 21; only here with  $\aleph$  of the obj.), and expose him as a liar—viz. by the dispensations which unmask the falsifier as such, and make manifest the falsehood of his doctrines as dangerous to souls and destructive to society. An example of this is found in the kingdom of Israel, in the destruction of which the curse of the human institution of its state religion, set up by Jeroboam, had no little share. Also the Jewish traditional law, although in itself necessary for the carrying over of the law into the praxis of private and public life, falls under the Deuteron. prohibition,—which the poet here repeats,—so far as it claimed for itself the same divine authority as that of the written law, and so far as it hindered obedience to the law—by the straining-at-a-gnat policy—and was hostile to piety. Or, to adduce an example of an addition more dogmatic than legal, what a fearful impulse was given to fleshly security by that overstraining of the promises in Gen. xvii., which were connected with circumcision by the tradition, “the circumcised come not into hell,” or by the overstraining of the prerogative attributed by Paul, Rom. ix. 4 f., to his people according to the Scriptures, in the principle, “All Israelites have a part in the future world!” Regarding the accentuation of the perf. consec. after  $\aleph$ , vid. at Ps. xxviii. 1. The penultima accent is always in pausa (cf. vers. 9 and 10).

In what now follows, the key-note struck in ver. 1 is continued. There follows a prayer to be kept in the truth, and to be preserved in the middle state, between poverty and riches. It is a Mashal-ode, vid. vol. i. p. 12. By the first prayer, “vanity and lies keep far from me,” it is connected with the warning of ver. 6.

- Ver. 7 Two things I entreat from Thee,
 Refuse them not to me before I die.
 8 Vanity and lies keep far away from me
 Poverty and riches give me not :
 Cause me to eat the bread which is allotted to me,
 9 Lest in satiety I deny,
 And say : Who is Jahve ?
 And lest, in becoming poor, I steal,
 And profane the name of my God.

We begin with the settlement and explanation of the traditional punctuation. A monosyllable like  $\aleph$  receives, if Legarmeh, always Mehuppach Legarmeh, while, on the contrary, the polysyllable אֶשְׁבַּע has Asla Legarmeh. אֶל־תִּתֶּן־לִי, with double Makkeph and with Gaja in the third syllable before the tone (after the Metheg-Setzung, § 28), is Ben-Asher's; whereas Ben-Naphtali prefers the punctuation לִי אֶל־תִּתֶּן (vid. Baer's Genesis, p. 79, note 3). Also פֶּן־אֶשְׁבַּע has (cf. פֶּן־יִשְׁתָּה, xxxi. 5) Makkeph, and on the antepenultima Gaja (vid. Thorath Emeth, p. 32).

The perf. consec. וְכִבַּח־שִׁתִּי has on the ult. the disjunctive Zinnor (Sarka), which always stands over the final letter; but that the ult. is also to be accented, is shown by the counter-tone Metheg, which is to be given to the first syllable. Also וְאָמַרְתִּי has in correct Codd., e.g. Cod. 1294, the correct ultima toning of a perf. consec.; Kimchi in the Michlol 6b, as well as Aben Ezra in both of his Grammars, quotes only וְנִגְבַּחְתִּי וְתִפְשִׁתִּי as toned on the penult. That וְנִגְבַּחְתִּי cannot be otherwise toned on account of the pausal accent, has been already remarked under 6b; the word, besides, belongs to the פֶּהחֵן בִּא"ס, i.e. to those which preserve their Pathach unlengthened by one of the greater disjunctives; the Athnach has certainly in the three so-called metrical books only the disjunctive form of the Zakeph of the prose books. So much as to the form of the text.

As to its artistic form, this prayer presents itself to us as the first of the numerical proverbs, under the "Words" of Agur, who delighted in this form of proverb. The numerical proverb is a brief discourse, having a didactic end complete in itself, which by means of numerals gives prominence to that which it seeks to bring forward. There are two kinds of these. The more simple form places in the first place only one numeral, which is the sum of that which is to be brought forth separately: the numerical proverb of one cipher; to this class belong, keeping out of view the above prayer, which if it did not commence a series of numerical proverbs does not deserve this technical name on account of the low ciphers: vers. 24-28, with the cipher 4; Sir. xxv. 1 and 2, with the cipher 3. Similar to the above prayer are Job xiii. 20 f., Isa. li. 19; but these are not numerical proverbs, for they are not proverbs. The more artistic kind of numerical proverb has two ciphers: the two-ciphered numerical proverb we call the sharpened (pointed) proverb.

Of such two-ciphered numerical proverbs the "words" of Agur contain four, and the whole Book of Proverbs, reckoning vi. 16-19, five—this ascending numerical character belongs to the popular saying, 2 Kings ix. 32, Job xxxiii. 29, Isa. xvi. 6, and is found bearing the stamp of the artistic distich outside of the Book of Proverbs, Ps. lxii. 12, Job xxxiii. 14, xl. 5; Job v. 19, and particularly Amos i. 3-ii. 6. According to this scheme, the introduction of Agur's prayer should be:

וְשִׁתִּים אֶל-תִּמְנַע מִמֶּנִּי בְּטָרִם אֲמוֹת

and it could take this form, for the prayer expresses two requests, but dwells exclusively on the second. A twofold request he presents to God, these two things he wishes to be assured of on this side of death; for of these he stands in need, so as to be able when he dies to look back on the life he has spent, without the reproaches of an accusing conscience. The first thing he asks is that God would keep far from him vanity and lying words. שְׁוֹא (= שְׁוֹא, from שׂוֹא = שָׂאָה, to be waste, after the form מְוֹת) is either that which is confused, worthless, untrue, which comes to us from without (e.g. Job xxxi. 5), or dissoluteness, hollowness, untruthfulness of disposition (e.g. Ps. xxvi. 4); it is not to be decided whether the suppliant is influenced by the conception thus from within or from without, since דְּבַר־קִבּוֹב [a word of falsehood] may be said by himself as well as to him, a falsehood can intrude itself upon him. It is almost more probable that by שׂוֹא he thought of the misleading power of God-estranged, idolatrous thought and action; and by דְּבַר־רִבּוֹב, of lying words, with which he might be brought into sympathy, and by which he might ruin himself and others. The second petition is that God would give him neither poverty (רָעִישׁ, vid. x. 4) nor riches, but grant him for his sustenance only the bread of the portion destined for him. The Hiph. הִטְרִיף (from טָרַף, to grind, viz. the bread with the teeth) means to give<sup>1</sup> anything, as טָרַף, with which, xxxi. 15, נָתַן הֵק is parallel: to present a fixed piece, a definite portion of sustenance. הֵק, Gen. xlvii. 22, the portion assigned as nourishment; cf. Job

xxiii. 14 חֲקִי, the decree determined regarding me. Accordingly, חֲקִי לֶחֶם does not mean the bread appropriately measured out for me (like ἄρτος ἐπιούσιος, that which is required for οὐσία, subsistence), but the bread appropriate for me, determined for me according to the divine plan. Fleischer compares (Arab.) ratab and marsaum, which both in a similar way designate a fixed sustentation portion. And why does he wish to be neither poor nor rich? Because in both extremes lie moral dangers: in riches, the temptation to deny God (which בָּהֵשׁ בְּהָאֵשׁ signifies, in the later Heb. בָּפֶר בְּעֶקֶר, to deny the fundamental truth; cf. (Arab.) kafar, unbelieving), whom one flowing in superabundance forgets, and of whom one in his self-indulgence desires to know nothing (Job xxi. 14–16, xxii. 16 f.); in poverty, the temptation is to steal and to blaspheme the name of God, viz. by murmuring and disputing, or even by words of blasphemy; for one who is in despair directs the outbreaks of his anger against God (Isa. viii. 21), and curses Him as the cause of His misfortune (Rev. xvi. 11, 21). The question of godless haughtiness, כִּי יִהְיֶה, the LXX. improperly change into כִּי יִרְאֶה, τίς με ὀρᾷ. Regarding נוֹרֵשׁ, to grow poor, or rather, since only the fut. Niph. occurs in this sense, regarding נוֹרֵשׁ, vid. at xx. 13.

That the author here, by blaspheming (grasping at) the name of God, especially thinks on that which the Tóra calls “cursing (קָלַל) God,” and particularly “blaspheming the name of the Lord,” Lev. xxiv. 15, 16, is to be concluded from the two following proverbs, which begin with the catchword קָלַל:

Ver. 10 Calumniate not a servant with his master,

Lest he curse thee, and thou must atone for it.

Incorrectly Ewald: entice not a servant to slander against his master; and Hitzig: “Make not a servant tattle regarding his master.” It is true that the Poel לִישַׁן (to pierce with the tongue, linguá petere) occurs twice in the sense of to calumniate; but that הִלְשִׁין means nothing else, is attested by the post.-bibl. Hebrew; the proverb regarding schismatics (בְּרִיבַת הַמֵּינִים) in the Jewish Schemone-Esre (prayer of the eighteen benedictions) began with וְלַמְלִשִׁינִים, “and to the calumniators” (delatoribus). Also in the Arab. álsana signifies pertulit verba alicujus ad alterum, to make a babbler, rappporteur (Fleischer). That the word also here is not to be otherwise interpreted, is to be concluded from לֹא with the causative rendering. Rightly Symmachus, μή διαβάλης; Theodotion, μή καταλαλήσης; and according to the sense also, Jerome, ne accusas; the Venet. μή καταμηνύσης (give not him); on the contrary, Luther, verrate nicht [betray not], renders רָשָׁה with the LXX., Syr. in the sense of the Aram. רָשָׁה and the Arab. âslam (tradere, prodere). One should not secretly accuse (Ps. ci. 5) a servant with his master, and in that lies the character of slander (עָרַב רִשְׁוֹ) when one puts suspicion upon him, or exaggerates the actual facts, and generally makes the person suspected—one thereby makes a man, whose lot in itself is not a happy one, at length and perhaps for ever unhappy, and thereby he brings a curse on himself. But it is no matter of indifference to be the object of the curse of a man whom one has unrighteously and unjustly overwhelmed in misery: such a curse is not without its influence, for it does not fruitlessly invoke the righteous retribution of God, and thus one has sorrowfully to atone for the wanton sins of the tongue (ve-aschämta, for ve-aschamtá as it is would be without pause).

There now follows a Priamel,<sup>1</sup> the first line of which is, by לֹא, connected with the לֹא of the preceding distich :

- Ver. 11 A generation that curseth their father,
 And doth not bless their mother ;
 12 A generation pure in their own eyes,
 And yet not washed from their filthiness ;
 13 A generation—how haughty their eyes,
 And their eyelids lift themselves up ;
 14 A generation whose teeth are swords and their jaw teeth knives
 To devour the poor from the earth and the needy from the midst of men.

Ewald translates : O generation ! but that would have required the word, 13a, הָרַר (Jer. ii. 31), and one would have expected to have found something mentioned which the generation addressed were to take heed to; but it is not so. But if "O generation!" should be equivalent to "O regarding the generation!" then הוֹי ought to have introduced the sentence. And if we translate, with Luther: There is a generation, etc., then שׁ is supplied, which might drop out, but could not be omitted. The LXX. inserts after ἔκγονον the word κακόν, and then renders what follows as pred.—a simple expedient, but worthless. The Venet. does not need this expedient, for it renders γενεὰ τὸν πατέρα αὐτοῦ βλασφημήσει; but then the order of the words in 11a would have been דוֹר יקלל אביו; and in 12a, after the manner of a subst. clause, דוֹר טהור בעיניו הוא, one sees distinctly, from 13 and 14, that what follows דוֹר is to be understood, not as a pred., but as an attributive clause. As little can we interpret ver. 14, with Löwenstein, as pred. of the three subj., "it is a generation whose teeth are swords;" that would at least have required the words דוֹר הוא; but ver. 14 is not at all a judgment valid for all the three subjects. The Targ. and Jerome translate correctly, as we above;<sup>1</sup> but by this rendering there are four subjects in the preamble, and the whole appears, since the common pred. is wanting, as a mutilated Priamel. Perhaps the author meant to say: it is such a generation that encompasses us; or: such is an abomination to Jahve; for דוֹר is a Gesamtheit = totality, generation of men who are bound together by contemporary existence, or homogeneity, or by both, but always a totality; so that these verses, 11-14, might describe quatuor detestabilia genera hominum (C. B. Michaelis), and yet one generatio, which divide among themselves these four vices, of blackest ingratitude, loathsome self-righteousness, arrogant presumption, and unmerciful covetousness. Similar is the description given in the Mishna Sota ix. 14, of the character of the age in which the Messiah appeared. "The appearance of this age," thus it concludes, "is like the appearance of a dog; a son is not ashamed before his father; to whom will we then look for help? To our Father in heaven!"<sup>2</sup> The undutifulness of a child is here placed first. To curse one's parents is, after Ex. xxi. 17, cf. Prov. xx. 10, a crime worthy of death; "not to bless," is here, per litoten, of the same force as לָלַץ [to curse]. The second characteristic, ver. 12, is wicked blindness as to one's judgment of himself. The LXX. coarsely, but not bad: τὴν δ' ἕξοδου αὐτοῦ οὐκ ἀπένιψεν. Of such darkness one says: sordes suas putat olere cinnama. חָרָן is not the abbreviated part. (Stuart), as e.g. Ex. iii. 2, but the finite, as e.g. Hos. i. 6.

In 13a the attributive clause forms itself, so as to express the astonishing height of arrogance, into an exclamation: a generation, how lofty are their eyes (cf. e.g. vi. 17, עֵינַיִם רְמוֹת)! to which, as usual, it is simply added: and his eyelids (palpebræ) lift themselves up; in Lat., the lifting up of the eyebrow as an expression of haughtiness is described by elatum (superbum) supercilium.

The fourth characteristic is insatiable covetousness, which does not spare even the poor, and preys upon them, the helpless and the defenceless: they devour them as one eats bread, Ps. xiv. 4. The teeth, as the instruments of eating, are compared to swords and knives, as at Ps. lvii. 4 to spears and arrows. With שָׁנָי there is interchanged, as at Job xxix. 17,

Jonah i. 6, מִתְּלַעְתֵּי (not מִתְּמֹת, as Norzi writes, contrary to Metheg-Setzung, § 37, according to which Gaja, with the servant going before, is inadmissible), transposed from מִלְּתַעְתֵּי, Ps. lviii. 7, from לָתַע, to strike, pierce, bite. The designation of place, מִן־אָרֶץ, "from the earth" (which also, in pausa, is not modified into מִן־אָרֶץ), and מִן־אָדָם, "from the midst of men," do not belong to the obj.: those who belong to the earth, to mankind (vid. Ps. x. 18), for thus interpreted they would be useless; but to the word of action: from the earth, out from the midst of men away, so that they disappear from thence (Amos viii. 4). By means of fine but cobweb combinations, Hitzig finds Amalek in this fourfold proverb. But it is a portrait of the times, like Ps. xiv., and certainly without any national stamp.

With the characteristic of insatiableness it closes, and there follows an apophthegma de quatuor insatiabilibus quæ ideo comparantur cum sanguisuga (C. B. Michaelis). We translate the text here as it lies before us:

Ver. 15 The 'Alûka hath two daughters : Give ! Give !

Three of these are never satisfied ;

Four say not : Enough !

16 The under-world and the closing of the womb ;

The earth is not satisfied with water ;

And the fire saith not : Enough !

We begin with Masoretic externalities. The first ב in הַב is Beth minusculum ; probably it had accidentally this diminutive form in the original mss., to which the Midrash (cf. Sepher Taghin ed. Bargès, 1866, p. 47) has added absurd conceits. This first הַב has Pasek after it, which in this case is servant to the Olewejored going before, according to the rule Thorath Emeth, p. 24, here, as at Ps. lxxxv. 9, Mehuppach. The second הַב, which of itself alone is the representative of Olewejored, has in Hutter, as in the Cod. Erfurt 2, and Cod. 2 of the Leipzig Public Library, the pausal punctuation הַב (cf. הַב, 1 Sam. xxi. 10), but which is not sufficiently attested. Instead of לֹא־אָמְרוּ, 15b, לֹא־אָמְרוּ, and instead of לֹא־אָמְרָה, 16b, לֹא־אָמְרָה are to be written ; the Zinnorith removes the Makkeph, according to Thorath Emeth, p. 9, Accentuationssystem, iv. § 2. Instead of מַיִם, 16a, only Jablonski, as Mühlau remarks, has מַיִם ; but incorrectly, since Athnach, after Olewejored, has no pausal force (vid. Thorath Emeth, p. 37). All that is without any weight as to the import of the words. But the punctuation affords some little service for the setting aside of a view of Rabbenu Tam (vid. Tosaphoth to Aboda zara 17a, and Erubin 19a), which has been lately advocated by Löwenstein. That view is, that 'Alûka is the name of a wise man, not Solomon's, because the Pesikta does not reckon this among the names of Solomon, nor yet a name of hell, because it is not, in the Gemara, numbered among the names of Gehinnom. Thus לְעֵלְיָקָה would be a superscription, like לְדָוִד and לְשִׁלְמֹה, Ps. xxvi. 1, lxxii. 1, provided with Asla Legarmeh. But this is not possible, for the Asla Legarmeh, at Ps. xxvi. 1 and lxxii. 1, is the transformation of Olewejored, inadmissible on the first word of the verse (Accentuationssystem, xix. § 1) ; but no Olewejored can follow such an Asla Legarmeh, which has the force of an Olewejored, as after this לְעֵלְיָקָה, which the accentuation then does not regard as the author's name given as a superscription.

עֲלִיקָה is not the name of a person, and generally not a proper name, but a generic name of certain traditional signification. "One must drink no water"—says the Gemara Aboda zara 12b—"out of a river or pond, nor (immediately) with his mouth, nor by means of his hand; he who, nevertheless, does it, his blood comes on his own head, because of the danger. What danger? סִכְנַת עֲלִיקָה," i.e. the danger of swallowing a leech. The Aram. also designates a leech by עֲלִיקָה (cf. e.g. Targ. Ps. xii. 9: hence the godless walk about like the leech, which sucks the blood of men), and the Arab. by 'alāk (n. unit. 'alakat), as the word is also rendered here by the Aram. and Arab. translators. Accordingly, all the Greeks render it by βδέλλη; Jerome, by sanguisuga (Rashi, sangsue); also Luther's Eigel is not the Igel erinaceus [hedgehog], but the Egel, i.e., as we now designate it, the Blutegel [leech], or (less correctly) Blutigel. עֲלִיקָה is the fem. of the adj. עֲלִיק, attached to, which meaning, together with the whole verbal stem, the Arab. has preserved (vid. Mühlau's Mittheilung des Art. 'alūka aus dem Kamus, p. 42).<sup>1</sup> But if, now, the 'Alūka is the leech,<sup>2</sup> which are then its two daughters, to which is here given the name הַב הַב, and which at the same time have this cry of desire in their mouths? Grotius and others understand, by the two daughters of the leech, the two branches of its tongue; more correctly: the double-membered overlip of its sucker. C. B. Michaelis thinks that the greedy cry, "Give! Give!" is personified: voces istæ concipiuntur ut hirudinis filia, quas ex se gignat et velut mater sobolem impense diligit. But since this does not satisfy, symbolical interpretations of 'Alūka have been resorted to. The Talmud, Aboda zara 17a, regards it as a name of hell. In this sense it is used in the language of the Pijut (synagogue poetry).<sup>1</sup> If 'Alûka is hell, then fancy has the widest room for finding an answer to the question, What are the two daughters? The Talmud supposes that רשות (the worldly domination) and מינות (heresy) are meant. The Church-fathers also, understanding by 'Alûka the power of the devil, expatiated in such interpretations. Of the same character are Calmet's interpretation, that sanguisuga is a figure of the mala cupiditas, and its twin-daughters are avaritia and ambitio. The truth lying in all these is this, that here there must be some kind of symbol. But if the poet meant, by the two daughters of the 'Alûka, two beings or things which he does not name, then he kept the best of his symbol to himself. And could he use 'Alûka, this common name for the leech, without further intimation, in any kind of symbolical sense? The most of modern interpreters do nothing to promote the understanding of the word, for they suppose that 'Alûka, from its nearest signification, denotes a demoniacal spirit of the character of a vampire, like the Dakinî of the Indians, which nourish themselves on human flesh; the ghouls of the Arabs and Persians, which inhabit graveyards, and kill and eat men, particularly wanderers in the desert; in regard to which it is to be remarked, that (Arab.) 'awluk is indeed a name for a demon, and that al'aluwak, according to the Kamus, is used in the sense of alghwal. Thus Dathe, Döderlein, Ziegler, Umbreit; thus also Hitzig, Ewald, and others. Mühlau, while he concurs in this understanding of the word, and now throwing open the question, Which, then, are the two daughters of the demoness 'Alûka? finds no answer to it in the proverb itself, and therefore accepts of the view of Ewald, since 15b-16, taken by themselves, form a fully completed whole, that the line לעלוקה וגו' is the beginning of a numerical proverb, the end of which is wanting. We acknowledge, because of the obscurity—not possibly aimed at by the author himself—in which the two daughters remain, the fragmentary characters of the proverb of the 'Alûka; Stuart also does this, for he regards it as brought out of a connection in which it was intelligible,—but we believe that the line שלוש וגו' is an original formal part of this proverb. For the proverb forming, according to Mühlau's judgment, a whole rounded off:

<sup>1</sup> Nöldeke has remarked, with reference to Mühlau's Monographie, that 'alūka, in the sense of tenacious (tenax), is also found in Syr. (Geopon. xiii. 9, xli. 26), and that generally the stem עֲלִיק, to cleave, to adhere, is more common in Aram. than one would suppose. But this, however common in Arab., is by no means so in Syr.; and one may affirm that, among other Arabisms found in the Proverbs of Agur, the word 'Alūka has decidedly an Arab. sound.

שְׁלֹשׁ הֵנָּה לֹא תִשְׁבַּענָה
 אַרְבַּע לֹא אָמְרוּ הוּן:
 נְשֹׂאֹל וְעֵצֵר רַחֵם
 אֶרֶץ לֹא שִׁבְעָה מִים
 וְאִשׁ לֹא אָמְרָה הוּן:

contains a mark which makes the original combination of these five lines improbable. Always where the third is exceeded by the fourth, the step from the third to the fourth is taken by the connecting Vav: ver. 18, וְאַרְבַּע; 21, וְיַחַח אַרְבַּע; 29, וְאַרְבַּעָה. We therefore conclude that אַרְבַּע לֹא וְנֹ is the original commencement of independent proverb. This proverb is:

Four things say not: Enough!
 The under-world and the closing of the womb [i.e. unfruitful womb]—
 The earth is not satisfied with water,
 And the fire says not: Enough!

a tetrastich more acceptable and appropriate than the Arab. proverb (Freytag, Prov. iii. p. 61, No. 347): "three things are not satisfied by three: the womb, and wood by fire, and the earth by rain;" and, on the other hand, it is remarkable to find it thus clothed in the Indian language,<sup>1</sup> as given in the Hitopadesa (p. 67 of Lassen's ed.), and in Panchatantra, i. 153 (ed. of Kosegarten):

nâgnis tṛṇjati kâshṭhânân nâpogânân mahôdadhih nântakah sarvabhûtânân na punsân vâmalôcânâh.

Fire is not sated with wood, nor the ocean with the streams,
 Nor death with all the living, nor the beautiful-eyed with men.

As in the proverb of Agur the 4 falls into 2 + 2, so also in this Indian sloka. In both, fire and the realm of death (ântaka is death as the personified "end-maker") correspond; and as there the womb and the earth, so here feminarium cupiditas and the ocean. The parallelizing of ארץ and רחם is after passages such as Ps. cxxxix. 15, Job i. 21 (cf. also Prov. v. 16; Num. xxiv. 7; Isa. xlvi. 1); that of שאל and אש is to be judged of<sup>1</sup> after passages such as Deut. xxxii. 22, Isa. lvi. 24. That לא אמרו הן repeats itself in הן לא אמרה הן is now, as we render the proverb independently, much more satisfactory than if it began with שלוש וגו': it rounds itself off, for the end returns into the beginning. Regarding הן, vid. i. 13. From הן, to be light, it signifies living lightly; ease, superabundance, in that which renders life light or easy. "Used accusatively, and as an exclamation, it is equivalent to plenty! enough! It is used in the same sense in the North African Arab. brakat (spreading out, fulness). Wetzstein remarks that in Damascus lahôn, i.e. hitherto, is used in the sense of hajah, enough; and that, accordingly, we may attempt to explain הן of our [Heb.] language in the sense of (Arab.) hawn haddah, i.e. here the end of it!" (Mühlau.)

But what do we now make of the two remaining lines of the proverb of the 'Alûka? The proverb also in this division of two lines is a fragment. Ewald completes it, for to the one line, of which, according to his view, the fragment consists, he adds two:

The bloodsucker has two daughters, "Hither! hither!"
 Three saying, "Hither, hither, hither the blood,
 The blood of the wicked child."

A proverb of this kind may stand in the O. T. alone: it sounds as if quoted from Grimm's Mährchen, and is a side-piece to Zappert's altdeutsch. Schlummerlieder. Cannot the mutilation of the proverb be rectified in a less violent way without any self-made addition? If this is the case, that in vers. 15 and 16, which now form one proverb, there are two melted together, only the first of which lies before us in a confused form, then this phenomenon is explained by supposing that the proverb of the 'Alûka originally stood in this form:

The 'Alûka has two daughters: Give! give!—
 The under-world and the closing of the womb;
 There are three that are never satisfied.

Thus completed, this tristich presents itself as the original side-

piece of the lost tetrastich, beginning with ארבע. One might suppose that if שאל and עזר רחם have to be regarded as the daughters of the 'Alûka, which Hitzig and also Zöckler have recognised, then there exists no reason for dividing the one proverb into two. Yet the taking of them as separate is necessary, for this reason, because in the fourth, into which it expands, the 'Alûka is altogether left out of account. But in the above tristich it is taken into account, as was to be expected, as the mother with her children. This, that sheol (שְׁאוֹל is for the most part fem.), and the womb (רֶחֶם = רָחַם, which is fem., Jer. xx. 17) to which conception is denied, are called, on account of their greediness, the daughters of the 'Alûka, is to be understood in the same way as when a mountain height is called, Isa. v. 1, a horn of the son of oil. In the Arab., which is inexhaustibly rich in such figurative names, a man is called "a son of the clay (limi);" a thief, "a son of the night;" a nettle, "the daughter of fire." The under-world and a closed womb have the 'Alûka nature; they are insatiable, like the leech. It is unnecessary to interpret, as Zöckler at last does, 'Alûka as the name of a female demon, and the לְיָלִיּוֹת, "daughters," as her companions. It may be adduced in favour of this view that לְעֵלְיָקוּהָ is without the article, after the manner of a proper name. But is it really without the article? Such a doubtful case we had before us at xxvii. 23. As yet only Böttcher, § 394, has entered on this difficulty of punctuation. We compare Gen. xxix. 27, בַּעֲבֹרָה; 1 Kings xii. 32, לְעֵגְלִים; 1 Chron. xiii. 7, בַּעֲגֹלָה; and consequently also Ps. cxlvi. 7, לְעֵשׂוֹקִים; thus the assimilating force of the Chateph appears here to have changed the syntactically required לְ and בְּ into לַ and בַּ. But also supposing that לְעֵלְיָקוּהָ in עֲלֵיָקוּהָ is treated as a proper name, this is explained from the circumstance that the leech is not meant here in the natural history sense of the word, but as embodied greediness, and is made a person, one individual being. Also the symbol of the two daughters is opposed to the mythological character of the 'Alûka. The imper. הִב, from יָהַב, occurs only here and at Dan. vii. 17 (= הִיב), and in the bibl. Heb. only with the intentional הִב־, and in inflection forms. The insatiableness of sheol (xxvii. 20a) is described by Isaiah, v. 14; and Rachel, Gen. xxx. 1, with her "Give me children," is an example of the greediness of the "closed-up womb" (Gen. xx. 18). The womb of a childless wife is meant, which, because she would have children, the nuptiæ never satisfy; or also of one who, because she does not fear to become pregnant, invites to her many men, and always burns anew with lust. "In Arab. 'alwak means not only one fast bound to her husband, but, according to Wetzstein, in the whole of Syria and Palestine, the prostitute, as well as the κίταιδοι, are called 'ulak (plur. 'alwak), because they obtrude themselves and hold fast to their victim" (Mühlau). In the third line, the three: the leech, hell, and the shut womb, are summarized: tria sunt quæ non satiantur. Thus it is to be translated with Fleischer, not with Mühlau and others, tria hæc non satiantur. "These three" is expressed in Heb. by שְׁלֹשׁ אֵלֶּיהָ, Ex. xxi. 11, or שְׁלֹשֶׁת אֵלֶּיהָ (ה), 2 Sam. xxi. 22; הַיָּהוּ (which, besides, does not signify hæc, but illa) is here, taken correctly, the pred., and represents in general the verb of being (Isa. li. 19), vid. at vi. 16. Zöckler finds the point of the proverb in the greediness of the unfruitful womb, and is of opinion that the poet purposely somewhat concealed this point, and gave to his proverb thereby the enhanced attraction of the ingenious. But the tetrastich וְנִי אֲרִבֵּעַ shows that hell, which is compared to fire, and the unfruitful womb, to which the parched and thirsty earth is compared, were placed by the poet on one and the same line; it is otherwise with vers. 18–20, but where that point is nothing less than concealed.

The proverb of the 'Alûka is the first of the proverbs founded on the figure of an animal among the "words" of Agur. It is now followed by another of a similar character:

Ver. 17 An eye that mocketh at his father,
 And despiseth obedience to his mother:
 The ravens of the brook shall pluck it out,
 And the young eagles shall eat it.

If "an eye," and not "eyes," are spoken of here, this is accounted for by the consideration that the duality of the organ falls back against the unity of the mental activity and mental expression which it serves (cf. Psychol. p. 234). As haughtiness reveals itself (ver. 13) in the action of the eyes, so is the eye also the mirror of humble subordination, and also of malicious scorn which refuses reverence and subjection to father and mother. As in German the verbs [verspotten, spotten, höhnen, hohnsprechen] signifying to mock at or scorn may be used with the accus., genit., or dat., so also לְעַץ [to deride] and בּוֹז [to despise] may be connected at pleasure with either an accusative object or a dative object. Ben-Chajim, Athias, van der Hooght, and others write תִּלְעַץ; Jablonski, Michaelis, Löwenstein, תִּלְעַץ; Mühlau, with Norzi, accurately, תִּלְעַץ, with Munach, like תִּבְחֵר, Ps. lxxv. 5; the writing of Ben-Asher<sup>1</sup> is תִּלְעַץ, with Gaja, Chateph, and Munach. The punctuation of לִיקָהָת is more fluctuating. The word לִיקָהָת (e.g. Cod. Jaman.) may remain out of view, for the Dag. dirimens in ק stands here as firmly as at Gen. xlix. 10, cf. Ps. xlv. 10. But it is a question whether one has to write לִיקָהָת with Yod quies. (regarding this form of writing, preferred by Ben-Naph-tali, the Psalmen-Comm. under Ps. xlv. 10, in both Edd.; Luzzatto's Gramm. § 193; Baer's Genesis, p. 84, note 2; and Heidenheim's Pentateuch, with the text-crit. Comm. of Jekuthiël ha-Nakdans, under Gen. xlvii. 17, xlix. 10), as it is found in Kimchi, Michlol 45a, and under יקה, and as also Norzi requires, or לִיקָהָת (as e.g. Cod. Erfurt 1), which appears to be the form adopted by Ben-Asher, for it is attested<sup>2</sup> as such by Jekuthiël under Gen. xlix. 10, and also expressly as such by an old Masora-Cod. of the Erfurt Library. Löwenstein translates, "the weakness of the mother." Thus after Rashi, who refers the word to קָהָת, to draw together, and explains it, Gen. xlix. 10, "collection;" but in the passage before us, understands it of the wrinkles on the countenance of the aged mother. Nachmani (Ramban) goes still further, giving to the word, at Gen. xlix. 10, everywhere the meaning of weakness and frailty. Aben Ezra also, and Gersuni (Ralbag), do not go beyond the meaning of a drawing together; and the LXX., with the

<sup>1</sup> The Gaja has its reason in the Zinnor that follows, and the Munach in the syllable beginning with a moveable Sheva; תִּלְעַץ with Scheva quiesc. must, according to rule, receive Mercha, vid. Thorath Emeth, p. 26.

<sup>2</sup> Kimchi is here no authority, for he contradicts himself regarding such word-forms. Thus, regarding וַיִּלְלֵת, Jer. xxv. 36, in Michlol 87b, and under ילל. The form also wavers between בְּיִתְרוֹן and בִּיתְרוֹן, Eccles. ii. 13. The Cod. Jaman. has here the Jod always quiesc.

Aram., who all translate the word by senectus, have also קָהָה in the sense of to become dull, infirm (certainly not the Æthiopic leh'ka, to become old, weak through old age). But Kimchi, whom the Venet. and Luther<sup>1</sup> follow, is informed by Abul-walîd, skilled in the Arab., of a better: יִקְהָה (or יִקְהָה, cf. נִצְרָה, Ps. cxli. 3) is the Arab. wakhat, obedience (vid. above יִקְהָה, under 1a). If now it is said of such a haughty, insolent eye, that the ravens of the brook (cf. 1 Kings xvii. 4) will pluck it out, and the בני-נֶשֶׁר eat it, they, the eagle's children, the unchild-like human eye: it is only the description of the fate that is before such an one, to die a violent death, and to become a prey to the fowls of heaven (cf. e.g. Jer. xvi. 3 f., and Passow's Lex. under κόραξ); and if this threatening is not always thus literally fulfilled, yet one has not on that account to render the future optatively, with Hitzig; this is a false conclusion, from a too literal interpretation, for the threatening is only to be understood after its spirit, viz. that a fearful and a dishonourable end will come to such an one. Instead of יִקְרִיָה, as Mühlau reads from the Leipzig Cod., יִקְרוּהָ, with Mercha (Athias and Nissel have it with Tarcha), is to be read, for a word between Olewejored and Athnach must always contain a conjunctive accent (Thorath Emeth, p. 51; Accentuationssystem, xviii. § 9). עֲרִבֵי-נֶחֱלִל is also irregular, and instead of it עֲרִבֵי-נֶחֱלִל is to be written, for the reason given above under ver. 16 (מַיִם).

The following proverb, again a numerical proverb, begins with the eagle, mentioned in the last line of the foregoing:

- Ver. 18 Three things lie beyond me,
 And four I understand not:
 19 The way of the eagle in the heavens,
 The way of a serpent over a rock,
 The way of a ship on the high sea,
 And the way of a man with a maid.
 20 Thus is the way of the adulterous woman:
 She eateth and wipeth her mouth, and saith:
 I have done no iniquity.

<sup>1</sup> Jerome translates, et qui despicit partum matris suæ. To partus there separates itself to him here the signification expectatio, Gen. xlix. 10, resting on a false combination with קוּהָ. To think of pareo, parui, paritum (Mühlau), was not yet granted to him.

נִפְלְאוּ מִמֶּנִּי, as relative clause, like 15*b* (where Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion rightly: τρία δέ ἐστὶν ἃ οὐ πλησθήσεται), is joined to שְׁלֹשָׁה הַמָּוֶה. On the other hand, אַרְבַּע (τέσσαρα, for which the Keri, conforming to 18*a*, אַרְבָּעָה, τέσσαρας) has to be interpreted as object. accus. The introduction of four things that are not known is in expressions like Job xlii. 3; cf. Ps. cxxxix. 6. The turning-point lies in the fourth; to that point the other three expressions gravitate, which have not an object in themselves, but are only as folie to the fourth. The articles wanting after הַיָּמִי: they would be only the marks of the gender, and are therefore unnecessary; cf. under xxix. 2. And while בַּשָּׁמַיִם, in the heavens, and בְּלִבְיָם, in the sea, are the expressions used, עַל־צֶרֶף is used for on the rock, because here "on" is not at the same time "in," "within," as the eagle cleaves the air and the ship the waves. For this same reason the expression, "the way of a man בְּעֶלְמָה," is not to be understood of love unsought, suddenly taking possession of and captivating a man toward this or that maid, so that the principal thought of the proverb may be compared to the saying, "marriages are made in heaven;" but, as in Kidduschin 2*b*, with reference to this passage, is said coitus via appellatur. The כּ refers to copula carnalis. But in what respect did his understanding not reach to this? "Wonderful," thus Hitzig explains as the best interpreter of this opinion elsewhere (cf. Psychol. p. 115) propounded, "appeared to him the flying, and that how a large and thus heavy bird could raise itself so high in the air (Job xxxix. 27); then how, over the smooth rock, which offers no hold, the serpent pushes itself along; finally, how the ship on the trackless waves, which present nothing to the eye as a guide, nevertheless finds its way. These three things have at the same time this in common, that they leave no trace of their pathway behind them. But of the fourth way that cannot be said; for the trace is left on the substrat, which the man יָרָה, and it becomes manifest, possibly as pregnancy, keeping out of view that the עלמה may yet be בתולה. That which is wonderful is consequently only the coition itself, its mystical act and its incomprehensible consequences." But does not this interpretation carry in itself its own refutation? To the three wonderful ways which leave no traces behind them, there cannot be compared a fourth, the consequences of which are not only not trackless, but, on the contrary, become manifest as proceeding from the act in an incomprehensible way. The point of comparison is either the wonderfulness of the event or the tracklessness of its consequences. But now "the way of a man בתולה" is altogether inappropriate to designate the wonderful event of the origin of a human being. How altogether differently the Chokma expresses itself on this matter is seen from Job x. 8-12; Eccles. xi. 5 (cf. Psychol. p. 210). That "way of a man with a maid" denotes only the act of coition, which physiologically differs in nothing from that of the lower animals, and which in itself, in the externality of its accomplishment, the poet cannot possibly call something transcendent. And why did he use the word בעלמה, and not rather בְּנִקְבָּה [with a female] or בְּאִשָּׁה [id.]? For this reason, because he meant the act of coition, not as a physiological event, but as a historical occurrence, as it takes place particularly in youth as the goal of love, not always reached in the divinely-appointed way. The point of comparison hence is not the secret of conception, but the tracelessness of the carnal intercourse. Now it is also clear why the way of the serpent עלֵי צֹר was in his eye: among grass, and still more in sand, the trace of the serpent's path would perhaps be visible, but not on a hard stone, over which it has glided. And it is clear why it is said of the ship בְּלִבֵּים [in the heart of the sea]: while the ship is still in sight from the land, one knows the track it follows; but who can in the heart of the sea, i.e. on the high sea, say that here or there a ship has ploughed the water, since the water-furrows have long ago disappeared? Looking to the heavens, one cannot say that an eagle has passed there; to the rock, that a serpent has wound its way over it; to the high sea, that a ship has been steered through it; to the maid, that a man has had carnal intercourse with her. That the fact might appear on nearer investigation, although this will not always guide to a certain conclusion, is not kept in view; only the outward appearance is spoken of, the intentional concealment (Rashi) being in this case added thereto. Sins against the sixth [=the seventh] commandment remain concealed from human knowledge, and are distinguished from others by this, that they shun human cognition (as the proverb says: אין אפיטרופוס לעריות (ἐπιτροπος)—unchastity can mask itself, the marks of chastity are deceitful, here only the All-seeing Eye (עַיִן רֹאֶה כָּל, Aboth ii. 1) perceives that which is done. Yet it is not maintained that “the way of a man with a maid” refers exclusively to external intercourse; but altogether on this side the proverb gains ethical significance. Regarding עֲלָמָה (from עלם, pubes esse et cœundi cupidus, not from עלם, to conceal, and not, as Schultens derives it, from עלם, signare, to seal) as distinguished from בְּתוּלָה, vid. under Isa. vii. 14. The mark of maidenhood belongs to עלמה not in the same way as to בתולה (cf. Gen. xxiv. 43 with 16), but only the marks of puberty and youth; the wife אִשָּׁה (viz. אִשָּׁת אִישׁ) cannot as such be called עלמה. Ralbag’s gloss עלמה שהיא בעולה is incorrect, and in Arama’s explanation (Akeda, Abschn. 9): the time is not to be determined when the sexual love of the husband to his wife flames out, ought to have been ודרך איש באשתו. One has therefore to suppose that ver. 20 explains what is meant by “the way of a man with a maid” by a strong example (for “the adulterous woman” can mean only an old adulteress), there not inclusive, for the tracklessness of sins of the flesh in their consequences.

This 20th verse does not appear to have been an original part of the numerical proverb, but is an appendix thereto (Hitzig). If we assume that כֵּן points forwards: thus as follows is it with the . . . (Fleischer), then we should hold this verse as an independent cognate proverb; but where is there a proverb (except xi. 19) that begins with כֵּן? כֵּן, which may mean eodem modo (for one does not say כֵּן) as well as eo modo, here points backwards in the former sense. Instead of וּבְחַתָּהּ פִּיָּהּ (not פִּיָּהּ; for the attraction of that which follows, brought about by the retrogression of the tone of the first word, requires dageshing, Thorath Emeth, p. 30) the LXX. has merely ἀπονεψαμένη, i.e. as Immanuel explains: כִּמְנַהֶה עֲצָמָה, abstergens semet ipsam, with Grotius, who to tergens os suum adds the remark: σεμνολογία (honesta elocutio). But eating is just a figure, like the “secret bread,” ix. 17, and the wiping of the mouth belongs to this figure. This appendix, with its כֵּן, confirms it, that the intention of the four ways refers to the tracklessness of the consequences.

It is now not at all necessary to rack one's brains over the grounds or the reasons of the arrangement of the following proverb (vid. Hitzig). There are, up to this point, two numerical proverbs which begin with אֲשֶׁר, ver. 7, and אֲשֶׁר, ver. 15; after the cipher 2 there then, ver. 18, followed the cipher 3, which is now here continued:

- Ver. 21 Under three things doth the earth tremble,
And under four can it not stand :
- 22 Under a servant when he becomes king,
And a profligate when he has bread enough ;
- 23 Under an unloved woman when she is married,
And a maid-servant when she becomes heiress to her mistress.

We cannot say here that the 4 falls into  $3 + 1$ ; but the four consists of four ones standing beside one another. אֲשֶׁר is here without pausal change, although the Athnach here, as at ver. 24, where the modification of sound occurs, divides the verse into two; אֲשֶׁר, 14b (cf. Ps. xxxv. 2), remains, on the other hand, correctly unchanged. The "earth" stands here, as frequently, instead of the inhabitants of the earth. It trembles when one of the four persons named above comes and gains free space for acting; it feels itself oppressed as by an insufferable burden (an expression similar to Amos vii. 10);—the arrangement of society is shattered; an oppressive closeness of the air, as it were, settles over all minds. The first case is already designated, xix. 10, as improper: under a slave, when he comes to reign (quum rex fit); for suppose that such an one has reached the place of government, not by the murder of the king and by the robbery of the crown, but, as is possible in an elective monarchy, by means of the dominant party of the people, he will, as a rule, seek to indemnify himself in his present highness for his former lowliness, and in the measure of his rule show himself unable to rise above his servile habits, and to pass out of the limited circle of his earlier state. The second case is this: אֲשֶׁר, one whose mind is perverted and whose conduct is profligate,—in short, a low man (vid. xvii. 17), —אֲשֶׁר-עָלֵהם (cf. Metheg-Setzung, § 28), i.e. has enough to eat (cf. to the expression xxviii. 19, Jer. xlv. 17); for this undeserved living without care and without want makes him only so much the more arrogant, and troublesome, and dangerous. The שְׁנוּאָה, in the second case, is not thought of as a spouse, and that, as in supposed polygamy, Gen. xxix. 31, Deut. xxi. 15–17, as fallen into disfavour, but who again comes to favour and honour (Dathe, Rosenmüller); for she can be שְׁנוּאָה without her own fault, and as such she is yet no נְרוּשָׁה; and it is not to be perceived why the re-assumption of such an one should shatter social order. Rightly Hitzig, and, after his example, Zöckler: an unmarried lady, an old spinster, is meant, whom no one desired because she had nothing attractive, and was only repulsive (cf. Grimm, under Sir. vii. 26b). If such an one, as בִּי הַבַּעַל says, at length, however, finds her husband and enters into the married relation, then she carries her head so much the higher; for she gives vent to ill-humour, strengthened by long restraint, against her subordinates; then she richly requites her earlier and happily married companions for their depreciation of her, among whom she had to suffer, as able to find no one who would love her. In the last case it is asked whether בִּי-הִירָשׁ is meant of inheriting as an heiress (Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, the Targ., Jerome, the Venet., and Luther), or supplanting (Euchel, Gesenius, Hitzig), i.e. an entering into the inheritance of the dead, or an entering into the place of a living mistress. Since יָרַשׁ, with the accus. of the person, Gen. xv. 3, 4, signifies to be the heir of one, and only with the accus. of peoples and lands signifies, “to take into possession (to seize) by supplanting,” the former is to be preferred; the LXX. (Syr.), ὅταν ἐκβάλη, appear to have read בִּי-תִקְרָשׁ. This בִּי-תִקְרָשׁ would certainly be, after Gen. xxi. 10, a piece of the world turned upside down; but also the entering, as heiress, into the inheritance, makes the maid-servant the reverse of that which she was before, and brings with it the danger that the heiress, notwithstanding her want of culture and dignity, demean herself also as heiress of the rank. Although the old Israelitish law knew only intestate succession to an inheritance, yet there also the case might arise, that where there were no natural or legal heirs, the bequest of a wife of rank passed over to her servants and nurses.

Vers. 24–28. Another proverb with the cipher 4, its first line terminating in ארין :

- Ver. 24 Four are the little things of the earth,
 And yet they are quick of wit—wise :
 25 The ants—a people not strong,
 And yet they prepare in summer their food ;
 26 Conies—a people not mighty,
 And yet set their dwelling on the rocks ;
 27 No king have the locusts,
 And yet they go forth in rank and file, all of them together ;
 28 The lizard thou canst catch with the hands,
 And yet it is in the king's palaces.

By the disjunctive accent, אַרְבָּעָה, in spite of the following word toned on the beginning, retains its ultima-toning, 18a; but here, by the conjunctive accent, the tone retrogrades to the penult., which does not elsewhere occur with this word. The connection קְטַנֵי־אֶרֶץ is not superlat. (for it is impossible that the author could reckon the שְׁפָנִים, conies, among the smallest of beasts), but, as in the expression נִכְבְּדֵי־אֶרֶץ, the honoured of the earth, Isa. xxiii. 8. In 24b, the LXX., Syr., Jerome, and Luther see in כ the comparative: σοφώτερα τῶν σοφῶν (מְחֻכְמִים), but in this connection of words it could only be partitive (wise, reckoning among the wise); the part. Pual מְחֻכְמִים (Theodotion, the Venet. σεσοφισμένα) was in use after Ps. lviii. 6, and signified, like בִּישַׁל מְבֻשָׁל, Ex. xii. 9, boiled well; thus חכמים מְחֻכְמִים, taught wit, wise, cunning, prudent (cf. Ps. lxiv. 7, a planned plan = a cunningly wrought out plan; Isa. xxviii. 16, and Vitringa thereto: grounded = firm, grounding), Ewald, § 313c. The reckoning moves in the contrasts of littleness to power, and of greatness to prudence. The unfolding of the ארבעה [four] begins with the הַנְּמָלִים [the ants] and שְׁפָנִים [conies], subject conceptions with apposit. joined; 26a, at least in the indetermina- tion of the subject, cannot be a declaration. Regarding the fut. consec. as the expression, not of a causal, but of a contrasted connection, vid. Ewald, § 342, 1a. The ants are called עַם, and they deserve this name, for they truly form communities with well-ordered economy; but, besides, the ancients took delight in speaking of the various classes of animals as peoples and states.<sup>1</sup> That which is said, 25b, as also vi. 8, is not to be understood of stores laid up for the winter. For the ants are torpid for the most part in winter; but certainly the summer is their time for labour, when the labourers gather together food, and feed in a truly motherly way the helpless.  $\text{פֶּשׁ}$ , translated arbitrarily in the Venet. by  $\acute{\epsilon}\chi\acute{\iota}\nu\omicron\iota$ , in the LXX. by  $\chi\omicron\iota\rho\omicron\gamma\omicron\rho\acute{\upsilon}\lambda\lambda\iota\omicron\iota$ , by the Syr. and Targ. here and at Ps. civ. by  $\text{פֶּשׁ}$ , and by Jerome by lepusculus (cf.  $\lambda\alpha\gamma\acute{\iota}\delta\iota\omicron\nu$ ), both of which names, here to be understood after a prevailing Jewish opinion, denote the Caninichen<sup>1</sup> (Luther), Latin cuniculus ( $\kappa\acute{\omicron}\nu\iota\kappa\lambda\omicron\varsigma$ ), is not the kaninchen [rabbit], nor the marmot,  $\chi\omicron\iota\rho\omicron\gamma\omicron\rho\acute{\upsilon}\lambda\lambda\iota\omicron\varsigma$  (C. B. Michaelis, Ziegler, and others); this is called in Arab. garbuw'; but  $\text{פֶּשׁ}$  is the wabr, which in South Arab. is called thufun, or rather thafan, viz. the klippdachs (hyrax syriacus), like the marmot, which lives in societies and dwells in the clefts of the mountains, e.g. at the Kedron, the Dead Sea, and at Sinai (vid. Knobel on Lev. xi. 5; cf. Brehm's Thierleben, ii. p. 721 ff., the Illustrirte Zeitung, 1868, Nr. 1290). The klippdachs are a weak little people, and yet with their weakness they unite the wisdom that they establish themselves among the rocks. The ants show their wisdom in the organization of labour, here in the arranging of inaccessible dwellings.

Ver. 27. Thirdly, the locusts belong to the class of the wise little folk: these have no king, but notwithstanding that, there is not wanting to them guidance; by the power and foresight of one sovereign will they march out as a body,  $\text{יִצְחָה}$ , dividing, viz. themselves, not the booty (Schultens); thus: dividing themselves into companies, ordine dispositæ, from  $\text{יִצְחָה}$ , to divide, to fall into two (cogn.  $\text{פֶּצַח}$ , e.g. Gen. xxxii. 7) or more parts; Mühlau, p. 59–64, has thoroughly investigated this whole wide range of roots. What this  $\text{יִצְחָה}$  denotes is described in Joel ii. 7: "Like mighty men they hunt; like men of war they climb the walls; they march forward every one on his appointed way, and change not their paths." Jerome narrates from his own observation: tanto ordine ex dispositione jubentis (LXX. at this passage before us:  $\acute{\alpha}\phi' \acute{\epsilon}\nu\delta\omicron\varsigma \kappa\epsilon\lambda\epsilon\acute{\upsilon}\sigma\mu\alpha\tau\omicron\varsigma \epsilon\upsilon\tau\acute{\alpha}\kappa\tau\omega\varsigma$ ) volitant, ut instar tesserularum, quæ in pavimentis artificis figuntur manu, <sup>1</sup> The kaninchen as well as the klippdachs [cliff-badgers] may be meant, Lev. xi. 5 (Deut. xiv. 7); neither of these belong to the bisulca, nor yet, it is true, to the ruminants, though to the ancients (as was the case also with hares) they seemed to do. The klippdach is still, in Egypt and Syria, regarded as unclean.

suum locum teneant et ne puncto quidem et ut ita dicam ungue transverso declinent ad alterum. Aben Ezra and others find in הציץ the idea of gathering together in a body, and in troops, according to which also the Syr., Targ., Jerome, and Luther translate; Kimchi and Meïri gloss הציץ by הותך and בורת, and understand it of the cutting off, i.e. the eating up, of plants and trees, which the Venet. renders by ἐκτέμνουσα.

Ver. 28. In this verse the expression wavers in a way that is with difficulty determinable between שְׂמָמִית and שְׂמָמִית. The Edd. of Opitz Jablonski and Van der Hooght have 'שָׁמ, but the most, from the Venetian 1521 to Nissel, have 'שָׁמ (vid Mührlau, p. 69). The Codd. also differ as to the reading of the word; thus the Codd. Erfurt 2 and 3 have 'שָׁמ, but Cod. 1294 has 'שָׁמ. Isaak Tschelebi and Moses Algazi, in their writings regarding words with ש and ש (Constant. 1723 and 1799), prefer 'שָׁמ, and so also do Mordecai Nathan in his Concordance (1563-4), David de Pomis (1587), and Norzi. An important evidence is the writing סַמְמִית, Schabbath 77b, but it is as little decisive as קַרְיִין [coat of mail], used by Jeremiah [xlvi. 4], is decisive against the older expression שְׂרִיין. But what kind of a beast is meant here is a question. The swallow is at once to be set aside, as the Venet. translates (χελιδών) after Kimchi, who explains after Abulwalîd, but not without including himself, that the Heb. word for (Arab.) khuttaf (which is still the name given to the swallow from its quickness of motion), according to Haja's testimony, is much rather פְּנִינִית, a name for the swallow; which also the Arab. (Freytag, ii. p. 368) and the modern Syriac confirm; besides, in old Heb. it has the name of סוּס or פִּיִּס (from Arab. shash, to fly confusedly hither and thither). In like manner the ape (Aben Ezra, Meïri, Immanuel) is to be set aside, for this is called קִפָּה (Indian kapi, kap, kamp, to move inconstantly and quickly up and down),<sup>1</sup> and appears here admissible only on the ground that from בִּידִים הַתַּפֵּשׁ they read that the beast had a resemblance to man. There remains now only the lizard (LXX. Jerome) and the spider (Luther) to be considered. The Talmud, Schabbath 77b, reckons five instances in which fear of the weaker pursues the stronger: one of these instances is אֵימַת סַנּוּנִית עַל הַנֶּשֶׁר, another

אימת כממית על העקרב. The swallow, thus Rashi explains, creeps under the wings of the eagle and hinders it from spreading them out in its flight; and the spider (araigne) creeps into the ear of the scorpion; or also: a bruised spider applied heals the scorpion's sting. A second time the word occurs, Sanhedrin 103*b*, where it is said of King Amon that he burnt the Tôra, and that over the altar came a שממית (here with ש), which Rashi explains of the spider (a spider's web). But Aruch testifies that in these two places of the Talmud the explanation is divided between ragnatelo (spider) and (Ital.) lucërta (lizard). For the latter, he refers to Lev. xi. 30, where לטאה (also explained by Rashi by lézard) in the Jerus. Targ. is rendered<sup>1</sup> by שממיתא (the writing here also varies between ש and ש or ס). Accordingly, and after the LXX. and Jerome, it may be regarded as a confirmed tradition that שממית means not the spider, for which the name עֲפָרַיִשׁ is coined, but the lizard, and particularly the stellion (spotted lizard). Thus the later language used it as a word still living (plur. סְפִמִּיּוֹת, Sifre, under Deut. xxxiii. 19). The Arab. also confirms this name as applicable to the lizard.<sup>2</sup> "To this day in Syria and in the Desert it is called samawiyat, probably not from poison, but from samawah = שְׂמָמָה, the wilderness, because the beast is found only in the stony heaps of the Kharab" (Mühlau after Wetzstein). If this derivation is correct, then שממית is to be regarded as an original Heb. expression; but the lizard's name, samm, which, without doubt, designates the animal as poisonous (cf. סַם, samam, samm, vapour, poisonous breath, poison), favours Schultens' view: שממית = (Arab.) samamyat, afflatu interficiens, or generally venenosa. In the expression בְּיָדַיִם תִּתְפֹּשֵׁשׁ, Schultens, Gesenius, Ewald, Hitzig, Geier, and others, understand יָדַיִם of the two fore-feet of the lizard: "the lizard feels (or: seizes) with its two hands;" but granting that יָדַיִם is used of the fifteen feet of the stellio, or of the climbing feet of any other animal (LXX. καλα- βώτης = ἀσκαλαβώτης), yet it is opposed by this explanation, that in line first of this fourth distich an expression regarding the smallness or the weakness of the beast is to be expected, as at 25*a*, 26*a*, and 27*a*. And since, besides, תפשׁ with ביר or בכב always means "to catch" or "seize" (Ezek. xxi. 16, xxix. 7; Jer. xxxviii. 23), so the sense according to that explanation is: the lizard thou canst catch with the hand, and yet it is in kings' palaces, i.e. it is a little beast, which one can grasp with his hand, and yet it knows how to gain an entrance into palaces, by which in its nimbleness and cunning this is to be thought of, that it can scale the walls even to the summit (Aristoph. Nubes 170). To read תפשׁת with Mühlau, after Böttcher, recommends itself by this, that in תפשׁת one misses the suff. pointing back (תפשׁתנָה); also why the intensive of תפשׁ is used, is not rightly comprehended. Besides, the address makes the expression more animated; cf. Isa. vii. 25, תבוא. In the LXX. as it lies before us, the two explanations spoken of are mingled together: καὶ καλαβώτης (= ἀσκαλαβώτης) χερσὶν ἐρειδόμενος καὶ εὐάλωτος ὦν . . . This εὐάλωτος ὦν (Symmachus, χερσὶν ἐλλαμβανόμενος) hits the sense of 28*a*. In מלך הַיְיָ מִלְּךָ is not the genit. of possession, as at Ps. xlv. 9, but of description (Hitzig), as at Amos vii. 13.

Vers. 29-31. Another numerical proverb with the cipher 4 = 3 + 1:

- Three things are of stately walk,
 And four of stately going:
 30 The lion, the hero among beasts,
 And that turneth back before nothing;
 31 The swift-loined, also the goat;
 And a king with whom is the calling out of the host.

Regarding הַיְיָ מִלְּךָ with inf. following (the segolated n. actionis מַעַל is of equal force with an inf.), vid. under xv. 2.<sup>1</sup> The relation of the members of the sentence in 30*a* is like that in 25*a* and 26*a*: subj. and apposit., which there, as here, is continued in a verbal clause which appears to us as relative. It deserves to be here remarked that מִלְּךָ, as the name for a lion, occurs only here and at Job iv. 11, and in the description of the Sinai wilderness, Isa. xxx. 6; in Arab. it is layth, Aram. לַיִת, and belongs to the Arameo-Arab. dialect of this language; the LXX. and Syr. translate it "the young lion;" the Venet. excellently, by the epic λῆς. לַיִת has the article only to denote the genus, viz. of the beasts, and particularly the four-footed beasts. What is said in 30b (cf. with the expression, Job xxxix. 22) is described in Isa. xxx. 4. The two other beasts which distinguish themselves by their stately going are in 31a only briefly named. But we are not in the condition of the readers of this Book of Proverbs, who needed only to hear the designation לַיִת at once to know what beast was meant. Certainly לַיִת, as the name for a beast, is not altogether unknown in the post-bibl. Heb. "In the days of Rabbi Chija (the great teacher who came from Babylon to the Academy of Sepphoris), as is narrated in Bereschith rabba, sect. 65, a zarzir flew to the land of Israel, and it was brought to him with the question whether it were eatable. Go, said he, place it on the roof! Then came an Egyptian raven and lighted down beside it. See, said Chija, it is unclean, for it belongs to the genus of the ravens, which is unclean (Lev. xi. 15). From this circumstance there arose the proverb: The raven goes to the zarzir because it belongs to his own tribe."<sup>1</sup> Also the Jer. Rosch ha-schane, Halacha 3: "It is the manner of the world that one seeks to assist his zarzir, and another his zarzir, to obtain the victory;" and Midrash Echa v. 1, according to which it is the custom of the world, that one who has a large and a little zarzir in his house, is wont to treat the little one sparingly, so that in the case of the large one being killed, he might not need to buy another. According to this, the zarzir is a pugnacious animal, which also the proverb Bereschith rabba, c. 75, confirms: two zarzir do not sleep on one board; and one makes use of his for contests like cock-fights. According to this, the לַיִת is a bird, and that of the species of the raven; after Rashi, the étourneau, the starling, which is confirmed by the Arab. zurzur (vulgar Arab.

zarzur), the common name of starlings (cf. Syr. zarzizo, under zrz of Castelli). But for the passage before us, we cannot regard this as important, for why is the starling fully named זרזיר מתנין? To this question Kimchi has already remarked that he knows no answer for it. Only, perhaps, the grave magpie (corvus pica), strutting with up-raised tail, might be called succinctus lumbos, if מתנין can at all be used here of a bird. At the earliest, this might possibly be used of a cock, which the later Heb. named directly נָבֵר, because of its manly demeanour; most old translators so understand it. The LXX. translates, omitting the loins, by ἀλέκτωρ ἐμπεριπατῶν θηλείαις εὐψυχος, according to which the Syr. and Targ.: like the cock which struts about proudly among the hens;<sup>1</sup> Aquila and Theodotion: ἀλέκτωρ (ἀλεκτρυὸν) νότου; the Quinta: ἀλέκτωρ ὀσφύος; Jerome: gallus succinctus lumbos. Şarsar (not sirsir, as Hitzig vocalizes) is in Arab. a name for a cock, from şarsara, to crow, an onomatopœia. But the Heb. זרזיר, as the name of a bird, signifies, as the Talmud proves on the ground of that history, not a cock, but a bird of the raven order, whether a starling, a crow, or a magpie. And if this name of a corvinus is formed from the onomatopœia זרזר, the weaker form of that (Arab.) şarsar, then מתנין, which, for זרזיר, requires the verbal root זרז, to girdle, is not wholly appropriate; and how strangely would the three four-footed animals, if between לִישׁ and תִּישׁ, the two four-footed animals, a bird were placed! If, as is to be expected, the "Lendenumgürtete" [the one girded about the loins = זרזיר מתנין] be a four-footed animal, then it lies near, with C. B. Michaelis and Ziegler, after Ludolf's<sup>2</sup> example, to think of the zebra, the South African wild ass. But this animal lay beyond the sphere of the author's observation, and perhaps also of his knowledge, and at the same time of that of the Israelitish readers of this Book of Proverbs; and the dark-brown cross stripes on a white ground, by which the zebra is distinguished, extend not merely to its limbs, but over the whole body, and particularly over the front of the body. It would be more tenable to think of the leopard, with its black round spots, or the tiger, with dark stripes; but the name זריר מתנים scarcely refers to the colour of the hair, since one has to understand it after the Aram. שָׁנִים מְתָנִי = זָרוּ חֲרִיָּיה, 1 Kings xviii. 46, or אָזַר הַלְּצִי, Job xxxviii. 3, and thus of an activity, i.e. strength and swiftness, depending on the condition of the loins. Those who, with Kimchi, think that the נָמֵר [leopard] is thus named, ground their view, not on this, that it has rings or stripes round its legs, but on this, that it דק מתנים וזוקק במתניו. But this beast has certainly its definite name; but a fundamental supposition entering into every attempt at an explanation is this, that זריר מתנים, as well as לֵישׁ and חֵישׁ, is the proper name of a beast, not a descriptive attribute. Therefore the opinion of Rosse, which Bochart has skilfully established in the Hierozoicon, does not recommend itself, for he only suggests, for choice, to understand the name, "the girded about the loins," in the proper sense of straps and clasps around and on the loins (thus e.g. Gesenius, Fleischer, Hitzig), or of strength, in the sense of the Arab. habuwk, the firmly-bound = compact, or samm als̄lab, the girded loin (thus e.g. Muntinghe). Schultens connects together both references: Utrumque jungas licet. That the by-name fits the horse, particularly the war-horse, is undeniable; one would have to refer it, with Mühlau, to the slender structure, the thin flanks, which are reckoned among the requisites of a beautiful horse.<sup>1</sup> But if succinctus lumbos were a by-name of a horse, why did not the author at once say סוס זריר מתנים? We shall give the preference to the opinion, according to which the expression, "girt about the loins" = "with strong loins," or "with slender limbs," is not the by-name, but the proper name of the animal.

<sup>2</sup> Ludolf gave, in his Hist. Æthiop. i. 10, and Commentarius, p. 150, only a description of the Zecora, without combining therewith זרזיר; but vid. Joh. Dietr. Winckler's Theol. u. Philol. Abhand. i. (1755) p. 33 ff.: "A nearer explanation of what is to be understood by זרזיר מתנין, Prov. xxx. 31, along with a statement from a hitherto unpublished correspondence between the learned philologists Hiob Ludolf and Matthai Leydecker, a Reformed preacher in Batavia." With Ludolf, Joh. Simonis also, in the Arcanum Formarum (1735), p. 687 sq., decides in favour of the zebra.

This may be said of the hunting-hound, lévrier (according to which the Venet., incorrectly translating מתנים : λαγφοκύων ψοιῶν),<sup>1</sup> which Kimchi ranks in the first place. Luther, by his translation, Ein Wind = Windhund [greyhound], of good limbs, has given the right direction to this opinion. Melancthon, Lavater, Mercier, Geier, and others, follow him; and, among the moderns, so also do Ewald and Böttcher (also Bertheau and Stuart), which latter supposes that before זריר מתנים there originally stood בלב, which afterwards disappeared. But why should the greyhound not at once be called זריר מתנים? We call the smaller variety of this dog the Windspiel [greyhound]; and by this name we think on a hound, without saying Windspiellhund. The name זריר מתנים (Symmachus excellently: περιεσφυγμένος, not περιεσφραγισμένος, τὴν ὀσφύν, i.e. strongly bound in the limbs) is fitted at once to suggest to us this almost restless, slender animal, with its high, thin, nimble limbs. The verbal stem זרר, (Arab.) zarr, signifies to press together, to knit together; the reduplicative form זררר, to bind firmly together, whence זרריר, firmly bound together, referred to the limbs as designating a natural property (Ewald, § 158a): of straight and easily-moveable legs.<sup>2</sup> The hunting-hound (saláki or salúki, i.e. coming from Seleucia) is celebrated by the Arab. poets as much as the hunting-horse.<sup>3</sup> The name בָּלָב, though not superfluous, the author ought certainly to have avoided, because it does not sound well in the Heb. collocation of words.

There now follows תיש, a goat, and that not the ram (Jerome, Luther), which is called איל, but the he-goat, which bears this name, as Schultens has already recognised, from its pushing, as it is also called עתיד, as paratus ad pugnam; the two names appear to be only provincially different; שָׁעִיר, on the contrary, is the old he-goat, as shaggy; and יָפִיר also perhaps denotes it, as Schultens supposes, with twisted, i.e. curled hair (tortipilus).

In Arab. tays denotes the he-goat as well as the roebuck and the gazelle, and that at full growth. The LXX. (the Syr. and Targ., which is to be emended after the Syr.) is certainly right, for it understands the leading goat: καὶ τράγος ἡγούμενος αἰπολίου. The text, however, has not וְתִישׁ, but וְתִישׁ אֵשׁ, הַ טְרָאָגוֹס (Aquila, Theodotion, Quinta, and the Venet.). Böttcher is astonished that Hitzig did not take hold of this אֵשׁ, and conjectures וְתִישׁ-אֵשׁ, which should mean a “gazelle-goat” (Mühlau: dorcas mas). But it is too bold to introduce here תִּישׁ (תִּישׁ), which is only twice named in the O. T., and תִּישׁ-הַיִּשׁ for וְתִישׁ is not the Heb. style; and besides, the setting aside of אֵשׁ has a harsh asyndeton for its consequence, which bears evidence to the appearance that תִּישׁ and וְתִישׁ are two different animals. And is the אֵשׁ then so objectionable? More wonderful still must Song ii. 9 appear to us. If the author enumerated the four of stately going on his fingers, he would certainly have said וְתִישׁ. By אֵשׁ he communicates to the hearer, setting before him another figure, how there in the Song Sulamith’s fancy passed from one object to another.

To the lion, the king of the animal world, the king עַמּוֹ אֱלִקִּימוֹס corresponds. This אֱלִקִּימוֹס Hitzig regards as mutilated from אֱלֹהִים (which was both written and pronounced as אֱלִקִּימוֹס by the Jews, so as to conceal the true sound of the name of God),—which is untenable, for this reason, that this religious conclusion [“A king with whom God is”] accords badly with the secular character of this proverb. Geiger (Urschrift, p. 62 ff.) translates: “and King Alkimos corresponding to it (the lustful and daring goat)” —he makes the harmless proverb into a ludibrium from the time of the Maccabeo-Syrian war. The LXX., which the Syr. and Targ. follow, translates καὶ βασιλεὺς δημηγορῶν ἐν ἔθνει; it appears to have changed עַמּוֹ אֱלִקִּימוֹס into עַמּוֹ אֵשׁ (standing with his people and haranguing them), like the Quinta: καὶ βασ. ἀναστὰς (ὃς ἀνέστη) ἐν τῷ λαῷ αὐτοῦ. Ziegler and Böttcher also, reading עַמּוֹ and אֵשׁ without any transposition, get עַמּוֹ אֱלִקִּימוֹס, which the former translates: “a king with the presence of his people;” the latter, “a king with the setting up of his people,”—not accordant with the thought, for the king should be brought forward as מִיָּמִיב לְבַת. For the same reason, Kimchi’s explanation is not suitable: a king with whom is no resistance, i.e. against whom no one can rank himself (thus e.g. also Immanuel); or more specially, but not better: who has no successor of his race (according to which the Venet. ἀδιάδεκτος ξὺν ἑαυτῷ). Rather this explanation commends itself: a king with whom (i.e. in war with whom) is no resistance. Thus Jerome and Luther: against whom no one dare place himself; thus Rashi, Aben Ezra, Rabbag (שׂאן תקומה עמו), Ahron b. Josef (קום = ἀντίστασις), Arama, and others; thus also Schultens, Fleischer (adversus quem nemo consistere audent), Ewald, Bertheau, Elster, Stuart, and others. But this connection of אָלְמִי with the infin. is not Heb.; and if the Chokma, xii. 28, has coined the expression אָלְמִי for the idea of "immortality," then certainly it does not express the idea of resistlessness by so bold a quasi compositum. But this boldness is also there mitigated, for יְהִי is supplied after אָלְמִי, which is not here practicable with קום, which is not a subst. like אָלְמִי. Pocock in the Spec. historice Arabum, and Castellus in the Lex. Heptaglotton (not Castellio, as the word is printed by Zöckler), have recognised in אָלְקוּם the Arab. alkawm; Schultens gives the LXX. the honour of this recognition, for he regards their translation as a paraphrase of ὁ δῆμος μετ' αὐτοῦ. Bertheau thinks that it ought to be in Arab. kawmuhu, but אָלְקוּם עמו = alkawhu ma'ahu is perfectly correct, alkawhu is the summons or the Heerbann = arriere-ban;<sup>1</sup> in North Africa they speak in their language in the same sense of the Gums. This explanation of אָלְקוּם, from the Arab. Dachselt (rex cum satellitio suo), Diedrichs in his Arab.-Syr. Spicilegium (1777), Umbreit, Gesenius, and Vaihinger, have recognised, and Mühlau has anew confirmed it at length. Hitzig, on the contrary, remarks that if Agur wrote on Arab. territory, we could be contented with the Arab. appellative, but not with the article, which in words like אָלְקַבְיִשׁ and אָלְקַמִּי is no longer of force as an art., but is an integ. component part of the word. We think that it is with אָלְקוּם exactly as with other words descriptive of lordship, and the many similar that have passed over into the Spanish language; the word is taken over along with the article, without requiring the Heb. listener to take the art. as such, although he certainly felt it better than we do, when we say "das Alcoran" [the Alcoran], "das Alcohol," and the like. Blau also, in his Gesch. der Arab. Substantiv-Determ.,<sup>1</sup> regards it as certain that Agur borrowed this מִלְּאָרָב from the idiom of the Arabians, among whom he lived, and heard it constantly spoken. By this explanation we first reach a correspondence between what is announced in lines first and second and line sixth. A king as such is certainly not "comely in going;" he can sit upon his throne, and especially as δημηγορῶν will he sit (Acts xii. 21) and not stand. But the majesty of his going shows itself when he marches at the head of those who have risen up at his summons to war. Then he is for the army what the שֵׂה [he-goat] is for the flock. The אָ, preferred to ו, draws close together the שֵׂה and the king (cf. e.g. Isa. xiv. 9).

Vers. 32, 33. Another proverb, the last of Agur's "Words" which exhorts to thoughtful, discreet demeanour, here follows the proverb of self-conscious, grave deportment:

If thou art foolish in that thou exaltest thyself,
Or in devising,—put thy hand to thy mouth!
33 For the pressure on milk bringeth forth butter,
And pressure on the nose bringeth forth blood,
And pressure on sensibility bringeth forth altercation.

Löwenstein translates ver. 32:

Art thou despicable, it is by boasting;
Art thou prudent, then hold thy hand on thy mouth.

But if מַחְשָׁבָה denotes reflection and deliberation, then נִבְלָה, as its opposite, denotes unreflecting, foolish conduct. Then בְּהִתְנַחֵץ [by boasting] is not to be regarded as a consequent (thus it happens by lifting thyself up; or: it is connected with boasting); by this construction also, מִן־נִבְלָה must be accented with Dechi, not with Tarcha. Otherwise Eichel:

Hast thou become offensive through pride,
Or seems it so to thee,—lay thy hand to thy mouth.

The thought is appropriate,<sup>1</sup> but גַּבְלָתָּהּ for גַּבְלָתִי is more than improbable; גַּבְלָתִי, thus absolutely taken in an ethical connection, is certainly related to גַּבְלָתִי, as פָּסַלְתִּי, Jer. x. 8, to פָּסַלְתִּי. The prevailing mode of explanation is adopted by Fleischer: si stulta arrogantia elatus fueris et si quid durius (in alios) mente conceperis, manum ori impone; i.e., if thou arrogantly, and with offensive words, wilt strive with others, then keep thyself back, and say not what thou hast in thy mind. But while מְזַמֵּה and מְזַמֵּה denote intrigues, xiv. 17, as well as plans and considerations, זָמַן has never by itself alone the sense of meditari mala; at Ps. xxxvii. 12, also with ל of the object at which the evil devices aim. Then for אָמַן . . . אָמַן (Arab. án . . . wán) there is the supposition of a correlative relation, as e.g. 1 Kings xx. 18, Eccles. xi. 3, by which at the same time אָמַן is obviously thought of as a contrast to גַּבְלָתִי. This contrast excludes<sup>2</sup> for זָמַן not only the sense of mala moliri (thus e.g. also Mühlau), but also the sense of the Arab. zamm, superbire (Schultens). Hitzig has the right determination of the relation of the members of the sentence and the ideas: if thou art irrational in ebullition of temper and in thought—thy hand to thy mouth! But הִתְנַשֵּׂא has neither here nor elsewhere the meaning of הִתְעַבֵּר (to be out of oneself with anger); it signifies everywhere to elevate or exalt oneself, i.e. rightly or wrongly to make much of oneself. There are cases where a man, who raises himself above others, appears as a fool, and indeed acts foolishly; but there are also other cases, when the despised has a reason and an object for vindicating his superiority, his repute, his just claim: when, as we say, he places himself in his right position, and assumes importance; the poet here recommends, to the one as well as to the other, silence. The rule that silence is gold has its exceptions, but here also it is held valid as a rule. Luther and others interpret the perfecta as looking back: “hast thou become a fool and ascended too high and intended evil, then lay thy hand on thy mouth." But the reason in ver. 33 does not accord with this rendering, for when that has been done, the occasion for hatred is already given; but the proverb designs to warn against the stirring up of hatred by the reclaiming of personal pretensions. The perfecta, therefore, are to be interpreted as at Deut. xxxii. 29, Job ix. 15, as the expression of the abstract present; or better, as at Job ix. 16, as the expression of the fut. exactum: if thou wouldst have acted foolishly, since thou walkest proudly, or if thou hadst (before) thought of it (Aquila, Theodotion: καὶ ἐὰν ἐννοηθῆς)—the hand on thy mouth, i.e. let it alone, be silent rather (expression as xi. 24; Judg. xviii. 19; Job xl. 4). The Venet. best: εἴπερ ἐμώρανας ἐν τῷ ἐπαίρεσθαι καὶ εἴπερ ἐλογίσω, χεὶρ τῷ στόματι. When we have now interpreted נִשְׁנַח, not of the rising up of anger, we do not also, with Hitzig, interpret the dual of the two snorting noses—viz. of the double anger, that of him who provokes to anger, and that of him who is made angry,—but מִנְחָה denotes the two nostrils of one and the same person, and, figuratively, snorting or anger. Pressure against the nose is designated מִנְחָה גְּבוּרָה, ἐκμύζησις (ἐκπίεσις) μυκτῆρος (write מִנְחָה גְּבוּרָה, with Metheg, with the long tone, after Metheg-Setzung, § 11, 9, 12), and מִנְחָה גְּבוּרָה, ἐκμύζησις θυμοῦ (Theodotion), with reference to the proper meaning of מִנְחָה, pressure to anger, i.e. to the stirring up and strengthening of anger. The nose of him who raises himself up comes into view, in so far as, with such self-estimation, sneering, snuffling scorn (μυκτῆρίζειν) easily connects itself; but this view of נִשְׁנַח is not here spoken of.

SECOND APPENDIX TO THE SECOND SOLOMONIC COLLECTION
OF PROVERBS.—XXXI. 1-9.

Superscription :

Ver. 1 Words of Lemuel the king,
The utterance wherewith his mother warned him.

Such would be the superscription if the interpunction of the text as it lies before us were correct. But it is not possibly right. For, notwithstanding the assurance of Ewald, § 277*b*, למואל מלך, nevertheless, as it would be here used, remains an impossibility. Certainly under circumstances an indeterminate apposition can follow a proper name. That on coins we read נרוך קיסר or מתתיה כהן גדול is nothing strange; in this case we also use the words "Nero, emperor," and that we altogether omit the article shows that the case is singular: the apposition wavers between the force of a generic and of a proper name. A similar case is the naming of the proper name with the general specification of the class to which this or that one bearing the name belongs in lists of persons, as e.g. 1 Kings iv. 2-6, or in such expressions as, e.g., "Damascus, a town," or "Tel Hum, a castle," and the like; here we have the indefinite article, because the apposition is a simple declaration of the class.<sup>1</sup> But would the expression, "The poem of Oscar, a king," be proper as the title of a book? Proportionally more so than "Oscar, king;" but also that form of indeterminate apposition is contrary to the usus loq., especially with a king with whom the apposition is not a generic name, but a name of honour. We assume that "Lemuel" is a symbolical name, like "Jareb" in "King Jareb," Hos. v. 13, x. 6; so we would expect the phrase to be למואל מלך (ה) rather than למואל מלך. The phrase "Lemuel, king," here in the title of this section of the book, sounds like a double name, after the manner of עֶבֶר מְלִיכָה in the book of Jeremiah. In the Greek version also the phrase Λεμουέλου βασιλέως (Venet.) is not used as syntactically correct without having joined to the βασιλέως a dependent genitive such as τῶν Ἀράβων, while none of the old translators, except Jerome, take the words למואל מלך together in the sense of Lamuelis regis. Thus מְלִיכָה מְשֻׁא are to be taken together, with Hitzig, Bertheau, Zöckler, Mühlau, and Dächsel, against Ewald and Kamphausen; מְשֻׁא, whether it be a name of a tribe or a country, or of both at the same time, is the region ruled over by Lemuel, and since this proper name throws back the determination which it has in itself on לֵמֶלֶךְ, the phrase is to be translated: "Words of Lemuel the king of Massa" (vid. under xxx. 1). If Aquila renders this proper name by Λεμμοῦν, Symmachus by Ἰαμουήλ, Theodotion by Πεβουήλ, the same arbitrariness prevails with reference to the initial and terminal sound of the word, as in the case of the words Ἀμβακούμ, Βεελζεβούλ, Βελλάρ. The name לֵמֶלֶךְ sounds like the name of Simeon's first-born, לֵמֶלֶךְ, Gen. xlv. 10, written in Num. xxvi. 12 and 1 Chron. iv. 24 as לֵמֶלֶךְ; לֵמֶלֶךְ also appears, 1 Chron. iv. 35, as a Simeonite name, which Hitzig adduces in favour of his view that מֶלֶךְ was a North Arab. Simeonite colony. The interchange of the names לֵמֶלֶךְ and מֶלֶךְ is intelligible if it is supposed that לֵמֶלֶךְ (from לֵמֶלֶךְ = מֶלֶךְ) designates the sworn (sworn to) of God, and מֶלֶךְ (from מֶלֶךְ Mishnic = מֶלֶךְ)<sup>1</sup> the expressed (addressed) of God; here the reference of לֵמֶלֶךְ and מֶלֶךְ to verbal stems is at least possible, but a verb לֵמֶלֶךְ is found only in the Arab., and with significations inus. But there are two other derivations of the name: (1) The verb (Arab.) waāla signifies to hasten (with the infin. of the onomatop. verbs waniyal, like rahyal, walking, because motion, especially that which is tumultuous, proceeds with a noise), whence mavnīl, the place to which one flees, retreat. Hence לֵמֶלֶךְ or לֵמֶלֶךְ, which is in this case to be assumed as the ground-form, might be formed from לֵמֶלֶךְ, God is a refuge, with the rejection of the א. This is the opinion of Fleischer, which Mühlau adopts and has established, p. 38–41; for he shows that the initial א is not only often rejected where it is without the support of a full vocal, e.g. נֶחֱמִי = נֶחֱמִי, lalah = ilalah (Deus), but that this aphaeresis not seldom also occurs where the initial has a full vocal, e.g. לֵמֶלֶךְ = לֵמֶלֶךְ, lahmaru = allahmaru (ruber), lahsā = āl-lahsā (the name of a town); cf. also Blau in Deutsch. Morgenl. Zeitschr. xxv. 580. But this view is thus acceptable and tenable; a derivation which spares us by a like certainty the supposition of such an abbreviation established only by the late Palestinianian לֵמֶלֶךְ, Λάζαπος, might well desire the preference. (2) Fleischer himself suggests another derivation: "The signi-fiction of the name is Deo consecratus, לְמוֹ, poetic for לְ, as also in ver. 4 it is to be vocalized לְמוֹאֵל after the Masora." The form לְמוֹאֵל is certainly not less favourable to that first derivation than to this second; the u is in both cases an obscuration of the original . But that "Lemuel" may be explained in this second way is shown by "Lael," Num. iii. 24 (Olshausen, § 277*d*).<sup>1</sup> It is a beautiful sign for King Lemuel, and a verification of his name, that it is he himself by whom we receive the admonition with which his mother in her care counselled him when he attained to independent government. אֲשֶׁר connects itself with רַבְרִי, after we have connected מִשָּׂא with מֶלֶךְ; it is accus. of the manner to יִפְרְתֵהוּ = יִפְרֹתָהוּ; cf. הִפְרֵתִי, vii. 21, with גִּמְלֹתֶיהָ, xxxi. 12: wherewith (with which words) she earnestly and impressively admonished him. The Syr. translates: words of Muel, as if לְ were that of the author. "Others as inconsistently: words to Lemuel—they are words which he himself ought to carry in his mouth as received from his mother" (Fleischer).

The name "Massa," if it here means effatum, would be proportionally more appropriate for these "Words" of Lemuel than for the "Words" of Agur, for the maternal counsels form an inwardly connected compact whole. They begin with a question which maternal love puts to itself with regard to the beloved son whom she would advise:

Ver. 2 What, my son? and what the son of my womb?
And what, O son of my vows?!

The thrice repeated מַה is completed by תַּעֲשֶׂה (cf. Köhler under Mal. ii. 15), and that so that the question is put for the purpose of exciting attention: Consider well, my son, what thou wilt do as ruler, and listen attentively to my counsel (Fleischer). But the passionate repetition of מַה would be only affectation if thus interpreted; the underlying thought must be of a subjective nature: what shall I say, אֲדַבֵּר (vid. under Isa. xxxviii. 15), what advise thee to do? The question, which is at the same time a call, is like a deep sigh from the heart of the mother concerned for the welfare of her son, who would say to him what is beneficial, and say it in words which strike and remain fixed. He is indeed her dear son, the son whom she carries in her heart, the son for whom with vows of thanksgiving she prayed to God; and as he was given her by God, so to His care she commits him. The name "Lemuel" is, as we interpret it, like the anagram of the fulfilment of the vows of his mother. לְמֹוֹלֵל bears the Aramaic shade in the Arameo-Arab. colouring of these proverbs from Massa; לְמֹוֹלֵל is common in the Aram., and particularly in the Talmudic, but it can scarcely be adduced in support of בְּרִי. וְמָה belongs to the 24, מָה, with ה or ע not following; vid. the Masora to Ex. xxxii. 1, and its correction by Norzi at Deut. xxix. 23. We do not write וְמָה-בְּרִי; מָה, with Makkeph and with Metheg, exclude one another.

Ver. 3. The first admonition is a warning against effeminate sensuality:

Give not thy strength to women,
Nor thy ways to them that destroy kings.

The punctuation לְמַחֹות sees in this form a syncopated inf. Hiph. = לְמַחֹות (vid. at xxiv. 17), according to which we are to translate: viasque tuas ad perdendos reges (ne dirige), by which, as Fleischer formulates the twofold possibility, it may either be said: direct not thy effort to this result, to destroy neighbouring kings,—viz. by wars of invasion (properly, to wipe them away from the table of existence, as the Arabs say),—or: do not that by which kings are overthrown; i.e., with special reference to Lemuel, act not so that thou thyself must thereby be brought to ruin. But the warning against vengeful, rapacious, and covetous propensity to war (thus Jerome, so the Venet. after Kimchi: ἀπομάττειν βασιλέας, C. B. Michaelis, and earlier, Gesenius) does not stand well as parallel with the warning against giving his bodily and mental strength to women, i.e. expending it on them. But another explanation: direct not thy ways to the destruction of kings, i.e. toward that which destroys kings (Elster); or, as Luther translates: go not in the way wherein kings destroy themselves,—puts into the words a sense which the author cannot have had in view; for the individualizing expression would then be generalized in the most ambiguous way. Thus לְמַחֹות מְלִכִין will be a name for women, parallel to לְמַחֹות. So far the translation of the Targum: לְבִנְתַי מְלִכִין, filiabus (לְמַחֹות?) regum, lies under a right supposition. But the designation is not thus general. Schultens explains catapultis regum after Ezek. xxvi. 9; but, inasmuch as he takes this as a figure of those who lay siege to the hearts of men, he translates: expugnatrixibus regum, for he regards מַחֹת as the plur. of מָחָה, a particip. noun, which he translates by deletor. The connecting form of the fem. plur. of this מָחָה might certainly be מַחֹת (cf. מָוִי, from מָוָה), but לְמַחֹת מַלְכֵינּוּ ought to be changed into לְמָ' וְגו'; for one will not appeal to anomalies, such as לָמ', xvi. 4; בְּג', Isa. xxiv. 2; לָמ', Lam. i. 19; or וְהָ' וְגו', 1 Kings xiv. 24, to save the Pathach of לְמַחֹת, which, as we saw, proceeds from an altogether different understanding of the word. But if לָמ' is to be changed into לְמָ', then one must go further, since for מָחָה not an active but a conditional meaning is to be assumed, and we must write לְמַחֹת, in favour of which Fleischer as well as Gesenius decides: et ne committe consilia factaque tua iis quæ reges perdunt, regum pestibus. Ewald also favours the change לְמַחֹת, for he renders מָחָה as a denom. of מָחָה, marrow: those who enfeeble kings, in which Kamphausen follows him. Mühlau goes further; he gives the privative signification, to enfeeble, to the Piel מָחָה = makhakha (cf. Herzog's Real-Wörterb. xiv. 712), which is much more probable, and proposes לְמַמְחֹת: iis quæ vires enervant regum. But we can appropriately, with Nöldeke, adhere to לְמַחֹת, deletrixibus (perditricibus), for by this change the parallelism is satisfied; and that מָחָה may be used, with immediate reference to men, of entire and total destruction, is sufficiently established by such passages as Gen. vi. 7, Judg. xxi. 17, if any proof is at all needed for it. Regarding the LXX. and those misled by it, who, by מַלְכֵינּוּ and מַלְכִים, 4a, think on the Aram. מַלְכֵינּוּ, βουλαβ, vid. Mühlau, p. 53.<sup>1</sup> But the Syr. has an idea worthy of the discourse, who translates epulis regum without our needing, with Mühlau, to charge him with dreaming of לְחָם in לְמַחֹת. Perhaps that is true; but perhaps by לְמַחֹת he thought of לְמַחֹת (from מָחָה, the particip. adj. of מָחָה): do not direct thy ways to rich food (morsels), such as kings love and can have. By this reading,

3b would mediate the transition to ver. 4; and that the mother refers to the immorality, the unseemliness, and the dangers of a large harem, only in one brief word (3a), cannot seem strange, much rather it may be regarded as a sign of delicacy. But so much the more badly does וַיִּרְבֵּי accord with לְמַחֹת. Certainly one goes to a banquet, for one finds leisure for it; but of one who himself is a king, it is not said that he should not direct his ways to a king's dainties. But if לְמַחֹת refers to the whole conduct of the king, the warning is, that he should not regulate his conduct in dependence on the love and the government of women. But whoever will place himself amid the revelry of lust, is wont to intoxicate himself with ardent spirits; and he who is thus intoxicated, is in danger of giving reins to the beast within him. Hence there now follows a warning against drunkenness, not unmediated by the reading לְמַחֹת:

- Ver. 4 It is not for kings, O Lemuel,
 Not for kings to drink wine,
 Not for rulers to ask for intoxicating drink;
 5 Lest he drink, and forget what is prescribed,
 And pervert the right of all the children of want.

The usual translation of 4a is: non decet reges . . . (as e.g. also Mühlau); but in this לֹא is not rightly rendered, which indeed is at times only an oû, spoken with close interest, but yet first of all, especially in such parænetic connection as here, it is a dissuasive μή. But now לֹא לְמַלְכִים שָׁתוּת or לֹא לְמַלְכִים לְשָׁתוּת, after 2 Chron. xxvi. 18, Mic. iii. 1, signifies: it is not the part of kings, it does not become them to drink, which may also be turned into a dissuasive form: let it not be the part of kings to drink, let them not have any business therewith, as if it belonged to their calling; according to which Fleischer renders: Absit a regibus, Lemuel, absit a regibus potare vinum. The clearer expression לְמוֹאֵל, instead of לְמוֹאֵל, is, after Böttcher, occasioned by this, that the name is here in the vocative; perhaps rather by this, that the meaning of the name: consecrated to God, belonging to God, must be placed in contrast to the descending to low, sensual lust. Both times we write לְמוֹאֵל with the orthophonic Dagesh<sup>1</sup> in the ל following ל, and with-

out the recompensative Dagesh, the want of which is in a certain measure covered by the Metheg (vid. Norzi). Regarding the inf. constr. שְׁתוּ (cf. קָנָה, xvi. 16), vid. Gesen. § 75, Anm. 2; and regarding the sequence of accents here necessary, אֶל־לְמַלְכִים שְׁתוּ־יֵינָהּ (not Mercha, Dechi, Athnach, for Dechi would be here contrary to rule), vid. Thorath Emeth, p. 22 § 6, p. 43 § 7. In 4*b* nothing is to be gained from the Chethûb אוֹ. There is not a substantive אוֹ, desire, the constr. of which would here have to be read, not אוֹ (Umbreit, Gesenius), but אוֹ, after the form קוֹ (Maurer); and why did the author not write תִּיאֹת שְׁכָר? But the particle אוֹ does not here also fall in with the connection; for if אוֹ שְׁכָר connect itself with יֵין (Hitzig, Ewald, and others), then it would drag disagreeably, and we would have here a spiritless classification of things unadvisable for kings. Böttcher therefore sees in this אוֹ the remains of the obliterated סְבוּא; a corrector must then have transformed the וֹ which remained into אוֹ. But before one ventures on such conjectures, the Keri אֵי [where?] must be tried. Is it the abbreviated אֵין (Herzog's Real-Wörterbuch, xiv. 712)? Certainly not, because אֵין שְׁכָר would mean: and the princes, or rulers (vid. regarding רוֹנִים at viii. 15), have no mead, which is inconsistent. But אֵין does not abbreviate itself into אֵי, but into אֵי. Not אֵי, but אֵי, is in Heb., as well as in Ethiop., the word with which negative adjectives such as אֵי נְקִי, not innocent, Job xxii. 30, and in later Heb. also, negative sentences, such as אֵי אֶפְשֶׁר: it is not possible, are formed.<sup>1</sup> Therefore Mühlau vocalizes אֵי, and thinks that the author used this word for אֶל, so as not to repeat this word for the third time. But how is that possible? אֵי שְׁכָר signifies either: not mead, or: there is not mead; and both afford, for the passage before us, no meaning. Is, then, the Keri אֵי truly so unsuitable? Indeed, to explain: how came intoxicating drink to rulers! is inadmissible, since אֵי always means only ubi (e.g. Gen. iv. 9); not, like the Ethiop. aité, also quomodo. But the question ubi temetum, as a question of desire, fits the connection, whether the sentence means: non decet principibus dicere (Ahron b. Josef supplies שיאמרו) ubi temetum, or: absit a principibus quærere ubi temetum (Fleischer), which, from our view of 4a, we prefer. There is in reality nothing to be supplied; but as 4a says that the drinking of wine ought not to characterize kings, so 4b, that "Where is mead?" (i.e. this eager inquiry after mead) ought not to characterize rulers.<sup>1</sup> Why not? ver. 5 says. That the prince, being a slave to drink, may not forget the כְּחֶקֶק, i.e. that which has been made and has become חֶק, thus that which is lawfully right, and may not alter the righteous cause of the miserable, who cry against their oppressors, i.e. may not handle falsely the facts of the case, and give judgment contrary to them. שָׁנָה רֵן (Aquila, Theodotion, Quinta, ἀλλοιοῦν κρίσιω) is elsewhere equivalent to עוֹתָהּ הַפָּה מִשָּׂפָט (עוֹתָהּ). בְּנִי־עָנִי are those who are, as it were, born to oppression and suffering. This mode of expression is a Semitism (Fleischer), but it here heightens the impression of the Arab. colouring. In כָּל (Venet. ὀντισοῦν) it is indicated that, not merely with reference to individual poor men, but in general to the whole class of the poorer people, suffering humanity, sympathy and a regard for truth on the part of a prince given to sensuality are easily thrown aside. Wine is better suited for those who are in a condition to be timeously helped over which, is a refreshment to them.

- Ver. 6 Give strong drink to him that is perishing,
 And wine to those whose soul is in bitter woe;
 7 Let him drink and forget his poverty,
 And let him think of his misery no more.

The preparation of a potion for malefactors who were condemned to death was, on the ground of these words of the proverb, cared for by noble women in Jerusalem (נָשִׁים יְרוּשָׁה), (שבירושלים), Sanhedrin 43a; Jesus rejected it, because He wished, without becoming insensible to His sorrow, to pass away from the earthly life freely and in full consciousness, Mark xv. 23.

<sup>1</sup> The translation of Jerome, quia nullum secretum est ubi regnat ebrietas (as if the words were לֵית רְזָא אֵי שֶׁבֶר), corresponds to the proverb: נִכְנַס כּוֹד יֵצֵא כּוֹד, when the wine goes in the secret comes out; or, which is the same thing: if one adds יין (= 70), כּוֹד (= 70) comes out.

The transition from the plur. to the sing. of the subject is in ver. 7 less violent than in ver. 5, since in ver. 6 singular and plur. already interchange. We write  $\text{הַתְּנִי-שִׁבְרֵךְ}$  with the counter-tone Metheg and Mercha.  $\text{אֹיֵבֶךָ}$  designates, as at Job xxix. 13, xxxi. 19, one who goes to meet destruction: it combines the present signification interiens, the fut. signif. interiturus, and the perf. perditus (hopelessly lost).  $\text{מַרֵּי נַפְשׁוֹ}$  (those whose minds are filled with sorrow) is also supported from the Book of Job, iii. 20, cf. xxi. 25, the language and thought and mode of writing of which notably rests on the Proverbs of Agur and Lemuel (vid. Mühlau, pp. 64–66). The Venet.  $\text{τοῖς πικροῖς}$  (not  $\text{ψυχροῖς}$ )  $\text{τὴν ψυχὴν}$ .  $\text{שִׁי}$  (poverty) is not, however, found there, but only in the Book of Proverbs, in which this word-stem is more at home than elsewhere. Wine rejoices the heart of man, Ps. civ. 15, and at the same time raises it for the time above oppression and want, and out of anxious sorrow, wherefore it is soonest granted to them, and in sympathizing love ought to be presented to them by whom this its beneficent influence is to be wished for. The ruined man forgets his poverty, the deeply perplexed his burden of sorrow; the king, on the contrary, is in danger from this cause of forgetting what the law required at his hands, viz. in relation to those who need help, to whom especially his duty as a ruler refers.

- Ver. 8 Open thy mouth for the dumb,
 For the right of all the children of leaving;
 9 Open thy mouth, judge righteously,
 And do right to the poor and needy.

He is called dumb who suffers the infirmity of dumbness, as  $\text{עֵיִר}$  and  $\text{קֵדָם}$ , Job xxix. 15, is he who suffers the infirmity of blindness or lameness, not here figuratively; at the same time, he who, on account of his youth, or on account of his ignorance, or from fear, cannot speak before the tribunal for himself (Fleischer). With  $\text{ל}$  the dat. commodi (LXX. after Lagarde,  $\text{μοιλάλω}$ ; Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion,  $\text{ἀλάλω}$ ; the Venet. after Gebhardt,  $\text{βωβῶ}$ )  $\text{לְ}$ , of the object aimed at, interchanges, as e.g. 1 Kings xix. 3, 2 Kings vii. 7,  $\text{לְנַפְשׁוֹ}$ , for the preservation of their life, or for the sake of their life, for it is seldom that it introduces the object so purely as here. And that an infin. such as  $\text{הִלְבֵּן}$  should stand as a subst. occurs proportionally seldomer in Heb. (Isa. iv. 4; Ps. xxii. 7; cf. with ה of the artic., Num. iv. 12; Ps. lxvi. 9) than it does in Arab. בְּנֵי הַלֵּוֹי in the same way as בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל, 5b, belongs to the Arab. complexion of this proverb, but without its being necessary to refer to the Arab. in order to fix the meaning of these two words. Hitzig explains after khalf, to come after, which further means "to have the disadvantage," in which Zöckler follows him; but this verb in Arab. does not mean ὑστερεῖν (ὑστερεῖσθαι), we must explain "sons of him that remains behind," i.e. such as come not forward, but remain behind (an) others. Mühlau goes further, and explains, with Schultens and Vaihinger: those destitute of defence, after (Arab.) khalaḡahu he is ranked next to him, and has become his representative—a use of the word foreign to the Heb. Still less is the rendering of Gesenius justified, "children of inheritance" = children left behind, after khallafa, to leave behind; and Luther, "for the cause of all who are left behind," by the phrase (Arab.) khallafany 'an 'awnih, he has placed me behind his help, denied it to me, for the Kal of the verb cannot mean to abandon, to leave. And that בְּנֵי הַלֵּוֹי means the opposers of the truth, or of the poor, or the litigious person, the quarrelsome, is perfectly inadmissible, since the Kal הָלַף cannot be equivalent to (Arab.) khilaf, the inf. of the 3d conj., and besides, the gen. after לֵוִי always denotes those in whose favour, not those against whom it is passed; the latter is also valid against Ralbag's "sons of change," i.e. who say things different from what they think; and Ahron b. Josef's "sons of changing," viz. the truth into lies. We must abide by the meaning of the Heb. הָלַף, "to follow after, to change places, pass away." Accordingly, Fleischer understands by הָלַף, the going away, the dying, viz. of parents, and translates: eorum qui parentibus orbati sunt. In another way Rashi reaches the same sense: orphans deprived of their helper. But the connection בְּנֵי הַלֵּוֹי requires that we make those who are intended themselves the subject of הָלַף. Rightly Ewald, Bertheau, Kamphausen, compare Isa. ii. 18 (and Ps. xc. 5 f., this with questionable right), and understand by the sons of disappearance those whose inherited lot, whose proper fate, is to disappear, to die, to perish (Symmachus: πάντων υἱῶν ἀποικομένων; Jerome: omnium filiorum qui per-transeunt). It is not men in general as children of frailty that are meant (Kimchi, Meiri, Immanuel, Enchel, and others), after which the Venet. τῶν υἱῶν τοῦ μεταβάλλειν (i.e. those who must exchange this life for another), but such as are on the brink of the abyss. צָדִק in שִׁפְט־צָדִק is not equivalent to בְּצָדִק, but is the accus. of the object, as at Zech. viii. 16, decide justice, i.e. so that justice is the result of thy judicial act; cf. Knobel on Deut. i. 16. יָדִן is imper., do right to the miserable and the poor; cf. Ps. liv. 3 with Jer. xxii. 16, v. 28. That is a king of a right sort, who directs his high function as a judge, so as to be an advocate [procurator] for the helpless of his people.

THIRD APPENDIX TO THE SECOND COLLECTION OF SOLOMONIC PROVERBS.—XXXI. 10 ff.

The admonitions of a faithful mother are followed by words in praise of a virtuous wife; the poet praises them through all the prædicamenta, i.e. all the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet. The artificialness of the order, says Hitzig, proves that the section belongs to a proportionally late age. But if, as he himself allows, even a Davidic psalm, viz. Ps. ix.—x., is constructed acrostically, then from this, that there the acrostic design is not so purely carried out as it is here in this ode, no substantial proof can be drawn for the more recent origin of the latter. Yet we do not deny that it belongs to an earlier time than the earliest of the era of Hezekiah. If Hitzig carries it back to the times subsequent to Alexander on account of the scriptio plena, without distinctive accents, vers. 17, 25, it is, on the other hand, to be remarked that it has the scriptio plena in common with the “utterance from Massa,” which he places forward in the times of Hezekiah, without being influenced to such clear vision by writings such as ימלוך, xxx. 22, אובד, xxxi. 6, רחונים, xxxi. 4. Besides, the plene written עון, ver. 25, is incorrect, and בָּעֵינַי, ver. 17, which has its parallel in עון, Ps. lxxxiv. 6, is in its form altogether dependent on the Munach, which was added some thousand years after.

In the LXX. this section forms the concluding section of the Book of Proverbs. But it varies from the Heb. text in that the  $\delta$  ( $\sigma\tau\acute{o}\mu\alpha$ ) goes before the  $\gamma$  ( $\iota\sigma\chi\acute{\upsilon}\nu$ ). The very same sequence of letters is found in the Heb. text of Ps. xxxiv. and Lam. ii. iii. and iv.

Stier has interpreted allegorically the matron here commended. He understands thereby the Holy Ghost in His regenerating and sanctifying influence, as the Midrash does the Tóra; Ambrosius, Augustine, and others, the Church; Immanuel, the soul in covenant with God, thirsting after the truth. As if it were not an invaluable part of Biblical moral instruction which is here presented to us! Such a woman's mirror is nowhere else found. The housewife is depicted here as she ought to be; the poet shows how she governs and increases the wealth of the house, and thereby also advances the position of her husband in the common estimation, and he refers all these, her virtues and her prudence, to the fear of God as their root (Von Hofmann's Schriftbeweis, ii. 2. 404 f.). One of the most beautiful expositions of this section is that of Luis de Leon, La perfecta casada (Salamanca, 1582), which has been revived in a very attractive way by Wilkens.<sup>1</sup>

A wife, such as she ought to be, is a rare treasure, a good excelling all earthly possession :

Ver. 10 א A virtuous woman, who findeth her!
She stands far above pearls in worth.

In the connection אִשָּׁה צְדִיקָה and the like, the idea of bodily vigour is spiritualized to that of capacity, ability, and is generalized; in virtus the corresponding transition from manliness, and in the originally Romanic "Bravheit," valour to ability, is completed; we have translated as at xii. 4, but also Luther, "a virtuous woman," is suitable, since Tugend (virtue) has with Tüchtigkeit [ability] the same root-word, and according to our linguistic [German] usage designates the property of moral goodness and propriety, while for those of former times, when they spoke of the tugend (tugent) of a woman, the word combined with it the idea of fine manners (cf. אִשָּׁה צְדִיקָה, xi. 16) and culture (cf. אִשָּׁה צְדִיקָה, xiii. 15). The question אִשָּׁה צְדִיקָה מַי, quis inveniat, which,

Eccles. vii. 24, proceeds from the supposition of the impossibility of finding, conveys here only the idea of the difficulty of finding. In ancient Jerusalem, when one was married, they were wont to ask : מָצָא אוּ מוֹצֵא, i.e. has he found? thus as is said at Prov. xviii. 22, or at Eccles. vii. 26. A virtuous woman [braves Weib] is not found by every one, she is found by comparatively few. In 10*b* there is given to the thought which underlies the question a synonymous expression. Ewald, Elster, and Zöckler incorrectly render the ו by “although” or “and yet.” Fleischer rightly : the second clause, if not in form yet in sense, runs parallel to the first. מְכָר designates the price for which such a woman is sold, and thus is purchasable, not without reference to this, that in the Orient a wife is obtained by means of מְהָר, מְכָר, synon. מְחִיר, for which a wife of the right kind is gained, is רָחִיק, placed further, i.e. is more difficult to be obtained, than pearls (vid. regarding “pearls” at iii. 15), i.e. than the price for such precious things. The poet thereby means to say that such a wife is a more precious possession than all earthly things which are precious, and that he who finds such an one has to speak of his rare fortune. The reason for this is now given :

Ver. 11 בּ The heart of her husband doth trust her,
And he shall not fail of gain.

If we interpret שָׁלַל, after Eccles. ix. 8, as subject, then we miss וְ; it will thus be object., and the husband subj. to לֹא יִהְיֶה רֵפֶר : nec lucro carebit, as e.g. Fleischer translates it, with the remark that שָׁלַל denotes properly the spoil which one takes from an enemy, but then also, like the Arab. danyimat, can mean profit and gain of all kinds (cf. Rödiger in Gesenius' Thes.). Thus also in our “kriegen” = to come into possession, the reference to war disappears. Hitzig understands by שָׁלַל, the continual prosperity of the man on account of his fortunate possession of such a wife ; but in that case the poet should have said שְׂמֵחָה שָׁלַל ; for שָׁלַל is gain, not the feeling that is therewith connected. There is here meant the gain, profit, which the housewife is the means of bringing in (cf. Ps. lxxviii. 13). The heart of her husband (בְּעֵלָהּ) can be at rest, it can rest on her whom it loves—he goes after his calling, perhaps a calling which, though weighty and honourable, brings in little or nothing ; but the wife keeps the family possessions scrupulously together, and increases them by her laborious and prudent management, so that there is not wanting to him gain, which he properly did not acquire, but which the confidence he is justified in reposing in his wife alone brings to him. She is to him a perpetual spring of nothing but good.

Ver. 12 ך She doeth good to him, and not evil,
All the days of her life ;

or, as Luther translates :

“Sie thut jm liebs vnd kein leid̄s.”

[She does him good, and no harm.]

She is far from ever doing him evil, she does him only good all her life long ; her love is not dependent on freaks, it rests on deep moral grounds, and hence derives its power and purity, which remain ever the same. נָמַל signifies to accomplish, to perform. To the not assimilated form נְמַלְתָּהּ, cf. יִפְרֶהּ, 1b. The poet now describes how she disposes of things :

Ver. 13 ך She careth for wool and flax,
And worketh these with her hands' pleasure.

The verb ך proceeds, as the Arab. shows,<sup>1</sup> from the primary meaning terere ; but to translate with reference thereto : tractat lanam et linum (LXX., Schultens, Dathe, Rosenmüller, Fleischer), is inadmissible. The Heb. ך does not mean the external working at or manufacturing of a thing ; but it means, even when it refers to this, the intention of the mind purposely directed thereto. Thus wool and flax come into view as the material of work which she cares to bring in ; and וְהַעֲשֶׂה signifies the work itself, following the creation of the need of work. Hitzig translates the second line : she works at the business of her hands. Certainly ך after עֲשֶׂה may denote the sphere of activity, Ex. xxxi. 4 ; 1 Kings v. 30, etc. ; but if הַפֶּן had here the weakened signification business, πράγμα,—which it gains in the same way as we say business, affair, of any object of care,—the scarcely established meaning presents itself, that she shows herself active in that which she has made the business of her hands. How much more beautiful, on the contrary, is the thought : she is active with her hands' pleasure ! הַפֶּן is, as Schultens rightly explains, inclinatio flexa et propensa in aliquid, and pulchre manibus diligentissimis attribuitur lubentia cum ob- lectatione et per oblectationem sese animans. עָשָׂה, without obj. accus., signifies often: to accomplish, e.g. Ps. xxii. 32; here it stands, in a sense, complete in itself, and without object. accus., as when it means “handeln” [agere], xiii. 16, and particularly to act in the service of God = to offer sacrifice, Ex. x. 25; it means here, and at Ruth ii. 19, Hag. ii. 4, to be active, as at Isa. xix. 15, to be effective; וַתַּעַשׂ is equivalent to וַתַּעֲשֵׂהוּ or בְּמַלְאכָהּ or וַתַּעֲשֵׂהוּ מְלָאכָתָהּ (cf. under x. 4). And pleasure and love for the work, הִפְתִּין, can be attributed to the hands with the same right as at Ps. lxxviii. 72, discretion. The disposition which animates a man, especially his inner relation to the work devolving upon him, communicates itself to his hands, which, according as he has joy or aversion in regard to his work, will be nimble or clumsy. The Syr. translates: “and her hands are active after the pleasure of her heart;” but בְּחַפְזָהּ is not equivalent to בְּהִפְתִּיןָ; also בְּהִפְתִּיןָ, in the sense of con amore (Böttcher), is not used. The following proverb praises the extent of her housewifely transactions:

Ver. 14 הַ She is like the ships of the merchant—
Bringeth her food from afar.

She is (LXX. ἐγέμετο) like merchant ships (בְּאֵינִיּוֹת, indeterminate, and thus to be read kōōnîjoth), i.e. she has the art of such ships as sail away and bring wares from a distance, are equipped, sent out, and managed by an enterprising spirit; so the prudent, calculating look of the brave wife, directed towards the care and the advancement of her house, goes out beyond the nearest circle; she descries also distant opportunities of advantageous purchase and profitable exchange, and brings in from a distance what is necessary for the supply of her house, or, mediately, what yields this supply (מְמַרְחֵק, Cod. Jaman. מְמַרְחֵק, cf. under Isa. x. 6), for she finds that source of gain she has espied. With this diligence in her duties she is not a long sleeper, who is not awakened till the sun is up; but

Ver. 15 יַ She riseth up while it is yet night,
And giveth food to her house,
And the fixed portion to her maidens.

The fut. consec. express, if not a logical sequence of connection, yet a close inner binding together of the separate features of the character here described. Early, ere the morning dawns, such a housewife rises up, because she places care for her house above her own comfort; or rather, because this care is to her a satisfaction and a joy. Since now the poet means without doubt to say that she is up before the other inmates of the house, especially before the children, though not before the maids: we have not, in וַיִּתְהַן, to think that the inmates of the house, all in the morning night-watch, stand round about her, and that each receives from her a portion for the approaching day; but that she herself, early, whilst yet the most are asleep, gives out or prepares the necessary portions of food for the day (cf. וַיִּתְהַן, Isa. liii. 9). Regarding בָּרֶה, food, from בָּרַה (to tear in pieces, viz. with the teeth), and regarding חֶק, a portion decreed, vid. at xxx. 8. It is true that חֶק also means the appointed labour (pensum), and thus the day's work (דְּבַר יוֹם); but the parallelism brings it nearer to explain after xxx. 8, as is done by Gesenius and Hitzig after Ex. v. 14. This industry,—a pattern for the whole house,—this punctuality in the management of household matters, secures to her success in the extension of her household wealth:

Ver. 16 † She seeketh a field and getteth possession of it;
Of the fruit of her hands she planteth a vineyard.

The field which she considereth, towards which her wish and her effort are directed, is perhaps not one beyond those which she already possesses, but one which has hitherto been wanting to her family; for the poet has, after ver. 23, an inhabitant of a town in his eye,—a woman whose husband is not a landlord, but has a business in the city. The perf. וַיִּמְכַּר precedes and gives circumstantiality to the chief factum expressed by וַתִּקְחָהּ. Regarding וַיִּמְכַּר, vid. xxi. 27. “וַיִּמְכַּר is the general expression for purchasing, as וַיִּקַּח, 24*b*, for selling. Thus the Aram. and Arab. אַחַר, while, (Arab.) akhadh w'ta, Turk. alisch werisch (from elmek, to take, and wirmek, to give—viz. sâtün, in the way of selling; Lat. venum), post.-bibl. מִשָּׂא וּמִמְכָּר or מִמְכָּר וּמִשָּׂא, denotes giving and taking = business in general” (Fleischer). In 16*b* the Chethib is, with Ewald and Bertheau, to be read וַיִּטַּע, and, with Hitzig, to be made dependent on וַתִּקְחָהּ, as parallel obj.: “of her hands' fruit (she gaineth) a planting of vines.” But a planting of vines would be expressed by מִטַּע כֶּרֶם (Mic. i. 6); and the Keri וַיִּטַּע is more acceptable. The perf., as a fundamental verbal form, is here the expression of the abstract present: she plants a vineyard, for she purchases vines from the profit of her industry (Isa. vii. 23, cf. v. 2). The poet has this augmented household wealth in his eye, for he continues:

Ver. 17 ה She girdeth her loins with strength,
And moveth vigorously her arms.

Strength is as the girdle which she wraps around her body (Ps. xciii. 1). We write  $\text{הַגִּירָה בְּעֹז}$ ; both words have Munach, and the ה of בעוז is aspirated. Thus girded with strength, out of this fulness of strength she makes firm or steels her arms (cf. Ps. lxxxix. 22). The produce of the field and vineyard extend far beyond the necessity of her house; thus a great portion is brought to sale, and the gain thence arising stimulates the industry and the diligence of the unwearied woman.

Ver. 18 ט She perceiveth that her gain is good;
And her light goeth not out at night.

The perf. and fut. are related to each other as antecedent and consequent, so that 18a can also be rendered as an hypothetical antecedent. She comes to find (taste) how profitable her industry is by the experience resulting from the sale of its product: the corn, the grapes, and the wine are found to be good, and thus her gain (cf. iii. 14) is better, this opened new source of nourishment productive.

This spurs on her active industry to redoubled effort, and at times, when she is not fully occupied by the oversight of her fields and vineyard, she has another employment over which her light goes not out till far in the night.  $\text{בְּלַיְלָהָ$  is, as at Lam. ii. 19, a needless Keri for the poetic  $\text{בְּלַיְלֵי}$  (Isa. xvi. 3). What other business it is to which she gives attention till in the night, is mentioned in the next verse.

Ver. 19 י She putteth her hand to the rock [Spinrocken];
And her fingers lay hold on the spindle.

She applies herself to the work of spinning, and performs it with skill. The phrase  $\text{שָׁלַח יָדָהּ$  (שָׁלַח, Job xxviii. 9) signifies to take up an object of work, and תִּקַּף, with obj. accus. (cf. Amos i. 5), the handling of the instrument of work necessary thereto. כַּפַּיִם denotes the hands when the subject is skilful, successful work; we accordingly say  $\text{יָגַע כַּפַּיִם}$ , not  $\text{יָגַע יָדַיִם}$ ; cf. vers. 13 and 16,

Ps. lxxviii. 72. What פְּלָקָה means is shown by the Arab. falakat, which, as distinguished from mighzal, i.e. fuseau (Lat. fuscus), is explained by bout arrondi et conique au bas du fuseau, thus: the whorl, i.e. the ring or knob fastened on the spindle below, which gives it its necessary weight and regulates its movement, Lat. verticellus, post-bibl. פְּיָקָה (which Bartenora glosses by the Ital. fusajuolo) or צִנּוּרָה, e.g. Kelim ix. 6, כִּישׁ שְׁבֹלַע אֶת הַצִּנּוּרָה, a spindle which holds the whorl hidden (vid. Aruch under כִּישׁ, iii.). But the word then also signifies per synecdochen partis pro toto, the spindle, i.e. the cylindrical wood on which the thread winds itself when spinning (cf. 2 Sam. iii. 29, where it means the staff on which the infirm leans); Homer gives to Helen and the goddesses golden spindles (χρυσήλακατοι). Accordingly it is not probable that כִּישׁוֹר also denotes the whorl, as Kimchi explains the word: “כִּישׁוֹר is that which one calls by the name verteil, viz. that which one fixes on the spindle (פְּלָקָה) above to regulate the spinning (מַטְוֶה),” according to which the Venet. renders כִּישׁוֹר by σφόδρυλος, whorl, and פְּלָקָה by ἄτρακτος, spindle. The old interpreters have not recognised that כִּישׁוֹר denotes a thing belonging to the spinning apparatus; the LXX., Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, Syr., and Jerome see therein an ethical idea (from כִּישׁוֹר, to be capable, able); but Luther, not misled thereby, translates with unusual excellence:

She stretches her hand to the rock,
And her fingers grasp the spindle.

He has in this no predecessors, except only the Targumists, whose כִּישְׁרָא (vid. Levy) appears also to denote the spinning-rock. The Syriac and Talmudic כִּישׁ, which is compared by Gesenius-Dietrich, is another word, and denotes, not the rock, but the spindle. Immanuel also, who explains פְּלָקָה as the מַטְוֶה, i.e. the spindle, understands (as perhaps also Parchon) by כִּישׁוֹר the rock. And why should not the rock (wocken = distaff), i.e. the stock to which the tuft of flax, hemp, or wool is fixed for the purpose of being spun, Lat. colus, not be named כִּישׁוֹר, from כִּישׁ, to be upright as a stick, upright in height, or perhaps more correctly as כִּישְׁרִי, i.e. as that which prepares or makes fit the flax for spinning? Also in צִינָה, Jer. xxix. 26, there are united the meanings of the close and the confining dungeon, and שְׁלֹחַן = שִׁילּוֹן signifies<sup>1</sup> the place which yields rest. The spinning-wheel is a German invention of the 16th century, but the rock standing on the ground, or held also in the hands, the spindle and the whorl, are more ancient.<sup>2</sup> With the spindle תַּכְךָ stands in fit relation, for it is twirled between the fingers, as Catullus says of Fate:

Libratum tereti versabat pollice fusum.<sup>3</sup>

That which impels the housewife to this labour is not selfishness, not a narrow-hearted limitation of her care to the circle of what is her own, but love, which reaches out far beyond this circle:

Ver. 20 כַּ She holdeth out her hand to the unfortunate,
And stretcheth forth her hands to the needy.

With כַּפָּיָה, 19b, is connected the idea of artistic skilfulness; with כַּפָּה, here that of offering for counsel (vid. at Isa. ii. 6); with sympathy and readiness to help, she presents herself to those who are oppressed by the misfortunes of life as if for an alliance, as if saying: place confidence in me, I shall do whatever I can—there thou hast my hand! Hitzig erroneously thinks of the open hand with a gift lying in it: this ought to be named, for כַּ in itself is nothing else than the half-opened

(After HERTZBERG’S Translation.)

hand. Also in 20*b* we are not to think of alms. Here Hitzig rightly: she stretches out to him both of her hands, that he might grasp them, both of them, or whichever he may. She does not throw to him merely a gift from a distance, but above all she gives to him to experience her warm sympathy (cf. Ezek. xvi. 49). Here, as at 19*a*, שלחה is punctuated (with Dagesh) as Piel. The punctuation supposes that the author both times not unintentionally made use of the intensive form. This one verse (20) is complete in itself as a description of character; and the author has done well in choosing such strong expressions, for, without this sympathy with misery and poverty, she, so good and trustworthy and industrious, might indeed be pleasing to her husband, but not to God. One could almost wish that greater expansion had been given to this one feature in the picture. But the poet goes on to describe her fruitful activity in the nearest sphere of her calling:

Ver. 21  $\zeta$  She is not afraid of the snow for her house;
For her whole house is clothed in scarlet.

A fall of snow in the rainy season of winter is not rare in Palestine, the Hauran, and neighbouring countries, and is sometimes accompanied with freezing cold.<sup>1</sup> She sees approaching the cold time of the year without any fear for her house, even though the season bring intense cold; for her whole house, i.e. the whole of the members of her family, are לבש שנים. The connection is accusativus (Venet. ἐνδεδυμένους ἐρυθρά), as at 2 Sam. xv. 32; Ezek. ix. 2, 3. שני, from שנה, to shine, glance clear, or high red, and is with or without תולעת the name of the colour of the Kermes worm, crimson or scarlet, perhaps to be distinguished from ארנמן, the red-purple shell colour, and תכלת, the blue. שנים are clothing or material coloured with such שני (bright red) (vid. at Isa. i. 18). The explanation of the word by dibapha is inadmissible, because the doubled colouring, wherever it is mentioned, always refers to the purple, particularly that of Tyre (dibapha Tyria), not to the scarlet.<sup>2</sup> But why does the poet name scarlet-coloured clothing? On account of the contrast to the white snow, says Hitzig, he clothes the family in crimson. But this contrast would be a meaningless freak. Rather it is to be supposed that there is ascribed to the red material a power of retaining the heat, as there is to the white that of keeping off the heat; but evidences for this are wanting. Therefore Rosenmüller, Vaihinger, and Böttcher approve of the translation duplicibus (Jerome, Luther) [= with double clothing], because they read, with the LXX., שָׁנִים.<sup>1</sup> But, with right, the Syr., Targ. abide by זָהָרִיתָא, scarlet. The scarlet clothing is of wool, which as such preserves warmth, and, as high-coloured, appears at the same time dignified (2 Sam. i. 24). From the protecting, and at the same time ornamental clothing of the family, the poet proceeds to speak of the bed-places, and of the attire of the housewife:

Ver. 22 מַ She prepareth for herself pillows;
Linen and purple is her raiment.

Regarding מְרִבְרִים (with ב raphatum), vid. at vii. 16. Thus, pillows or mattresses (Aquila, Theodotion, περιστρόματα; Jerome, stragulatam vestem; Luther, Decke = coverlets) to make the bed soft and to adorn it (Kimchi: לְיִפּוֹת עַל הַמַּטּוֹת according to which Venet. κόσμια); Symmachus designates it as ἀμφιτάπους, i.e. τάπητες (tapetae, tapetia, carpets), which are hairy (shaggy) on both sides.<sup>2</sup> Only the LXX. makes out of it δισσὰς χλαίνας, lined overcoats, for it brings over שָׁנִים. By עֲשֶׂתָהּ לָהּ it is not meant that she prepares such pillows for her own bed, but that she herself (i.e. for the wants of her house) prepares them. But she also clothes herself in costly attire. שֵׁשׁ (an Egyptian word, not, as Heb., derived from שָׁשׁ, cogn. שֵׁשׁ, to be white) is the old name for linen, according to which the Aram. translates it by בּוּיָן, the Greek by βύσσος, vid. Genesis, pp. 470, 557, to which the remark is to be added, that the linen [Byssus], according to a prevailing probability, was not a fine cotton cloth, but linen cloth. Luther translates שי, here and elsewhere, by weisse Seide [white silk] (σηρικόν, i.e. from the land of the Σήρες, Rev. xviii. 12); but the silk is first mentioned by Ezekiel under the name of מִשֵּׁי; and the ancients call the country where silk-stuff (bombycina) was woven, uniformly Assyria. אַרְמֵן (Aram. אַרְמֵן, derived by Benfey, with great improbability, from the rare Sanscrit word rāgavant, red-coloured; much rather from רָגַם = רָגַם, as stuff of variegated colour) is red purple; the most valuable purple garments were brought from Tyre and Sidon.

Now, first, the description turns back to the husband, of the woman who is commended, mentioned in the introduction:

Ver. 23 ; Well known in the gates is her husband,
Where he sitteth among the elders of the land.

Such a wife is, according to xii. 4, עֲטֹרַת בַּעֲלָהָ,—she advances the estimation and the respect in which her husband is held. He has, in the gates where the affairs of the city are deliberated upon, a well-known, reputable name; for there he sits, along with the elders of the land, who are chosen into the council of the city as the chief place of the land, and has a weighty voice among them. The phrase wavers between נִרְעָה (LXX. περίβλεπτος γίγνεται; Venet. ἔλνωσται) and נִרְעָה. The old Venetian edd. have in this place (like the Cod. Jaman.), and at Ps. ix. 17, נִרְעָה; on the contrary, Ps. lxxvi. 2, Eccles. vi. 10, נִרְעָה, and that is correct; for the Masora, at this place and at Ps. lxxvi. 2 (in the Biblia rabb.), is disfigured. The description, following the order of the letters, now directs attention to the profitable labour of the housewife:

Ver. 24 ; She prepareth body-linen and selleth it,
And girdles doth she give to the Phœnicians.

It is a question whether קָרִין signifies σινδών, cloth from Sindhu, the land of India (vid. at Isa. iii. 23); the Arab. sadn (sadl), to cause to hang down, to descend (for the purpose of covering or veiling), offers an appropriate verbal root. In the Talmud, קרין is the sleeping linen, the curtain, the embroidered cloth, but particularly a light smock-frock, as summer costume, which was worn on the bare body (cf. Mark xiv. 51 f.). Kimchi explains the word by night-shirt; the Edictum Diocle- tiani, xviii. 16, names σινδόνες κοιταρίαι, as the Papyrus Louvre, ὀθόνια ἐγκοιμήτρια; and the connection in the Edict shows that linen attire (ἐκ λίνου) is meant, although—as with שֵׁשׁ, so also with סֹדֵן—with the ancients and the moderns, sometimes linen and sometimes cotton is spoken of without any distinction. Æthicus speaks of costly girdles, Cosmogr. 84, as fabricated at Jerusalem: baltea regalia . . . ex Hierosolyma allata; Jerusalem and Scythopolis were in later times the chief places in Palestine for the art of weaving. In Galilee also, where excellent flax grew, the art of weaving was carried on; and the ὀθόναι, which, according to Clemens Alex. Pædag. ii. 10, p. 239, were exported ἐκ γῆς Ἐβραίων, are at least in their material certainly synon. with σινδόνες. Regarding נֵתָן, syn. מְכַר, opp. לָקַח, syn. נָשָׂא = קָנָה, vid. at 16a. There is no reason to interpret בְּנֵעֵי here, with the obliteration of the ethnographical meaning, in the general sense of בֹּחֵר, trader, merchant; for purple, 22b, is a Phœnician manufacture, and thus, as an article of exchange, can be transferred to the possession of the industrious wife. The description is now more inward:

Ver. 25 ע Strength and honour is her clothing;
Thus she laugheth at the future day.

She is clothed with עַז, strength, i.e. power over the changes of temporal circumstances, which easily shatter and bring to ruin a household resting on less solid foundations; clothed with הֲדָרָה, glory, i.e. elevation above that which is low, little, common, a state in which they remain who propose to themselves no high aim after which they strive with all their might: in other words, her raiment is just pride, true dignity, with which she looks confidently into the future, and is armed against all sorrow and care. The connection of ideas, עַז וְהֲדָרָה (defectively written, on the contrary, at Ps. lxxxiv. 6, Masora, and only there written plene, and with Munach), instead of the frequent הוֹד וְהֲדָרָה, occurs only here. The expression 25b is like Job xxxix. 7, wherefore Hitzig rightly compares Job xxiv. 14 to 25a. יוֹם אֲחֵרוֹן, distinguished from אֲחֵרִית, and incorrectly interpreted (Rashi) of the day of death, is, as at Isa. xxx. 8, the future, here that which one at a later period may enter upon.

The next verse presents one of the most beautiful features in the portrait :

Ver. 26 פ She openeth her mouth with wisdom,
And amiable instruction is on her tongue.

The פ of פִּתְּחָהּ is, as also at Ps. xlix. 5, lxxviii. 2, that of means: when she speaks, then it is wisdom pressing itself from her heart outward, by means of which she breaks the silence of her mouth. With לַע, in the expression 26*b*, elsewhere תַּחַת interchanges: under the tongue, Ps. x. 7, one has that which is ready to be spoken out, and on the tongue, Ps. xv. 3, that which is in the act of being spoken out. תּוֹרַת־הַסֵּדֶר is a genitive connection after the manner of tôrath אֵמֶת, Mal. ii. 6. The gen. is not, as at Lev. vi. 2, in tôrath הַעֲלֵה, the gen. of the object (thus e.g. Fleischer's institutio ad humanitatem), but the gen. of property, but not so that הסֵדֶר denotes grace (Symmachus, νόμος ἐπίχαρις; Theodotion, νόμος χάριτος), because for this meaning there is no example except Isa. xl. 6; and since הסֵדֶר in the O. T. is the very same as in the N. T., love, which is the fulfilling of the law, Hos. vi. 6, cf. 1 Kings xx. 31,<sup>1</sup> it is supposed that the poet, since he writes תּוֹרַת־הַסֵּדֶר, and not תּוֹרַת־הוֹן, means to designate by תּוֹרַת־הַסֵּדֶר this property without which her love for her husband, her industry, her high sentiment, would be no virtues, viz. unselfish, sympathizing, gentle love. Instruction which bears on itself the stamp of such amiability, and is also gracious, i.e. awakening love, because going forth from love (according to which Luther, translating holdselige Lere = pleasing instructions, thus understands it)—such instruction she carries, as house-mother (i. 8), in her mouth. Accordingly the LXX. translate (vid. Lagarde regarding the mistakes of this text before us) θεσμοὶ ἐλεημοσύνης, and Jerome lex clementiæ. תּוֹרַת־הַסֵּדֶר is related to אֲהַבָה as grace to love; it denotes love showing itself in kindness and gracefulness, particularly condescending love, proceeding from a compassionate sympathy with the sufferings and wants of men. Such graceful instruction she communicates now to this and now to that member of her household, for nothing that goes on in her house escapes her observation.

Ver. 27 ו She looketh well to the ways of her house,
And eateth not the bread of idleness.

Although there exists an inner relation between 27a and ver. 26, yet 27a is scarcely to be thought of (Hitzig) as appos. to the suffix in לְשׂוֹנָה. Participles with or without determination occur in descriptions frequently as predicates of the subject standing in the discourse of the same force as abstr. present declarations, e.g. Isa. xl. 22 f., Ps. civ. 13 f. צוֹפֵיָה is connected with the accus. of the object of the intended warning, like xv. 3, and is compared according to the form with הַמְּיָה, vii. 11. הַלְּיָה signifies elsewhere things necessary for a journey, Job vi. 19, and in the plur. magnificus it denotes show (pompa), Hab. iii. 6: but originally the walk, conduct, Nah. ii. 6; and here in the plur. walks = comings and goings, but not these separately, but in general, the modi procedendi (LXX. δια-τριβαί). The Chethîb has הַלְּכָה, probably an error in writing, but possibly also the plur. of הַלְּכָה, thus found in the post.-bibl. Heb. (after the form צִדְקוֹת), custom, viz. appointed traditional law, but also like the Aram. הַלְּכָה (emph. הַלְּכָה), usage, manner, common practice. Hitzig estimates this Chethîb, understood Talmudically, as removing the section into a late period; but this Talmudical signification is not at all appropriate (Hitzig translates, with an incorrect rendering of צוֹפֵיָה, “for she sees after the ordering of the house”), and besides the Aram. הַלְּכָה, e.g. Targ. Prov. xvi. 9, in the first line, signifies only the walk or the manner and way of going, and this gives with the Kerî essentially the same signification. Luther well: Sie schawet wie es in jrem Hause zugeht [= she looks how it goes in her house]. Her eyes are turned everywhere; she is at one time here, at another there, to look after all with her own eyes; she does not suffer the day’s work, according to the instructions given, to be left undone, while she folds her own hands on her bosom; but she works, keeping an oversight on all sides, and does not eat the bread of idleness (עֲצָלָה = עֲצָלָה, xix. 15), but bread well deserved, for εἴ τις οὐ θέλει ἐργάζεσθαι, μηδὲ ἐσθιέτω, 2 Thess. iii. 10.

Now begins the finale of this song in praise of the virtuous woman :

Ver. 28 ק Her sons rise up and bless her,
Her husband (riseth up) and praiseth her.

The Piel אָשַׁר in such a connection is denom. of אִשָּׁר (אִשְׁרִי). Her children rise up (קוּם, like e.g. Jer. xxvi. 17, but here, perhaps, with the associated idea of reverential honour) and bless her, that she has on her part brought the house and them to such prosperity, such a position of respect, and to a state where love (חַסֵּד) reigns, and her husband rises up and sings her praise.

Ver. 29 ר “ Many are the daughters who have done bravely,
But thou hast surpassed them all together.”

We have already often remarked, last time under xxix. 6, that רַב, not indeed in its sing., but in its plur. רַבִּים and רַבּוֹת, can precede, after the manner of a numeral, as attribute; but this syntactical licence, xxviii. 12, by no means appears, and needs to be assumed as little here as at viii. 26, although there is no reason that can be adduced against it. חֵיל עָשָׂה חֵיל signifies here not the gaining of riches (the LXX., Syr., Targ., Jerome, Luther, Gesenius, Böttcher, and others), which here, where the encomium comes to its height, would give to it a mercenary mammon-worship note—it indeed has this signification only when connected with ל of the person: Sibi opes acquirere, Dent. vi. 17; Ezek. xxviii. 4—but: bravery, energy, and, as the reference to אִשָּׁת חֵיל demands, moral activity, capacity for activity, in accordance with one's calling, ποιῆν ἀρετῆς, by which the Venet. translates it. בְּנוֹת is, as in the primary passages, Gen. xxx. 13, Song vi. 9, a more delicate, finer name of women than נָשִׁים: many daughters there have always been who have unfolded ability, but thou my spouse hast raised thyself above them all, i.e. thou art excellent and incomparable. Instead of עָלִית, there is to be written, after Chajug, Aben Ezra (Zachoth 7a), and Jekuthiel under Gen. xvi. 11, עָלִיתָ; the Spanish Nakdanim thus distinguish the forms מְצָאתָ, thou hast found, and מְצָאתָ, she has found. מְצָאתָ, for מְצָאתָ, Gen. xlii. 36. What now follows is not a continuation of the husband's words of praise (Ewald, Elster, Löwenstein), but an epiphonema auctoris

(Schultens); the poet confirms the praise of the husband by referring it to the general ground of its reason:

Ver. 30 ו Grace is deceit; and beauty, vanity--

A wife that feareth Jahve, she shall be praised.

Grace is deceit, because he who estimates the works of a wife merely by the loveliness of her external appearance, is deceived by it; and beauty is vanity, vanitas, because it is nothing that remains, nothing that is real, but is subject to the law of all material things—transitoriness. The true value of a wife is measured only by that which is enduring, according to the moral background of its external appearance; according to the piety which makes itself manifest when the beauty of bodily form has faded away, in a beauty which is attractive.<sup>1</sup> וְרָצָה (with Makkeph following)<sup>2</sup> is here the connective form of וְרָצָה (fem. of רָצָה). The Hithpa. וְרָצָהּ is here manifestly (xxvii. 2) not reflexive, but representative of the passive (cf. xii. 8, and the frequently occurring וְרָצָהּ, laudatus = laudandus), nowhere occurring except in the passage before us. In itself the fut. may also mean: she will be praised = is worthy of praise, but the jussive rendering (Luther: Let her be praised) is recommended by the verse which follows:

Ver. 31 ת Give to her of the fruit of her hands;

And let her works praise her in the gates!

The fruit of her hands is the good which, by her conduct, she has brought to maturity,—the blessing which she has secured for others, but, according to the promise (Isa. iii. 10), has also secured for her own enjoyment. The first line proceeds on the idea that, on account of this blessing, she herself shall rejoice. תַּנְיֶנָּה (with Gaja, after Metheg-Setzung, § 37) is not equivalent to give to her honour because of . . .; for in that case, instead of the ambiguous בְּ, another preposition—such e.g. as עַל—would have been used; and so תַּנְיֶנָּה, of itself, cannot be equivalent to יָבִי (sing the praise of), as Ziegler would read, after Judg. xi. 40. It must stand with כְּבוֹד, or instead of מִפְּרֵי an accus. obj. is to be thought of, as at Ps. lxxviii. 35, Deut. xxxii. 3, which the necessity of the case brings with it,—the giving, as a return in the echo of the song of praise. Immanuel is right in explaining תְּנוּלָה by הַסֵּד לֵה הַסֵּד or וּכְבוֹד וְהַסֵּד, cf. Ps. xxviii. 4. The מִן, as is not otherwise to be expected, after תְּנוּ is partitive: give to her something of the fruit of her hands, i.e. recompense it to her, render it thankfully, by which not exclusively a requital in the form of honourable recognition, but yet this specially, is to be thought of. Her best praise is her works themselves. In the gates, i.e. in the place where the representatives of the people come together, and where the people are assembled, her works praise her; and the poet desires that this may be right worthily done, full of certainty that she merits it, and that they honour themselves who seek to praise the works of such a woman, which carry in themselves their own commendation.

NOTE.

The Proverbs peculiar to the Alexandrine Translation.

In the LXX. there are not a few proverbs which are not found in the Heb. text, or, as we may express it, are peculiar to the Egyptian Text Recension, as distinguished from the Palestinean. The number is not so great as they appear to be on a superficial examination; for many of these apparently independent proverbs are duplicate translations. In many places there follows the Greek translation of the Heb. proverbs another translation, e.g. at i. 14, 27, ii. 2, iii. 15, iv. 10, vi. 25*b*, x. 5, xi. 16, xiv. 22, xv. 6, xvi. 26, xxiii. 31, xxix. 7*b*, 25, xxxi. 29*a*. These duplicate translations are found sometimes at different places, e.g. xvii. 20*b* is duplicate to xvii. 16*d*; xix. 15 is duplicate to xviii. 8; xxii. 9*cd* = xix. 6*b*, i. 19*b*; xxix. 17 is duplicate to xxviii. 17*cd*; or, according to the enumeration of the verses as it lies before us, not within the compass of one verse to which they belong: xxii. 8, 9 is a duplicate translation of ver. 8*b* and 9*a* of the Heb. text; xxiv. 23, xxx. 1, a duplicate translation of xxx. 1; and xxxi. 26, 27*b*, of xxxi. 26 of the Heb. text.<sup>1</sup> Everywhere, here, along with the translated proverb of our Heb. text, there is not an independent one. Also one has to be on his guard against seeing independent proverbs where the translator only, at his own will, modified one of the Heb. proverbs lying before us, as e.g. at x. 10, xiii. 23, xix. 7, as he here and there lets his Alexandrine exegesis influence him, ii. 16 f., v. 5, ix. 6, and adds explanatory clauses, ii. 19, iii. 18, v. 3, ix. 12; seldom fortunate in this, oftener, as at i. 18, 22, 28, ix. 12, xxviii. 10, showing by these interpolations his want of knowledge. There are also, in the translation, here and there passages introduced from some other part of Scripture, e.g.: i. 7*ab* = Ps. cxi. 10, LXX.; iii. 22*cd* = iii. 8; iii. 28*c* = xxvii. 1*b*, xiii. 5*c*, from Ps. cxii. 5, cf. xxxvii. 21; xvi. 1 (ὄσφ μέγας κ.τ.λ.) = Sir. iii. 18; xxvi. 11*cd* = Sir. iv. 21. A free reminiscence, such as xvi. 17, may speak a certain independence, but not those borrowed passages.

Keeping out of view all this only apparent independence, we place together the independent proverbs contained in the LXX., and, along with them, we present a translation of them into Heb. Such a translation has already been partly attempted by Ewald, Hitzig, and Lagarde; perhaps we have been here and there more fortunate in our rendering. It is certainly doubtful whether the translator found all these proverbs existing in Heb. Many of them appear to be originally Greek. But the rendering of them into Hebrew is by no means useless. It is of essential importance in forming a judgment regarding the original language.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> One must suppose that here translations of other Greeks, which were placed alongside of the LXX. in Origen's Hexapla, were taken up into the LXX. But this is not confirmed: these duplicates were component parts of the LXX., which Origen and the Syriac translators found already existing.

[<sup>2</sup> These the translator has not printed, because, however interesting it may be to the student of the Hebrew language as such, to compare Delitzsch's renderings into Hebrew with the Greek original, as placed before him, they may be here omitted, inasmuch as all that is of importance on the subject, in an exegetical point of view, has been already embodied in the Commentary.]

There are a few grains of wheat, and, on the other hand, much chaff, in these proverbs that are peculiar to the LXX. They are not, in the most remote way, fit to supply the place of the many proverbs of our Heb. text which are wanting in the LXX. One must also here be cautious in examining them. Thus, e.g., xvii. 19 stands as a proverb of only one line; the second forms a part of ver. 16. As true defects, we have noticed the following proverbs and parts of proverbs: i. 16, vii. 25*b*, viii. 32*b*, 33, xi. 3*b*, 4, 10*b*, xviii. 8, 23, 24, xix. 1, 2, 15, xxi. 5, xxii. 6, xxiii. 23, xxv. 20*a*. All these proverbs and parts of proverbs of the Heb. text are wanting in the LXX.

It is difficult to solve the mystery of this Alexandrine translation, and to keep separate from each other the Text Recension which the translator had before him, the transformations and corrections which, of his own authority, he made on the corruptions which the text of the translation, as it came from the first translator and the later revisers of it, has suffered in the course of time. They appear in Egypt to have been as arbitrary as incompetent in handling the sacred Scriptures. The separating from each other of the proverbs of Agur and Lemuel, xxx.-xxxi. 9, has its side-piece in the separation of Jeremiah's proœmiums of the prophecies concerning the people, Jer. xxv.

CHEAP RE-ISSUE OF STIER'S WORDS OF THE LORD JESUS.

To meet a very general desire that this now well-known Work should be brought more within the reach of all classes, both Clergy and Laity, Messrs. CLARK are now issuing, for a limited period, the Eight Volumes, handsomely bound in Four, at the Subscription Price of

TWO GUINEAS.

As the allowance to the Trade must necessarily be small, orders sent either direct or through Booksellers must in every case be accompanied with a Post Office Order for the above amount.

'The whole work is a treasury of thoughtful exposition. Its measure of practical and spiritual application, with exegetical criticism, commends it to the use of those whose duty it is to preach as well as to understand the Gospel of Christ.'—Guardian.

New and Cheap Edition, in Four Vols., demy 8vo, Subscription Price 28s.,

THE LIFE OF THE LORD JESUS CHRIST :

A Complete Critical Examination of the Origin, Contents, and Connection of the Gospels. Translated from the German of J. P. LANGE, D.D., Professor of Divinity in the University of Bonn. Edited, with additional Notes, by MARCUS DODS, D.D.

'We have arrived at a most favourable conclusion regarding the importance and ability of this work—the former depending upon the present condition of theological criticism, the latter on the wide range of the work itself; the singularly dispassionate judgment of the Author, as well as his pious, reverential, and erudite treatment of a subject inexpressibly holy. . . . We have great pleasure in recommending this work to our readers. We are convinced of its value and enormous range.'—Irish Ecclesiastical Gazette.

BENDEL'S GNOMON—CHEAP EDITION.

GNOMON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

By JOHN ALBERT BENDEL. Now first translated into English. With Original Notes, Explanatory and Illustrative. Edited by the Rev. ANDREW R. FAUSSET, M.A. The Original Translation was in Five Large Volumes, demy 8vo, averaging more than 550 pages each, and the very great demand for this Edition has induced the Publishers to issue the Five Volumes bound in Three, at the Subscription Price of

TWENTY-FOUR SHILLINGS.

They trust by this still further to increase its usefulness.

'It is a work which manifests the most intimate and profound knowledge of Scripture, and which, if we examine it with care, will often be found to condense more matter into a line than can be extracted from many pages of other writers.'—Archdeacon HARE.

'In respect both of its contents and its tone, Bengel's Gnomon stands alone. Even among laymen there has arisen a healthy and vigorous desire for scriptural knowledge, and Bengel has done more than any other man to aid such inquirers. There is perhaps no book every word of which has been so well weighed, or in which a single technical term contains so often far-reaching and suggestive views. . . . The theoretical and practical are as intimately connected as light and heat in the sun's ray.'—Life of Perthes.

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. ## THE TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE.

THE volume now offered to students of the Bible completes the Keil and Delitzsch series of Commentaries on the Old Testament. Like the earlier volumes, it addresses itself exclusively to theological students and the more scholarly class of readers, and will be certain to find a cordial welcome among them, whether they may be able to agree or not with the conclusions of the learned author.

In an Appendix to the German edition there are added three brief Dissertations by Wetzstein. But as the commentary is in itself complete without these, they have been omitted with Dr. Delitzsch's concurrence. I content myself by merely indicating here their import. In the first, Wetzstein aims at showing that the words פֶּלֶחַ הַרְמוֹן, Song iv. 3, vi. 7, signify the slice (Spalt, Ritz) of a pomegranate = the inner surface of a sliced pomegranate. In the second, he argues that the Dudarm plant, Song vii. 13, is not the mandragora vernalis of botanists, but the mandr. autumnalis, which begins to bud and blossom, as is the case with most of the Palestinian flora, about the time of the first winter rains in the month of November. The passage, הָרִיחַ . . . הָרִיחַ, he accordingly translates: "Already the mandragora apples give forth their fragrance," i.e. are already ripe; because it is only the ripe apples that are fragrant. In the third, on Eccles. xii. 5, he seeks to establish the translation of וַיִּנְאֹץ . . . הָאֵבִי by "And the almond tree flourisheth, and the locusts creep forth, and the wretched life is brought to dissolution." The first two of these clauses, he holds, denote the season of the year [the beginning of the meteorological spring. The seven days from 25th February to 3d March are called the eijam el-'agaiz, i.e. the (seven death-) days for old people] in which that which is said in the third (the death of the old man) takes place.

The Translator cannot send forth this volume without expressing his deep obligation to Dr. Delitzsch for his kindness in forwarding various important corrections and additions which have been incorporated in the translation, as well as for other valuable suggestions with reference to it. This English edition may consequently be almost regarded as a second edition of the work. It is not unlikely that in a work containing such a multiplicity of details, and involving so many minute points of criticism, several errata may be found ; but it is believed that the scholarly reader will have no difficulty in inserting the necessary corrections. The Translator has done his best to verify the references, and to present a faithful rendering of the original, and in such a form as to allow the author to express himself in his own way, so far as the idiom of our language would permit.

DARVEL, May 1877.

ABBREVIATIONS.

THE abbreviations and technical forms common to such critical works as this have been retained. These require no explanation. The colon (:) has been used, as in the original, to introduce a translation or a quotation. In the text-criticisms, the following abbreviations have been used:—

F. = Cod. Francofurtensis of 1294, described by Delitzsch in his Preface to Baer's edition of the Psalter of 1861 and 1874.

H. = Cod. Heidenheimii, a MS.

J. = Cod. Jamanensis, which was brought from South Arabia by Jacob Sappir, and passed into Baer's possession. Vid. Delitzsch's Preface to Baer's edition of Isaiah, 1872.

P. = Cod. Petropolitanus of the year 1010, now in St. Petersburg. Vid. Pinner's Prospectus, pp. 81–88.

D. = A parchment ms. of the Song placed at Delitzsch's disposal by Baer.

THE SONG AND ECCLESIASTES.

INTRODUCTION TO THE SONG OF SONGS.

THE Song is the most obscure book of the Old Testament. Whatever principle of interpretation one may adopt, there always remains a number of inexplicable passages, and just such as, if we understood them, would help to solve the mystery. And yet the interpretation of a book presupposes from the beginning that the interpreter has mastered the idea of the whole. It has thus become an ungrateful task; for however successful the interpreter may be in the separate parts, yet he will be thanked for his work only when the conception as a whole which he has decided upon is approved of.

It is a love-poem. But why such a minne-song in the canon? This question gave rise in the first century, in the Jewish schools, to doubts as to the canonicity of the book. Yet they firmly maintained it; for they presupposed that it was a spiritual and not a secular love-poem. They interpreted it allegorically. The Targum paraphrases it as a picture of the history of Israel from the Exodus to the coming of the Messiah. The bride is the congregation of Israel; and her breasts, to quote one example, are interpreted of the Messiah in His lowliness and the Messiah in His glory. But "Solomon" is an anthropomorphic representation of Jahve Himself. And all the instances of the occurrence of the name, with one exception, are therefore regarded as an indirect allegorical designation of the God of peace (vid. Norzi under i. 1). And because of its apparently erotic, but in truth mysterious contents, it was a Jewish saying, as Origen and Jerome mention, that the Song should not be studied by any one till he was thirty years of age (nisi quis aetatem sacerdotalis ministerii, id est, tricesimum annum impleverit). Because, according to the traditional Targ. interpretation, it begins with the departure out of Egypt, it forms a part of the liturgy for the eighth day of the Passover. The five Megilloths are arranged in the calendar according to their liturgical use.<sup>1</sup>

In the church this synagogal allegorizing received a new turn. They saw represented in the Song the mutual love of Christ and His church, and it thus became a mine of sacred mysticism in which men have dug to the present day. Thus Origen explains it in twelve volumes. Bernhard of Clairvaux died (1153) after he had delivered eighty-six sermons on it, and had only reached the end of the second chapter;<sup>2</sup> and his disciple Gilbert Porretanus carried forward the interpretation in forty-eight sermons only to v. 10, when he died. Perluigi de Palestrina gained by his twenty-nine motettes on the Song (1584) the honoured name of Principe della Musica. In modern times this allegorico-mystical interpretation is represented in the department of exegesis (Hengst.), sermon (F. W. Krummacher), and poetry (Gustav Jahn), as well as of music (Neukomm's duet: Er und sie), and even of painting (Ludw. von Maydell).

If the Song is to be understood allegorically, then Shulamith is the personification of the congregation of Israel, and mediately of the church. All other interpretations fall below this. Hug (1813) understands by the "beloved" the kingdom of the ten tribes longing after a reunion with the house of David; and Heinr. Aug. Hahn (1852), the Japhetic heathendom. Ludw. Noack (1869) has even changed and modified the readings of the Heb. text, that he might find therein the ballads of a Tirhâka romance, i.e. a series of pictures of the events occurring between Samaria and her Aethiopian lover Tirhâka, of the years (B.C.) 702, 691, and 690. These are the aberrations of individuals. Only one other interpretation recommends itself. Solomon's charisma and aim was the Chokma. The Peshito places over the Song the superscription חכמה דהכמהה. Is Shulamith, then, the personification of wisdom, like Dante's Beatrice? Rosenmüller (1830) is the most recent representative of this view; we ought then to have in Dante's Convito the key to the allegorical interpretation. He there sings sweet songs of love of his mistress Philosophy. But there is nothing in the description here to show that Shulamith is Wisdom. The one expression, "Thou shalt teach me" (viii. 2), warns us against attempting to put Wisdom in the place of the church, as a reversal of the facts of the case.

But if one understands the church to be meant, there yet remains much that is inexplicable. Who are the sixty queens and the eighty concubines (vi. 8)? And why are the heroes just sixty (iii. 7)? The synagogal and church interpretation, in spite of two thousand years' labour, has yet brought to light no sure results, but only numberless absurdities, especially where the Song describes the lovers according to their members from head to foot and from foot to head. But notwithstanding all this, it is certain that the "great mystery" (Eph. v. 32) mirrors itself in the Song. In this respect it resembles the love of Joseph and Zuleikha, often sung by the Arabian poets, which is regarded by the mystics<sup>1</sup> as a figure of the love of God toward the soul longing for union with Him. Shulamith is a historic personage; not the daughter of Pharaoh, as has been often maintained since the days of Theodore of Mopsuestia (died 429) and Abulfaraj (died 1286), but a country maiden of humble rank, who, by her beauty and by the purity of her soul, filled Solomon with a love for her which drew him away from the wantonness of polygamy, and made for him the primitive idea of marriage, as it is described in Gen. iii. 23 ff., a self-experienced reality. This experience he here sings, idealizing it after the manner of a poet; i.e., removing the husk of that which is accidental, he goes back to its kernel and its essential nature. We have before us six dramatic figures, each in two divisions, which represent from within the growth of this delightful relation to its conclusion. This sunny glimpse of paradisaical love which Solomon experienced, again became darkened by the insatiableness of passion; but the Song of Songs has perpetuated it, and whilst all other songs of Solomon have disappeared, the providence of God has preserved this one, the crown of them all. It is a protest against polygamy, although only in the measure one might expect from the Mosaic standpoint. For the Tóra recognises, indeed, in its primitive history monogamy as the original form (Matt. xix. 4-6); but in its legislation, giving up the attempt to abolish polygamy, it is satisfied with its limitation (Deut. xvii. 17).

The Song celebrates paradisaical, but yet only natural love (minne). It stands, however, in the canon of the church, because Solomon is a type of Him of whom it can be said, "a greater than Solomon is here" (Matt. xii. 12). Referred to Him the antitype, the earthly contents receive a heavenly import and glorification. We see therein the mystery of the love of Christ and His church shadowed forth, not, however, allegorically, but typically. The allegory has to coincide throughout with that which is represented; but the type is always only a type subtractis subtrahendis, and is exceedingly surpassed by the antitype. In this sense Jul Sturm (1854) has paraphrased the Song under the title of "Zwei Rosen" (two roses) (the typical and the antitypical). When my monograph on the Song appeared (1851), a notice of it in Colani's Revue de Theologie (1852) began with the frivolous remark: "Ce n'est pas la première rêverie de ce genre sur le livre en question; plutôt à Dieu que ce fût la dernière;" and Hitzig (1855) judged that "such a work might properly have remained unprinted; it represents nothing but a perverse inconsiderate literature which has no conception of scientific judgment and industry." But this work (long since out of print and now rare) was the fruit of many years of study. The commentary here given is based on it, but does not put it out of date. It broke with the allegorizing interpretation, the untenableness of which appears against his will in Hengstenberg's commentary (1853); it broke also with the theory which regards the poem as a history of Solomon's unsuccessful seductive efforts to gain the Shulamite's affections, a theory which Hitzig (1855) tries to exempt from the necessity of doing violence to the text by arbitrarily increasing the number of speakers and actors in the plot. I certainly succeeded in finding the right key to the interpretation of this work. Zöckler has recognised my book<sup>1</sup> as presenting "the only correct interpretation of its design and contents." Kingsbury, author of the notes on the Song in The Speaker's Commentary, has expressed the same judgment. Poets such as Stadelmann (Das Hohelied, ein dramatisches Gedicht = The Song of Songs: a dramatic poem, 1870) and J. Koch, late pastor of St. Mary's in Parchim (died 1873), have recognised in their beautiful German paraphrases my interpretation as natural and in conformity with the text; and for twenty years I have constantly more and more seen that the solution suggested by me is the right and only satisfactory one.

Shulamith is not Pharaoh's daughter. The range of her thoughts is not that of a king's daughter, but of a rustic maiden; she is a stranger among the daughters of Jerusalem, not because she comes from a foreign land, but because she is from the country; she is dark-complexioned, not from the sun of her more southern home, but from the open sunshine to which she has been exposed as the keeper of a vineyard; in body and soul she is born to be a princess, but in reality she is out the daughter of a humble family in a remote part of Galilee; hence the child-like simplicity and the rural character of her thoughts, her joy in the open fields, and her longing after the quiet life of her village home. Solomon appears here in loving fellowship with a woman such as he had not found among a thousand (Eccles. vii. 28); and although in social rank far beneath him, he raises her to an equality with himself. That which attached her to him is not her personal beauty alone, but her beauty animated and heightened by nobility of soul. She is a pattern of simple devotedness, naive simplicity, unaffected modesty, moral purity, and frank prudence,—a lily of the field, more beautifully adorned than he could claim to be in all his glory. We cannot understand the Song of Songs unless we perceive that it presents before us not only Shulamith's external attractions, but also all the virtues which make her the ideal of all that is gentlest and noblest in woman. Her words and her silence, her doing and suffering, her enjoyment and self-denial, her conduct as betrothed, as a bride, and as a wife, her behaviour towards her mother, her younger sister, and her brothers,—all this gives the impression of a beautiful soul in a body formed as it were from the dust of flowers. Solomon raises this child to the rank of queen, and becomes beside this queen as a child. The simple one teaches the wise man simplicity; the humble draws the king down to her level; the pure accustoms the impetuous to self-restraint. Following her, he willingly exchanges the bustle and the outward splendour of court life for rural simplicity, wanders gladly over mountain and meadow if he has only her; with her he is content to live in a lowly cottage. The erotic external side of the poem has thus an ethical background. We have here no "song of loves" (Ezek. xxxiii. 32) having reference to sensual gratification. The rabbinical proverb is right when it utters its threat against him who would treat this Song, or even a single verse of it, as a piece of secular literature.<sup>1</sup> The Song transfigures natural but holy love. Whatever in the sphere of the divinely-ordered marriage relation makes love the happiest, firmest bond uniting two souls together, is presented to us here in living pictures. "The Song," says Herder, "is written as if in Paradise. Adam's song: Thou art my second self! Thou art mine own! echoes in it in speech and interchanging song from end to end." The place of the book in the canon does not need any further justification; that its reception was favoured also by the supposition that it represented the intercourse between Jahve and the congregation of Israel, may be conjectured indeed, but is not established. The supposition, however, would have been false; for the book is not an allegory, and Solomon is by no means an Alle-

goremnon of God. But the congregation is truly a bride (Jer. ii. 2; Isa. lxii. 5), and Solomon a type of the Prince of peace (Isa. ix. 5; Luke xi. 31), and marriage a mystery, viz. as a pattern of the loving relation of God and His Christ to the church (Eph. v. 32). The Song has consequently not only a historico-ethical, but also a typico-mystical meaning. But one must be on his guard against introducing again the allegorical interpretation as Soltz (1850) has done, under the misleading title of the typical interpretation. The typical interpretation proceeds on the idea that the type and the antitype do not exactly coincide; the mystical, that the heavenly stamps itself in the earthly, but is yet at the same time immeasurably different from it. Besides, the historico-ethical interpretation is to be regarded as the proper business of the interpreter. But because Solomon is a type (vaticinium reale) of the spiritual David in his glory, and earthly love a shadow of the heavenly, and the Song a part of sacred history and of canonical Scripture, we will not omit here and there to indicate that the love subsisting between Christ and His church shadows itself forth in it.

But the prevailing view which Jacobi (1771) established, and which has predominated since Umbreit (1820) and Ewald (1826), is different from ours. According to them, the Song celebrates the victory of the chaste passion of conjugal love. The beloved of Shulamith is a shepherd, and Solomon acts toward her a part like that of Don Juan with Anna, or of Faust with Gretchen. Therefore, of course, his authorship is excluded, although Anton (1773), the second oldest representative of this so-called shepherd hypothesis, supposes that Solomon at a later period of his life recognised his folly, and now here magnanimously praises the fidelity of Shulamith, who had spurned his enticements away from her; and a Jewish interpreter, B. Holländer (1871), following Hezel (1780), supposes that Solomon represents himself as an enticer, only to exhibit the ideal of female virtue as triumphing over the greatest seduction. Similarly also Godet (1867),<sup>1</sup> who, resting on Ewald, sees here a very complicated mystery presented by Solomon himself, and pointing far beyond him: Solomon, the earthly Messiah; Shulamith, the true Israel; the shepherd, Jahve, and as Jahve who is about to come, the heavenly Solomon; the little sisters, heathenism—it is the old allegory, able for everything, only with changed names and a different division of the parts which here comes in again by the back-door of the seduction-history.<sup>2</sup>

Thus this seduction-history has not put an end to the over-ingenious allegorizing. In one point, however, at least, it has aided in the understanding of the Song. Herder saw in the Song a collection of Solomonic songs of love, which he translated (1778), as the oldest and the most beautiful, from the Orient. But Goethe, who in the Westöst. Divan (1819) praises the Song as the most divine of all love-songs, recognised, after the appearance of Umbreit's Comm., the unity also of the "inexplicably mysterious."

We are not conscious of any prejudice which makes it impossible for us to do justice to the interpretation to which Umbreit and Ewald gave currency. It abundantly accounts for the reception of the book into the canon, for so interpreted it has a moral motive and aim. And the personality of Solomon has certainly not merely a bright side, which is typical, but also a dark side, which is pregnant with dark issues for his kingdom; it may perhaps be possible that in the Song the latter, and not the former, is brought to view. Then, indeed, the inscription would rest on an error; for that in this case also the Solomonic authorship could be maintained, is an idea which, in the traditional-apologetical interest, mounts up to a faith in the impossible. But the truth goes beyond the tradition; the inscription would then indicate a traditional interpretation which, as is evident from the book itself, does not correspond with its original meaning and aim. "It is clear to every unprejudiced mind," says Gustav Baur,<sup>1</sup> "that in ii. 10-15, iv. 8-15, a different person speaks from the royal wooer; for (1) Solomon only says, 'my friend' [i. 15, etc.]; while, on the other hand, the shepherd heaps up flattering words of warmest love; (2) Solomon praises only the personal beauty of the woman; the shepherd, the sweet voice, the enchanting look, the warm love, the incorruptible chastity of his beloved;—in short, the former reveals the eye and the sensuousness of the king; the latter, the heart of a man who is animated by the divine flame of true love." We only ask, meanwhile, whether words such as iv. 13 are less sensuous than iv. 5, and whether the image of the twin gazelles is not more suitable in the mouth of the shepherd than the comparison of the attractions of Shulamith with the exotic plants of Solomon's garden? "In three passages," says Godet, "lies open the slender thread which Ewald's penetrating eye discovered under the flowers and leaves which adorn the poem: 'The king has brought me into his palace' (i. 4); 'I knew not how my heart has brought me to the chariots of a princely people' (vi. 12); 'I was a wall, and have found peace before his eyes' (viii. 10)." The same critic also finds in several passages an apparent contrariety between Solomon and the shepherd. "Observe," says he, "e.g. i. 12, 13, where the shepherd—whom Shulamith calls her spikenard, and compares to a bunch of flowers on her breast—is placed over against the king, who sits on his divan; or vii. 9 f., where, suddenly interrupting the king, she diverts the words which he speaks concerning herself to her beloved; or viii. 7, where, leaning on the arm of her beloved, she expresses her disregard for riches, with which Solomon had sought to purchase her love." But spikenard is not the figure of the shepherd, not at all the figure of a man; and she who is praised as a "prince's daughter" (vii. 2) cannot say (vi. 12) that, enticed by curiosity to see the royal train, she was taken prisoner, and now finds herself, against her will, among the daughters of Jerusalem; and he whom she addresses (viii. 12) can be no other than he with whom she now finds herself in her parents' home. The course of the exposition will show that the shepherd who is distinguished from Solomon is nothing else than a shadow cast by the person of Solomon.

The Song is a dramatic pastoral. The ancients saw in it a carmen bucolicum mimicum. Laurentius Peträus, in his Heb.-Danish Paraphrase (1640), calls it carmen bucolicum, ἀμοιβαίων (δραματικόν); George Wachter (1722), an "opera divided into scenic parts." It acquires the character of a pastoral poem from this, that Shulamith is a shepherdess, that she thinks of Solomon as a shepherd, and that Solomon condescends to occupy the sphere of life and of thought of the shepherdess. It is not properly an idyll, nor yet properly a drama. Not an idyll, because the life-image which such a miniature drawn from life—such, e.g., as the Adon. of Theocritus presents to us—unfolds itself within a brief time without interruption; in the Song, on the other hand, not merely are the places and persons interchanged, but also the times. The whole, however, does not fall into little detached pictures; but there runs through this wreath of figures a love-relation, which embodies itself externally and internally before our eyes, and attains the end of its desire, and shows itself on the summit of this end as one that is not merely sensuous, but moral. The Song is certainly not a theatrical piece:<sup>1</sup> the separate pieces would necessarily have been longer if the poet had had in view the changes of theatrical scenery. But at all events the theatre is not a Semitic institution, but is of Indo-Persian Greek origin. Jewish poetry attempted the drama only after it began in Alexandrinism<sup>1</sup> to emulate Greece. Grätz' (1871) polemic against the dramatists is so far justified. But yet we see, as in the Book of Job, so in the Song, the drama in process of formation from the lyric and narrative form of poetry, as it has developed among the Greeks from the lyric, and among the Indians from the epic. In the Book of Job the colloquies are all narrative. In the Song this is never the case;<sup>2</sup> for the one expression, "answered my beloved, and said to me" (ii. 10), is not to be compared with, "and Job answered and said:" the former expression indicates a monologue. And in the "Daughters of Jerusalem" (i. 5, etc.) we have already something like the chorus of the Greek drama. The ancient Greek MSS. bear involuntary testimony to this dramatic character of the Song. There are several of them which prefix to the separate addresses the names of the persons speaking, as ἡ νύμφη, ὁ νυμφίος.<sup>3</sup> And the Aethiopic translation makes five separate pieces, probably, as the Cod. Sinait. shows, after the example of the LXX., which appear as divisions into Acts.

The whole falls into the following six Acts:—

- (1.) The mutual affection of the lovers, i. 2—ii. 7, with the conclusion, "I adjure you, ye daughters of Jerusalem."
- (2.) The mutual seeking and finding of the lovers, ii. 8—iii. 5, with the conclusion, "I adjure you, ye daughters of Jerusalem."
- (3.) The fetching of the bride, and the marriage, iii. 6—v. 1, beginning with, "Who is this . . .?" and ending with, "Drink and be drunken, beloved."
- (4.) Love scorned, but won again, v. 2—vi. 9.
- (5.) Shulamith the attractively fair but humble princess, vi. 10—viii. 4, beginning with, "Who is this . . .?" and ending with, "I adjure you, ye daughters of Jerusalem."

would be the oldest drama—older than Thespis and Kalidasa. For the Sakuntala and the drama Der Kaufmann und die Bajadere belong to the first century of our era.

<sup>2</sup> Similar is the relation between Homer, where the speakers are introduced with narrative, and our national epics, the Nibelungen and Gudrun which become dramatic when the action and the feeling rise to a higher elevation: the words of the different persons follow each other without introduction, so that here the manner of the singer had to become dramatic.

(6.) The ratification of the covenant of love in Shulamith's home, viii. 5-14, beginning with, "Who is this . . . ?"

Zöckler reckons only five acts, for he comprehends v. 2-viii. 4 in one; but he himself confesses its disproportionate length; and the reasons which determine him are invalid; for the analogy of the Book of Job, which, besides, including the prologue and the epilogue, falls into seven formal parts, can prove nothing; and the question, "Who is this?" vi. 10, which he interprets as a continuation of the encomium in vi. 9, is rather to be regarded, like iii. 8, viii. 5, as a question with reference to her who is approaching, and as introducing a new act; for the supposition that vi. 9 requires to be further explained by a statement of what was included in the "blessing" and the "praising" is unwarranted, since these are ideas requiring no supplement to explain them (Gen. xxx. 13; Ps. xli. 3, cvii. 32), and the poet, if he had wished to explain the praise as to its contents, would have done this otherwise (cf. Prov. xxxi. 28 f.) than in a way so fitted to mislead. Rightly, Thrupp (1862) regards vi. 10 as the chorus of the daughters of Jerusalem. He divides as follows: (1) the Anticipation, i. 2-ii. 7; (2) the Awaiting, ii. 8-iii. 5; (3) the Espousal and its Results, iii. 6-v. 1; (4) the Absence, v. 2-8; (5) the Presence, v. 9-viii. 4; (6) Love's Triumph, viii. 5-12, with the Conclusion, viii. 13, 14. But how can v. 9 begin a new formal part? It is certainly the reply to Shulamith's adjuration of the daughters of Jerusalem, and not at all the commencement of a new scene, much less of a new act.

In our division into six parts, the separate acts, for the most part necessarily, and in every case without any violence, divide themselves into two scenes each, thus:—

|----------------------|------------------|----------------------|
| Act I. i. 2-ii. 7.   | Scene 1. i. 2-8. | Scene 2. i. 9-ii. 7. |
| „ II. ii. 8-iii. 5.  | „ ii. 8 ff.      | „ iii. 1-5.          |
| „ III. iii. 6-v. 1.  | „ iii. 6 ff.     | „ iv. 1-v. 1.        |
| „ IV. v. 2-vi. 9.    | „ v. 2-vi. 3.    | „ vi. 4-9.           |
| „ V. vi. 10-viii. 4. | „ vi. 10-vii. 6. | „ vii. 7-viii. 4.    |
| „ VI. viii. 5-14.    | „ viii. 5-7.     | „ viii. 8-14.        |

The first scene of the first act I formerly (1851) extended to i. 17, but it reaches only to i. 8; for up to this point Solomon is absent, but with i. 9 he begins to converse with Shulamith, and the chorus is silent—the scene has thus changed. Kingsbury in his translation (1871) rightly places over i. 9 the superscription, "The Entrance of the King."

The change of scenery is not regulated in accordance with stage decoration, for the Song is not a theatrical piece.<sup>1</sup> The first act is played both in the dining-room and in the wine-room appertaining to the women of the royal palace. In the second act, Shulamith is again at home. In the third act, which represents the marriage, the bride makes her entrance into Jerusalem from the wilderness, and what we further then hear occurs during the marriage festival. The locality of the fourth act is Jerusalem, without being more particularly defined. That of the fifth act is the park of Etam, and then Solomon's country house there. And in the sixth act we see the newly-married pair first in the way to Shulem, and then in Shulamith's parental home. In the first half of the dramatic pictures, Shulamith rises to an equality with Solomon; in the second half, Solomon descends to an equality with Shulamith. At the close of the first, Shulamith is at home in the king's palace; at the close of the second, Solomon is at home with her in her Galilean home.

In our monograph on the Song (1851), we believe we have proved that it distinctly bears evidences of its Solomonic origin. The familiarity with nature, the fulness and extent of its geographical and artistic references, the mention made of so many exotic plants and foreign things, particularly of such objects of luxury as the Egyptian horses, point to such an authorship; in common with Ps. lxxii, it has the multiplicity of images taken from plants; with the Book of Job, the dramatic form; with the Proverbs, manifold allusions to Genesis. If not the production of Solomon, it must at least have been written near his time, since the author of Prov. i.-ix., the introduction to the older Book of Proverbs, for the origin of which there is no better defined period than that of Jehoshaphat (909-883 B.C.), and the author or authors of the supplement (Prov. xxii. 17-xxiv. 22), reveal an acquaintance with the Song. Ewald also, and Hitzig, although denying that Solomon is the author because it is directed against him, yet see in it a product of the most flourishing state of the language and of the people; they ascribe it to a poet of the northern kingdom about 950 B.C. Modern Jewish criticism surpasses, however, on the field of O. T. history, the anachronisms of the Tübingen school. As Zunz has recently (Deut. Morgenl. Zeitsch.

<sup>1</sup> Ephr. Epstein, surgeon in Cincinnati, in a review of Von Grätz' Comm. in The Israelite (1872), calls the Song quite in our sense, "a dramatic poem, though not a complete scenic drama." But the bridal procession in the third act is not of this character—he sees in it a return from a hunting expedition.

xxvii.) sought to show that the Book of Leviticus was written about a thousand years after Moses, that there never was a prophet Ezekiel, that the dates of this book are fictitious, etc.; so Grätz attempts to prove that the Song in its Graecising language and Greek customs and symbols bears evidences of the Syro-Macedonian age;<sup>1</sup> that the poet was acquainted with the idylls of Theocritus and the Greek erotic poets, and, so far as his Israelitish standpoint admitted, imitates them; and that he placed an ideal picture of pure Jewish love over against the immorality of the Alexandrine court and its Hellenistic partisans, particularly of Joseph b. Tobia, the collector of taxes in the time of Ptolemy Euergetes (247–221 B.C.),—a picture in which “the Shepherd,”<sup>2</sup> now grown into a fixed idea, renders welcome service, in contrast to Solomon, in whom the poet glances at the court of Alexandria. One is thus reminded of Kirschbaum (1833), who hears in Ezek. xxxiii. 5 an echo of Cicero’s dixi et salvavi animam, and in the Song ii. 17, a reference to the Bethar of Barcochba. We do not deny the penetration which this chief of Jewish historians has expended on the establishment of his hypothesis; but the same penetration may prove that the Babylon-Assyr. “syllabaries” of the time of Asurbanipal (667–626) belong to the Greek era, because there occurs therein the word azamillav (knife), and this is the Greek σμίλη; or that the author of Prov. i.–ix. alludes in vii. 23 to Eros and his quivers, and in ix. 1 betrays a knowledge of the seven artes liberales. Parallels to the Song are found wherever sensuous love is sung, also in the Pastoralia of Longus, without the least dependence of one author upon another. And if such a relation is found between Theocritus and the Song, then it might rather be concluded that he became acquainted with it in Alexandria from Jewish literates,<sup>3</sup> than that the author of the Song has imitated Greek models, as Immanuel Romi, the Arabians and Dante; besides, it is not at all the Song lying before us which Grätz expounds, but the Song modified by violent corrections of all kinds, and fitted to the supposed tendency. Thus he changes (i. 3) שֶׁמֶן הַתִּיבֵּה (thine unguent) into בְּשֵׁמֶן הַתִּיבֵּה, and שֶׁמֶן הַתִּיבֵּה (ointment poured forth) into שֶׁמֶן הַתִּיבֵּה. — Shulamith says this of her beautiful shepherd, and what follows (i. 4) the damsels say to him; he changes

משכני into מִשְׁכְּנוֹ, הַבִּיאתוּ into הַבִּיאֲנוּ, and then remarks: "Shulamith mentions it as to the praise of her beloved, that the damsels, attracted by his beauty, love him, and say to him, 'Draw us, we will run after thee; though the king brought us into his chambers, we would rejoice only with thee, and prefer thee to the king.'" His too confident conjectural criticism presents us with imaginary words, such as (iii. 10) אֶבְרִים (ebony); with unfortunate specimens of style, such as (vi. 10), "Thou hast made me weak, O daughter of Aminadab;" and with unheard-of renderings, such as (viii. 5), "There where thy mother has wounded thee;" for he supposes that Shulamith is chastised by her mother because of her love. This Song is certainly not written by Solomon, nor yet does it date from the Syro-Macedonian time, but was invented in Breslau in the 19th century of our era!

Grätz (1871) has placed yet farther down than the Song the Book of Ecclesiastes, in which he has also found Graecismus; the tyrannical king therein censured is, as he maintains, Herod the Great, and the last three verses (xii. 12-14) are not so much the epilogue of the book as that of the Hagiographa which closes with it. Certainly, if this was first formed by the decision of the conference in Jerusalem about 65, and of the synod in Jabne about 90, and the reception of the Books of Ecclesiastes and the Song was carried not without controversy, then it lies near to regard these two books as the most recent, originating not long before. But the fact is this: We learn from Jud-ajim iii. 5, iv. 6, cf. Edujoth v. 3, that in the decade before the destruction of Jerusalem the saying was current among the disciples of Hillel and Shammai, that "all Holy Scriptures (Kethubim) pollute the hands;"<sup>1</sup> but that the question whether Ecclesiastes is included was answered in the negative by the school of Shammai, and in the affirmative by the school of Hillel—the Song nothing is here said. But we learn further, that several decades later the Song also was comprehended in this controversy along with Ecclesiastes; and in an assembly of seventy-two doctors of the law in Jabne, that decree, "all Holy Scriptures (Kethubim) pollute the hands," was extended to Ecclesiastes and the Song. R. Akiba

<sup>1</sup> Vid. for the explanation of this, my essay, "Das Hohelied verunreinigt die Hände," in the Luth. Zeitsch. 1854. [The Tôra and the Theruma-food, as being both reckoned holy, were usually placed together in the temple. It was discovered that the sacred books were thereby exposed to damage by mice: and hence, to prevent their being brought any longer into contact with the Theruma, the Rabbins decided that they were henceforth to be regarded as unclean, and they gave forth the decree, "All Holy Scriptures pollute the hand." This decree was applicable only to holy or inspired books. Vic. Ginsburg on the Song, p. 3, note.]

(or some one else) asserted, in opposition to those who doubted the canonicity of the Song, "No day in the whole history of the world is so much worth as that in which the Song of Songs was given; for all the Kethubim are holy, but the Song of Songs is most holy." From this Grätz draws the conclusion that the Hagiographa was received as canonical for the first time about 65, and that its canon was finally fixed so as to include Ecclesiastes and the Song, not till about 90; but this conclusion rests on the false supposition that "Holy Scriptures" (Kethubim) is to be understood exclusive of the Hagiographa, which is just as erroneous as that Sepharim designates the prophets, with the exclusion of the Hagiographa. Holy Kethubim is a general designation, without distinction, of all the canonical books, e.g. Bathra i 6, and Sepharim in like manner, with the exception only of the Tôra, Megilla i 8, iii. 1, Shabbath 115*b*. And it rests on a misapprehension of the question discussed: the question was not whether Ecclesiastes and the Song should be admitted, but whether they had been justly admitted, and whether the same sacred character should be ascribed to them as to the other holy writings; for in Bathra 14*b*-15*a* (without a parallel in the Palest. Talmud) the enriching of the canon by the addition of the Books of Isaiah, Proverbs, the Song, and Ecclesiastes, is ascribed to the Hezekiah-Collegium (Prov. xxi. 5), and thus is dated back in the period before the rise of the great synagogue. That Philo does not cite the Song proves nothing; he cites none of the five Megilloth. But Josephus (C. Ap. 1, § 8; cf. Euseb. H. E. iii. 10), since he enumerates five books of the Mosaic law, thirteen books of prophetic history and prediction, and four books of a hymno-ethical character, certainly means by these four the Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song, which in the Alexandrine canon stand thus connected. His work, Cont. Apion, was not indeed written till about 100 A.D.; but Josephus there speaks of a fact which had existed for centuries. The Song and Ecclesiastes formed part of the sacred books among the Hellenists as well as among the Palestinian Jews of the first Christian century; but, as those Talmud notices show, not without opposition. The Old Testament canon, as well as that of the New Testament, had then also its Antilegomena. These books were opposed not because of their late origin, but because their contents apparently militated against the truth of revelation and the spiritual nature of revealed religion. Similar doubts, though not so strong and lasting, were also uttered with reference to Proverbs, Esther, and Ezekiel.

The history of the exposition of this book is given in detail by Christian D. Ginsburg in The Song of Songs, London 1857; and by Zöckler in "The Song," forming part of Lange's Bibelwerk, 1868, and supplemented by an account of the English interpretations and translations in the Anglo-American translation of this work by Green. Zunz, in the preface to Rebenstein's (Bernstein's) Lied der Lieder, 1834, has given an historical account of the Jewish expositors. Steinschneider's המוכיר (Heb. Bibliograph. 1869, p. 110 ff.) presents a yet fuller account of the Jewish commentaries. The Munich royal library contains a considerable number of these,—e.g. by Moses b. Tibbon, Shemariah, Immanuel Romi, Moses Calais (who embraced Christianity). Our commentary presents various new contributions to the history of the interpretation of this book. No other book of Scripture has been so much abused, by an unscientific spiritualizing, and an over-scientific unspiritual treatment, as this has. Luther says, at the close of his exposition: Quodsi erro, veniam meretur primus labor, nam aliorum cogitationes longe plus absurditatis habent. To inventory the maculatur of these absurdities is a repulsive undertaking, and, in the main, a useless labour, from which we absolve ourselves.

EXPOSITION OF THE SONG OF SONGS.

THE title of the book at once denotes that it is a connected whole, and is the work of one author.—Ch. i. 1. The Song of Songs, composed by Solomon. The genitival connection, “Song of Songs,” cannot here signify the Song consisting of a number of songs, any more than calling the Bible “The Book of books” leads us to think of the 24 + 27 canonical books of which it consists. Nor can it mean “one of Solomon’s songs;” the title, as it here stands, would then be the paraphrase of שִׁיר שִׁירֵי שֶׁ, chosen for the purpose of avoiding the redoubled genitives; but “one of the songs” must rather have been expressed by שִׁיר מִשִּׁירֵי. It has already been rightly explained in the Midrash:<sup>1</sup> “the most praiseworthy, most excellent, most highly-treasured among the songs.” The connection is superl. according to the sense (cf. ἀρρήτα ἀρρήτων of Sophocles), and signifies that song which, as such, surpasses the songs one and all of them; as “servant of servants,” Gen. ix. 25, denotes a servant who is such more than all servants together. The plur. of the second word is for this superl. sense indispensable (vid. Dietrich’s Abhand. zur hebr. Gramm. p. 12), but the article is not necessary: it is regularly wanting where the complex idea takes the place of the predicate, Gen. ix. 25, Ex. xxix. 37, or of the inner member of a genitival connection of words Jer. iii. 19; but it is also wanting in other places, as Ezek. xvi. 7 and Eccles. i. 2, xii. 8, where the indeterminate plur. denotes not totality, but an unlimited number; here it was necessary, because a definite Song—that, namely, lying before us—must be designated as the paragon of songs. The relative clause, “asher lishlōmō,” does not refer to the single word “Songs” (Gr. Venet. τῶν τοῦ), as it would if the expression were שִׁיר מִשִּׁירֵי, but to the whole idea of “the Song of Songs.” A relative clause of similar formation and reference occurs at 1 Kings iv. 2: “These are the princes, asher lo, which belonged to him (Solomon).” They who deny the Solomonic authorship usually explain: The Song of Songs which concerns or refers to Solomon, and point in favour of this interpretation to LXX. B.  $\delta$  ἐστὶ Σαλ., which, however, is only a latent genit., for which LXX. A. τῷ Σαλ. Lamed may indeed introduce the reference of a writing, as at Jer. xxiii. 9; but if the writing is more closely designated as a “Song,” “Psalm,” and the like, then Lamed with the name of a person foll. is always the Lamed auctoris; in this case the idea of reference to, as e.g. at Isa. i. 1, cf. 1 Kings v. 13, is unequivocally expressed by  $\text{לְ}$ . We shall find that the dramatized history which we have here, or as we might also say, the fable of the melodrama and its dress, altogether correspond with the traits of character, the favourite turns, the sphere of vision, and the otherwise well-known style of authorship peculiar to Solomon. We may even suppose that the superscription was written by the author, and thus by Solomon himself. For in the superscription of the Proverbs he is surnamed “son of David, king of Israel,” and similarly in Ecclesiastes. But he who entitles him merely “Solomon” is most probably himself. On the other hand, that the title is by the author himself, is not favoured by the fact that instead of the  $\text{שׁ}$ , everywhere else used in the book, the fuller form asher is employed. There is the same reason for this as for the fact that Jeremiah in his prophecies always uses asher, but in the Lamentations interchanges  $\text{שׁ}$  with asher. This original demonstrative  $\text{שׁ}$  is old-Canaanitish, as the Phoenician  $\text{שׁ}$ , arrested half-way toward the form asher, shows.<sup>1</sup> In the Book of Kings it appears as a North Palest. provincialism, to the prose of the pre-exilian literature it is otherwise foreign;<sup>2</sup> but the pre-exilian shir and kinah (cf. also Job xix. 29) make use of it as an ornament. In the post-exilian literature it occurs in poetry (Ps. cxxii. 3, etc.) and in prose (1 Chron. v. 20, xxvii. 27); in Ecclesiastes it is already a component part of the rabbinism in full growth. In a pre-exilian book-title  $\text{שׁ}$  in place of asher is thus not to be expected. On the other hand, in the Song itself it is no sign of a post-exilian composition, as Grätz supposes. The history of the language and literature refutes this.

<sup>2</sup> We do not take into view here Gen. vi. 3. If  $\text{שׁ}$  is then to be read, then there is in it the pronominal  $\text{שׁ}$ , as in the old proper name Mishael (who is what God is?).

FIRST ACT.

THE MUTUAL AFFECTION OF THE LOVERS.—CHAP. I. 2-II. 7.

FIRST SCENE OF THE ACT, I. 2-8.

The first act of the melodrama, which presents the loving relationship in the glow of the first love, now opens. i. 5, 6, are evidently the words of Shulamith. Here one person speaks of herself throughout in the singular. But in vers. 2-4 one and several together speak. Ewald also attributes vers. 2-4 to Shulamith, as words spoken by her concerning her shepherd and to him. She says, "Draw me after thee, so will we run," for she wishes to be brought by him out of Solomon's court. But how can the praise, "an ointment poured forth is thy name,"—an expression which reminds us of what is said of Solomon, 1 Kings v. 11 [1 Kings iv. 31], "and his fame was in all nations round about,"—be applicable to the shepherd? How could Shulamith say to the shepherd, "virgins love thee," and including herself with others, say to him also, "we will exult and rejoice in thee"? on which Ewald remarks: it is as if something kept her back from speaking of herself alone. How this contradicts the psychology of love aiming at marriage! This love is jealous, and does not draw in rivals by head and ears. No; in vers. 2-4 it is the daughters of Jerusalem, whom Shulamith addresses in ver. 5, who speak. The one who is praised is Solomon. The ladies of the palace are at table (vid. under ver. 12), and Solomon, after whom she who is placed amid this splendour which is strange to her asks longingly (ver. 7), is not now present. The two pentastichal strophes, vers. 2-4, are a scholion, the table song of the ladies; the solo in both cases passes over into a chorus.

Ver. 2. From these words with which as a solo the first strophe begins:

Let him kiss me with kisses of his mouth, we at once perceive that she who here speaks is only one of many among whom Solomon's kisses are distributed; for min is partitive, as e.g. Ex. xvi. 27 (cf. Jer. xlvi. 32 and Isa. xvi. 9), with the underlying phrase נִשְׁקָה נִשְׁקָה, osculum osculari = figere, jungere, dare. Nashak properly means to join to each other and to join together, particularly mouth to mouth. נִשְׁקָה is the parallel form of נִשְׁקָה, and is found in prose as well as in poetry; it is here preferred for the sake of the rhythm. Böttcher prefers, with Hitzig, נִשְׁקָה ("let him give me to drink"); but "to give to drink with kisses" is an expression unsupported.

In line 2 the expression changes into an address:

For better is thy love than wine.

Instead of "thy love," the LXX. render "thy breasts," for they had before them the word written defectively as in the traditional text, and read דָּוִדָּי. Even granting that the dual דָּוִדִּים or דָּוִדִּים could be used in the sense of the Greek μαστοί (Rev. i. 13),<sup>1</sup> of the breasts of a man (for which Isa. xxxii. 12, Targ., furnishes no sufficient authority); yet in the mouth of a woman it were unseemly, and also is itself absurd as the language of praise. But, on the other hand, that דָּוִדָּי is not the true reading ("for more lovely—thus he says to me—are," etc.), R. Ismael rightly says, in reply to R. Akiba, Aboda zara 29b, and refers to דָּוִדָּי following (ver. 3), which requires the mas. for דָּוִדָּי. Rightly the Gr. Venet. οἱ σοὶ ἔρωτες, for דָּוִדִּים is related to אֶרֶבָּחָה, almost as ἔρωτες to ἀργάνη, Minne to Liebe. It is a plur. like דָּוִדִּים, which, although a pluraletantum, is yet connected with the plur. of the pred. The verbal stem דָּוִד is an abbreviated reduplicative stem (Ewald, § 118. 1); the root דָּו appears to signify "to move by thrusts or pushes" (vid. under Ps. xlii. 5); of a fluid, "to cause to boil up," to which the word דָּוִד, a kitchen-pot, is referred.<sup>2</sup> It is the very same verbal stem from which דָּוִדָּי (David), the beloved, and the name of the foundress of Carthage, דָּוִדָּיָה (= דָּוִדָּיָה) Minna, is derived. The adj. tov appears here and at 3a twice in its nearest primary meaning, denoting that which is pleasant to the taste and (thus particularly in Arab.) to the smell.

This comparison suaves prae vino, as well as that which in line 3 of the pentastich, ver. 3,

To the smell thy ointments are sweet, shows that when this song is sung wine is presented and perfumes are sprinkled; but the love of the host is, for those who sing, more excellent than all. It is maintained that דָּוִדָּי signifies fragrance emitted, and not smell. Hence Hengst., Hahn, Hölem., and Zöck. explain: in odour thy ointments are sweet. Now the words can certainly, after Josh. xxii. 10, Job xxxii. 4, 1 Kings x. 23, mean "sweet in (of) smell;" but in such cases the word with Lamed of reference naturally stands after that to which it gives the nearer reference, not as here before it. Therefore Hengst.: ad odorem unguentorem tuorum quod attinet bonus est, but such giving prominence to the subject and attraction (cf. 1 Sam. ii. 4a; Job xv. 20) exclude one another; the accentuation correctly places לָרִיחַ out of the gen. connection. Certainly this word, like the Arab. ryh, elsewhere signifies odor, and the Hiph. לָרִיחַ (aral) odorari; but why should not רִיחַ be also used in the sense of odoratus, since in the post-bibl. Heb. הִרַח הָרִיחַ means the sense of smell, and also in Germ. “riechen” means to emit fragrance as well as to perceive fragrance? We explain after Gen. ii. 9, where Lamed introduces the sense of sight, as here the sense of smell. Zöckl. and others reply that in such a case the word would have been לָרִיחַ; but the art. is wanting also at Gen. ii. 9 (cf. iii. 6), and was not necessary, especially in poetry, which has the same relation to the art. as to asher, which, wherever practicable, is omitted.

Thus in line 4:

An ointment poured forth is thy name.

By “thy ointments,” line 3, spices are meant, by which the palace was perfumed; but the fragrance of which, as line 4 says, is surpassed by the fragrance of his name. שֵׁם (name) and שֶׁמֶן (fragrance) form a paranomasia by which the comparison is brought nearer Eccles. vii. 1. Both words are elsewhere mas.; but sooner than שֵׁם, so frequently and universally mas. (although its plur. is שְׂמוֹת, but cf. אֲבוֹת), שֶׁמֶן may be used as fem., although a parallel example is wanting (cf. d'vāsh, mōr, nōphēth, kēmāh, and the like, which are constantly mas.). Ewald therefore translates שֶׁמֶן תּוּרֵק as a proper name: “O sweet Salbenduft” [Fragrance of Ointment]; and Böttcher sees in turāk a subst. in the sense of “sprinkling” [Spreng-Oel]; but a name like “Rosenoel” [oil of roses] would be more appropriately formed, and a subst. form תּוּרֵק is, in Heb. at least, unexampled (for neither תּוּרֵק nor תּוּרֵק, in the name Tubal-Cain, is parallel). Fürst imagines “a province in Palestine where excellent oil was got,” called Turak; “Turkish” Rosenöl recommends itself, on the contrary, by the fact of its actual existence. Certainly less is hazarded when we regard shēmēn, as here treated exceptionally, as fem.; thus, not: ut unguentum nomen tuum effunditur, which, besides, is unsuitable, since one does not empty out or pour out a name; but: unguentum quod effunditur (Hengst., Hahn, and others), an ointment which is taken out of its depository and is sprinkled far and wide is thy name. The harsh expression שֶׁמֶן מִיֵּרֵק is intentionally avoided; the old Heb. language is not φιλομέτοχος (fond of participles); and, besides, מִיֵּרֵק sounds badly with מִרֵּק, to rub off, to wash away. Perhaps, also, שֶׁמֶן יֵרֵק is intentionally avoided, because of the collision of the weak sounds n and j. The name Shēm is derived from the verb shāmā, to be high, prominent, remarkable: whence also the name for the heavens (vid. under Ps. viii. 2). That attractive charm (lines 2, 3), and this glory (line 4), make him, the praised, an object of general love, line 5, ver. 3b :

Therefore virgins love thee.

This "therefore" reminds us of Ps. xlv. תִּלְבָּטִי (sing. Isa. vii. 14), from מִלְּבָ (Arab.), ghalima, pubescere, are maidens growing to maturity. The intrans. form תִּלְבָּטִי, with transitive signification, indicates a pathos. The perf. is not to be translated dilexerunt, but is to be judged of according to Gesen. § 126. 3 : they have acquired love to thee (= love thee), as the ἡγάπησάν σε of the Greek translators is to be understood. The singers themselves are the evidence of the existence of this love.

With these words the first pentastich of the table-song terminates. The mystical interpretation regards it as a song of praise and of loving affection which is sung to Christ the King, the fairest of the children of men, by the church which is His own. The Targum, in line first, thinks of the "mouth to mouth" [Num. xii. 8] in the intercourse of Moses with God. Evidence of divine love is also elsewhere thought of as a kiss: the post-bibl. Heb. calls the gentlest death the death בְּנִשְׁקָה, i.e. by which God takes away the soul with a kiss.

The second pentastich also begins with a solo :

Ver. 4 Draw me, so will we run after thee.

All recent interpreters (except Böttcher) translate, like Luther, "Draw me after thee, so we run." Thus also the Targ., but doubtfully: Trahe nos post te et curremus post viam bonitatis tuae. But the accentuation which gives Tiphcha to תִּפְחָה requires the punctuation to be that adopted by the Peshito and the Vulg., and according to which the passage is construed by the Greeks (except, perhaps, by the Quinta): Draw me, so will we, following thee, run (vid. Dachselt, Biblia Accentuata, p. 983 s.). In reality, this word needs no complement: of itself it already means, one drawing towards, or to himself; the corresponding (Arab.) masak signifies, prehendere prehensumque tenere; the root is שָׁק, palpare, contrectare. It occurs also elsewhere, in a spiritual connection, as the expression of the gentle drawing of love towards itself (Hos. xi. 4; Jer. xxxi. 3); cf. ἐλπίειν, John vi. 44, xii. 32. If one connects "after thee" with "draw me," then the expression seems to denote that a certain violence is needed to bring the one who is drawn from her place; but if it is connected with "we will run," then it defines the desire to run expressed by the cohortative, more nearly than a willing obedience or following. The whole chorus, continuing the solo, confesses that there needs only an indication of his wish, a direction given, to make those who here speak eager followers of him whom they celebrate.

In what follows, this interchange of the solo and the unisono is repeated :

Ver. 4b If the king has brought me into his chambers,
So will we exult and rejoice in thee.
We will praise thy love more than wine!
Uprightly have they loved thee.

The cohortative נִרְצֵה (we will run) was the apodosis imperativi; the cohortatives here are the apodosis perfecti hypothetici. "Suppose that this has happened," is oftener expressed by the perf. (Ps. lvii. 7; Prov. xxii. 29, xxv. 16); "suppose that this happens," by the fut. (Job xx. 24; Ewald, § 357b). הַדְרִים are the interiora domus; the root word hādār, as the Arab. khadar shows, signifies to draw oneself back, to hide; the hādār of the tent is the back part, shut off by a curtain from the front space. Those who are singing are not at present in this innermost chamber. But if the king brings one of them in (הִבִּיִּא, from בִּיא, introire, with acc. loci), then—they all say—we will rejoice and be glad in thee. The cohortatives are better translated by the fut. than by the conjunctive (exultemus); they express as frequently not what they then desire to do, but what they then are about to do, from inward impulse, with heart delight. The sequence of ideas, "exult" and "rejoice," is not a climax descendens, but, as Ps. cxviii. 24, etc., an advance from the external to the internal,—from jubilation which can be feigned, to joy of heart which gives it truth; for עָצַם —according to its root signification: to be smoothed, unwrinkled, to be glad<sup>1</sup>—means to be of a joyful, bright, complaisant disposition; and נָיַל, cogn. הִיל, to turn (wind) oneself, to revolve, means conduct betokening delight. The prep. ב in verbs of rejoicing, denotes the object on account of which, and in which, one has joy. Then, if admitted into the closest neighbourhood of the king, they will praise his love more than wine. נִקְרָה denotes to fix, viz. in the memory; Hiph.: to bring to remembrance, frequently in the way of praise, and thus directly equivalent to celebrare, e.g. Ps. xlv. 18. The wine represents the gifts of the king, in contradistinction to his person. That in inward love he gives himself to them, excels in their esteem all else he gives. For, as the closing line expresses, "uprightly they love thee,"—viz. they love thee, i.e. from a right heart, which seeks nothing besides, and nothing with thee; and a right mind, which is pleased with thee, and with nothing but thee. Heiligstedt, Zöckler, and others translate: with right they love thee. But the pluralet.

כִּי־צָדִיק (from כִּי־צָדִיק, for which the sing. כִּי־צָדִיק occurs) is an ethical conception (Prov. i. 3), and signifies, not: the right of the motive, but: the rightness of the word, thought, and act (Prov. xxiii. 16; Ps. xvii. 2, lviii. 2); thus, not: jure, but: recte, sincere, candidè. Hengst., Thrupp, and others falsely render this word, like the LXX., Aquil., Symm., Theod., Targ., Jerome, Venet., and Luther, as subject: rectitudes [abstr. for concr.] = those who have rectitude, the upright. Hengstenberg's assertion, that the word never occurs as an adv., is set aside by a glance at Ps. lviii. 2, lxxv. 3; and, on the other hand, there is no passage in which it is used as abstr. pro concr. It is here, as elsewhere, an adv. acc. for which the word כִּי־צָדִיק might also be used.

The second pentastich closes similarly with the first, which ended with "love thee." What is there said of this king, that the virgins love him, is here more generalized; for diligunt te is equivalent to diligentis (cf. viii. 1, 7). With these words the table-song ends. It is erotic, and yet so chaste and delicate,—it is sensuous, and yet so ethical, that here, on the threshold, we are at once surrounded as by a mystical cloudy brightness. But how is it to be explained that Solomon, who says (Prov. xxvii. 2), "Let another praise thee, and not thine own mouth," begins this his Song of Songs with a song in praise of himself? It is explained from this, that here he celebrates an incident belonging to the happy beginning of his reign; and for him so far fallen into the past, although not to be forgotten, that what he was and what he now is are almost as two separate persons.

After this choral song, Shulamith, who has listened to the singers not without being examined by their inquisitive glances as a strange guest not of equal rank with them, now speaks:

Ver. 5 Black am I, yet comely, ye daughters of Jerusalem,
As the tents of Kedar, as the hangings of Solomon.

From this, that she addresses the ladies of the palace as "daughters of Jerusalem" (Kerî יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, a du. fractus; like עֲפָרַיִן for עֲפָרָתָא, 2 Chron. xiii. 19), it is to be concluded that she, although now in Jerusalem, came from a different place. She is, as will afterwards appear, from Lower Galilee;—and it may be remarked, in the interest of the mystical interpretation, that the church, and particularly her first congregations, according to the prophecy (Isa. viii. 23), was also Galilean, for Nazareth and Capernaum are their original seats;—and if Shulamith is a poetico-mystical Mashal or emblem, then she represents the synagogue one day to enter into the fellowship of Solomon—i.e. of the son of David, and the daughters of Jerusalem, i.e. the congregation already believing on the Messiah. Yet we confine ourselves to the nearest sense, in which Solomon relates a self-experience. Shulamith, the lightly esteemed, cannot boast that she is so ruddy and fair of countenance as they who have just sung how pleasant it is to be beloved by this king; but yet she is not so devoid of beauty as not to venture to love and hope to be loved: "Black am I, yet comely." These words express humility without abjectness. She calls herself "black," although she is not so dark and unchangeably black as an "Ethiopian" (Jer. xiii. 23). The verb שָׁחַר has the general primary idea of growing dark, and signifies not necessarily soot-blackness (modern Arab. shukhar, soot), but blackness more or less deep, as שָׁחַר, the name of the morning twilight, or rather the morning grey, shows; for (Arab.) sahar<sup>1</sup> denotes the latter, as distinguished from (Arab.) fajr, the morning twilight (vid. under Isa. xiv. 12, xlvii. 11). She speaks of herself as a Beduin who appears to herself as (Arab.) sawda, black, and calls<sup>2</sup> the inhabitants of the town (Arab.) hawaryyat (cute candidas). The Vav we have translated "yet" ("yet comely"); it connects the opposite, which exists along with the blackness. נְאוֹה is the fem. of the adj. נְאוֹה = נְאוֹה = נְאוֹה, which is also formed by means of the doubling of the third stem-letter of נָאוּ = נָאוּ, נָאוּ (to bend forward, to aim; to be corresponding to the aim, conformable, becoming, beautiful), e.g. like רָעוּן, to be full of sap, green. Both comparisons run parallel to nigra et bella; she compares on the one hand the tents of Kedar, and on the other the tapestry of Solomon. מְנוּחָה signifies originally, in general, the dwelling-place, as בְּיַת the place where one spends the night; these two words interchange: ohel is the house of the nomad, and bāith is the tent of him who is settled. קָדַר (with the Tsere, probably from (Arab.) kadar, to have ability, be powerful, thought of after the Heb. manner, as Theodoret explains and Symm. also translates: σκοτασμός, from (Heb.) Kadar, atrum esse) is the name of a tribe of North. Arab. Ishmaelites (Gen. xxv. 13) whom Pliny speaks of (Cedraei in his Hist. Nat. v. 11), but which disappeared at the era of the rise of Islam; the Karaite Jefeth uses for it the word (Arab.) Karysh, for he substitutes the powerful Arab tribe from which Muhammed sprung, and rightly remarks: "She compares the colour of her skin to the blackness of the hair tents of the Koreishites,"— even to the present day the Beduin calls his tent his "hair-house" (bét wabar, or, according to a more modern expression; bét sa'ar, בֵּית שֵׁעַר); for the tents are covered with cloth made of the hair of goats, which are there mostly black-coloured or grey. On the one hand, dark-coloured as the tents of the Kedarenes, she may yet, on the other hand, compare herself to the beautiful appearance of the יְרֵעוֹת of Solomon. By this word we will have to think of a pleasure-tent or pavilion for the king; pavillon (softened from Lat. papilio) is a pleasure-tent spread out like the flying butterfly. This Heb. word could certainly also mean curtains for separating a chamber; but in the tabernacle and the temple the curtains separating the Most Holy from the Holy Place were not so designated, but are called פְּרֹכֶת and כַּסָּף; and as with the tabernacle, so always elsewhere, יְרֵעוֹת (from יָרַע, to tremble, to move hither and thither) is the name of the cloths or tapestry which formed the sides of the tent (Isa. liv. 2); of the tent coverings, which were named in parall. with the tents themselves as the clothing of their framework (Hab. iii. 7; Jer. iv. 20, x. 20, xlix. 29). Such tent hangings will thus also be here meant; precious, as those described Ex. xxvi. and xxxvi., and as those which formed the tabernacle on Zion (2 Sam. vii.; cf. 1 Chron. xvii. 1) before the erection of the temple. Those made in Egypt<sup>1</sup> were particularly prized in ancient times.

Shulamith now explains, to those who were looking upon her with inquisitive wonder, how it is that she is swarthy:

Ver. 6a Look not on me because I am black,
Because the sun has scorched me.

If the words were אֶל-תִּרְאוּ (תִּרְאוּיָנָה) בִּי, then the meaning would be: look not at me, stare not at me. But אֶל-תִּרְאוּנִי, with שׁ (elsewhere פִּי) following, means: Regard me not that I am blackish (subnigra); the second שׁ is to be interpreted as co-ordin. with the first (that . . . that), or assigning a reason, and that objectively (for). We prefer, with Böttch., the former, because in the latter case we would have had שֶׁהִשְׁמַח. The quingueliterum שְׁחֲרֹתָ signifies, in contradistinction to שְׁחֹר, that which is black here and there, and thus not altogether black. This form, as descriptive of colour, is diminutive; but since it also means id quod passim est, if the accent lies on passim, as distinguished from raro, it can be also taken as increasing instead of diminishing, as in הִפְכַּפְּךָ, הִפְיַפְּהָ. The LXX. trans. παραβλεψέ (Symm. παραβλεψέ) με ὁ ἥλιος: the sun has looked askance on me. But why only askance? The Venet. better: κατείδέ με; but that is too little. The look is thought of as scorching; wherefore

Aquila: συνέκαυσέ με, it has burnt me; and Theodotion: περιέφρυξέ με, it has scorched me over and over. רָצַף signifies here not adspicere (Job iii. 9, xli. 10) so much as adurere. In this word itself (cogn. רָצַף; Arab. sadaf, whence asdaf, black; cf. רָצַף and רָצַף, Job xvii. 1), the looking is thought of as a scorching; for the rays of the eye, when they fix upon anything, gather themselves, as it were, into a focus. Besides, as the Scriptures ascribe twinkling to the morning dawn, so it ascribes eyes to the sun (2 Sam. xii. 11), which is itself as the eye of the heavens.<sup>1</sup> The poet delicately represents Shulamith as regarding the sun as fem. Its name in Arab. and old Germ. is fem., in Heb. and Aram. for the most part mas. My lady the sun, she, as it were, says, has produced on her this swarthythness.

She now says how it has happened that she is thus sunburnt:

6b My mother's sons were angry with me,
Appointed me as keeper of the vineyards—
Mine own vineyard have I not kept.

If "mother's sons" is the parallel for "brothers" (אֶחָיו), then the expressions are of the same import, e.g. Gen. xxvii. 29; but if the two expressions stand in apposition, as Deut. xiii. 7 [6], then the idea of the natural brother is sharpened; but when "mother's sons" stands thus by itself alone, then, after Lev. xviii. 9, it means the relationship by one of the parents alone, as "father's wife" in the language of the O. T. and also 1 Cor. v. 5 is the designation of a step-mother. Nowhere is mention made of Shulamith's father, but always, as here, only of her mother, iii. 4, viii. 2, vi. 9; and she is only named without being introduced as speaking. One is led to suppose that Shulamith's own father was dead, and that her mother had been married again; the sons by the second marriage were they who ruled in the house of their mother. These brothers of Shulamith appear towards the end of the melodrama as rigorous guardians of their youthful sister; one will thus have to suppose that their zeal for the spotless honour of their sister and the family proceeded from an endeavour to accustom the fickle or dreaming child to useful activity, but not without step-brotherly harshness. The form בָּתָּר, Ewald, § 193c, and Olsh. p. 593, derive from בָּתָּר, the Niph. of which is either בָּתָּר or בָּתָּר (= בָּתָּר), Gesen. § 68, An. 5; but the plur. of this בָּתָּר should, according to rule, have been בָּתָּרִים (cf. however, נחלי, profanantur, Ezek. vii. 24); and what is more decisive, this נחר from חרר everywhere else expresses a different passion from that of anger; Böttch. § 1060 (2, 379). חרה is used of the burning of anger; and that נחרי (from נחרה = נחרה) can be another form for נחרי, is shown, e.g., by the interchange of נחרי and נחרי; the form נחרי, like נחלי, Amos vi. 6, resisted the bringing together of the ה and the half guttural ר. Nēherā (here as Isa. xli. 11, xlv. 24) means, according to the original, mid. signif. of the Niph., to burn inwardly, ἀναφλέγεσθαι = ὀργίζεσθαι. Shulamith's address consists intentionally of clauses with perfects placed together: she speaks with childlike artlessness, and not "like a book;" in the language of a book, רשמיני would have been used instead of שמיני. But that she uses נטרה (from נטר, R. טר = τηρεῖν; cf. Targ. Gen. xxxvii. 11 with Luke ii. 51), and not ינרה, as they were wont to say in Judea, after Prov. xxvii. 18, and after the designation of the tower for the protection of the flocks by the name of "the tower of the nōtsrīm" [the watchmen], 2 Kings xvii. 9, shows that the maid is a Galilean, whose manner of speech is Aramaizing, and if we may so say, platt-Heb. (= Low Heb.), like the Lower Saxon plattdeutsch. Of the three forms of the particip. נטרה, נטרה, נטרה, we here read the middle one, used subst. (Ewald, § 188b), but retaining the long ē (ground-form, nātir). The plur. נטרה does not necessarily imply that she had several vineyards to keep, it is the categ. plur. with the art. designating the genus; custodiens vineas is a keeper of a vineyard. But what kind of vineyard, or better, vine-garden, is that which she calls בְּרָמִי שְׁלִי, i.e. meam ipsius vineam? The personal possession is doubly expressed; shēlli is related to cārmī as a nearer defining apposition: my vineyard, that which belongs to me (vid. Fr. Philippi's Status constr. pp. 112–116). Without doubt the figure refers to herself given in charge to be cared for by herself: vine-gardens she had kept, but her own vine-garden, i.e. her own person, she had not kept. Does she indicate thereby that, in connection with Solomon, she has lost herself, with all that she is and has? Thus in 1851 I thought; but she certainly seeks to explain why she is so sunburnt. She intends in this figurative way to say, that as the keeper of a vineyard she neither could keep nor sought to keep her own person. In this connection cārmī, which by no means = the colourless memet ipsam, is to be taken as the figure of the person in its external appearance, and that of its fresh-blooming attractive appearance which directly accords with בְּרָם, since from the stem-word בְּרָם (Arab.), karuma, the idea of that which is noble and distinguished is connected with this designation of the planting of vines (for בְּרָם, (Arab.) karm, cf. karmat, of a single vine-stock, denotes not so much the soil in which the vines are planted, as rather the vines themselves): her kērēm is her (Arab.) karamat, i.e. her stately attractive appearance. If we must interpret this mystically then, supposing that Shulamith is the congregation of Israel moved at some future time with love to Christ, then by the step-brothers we think of the teachers, who after the death of the fathers threw around the congregation the fetters of their human ordinances, and converted fidelity to the law into a system of hiring service, in which all its beauty disappeared. Among the allegorists, Hengstenberg here presents the extreme of an interpretation opposed to what is true and fine.

These words (vers. 5–6) are addressed to the ladies of the palace, who look upon her with wonder. That which now follows is addressed to her beloved:

Ver. 7 O tell me, thou whom my soul loveth : where feedest thou ?
 Where caust thou it (thy flock) to lie down at noon ?
 For why should I appear as one veiled
 Among the flocks of thy companions !

The country damsel has no idea of the occupation of a king. Her simplicity goes not beyond the calling of a shepherd as of the fairest and the highest. She thinks of the shepherd of the people as the shepherd of sheep. Moreover, Scripture also describes governing as a tending of sheep; and the Messiah, of whom Solomon is a type, is specially represented as the future Good Shepherd. If now we had to conceive of Solomon as present from the beginning of the scene, then here in ver. 7 would Shulamith say that she would gladly be alone with him, far away from so many who are looking on her with open eyes; and, indeed, in some country place where alone she feels at home. The entreaty "O tell me" appears certainly to require (cf. Gen. xxxvii. 19) the presence of one to whom she addresses herself. But, on the other hand, the entreaty only asks that he should let her know where he is; she longs to know where his occupation detains him, that she may go out and seek him. Her request is thus directed toward the absent one, as is proved by ver. 8. The vocat., "O thou whom my soul loveth," is connected with אָמַרְתָּ, which lies hid in הַנִּידָה ("inform thou"). It is a circumlocution for "beloved" (cf. Neh. xiii. 26), or "the dearly beloved of my soul" (cf. Jer. xii. 7). The entreating request, indica quaeso mihi ubi pascis, reminds one of Gen. xxxvii. 16, where, however, ubi is expressed by אֵיפֶה, while here by אֵיכָה, which in this sense is ἀπ. λεγ. For ubi = אֵיפֶה, is otherwise denoted only by אֵיכָה (אֵיכוֹ), 2 Kings vi. 13, and usually אֵינִי, North Palest., by Hosea אֵינִי. This אֵיכָה elsewhere means qua- modo, and is the key-word of the Kîna, as  $\text{מִיָּד}$  is of the Mashal (the satire); the Song uses for it, in common with the Book of Esther,  $\text{מִיָּדָה}$ . In themselves  $\text{כִּי}$  and  $\text{וְכִי}$ , which with  $\text{מִיָּד}$  preceding, are stamped as interrog. in a sense analogous to hic, ecce, κελως, and the like; the local, temporal, polite sense rests only on a conventional usus loq., Böttch. § 530. She wishes to know where he feeds, viz. his flock, where he causes it (viz. his flock) to lie down at mid-day. The verb  $\text{רָבַץ}$  (R. רב, with the root signif. of condensation) is the proper word for the lying down of a four-footed animal: complicatis pedibus procumbere (cubare); Hiph. of the shepherd, who causes the flock to lie down; the Arab. rab'a is the name for the encampment of shepherds. The time for encamping is the mid-day, which as the time of the double-light, i.e. the most intense light in its ascending and descending, is called  $\text{צִהְרִים שְׁלֵמָה}$ , occurring only here, signifies nam cur, but is according to the sense = ut ne, like  $\text{מִיָּד לְפָנָיִךְ}$ , Dan. i. 10 (cf. Ezra vii. 23);  $\text{לְמָה}$ , without Dag. forte euphon., is, with the single exception of Job vii. 20, always milra, while with the Dag. it is mîlel, and as a rule, only when the following word begins with  $\text{וְהַיּוֹם}$  carries forward the tone to the ult. Shulamith wishes to know the place where her beloved feeds and rests his flock, that she might not wander about among the flocks of his companions seeking and asking for him. But what does  $\text{כִּי עֲשֵׂיהָ}$  mean? It is at all events the part. act. fem. of  $\text{עָשָׂה}$  which is here treated after the manner of the strong verb, the kindred form to the equally possible  $\text{עָשָׂה}$  (from 'ataja) and  $\text{עָשִׂיהָ}$ . As for the meaning, instar errabundae (Syr., Symm., Jerome, Venet., Luther) recommends itself; but  $\text{עָשָׂה}$  must then, unless we wish directly to adopt the reading  $\text{כִּי עֲשֵׂיהָ}$  (Böttch.), have been transposed from  $\text{טַעַה}$  ( $\text{הַעַה}$ ), which must have been assumed if  $\text{עָשָׂה}$ , in the usual sense of velare (cf.  $\text{עָשָׂה}$ ), did not afford an appropriate signification. Indeed, velans, viz. sese, cannot denote one whom consciousness veils, one who is weak or fainting (Gesen. Lex.), for the part. act. expresses action, not passivity. But it can denote one who covers herself (the LXX., perhaps, in this sense ὡς περιβαλλομένη), because she mourns (Rashi); or after Gen. xxxviii. 14 (cf. Martial, ix. 32) one who muffles herself up, because by such affected apparent modesty she wishes to make herself known as a Hierodoule or harlot. The former of these significations is not appropriate; for to appear as mourning does not offend the sense of honour in a virtuous maiden, but to create the appearance of an immodest woman is to her intolerable; and if she bears in herself the image of an only beloved, she shrinks in horror from such a base appearance, not only as a debasing of herself. but also as a desecration of this sanctuary in her heart.

Shulamith calls entreatingly upon him whom her soul loveth to tell her how she might be able directly to reach him, without feeling herself wounded in the consciousness of her maidenhood and of the exclusiveness of her love. It is thereby supposed that the companions of her only beloved among the shepherds might not treat that which to her is holy with a holy reserve,—a thought to which Hattendorff has given delicate expression in his exposition of the Song, 1867. If Solomon were present, it would be difficult to understand this entreating call. But he is not present, as is manifest from this, that she is not answered by him, but by the daughters of Jerusalem.

Ver. 8 If thou knowest not, thou fairest of women,
Go after the footprints of the flock,
And feed thy kids beside the shepherds' tents.

יְפֵהָיָהּ, standing in the address or call, is in the voc.; the art. was indispensable, because "the beautiful one among women" = the one distinguished for beauty among them, and thus is, according to the meaning, superlative; cf. Judg. vi. 15, Amos ii. 16, with Judg. v. 24; Luke i. 28; Ewald, § 313c. The verb יָפָהּ refers to the fundamental idea: integrum, completum esse, for beauty consists in well-proportioned fulness and harmony of the members. That the ladies of the court are excited to speak thus may arise from this, that one often judges altogether otherwise of a man, whom one has found not beautiful, as soon as he begins to speak, and his countenance becomes intellectually animated. And did not, in Shulamith's countenance, the strange external swarthiness borrow a brightness from the inner light which irradiated her features, as she gave so deep and pure an expression to her longing? But the instruction which her childlike, almost childish, naïvete deserved, the daughters of Jerusalem do not feel disposed to give her. לֹא יָדַע signifies, often without the obj. supplied, non sapere, e.g. Ps. lxxxii. 5; Job viii. 9. The הֵן subjoined guards against this inclusive sense, in which the phrase here would be offensive. This dat. ethicus (vid. ii. 10, 11, 13, 17, iv. 6, viii. 14), used twice here in ver. 8 and generally in the Song, reflects that which is said on the will of the subject, and thereby gives to it an agreeable cordial turn, here one bearing the colour of a gentle reproof: if thou knowest not to thee,—i.e. if thou, in thy simplicity and retirement, knowest it not, viz. that he whom thou thinkest thou must seek for at a distance is near to thee, and that Solomon has to tend not sheep but people,—now, then, so go forth, viz. from the royal city, and remain, although chosen to royal honours, as a shepherdess beside thine own sheep and kids. One misapprehends the answer if he supposes that they in reality point out the way to Shulamith by which she might reach her object; on the contrary, they answer her ironically, and, entering into her confusion of mind, tell her that if she cannot apprehend the position of Solomon, she may just remain what she is. עֲקֵב (Arab. 'akib), from עָקַב, to be convex, arched, is the heel; to go in the heels (the reading fluctuates between the form, with and without Dag. dirimens in ק) of one = to press hard after him, to follow him immediately. That they assign to her not goats or kids of goats, but kids, נְיִיט, is an involuntary fine delicate thought with which the appearance of the elegant, beautiful shepherdess inspires them. But that they name kids, not sheep, may arise from this, that the kid is a near-lying erotic emblem; cf. Gen. xxxviii. 17, where it has been fittingly remarked that the young he-goat was the proper courtesan-offering in the worship of Aphrodite (Movers' Phönizier, I. 680). It is as if they said: If thou canst not distinguish between a king and shepherds, then indulge thy love-thoughts beside the shepherds' tents,—remain a country maiden if thou understandest not how to value the fortune which has placed thee in Jerusalem in the royal palace.

SECOND SCENE OF THE FIRST ACT, I. 9—II. 7.

Solomon, while he was absent during the first scene, is now present. It is generally acknowledged that the words which follow were spoken by him:

- Ver. 9 To a horse in the chariot of Pharaoh
Do I compare thee, my love.
10 Beautiful are thy cheeks in the chains,
Thy neck in the necklaces.
11 Golden chains will we make for thee,
With points of silver.

Till now, Shulamith was alone with the ladies of the palace in the banqueting-chamber. Solomon now comes from the banquet-hall of the men (ver. 12); and to ii. 7, to which this scene extends, we have to think of the women of the palace as still present, although not hearing what Solomon says to Shulamith. He addresses her, "my love:" she is not yet his bride. רַעְיָה (female friend), from רָעָה (רָעָה), to guard, care for, tend, ethically: to delight in something particularly, to take pleasure in intercourse with one, is formed in the same way as נַעֲרָה; the mas. is רַעִי (= ra'j), abbreviated רַע, whence the fem. rā'yāh (Judg. xi. 37; Chethib), as well as rē'āh, also with reference to the ground-form. At once, in the first words used by Solomon, one recognises a Philip, i.e. a man fond of horses,—an important feature in the character of the sage (vid. Sur. 38 of the Koran),—and that, one fond of Egyptian horses: Solomon carried on an extensive importation of horses from Egypt and other countries (2 Chron. ix. 28); he possessed 1400 war-chariots and 12,000 horsemen (1 Kings x. 26); the number of stalls of horses for his chariots was still greater (1 Kings v. 6) [iv. 26]. Horace (Ode iii. 11) compares a young sprightly maiden to a nimble and timid equa trima; Anacreon (60) addresses such an one: “thou Thracian filly;” and Theocritus says (Idyl xviii. 30, 31):

“As towers the cypress mid the garden’s bloom,
As in the chariot proud Thessalian steed,
Thus graceful rose-complexioned Helen moves.”

But how it could occur to the author of the Song to begin the praise of the beauty of a shepherdess by saying that she is like a horse in Pharaoh’s chariot, is explained only by the supposition that the poet is Solomon, who, as a keen hippologue, had an open eye for the beauty of the horse. Egyptian horses were then esteemed as afterwards the Arabian were. Moreover, the horse was not native to Egypt, but was probably first imported thither by the Hyksos: the Egyptian name of the horse, and particularly of the mare, ses-t, ses-mut, and of the chariot, markabuta, are Semitic.<sup>1</sup> סוסה is here not equitatus (Jerome), as Hengst. maintains: “Susah does not denote a horse, but is used collectively;” while he adds, “Shulamith is compared to the whole Egyptian cavalry, and is therefore an ideal person.” The former statement is untrue, and the latter is absurd. Sūs means equus, and susā may, indeed, collectively denote the stud (cf. Josh. xix. 5 with 1 Chron. iv. 31), but obviously it first denotes the equa. But is it to be rendered, with the LXX. and the Venet., “to my horse”? Certainly not; for the chariots of Pharaoh are just the chariots of Egypt, not of the king of Israel. The Chirek in which this word terminates is the Ch. compag., which also frequently occurs where, as here and Gen. xlix. 11, the second member of the word-chain is furnished with a prep. (vid. under Ps. cxiii.). This i is an old genitival ending, which, as such, has disappeared from the language; it is almost always accented as the suff. Thus also here, where the Metheg shows that the accent rests on the ult. The plur. רִכְבֵּי, occurring only here, is the amplificative poetic, and denotes state equipage. רִפְתָּה is the trans. of רִפְתָּה, which combines the meanings aequum and aequalem esse. Although not allegorizing, yet, that we may not overlook the judiciousness of the comparison, we must remark that Shulamith is certainly a "daughter of Israel;" a daughter of the people who increased in Egypt, and, set free from the bondage of Pharaoh, became the bride of Jahve, and were brought by the law as a covenant into a marriage relation to Him.

The transition to ver. 10 is mediated by the effect of the comparison; for the head-frame of the horse's bridle, and the poitral, were then certainly, just as now, adorned with silken tassels, fringes, and other ornaments of silver (vid. Lane's Modern Egypt, I. 149). Jerome, absurdly, after the LXX.: pulchrae sunt genae tuae sicut turturis. The name of the turtle, תור, redupl. turtur, is a pure onomatopoeia, which has nothing to do with תור, whence דור, to go round about, or to move in a circle; and turtle-dove's cheeks — what absurdity! Birds have no cheeks; and on the sides of its neck the turtle-dove has black and white variegated feathers, which also furnishes no comparison for the colour of the cheeks. תורים are the round ornaments which hang down in front on both sides of the head-band, or are also inwoven in the braids of hair in the forehead; תור, circumire, signifies also to form a circle or a row; in Aram. it thus denotes, e.g., the hem of a garment and the border round the eye. In נאור (vid. at 5a) the Aleph is silent, as in לאמר, אבל, תרמים are strings of pearls as a necklace; for the necklace (Arab. khazar) consists of one or more, for the most part, of three rows of pearls. The verb תרם signifies, to bore through and to string together; e.g. in the Talm., fish which one strings on a rod or line, in order to bring them to the market. In Heb. and Aram. the secondary sense of stringing predominates, so that to string pearls is expressed by חרו, and to bore through pearls, by קרו; in Arab., the primary meaning of piercing through, e.g. michraz, a shoemaker's awl.

After ver. 11, one has to represent to himself Shulamith's adorning as very simple and modest; for Solomon seeks to make her glad with the thought of a continued residence at the royal court by the promise of costly and elegant ornaments. Gold and silver were so closely connected in ancient modes of representation, that in the old Egypt. silver was called nub het, or white gold. Gold derived its name of זהב from its splendour, after the witty Arab. word zahab, to go away, as an unstable possession; silver is called כסף, from כסף, scindere, abscondere, a piece of metal as broken off from the mother-stone, like the Arab. dhukrat, as set free from the lump by means of the pickaxe (cf. at Ps. xix. 11, lxxxiv. 3). The name of silver has here, not without the influence of the rhythm (cf. viii. 9), the article designating the species; the Song frequently uses this, and is generally in using the art. not so sparing as poetry commonly is.<sup>1</sup> נָּעַץ makes prominent the points of silver as something particular, but not separate. In נָּעַץ, Solomon includes himself among the other inhabitants, especially the women of the palace; for the plur. majest. in the words of God of Himself (frequently in the Koran), or persons of rank of themselves (general in the vulgar Arab.), is unknown in the O. T. They would make for her golden globules or knobs with (i.e. provided with . . .; cf. Ps. lxxxix. 14) points of silver sprinkled over them,—which was a powerful enticement for a plain country damsel.

Now for the first time Shulamith addresses Solomon, who is before her. It might be expected that the first word will either express the joy that she now sees him face to face, or the longing which she had hitherto cherished to see him again. The verse following accords with this expectation:

Ver. 12 While the king is at his table,
My nard has yielded its fragrance.

עַד עַד or עַד אֲשֶׁר עַד, with fut. foll., usually means: usque eo, until this and that shall happen, ii. 7, 17; with the perf. foll., until something happened, iii. 4. The idea connected with “until” may, however, be so interpreted that there comes into view not the end of the period as such, but the whole length of the period. So here in the subst. clause following, which in itself is already an expression of continuance, donec = dum (erat); so also עַד alone, without asher, with the part. foll. (Job i. 18), and the infin. (Judg. iii. 26; Ex. xxxiii. 22; Jonah iv. 2; cf. 2 Kings ix. 22); seldomer with the fin. foll., once with the perf. foll. (1 Sam. xiv. 19), once (for Job viii. 21 is easily explained otherwise) with the fut. foll. (Ps. cxli. 10, according to which Gen. xlix. 10 also is explained by Baur and others, but without כִּי עַר in this sense of limited duration: "so long as," being anywhere proved). מִסָּבִי is the inflected מִסָּב, which, like the post-bibl. מִסָּבָה, signifies the circuit of the table; for סָּבִי signifies also, after 1 Sam. xvi. 11 (the LXX. rightly, after the sense οὐ μὴ κατακλιθῶμεν), to seat themselves around the table, from which it is to be remarked that not till the Greek-Roman period was the Persian custom of reclining at table introduced, but in earlier times they sat (1 Sam. xx. 5; 1 Kings xiii. 20; cf. Ps. cxxviii. 3). Reclining and eating are to be viewed as separate from each other, Amos vi. 4; מִסָּב, "three and three they recline at table," is in matter as in language mishnic (Berachoth 42*b*; cf. Sanhedrin ii. 4, of the king: if he reclines at table, the Tōra must be opposite him). Thus: While (usque eo, so long as), says Shulamith, the king was at his table, my nard gave forth its fragrance.

<sup>1</sup> The art. denoting the idea of species in the second member of the st. const. standing in the sing. without a determining reference to the first, occurs in i. 13, “a bundle of (von) myrrh;” i. 14, “a cluster of (von) the cyprus-flower;” iv. 3, “a thread of (von) scarlet,” “a piece of pomegranate;” v. 13, “a bed of balm” (but otherwise, vi. 2); vii. 9, “clusters of the vine;” vii. 3, “a bowl of roundness” (which has this property); vii. 10, “wine (of the quality) of goodness;” cf. viii. 2, “wine the (= of the) spicing.” It also, in cases where the defined species to which the first undefined member of the st. const. belongs, stands in the pl.: ii. 9, 17, viii. 14, “like a young one of the hinds;” iv. 1, vi. 5, “a herd of goats;” iv. 2, “a flock of shorn sheep;” vi. 6, “a flock of lambs,” i.e. consisting of individuals of this kind. Also, when the second member states the place where a thing originates or is found, the first often remains indeterminate, as one of that which is there found, or a part of that which comes from thence: ii. 1, “a meadow-saffron of Sharon,” “a lily of the valleys;” iii. 9, “the wood of Lebanon.” The following are doubtful: iv. 4, “a thousand bucklers;” and vii. 5, “a tower of ivory;” less so vii. 1, “the dance of Mahanaim.” The following are examples of a different kind: Gen. xvi. 7, “a well of water;” Deut. xxii. 19, “a damsel of Israel;” Ps. cxiii. 9, “a mother of children;” cf. Gen. xxi. 28.

נָרְדִּי is an Indian word: naladd, i.e. yielding fragrance, Pers. nard (nārd), Old Arab. nardin (nārdin), is the aromatic oil of an Indian plant valeriana, called Nardostachys 'Gatmānsi (hair-tress nard). Interpreters are wont to represent Shulamith as having a stalk of nard in her hand. Hitzig thinks of the nard with which she who is speaking has besprinkled herself, and he can do this because he regards the speaker as one of the court ladies. But that Shulamith has besprinkled herself with nard, is as little to be thought of as that she has in her hand a sprig of nard (spica nardi), or, as the ancients said, an ear of nard; she comes from a region where no nard grows, and nard-oil is for a country maiden unattainable.<sup>1</sup> Horace promises Virgil a cadus (= 9 gallons) of the best wine for a small onyx-box full of nard; and Judas estimated at 300 denarii (about £8, 10s.) the genuine nard (how frequently nard was adulterated we learn from Pliny) which Mary of Bethany poured from an alabaster box on the head of Jesus, so that the whole house was filled with the odour of the ointment (Mark xiv. 5; John xii. 2). There, in Bethany, the love which is willing to sacrifice all expressed itself in the nard; here, the nard is a figure of the happiness of love, and its fragrance a figure of the longing of love. It is only in the language of flowers that Shulamith makes precious perfume a figure of the love which she bears in the recess of her heart, and which, so long as Solomon was absent, breathed itself out and, as it were, cast forth its fragrance<sup>1</sup> (cf. ii. 13, vii. 14) in words of longing. She has longed for the king, and has sought to draw him towards her, as she gives him to understand. He is continually in her mind.

Ver. 13 A bundle of myrrh is my beloved to me,
Which lieth between my breasts.

14 A bunch of cypress-flowers is my beloved to me,
From the vine-gardens of Engedi.

Most interpreters, ignoring the lessons of botany, explain 13*a* of a little bunch of myrrh; but whence could Shulamith obtain this? Myrrh, מֵרְרָה (מֵרָרָה, to move oneself in a horizontal direction hither and thither, or gradually to advance; of a fluid, to flow over the plain<sup>2</sup>), belongs, like the frankincense, to the amyrids, which are also exotics<sup>3</sup> in Palestine; and that which is aromatic in the Balsamodendron myrrha are the leaves and flowers, but the resin (Gummi myrrhae, or merely myrrha) cannot be tied in a bunch. Thus the myrrh here can be understood in no other way than as at v. 5; in general צִרְרִי, according to Hitzig's correct remark, properly denotes not what one binds up together, but what one ties up—thus sacculus, a little bag. It is not supposed that she carried such a little bag with her (cf. Isa. iii. 20), or a box of frankincense (Luth. musk-apple); but she compares her beloved to a myrrh-repository, which day and night departs not from her bosom, and penetrates her inwardly with its heart-strengthening aroma. So constantly does she think of him, and so delightful is it for her to dare to think of him as her beloved.

The 14th verse presents the same thought. כַּפָּר is the cypress-cluster or the cypress-flowers, καμπος (according to Fürst, from כָּפַר = עָפַר, to be whitish, from the colour of the yellow-white flowers), which botanists call Lawsonia, and in the East Alhennā; its leaves yield the orange colour with which the Moslem women stain<sup>4</sup> their hands and feet. אֶשְׁבֵּל (from עָבַל, to interweave) denotes that which is woven, tresses, or a cluster or garland of their flowers. Here also we

have not to suppose that Shulamith carried a bunch of flowers; in her imagination she places herself in the vine-gardens which Solomon had planted on the hill-terraces of Engedi lying on the west of the Dead Sea (Eccles. ii. 4), and chooses a cluster of flowers of the cypress growing in that tropical climate, and says that her beloved is to her internally what such a cluster of cypress-flowers would be to her externally. To be able to call him her beloved is her ornament; and to think of him refreshes her like the most fragrant flowers.

In this ardour of loving devotion, she must appear to the king so much the more beautiful.

Ver. 15 Lo, thou art fair, my love.

Lo, thou art fair; thine eyes are doves.

This is a so-called comparatio decurtata, as we say: feet like the gazelle, i.e. to which the swiftness of the gazelle's feet belongs (Hab. iii. 19); but instead of "like doves," for the comparison mounts up to equalization, the expression is directly, "doves." If the pupil of the eye were compared with the feathers of the dove (Hitz.), or the sprightliness of the eye with the lively motion hither and thither of the dove (Heiligst.), then the eulogium would stand out of connection with what Shulamith has just said. But it stands in reference to it if her eyes are called doves; and so the likeness to doves' eyes is attributed to them, because purity and gentleness, longing and simplicity, express themselves therein. The dove is, like the myrtle, rose, and apple, an attribute of the goddess of love, and a figure of that which is truly womanly; wherefore יְסִימָה? (the Arab. name of a dove), Columbina, and the like names of women, columba and columbari, are words of fondness and caressing. Shulamith gives back to Solomon his eulogium, and rejoices in the prospect of spending her life in fellowship with him.

Ver. 16 Behold, thou art comely, my beloved; yea, charming;

Yea, our couch is luxuriously green.

17 The beams of our house are cedars,

Our wainscot of cypresses.

If ver. 16 were not the echo of her heart to Solomon, but if she therein meant some other one, then the poet should at least not have used יְסִימָה, but יְסִימָה. Hitzig remarks, that up to "my beloved" the words appear as those of mutual politeness—that therefore יְסִימָה (charming) is added at once to distinguish her beloved from the king, who is to her insufferable. But if a man and a woman are together, and he says יְסִימָה and she says יְסִימָה, that is as certainly an interchange of address as that one and one are two and not three.

He praises her beauty; but in her eyes it is rather he who is beautiful, yea charming: she rejoices beforehand in that which is assigned to her. Where else could her conjugal happiness find its home but among her own rural scenes? The city with its noisy display does not please her; and she knows, indeed, that her beloved is a king, but she thinks of him as a shepherd. Therefore she praises the fresh green of their future homestead; cedar tops will form the roof of the house in which they dwell, and cypresses its wainscot. The bed, and particularly the bridal-bower (D. M. Z. xxii. 153),—but not merely the bed in which one sleeps, but also the cushion for rest, the divan (Amos vi. 4),—has the name עֲרֵשׁ, from עָרַשׁ, to cover over; cf. the “network of goats’ hair” (1 Sam. xix. 13) and the κωνωπεῖον of Holofernes (Judith x. 21, xiii. 9), (whence our kanapee = canopy), a bed covered over for protection against the κώνωπες, the gnats. רַעֲנָן, whence here the fem. adj. accented on the ult., is not a word of colour, but signifies to be extensible, and to extend far and wide, as lentus in lenti salices; we have no word such as this which combines in itself the ideas of softness and juicy freshness, of bending and elasticity, of looseness, and thus of overhanging ramification (as in the case of the weeping willow). The beams are called קָרוֹת, from קָרָה, to meet, to lay crosswise, to hold together (cf. contingere and contignare). רְהִיטֵי (after another reading, רַח, from רְהִיטֵי, with Kametz immutable, or a virtual Dag.) is North Palest. = רְהִי (Kert), for in place of רְהִיטֵי, troughs (Ex. ii. 16), the Samarit. has רַחֲטִים (cf. sahar and sahhar, circumvire, zahar and zahhar, whence the Syr. name of scarlet); here the word, if it is not defect. plur. (Heiligst.), is used as collect. sing. of the hollows or panels of a wainscoted ceiling, like φάρται, whence the LXX. φατνώματα (Symm. φατνώσεις), and like lacunae, whence lacunaria, for which Jerome has here laquearia, which equally denotes the wainscot ceiling Abulwalid glosses the word rightly by מְרוּבִים, gutters (from רָהַט, to run); only this and οἱ διάδρομοι of the Gr. Venet. is not an architectural expression, like רַהֲטִים, which is still found in the Talm. (vid. Buxtorf’s Lex.). To suppose a transposition from חֲרִיטֵי, from חָרַט, to turn, to carve (Ew. Heiligst. Hitz.), is accordingly not necessary. As the ה in בְּרוּחִים belongs to the North Palest. (Galilean) form of speech,<sup>1</sup> so also ה for ה in this word: an exchange of the gutturals was characteristic of the Galilean idiom (vid. Talm. citations by Frankel, Einl. in d. jerus. Talm.

<sup>1</sup> Pliny, H. N. xxiv. 102, ed. Jan., notes brathy as the name of the savin-tree Juniperus sabina. Wetstein is inclined to derive the name of Beirut from בְּרוּת, as the name of the sweet pine, the tree peculiar to the Syrian landscape, and which, 1870, 7b). Well knowing that a mere hut was not suitable for the king, Shulamith's fancy converts one of the magnificent nature-temples of the North Palest. forest-solititudes into a house where, once together, they will live each for the other. Because it is a large house, although not large by art, she styles it by the poet. plur. bättenu. The mystical interpretation here finds in Isa. lx. 13 a favourable support.

What Shulamith now further says confirms what had just been said. City and palace with their splendour please her not; forest and field she delights in; she is a tender flower that has grown up in the quietness of rural life.

Ch. ii. 1 I am a meadow-flower of Sharon,
A lily of the valleys.

We do not render: "the wild-flower," "the lily," . . . for she seeks to represent herself not as the one, but only as one of this class; the definiteness by means of the article sometimes belongs exclusively to the second number of the genit. word-chain. מלאך mal'ak may equally (vid. at i. 11, Hitz. on Ps. cxiii. 9, and my Comm. on Gen. ix. 20) mean "an angel" or "the angel of Jahve;" and 'בת יש' bat is "a virgin," or "the virgin of Israel" (the personification of the people). For hhävatstsel'eth (perhaps from hhivtsel, a denom. quadril. from betsel, to form bulbs or bulbous knolls) the Syr. Pesh. (Isa. xxxv. 1) uses chamsaljotho, the meadow-saffron, colchicum autumnale; it is the flesh-coloured flower with leafless stem, which, when the grass is mown, decks in thousands the fields of warmer regions. They call it filius ante patrem, because the blossoms appear before the leaves and the seed-capsules, which develop themselves at the close of winter under the ground. Shulamith compares herself to such a simple and common flower, and that to one in Sharon, i.e. in the region known by that name. Sharon is per aphaer. derived from שָׁרׁוֹן. The most celebrated plain of this name is that situated on the Mediterranean coast between Joppa and Caesarea; but there is also a trans-Jordanic Sharon, 1 Chron. v. 16; and according to Eusebius and Jerome, there is also another district of this name between Tabor and the Lake of Tiberias,<sup>1</sup> which is the one here intended, because Shulamith is a Galilean: she calls herself a flower from the neighbourhood of Nazareth. Aquila translates: "A rosebud of Sharon;" but שֶׁשֶׁן (designedly here the fem. form of the name, which is also growing on the sandy hills, prevents the town from being filled with flying sand. The cypress is now called (Arab.) sanaubar; regarding its old names, and their signification in the figurative language of love, vid. under Isa. xli. 19.

the name of a woman) does not mean the Rose which was brought at a later period from Armenia and Persia, as it appears,<sup>1</sup> and cultivated in the East (India) and West (Palestine, Egypt, Europe). It is nowhere mentioned in the canonical Scriptures, but is first found in Sir. xxiv. 14, xxxix. 13, l. 8; Wisd. ii. 8; and Esth. i. 6, LXX. Since all the rosaceae are five-leaved, and all the liliaceae are six-leaved, one might suppose, with Aben Ezra, that the name sosan (susan) is connected with the numeral שש, and points to the number of leaves, especially since one is wont to represent to himself the Eastern lilies as red. But they are not only red, or rather violet, but also white: the Moorish-Spanish azucena denotes the white lily.<sup>2</sup> The root-word will thus, however, be the same as that of שש, byssus, and שש, white marble. The comparison reminds us of Hos. xiv. 6 [5], "I shall be as the dew unto Israel: he shall grow as the lily." העמקים are deep valleys lying between mountains. She thinks humbly of herself; for before the greatness of the king she appears diminutive, and before the comeliness of the king her own beauty disappears—but he takes up her comparison of herself, and gives it a notable turn.

Ver. 2 As a lily among thorns,
So is my love among the daughters.

By החיות are not meant the thorns of the plant itself, for the lily has no thorns, and the thorns of the rose are, moreover, called kotsim, and not hhohhim,<sup>3</sup> besides, ben (among) contradicts that idea, since the thorns are on the plant itself, and it is not among them—thus the hhohhim are not the thorns of the flower-stem, but the thorn-plants that are around. חות designates the thorn-bush, e.g. in the allegorical answer of King Josiah to Amaziah, 2 Kings xiv. 9. Simplicity, innocence, gentleness, are the characteristics in which Shulamith surpasses all בנות, i.e. all women (vid. vi. 9), as the lily of the valley surpasses the thorn-bushes around it. "Although thorns surround her, yet can he see her; he sees her quiet life, he finds her beautiful." But continuing this reciprocal rivalry in the praise of mutual love, she says:

Among the rich flora on the descent of the Hauran range, Wetstein saw (Reisebericht, p. 148) a dark-violet magnificent lily (susan) as large as his fist. We note here Rückert's "Bright lily! The flowers worship God in the garden: thou art the priest of the house."

<sup>3</sup> An Aramaic proverb: "from thorns sprouts the rose" (i.e. bad fathers have often pious children), in Heb. is קוין מרציה שושן; vid. Jalkut Samuel, § 134.

Ver. 3a As an apple-tree among the trees of the wood,
So is my beloved among the sons.

The apple-tree, the name of which, תַּפְּחִי, is formed from תַּפְּחִי, and denominates it from its fragrant flower and fruit, is as the king among fruit trees, in Shulamith's view. יַעַר (from יָעַר, to be rough, rugged, uneven) is the wilderness and the forest, where are also found trees bearing fruit, which, however, is for the most part sour and unpalatable. But the apple-tree unites delicious fruit along with a grateful shade; and just such a noble tree is the object of her love.

3b Under his shadow it delighted me to sit down;
And his fruit is sweet to my taste.

In concupivi et consedi the principal verb completes itself by the co-ordinating of a verb instead of an adv. or inf. as Isa. xlii. 21; Esth. viii. 7; Ewald, § 285. However, concupivi et consedi is yet more than concupivi considerare, for thereby she not only says that she found delight in sitting down, but at the same time also in sitting down in the shadow of this tree. The Piel תַּפְּחִי, occurring only here, expresses the intensity of the wish and longing. The shadow is a figure of protection afforded, and the fruit a figure of enjoyment obtained. The taste is denoted by תַּחַם = תָּחַם, from תָּחַם, to chew, or also imbuere; and that which is sweet is called מְתוּקָה, from the smacking connected with an agreeable relish. The usus loq. has neglected this image, true to nature, 'of physical circumstances in words, especially where, as here, they are transferred to the experience of the soul-life. The taste becomes then a figure of the soul's power of perception (αἰσθητικόν); a man's fruit are his words and works, in which his inward nature expresses itself; and this fruit is sweet to those on whom that in which the peculiar nature of the man reveals itself makes a happy, pleasing impression. But not only does the person of the king afford to Shulamith so great delight, he entertains her also with what can and must give her enjoyment.

Ver. 4 He has brought me into the wine-house,
And his banner over me is love.

After we have seen the ladies of the palace at the feast, in which wine is presented, and after Solomon, till now absent, has entered the banqueting-chamber (Arab. meḡlis), by בֵּית הַיַּיִן we are not to understand the vineyard, which would be called bēth hāggēphānīm or bēth hā'ānāvīm, as in Acts i. 12, Pesh. the Mount of Olives, bēth zaitē.<sup>1</sup> He has introduced her to the place where he royally entertains his friends. Well knowing that she, the poor and sunburnt maiden, does not properly belong to such a place, and would rather escape away from it, he relieves her from her fear and bashfulness, for he covers her with his fear-inspiring, awful, and thus surely protecting, banner; and this banner, which he waves over her, and under which she is well concealed, is "love." הַגִּל (from הָגַל, to cover) is the name of the covering of the shaft or standard, i.e. pannus, the piece of cloth fastened to a shaft. Like a pennon, the love of the king hovers over her; and so powerful, so surpassing, is the delight of this love which pervades and transports her, that she cries out :

Ver. 5 Support me with grape-cakes,
Refresh me with apples :
For I am sick with love.

She makes use of the intensive form as one in a high degree in need of the reanimating of her almost sinking life: הִשְׁעֵר is the intens. of שָׁעַר, to prop up, support, or, as here, to under-prop, uphold; and הִרְפֵּה, the intens. of רָפֵה (R. רָף), to raise up from beneath (vid. at Prov. vii. 16), to furnish firm ground and support. The apple is the Greek attribute of Aphrodite, and is the symbol of love; but here it is only a means of refreshing; and if thoughts of love are connected with the apple-tree (ii. 3, viii. 5), that is explained from Shulamith's rural home. Böttcher understands quinces; Epstein, citrons; but these must needs have been more closely denoted, as at Prov. xxv. 11, by some addition to the expression. תִּשְׁבִּיעַ (from שָׁבַע, to establish, make firm) are (cf. Isa. xvi. 7; Hos. iii. 1) grapes pressed together like cakes; different from צִמְרִיקִים, dried grapes (cf. הַבִּלְיָה), fig-cakes (Arab. dabbûle, a mass pressed together), and πλακοῦς, placenta, from the pressed-out form. A cake is among the gifts (2 Sam. vi. 19) which David distributed to the people on the occasion of the bringing up of the ark; date-cakes, e.g. at the monastery at Sinai, are to the present day gifts for the refreshment of travellers. If Shulamith's cry was to be understood literally, one might, with Noack, doubt the correctness of the text; for "love-sickness, even in the age of passion and sentimentality, was not to be cured with roses and apples." But (1) sentimentality, i.e. susceptibility, does not belong merely to the Romantic, but also to Antiquity, especially in the Orient, as e.g. is shown by the symptoms of sympathy with which the prophets were affected when uttering their threatenings of judgment; let one read such outbreaks of sorrow as Isa. xxi. 3, which, if one is disposed to scorn, may be derided as hysterical fits. Moreover, the Indian, Persian, and Arabic erotic ineptly cites "vine-arbour," and South-Germ. "kamerte" = vinea camerata; in Heb. בֵּית הַיַּיִן is the house in which wine is drunk.

(vid. e.g. the Romance Siret 'Antar) is as sentimental as the German has at any time been. (2) The subject of the passage here is not the curing of love-sickness, but bodily refreshment: the cry of Shulamith, that she may be made capable of bearing the deep agitation of her physical life, which is the consequence, not of her love-sickness, but of her love-happiness. (3) The cry is not addressed (although this is grammatically possible, since פִּמְכֵינִי אֶתִּי is, according to rule, = פִּמְכֵינִי אֶתִּי) to the daughters of Jerusalem, who would in that case have been named, but to some other person; and this points to its being taken not in a literal sense. (4) It presupposes that one came to the help of Shulamith, sick and reduced to weakness, with grapes and apple-scent to revive her fainting spirit. The call of Shulamith thus means: hasten to me with that which will revive and refresh me, for I am sick with love. This love-sickness has also been experienced in the spiritual sphere. St. Ephrem was once so overcome by such a joy that he cried out: "Lord, withdraw Thine hand a little, for my heart is too weak to receive so great joy." And J. R. Hedinger († 1704) was on his deathbed overpowered with such a stream of heavenly delight that he cried: "Oh, how good is the Lord! Oh, how sweet is Thy love, my Jesus! Oh, what a sweetness! I am not worthy of it, my Lord! Let me alone; let me alone!" As the spiritual joy of love, so may also the spiritual longing of love consume the body (cf. Job xix. 27; Ps. lxxiii. 2, lxxxiv. 3); there have been men who have actually sunk under a longing desire after the Lord and eternity. It is the state of love-ecstasy in which Shulamith calls for refreshment, because she is afraid of sinking. The contrast between her, the poor and unworthy, and the king, who appears to her as an ideal of beauty and majesty, who raises her up to himself, was such as to threaten her life. Unlooked for, extraordinary fortune, has already killed many. Fear, producing lameness and even death, is a phenomenon common in the Orient.<sup>1</sup> If Pharaoh's daughter, if the Queen of Sheba, finds herself in the presence of Solomon, the feeling of social equality prevents all alarm. But Shulamith is dazzled by the splendour, and disconcerted;

<sup>1</sup> "Ro'b (רֹעַב, thus in Damascus), or ra'b (thus in the Hauran and among the Beduins), is a state of the soul which with us is found only in a lower degree, but which among the Arabians is psychologically noteworthy. The wahm, i.e. the idea of the greatness and irresistibility of a danger or a misfortune, overpowers the Arabian; all power of body and of soul suddenly so departs from him, that he falls down helpless and defenceless. Thus, on the 8th July 1860, in a few hours, about 6000 Christian men were put to death in Damascus, without one lifting his hand in defence, or uttering one word of supplication. That the ro'b and it happens to her in type as it happened to the seer of Patmos, who, in presence of the ascended Lord, fell at His feet as one dead, Rev. i. 17. If beauty is combined with dignity, it has always, for gentle and not perverted natures, something that awakens veneration and tremor; but if the power of love be superadded, then it has, as a consequence, that combination of awe and inward delight, the psychological appearance of which Sappho, in the four strophes which begin with “Φάλνεται μοι κήνος ἴσος θεοῖσιν ἔμμεν ὀνήρ,” has described in a manner so true to nature. We may thus, without carrying back modern sentimentality into antiquity, suppose that Shulamith sank down in a paroxysm caused by the rivalry between the words of love and of praise, and thus thanking him,—for Solomon supports and bears her up,—she exclaims :

Ver. 6 His left hand is under my head,
And his right hand doth embrace me.

With his left hand he supports her head that had fallen backwards, and with his right he embraces her [herzet], as Luther rightly renders it (as he also renders the name Habakkuk by “der Herzer” = the embracer); for עֶרְצָה signifies properly to enfold, to embrace; but then generally, to embrace lovingly, to fondle, of that gentle stroking with the hand elsewhere denoted by מָלַח, mulcere. The situation here is like that at Gen. xxix. 13, xlvi. 10; where, connected with the dat., it is meant of loving arms stretched out to embrace. If this sympathetic, gentle embracing exercises a soothing influence on her, overcome by the power of her emotions; so love mutually kindled now celebrates the first hour of delighted enjoyment, and the happy Shulamith calls to those who are witnesses of her joy :

Ver. 7 I adjure you, ye daughters of Jerusalem,
By the gazelles or the hinds of the field,
That ye arouse not and disturb not love
Till she pleasea.

It is permitted to the Israelites to swear, אֲשַׁבֵּן, only by God (Gen. xxi. 23); but to adjure, אֲשַׁבֵּן, by that which is not God, is also admissible, although this example before us is perhaps the only kills in Arabia, European and native physicians have assured me; and I myself can confirm the fact. Since it frequently produces a stiffening of the limbs, with chronic lameness, every kind of paralysis is called ro'û, and every paralytic mar'ûb. It is treated medically by applying the ‘terror-cup’ (qâset er-ro'ûb), covered over with sentences engraved on it, and hung round with twenty bells; and since, among the Arabians, the influence of the psychical on the physical is stronger and more immediate than with us, the sympathetic cure may have there sometimes positive results.”—Wetstein.

direct one in Scripture. צִבְיָ (= צִבְיָ, dialect. טִבְיָ), fem. צִבְיָה (Aram. טַבְיָה, Acts ix. 36), plur. tsebaim or tsebajim, fem. tsabaōth (according with the pl. of צִבְיָ), softened from tsebajōth, is the name for the gazelle, from the elegance of its form and movements. אֵילָנִים is the connecting form of אֵילָנִים, whose consonantal Yod in the Assy. and Syr. is softened to the diphthong ailuv, ailā; the gen. "of the field," as not distinguishing but describing, belongs to both of the animals, therefore also the first is without the article. אֵ (after the etymon corresponding to the Lat. vel) proceeds, leaving out of view the repetition of this so-called Slumber-Song (iii. 5; cf. viii. 4, as also ii. 9), from the endeavour to give to the adjuration the greatest impression; the expression is varied, for the representations flit from image to image, and the one, wherever possible, is surpassed by the other (vid. at Prov. xxx. 31). Under this verse Hengst. remarks: "The bride would not adjure by the hinds, much more would she adjure by the stags." He supposes that Solomon is here the speaker; but a more worthless proof for this could not be thought of. On the contrary, the adjuration by the gazelles, etc., shows that the speaker here is one whose home is the field and wood; thus also not the poet (Hitz.) nor the queen-mother (Böttch.); neither of whom is ever introduced as speaking. The adjuration is that love should not be disturbed, and therefore it is by the animals that are most lovely and free, which roam through the fields. Zöckler, with whom in this one point Grätz agrees, finds here, after the example of Böttch. and Hitz., the earnest warning against wantonly exciting love in themselves (cf. Lat. irritamenta veneris, irritata voluptas) till God Himself awakens it, and heart finds itself in sympathy with heart. But the circumstances in which Shulamith is placed ill accord with such a general moralizing. The adjuration is repeated, iii. 5, viii. 4, and wherever Shulamith finds herself near her beloved, as she is here in his arms. What lies nearer, then, than that she should guard against a disturbance of this love-ecstasy, which is like a slumber penetrated by delightful dreams? Instead of אֶתְכֶם, אֶתְעִיר, and אֶתְעִירי, should be more exactly the words אֶתְכֶן, אֶתְעִירָה, and אֶתְעִירְנָה; but the gram. distinction of the genera is in Heb. not perfectly developed. We meet also with the very same synallage generis, without this adjuration formula, at v. 8, vii. 1, iv. 2, vi. 8, etc.; it is also elsewhere frequent; but in the Song it perhaps belongs to the foil of the vulgar given to the highly poetic. Thus also in the vulgar Arab. the fem. forms jaktulna, taktulna, corresponding to אֶתְקַטְלְנָה, are fallen out of use. With העיר, expergefacerere, there is connected the idea of an interruption of sleep; with עורר, excitare, the idea, which goes further, of arousing out of sleep, placing in the full activity of awakened life.<sup>1</sup> The one adjuration is, that love should not be awakened out of its sweet dream; the other, that it should not be disturbed from its being absorbed in itself. The Pasek between תעיר and the word following has, as at Lev. x. 6, the design of keeping the two Vavs distinct, that in reading they might not run together; it is the Pasek which, as Ben Asher says, serves "to secure to a letter its independence against the similar one standing next it." הַאֲהִיבָה is not abstr. pro concreto, but love itself in its giving and receiving. Thus closes the second scene of the first act: Shulamith lies like one helpless in the arms of Solomon; but in him to expire is her life; to have lost herself in him, and in him to find herself again, is her happiness.

SECOND ACT.

THE MUTUAL SEEKING AND FINDING OF THE LOVERS.—

CHAP. II. 8-III. 5.

FIRST SCENE OF THE SECOND ACT, II. 8-17.

With ii. 8 the second act begins. The so-called slumber-song (iii. 5) closes it, as it did the first act; and also the refrain-like summons to hasten to the mountains leaves no doubt regarding the close of the first scene. The locality is no longer the royal city. Shulamith, with her love-sickness, is once more at home in the house which she inhabits along with her own friends, of whom she has already (i. 6) named her brothers. This house stands alone among the rocks, and deep in the mountain range; around are the vineyards which the family have planted, and the hill-pastures on which they feed their flocks. She longingly looks out here for her distant lover.

Ver. 8 Hark, my beloved! lo, there he comes!
Springs over the mountains,
Bounds over the hills.

<sup>1</sup> The distinction between these words is well explained by Lewisohn in his Investigationes Linguae (Wilna, 1840), p. 21: "The מעיר את-הישן is satisfied that the sleeper wakes, and it is left to him fully to overcome the influence of sleep; the מעורר, however, arouses him at once from sleepiness, and awakes him to such a degree that he is secured against falling asleep again."

9 My beloved is like a gazelle,
 Or a young one of the harts.
 Lo, there he stands behind our wall!
 He looks through the windows,
 Glances through the lattices.

The word קול, in the expression קול יודי, is to be understood of the call of the approaching lover (Böttch.), or only of the sound of his footsteps (Hitz.); it is an interjectional clause (sound of my beloved!), in which kōl becomes an interjection almost the same as our "horch" ["hear!"]. Vid. under Gen. iv. 10. הַיָּה after הַיָּה sharpens it, as the demonstr. ce in ecce = en ce. אֶפֶס is thought of as partic., as is evident from the accenting of the fem. אֶפֶסָה, e.g. Jer. x. 22. אֶפֶס is the usual word for springing; the parallel אֶפֶסָה (אֶפֶסָה), Aram. אֶפֶסָה, אֶפֶסָה, signifies properly contrahere (cogn. אֶפֶסָה, whence Kametz, the drawing together of the mouth, more accurately, of the muscles of the lips), particularly to draw the body together, to prepare it for a spring. In the same manner, at the present day, both in the city and in the Beduin Arab. kamaz, for which also famaz, is used of the springing of a gazelle, which consists in a tossing up of the legs stretched out perpendicularly. 'Antar says similarly, as Shulamith here of the swift-footed schébûb (D. M. Zeitung, xxii. 362): wahu jégmiz gamazât el-jazâl, it leaps away with the springing of a gazelle.

The figure used in ver. 8 is continued in ver. 9. אֶפֶסָה is the gazelle, which is thus designated after its Arab. name ghazâl, which has reached us probably through the Moorish-Spanish gazela (distinct from "ghasele," after the Pers. ghazal, love-poem). אֶפֶסָה is the young hart, like the Arab. ghufar (ghafar), the young chamois, probably from the covering of young hair; whence also the young lion may be called אֶפֶסָה. Regarding the effect of אֶפֶסָה passing from one figure to another, vid. under ii. 7a. The meaning would be plainer were ver. 9a joined to ver. 8, for the figures illustrate quick-footed speed (2 Sam. ii. 18; 1 Chron. xii. 8; cf. Ps. xviii. 34 with Hab. iii. 19 and Isa. xxxv. 6). In ver. 9b he comes with the speed of the gazelle, and his eyes seek for the unforgotten one. אֶפֶסָה (from אֶפֶסָה, compingere, condensare; whence, e.g., Arab. mukattal, pressed together, rounded, ramassé; vid. regarding R. כַּת at Ps. lxxxvii. 6), Aram. אֶפֶסָה (Josh. ii. 15; Targ. word for אֶפֶסָה), is meant of the wall of the house itself, not of the wall surrounding it. Shulamith is within, in the house: her beloved, standing behind the wall, stands without, before the house (Tympe: ad latus aversum parietis, viz. out from it), and looks through the windows,—at one time through this one, at another through that one,—that he might see her and feast his eyes on her. We have here two verbs from the fulness of Heb. synon. for one idea of seeing. הִצִּיץ, from צָצַץ, occurring only three times in the O. T., refers, in respect of the roots צָצַץ, צָרַץ, צָרַץ, to the idea of piercing or splitting (whence also צָרַץ, to be furious, properly pierced, percitum esse; cf. oestrus, sting of a gadfly = madness, Arab. transferred to hardness = madness), and means fixing by reflection and meditation; wherefore הִצִּיץ in post-bibl. Heb. is the name for Divine Providence. הִצִּיץ, elsewhere to twinkle and to bloom, appears only here in the sense of seeing, and that of the quick darting forward of the glance of the eye, as blick [glance] and blitz [lightning] (blic) are one word; “he saw,” says Goethe in Werther, “the glance of the powder” (Weigand).<sup>1</sup> The plur. fenestras and transennas are to be understood also as synechdoche totius pro parte, which is the same as the plur. of categ.; but with equal correctness we conceive of him as changing his standing place. חַלּוֹן is the window, as an opening in the wall, from חָלַל, perforare. חַרְכִּים we combine most certainly (vid. Prov. xii. 27) with (Arab.) khark, fissura, so that the idea presents itself of the window broken through the wall, or as itself broken through; for the window in the country there consists for the most part of a pierced wooden frame of a transparent nature,—not (as one would erroneously conclude, from the most significant name of a window שֻׁבְבָכָה, now schubbáke, from שָׁבַץ, to twist, to lattice, to close after the manner of our Venetian blinds) of rods or boards laid crosswise. הִצִּיץ accords with the looking out through the pierced places of such a window, for the glances of his eye are like the penetrating rays of light.

When now Shulamith continues :

Ver. 10a My beloved answered and said to me,
Arise, my love, my fair one, and go forth !

the words show that this first scene is not immediately dramatic, but only mediately; for Shulamith speaks in monologue, though in a dramatic manner narrating an event which occurred between the commencement of their love-relation and her home-bringing.<sup>2</sup> She does not relate it as a dream, and thus it is not one. Solomon

<sup>2</sup> Grätz misinterprets this in order by the supplement of similar ones to make the whole poem a chain of narrative which Shulamith declaims to the daughters of Jerusalem. Thereby it certainly ceases to be dramatic, but so much more tedious does it become by these interposed expressions, “I said,” “he said,” “the sons of my mother said.”

again once more passes, perhaps on a hunting expedition into the northern mountains after the winter with its rains, which made them inaccessible, is over; and after long waiting, Shulamith at length again sees him, and he invites her to enjoy with him the spring season. עָנָה signifies, like ἀποκρίνεσθαι, not always to answer to the words of another, but also to speak on the occasion of a person appearing before one; it is different from עָנָה, the same in sound, which signifies to sing, properly to sing through the nose, and has the root-meaning of replying (of the same root as נָעַן, clouds, as that which meets us when we look up toward the heavens); but taking speech in hand in consequence of an impression received is equivalent to an answer. With קִימִי he calls upon her to raise herself from her stupor, and with אֲבִי־לִי, French va-t-en, to follow him.

Ver. 11 For, lo! the winter is past,

The rain is over, is gone.

12 The flowers appear in the land;

The time of song has come,

And the voice of the turtle makes itself heard in our land.

13 The fig-tree spices her green figs,

And the vines stand in bloom, they diffuse fragrance;—

Rise up, my love, my fair one, and go forth!

The winter is called קָטָה, perhaps from a verb קָטָה (of the same root as קָתַם, קָתַם, without any example, since קָתַת, Gen. xlix. 11, is certainly not derived from a verb קָתַת), to conceal, to veil, as the time of being overcast with clouds, for in the East winter is the rainy season; (Arab.) shataā is also used in the sense of rain itself (vid. D. M. Zeitsch. xx. 618); and in the present day in Jerusalem, in the language of the people, no other name is used for rain but shataā (not metar). The word קָתַי, which the Keri substitutes, only means that one must not read קָתַי, but קָתַי with long a; in the same way עָנָי, humble, from עָנָה, to be bowed down, and שָׁלִי, a quail, from שָׁלָה, to be fat, are formed and written. Rain is here, however, especially mentioned: it is called gëshem, from gāshēm, to be thick, massy (cf. revivim, of density). With עָבַר, to pass by, there is interchanged קָלַף, which, like (Arab.) khalaḥ, means properly to press on, and then generally to move to another place, and thus to remove from the place hitherto occupied. In הִלֵּךְ לִי, with the dat. ethicus, which throws back the action on the subject, the winter rain is thought of as a person who has passed by. נִצֵּן, with the noun-ending ān, is the same as נִצָּן, and signifies the flower, as the latter the flower-month, floréal; in the use of the word, נִצֵּן is related to נִצַּח and נִצְחָה, probably as little flower is to flower. In hāzzāmīr the idea of the song of birds (Arab. gharad) appears, and this is not to be given up. The LXX., Aquila, Symm., Targ., Jerome, and the Venet. translate tempus putationis: the time of the pruning of vines, which indeed corresponds to the usus loq. (cf. זָמַר, to prune the vine, and מְזַמְרֵה, a pruning-knife), and to similar names, such as אֶסְפִּיף [ingathering of fruit], but supplies no reason for her being invited out into the open fields, and is on this account improbable, because the poet further on speaks for the first time of vines. זָמַר (זִמְרָה) is an onomatopoeia, which for the most part denotes song and music; why should זָמַר thus not be able to denote singing, like זִמְרָה!—but not, at least not in this passage, the singing of men (Hengst.), for they are not silent in winter; but the singing of birds, which is truly a sign of the spring, and as a characteristic feature, is added<sup>1</sup> to this lovely picture of spring? Thus there is also suitably added the mention of the turtle-dove, which is a bird of passage (vid. Jer. viii. 7), and therefore a messenger of spring. נִשְׁמַע is 3d pret.: it makes itself heard.

The description of spring is finished by a reference to the fig-tree and the vine, the standing attributes of a prosperous and peaceful homestead, 1 Kings v. 5; 2 Kings xviii. 31. פֵּי (from פִּנְיָה, and thus named, not from their hardness, but their delicacy) are the little fruits of the fig-tree which now, when the harvest-rains are over, and the spring commences with the equinox of Nisan, already begin to assume a red colour; the verb הִנְיָה does not mean “to grow into a bulb,” as Böttch. imagines; it has only the two meanings, condire (condiri, post-bibl. syn. of בָּשַׁל) and rubescere. From its colour, wheat has the name הַפְּיָה = הַנְּיָה; and here also the idea of colour has the preference, for becoming fragrant does not occur in spring,—in the history of the cursing of the fig-tree at the time of the Passover, Mark (xi. 13) says, “for the time of figs was not yet.” In fig-trees, by this time the green of the fruit-formation changes its colour, and the vines are פִּטְוֵר, blossom, i.e. are in a state of bloom (LXX. καυρήζουσαι; cf. vii. 13, καυρισμός)—it is a clause such as Ex. ix. 31, and to which “they diffuse fragrance” (ver. 13) is parallel. This word פִּטְוֵר is usually regarded as a compound word, consisting of פֶּט, scent, and הִרְרָה, brightness = blossom (vid. Gesen. Thes.); it is undeniable that there are such compound formations, e.g. שִׁלְיָנָה, from שָׁלַח and אָנָה; חִלְמִישׁ, from (Arab.) hams, to be hard, and hals, to be dark-brown.<sup>2</sup> But the

<sup>2</sup> In like manner as (Arab.) karbsh, corrugare, is formed of karb, to string, and karsh, to wrinkle, combined; and another extension of karsh is kurnash, wrinkles, and mukarnash, wrinkled. “One day,” said Wetstein to me, “I asked an traditional reading סָמְרָר (not סָמְרָר) is unfavourable to this view; the middle ā accordingly, as in צִלְצֵל, presents itself as an ante-tone vowel (Ewald, § 154*a*), and the stem-word appears as a quadril. which may be the expansion of סָרָר, to range, put in order in the sense of placing asunder, unfolding. Symm. renders the word by οὐράνθη, and the Talm. idiom shows that not only the green five-leaved blossoms of the vine were so named, but also the fruit-buds and the first shoots of the grapes. Here, as the words “they diffuse fragrance” (as at vii. 14 of the mandrakes) show, the vine-blossom is meant which fills the vineyard with an incomparably delicate fragrance. At the close of the invitation to enjoy the spring, the call “Rise up,” etc., with which it began, is repeated. The Chethib לְבִי, if not an error in writing, justly set aside by the Keri, is to be read לְבִי (cf. Syr. bechi, in thee, l'votchi, to thee, but with occult i)—a North Palestinism for לְבִי, like 2 Kings iv. 2, where the Keri has substituted the usual form (vid. under Ps. ciii. introd.) for this very dialectic form, which is there undoubtedly original.

Ver. 14. Solomon further relates how he drew her to himself out of her retirement:

My dove in the clefts of the rock,
In the hiding-place of the cliff;
Let me see thy countenance,
Let me hear thy voice!
For thy voice is sweet and thy countenance comely.

“Dove” (for which Castello, columbula, like vulticulum, voculam) is a name of endearment which Shulamith shares with the church of God, Ps. lxxiv. 19; cf. lvi. 1; Hos. vii. 11. The wood-pigeon builds its nest in the clefts of the rocks and other steep rocky places, Jer. xlvi. 28.<sup>1</sup> That Shulamith is thus here named, shows that, far removed from intercourse with the world, her home was among the mountains. חֲנִיָּהּ, from חָנַן, or also חָנַן, requires a verb חָנַן = (Arab.)

Arab the origin of the word karnasa, to wrinkle, and he replied that it was derived from a sheep's stomach that had lain over night, i.e. the stomach of a slaughtered sheep that had lain over night, by which its smooth surface shrinks together and becomes wrinkled. In fact, we say of a wrinkled countenance that it is mathal alkarash albayt.” With right Wetstein gathers from this curious fact how difficult it is to ascertain by purely etymological considerations the view which guided the Semites in this or that designation. Samdor is also a strange word; on the one side it is connected with sadr, of the veiling of the eyes, as the effect of terror; and on the other with samd, of stretching oneself straight out. E. Meier takes סָמְרָר as the name of the vine-blossom, as changed from סָמְרָר, bristling. Just as unlikely as that סָמְרָר is cogn. to חָסַר, Jesurun, p. 221.

khajja, findere. מַלְעָ, as a Himyar. lexicographer defines it, is a cleft into the mountains after the nature of a defile; with צִוִּיר, only the ideas of inaccessibility and remoteness are connected; with סִלְעָ, those of a secure hiding-place, and, indeed, a convenient, pleasant residence. מַרְרִינָה is the stairs; here the rocky stairs, as the two chalk-cliffs on the Rügen, which sink perpendicularly to the sea, are called "Stubbenkammer," a corruption of the Slavonic Stupnykamen, i.e. the Stair-Rock. "Let me see," said he, as he called upon her with enticing words, "thy countenance;" and adds this as a reason, "for thy countenance is lovely." The word מַרְאִיָּה, thus pointed, is sing.; the Jod otians is the third root letter of מַרְאִי, retained only for the sake of the eye. It is incorrect to conclude from ashrēch, in Eccles. x. 17, that the ech may be also the plur. suff., which it can as little be as ēhu in Prov. xxix. 18; in both cases the sing. ēshēr has substituted itself for ashrē. But, inversely, mārāich cannot be sing.; for the sing. is simply marēch. Also mārāv, Job xli. 1, is not sing.: the sing. is marēhu, Job iv. 16; Song v. 15. On the other hand, the determination of such forms as מַרְאִיָּה, מַרְאִיָּי, is difficult: these forms may be sing. as well as plur. In the passage before us, מַרְאִים is just such a non-numer. plur. as פְּנִים. But while panīm is an extensive plur., as Böttcher calls it: the countenance, in its extension and the totality of its parts,—marīm, like marōth, vision, a stately term, Ex. xl. 2 (vid. Dietrich's Abhand. p. 19), is an amplificative plur.: the countenance, on the side of its fulness of beauty and its overpowering impression.

There now follows a cantiuncula. Shulamith comes forward, and, singing, salutes her beloved. Their love shall celebrate a new spring. Thus she wishes everything removed, or rendered harmless, that would disturb the peace of this love:

- Ver. 15 Catch us the foxes, the little foxes,
 The spoilers of the vineyards;
 For our vineyards are in bloom!
 16 My beloved is mine, and I am his;
 Who feeds [his flock] among the lilies.

If the king is now, on this visit of the beloved, engaged in hunting, the call: "Catch us," etc., if it is directed at all to any definite persons, is addressed to those who follow him. But this is a vine-dresser's ditty, in accord with Shulamith's experience as the keeper pigeon-tower, περισσρεῖῶνα, it builds its nest in the hollows of rocky precipices, or in the walls of deep and wide fountains." See also his Nord-arabien, p. 58: "A number of scarcely accessible mountains in Arabia are called alkunnat, a rock-nest."

of a vineyard, which, in a figure, aims at her love-relation. The vineyards, beautiful with fragrant blossom, point to her covenant of love; and the foxes, the little foxes, which might destroy these united vineyards, point to all the great and little enemies and adverse circumstances which threaten to gnaw and destroy love in the blossom, ere it has reached the ripeness of full enjoyment. שָׁעִלִּים comprehends both foxes and jackals, which "destroy or injure the vineyards; because, by their holes and passages which they form in the ground, loosening the soil, so that the growth and prosperity of the vine suffers injury" (Hitzig). This word is from שָׁעַל (R. של), to go down, or into the depth. The little foxes are perhaps the jackals, which are called tānnīm, from their extended form, and in height are seldom more than fifteen inches. The word "jackal" has nothing to do with שָׁעִל, but is the Persian-Turkish shaghal, which comes from the Sanscr. ergāla, the howler (R. krag, like kap-āla, the skull; R. kap, to be arched). Moreover, the mention of the foxes naturally follows 14a, for they are at home among rocky ravines. Hitzig supposes Shulamith to address the foxes: hold for us = wait, ye rascals! But אָחִיר, Aram. אָחִיר, does not signify to wait, but to seize or lay hold of (synon. לָכַד, Judg. xv. 4), as the lion its prey, Isa. v. 29. And the plur. of address is explained from its being made to the king's retinue, or to all who could and would give help. Fox-hunting is still, and has been from old times, a sport of rich landowners; and that the smaller landowners also sought to free themselves from them by means of snares or otherwise, is a matter of course,—they are proverbially as destroyers, Neh. iii. 35 [iv. 3], and therefore a figure of the false prophets, Ezek. xiii. 4. מַחֲבֵלֵי הַבְּרִית' are here instead of מַחֲבֵלֵי הַבְּרִית'. The articles are generally omitted, because poetry is not fond of the article, where, as here (cf. on the other hand, i. 6), the thoughts and language permit it; and the fivefold im is an intentional mere verborum sonus. The clause וַיִּכְרֶה סִמְרֵר is an explanatory one, as appears from the Vav and the subj. preceding, as well as from the want of a finitum. סִמְרֵר maintains here also, in pausa, the sharpening of the final syllable, as הִצִּי, Deut. xxviii. 42.

The 16th verse is connected with the 15th. Shulamith, in the pentast. song, celebrates her love-relation; for the praise of it extends into ver. 15, is continued in ver. 16, and not till ver. 17 does she address her beloved. Luther translates:

My beloved is mine, and I am his;
He feeds [his flock] among the roses.

He has here also changed the "lilies" of the Vulgate into "roses;" for of the two queens among the flowers, he gave the preference to the popular and common rose ; besides, he rightly does not translate הִרְעִיהָ, in the mid. after the pascitur inter lilia of the Vulgate : who feeds himself, i.e. pleases himself ; for רעה has this meaning only when the object expressly follows, and it is evident that רֵעוּ cannot possibly be this object, after Gen. xxxvii. 2,—the object is thus to be supplied. And which ? Without doubt, gregem ; and if Heiligst., with the advocates of the shepherd-hypothesis, understands this feeding (of the flock) among the lilies, of feeding on a flowery meadow, nothing can be said against it. But at vi. 2 f., where this saying of Shulamith is repeated, she says that her beloved יִבְרַח feeds and gathers lilies. On this the literal interpretation of the qui pascit (gregem) inter lilia is wrecked ; for a shepherd, such as the shepherd-hypothesis supposes, were he to feed his flock in a garden, would be nothing better than a thief ; such shepherds, also, do not concern themselves with the plucking of flowers, but spend their time in knitting stockings. It is Solomon, the king, of whom Shulamith speaks. She represents him to herself as a shepherd ; but in such a manner that, at the same time, she describes his actions in language which rises above ordinary shepherd-life, and, so to speak, idealizes. She, who was herself a shepherdess, knows from her own circle of thought nothing more lovely or more honourable to conceive and to say of him, than that he is a shepherd who feeds among lilies. The locality and the surroundings of his daily work correspond to his nature, which is altogether beauty and love. Lilies, the emblem of unapproachable highness, awe-inspiring purity, lofty elevation above what is common, bloom where the lily-like (king) wanders, whom the Lily names her own. The mystic interpretation and mode of speaking takes “lilies” as the figurative name of holy souls, and a lily-stalk as the symbol of the life of regeneration. Mary, who is celebrated in song as the rosa mystica, is rightly represented in ancient pictures with a lily in her hand on the occasion of the Annunciation ; for if the people of God are called by Jewish poets “a people of lilies,” she is, within this lily-community, this communio sanctorum, the lily without a parallel.

Shulamith now further relates, in a dramatic, lively manner, what she said to her beloved after she had saluted him in a song :

Ver. 17 Till the day cools and the shadows flee away,
 Turn ; make haste, my beloved,
 Like a gazelle or a young one of the hinds
 On the craggy mountains.

With the perf., עָרַף (cf. עָרַף, Gen. xxiv. 33) signifies, till something is done ; with the fut., till something will be done. Thus : till the evening comes—and, therefore, before it comes—may he do what she requires of him. Most interpreters explain כב, verte te, with the supplement ad me; according to which Jerome, Castell., and others translate by revertere. But Ps. lxxi. 21 does not warrant this rendering; and if Shulamith has her beloved before her, then by כב she can only point him away from herself; the parall. viii. 14 has פרה instead of כב, which consequently means, “turn thyself from here away.” Rather we may suppose, as I explained in 1851, that she holds him in her embrace, as she says, and, inseparable from him, will wander with him upon the mountains. But neither that ad me nor this mecum should have been here (cf. on the contrary viii. 14) unexpressed. We hold by what is written. Solomon surprises Shulamith, and invites her to enjoy with him the spring-time; not alone, because he is on a hunting expedition, and—as denoted by “catch us” (ver. 15)—with a retinue of followers. She knows that the king has not now time to wander at leisure with her; and therefore she asks him to set forward his work for the day, and to make haste on the mountains till “the day cools and the shadows flee.” Then she will expect him back; then in the evening she will spend the time with him as he promised her. The verb פרה, with the guttural letter Hheth and the labial Pe, signifies spirare, here of being able to be breathed, i.e. cool, like the expression ריה ה, Gen. iii. 8 (where the guttural Hheth is connected with Rzsh). The shadows flee away, when they become longer and longer, as if on a flight, when they stretch out (Ps. cix. 23, cii. 12) and gradually disappear. Till that takes place—or, as we say, will be done—he shall hasten with the swiftness of a gazelle on the mountains, and that on the mountains of separation, i.e. the riven mountains, which thus present hindrances, but which he, the “swift as the gazelle” (vid. ii. 9), easily overcomes. Rightly, Bochart: montes scissionis, ita dicti propter, ῥωχμούς et χάσματα. Also, Luther’s “Scheideberge” are “mountains with peaks, from one of which to the other one must spring.” We must not here think of Bithron (2 Sam. ii. 29), for that is a mountain ravine on the east of Jordan; nor of Bar-Cochba’s ביתר (Kirschbaum, Landau), because this mountain (whether it be sought for to the south of Jerusalem or to the north of Antipatris) ought properly to be named ביתר (vid. Aruch). It is worthy of observation, that in an Assyrian list of the names of animals, along with šabi (gazelle) and apparu (the young of the gazelle or of the hind), the name bitru occurs, perhaps the name of the rupicapra. At the close of the song, the expression “mountain of spices” occurs instead of “mountain of separation,” as here. There no more hindrances to be overcome lie in view, the rock-cliffs have become fragrant flowers. The request here made by Shulamith breathes self-denying humility, patient modesty, inward joy in the joy of her beloved. She will not claim him for herself till he has accomplished his work. But when he associates with her in the evening, as with the Emmaus disciples, she will rejoice if he becomes her guide through the new-born world of spring. The whole scene permits, yea, moves us to think of this, that the Lord already even now visits the church which loves Him, and reveals Himself to her; but that not till the evening of the world is His parousia to be expected.

SECOND SCENE OF THE SECOND ACT, III. 1-5.

In the first scene, Shulamith relates what externally happened to her one day when the evening approached. In this second scene, she now relates what she inwardly experienced when the night came. She does not indeed say that she dreamed it; but that it is a dream is seen from this, that that which is related cannot be represented as an external reality. But it at once appears as an occurrence that took place during sleep.

Chap. iii. 1 On my bed in the nights
I sought him whom my soul loveth:
I sought him, and found him not.

She does not mean to say that she sought him beside herself on her couch; for how could that be of the modest one, whose home-bringing is first described in the next act—she could and might miss him there neither waking nor sleeping. The commencement is like Job xxxiii. 15. She was at night on her couch, when a painful longing seized her: the beloved of her soul appeared to have forsaken her, to have withdrawn from her; she had lost the feeling of his nearness, and was not able to recover it. לילית is neither here nor at iii. 8 necessarily the categ. plur. The meaning may also be, that this pain, arising from a sense of being forgotten, always returned upon her for several nights through: she became distrustful of his fidelity; but the more she apprehended that she was no longer loved, the more ardent became her longing, and she arose to seek for him who had disappeared.

Ver. 2 So I will arise, then, and go about the city,
The markets, and the streets;
I will seek him whom my soul loveth!—
I sought him, and found him not.

How could this night-search, with all the strength of love, be consistent with the modesty of a maiden? It is thus a dream which she relates. And if the beloved of her soul were a shepherd, would she seek him in the city, and not rather without, in the field or in some village? No; the beloved of her soul is Solomon; and in the dream, Jerusalem, his city, is transported close to the mountains of her native home. The resolution expressed by "I will arise, then," is not introduced by "then I said," or any similar phrase: the scene consists of a monologue which dramatically represents that which is experienced. Regarding the second Chatef-Pathach of 'אָמַן, vid. Baer's Genesis, p. 7. אֲשֶׁר־יָקִים is the plur. of אֲשֶׁר (= shavk), as אֲשֶׁר־יָרַח of יָרַח (= shavr); the root-word שָׁק (Arab. shak) signifies to press on, to follow after continuously; (Arab.) suwak designates perhaps, originally, the place to which one drives cattle for sale, as in the desert; (Arab.) sawak designates the place to which one drives cattle for drink (Wetzst.). The form אֲשֶׁר־יָקִים is without the Daghesh, as are all the forms of this verb except the imper.; the semi-guttural nature of the Koph has something opposing the simple Sheva.

Shulamith now relates what she further experienced when, impelled by love-sorrow, she wandered through the city:

Ver. 3 The watchmen who go about in the city found me:
 "Have ye seen him whom my soul loveth?"

Here also (as in ver. 2) there is wanting before the question such a phrase as, "and I asked them, saying:" the monologue relates dramatically. If she described an outward experience, then the question would be a foolish one; for how could she suppose that the watchmen, who make their rounds in the city (Epstein, against Grätz, points for the antiquity of the order to Ps. cxxvii. 1; Isa. lxii. 6; cf. xxi. 11), could have any knowledge of her beloved! But if she relates a dream, it is to be remembered that feeling and imagination rise higher than reflection. It is in the very nature of a dream, also, that things thus quickly follow one another without fixed lineaments. This also, that having gone out by night, she found in the streets him whom she sought, is a happy combination of circumstances formed in the dreaming soul; an occurrence without probable external reality, although not without deep inner truth:

Ver. 4 Scarcely had I passed from them,
 When I found him whom my soul loveth.
 I seized him, and did not let him go
 Until I brought him into the house of my mother,
 And into the chamber of her that gave me birth.

פָּקַעַם = paululum, here standing for a sentence: it was as a little that I passed, etc. Without שׁ, it would be paululum transii; with it, paululum fuit quod transii, without any other distinction than that in the latter case the paululum is more emphatic. Since Shulamith relates something experienced earlier, אָזְחוּתִי is not fitly rendered by teneo, but by tenui; and וְלֹא אֶרְפָּנִי, not by et non dimittam eum, but, as the neg. of אֶרְפָּנִי, et dimisi eum,—not merely et non dimittebam eum, but et non dimisi eum. In Gen. xxxii. 27 [26], we read the cogn. שָׁלַח, which signifies, to let go (“let me go”), as הִרְפָּה, to let loose, to let free. It is all the same whether we translate, with the subjective colouring, donec introduxerim, or, with the objective, donec introduxi; in either case the meaning is that she held him fast till she brought him, by gentle violence, into her mother’s house. With בֵּית there is the more definite parallel הִרְרָה, which properly signifies (vid. under i. 4), recessus, penetrare; with אִפְי, the seldom occurring (only, besides, at Hos. ii. 7) הוֹרִיחַ, part. f. Kal of הָרָה, to conceive, be pregnant, which poetically, with the accus., may mean parturire or parere. In Jacob’s blessing, Gen. xlix. 26, as the text lies before us, his parents are called הוֹרֵי; just as in Arab. ummāni, properly “my two mothers,” may be used for “my parents;” in the Lat. also, parentes means father and mother zeugmatically taken together.

The closing words of the monologue are addressed to the daughters of Jerusalem.

Vcr. 5 I adjure you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem,
By the gazelles or the hinds of the field,
That ye awake not and disturb not love
Till she pleases.

We are thus obliged apparently to think of the daughters of Jerusalem as being present during the relation of the dream. But since Shulamith in the following Act is for the first time represented as brought from her home to Jerusalem, it is more probable that she represented her experience to herself in secret, without any auditors, and feasting on the visions of the dream, which brought her beloved so near, that she had him by herself alone and exclusively, that she fell into such a love-ecstasy as ii. 7; and pointing to the distant Jerusalem, deprecates all disturbance of this ecstasy, which in itself is like a slumber pervaded by pleasant dreams. In two monologues dramatically constructed, the poet has presented to us a view of the thoughts and feelings by which the inner life of the maiden was moved in the near prospect of becoming a bride and being married. Whoever reads the Song in the sense in which it is incorporated with the canon, and that, too, in the historical sense fulfilled in the N. T., will not be able to read the two scenes from Shulamith's experience without finding therein a mirror of the intercourse of the soul with God in Christ, and cherishing thoughts such, e.g., as are expressed in the ancient hymn :

*Quando tandem venies, meus amor?
 Propera de Libano, dulcis amor!
 Clamat, amat sponsula: Veni, Jesu, Dulcis veni Jesu!*

THIRD ACT.

THE BRINGING OF THE BRIDE AND THE MARRIAGE. CHAP. III. 6-V. 1.

FIRST SCENE OF THE THIRD ACT, III. 6-11.

In this third Act the longing of the loving one after her beloved is finally appeased. The first scene<sup>1</sup> represents her home-bringing into the royal city. A gorgeous procession which marches towards Jerusalem attracts the attention of the inhabitants of the city.

Ver. 6 Who is this coming up from the wilderness
 Like pillars of smoke,
 Perfumed with myrrh and frankincense,
 With all aromatics of the merchants?

It is possible that זֹהַב and עָנַי may be connected; but זֹהַב, Ps. xxxiv. 7 (this poor man, properly, this, a poor man), is not analogous, it ought to be זֹהַב הָעֵלֶיךָ. Thus zoth will either be closely connected with עָנַי, and make the question sharper and more animated, as is that in Gen. xii. 18, or it will be the subject which then, as in Isa. lxiii. 1, Job xxxviii. 2, cf. below vii. 5b, Jonah iv. 17, Amos ix. 12, is more closely written with indeterminate participles, according to which it is rightly accented. But we do not translate with Heiligst. quid est hoc quod adscendit, for m̄ asks after a person, mā after a thing, and only per attract. does m̄ stand for mā in Gen. xxxiii. 8; Judg. xiii. 17; Mic. i. 5; also not quis est hoc (Vaih.), for zoth after mi has a personal sense, thus: quis (quaenam) haec est. That it is a woman that is being brought forward those who ask know, even if she is yet too far off to be seen by them, because they recognise in the festal gorgeous procession a marriage party. That the company comes up from the wilderness, it may be through the wilderness which separates Jerusalem from Jericho, is in accordance with the fact that a maiden from Galilee is being brought up, and that the procession has taken the way through the Jordan valley (Ghôr); but the scene has also a typical colouring; for the wilderness is, since the time of the Mosaic deliverance out of Egypt, an emblem of the transition from a state of bondage to freedom, from humiliation to glory (vid. under Isa. xl. 3; Hos. i. 16; Ps. lxxviii. 5). The pomp is like that of a procession before which the censer of frankincense is swung. Columns of smoke from the burning incense mark the line of the procession before and after. תִּמְרוֹת (תִּמְרָה) here and at Job iii. (vid. Norzi) is formed, as it appears, from תָּמַר, to strive upwards, a kindred form to תָּמַר; cf. Isa. lxi. 6 with xvii. 6, Ps. xciv. 4; the verb תָּמַר, whence the date-palm receives the name תָּמַר, is a secondary formation, like תָּמַר to תָּמַר. Certainly this form תִּמְרוֹת (cf. on the contrary, תִּמְרוֹת) is not elsewhere to be supported; Schlottm. sees in it תִּמְרוֹת, from תָּמַר; but such an expansion of the word for Dag. dirimens is scarcely to be supposed. This naming of the pillars of smoke is poet., as Jonah iii. 3; cf. "a pillar of smoke," Judg. xx. 40. She who approaches comes from the wilderness, brought up to Jerusalem, placed on an elevation, "like pillars of smoke," i.e. not herself likened thereto, as Schlottm. supposes it must be interpreted (with the tertium comp. of the slender, precious, and lovely), but encompassed and perfumed by such. For her whom the procession brings this lavishing of spices is meant; it is she who is incensed or perfumed with myrrh and frankincense. Schlottm. maintains that מְקַטְרֵת cannot mean anything else than "perfumed," and therefore he reads מְקַטְרֵת (as Aq. ἀπὸ θυμιάματος, and Jerome). But the word mekuttêrêth does not certainly stand alone, but with the genit. foll.; and thus as "rent in their clothes," 2 Sam. xiii. 31, signifies not such as are themselves rent, but those whose clothes are rent (Ewald, § 288b, compare also de Sacy, II. § 321), so מְקַטְרֵת can also mean those for whom (for whose honour) this incense is expended, and who are thus fumigated with it. מֵר, myrrh, (Arab.) murr (vid. above under i. 13), stands also in Ex. xxx. 23 and Ps. xlv. 9 at the head of the perfumes; it came from Arabia, as did also frankincense levōnā, Arab. lubân (later referred to benzoin); both of the names are Semitic, and the circumstance that the Tōra required myrrh as a component part of the holy oil, Ex. xxx. 23, and frankincense as a component part of the holy incense, Ex. xxx. 34, points to Arabia as the source whence they were obtained. To these two principal spices there is added סַבִּל (cf. Gen. vi. 20, ix. 2) as an et cetera. רוֹכֵל denotes the travelling spice merchants (traders in aromatics), and traders generally. מִנְקָה, which is related to מִנְקָה as powder to dust (cf. abacus, a reckoning-table, so named from the sand by means of which arithmetical numbers were reckoned), is the name designating single drugs (i.e. dry wares; cf. the Arab. elixir = ξηρόν).

The description of the palanquin now following, one easily attributes to another voice from the midst of the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

Ver. 7 Lo! Solomon's palanquin, Threescore heroes are around it,
Of the heroes of Israel,
8 All of them armed with the sword, expert in war.
Each with his sword on his thigh,
Against fear in the nights.

Since מִנְקָה, 9a, is not by itself a word clearly intelligible, so as to lead us fully to determine what is here meant by מִנְקָה as distinguished from it, we must let the connection determine. We have before us a figure of that which is called in the post-bibl. Heb. הַכִּנְסָה בְּלֵה (the bringing-home of the bride). The bridegroom either betook himself to her parents' house and fetched his bride thence, which appears to be the idea lying at the foundation of Ps. xlv., if, as we believe, the ivory-palaces are those of the king of Israel's house; or she was brought to him in festal procession, and he went forth to meet her, 1 Macc. ix. 39—the prevailing custom, on which the parable of the ten virgins (Matt. xxv.) is founded.<sup>1</sup> Here the bride comes from a great distance; and the difference in rank between the Galilean maid and the king brings this result, that he does not himself go and fetch her, but that she is brought to him. She comes, not as in old times Rebecca did, riding on a camel, but is carried in a mittā, which is surrounded by an escort for protection and as a mark of honour. Her way certainly led through the wilderness, where it was necessary, by a safe convoy, to provide against the possibility (min in mippahad, cf. Isa. iv. 6, xxv. 4) of being attacked by robbers; whereas it would be more difficult to understand why the marriage-bed in the palace of the king of peace (1 Chron. xxii. 9) should be surrounded by such an armed band for protection. That Solomon took care to have his chosen one brought to him with royal honours, is seen in the lavish expenditure of spices, the smoke and fragrance of which signalized from afar the approach of the procession,—the mittā, which is now described, can be no other than that in which, sitting or reclining, or half sitting, half reclining, she is placed, who is brought to him in such a cloud of incense. Thus mittā (from nāthā, to stretch oneself out), which elsewhere is also used of a bier, 2 Sam. iii. 21 (like the Talm. עַרְס = עָרַשׁ), will here signify a portable bed, a sitting cushion hung round with curtains after the manner of the Indian palanquin, and such as is found on the Turkish caïques or the Venetian gondolas. The appositional nearer definition 'שָׁלֵשׁ, "which belonged to Solomon" (vid. under i. 6*b*), shows that it was a royal palanquin, not one belonging to one of the nobles of the people. The bearers are unnamed persons, regarding whom nothing is said; the sixty heroes form only the guard for safety and for honour (sauvegarde), or the escorte or convoie. The sixty are the tenth part (the élite) of the royal body-guard, 1 Sam. xxvii. 2, xxx. 9, etc. (Schlottm.). If it be asked, Why just 60? we may perhaps not unsuitably reply: The number 60 is here, as at vi. 8, the number of Israel multiplied by 5, the fraction of 10; so that thus 60 distinguished warriors form the half of the escort of a king of Israel. חָרַב אֶת־יָדָיו properly means, held fast by the sword so that it does not let them free, which, according to the sense = holding fast [= practised in the use of the sword]; the Syr. translation of the Apoc. renders παντοκράτωρ by "he who is held by all," i.e. holding it (cf. Ewald, § 149*d*).<sup>1</sup>

Another voice now describes the splendour of the bed of state which Solomon prepared in honour of Shulamith:

- Ver. 9 A bed of state hath King Solomon made for himself
Of the wood of Lebanon.
10 Its pillars hath he made of silver,
Its support of gold, its cushion of purple;
Its interior is adorned from love
By the daughters of Jerusalem.

The sound of the word, the connection and the description, led the Greek translators (the LXX., Venet., and perhaps also others) to render אֶת־יָדָיו by φορέϊον, litter, palanquin (Vulg. ferculum). The appiryon here described has a silver pedestal and a purple cushion—as we read in Athenaeus v. 13 (II. p. 317, ed. Schweigh.) that the philosopher and tyrant Athenion showed himself "on a silver-legged φορείον, with purple coverlet;" and the same author, v. 5 (II. p. 253), also says, that on the occasion of a festal procession by Antiochus Epiphanes, behind 200 women who sprinkled ointments from golden urns came 80 women, sitting in pomp on golden-legged, and 500 on silver-legged, φορεία—this is the proper name for the costly women's-litter (Suidas: φορείον γυναικείον), which, according to the number of bearers (Mart. VI. 77: six Cappadocians and, ix. 2, eight Syrians), was called ἑξάφορον (hexaphorum, Mart. II. 81) or ὀκτώφορον (octophorum, Cicero's Verr. v. 10). The Mishna, Sota ix. 14, uses appiryon in the sense of phoreion: "in the last war (that of Hadrian) it was decreed that a bride should not pass through the town in an appiryon [on account of the danger], but our Rabbis sanctioned it later [for modesty's sake];" as here, "to be carried in an appiryon," so in Greek, προίεναι (καταστείχειν) ἐν φορείῳ. In the Midrash also, Bamidbar rabba c. 12, and elsewhere, appiryon of this passage before us is taken in all sorts of allegorical significations, in most of which the identity of the word with φορείον is supposed, which is also there written פִּירְיוֹן (after Aruch), cf. Isa. xlix. 22, Targ., and is once interchanged with פִּילִיּוֹן, papilio (pavillon), pleasure-tent. But a Greek word in the Song is in itself so improbable, that Ewald describes this derivation of the word as a frivolous jest; so much the more improbable, as φορείον as the name of a litter (lectica) occurs first in such authors (of the κοινή) as Plutarch, Polybius, Herodian, and the like, and therefore, with greater right, it may be supposed that it is originally a Semitic word, which the Greek language adopted at the time when the Oriental and Graeco-Roman customs began to be amalgamated. Hence, if mittā, ἡ, means a portable bed,—as is evident from this, that it appears as the means of transport with an escort,—then appiryon cannot also mean a litter; the description, moreover, does not accord with a litter. We do not read of rings and carrying-poles, but, on the contrary, of pillars (as those of a tent-bed) instead, and, as might be expected, of feet. Schlottm., however, takes mittā and appiryon as different names for a portable bed; but the words, "an appiryon has King Solomon made," etc., certainly indicate that he who thus speaks has not the appiryon before him, and also that this was something different from the mittā. While Schlottm. is inclined to take appiryon, in the sense of a litter, as a word borrowed from the Greek (but in the time of the first king?), Gesen. in his Thes. seeks to derive it, thus understood, from פִּירְיוֹן, cito ferri, currere; but this signification of the verb is imaginary. We expect here, in accordance with the progress of the scene, the name of the bridal couch: and on the supposition that appiryon, Sota 12a, as in the Mishna, means the litter (Aruch) of the bride, Arab. maziffat, and not torus nuptialis (Buxt.), then there is a possibility that appiryon is a more dignified word for 'eres, i. 17, yet sufficient thereby to show that פִּירְיָא is the usual Talm. name of the marriage-bed (e.g. Mezia 23b, where it stands, per meton., for concupitus), which is wittily explained by שְׁפָרָן וּרְבִין עָלֶיהָ (Kethuboth 10b, and elsewhere). The Targ. has for it the form פִּירְיָן (vid. Levy). It thus designates a bed with a canopy (a tent-bed), Deut. xxxii. 50, Jerus; so that the ideas of the bed of state and the palanquin (cf. בִּילָה, canopy, and בִּילַת הַתְּנִים, bridal-bed, Succa 11a) touch one another. In general, פּוּרְיָא (פּוּרְיָן), as is also the case with appiryon, must have been originally a common designation of certain household furniture with a common characteristic; for the Syr. parautha, plur. parjevatha (Wiseman's Horae, p. 255), or also parha (Castell), signifies a cradle. It is then to be inquired, whether this word is referable to a root-word which gives a common characteristic with manifold applications. But the Heb. פָּרָה from the R. פָּר, signifies to split,<sup>1</sup> to tear asunder, to break forth, to bring fruit, to be fruitful, and nothing further. Pārā has nowhere the signification to run, as already remarked; only in the Palest.-Aram. פִּירְיָא is found in this meaning (vid. Buxt.). The Arab. farr does not signify to run, but to flee; properly (like our "ausreissen" = to tear out, to break out), to break open by flight the rank in which one stands (as otherwise turned by horse-dealers: to open wide the horse's mouth). But, moreover, we do not thus reach the common characteristic which we are in search of; for if we may say of the litter that it runs, yet we cannot say that of a bed or a cradle, etc. The Arab. farfār, species vehiculi muliebris, also does not help us; for the verb farfar, to vacillate, to shake, is its appropriate root-word.<sup>2</sup> With better results shall we compare the Arab. fary, which, in Kal and Hiph., signifies to break open, to cut out (couper, tailler une étoffe), and also, figuratively, to bring forth something strange, something not yet existing (yafry alfaryya, according to the Arab. Lex. = yaty bal'ajab fy 'amalh, he accomplishes something wonderful); the primary meaning in Conj. viii. is evidently: yftarra kidban, to cut out lies, to meditate and to express that which is calumnious (a similar metaphor to khar'a, findere, viii. findere, to cut out something in the imagination; French, inventer, imaginer). With this fary, however, we do not immediately reach אַפְרִיּוֹן, אַפְרִיָּא; for fary, as well as fara (farw), are used only of cutting to pieces, cutting out, sewing together of leather and other materials (cf. Arab. farwat, fur; farrā, furrier), but not of cutting and preparing wood. But why should not the Semitic language have used פָּרָה, פָּרָא, also, in the sense of the verb פָּרַח, which signifies<sup>1</sup> to cut and hew, in the sense of forming (cf. Pih. פָּרַח, sculperere, Ezek. xxi. 24), as in the Arab. bara and bary, according to Lane, mean, "be formed or fashioned by cutting (a writing-reed, stick, bow), shaped out, or pared,"—in other words: Why should פָּרָה, used in the Arab. of the cutting of leather, not be used, in the Heb. and Aram., of the preparing of wood, and thus of the fashioning of a bed or carriage? As חֲשָׁבוֹן signifies a machine, and that the work of an engineer, so פְּרִיִּתִּים signifies timber-work, carpenter-work, and, lengthened especially by Aleph prosthet., a product of the carpenter's art, a bed of state. The Aleph prosth. would indeed favour the supposition that appiryon is a foreign word; for the Semitic language frequently forms words after this manner,—e.g. אֲמַנְשֵׁא, a magician; אֲסַתְרָא, a stater.<sup>2</sup> But apart from such words as אֲנִרְטָל, oddly sounding in accord with κάρταλλος as appiryon with φορείον, אֲבַעְבְּעָה and אֲבַכְבִּיָּה are examples of genuine Heb. words with such a prosthesis, i.e. an Aleph added at the beginning of the word; not a formative Aleph, as in אֲכֹזֵב and the like. אֲפַרְזֵן, palace, Dan. xi. 45, is, for its closer amalgamation by means of Dag., at least an analogous example; for thus it stands related to the Syr. opadna, as, e.g. (Syr.), oparsons, net, Ewald, § 163c, to the Jewish-Aram. אֲפַרְסָנָא or אֲפַרְסָנָא; cf. also אֲפַתָּם, "finally," in relation to the Pehl. אֲפַרְדִּים (Spiegel's Literatur der Parsen, p. 356).<sup>3</sup> We think we have thus proved that אַפְרִיּוֹן is a Heb. word, which, coming from the verb פָּרַח, to cut right, to make, frame, signifies<sup>4</sup> a bed, and that, as Ewald also renders, a bed of state.

<sup>4</sup> This derivation explains how it comes that appiryon can mean, in the Karaite Heb., a bird-cage or aviary, vid. Gottlob's בְּקֵרֶת מ' ב, p. 208. We have left out of view the phrase אֲפַרְיִן נִמְטָי לִיָּה, which, in common use, means: we present

רִפְיָה (from רָפַר, R. רָפַ, to lift from beneath, sublevare, then sternere) is the head of the bed; LXX. ἀνάκλιτον; Jerome, reclinatorium, which, according to Isidore, is the Lat. vulgar name for the fulchra, the reclining (of the head and foot) of the bedstead. Schlottmann here involuntarily bears testimony that appiryon may at least be understood of a bed of state as well as of a litter of state; for he remarks: "The four sides of the bed were generally adorned with carved work, ivory, metal, or also, as in the case of most of the Oriental divans, with drapery." "Nec mihi tunc," says Propertius, ii. 10, 11, "fulcro lectus sternatur eburno." Here the fulcrum is not of ivory, but of gold.

מְרִכָּב (from רָכַב, to lie upon anything; Arab. II. componere; Aethiop. adipisci) is that which one takes possession of, sitting or lying upon it, the cushion, e.g. of a saddle (Lev. xv. 9); here, the divan (vid. Lane, Mod. Egypt, I. 10) arranged on an elevated frame, serving both as a seat and as a couch. Red purple is called מְרִכָּבָא, probably from רָכַם = רָקַם, as material of variegated colour. By the interior חוּף of the bed, is probably meant a covering which lay above this cushion. רָצַף, to arrange together, to combine (whence רָצֵף, pavement; Arab. rusafat, a paved way), is here meant like στορέννυμι, στόρνυμι, στρώννυμι, whence στρώμα. And רָצִיף אֹהֶב is not equivalent to רָצִיף אֹהֶב (after the construction 1 Kings xxii. 10; Ezek. ix. 2), inlaid with love, but is the adv. accus. of the manner; "love" (cf. hhesed, Ps. cxli. 5) denotes the motive: laid out or made up as a bed from love on the part of the daughters of Jerusalem, i.e. the ladies of the palace—these from love to the king have procured a costly tapestry or tapestries, which they have spread over the purple cushion. Thus rightly Vaihinger in his Comm., and Merx, Archiv. Bd. II. 111–114. Schlottmann finds this interpretation of כָּן "stiff and hard;" but although כָּן in the pass. is not used like the Greek ὑπό, yet it can be used like ἀπό (Ewald, sec. 295*b*); and if there be no actual example of this, yet we point to Ps. xlv. in illustration of the custom of presenting gifts to a newly-married pair. He himself understands אהבה personally, as do also Ewald, Heiligst., Böttcher; "the voice of the people," says Ewald, "knows that the finest ornament with which the into him homage (of approbation or thanks). It occurs first, as uttered by the Sassanidean king, Shabur I., Mezia 119a, extr.; and already Rapoport, in his Erech Millin, 1852, p. 183, has recognised this word appiryon as Pers. It is the Old Pers. âfrîna or âfrivana (from frî, to love), which signifies blessing or benediction (vid. Justi's Handb. d. Zendsprache, p. 51). Rashi is right in glossing it by חָן שְׁלָנוּ (the testimony of our favour).

visible interior of the couch is adorned, is a love from among the daughters of Jerusalem,—i.e. some one of the court ladies who was raised, from the king's peculiar love to her, to the rank of a queen-consort. The speaker thus ingeniously names this newest favourite 'a love,' and at the same time designates her as the only thing with which this elegant structure, all adorned on the outside, is adorned within." Relatively better Böttcher: with a love (beloved one), prae filiis Hierus. But even though אהבה, like amor and amores, might be used of the beloved one herself, yet רצוף does not harmonize with this, seeing we cannot speak of being paved or tapestried with persons. Schlottm. in vain refers for the personal signification of אהבה to ii. 7, where it means love and nothing else, and seeks to bring it into accord with רצוף; for he remarks, "as the stone in mosaic work fills the place destined for it, so the bride the interior of the litter, which is intended for just one person filling it." But is this not more comical, without intending to be so, than Juvenal's (i. 1. 32 s.):

But Schlottm. agrees with us in this, that the marriage which is here being prepared for was the consummation of the happiness of Solomon and Shulamith, not of another woman, and not the consummation of Solomon's assault on the fidelity of Shulamith, who hates him to whom she now must belong, loving only one, the shepherd for whom she is said to sigh (i. 4a), that he would come and take her away. "This triumphal procession," says Roche,<sup>1</sup> "was for her a mourning procession, the royal litter a bier; her heart died within her with longing for her beloved shepherd." Touching, if it were only true! Nowhere do we see her up to this point resisting; much rather she is happy in her love. The shepherd-hypothesis cannot comprehend this marriage procession without introducing incongruous and imaginary things; it is a poem of the time of Gellert. Solomon the seducer, and Shulamith the heroine of virtue, are figures as from Gellert's Swedish Countess; they are moral commonplaces personified, but not real human beings. In the litter sits Shulamith, and the appiryon waits for her. Solomon rejoices that now the reciprocal love-bond is to find its conclusion; and what Shulamith, who is brought from a lowly to so lofty a station, experiences, we shall hear her describe in the sequel.

At the close of the scene, the call now goes forth to the daughters of Zion, i.e. the women of Jerusalem collectively, to behold the king, who now shows himself to the object of his love and to the jubilant crowd, as the festal procession approaches.

Ver. 11 Come out, ye daughters of Zion, and see King Solomon with the crown
 With which his mother crowned him
 On the day of his espousal,
 And on the day of the gladness of his heart.

The women of the court, as distinguished from the Galilean maiden, are called "daughters of Jerusalem;" here, generally, the women of Zion or Jerusalem (Lam. v. 11) are called "daughters of Zion." Instead of צִיּוֹן (since the verb Lamed Aleph is treated after the manner of verbs Lamed He, cf. Jer. l. 20; Ezek. xxiii. 49), צִיּוֹן, and that defect. צִיּוֹן,<sup>1</sup> is used for the sake of assonance with צִיּוֹן;<sup>2</sup> elsewhere also, as we have shown at Isa. xxii. 13, an unusual form is used for the sake of the sound. It is seen from the Sota (ix. 14) that the old custom for the bridegroom to wear a "crown" was abolished in consequence of the awful war with Vespasian. Rightly Epstein, against Grätz, shows from Job xxxi. 36, Isa. xxviii. 1, Ps. ciii. 4, that men also crowned themselves. בְּעֹרֶת (with the crown) is, according to the best authorities, without the art., and does not require it, since it is determined by the relat. clause following. הַחֲתָנָה is the marriage (the word also used in the post.-bibl. Heb., and interchanging with הַחֲתָנָה, properly νυμφών, Matt. ix. 15), from the verb חָתַן, which, proceeding from the root-idea of cutting into (Arab. khatn, to circumcise; R. חת, whence חָתָן, חָתָן, חָתָן), denotes the pressing into, or going into, another family; חָתָן is he who enters into such a relation of affinity, and חָתָן the father of her who is taken away, who also on his part is related to the husband.<sup>3</sup> Here also the seduction fable is shattered. The marriage with Shulamith takes place with the joyful consent of the queen-mother. In order to set aside this fatal circumstance, the "crown" is referred back to the time when Solomon was married to Pharaoh's daughter. Cogitandus est Salomo, says Heiligst., qui cum Sulamitha pompa sollemni Hierosolyma redit, eadem corona nuptiali ornatus, qua quum filiam regis Aegyptiorum uxorem duxeret ornatus erat. But was he then so poor or niggardly as to require to bring forth this old crown? and so basely regardless of his legitimate wife, of equal rank with himself, as to wound her by placing this crown on his head in honour of a rival? No; at the time when this youthful love-history occurred, Pharaoh's daughter was not yet married. The mention of his mother points us to the commencement of his reign. His head is not adorned with a crown which had already been worn, but with a fresh garland which his mother wreathed around the head of her youthful son. The men have already welcomed the procession from afar; but the king in his wedding attire has special attractions for the women—they are here called upon to observe the moment when the happy pair welcome one another.

<sup>2</sup> The Resh has in H Chatef-Pathach, with Methey preceding. This, according to Ben-Asher's rule, is correct (cf. Ps. xxviii. 9, חָתָן). In the punctuation of the Aleph with Tseré or Segol the Codd. vary, according to the different views of the punctuation. J has Segol; D H, Tseré, which latter also Kimchi, Michlol 109a.

SECOND SCENE OF THE THIRD ACT, IV. 1-V. 1.

This scene contains a conversation between Solomon and his beloved, whom he at first calls friend, and then, drawing always nearer to her, bride. The place of the conversation is, as v. 1 shows, the marriage hall. That the guests there assembled hear what Solomon says to Shulamith, one need not suppose; but the poet has overheard it from the loving pair. Fairer than ever does Shulamith appear to the king. He praises her beauty, beginning with her eyes.

Chap. iv. 1a Lo, thou art fair, my friend! yes, thou art fair!
Thine eyes are doves behind thy veil.

The Gr. Venet. translates, after Kimchi, "looking out from behind, thy hair flowing down from thy head like a mane." Thus also Schultens, capillus plexus; and Hengst., who compares πλέγμα, 1 Tim. ii. 9, and ἐμπλοκή τριχῶν, 1 Pet. iii. 3, passages which do not accord with the case of Shulamith; but neither עֵצִים, עֵצִים, nor עֵצִים signifies to plait; the latter is used of the hair when it is too abundant, and ready for the shears. To understand the hair as married man, and then any relation on the side of the wife (Lane); the fundamental idea must be the same as that of Khatn, circumcidere (cf. Ex. iv. 25), viz that of penetrating, which תַּתַּן, percellere, and תַּתַּן, descendere (cf. e.g. ferrum descendit haud alte in corpus, in Livy, and Prov. xvii. 1), also exhibit.

denoted here, is, moreover, inadmissible, inasmuch as מכער cannot be used of the eyes in relation to the braids of hair hanging before them. Symm. rightly translates צמח by κάλυμμα [veil] (in the Song the LXX. erroneously renders by σιωπήσεως [behind thy silence]), Isa. xlvi. 2. The verb צָמַח, (Arab.) ṣamm, to make firm, solid, massive, impenetrable; whence e.g. (Arab.) ṣimam, a stopper, and (Arab.) alṣamma, a plaid in which one veils himself, when he wraps it around him.<sup>1</sup> The veil is so called, as that which closely hides the face. In the Aram. צָמַח, Palp. צָמַח, means directly to veil, as e.g. Bereshith rabba c. 45, extr., of a matron whom the king lets pass before him it is said, צִימְצִמָה פָּנֶיהָ. Shulamith is thus veiled. As the Roman bride wore the velum flammeum, so also the Jewish bride was deeply veiled; cf. Gen. xxiv. 65, where Rebecca veiled herself (Lat. nubit) before her betrothed. בָּעַר, constr. בָּעַרְתִּי, a segolate noun, which denotes separation, is a prep. in the sense of pone, as in Arab. in that of post. Ewald, sec. 217*m*, supposes, contrary to the Arab., the fundamental idea of covering (cogn. בָּנָה); but that which surrounds is thought of as separating, and at the same time as covering, the thing which it encompasses. From behind her veil, which covered her face (vid. Bachmann, under Judg. iii. 23), her eyes gleam out, which, without needing to be supplemented by עֵינַי, are compared, as to their colour, motion, and lustre, to a pair of doves.

From the eyes the praise passes to the hair.

Ver. 1b Thy hair is like a flock of goats
Which repose downwards on Mount Gilead.

The hair of the bride's head was uncovered. We know from later times that she wore in it a wreath of myrtles and roses, or also a 'golden city' (עִיר זָהָב), i.e. an ornament which emblematically represented Jerusalem. To see that this comparison is not incongruous, we must know that sheep in Syria and Palestine are for the most part white; but goats, for the most part, black, or at least dark coloured, as e.g. the brown gedi Mamri.<sup>2</sup> The verb יָלַח is the Arab. جلس, which signifies, to rest upon; and is distinguished from

"Her teeth are like a flock of sheep,
With fleeces newly washen clean,
That slowly mount the rising steep,
And she's twa glancin', sparklin' een."

the synon. עמד in this, that the former is used of him who has previously lain down; the latter, of one who first stands and then sits down.<sup>1</sup> The nejd bears also the name jals, as the high land raising itself, and like a dome sitting above the rest of the land. One has to think of the goats as having lain down, and thus with the upper parts of their bodies as raised up. מִן in מִיָּהר is used almost as in מִן מִיָּהר, Isa. xl. 15. A flock of goats encamped on a mountain (rising up, to one looking from a distance, as in a steep slope, and almost perpendicularly), and as if hanging down lengthwise on its sides, presents a lovely view adorning the landscape. Solomon likens to this the appearance of the locks of his beloved, which hang down over her shoulders. She was till now a shepherdess, therefore a second rural image follows:

Ver. 2 Thy teeth are like a flock of shorn sheep
Which come up from the washing
All bearing twins,
And a bereaved one is not among them.

The verb לָצַב is, as the Arab. shows, in the sense of tondere oves, the synon. of לָצַב. With shorn (not to be shorn) sheep, the teeth in regard to their smoothness, and with washed sheep in regard to their whiteness, are compared—as a rule the sheep of Palestine are white; in respect of their full number, in which in pairs they correspond to one another, the one above to the one below, like twin births in which there is no break. The parallel passage, vi. 6, omits the point of comparison of the smoothness. That some days after the shearing the sheep were bathed, is evident from Columella vii. 4. Regarding the incorrect exchange of mas. with fem. forms, vid. under ii. 7. The part. Hiph. מִתְאַיֶּמֶת (cf. διδυματόκος, Theocr. i. 25) refers to the mothers, none of which has lost a twin of the pair she had borne. In “which come up from the washing,” there is perhaps thought of, at the same time with the whiteness, the saliva dentium. The moisture of the saliva, which heightens the glance of the teeth, is frequently mentioned in the love-songs of Mutenebbi, Hariri, and Deschami. And that the saliva of a clean and sound man is not offensive, is seen from this, that the Lord healed a blind man by means of His spittle.

The mouth is next praised:

Ver. 3a Like a thread of crimson thy lips,
And thy mouth is lovely.

As distinguished from red-purple, אֶרְבֵּי, שֵׁנִי (properly, shining, glistening; for this form has an active signification, like אֶרְבֵּי, as well as a passive, like עֲנִי)—fully, תּוֹלַעַת שֵׁנִי—signifies the kermes or worm-colour; the karmese, the red juice of the cochineal. מְדַבֵּרָה (מְדַבֵּרָהּ) is translated by the LXX. “thy speech;” Jerome, eloquium; and the Venet. “thy dialogue;” but that would be expressed, though by a ἀπ. λεγ., by רַבִּירָה. מְדַבֵּרָה is here the name of the mouth, the naming of which one expects; the preform. is the mem instrumenti: the mouth, as the instrument of speech, as the organ by which the soul expresses itself in word and in manner of speech. The poet needed for מְדַבֵּרָה a fuller, more select word; just as in Syria the nose is not called anf, but minchâr (from nachara, to blow, to breathe hard).

Praise of her temples.

Ver. 3b Like a piece of pomegranate thy temples
Behind thy veil.

רִקְיָה is the thin piece of the skull on both sides of the eyes; Lat., mostly in the plur., tempora; German, schläfe, from schlaff, loose, slack, i.e. weak = רָךְ. The figure points to that soft mixing of colours which makes the colouring of the so-called carnation one of the most difficult accomplishments in the art of painting. The half of a cut pomegranate (Jer. fragmen mali punici) is not meant after its outer side, as Zöckler supposes, for he gives to the noun rakkâ, contrary to Judg. iv. 21, v. 26, the meaning of cheek, a meaning which it has not, but after its inner side, which presents<sup>1</sup> a red mixed and tempered with the ruby colour,—a figure so much the more appropriate, since the ground-colour of Shulamith’s countenance is a subdued white.<sup>2</sup> Up to this point the figures are borrowed from the circle of vision of a shepherdess. Now the king derives them from the sphere of his own experience as the ruler of a kingdom. She who has eyes like doves is in form like a born queen.

Ver. 4 Like the tower of David thy neck,
Built in terraces;
Thereon a thousand shields hang,
All the armour of heroes.

The tower of David is, as it appears, "the tower of the flock," Mic. iv. 4, from which David surveyed the flock of his people. In Neh. iii. 25 f. it is called the "tower which lieth out from the king's high house," i.e. not the palace, but a government house built on Zion, which served as a court of justice. But what is the meaning of the ἀπ. λεγ. τῆς πύργου? Grätz translates: for a prospect; but the Greek τηλωπός, of which he regards 'תל as the Heb. abstr., is a word so rare that its introduction into the Semitic language is on that account improbable. Hengst. translates: built for hanging swords; and he sees in the word a compound of תל (from תלה, with which forms such as ת' = jadj, ש' = shadj, ש', 2 Sam. vi. 7, are compared) and פיות; but this latter word signifies, not swords, but edges of the (double-edged) sword; wherefore Kimchi (interpreting תל as the constr. of תל, as אל, in בעלאל, is of אל) explains: an erection of sharp-cornered stones; and, moreover, the Heb. language knows no such nmm. comp. appellativa: the names of the frog, צפרדע, and the bat, חתולה (cf. the Beth in (Arab.) sa'lab, fox, with the added Pe), are not such; and also tsalmāveth, the shadow of death, is at a later period, for the first time, restamped<sup>1</sup> as such from the original tsalmuth (cf. Arab. zalumat = tenebrae). Gesen. obtains the same meanings; for he explains 'תל by exitialibus (sc. armis), from an adj. תלפ, from תלה Arab. talifa, to perish, the inf. of which, talaf, is at the present day a word synon. with halak (to perish); (Arab.) matlaf (place of going down) is, like ישומן, a poetic name of the wilderness. The explanation is acceptable but hazardous, since neither the Heb. nor the Aram. shows a trace of this verb; and it is thus to be given up, if תלפ can be referred to a verbal stem to be found in the Heb. and Aram. This is done in Ewald's explanation, to which also Böttcher and Rödiger give the preference: built for close (crowded) troops (so, viz., that many hundreds or thousands find room therein); the (Arab.) verb aff, to wrap together (opp. nashar, to unfold), is used of the packing together of multitudes of troops (liff, plur. lufuf), and also of warlike hand-to-hand conflicts; תלפ would be traced to a verb תלף synon. therewith, after the form תלף. But if תלפ were meant of troops, then they would be denoted as the garrison found therein, and it would not be merely said that the tower was built for such; for the point of comparison would then be, the imposing look of the neck, overpowering by the force of the impression proceeding from within. But now, in the Aram., and relatively in the Talm. Heb., not only תלף and תלף occur, but also תלף (Af. תלף), and that in the sense of enclosure, i.e. of joining together, the one working into the other,—e.g. in the Targ. : of the curtain of the tabernacle (עֵיט לֹפֶיט, place of the joining together = חִבְרֵת or כִּחְבֵּרֵת of the Heb. text); and in the Talm. : of the roofs of two houses (Bathra 6a, מְלִפְתָּי, the joining<sup>1</sup>). Accordingly 'הלם, if we interpret the Lamed not of the definition, but of the norm, may signify, "in ranks together." The Lamed has already been thus rendered by Döderl. : "in turns" (cf. מִלֵּן, to turn, to wind); and by Meier, Mr. : "in gradation;" and Aq. and Jerome also suppose that 'הלם refers to component parts of the building itself, for they understand<sup>2</sup> pinnacles or parapets (ἐπάλξεις, propugnacula); as also the Venet. : εις ἐπάλξεις χιλίας. But the name for pinnacles is מִצְנֵה, and their points, מִצְנֵהוֹת; while, on the contrary, 'הלם is the more appropriate name for terraces which, connected together, rise the one above the other. Thus to build towers like terraces, and to place the one, as it were, above the other, was a Babylonian custom.<sup>3</sup> The comparison lies in this, that Shulamith's neck was surrounded with ornaments so that it did not appear as a uniform whole, but as composed of terraces. That the neck is represented as hung round with ornaments, the remaining portion of the description shows.

מִצְנֵה signifies a shield, as that which protects, like clupeus (clypeus), perhaps connected with καλύπτειν and מִצְנֵה, from מִצְנֵה = (Arab.) shalita, as a hard impenetrable armour. The latter is here the more common word, which comprehends, with מִצְנֵה, the round shield; also מִצְנֵה, the oval shield, which covers the whole body; and other forms of shields. מִצְנֵהוֹת הַמִּצְנֵה, "the thousand shields," has the indicative, if not (vid. under i. 11) the generic article. The appositional מִצְנֵהוֹת מִצְנֵה is not intended to mean : all shields of (von) heroes, which it would if the article were prefixed to col and omitted before gibborim, or if מִצְנֵה, iii. 8, were used; but it means : all the shields of heroes, as the accentuation also indicates. The article is also here significant. Solomon made, according to 1 Kings x. 16 f., 200 golden targets and 300 golden shields, which he put in the house of the forest of Lebanon. These golden shields Pharaoh Shishak took away with him, and Rehoboam replaced them by "shields of brass," which the guards bore when they accompanied the king on his going into the temple (1 Kings xiv. 26–28; cf. 2 Chron. xii. 9–11); these

“shields of David,” i.e. shields belonging to the king’s house, were given to the captains of the guard on the occasion of the raising of Joash to the throne, 2 Kings xi. 10; cf. 2 Chron. xxiii. 9. Of these brazen shields, as well as of those of gold, it is expressly said how and where they were kept, nowhere that they were hung up outside on a tower, the tower of David. Such a display of the golden shields is also very improbable. We will perhaps have to suppose that 4*b* describes the tower of David, not as it actually was, but as one has to represent it to himself, that it might be a figure of Shulamith’s neck. This is compared to the terraced tower of David, if one thinks of it as hung round by a thousand shields which the heroes bore, those heroes, namely, who formed the king’s body-guard. Thus it is not strange that to the 200 + 300 golden shields are here added yet 500 more; the body-guard, reckoned in companies of 100 each, 2 Kings xi. 4, is estimated as consisting of 1000 men. The description, moreover, corresponds with ancient custom. The words are עָלֵי עֲלָי, not בְּעֲלָי; the outer wall of the tower is thought of as decorated with shields hung upon it. That shields were thus hung round on tower-walls, Ezekiel shows in his prophecy regarding Tyre, xxvii. 11; cf. 1 Macc. iv. 57, and supra foris Capitolinae aedis, Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxxv. 3; and although we express the presumption that Solomon’s imagination represented David’s tower as more gorgeous than it actually was, yet we must confess that we are not sufficiently acquainted with Solomon’s buildings to be able to pass judgment on this. These manifold inexplicable references of the Song to the unfolded splendour of Solomon’s reign, are favourable to the Solomonic authorship of the book. This grandiose picture of the distinguished beauty of the neck, and the heightening of this beauty by the ornament of chains, is now followed by a beautiful figure, which again goes back to the use of the language of shepherds, and terminates the description:

Ver. 5 Thy two breasts are like two fawns,
Twins of a gazelle,
Which feed among lilies.

The dual, originating in the inner differ. of the plur., which denotes in Heb. not two things of any sort, but two paired by nature or by art, exists only in the principal form; שְׁנַיִם, as soon as inflected, is unrecognisable, therefore here, where the pair as such is praised, the word שְׁנֵי is used. The breasts are compared to a twin pair of young gazelles in respect of their equality and youthful freshness, and the bosom on which they raise themselves is compared to a meadow covered with lilies, on which the twin-pair of young gazelles feed.

With this tender lovely image the praise of the attractions of the chosen one is interrupted. If one counts the lips and the mouth as a part of the body, which they surely are, there are seven things here praised, as Hengst. rightly counts (the eyes, the hair, teeth, mouth, temples, neck, breasts); and Hahn speaks with right of the sevenfold beauty of the bride.

Shulamith replies to these words of praise :

Ver. 6 Until the day cools and the shadows flee,
I will go forth to the mountain of myrrh
And to the hill of frankincense.

All those interpreters who suppose these to be a continuation of Solomon's words, lose themselves in absurdities. Most of them understand the mountain of myrrh and the hill of frankincense of Shulamith's attractions, praised in ver. 5, or of her beauty as a whole; but the figures would be grotesque (cf. on the other hand v. 13), and  $\text{לְהֵלֵךְ לִי לְהַרְבֵּי מִיָּרְחָן}$  prosaic, wherefore it comes that the idea of betaking oneself away connects itself with  $\text{לֵךְ לִי}$  (Gen. xii. 1; Ex. xviii. 27), or that it yet preponderates therein (Gen. xxii. 2; Jer. v. 5), and that, for  $\text{לֵךְ לִי}$  in the passage before us in reference to ii. 10, 11, the supposition holds that it will correspond with the French jè m'en irai. With right Louis de Leon sees in the mountain of myrrh and the hill of frankincense names of shady and fragrant places; but he supposes that Solomon says he wishes to go thither to enjoy a siesta, and that he invites Shulamith thither. But we read nothing of this invitation; and that a bridegroom should sleep a part of his marriage-day is yet more unnatural than that, e.g., Wilh. Budäus, the French philologist, spent a part of the same at work in his study. That not Solomon but Shulamith speaks here is manifest in the beginning, "until the day," etc., which at ii. 17 are also Shulamith's words. Anton (1773) rightly remarks, "Shulamith says this to set herself free." But why does she seek to make herself free? It is answered, that she longs to be forth from Solomon's too ardent eulogies; she says that, as soon as it is dark, she will escape to the blooming aromatic fields of her native home, where she hopes to meet with her beloved shepherd. Thus, e.g., Ginsburg (1868). But do myrrh and frankincense grow in North Palestine? Ginsburg rests on Florus' Epitome Rerum Rom. iii. 6, where Pompey the Great is said to have passed over Lebanon and by Damascus "per nemora illa odorata, per thuris et balsami sylvas." But by these thuris et balsami sylvae could be meant only the gardens of Damascus; for neither myrrh nor frankincense is indigenous to North Palestine, or generally to any part of Palestine.

Friedrich (1866) therefore places Shulamith's home at Engedi, and supposes that she here once more looks from the window and dotes on the mountain of myrrh and the hill of frankincense, "where, at the approach of twilight, she was wont to look out for her betrothed shepherd." But Shulamith, as her name already denotes, is not from the south, but is a Galilean, and her betrothed shepherd is from Utopia! That myrrh and frankincense were planted in the gardens of Engedi is possible, although (i. 14) mention is made only of the Al-henna there. But here places in the neighbourhood of the royal palace must be meant; for the myrrh tree, the gum of which, prized as an aroma, is the Arab. Balsamodendron Myrrha, and the frankincense tree, the resin of which is used for incense, is, like the myrrh tree, an Arab. amyrid. The Boswellia serrata,<sup>1</sup> indigenous to the East Indies, furnishes the best frankincense; the Israelites bought it from Sheba (Isa. lx. 6; Jer. vi. 20). The myrrh tree as well as the frankincense tree were thus exotics in Palestine, as they are in our own country; but Solomon, who had intercourse with Arabia and India by his own mercantile fleet, procured them for his own garden (Eccles. ii. 5). The modest Shulamith shuns the loving words of praise; for she requests that she may be permitted to betake herself to the lonely places planted with myrrh and frankincense near the king's palace, where she thinks to tarry in a frame of mind befitting this day till the approaching darkness calls her back to the king. It is the importance of the day which suggests to her this אֶלֶךְ לִי, a day in which she enters into the covenant of her God with Solomon (Prov. ii. 17). Without wishing to allegorize, we may yet not omit to observe, that the mountain of myrrh and the hill of frankincense put us in mind of the temple, where incense, composed of myrrh, frankincense, and other spices, ascended up before God every morning and evening (Ex. xxx. 34 ff.). הַר הַמִּזְבֵּחַ is perhaps a not unintentional accord to הַר הַמִּזְבֵּחַ (2 Chron. iii. 1), the mountain where God appeared; at all events, "mountain of myrrh" and "hill of frankincense" are appropriate names for places of devout meditation, where one holds fellowship with God.

This childlike modest disposition makes her yet more lovely in the eyes of the king. He breaks out in these words:

Ver. 7 Thou art altogether fair, my love,
And no blemish in thee.

Certainly he means, no blemish either of soul or body. In vers. 1-5 he has praised her external beauty; but in vcr. 6 her soul has disclosed itself: the fame of her spotless beauty is there extended to her soul no less than to her external appearance. And as to her longing after freedom from the tumult and bustle of court life, he thus promises to her :

Ver. 8 With me from Lebanon, my bride,
With me from Lebanon shalt thou come ;
Shalt look from the top of Amana,
From the top of Shenir and Hermon,
From dens of lions,
From mountains of leopards.

Zöckl. interprets אָמָנִי in the sense of אָלֵי, and הִשְׁתַּדֵּרִי in the sense of journeying to this definite place: "he announces to her in overflowing fulness of expression, that from this time forth, instead of the lonely mountainous regions, and the dangerous caves and dens, she shall inhabit with him the royal palace." Thus also Kingsbury. But the interpretation, however plausible, cannot be supported. For (1) such an idea ought to be expressed either by 'אָלֵי רֶב' or by 'וְאִתִּי הַשְּׁבִי רֶב', instead of 'אִתִּי רֶב' ; (2) Shulamith is not from Lebanon, nor from the Anti-Libanus, which looks toward Damascus ; (3) this would be no answer to Shulamith's longing for lonely quietness. We therefore hold by our explanation given in 1851. He seeks her to go with him up the steep heights of Lebanon, and to descend with him from thence ; for while ascending the mountain one has no view before him, but when descending he has the whole panorama of the surrounding region lying at his feet. Thus הִשְׁתַּדֵּר is not to be understood as at Isa. lvii. 9, where it has the meaning of migrabas, but, as at Num. xxiii. 9, it means spectabis. With 'מֵר' the idea of prospect lies nearer than that of descending ; besides, the meaning spectare is secondary, for שָׁר signifies first "to go, proceed, journey," and then "going to view, to go in order to view." Sér in Arab. means "the scene," and sér etmek in Turkish, "to contemplate" (cf. Arab. tamashy, to walk, then, to contemplate). Lebanon is the name of the Alpine range which lies in the N.-W. of the Holy Land, and stretches above 20 (German) miles from the Leontes (Nahr el-Kasmité) northwards to the Eleutheros (Nahr el-Kebîr). The other three names here found refer to the Anti-Libanus separated from the Lebanon by the Coelo-Syrian valley, and stretching from the Banias northwards to the plain of Hamâth.

Amana denotes that range of the Anti-Libanus from which the springs of the river Amana issue, one of the two rivers which the Syrian captain (2 Kings v. 12) named as better than all the waters of Israel. These are the Amana and Pharpar, i.e. the Baradâ and A'wadsh ; to the union of the Baradâ (called by the Greeks Chry- sorrhoads, i.e. "golden stream") with the Feidshe, the environs of Damascus owe their ghuwdat, their paradisaical beauty.

Hermon (from חָרַם, to cut off; cf. Arab. kharom and mahrīm, the steep projection of a mountain) is the most southern peak of the Anti-Libanus chain, the lofty mountains (about 10,000 feet above the level of the sea) which form the north-eastern border of Palestine, and from which the springs of the Jordan take their rise.

Another section of the Anti-Libanus range is called Senir, not Shenir. The name, in all the three places where it occurs (Deut. iii. 9; 1 Chron. v. 23), is, in accordance with tradition, to be written with Sin. The Onkelos Targum writes סַרִיָן; the Jerusalem paraphrases, טוֹרָא דְמַסְרֵי פִירִי (the mountain whose fruits become putrid, viz. on account of their superabundance); the Midrash explains otherwise: שְׂרֵוּא שׁוֹנֵא הַנִּיר (the mountain which resists being broken up by the plough),—everywhere the writing of the word with the letter Sin is supposed. According to Deut. iii. 9, this was the Amorite name of Hermon. The expression then denotes that the Amorites called Hermon—i.e. the Anti-Libanus range, for they gave the name of a part to the whole range—by the name Senir; Abulfeda uses سنير as the name of the part to the north of Damascus, with which the statement of Schwarz (Das h. Land, p. 33) agrees, that the Hermon (Anti-Libanus) to the north-west of Damascus is called Senir.

נִמְרִים, panthers, to the present day inhabit the clefts and defiles of the Lebanon, and of the Anti-Libanus running parallel to it; whereas lions have now altogether disappeared from the countries of the Mediterranean. In Solomon's time they were to be met with in the lurking-places of the Jordan valley, and yet more frequently in the remote districts of the northern Alpine chains. From the heights of these Alps Solomon says Shulamith shall alone with him look down from where the lions and panthers dwell. Near these beasts of prey, and yet inaccessible by them, shall she enjoy the prospect of the extensive pleasant land which was subject to the sceptre of him who held her safe on these cliffs, and accompanied her over these giddy heights. If "mountain of myrrh," so also "the top of Amana" is not without subordinate reference. Amana, proceeding from the primary idea of firmness and verification, signifies fidelity and the faithful covenant as it is established between God and the congregation, for He betrothes it to Himself בְּאֱמִנָה ("in faithfulness"), Hos. ii. 22 [20]; the congregation of which the apostle (Eph. v. 27) says the same as is here said by Solomon of Shulamith. Here for the first time he calls her  $\text{בְּרֵיָה}$ , not  $\text{בְּרֵיָה}$ ; for that, according to the usus loq., would mean "my daughter-in-law." Accordingly, it appears that the idea of "daughter-in-law" is the primary, and that of "bride" the secondary one.  $\text{בְּרֵיָה}$ , which is =  $\text{בְּרֵיָה}$ , as  $\text{חֶלֶב}$ , a cake, is =  $\text{חֶלֶב־חַלְּוָה}$ , that which is pierced through (cf.  $\text{בְּרֵיָה}$ , being espoused; Jer. ii. 2), appears to mean<sup>1</sup> (cf. what was said regarding  $\text{חֶלֶב}$  under iii. 11b) her who is comprehended with the family into which, leaving her parents' house, she enters; not her who is embraced = crowned with a garland (cf. Arab.  $\text{تكلل}$ , to be garlanded; teklil, garlanding; iklil, Syr. k'ילו, a wreath), or her who is brought to completion (cf. the verb, Ezek. xxvii. 4, 11), i.e. has reached the goal of her womanly calling. Besides,  $\text{בְּרֵיָה}$ , like "Braut" in the older German (e.g. Gudrun), means not only her who is betrothed, but also her who has been lately married.

All that the king calls his, she now can call hers; for she has won his heart, and with his heart himself and all that is his.

Ver. 9 Thou hast taken my heart, my sister-bride;
 Thou hast taken my heart with one of thy glances,
 With a little chain of thy necklace.

The Piel  $\text{בָּרָא}$  may mean to make courageous, and it actually has this meaning in the Aram., wherefore the Syr. retains the word; Symm. renders it by  $\text{ἐθάρσυνάς με}$ . But is it becoming in a man who is no coward, especially in a king, to say that the love he cherishes gives him heart, i.e. courage? It might be becoming, perhaps, in a warrior who is inspired by the thought of his beloved, whose respect and admiration he seeks to gain, to dare the uttermost. But Solomon is no Antar, no wandering knight.<sup>2</sup> Besides, the first effect of love is different: it influences those whom it governs, not as encouraging, in the first instance, but as disarming them; love responded to encourages, but love in its beginning, which is the subject here, overpowers. We would thus more naturally render: "thou hast unhearted me;" but "to unheart," according to the Semitic and generally the ancient conception of the heart (Psychol. p. 254), does not so much mean to captivate the heart, as rather to deprive of understanding or of judgment (cf. Hos. iv. 11). Such denomin. Pi. of names of corporeal members signify not merely taking away, but also wounding, and generally any violent affection of it, as וַיִּבַּח, וַיִּרָם, Ewald, § 120c; accordingly the LXX., Venet., and Jerome: ἐκαρδίωσάς με, vulnerasti cor meum. The meaning is the same for "thou hast wounded my heart" = "thou hast subdued my heart" (cf. Ps. xlv. 6b). With one of her glances, with a little chain of her necklace, she has overcome him as with a powerful charm: veni, visa sum, vici. The Keri changes בְּאַחַר into בְּאַחֵת; certainly עֵץ is mostly fem. (e.g. Judg. xvi. 28), but not only the non-bibl. usus loq., which e.g. prefers רְעָה or רַעַץ, of a malignant bewitching look, but also the bibl. (vid. Zech. iii. 9, iv. 10) treats the word as of double gender. עֵץ and עֵצִים are related to each other as a part is to the whole. With the subst. ending ōn, the designation of an ornament designed for the neck is formed from צַוְנָה, the neck; cf. שְׁהֵרֶוֹן, the "round tires like the moon" of the women's toilet, Isa. iii. 18 ff. עֵץ (connected with עֵץ, עֵץ, cervix) is a separate chain (Aram. עֵץ) of this necklace. In the words אַחַר עֵץ, אַחַר is used instead of אַחֵר, occurring also out of genit. connection (Gen. xlvi. 22; 2 Sam. xvii. 22), and the arrangement (vid. under Ps. lxxxix. 51) follows the analogy of the pure numerals as שֵׁשֶׁת נְשִׁים; it appears to be transferred from the vulgar language to that used in books, where, besides the passage before us, it occurs only in Dan. viii. 13. That a glance of the eye may pierce the heart, experience shows; but how can a little chain of a necklace do this? That also is intelligible. As beauty becomes unlike itself when the attire shows want of taste, so by means of tasteful clothing, which does not need to be splendid, but may even be of the simplest kind, it becomes mighty. Hence the charming attractive power of the impression one makes communicates itself to all that he wears, as, e.g., the woman with the issue of blood touched with joyful hope the hem of Jesus' garment; for he who loves feels the soul of that which is loved in all that stands connected therewith, all that is, as it were, consecrated and charmed by the beloved object, and operates so much the more powerfully if it adorns it, because as an ornament of that which is beautiful, it appears so much the more beautiful. In the preceding verse, Solomon has for the first time addressed Shulamith by the title "bride." Here with heightened cordiality he calls her "sister-bride." In this change in the address the progress of the story is mirrored. Why he does not say כַּלְתִּי (my bride), has already been explained, under 8a, from the derivation of the word. Solomon's mother might call Shulamith callathi, but he gives to the relation of affinity into which Shulamith has entered a reference to himself individually, for he says ahhothi callā (my sister-bride): she who as callā of his mother is to her a kind of daughter, is as callā in relation to himself, as it were, his sister.

He proceeds still further to praise her attractions.

- Ver. 10 How fair is thy love, my sister-bride!
 How much better thy love than wine!
 And the fragrance of thy unguents than all spices!
 11 Thy lips drop honey, my bride;
 Honey and milk are under thy tongue;
 And the fragrance of thy garments is like the fragrance of Lebanon.

Regarding the connection of the pluralet. יְרֵיִם with the plur. of the pred., vid. at i. 2b. The pred. יָפִי praises her love in its manifestations according to its impression on the sight; כָּבוֹד, according to its experience on nearer intercourse. As in ver. 9 the same power of impression is attributed to the eyes and to the necklace, so here is intermingled praise of the beauty of her person with praise of the fragrance, the odour of the clothing of the bride; for her soul speaks out not only by her lips, she breathes forth odours also for him in her spices, which he deems more fragrant than all other odours, because he inhales, as it were, her soul along with them. נֶפֶת, from נָפַת, ebullire (vid. under Prov. v. 3, also Schultens), is virgin honey, ἀκροῦτον (acetum, Pliny, xi. 15), i.e. that which of itself flows from the combs (עֵינַיִם). Honey drops from the lips which he kisses; milk and honey are under the tongue which whispers to him words of pure and inward joy; cf. the contrary, Ps. cxl. 4. The last line is an echo of Gen. xxvii. 27. שְׂמֵלָה is שְׂמֵלָה (from שָׂמַל, complicare, complecti) transposed (cf. עֵלְיָה from עֵלְיָה, עֵשְׂבָה from עֵשְׂבָה). As Jacob's raiment had for his old father the fragrance of a field which God had blessed, so for Solomon the garments of the faultless and pure one, fresh from the woods and mountains of the north, gave forth a heart-strengthening savour like the fragrance of Lebanon (Hos. iv. 7), viz. of its fragrant herbs and trees, chiefly of the balsamic odour of the apples of the cedar.

The praise is sensuous, but it has a moral consecration.

- Ver. 12 A garden locked is my sister-bride;
 A spring locked, a fountain sealed.

גַּן (according to rule masc. Böttch. § 658) denotes the garden from its enclosure; מַיִם (elsewhere מַיִם), the fountain (synon. מַבְרֵן), the waves bubbling forth (cf. Amos v. 24); and מַעְיָן, the place, as it were an eye of the earth, from which a fountain gushes forth. Luther distinguishes rightly between gan and gal; on the contrary, all the old translators (even the Venet.) render as if the word in both cases were gan. The Pasek between gan and nā'ul, and between gal and nā'ul, is designed to separate the two Nuns, as e.g. at 2 Chron. ii. 9, Neh. ii. 2, the two Mems; it is the orthophonic Pasek, already described under ii. 7, which secures the independence of two similar or organically related sounds. Whether the sealed fountain (fons signatus) alludes to a definite fountain which Solomon had built for the upper city and the temple place,<sup>1</sup> we do not now inquire. To a locked garden and spring no one has access but the rightful owner, and a sealed fountain is shut against all impurity. Thus she is closed against the world, and inaccessible to all that would disturb her pure heart, or desecrate her pure person.<sup>2</sup> All the more beautiful and the greater is the fulness of the flowers and fruits which bloom and ripen in the garden of this life, closed against the world and its lust.

- Ver. 13 What sprouts forth for thee is a park of pomegranates,
 With most excellent fruits;
 Cypress flowers with nards;
 14 Nard and crocus; calamus and cinnamon,
 With all kinds of incense trees;
 Myrrh and aloes,
 With all the chief aromatics.

The common subject to all down to ver. 15 inclusive is שְׂתִיבָה ("what sprouts for thee" = "thy plants"), as a figurative designation, borrowed from plants, of all the "phenomena and life utterances" (Böttch.) of her personality. "If I only knew here," says Rocke, "how to disclose the meaning, certainly all these flowers and fruits, in the figurative language of the Orient, in the flower-language of love, had their beautiful interpretation." In the old German poetry, also, the phrase bluomen brechen [to break flowers] was equivalent to: to enjoy love; the flowers and fruits named are figures of all that the amata offers to the amator. Most of the plants here named are exotics; פְּרִי (heaping around, circumvallation, enclosing) is a garden or park, especially with foreign ornamental and fragrant plants—an old Persian word, the explanation of which, after Spiegel, first given in our exposition of the Song, 1851 (from pairi = περί, and déz, R. diz, a heap), has now become common property (Justi's Handb. der Zendsprache, p. 180). פְּרִי מְגָרִים (from מְגָר, which corresponds to the Arab. mejd, praise, honour, excellence; vid. Volck under Deut. xxxiii. 13) are fructus laudum, or lautittiarum, excellent precious fruits, which in the more modern language are simply called מְגִידִים (Shabbath 127*b*, מֵינֵי מְגִידִים, all kinds of fine fruits); cf. Syr. magdo, dried fruit. Regarding בָּפֶר, vid. under i. 14; regarding מֵר, under i. 13; also regarding נֶרְדִּי, under i. 12. The long vowel of נֶרְדִּי corresponds to the Pers. form nârd, but near to which is also nard, Indian nalada (fragrance-giving); the ê is thus only the long accent, and can therefore disappear in the plur. For נֶרְדִּים, Grätz reads יֶרְדִּים, roses, because the poet would not have named nard twice. The conjecture is beautiful, but for us, who believe the poem to be Solomonic, is inconsistent with the history of roses (vid. under ii. 1), and also unnecessary. The description moves forward by steps rhythmically.

כַּרְכֹּם is the crocus stivivus, the genuine Indian safran, the dried flower-eyes of which yield the safran used as a colour, as an aromatic, and also as medicine; safran is an Arab. word, and means yellow root and yellow colouring matter. The name כַּרְכֹּם, Pers. karkam, Arab. karkum, is radically Indian, Sanscr. kuñkuma. קִנְיָה, a reed (from קָנָה, R. קָנָה, to rise up, viewed intrans.),<sup>1</sup> viz. sweet reed, acorus calamus, which with us now grows wild in marshes, but is indigenous to the Orient.

קִנְמוֹן is the laurus cinnamomum, a tree indigenous to the east coast of Africa and Ceylon, and found later also on the Antilles. It is of the family of the laurineae, the inner bark of which, peeled off and rolled together, is the cinnamon-bark (cannella, French cannelle); Aram. קִינְמָא, as also the Greek κιννάμωμον and κίναμον, Lat. (e.g. in the 12th book of Pliny) cinnamomum and cinnamum, are interchanged, from קָנָם, probably a secondary formation from קָנָה (like בָּם, whence בָּמָה, from בָּא), to which also קִנְמוֹן, ἰνόςτασις, and the Talm.-Targ. קִנְמוֹן קִנְמוֹן, an oath (cf. קָנָם), go back, so that thus the name which was brought to the west by the Phoenicians denoted not the tree, but the reed-like form of the rolled dried bark. As “nards” refer to varieties of the nard, perhaps to the Indian and the Jamanic spoken of by Strabo and others, so “all kinds of incense trees” refers definitely to Indo-Arab. varieties of the incense tree and its fragrant resin; it has its name from the white and transparent seeds of this its resin (cf. Arab. lubân, incense and benzoin, the resin of the storax tree, הַבְּרִי); the Greek λίβανος, λίβανωτός (Lat. thus, frankincense, from θύω), is a word derived from the Phoenicians.

הַלְּבָנוֹן or הַלְּבָנוֹן (which already in a remarkable way was used by Balaam, Num. xxiv. 6, elsewhere only since the time of Solomon) is the Semitized old Indian name of the aloe, agaru or aguru; that which is aromatic is the wood of the aloe-tree (aloëxylon agallochum), particularly its dried root (agallochum or lignum aloës, ξύλαλόη, according to which the Targ. here: אֵין אֵלֶּיךָ לִבְנֵי אֵרֶץ, after the phrase in Aruch) mouldered in the earth, which chiefly came from farther India.<sup>1</sup> עַם, as everywhere, connects things contained together or in any way united (v. 1; cf. i. 11, as Ps. lxxxvii. 4; cf. 1 Sam. xvi. 12). The concluding phrase וְיִגְדֹל עִם בְּלִיָּהוּ, cum praestantissimis quibusque aromaticibus, is a poet. et cetera. שְׂרָר, with the gen. of the object whose value is estimated, denotes what is of meilleure qualité; or, as the Talm. says, what is אֶלְפָּא, alfa, i.e. number one. Ezekiel, xxvii. 22, in a similar sense, says, "with chief (שְׂרָר) of all spices."

The panegyric returns now once more to the figure of a fountain.

Ver. 15 A garden-fountain, a well of living water,
And torrents from Lebanon.

The tertium compar. in ver. 12 was the collecting and sealing up; here, it is the inner life and its outward activity. A fountain in gardens (מַיִם, categ. pl.) is put to service for the benefit of the beds of plants round about, and it has in these gardens, as it were, its proper sphere of influence. A well of living water is one in which that which it distributes springs up from within, so that it is indeed given to it, but not without at the same time being its own true property. יָרַד is related, according to the Semitic usus loq., to יָרַד, as "niedergehen" (to go down) to "weggehen" (to go away) (vid. Prov. v. 15); similarly related are (Arab.) sar, to go, and sal (in which the letter ra is exchanged for lam, to express the softness of the liquid), to flow, whence syl (sel), impetuous stream, rushing water, kindred in meaning to שׁוֹרֵי. Streams which come from Lebanon have a rapid descent, and (so far as they do not arise in the snow region) the water is not only fresh, but clear as crystal. All these figures understood sensuously would be insipid; but understood ethically, they are exceedingly appropriate, and are easily interpreted, so that the conjecture is natural, that on the supposition of the spiritual interpretation of the Song, Jesus has this saying in His mind when He says that streams of living water shall flow "out of the belly" of the believer, John vii. 38.

The king's praise is for Shulamith proof of his love, which seeks a response. But as she is, she thinks herself yet unworthy of him; her modesty says to her that she needs preparation for him, preparation by that blowing which is the breath of God in the natural and in the spiritual world.

Ver. 16 Awake, thou North (wind), and come, thou South!
 Blow through my garden, cause its spices to flow—
 Let my beloved come into his garden,
 And eat the fruits which are precious to him.

The names of the north and south, denoting not only the regions of the heavens, but also the winds blowing from these regions, are of the fem. gender, Isa. xliii. 6. The east wind, צָפוֹן, is purposely not mentioned; the idea of that which is destructive and adverse is connected with it (vid. under Job xxvii. 21). The north wind brings cold till ice is formed, Sir. xliii. 20; and if the south wind blow, it is hot, Luke xii. 55. If cold and heat, coolness and sultriness, interchange at the proper time, then growth is promoted. And if the wind blow through a garden at one time from this direction and at another from that,—not so violently as when it shakes the trees of the forest, but softly and yet as powerfully as a garden can bear it,—then all the fragrance of the garden rises in waves, and it becomes like a sea of incense. The garden itself then blows, i.e. emits odours; for (חַפְזָה = the Arab. fakh, fah, cf. fawh, pl. afwdh, sweet odours, fragrant plants) as in רִיחַ חַפְזָה, Gen. iii. 8, the idea underlies the expression, that when it is evening the day itself blows, i.e. becomes cool, the causative חַפְזָה, connected with the object-accus. of the garden, means to make the garden breezy and fragrant. חַפְזָה is here used of the odours which, set free as it were from the plants, flow out, being carried forth by the waves of air. Shulamith wishes that in her all that is worthy of love should be fully realized. What had to be done for Esther (Esth. ii. 12) before she could be brought in to the king, Shulamith calls on the winds to accomplish for her, which are, as it were, the breath of the life of all nature, and as such, of the life-spirit, which is the sustaining background of all created things. If she is thus prepared for him who loves her, and whom she loves, he shall come into his garden and enjoy the precious fruit belonging to him. With words of such gentle tenderness, childlike purity, she gives herself to her beloved.

She gives herself to him, and he has accepted her, and now celebrates the delight of possession and enjoyment.

Chap. v. 1 I am come into my garden, my sister-bride ;
 Have plucked my myrrh with my balsam ;
 Have eaten my honeycomb with my honey ;
 Have drunk my wine with my milk—
 Eat, drink, and be drunken, ye friends !

If the exclamation of Solomon, 1*a*, is immediately connected with the words of Shulamith, iv. 16, then we must suppose that, influenced by these words, in which the ardour of love and humility express themselves, he thus in triumph exclaims, after he has embraced her in his arms as his own inalienable possession. But the exclamation denotes more than this. It supposes a union of love, such as is the conclusion of marriage following the betrothal, the God-ordained aim of sexual love within the limits fixed by morality. The poetic expression לָגַנְי בְּאֵרְתִּי לְגַנְי points to the בּוֹא אֶל, used of the entrance of a man into the woman's chamber, to which the expression (Arab.) dakhal bihā (he went in with her), used of the introduction into the bride's chamber, is compared. The road by which Solomon reached this full and entire possession was not short, and especially for his longing it was a lengthened one. He now triumphs in the final enjoyment which his ardent desire had found. A pleasant enjoyment which is reached in the way and within the limits of the divine order, and which therefore leaves no bitter fruits of self-reproach, is pleasant even in the retrospect. His words, beginning with "I am come into my garden," breathe this pleasure in the retrospect. Ginsburg and others render incorrectly, "I am coming," which would require the words to have been אֲנִי בָא (הִנֵּה). The series of perfects beginning with בִּאֵרְתִּי cannot be meant otherwise than retrospectively. The "garden" is Shulamith herself, iv. 12, in the fulness of her personal and spiritual attractions, iv. 16 ; cf. פִּרְתִּי, i. 6. He may call her "my sister-bride;" the garden is then his by virtue of divine and human right, he has obtained possession of this garden, he has broken its costly rare flowers.

אָרְבָּ (in the Mishna dialect the word used of plucking figs) signifies to pluck; the Aethiop. trans. ararku karbé, I have plucked myrrh; for the Aethiop. has arara instead of simply ארה. אֲרָרָה is here בָּשָׁם deflected. While בָּשָׁם, with its plur. b'sāmin, denotes fragrance in general, and only balsam specially, bāsām = (Arab.) bashām is the proper name of the balsam-tree (the Mecca balsam), amyris opobalsamum, which, according to Forskal, is indigenous in the central mountain region of Jemen (S. Arabia); it is also called (Arab.) balsaman; the word found its way in this enlarged form into the West, and then returned in the forms אֲפֹסְלִסְמוֹן, בְּלִסְמוֹן, אֲפֹרֶסְמָא (Syr. afrusomo), into the East. Balsam and other spices were brought in abundance to King Solomon as a present by the Queen of Sheba, 1 Kings x. 10; the celebrated balsam plantations of Jericho (vid. Winer's Real-W.), which continued to be productive till the Roman period, might owe their origin to the friendly relations which Solomon sustained to the south Arab. princess. Instead of the Indian aloe, iv. 14, the Jamanic balsam is here connected with myrrh as a figure of Shulamith's excellences. The plucking, eating, and drinking are only interchangeable figurative descriptions of the enjoyment of love.

"Honey and milk," says Solomon, iv. 11, "is under thy tongue." יַיִר is like יַיִרָה, 1 Sam. xiv. 27, the comb (farus) or cells containing the honey,—a designation which has perhaps been borrowed from porous lava.<sup>1</sup> With honey and milk "under the tongue" wine is connected, to which, and that of the noblest kind, vii. 10, Shulamith's palate is compared. Wine and milk together are οἰνόγαλα, which Chloe presents to Daphnis (Longus, i. 23). Solomon and his Song here hover on the pinnacle of full enjoyment; but if one understands his figurative language as it interprets itself, it here also expresses that delight of satisfaction which the author of Ps. xix. 6*a* transfers to the countenance of the rising sun, in words of a chaste purity which sexual love never abandons, in so far as it is connected with esteem for a beloved wife, and with the preservation of mutual personal dignity. For this very reason the words of Solomon, 1*a*, cannot be thought of as spoken to the guests. Between iv. 16 and v. 1*a* the bridal night intervenes. The words used in 1*a* are Solomon's morning salutation to her who has now wholly become his own. The call addressed to the guests at the feast is given forth on the second day of the marriage, which, according to ancient custom, Gen. xxix. 28, Judg. xiv. 12, was wont to be celebrated for seven days, Tob. xi. 18. The dramatical character of the Song leads to this result, that the pauses are passed over, the scenes are quickly changed, and the times appear to be continuous.

The plur. יָרִים Hengst. thinks always designates "love" (Liebe); thus, after Prov. vii. 28, also here: Eat, friends, drink and intoxicate yourselves in love. But the summons, inebriamini amoribus, has a meaning if regarded as directed by the guests to the married pair, but not as directed to the guests. And while we may say יָרִים רִיחַ, yet not יָרִים שָׁכַר, for shakar has always only the accus. of a spirituous liquor after it. Therefore none of the old translators (except only the Venet.: μεθύσθητε ἔρωσι) understood dodim, notwithstanding that elsewhere in the Song it means love, in another than a personal sense; יָרִים and יָרִים are here the plur. of the elsewhere parallels יָרִים and יָרִים, e.g. v. 16*b*, according to which also (cf. on the contrary, iv. 16*b*) they are accentuated. Those who are assembled are, as sympathizing friends, to participate in the pleasures of the feast. The Song of Songs has here reached its climax. A Paul would not hesitate, after Eph. v. 31 f., to extend the mystical interpretation even to this. Of the antitype of the marriage pair it is said: "For the marriage of the Lamb is come, and His wife hath made herself ready" (Rev. xix. 7); and of the antitype of the marriage guests: "Blessed are they which are called unto the marriage supper of the Lamb" (Rev. xix. 9).

FOURTH ACT.

LOVE DISDAINED BUT WON AGAIN.—CHAP. V. 2-VI. 9.

FIRST SCENE OF THE FOURTH ACT, V. 2-VI. 3.

In this fourth Act we are not now carried back to the time when Solomon's relation to Shulamith was first being formed. We are not placed here amid the scenes of their first love, but of those of their married life, and of their original ardour of affection maintaining itself not without trial. This is evident from the circumstance that in the first two Acts the beloved is addressed by the title רַעִי (my friend, beloved), and that the third Act rises<sup>1</sup> to the title כַּלָּה (bride) and אַחֵתִי כַּלָּה (my sister-bride); in the fourth Act, on the other hand, along with the title ra'yaihi, we hear no longer calla, nor ahhothi

<sup>1</sup> Among the Slovacs a bride is called malducha, "virgin-bride," before she has a cap placed on her head; and after that, nevesta, "bride-spouse." In England, bride does not designate the betrothed as such, but the betrothed when near her marriage.

calla, but simply ahhothi,<sup>1</sup>—a title of address which contributes to heighten the relation, to idealize it, and give it a mystical background. We have here presented to us pictures from the life of the lovers after their marriage has been solemnized. Shulamith, having reached the goal of her longing, has a dream like that which she had (iii. 1-4) before she reached that goal. But the dreams, however they resemble each other, are yet also different, as their issues show; in the former, she seeks him, and having found him holds him fast; here, she seeks him and finds him not. That that which is related belongs to the dream-life in ch. iii., was seen from the fact that it was inconceivable as happening in real life; here that which is related is expressly declared in the introductory words as having occurred in a dream.

Ver. 2 I sleep, but my heart keeps waking—Hearken! my beloved is knocking:
 Open to me, my sister, my love,
 My dove, my perfect one;
 For my head is filled with dew,
 My locks (are) full of the drops of the night.

The partic. subst. clauses, 2a, indicate the circumstances under which that which is related in 2b occurred. In the principal sentence in hist. prose  $\text{קֹרֵא}$  would be used; here, in the dramatic vivacity of the description, is found in its stead the interject. vozem = ausculta with the gen. foll., and a word designating<sup>2</sup> state or condition added, thought of as accus. according to the Semitic syntax (like Gen. iv. 10; Jer. x. 22; cf. 1 Kings xiv. 6). To sleep while the heart wakes signifies to dream, for sleep and distinct consciousness cannot be co-existent; the movements of thought either remain in obscurity or are projected as dreams.  $\text{עָר}$  = 'awir is formed from  $\text{עָר}$ , to be awake

<sup>2</sup>  $\text{קֹרֵא}$  [is knocking] is not an attribute to the determinate  $\text{הַיְיָרֵאָה$  [my beloved] which it follows, but a designation of state or condition, and thus acc., as the Beirut translation renders it: "hear my beloved in the condition of one knocking." On the other hand,  $\text{קֹרֵא הַיְיָרֵאָה}$  signifies "a beloved one knocking." But "hear a beloved one knocking" would also be expressed acc. In classical language, the designation of state, if the subst. to which it belongs is indeterminate, is placed before it, e.g. "at the gate stood a beloved one knocking."

(in its root cogn. to the Aryan gar, of like import in γρηγορέω, éyélpeiv), in the same way as מַוִּיִּת = mawith from מִוִּיִּת. The ו has here the conj. sense of “diuweil” (because), like asher in Eccles. vi. 12, viii. 15. The ד dag, which occurs several times elsewhere (vid. under Prov. iii. 8, xiv. 10), is one of the inconsistencies of the system of punctuation, which in other instances does not double the ד; perhaps a relic of the Babylonian idiom, which was herein more accordant with the lingual nature of the ד than the Tiberian, which treated it as a semi-guttural. קָצַרְתָּ, a lock of hair, from קָצַר = קָצַר, abscidit, follows in the formation of the idea, the analogy of קָצַיִר, in the sense of branch, from קָצַר, deseuit; one so names a part which is removed without injury to the whole, and which presents itself conveniently for removal; cf. the oath sworn by Egyptian women, lahaját mukšúsi, “by the life of my separated,” i.e. “of my locks” (Lane, Egypt, etc., I. 38). The word still survives in the Talmud dialect. Of a beautiful young man who proposed to become a Nazarite, Nedarim 9a says the same as the Jer. Horajoth iii. 4 of a man who was a prostitute in Rome: his locks were arranged in separate masses, like heap upon heap; in Bereshith rabba c. lxx., under Gen. xxvii. 11, קָצַרְתָּ, curly-haired, is placed over against קָרַח, bald-headed, and the Syr. also has kausoto as the designation of locks of hair,—a word used by the Peshito as the rendering of the Heb. קָצַיִר, as the Syro-Hexap. Job xvi. 12, the Greek κόμη. טַל, from טַלַּל (טַלַּל, to moisten, viz. the ground; to squirt, viz. blood), is in Arabic drizzling rain, in Heb. dew; the drops of the night (רִטְסִים, from רָטַס, to sprinkle, to drizzle)<sup>1</sup> are just drops of dew, for the precipitation of the damp air assumes this form in nights which are not so cold as to become frosty. Shulamith thus dreams that her beloved seeks admission to her. He comes a long way and at night. In the most tender words he entreats for that which he expects without delay. He addresses her, “my sister,” as one of equal rank with himself, and familiar as a sister with a brother; “my love” (רַעֲיָה), as one freely chosen by him to intimate fellowship; “my dove,” as beloved and prized by him on account of her purity, simplicity, and loveliness. The meaning of the fourth designation used by him, תַּמָּתִי, is shown by the Arab. tam to be "wholly devoted," whence teim, "one devoted" = a servant, and mutajjam, desperately in love with one. In addressing her תַּמָּתִי, he thus designates this love as wholly undivided, devoting itself without evasion and without reserve. But on this occasion this love did not approve itself, at least not at once.

<sup>1</sup> According to the primary idea: to break that which is solid or fluid into little pieces, wherefore רִטְסִים means also broken pieces. To this root appertains also the Arab. rashh, to trickle through, to sweat through, II. to moisten (e.g. the mouth of a suckling with milk), and the Aethiop. rasēha, to be stained. Drops scattered with a sprinkling brush the Arabs call rashaḥāt; in the mystical writings, rashaḥāt el-uns (dew-drops of intimacy) is the designation of sporadic gracious glances of the deity.

Ver. 3 I have put off my dress,
How shall I put it on again?
I have washed my feet,
How shall I defile them again?

She now lies unclothed in bed. בְּתִנָּה is the χιτών worn next the body, from בתן, linen (diff. from the Arab. kutun, cotton, whence French coton, calico = cotton-stuff). She had already washed her feet, from which it is supposed that she had throughout the day walked barefooted,—how אֵיכָה (הָ), how? both times with the tone on the penult.;<sup>1</sup> cf. אֵיכָה, where? i. 7) should she again put on her dress, which she had already put off and laid aside (פָּשַׁטְתִּי)? why should she soil (אִמְנַמֵּם, relating to the fem. רַגְלִי, for אִמְנַמֵּן) again her feet, that had been washed clean? Shulamith is here brought back to the customs as well as to the home of her earlier rural life; but although she should thus have been enabled to reach a deeper and more lively consciousness of the grace of the king, who stoops to an equality with her, yet she does not meet his love with an equal requital. She is unwilling for his sake to put herself to trouble, or to do that which is disagreeable to her. It cannot be thought that such an interview actually took place; and yet what she here dreamed had not only inward reality, but also full reality. For in a dream, that which is natural to us or that which belongs to our very constitution becomes manifest, and much that is kept down during our waking hours by the power of the will, by a sense of propriety, and by the activities of life, comes to light during sleep; for fancy then stirs up the ground of our nature and brings it forth in dreams, and thus exposes us to ourselves in such a way as oftentimes, when we waken, to make us ashamed and alarmed. Thus it was with Shulamith. In the dream it was inwardly manifest that she had lost her first love. She relates it with sorrow; for scarcely had she rejected him with these unworthy deceitful pretences when she comes to herself again.

<sup>1</sup> That it has the tone on the penult., like בְּכָה, e.g., v. 9, is in conformity with the paragog. nature of ה. The tone, however, when the following word in close connection begins with א, goes to the ult., Esth. vii. 6. That this does not occur in 'איכ' אל, is explained from the circumstance that the word has the disjunctive Tifcha. But why not in 'איכ' אט? I think it is for the sake of the rhythm. Pinsker, Einl. p. 184, seeks to change the accentuation in order that the penult. accent might be on the second איכ, but that is not necessary. Cf. Ps. cxxxvii. 7.

Ver. 4 My beloved stretched his hand through the opening,
And my heart was moved for him.

הָרַר,<sup>1</sup> from the verb הָרַר, in the sense of to break through (R. הָרַר, whence also הָרַר, i. 10, and הָרַר, Arab. kharam, part. broken through, e.g. of a lattice-window), signifies foramen, a hole, also caverna (whence the name of the Troglodytes, הָרַר, and the Haurân, הָרַר), here the loophole in the door above (like khawkht, the little door for the admission of individuals in the street or house-door). It does not properly mean a window, but a part of the door pierced through at the upper part of the lock of the door (the door-bolt). פְּתֹחַ הַחֹרֶרֶת is understood from the standpoint of one who is within; "by the opening from without to within," thus "through the opening;" stretching his hand through the door-opening as if to open the door, if possible, by the pressing back of the lock from within, he shows how greatly he longed after Shulamith. And she was again very deeply moved when she perceived this longing, which she had so coldly responded to: the interior of her body, with the organs which, after the bibl. idea, are the seat of the tenderest emotions, or rather, in which they reflect themselves, both such as are agreeable and such as are sorrowful, groaned within her,—an expression of deep sympathy so common, that "the sounding of the bowels," Isa. lxiii. 15, an expression used, and that anthropopathically of God Himself, is a direct designation of sympathy or inner participation. The phrase here wavers between עָלָי and עָלָי (thus, e.g. Nissel, 1662). Both forms are admissible. It is true we say elsewhere only naphshi 'alâi, ruhi 'alâi, libbi 'alâi, for the Ego distinguishes itself from its substance (cf. System d. bibl. Psychologie, p. 151 f.); meâi 'alâi, instead of bi (בִּי), would, however, be also explained from this, that the bowels are meant, not anatomically, but as psychical organs. But the old translators (LXX., Targ., Syr., Jerome, Venet.) rendered עָלָי, which rests on later ms. authority (vid. Norzi and de Rossi), and is also more appropriate: her bowels are stirred, viz. over him, i.e. on account of him (Alkabez: בַּעֲבוּרֵי). As she will now open to him, she is inwardly more ashamed, as he has come so full of love and longing to make her glad.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. the Arab. ghawr (ghôr), as a sinking of the earth, and khawr (khôr), as a breaking through, and, as it were, a piercing. The mouth of a river is also called khôr, because there the sea breaks into the river.

Ver. 5 I arose to open to my beloved,
 And my hands dropped with myrrh,
 And my fingers with liquid myrrh,
 On the handle of the bolt.

The personal pron.  $\text{אֲנִי}$  stands without emphasis before the verb which already contains it; the common language of the people delights in such particularity. The Book of Hosea, the Ephraimite prophet's work, is marked by such a style.  $\text{מוֹר עֵינַי}$ , with which the parallel clause goes beyond the simple  $m\ddot{o}r$ , is myrrh flowing over, dropping out of itself, i.e. that which breaks through the bark of the balsamodendron myrrha, or which flows out if an incision is made in it; myrrha stacte, of which Pliny (xii. 35) says: cui nulla praeferitur, otherwise  $\text{מֵרֹר דְּרֹר}$ , from  $\text{דָּרַר}$ , to gush out, to pour itself forth in rich jets. He has come perfumed as if for a festival, and the costly ointment which he brought with him has dropped on the handles of the bolts ( $\text{מִנְעִיל}$ , keeping locked, after the form  $\text{מִלְבִּישׁ}$ , drawing on), viz. the inner bolt, which he wished to withdraw. A classical parallel is found in Lucretius, iv. 1171:

*“ At lacrimans exclusus amator limina saepe
 Floribus et sertis operit postesque superbos Unguit amaractino ” . . .*

Böttch. here puts to Hitzig the question, “Did the shepherd, the peasant of Engedi, bring with him oil of myrrh?” Rejecting this reasonable explanation, he supposes that the Shulamitess, still in Solomon's care, on rising up quickly dipped her hand in the oil of myrrh, that she might refresh her beloved. She thus had it near her before her bed, as a sick person her decoction. The right answer was, that the visitant by night is not that imaginary personage, but it is Solomon. She had dreamed that he stood before her door and knocked. But finding no response, he again in a moment withdrew, when it was proved that Shulamith did not requite his love and come forth to meet it in its fulness as she ought.

Ver. 6 I opened to my beloved;
 And my beloved had withdrawn, was gone:
 My soul departed when he spake—
 I sought him, and found him not;
 I called him, and he answered me not.

As the disciples at Emmaus, when the Lord had vanished from the midst of them, said to one another: Did not our heart burn within us when He spake with us? so Shulamith says that when he spake, i.e. sought admission to her, she was filled with alarm, and almost terrified to death. Love-ecstasy ( $\text{ἐκστάσην}$ ), as contrast to  $\text{γενέσθαι}$ ἐν ἑαυτῷ) is not to be here understood, for in such a state she would have flown to meet him; but a sinking of the soul, such as is described by Terence (And. I. 5. 16):

“Oratio haec me miseram exanimavit metu.”

The voice of her beloved struck her heart; but in the consciousness that she had estranged herself from him, she could not openly meet him and offer empty excuses. But now she recognises it with sorrow that she had not replied to the deep impression of his loving words; and seeing him disappear without finding him, she calls after him whom she had slighted, but he answers her not. The words: “My soul departed when he spake,” are the reason why she now sought him and called upon him, and they are not a supplementary remark (Zöckl.); nor is there need for the correction of the text בְּרָבַרְי, which should mean: (my soul departed) when he turned his back (Ewald), or, behind him (Hitz., Böttch.), from רָבַר = (Arab.) dabara, tergum vertere, praeterire,—the Heb. has the word רָבַרְי, the hinder part, and as it appears, רָבַרְי, to act from behind (treacherously) and destroy, 2 Chron. xxii. 10; cf. under Gen. xxxiv. 13, but not the Kal רָבַרְי, in that Arab. signification. The meaning of הִטַּק has been hit upon by Aquila (ἔκλιων), Symmachus (ἀπονεύσας), and Jerome (declinaverat); it signifies to turn aside, to take a different direction, as the Hithpa. Jer. xxxi. 22: to turn oneself away; cf. הִפּוּקִים, turnings, bendings, vii. 2. הִבַּק and אָבַק (cf. Gen. xxxii. 25), Aethiop. ḥakafa, Amhar. akafa (reminding us of גָּחַץ, Hiph. הִקִּיף), are usually compared; all of these, however, signify to “encompass;” but הִטַּק does not denote a moving in a circle after something, but a half circular motion away from something; so that in the Arab. the prevailing reference to fools, aḥamk, does not appear to proceed from the idea of closeness, but of the oblique direction, pushed sideways. Turning himself away, he proceeded farther. In vain she sought him; she called without receiving any answer. עָנִי is the correct pausal form of עָנִי, vid. under Ps. cxviii. 5. But something worse than even this seeking and calling in vain happened to her.

Ver. 7 The watchmen who go about in the city found me,
They beat me, wounded me;
My upper garment took away from me,
The watchmen of the walls.

She sought her beloved, not “in the midbar” (open field), nor “in the kepharim” (villages), but בעיר, “in the city,”—a circumstance which is fatal to the shepherd-hypothesis here, as in the other dream. There in the city she is found by the watchmen who patrol the city.

and have their proper posts on the walls to watch those who approach the city and depart from it (cf. Isa. lxii. 6). These rough, regardless men,—her story returns at the close like a palindrome to those previously named,—who judge only according to that which is external, and have neither an eye nor a heart for the sorrow of a loving soul, struck (חָבַהּ, from נָחַהּ, to pierce, hit, strike) and wounded (פָּצַע, R. פָּצַע, to divide, to inflict wounds in the flesh) the royal spouse as a common woman, and so treated her, that, in order to escape being made a prisoner, she was constrained to leave her upper robe in their hands (Gen. xxxix. 12). This upper robe, not the veil which at iv. 1, 3 we found was called tsammā, is called רָדִיד. Aben Ezra compares with it the Arab. riḍā, a plaid-like over-garment, which was thrown over the shoulders and veiled the upper parts of the body. But the words have not the same derivation. The riḍā has its name from its reaching downward,—probably from the circumstance that, originally, it hung down to the feet, so that one could tread on it; but the (Heb.) rīḍid (in Syr. the dalmatica of the deacons), from רָדַד, Hiph., 1 Kings vi. 32, Targ., Talm., Syr., רָדַד, to make broad and thin, as expansum, i.e. a thin and light upper robe, viz. over the cuttonēth, 3a. The LXX. suitably translates it here and at Gen. xxiv. 65 (hatstsāiph, from tsa'aph, to lay together, to fold, to make double or many-fold) by θέριστρον, a summer over-dress. A modern painter, who represents Shulamith as stripped naked by the watchmen, follows his own sensual taste, without being able to distinguish between tunica and pallium; for neither Luther, who renders by schleier (veil), nor Jerome, who has pallium (cf. the saying of Plautus: tunica propior pallio est), gives any countenance to such a freak of imagination. The city watchmen tore from off her the upper garment, without knowing and without caring to know what might be the motive and the aim of this her nocturnal walk.

All this Shulamith dreamed; but the painful feeling of repentance, of separation and misapprehension, which the dream left behind, entered as deeply into her soul as if it had been an actual external experience. Therefore she besought the daughters of Jerusalem :

Ver. 8 I adjure you, ye daughters of Jerusalem,
 If ye find my beloved,—
 What shall ye then say to him?
 “That I am sick of love.”

That DN is here not to be interpreted as the negative particle of adjuration (Böttch.), as at ii. 7, iii. 5, at once appears from the absurdity arising from such an interpretation. The or. directa, following "I adjure you," can also begin (Num. v. 19 f.) with the usual  $\text{אֲשָׁר}$ , which is followed by its conclusion. Instead of "that ye say to him I am sick of love," she asks the question: What shall ye say to him? and adds the answer: quod aegra sum amore, or, as Jerome rightly renders, in conformity with the root-idea of חלה: quia amore languo; while, on the other hand, the LXX. :  $\delta\tau\iota\ \tau\epsilon\tau\rho\omega\mu\acute{\epsilon}\nu\eta\ (\text{saucia})\ \alpha\gamma\acute{\alpha}\pi\eta\varsigma\ \acute{\epsilon}\gamma\acute{\omega}\ \epsilon\iota\mu\iota$ , as if the word were חלה, from חלל. The question proposed, with its answer, inculcates in a naive manner that which is to be said, as one examines beforehand a child who has to order something. She turns to the daughters of Jerusalem, because she can presuppose in them, in contrast with those cruel watchmen, a sympathy with her love-sorrow, on the ground of their having had similar experiences. They were also witnesses of the origin of this covenant of love, and graced the marriage festival by their sympathetic love. When, therefore, they put to her the question:

Ver. 9 What is thy beloved before another (beloved),
 Thou fairest of women?
 What is thy beloved before another (beloved),
 That thou dost adjure us thus?

the question thus asked cannot proceed from ignorance; it can only have the object of giving them the opportunity of hearing from Shulamith's own mouth and heart her laudatory description of him, whom they also loved, although they were not deemed worthy to stand so near to him as she did who was thus questioned. Böttch. and Ewald, secs. 325a, 326a, interpret the  $\text{מִן}$  in  $\text{מִי־דוֹר}$  partitively: quid amati (as in Cicero: quod hominis amatus tuus; but then the words would have been  $\text{מִה־דוֹר}$ , if such a phrase were admissible; for  $\text{מִה־דוֹר}$  certainly of itself alone means quid amati, what kind of a beloved. Thus the  $\text{מִן}$  is the comparative (prae amato), and  $\text{דוֹר}$  the sing., representing the idea of species or kind;  $\text{מִי־דוֹרִים}$ , here easily misunderstood, is purposely avoided. The use of the form  $\text{הַשְּׂבַעֲתֵינוּ}$  is one of the many instances of the disregard of the generic distinction occurring in this Song, which purposely, after the manner of the vulgar language, ignores pedantic regularity.

Hereupon Shulamith describes to them who ask what her beloved is. He is the fairest of men. Everything that is glorious in the kingdom of nature, and, so far as her look extends, everything in the sphere of art, she appropriates, so as to present a picture of his external appearance. Whatever is precious, lovely, and grand, is all combined in the living beauty of his person.<sup>1</sup> She first praises the mingling of colours in the countenance of her beloved.

Ver. 10 My beloved is dazingly white and ruddy, Distinguished above ten thousand.

The verbal root חצ has the primary idea of purity, i.e. freedom from disturbance and muddiness, which, in the stems springing from it, and in their manifold uses, is transferred to undisturbed health (Arab. ṣaḥḥ, cf. baria, of smoothness of the skin), a temperate stomach and clear head, but particularly to the clearness and sunny brightness of the heavens, to dazzling whiteness (חצצ, Lam. iv. 7; cf. חצצ), and then to parched dryness, resulting from the intense and continued rays of the sun; חצ is here adj. from חצצ, Lam. iv. 7, bearing almost the same relation to חצצ as λαμπρός to λευκός, cogn. with lucere. חצצ, R. חצ, to condense, is properly dark-red, called by the Turks kujū kirmesi (from kujū, thick, close, dark), by the French rouge foncé, of the same root as חצ, the name for blood, or a thick and dark fluid. White, and indeed a dazzling white, is the colour of his flesh, and redness, deep redness, the colour of his blood tinging his flesh. Whiteness among all the race-colours is the one which best accords with the dignity of man; pure delicate whiteness is among the Caucasian races a mark of high rank, of superior training, of hereditary nobility; wherefore, Lam. iv. 7, the appearance of the nobles of Jerusalem is likened in whiteness to snow and milk, in redness to corals; and Homer, Il. iv. 141, says of Menelaus that he appeared stained with gore, “as when some woman tinges ivory with purple colour.” In this mingling of white and red, this fulness of life and beauty, he is חצצ, distinguished above myriads. The old translators render dagul by “chosen” (Aquila, Symm., Syr., Jerome, Luther), the LXX. by ἐκλελοχισμένος, e cohorte selectus; but it means “bannered” (degel, ii. 4), as the Venet.: σσημαιωμένος, i.e. thus distinguished, as that which is furnished with a degel, a banner, a pennon. Grätz takes dagul as the Greek σημειωτός (noted). With חצצ, as a designation of an inconceivable number, Rashi rightly compares Ezek. xvi. 7. Since the “ten thousand” are here thought of, not in the same manner as חצצ, the particle min is not the compar. magis quam, but, as at Gen. iii. 14, Judg. v. 24, Isa. lii. 14, prae, making conspicuous (cf. Virgil, Aen. v. 435, prae omnibus unum). After this praise of the bright blooming countenance, which in general distinguished the personal appearance of her beloved, so far as it was directly visible, there now follows a detailed description, beginning with his head.

<sup>1</sup> Hengstenberg finds in this eulogium, on the supposition that Solomon is the author, and is the person who is here described, incomprehensible self-praise. But he does not certainly say all this immediately of himself, but puts it into the mouth of Shulamith, whose love he gained. But love idealizes; she sees him whom she loves, not as others see him,—she sees him in her own transforming light.

Ver. 11 His head is precious fine gold,
His locks hill upon hill,
Black as the raven.

The word-connection פָּזָהָם, occurring only here, serves as a designation of the very finest pure gold; for פָּהָם (hiding, then that which is hidden), from בָּהָם, R. כַּח (vid. concerning the words appertaining to this root, under Ps. lxxxvii. 6), is the name of fine gold, which was guarded as a jewel (cf. Prov. xxv. 12), and פָּז (with long ā) is pure gold freed from inferior metals, from פָּזַר, to set free, and generally violently to free (cf. zahav nuphaz, 1 Kings x. 18, with zahav tahor, 2 Chron. ix. 17). The Targ. to the Hagiog. translate פָּז by אֹבֵרְיִזָּא (e.g. Ps. cxix. 127), or אֹבֵרְיִזָּיָא (e.g. Ps. xix. 11), ὄβρυζον, i.e. gold which has stood the fire-proof (obrussa) of the cupel or the crucible. Grammatically regarded, the word-connection kethem paz is not genit., like kethem ophir, but appositional, like naarah b'thulah, Deut. xxii. 28, z'vachim sh'lamim, Ex. xxiv. 5, etc. The point of comparison is the imposing nobility of the fine form and noble carriage of his head. In the description of the locks of his hair the LXX. render תְּלַחִים by ἐλάται, Jerome by sicut elatae palmarum, like the young twigs, the young shoots of the palm. Ewald regards it as a harder parall. form of תְּלָלִים, Isa. xviii. 15, vine-branches; and Hitzig compares the Thousand and One Nights, iii. 180, where the loose hair of a maiden is likened to twisted clusters of grapes. The possibility of this meaning is indisputable, although (Arab.) taltalat, a drinking-vessel made of the inner bark of palm-branches, is named, not from taltalah, as the name of the palm-branch, but from taltala, to shake down, viz. in the throat. The palm-branch, or the vine-branch, would be named from תְּלָלָה, pendulum esse, to hang loosely and with a wavering motion, the freq. of תְּלָה, pendere. The Syr. also think on תְּלָה, for it translates "spread out," i.e. waving downward; and the Venet., which translates by ἀπαιωρήματα. The point of comparison would be the freshness and flexibility of the abundant long hair of the head, in contrast to motionless close-lying smoothness. One may think of Jupiter, who, when he shakes his head, moves heaven and earth. But, as against this, we have the fact: (1) That the language has other names for palm-branches and vine-branches; the former are called in the Song vii. 9, sansinnim. (2) That תְּלַחִים, immediately referred to the hair, but not in the sense of "hanging locks" (Böttch.), is still in use in the post-bibl. Heb. (vid. under v. 2*b*); the Targ. also, in translating רִיגְרִיז רִיגְרִיז, cumuli cumuli, thinks חללים = תלין תלין. Menachoth 29*b*. A hill is called תל, (Arab.) tall, from תלל, prosternere, to throw along, as of earth thrown out, sand, or rubbish; and תלתל, after the form תליל, in use probably only in the plur., is a hilly country which rises like steps, or presents an undulating appearance. Seen from his neck upwards, his hair forms in undulating lines, hill upon hill. In colour, these locks of hair are black as a raven, which bears the Semitic name עורב from its blackness (ערב), but in India is called kārava from its croaking. The raven-blackness of the hair contrasts with the whiteness and redness of the countenance, which shines forth as from a dark ground, from a black border. The eyes are next described.

Ver. 12 His eyes like doves by the water-brooks,
Bathing in milk, stones beautifully set

The eyes in their glancing moistness (cf. ὑγρότης τῶν ὀμμάτων, in Plutarch, of a languishing look), and in the movement of their pupils, are like doves which sip at the water-brooks, and move to and fro beside them. עֵינַי, from עֵינָה, continere, is a watercourse, and then also the water itself flowing in it (vid. under Ps. xviii. 16), as (Arab.) wadin, a valley, and then the river flowing in the valley, bahr, the sea-basin (properly the cleft), and then also the sea itself. The pred. "bathing" refers to the eyes (cf. iv. 9), not to the doves, if this figure is continued. The pupils of the eyes, thus compared with doves, seem as if bathing in milk, in that they swim, as it were, in the white in the eye. But it is a question whether the figure of the doves is continued also in יְשׁוּבוֹת עַל-מַלְאָת. It would be the case if milleth meant "fulness of water," as it is understood, after the example of the LXX., also by Aquila (ἐκχύσεις), Jerome (fluenta plenissima), and the Arab. (piscinas aqua refertas); among the moderns, by Döpke, Gesen., Hengst., and others. But this pred. would then bring nothing new to 12*a*; and although in the Syr. derivatives from ܡܠܐ signify flood and high waters, yet the form milleth does not seem, especially without מים, to be capable of bearing this signification. Luther's translation also, although in substance correct: vnd stehen in der fülle (and stand in fulness) (milleth, like שְׂמֹתָא of the Syr., πληρώσεως of the Gr. Venet., still defended by Hitz.), yet does not bring out the full force of milleth, which, after the analogy of עֵינַי, רִצְפָה, appears to have a concrete signification which is seen from a comparison of Ex. xxv. 7, xxvii. 17, 20, xxxix. 13. There מִלְאָת and מִלְאָתִים signify not the border with precious stones, but, as rightly maintained by Keil, against Knobel, their filling in, i.e. their bordering, setting. Accordingly, milleth will be a synon. technical expression: the description, passing from the figure of the dove, says further of the eyes, that they are firm on (in) their setting; עַל is suitable, for the precious stone is laid within the casket in which it is contained. Hitzig has, on the contrary, objected that מלאה and מלאים denote filling up, and thus that milleth cannot be a filling up, and still less the place thereof. But as in the Talm. מליית signifies not only fulness, but also stuffed fowls or pies, and as πλήρωμα in its manifold aspects is used not only of that with which anything is filled, but also of that which is filled (e.g. of a ship that is manned, and Eph. i. 23 of the church in which Christ, as in His body, is immanent),—thus also milleth, like the German “Fassung,” may be used of a ring-casket (funda or pala) in which the precious stone is put. That the eyes are like a precious stone in its casket, does not merely signify that they fill the sockets,—for the bulbus of the eye in every one fills the orbita,—but that they are not sunk like the eyes of one who is sick, which fall back on their supporting edges in the orbita, and that they appear full and large as they press forward from wide and open eyelids. The cheeks are next described.

Ver. 13a His cheeks like a bed of sweet herbs,
Towers of spicy plants.

A flower-bed is called ערנית, from ערני, to be oblique, inclined. His cheeks are like such a soft raised bed, and the impression their appearance makes is like the fragrance which flows from such a bed planted with sweet-scented flowers. Migdaloth are the tower-like or pyramidal mounds, and merkahhim are the plants used in spicery. The point of comparison here is thus the soft elevation; perhaps with reference to the mingling of colours, but the word chosen (merkahhim) rather refers to the lovely, attractive, heart-refreshing character of the impression. The Venet., keeping close to the existing text: αἱ σιαγόνες αὐτοῦ ὡς πρασιά τοῦ ἀρώματος, πύργοι ἀρωματισμῶν (thus (not ἀρωματιστῶν) according to Gebhardt's just conjecture). But is the punctuation here correct? The sing. כערונית is explained from this, that the bed is presented as sloping from its height downward on two parallel sides; but the height would then be the nose dividing the face, and the plur. would thus be more suitable; and the LXX., Symm., and other ancient translators have, in fact, read כערונית. But still less is the phrase migd'loth merkahhim to be comprehended; for a tower, however diminutive it may be, is not a proper figure for a soft elevation, nor even a graduated flowery walk, or a terraced flowery hill,—a tower always presents, however round one may conceive it, too much the idea of a natural chubbiness, or of a diseased tumour. Therefore the expression used by the LXX., φύουσαι μυρεψικά, i.e. 'מְגִדְלוֹת מֵרֶק', commends itself. Thus also Jerome: sicut areolae aromatum consitae a pigmentariis, and the Targ. (which refers לְחַיִּים לְחַיִּים allegorically to the לְחַיִּים of the law, and merkahhim to the refinements of the Halacha): "like the rows of a garden of aromatic plants which produce (gignent) deep, penetrating sciences, even as a (magnificent) garden, aromatic plants." Since we read בְּעֵרוֹנֵי מְגִדְלוֹת, we do not refer migadloth, as Hitzig, who retains בְּעֵרוֹנֵי, to the cheeks, although their name, like that of the other members (e.g. the ear, hand, foot), may be fem. (Böttch. § 649), but to the beds of spices; but in this carrying forward of the figure we find, as he does, a reference to the beard and down on the cheeks. גִּדְלֵי is used of suffering the hair to grow, Num. vi. 5, as well as of cultivating plants; and it is a similar figure when Pindar, Nem. v. 11, compares the milk-hair of a young man to the fine woolly down of the expanding vine-leaves (vid. Passow). In merkahhim there scarcely lies anything further than that this flos juventae on the blooming cheeks gives the impression of the young shoots of aromatic plants; at all events, the merkahhim, even although we refer this feature in the figure to the fragrance of the unguents on the beard, are not the perfumes themselves, to which m'gadloth is not appropriate, but fragrant plants, so that in the first instance the growth of the beard is in view with the impression of its natural beauty.

Ver. 13b His lips lilies,
Dropping with liquid myrrh.

Lilies, viz. red lilies (vid. under ii. 1), unless the point of comparison is merely loveliness associated with dignity. She thinks of the lips as speaking. All that comes forth from them, the breath in itself, and the breath formed into words, is מֵזֶרַח עֵינַי, most precious myrrh, viz. such as of itself wells forth from the bark of the balsamodendron. עֵינַי, the running over of the eyes (cf. myrrha in lacrimis, the most highly esteemed sort, as distinguished from myrrha in granis), with which Dillmann combines the Aethiop. name for myrrh, karbé (vid. under v. 5).

Ver. 14a His hands golden cylinders,
Filled in with stones of Tarshish.

The figure, according to Gesen., Heb. Wörterbuch, and literally also Heiligst., is derived from the closed hand, and the stained nails are compared to precious stones. Both statements are incorrect; for (1) although it is true that then Israelitish women, as at the present day Egyptian and Arabian women, stained their eyes with stibium (vid.

under Isa. liv. 11), yet it is nowhere shown that they, and particularly men, stained the nails of their feet and their toes with the orange-yellow of the Alhenna (Lane's Egypt, I. 33–35); and (2) the word used is not  $\text{יָבֵן}$ , but  $\text{יָדָן}$ ; it is thus the outstretched hands that are meant; and only these, not the closed fist, could be compared to "lilies," for  $\text{לֵלֵךְ}$  signifies not a ring (Cocc., Döpke, Böttch., etc.), but that which is rolled up, a roller, cylinder (Esth. i. 6), from  $\text{לָלַךְ}$ , which properly means not κυκλῶν (Venet., after Gebhardt: κεκυκλωμένοι), but κυλίνδειν. The hands thus are meant in respect of the fingers, which on account of their noble and fine form, their full, round, fleshy mould, are compared to bars of gold formed like rollers, garnished ( $\text{בְּסַבְבֵּי אֲבָנִים}$ , like  $\text{בְּסַבְבֵּי אֲבָנִים}$ , Ex. xxviii. 17) with stones of Tarshish, to which the nails are likened. The transparent horn-plates of the nails, with the lunula, the white segment of a circle at their roots, are certainly, when they are beautiful, an ornament to the hand, and, without our needing to think of their being stained, are worthily compared to the gold-yellow topaz. Tarshish is not the onyx, which derives its Heb. name  $\text{אֲבָנֵי יִשְׁבֵּל}$  from its likeness to the finger-nail, but the χρυσόλιθος, by which the word in this passage before us is translated by the Quinta and the Sexta, and elsewhere also by the LXX. and Aquila. But the chrysolite is the precious stone which is now called the topaz. It receives the name Tarshish from Spain, the place where it was found. Pliny, xxxviii. 42, describes it as aureo fulgore tralucens. Bredow erroneously interprets Tarshish of amber. There is a kind of chrysolite, indeed, which is called chryselectron, because in colorem electri declinans. The comparison of the nails to such a precious stone (Luther, influenced by the consonance, and apparently warranted by the plena hyacinthis of the Vulg., has substituted golden rings, vol Türkissen, whose blue-green colour is not suitable here), in spite of Hengst., who finds it insipid, is as true to nature as it is tender and pleasing. The description now proceeds from the uncovered to the covered parts of his body, the whiteness of which is compared to ivory and marble.

Ver. 14b His body an ivory work of art,
Covered with sapphires.

The plur.  $\text{בְּעֵינָיו}$  or  $\text{בְּעֵינָיו}$ , from  $\text{עֵינָהּ}$  or  $\text{עֵינָהּ}$  (vid. under Ps. xl. 9), signifies properly the tender parts, and that the inward parts of the body, but is here, like the Chald.  $\text{בְּעֵינָיו}$ , Dan. ii. 32, and the  $\text{בְּעֵינָיו}$ , vii. 3, which also properly signifies the inner part of the body, κοιλία, transferred to the body in its outward appearance. To the question how Shulamith should in such a manner praise that which is for the most part covered with clothing, it is not only to be answered that it is the poet who speaks by her mouth, but also that it is not the bride or the beloved, but the wife, whom he represents as thus speaking. עֲשָׂתָּ (from the peculiar Hebraeo-Chald. and Targ. עֲשָׂתָּ, which, after Jer. v. 28, like khalak, create, appears to proceed from the fundamental idea of smoothing) designates an artistic figure. Such a figure was Solomon's throne, made of יָשָׁ, the teeth of elephants, ivory,<sup>1</sup> 1 Kings x. 18. Here Solomon's own person, without reference to a definite admired work of art, is praised as being like an artistic figure made of ivory,—like it in regard to its glancing smoothness and its fine symmetrical form. When, now, this work of art is described as covered with sapphires (מְעִלְפָתָּ, referred to עֲשָׂתָּ, as apparently gramm., or as ideal, fem.), a sapphire-coloured robe is not meant (Hitzig, Ginsburg); for עֲלָהּ, which only means to disguise, would not at all be used of such a robe (Gen. xxxviii. 14; cf. xxiv. 65), nor would the one uniform colour of the robe be designated by sapphires in the plur. The choice of the verb עֲלָהּ (elsewhere used of veiling) indicates a covering shading the pure white, and in connection with מְסִירִים, thought of as accus., a moderating of the bright glance by a soft blue. For סָפִיר (a genuine Semit. word, like the Chald. שְׁפִיר; cf. regarding סָפִיר = שְׁפִיר, under Ps. xvi. 6) is the sky-blue sapphire (Ex. xxiv. 10), including the Lasurstein (lapis lazuli), sprinkled with golden, or rather with gold-like glistening points of pyrites, from which, with the l omitted, sky-blue is called azur (azure) (vid. under Job xxviii. 6). The work of art formed of ivory is quite covered over with sapphires fixed in it. That which is here compared is nothing else than the branching blue veins under the white skin.

Ver. 15a His legs white marble columns,
Set on bases of fine gold.

If the beauty of the living must be represented, not by colours, but in figurative language, this cannot otherwise be done than by the selection of minerals, plants, and things in general for the comparison, and the comparison must more or less come short, because dead soulless matter does not reach to a just and full representation of the living. Thus here, also, the description of the lower extremity, which reaches from the thighs and the legs down to the feet, of which last, in the words of an anatomist,<sup>2</sup> it may be said that "they form the pedestal for the bony pillars of the legs." The comparison is thus in accordance with fact; the שְׁוֹקִים (from שָׁק = (Arab.) sak, to drive: the movers forward), in the structure of the human frame, take in reality the place of "pillars," and the feet the place of "pedestals," as in the tabernacle the wooden pillars rested on small supports in which they were fastened, Ex. xxvi. 18 f. But in point of fidelity to nature, the symbol is inferior to a rigid Egyptian figure. Not only is it without life; it is not even capable of expressing the curvilinear shape which belongs to the living. On the other hand, it loses itself in symbol; for although it is in conformity with nature that the legs are compared to pillars of white (according to Aquila and Theod., Parian) marble,— $\text{שׁוֹטֵי} = \text{שׁוֹטֵי}$ , 1 Chron. xxix. 2 (material for the building of the temple), Talm.  $\text{בְּיָסוּדֵי}$ , of the same verbal root as  $\text{שׁוֹטֵי}$ , the name of the white lily,—the comparison of the feet to bases of fine gold is yet purely symbolical. Gold is a figure of that which is sublime and noble, and with white marble represents greatness combined with purity. He who is here praised is not a shepherd, but a king. The comparisons are thus so grand because the beauty of the beloved is in itself heightened by his kingly dignity.<sup>1</sup>

Ver. 15. His aspect like Lebanon, Distinguished as the cedars.

By  $\text{בְּחַיִּיר}$  the Chald. thinks of "a young man" (from  $\text{בָּחַר} = \text{בָּנִי}$ , to be matured, as at Ps. lxxxix. 20); but in that case we should have expected the word  $\text{בְּחַיִּירִים}$  instead of  $\text{בְּחַיִּירִים}$ . Luther, with all other translators, rightly renders "chosen as the cedars." His look, i.e. his appearance as a whole, is awe-inspiring, majestic, like Lebanon, the king of mountains; he (the praised one) is chosen, i.e. presents a rare aspect, rising high above the common man, like the cedars, those kings among trees, which as special witnesses of creative omnipotence are called "cedars of God," Ps. lxxx. 11 [10].  $\text{בְּחַיִּיר}$ , electus, everywhere else an attribute of persons, does not here refer to the look, but to him whose the look is; and what it means in union with the cedars is seen from Jer. xxii. 7; cf. Isa. xxxvii. 24. Here also it is seen (what besides is manifest), that the fairest of the children of men is a king. In conclusion, the description returns from elevation of rank to loveliness.

<sup>1</sup> Dillmann proposes the question, the answer to which he desiderates in Ewald, how the maiden could be so fluent in speaking of the new glories of the Solomonic era (plants and productions of art). Böttcher answers, that she had learned to know these whilst detained at court, and that the whole description has this ground-thought, that she possessed in her beloved all the splendour which the women of the harem value and enjoy. But already the first words of the description, "white and ruddy," exclude the sunburnt shepherd. To refer the gold, in the figurative description of the uncovered parts of the body, to this bronze colour is insipid.

And he is altogether precious [lovelinesses].

The palate, פֶּה, is frequently named as the organ of speech, Job vi. 30, xxxi. 30, Prov. v. 3, viii. 7; and it is also here used in this sense. The meaning, "the mouth for kissing," which Böttch. gives to the word, is fanciful; פֶּה (= hink, Arab. hanak) is the inner palate and the region of the throat, with the uvula underneath the chin. Partly with reference to his words, his lips have been already praised, 13*b*; but there the fragrance of his breath came into consideration, his breath both in itself and as serving for the formation of articulate words. But the naming of the palate can point to nothing else than his words. With this the description comes to a conclusion; for, from the speech, the most distinct and immediate expression of the personality, advance is made finally to the praise of the person. The pluraliatant. מִמְתָּקִים and מְתָקִים designate what they mention in richest fulness. His palate, i.e. that which he speaks and the manner in which he speaks it, is true sweetness (cf. Prov. xvi. 21; Ps. lv. 15), and his whole being true loveliness. With justifiable pride Shulamith next says:

Ver. 16*b This is my beloved and this my friend,
Ye daughters of Jerusalem!

The emphatically repeated "this" is here pred. (Luth.: "such an one is" . . .); on the other hand, it is subj. at Ex. iii. 15 (Luth.: "that is" . . .).

The daughters of Jerusalem now offer to seek along with Shulamith for her beloved, who had turned away and was gone.

Chap. vi. 1. Whither has thy beloved gone,
Thou fairest of women?
Whither has thy beloved turned,
That we may seek him with thee?

The longing remains with her even after she has wakened, as the after effect of her dream. In the morning she goes forth and meets with the daughters of Jerusalem. They cause Shulamith to describe her friend, and they ask whither he has gone. They wish to know the direction in which he disappeared from her, the way which he had probably taken (פָּנָה, R. פָּן, to drive, to urge forward, to turn from one to another), that with her they might go to seek him (Vav of the consequence or the object, as at Ps. lxxxiii. 17). The answer she gives proceeds on a conclusion which she draws from the inclination of her beloved.

Ver. 2 My beloved has gone down into the garden,
 To the beds of sweet herba,
 To feed in the gardens
 And gather lilies.

He is certainly, she means to say, there to be found where he delights most to tarry. He will have gone down—viz. from the palace (vi. 11 ; cf. 1 Kings xx. 43 and Esth. vii. 7)—into his garden, to the fragrant beds, there to feed in his garden and gather lilies (cf. Old Germ. “to collect rösen”); he is fond of gardens and flowers Shulamith expresses this in her shepherd-dialect, as when Jesus says of His Father (John xv. 1), “He is the husbandman.” Flower-beds are the feeding place (vid. regarding לְרֵעוֹת under ii. 16) of her beloved. Solomon certainly took great delight in gardens and parks, Eccles. ii. 5. But this historical fact is here idealized ; the natural flora which Solomon delighted in with intelligent interest presents itself as a figure of a higher Loveliness which was therein as it were typically manifest (cf. Rev. vii. 17, where the “Lamb,” “feeding,” and “fountains of water,” are applied as analogies, i.e. heavenward-pointing types). Otherwise it is not to be comprehended why it is lilies that are named. Even if it were supposed to be implied that lilies were Solomon’s favourite flowers, we must assume that his taste was determined by something more than by form and colour. The words of Shulamith give us to understand that the inclination and the favourite resort of her friend corresponded to his nature, which is altogether thoughtfulness and depth of feeling (cf. under Ps. xcii. 5, the reference to Dante : the beautiful women who gather flowers representing the paradisaical life); lilies, the emblems of unapproachable grandeur, purity inspiring reverence, high elevation above that which is common, bloom there wherever the lily-like one wanders, whom the lily of the valley calls her own. With the words :

Ver. 3 I am my beloved’s, and my beloved is mine,
 Who feeds among the lilies,

Shulamith farther proceeds, followed by the daughters of Jerusalem, to seek her friend lost through her own fault. She always says, not אֲנִי, but יְהוָה and רַעִי ; for love, although a passion common to mind and body, is in this Song of Songs viewed as much as possible apart from its basis in the animal nature. Also, that the description hovers between that of the clothed and the unclothed, gives to it an ideality favourable to the mystical interpretation. Nakedness is עֲרִוּהָ. But at the cross nakedness appears transported from the sphere of sense to that of the supersensuous.

SECOND SCENE OF THE FOURTH ACT, VI. 4-9.

With ver. 4 Solomon's address is resumed, and a new scene opens. Shulamith had found him again, and she who is beautiful in herself appears now so much the more beautiful, when the joy of seeing him again irradiates her whole being.

Ver. 4 Beautiful art thou, my friend, as Tirzah, Comely as Jerusalem,
Terrible as a battle-array.

In the praise of her beauty we hear the voice of the king. The cities which are the highest ornament of his kingdom serve him as the measure of her beauty, which is designated according to the root conceptions by תִּרְצַח, after the quality of completeness; by נְאוּמָה, after the quality of that which is well-becoming, pleasing. It is concluded, from the prominence given to Tirzah, that the Song was not composed till after the division of the kingdom, and that its author was an inhabitant of the northern kingdom; for Tirzah was the first royal city of this kingdom till the time of Omri, the founder of Samaria. But since, at all events, it is Solomon who here speaks, so great an historical judgment ought surely to be ascribed to a later poet who has imagined himself in the exact position of Solomon, that he would not represent the king of the undivided Israel as speaking like a king of the separate kingdom of Israel. The prominence given to Tirzah has another reason. Tirzah was discovered by Robinson on his second journey, 1852, in which Van de Velde accompanied him, on a height in the mountain range to the north of Nablûs, under the name Tullûzah. Brocardus and Breydenbach had already pointed out a village called Thersa to the east of Samaria. This form of the name corresponds to the Heb. better than that Arab. Tullûzah; but the place is suitable, and if Tullûzah lies high and beautiful in a region of olive trees, then it still justifies its ancient name, which means pleasantness or sweetness. But it cannot be sweetness on account of which Tirzah is named before Jerusalem, for in the eye of the Israelites Jerusalem was "the perfection of beauty" (Ps. l. 2; Lam. ii. 15). That there is gradation from Tirzah to Jerusalem (Hengst.) cannot be said; for נְאוּמָה (decora) and יִפְתָּח (pulchra) would be reversed if a climax were intended. The reason of it is rather this, that Shulamith is from the higher region, and is not a daughter of Jerusalem, and that therefore a beautiful city situated in the north toward Sunem must serve as a comparison of her beauty. That Shulamith is both beautiful and terrible (נְאוּמָה from אָמַר) is no con-tradition: she is terrible in the irresistible power of the impression of her personality, terrible as nidgaloth, i.e. as troops going forth with their banners unfurled (cf. the Kal of this v. denom., Ps. xx. 6). We do not need to supply מַחֲנֹת, which is sometimes fem., Ps. xxv. 3, Gen. xxxii. 9, although the attribute would here be appropriate, Num. ii. 3, cf. x. 5; still less צַבָּאוֹת, which occurs in the sense of military service, Isa. xl. 2, and a war-expedition, Dan. viii. 12, but not in the sense of war-host, as fem. Much rather nidgaloth, thus neut., is meant of bannered hosts, as מַחֲנֹתַי (not מַחֲנֵי), Isa. xxi. 13, of those that are marching. War-hosts with their banners, their standards, go forth confident of victory. Such is Shulamith's whole appearance, although she is unconscious of it—a veni, vidi, vici. Solomon is completely vanquished by her. But seeking to maintain himself in freedom over against her, he cries out to her:

Ver. 5a Turn away thine eyes from me,
For overpowering they assail me.

Döpke translates, ferocire me faciunt; Hengst.: they make me proud; but although הִרְהִיב, after Ps. cxxxviii. 3, may be thus used, yet that would be an effect produced by the eyes, which certainly would suggest the very opposite of the request to turn them away. The verb רָהִיב means to be impetuous, and to press impetuously against any one; the Hiph. is the intens. of this trans. signification of the Kal: to press overpoweringly against one, to infuse terror, terrorem incutere. The LXX. translates it by ἀναπρεπούν, which is also used of the effect of terror ("to make to start up"), and the Syr. by afred, to put to flight, because arheb signifies to put in fear, as also arhab = khawwaf, terrefacere; but here the meaning of the verb corresponds more with the sense of رَعِبَ, to be placed in the state of ro'b, i.e. of paralyzing terror. If she directed her large, clear, penetrating eyes to him, he must sink his own: their glance is unbearable by him. This peculiar form the praise of her eyes here assumes; but then the description proceeds as at iv. 1b, ii. 3b. The words used there in praise of her hair, her teeth, and her cheeks, are here repeated.

Ver. 5b Thy hair is like a flock of goats
Which repose downwards on Gilead.
6 Thy teeth like a flock of lambs
Which come up from the washing,
All of them bearing twins,
And a bereaved one is not among them.
7 Like a piece of pomegranate thy temples
Behind thy veil.

The repetition is literal, but yet not without change in the expression,—there, 'מִהָרַגַל, here, 'מִן־הָגַל; there, 'תִּסְאָרִים, here, 'תִּרְחִי, agnarum (Symm., Venet. τῶν ἀμνάδων); for רַחֵל, in its proper signification, is like the Arab. rachil, richl, richleh, the female lamb, and particularly the ewe. Hitzig imagines that Solomon here repeats to Shulamith what he had said to another donna chosen for marriage, and that the flattery becomes insipid by repetition to Shulamith, as well as also to the reader. But the romance which he finds in the Song is not this itself, but his own palimpsest, in the style of Lucian's transformed ass. The repetition has a morally better reason, and not one so subtle. Shulamith appears to Solomon yet more beautiful than on the day when she was brought to him as his bride. His love is still the same, unchanged; and this both she and the reader or hearer must conclude from these words of praise, repeated now as they were then. There is no one among the ladies of the court whom he prefers to her,—these must themselves acknowledge her superiority.

Ver. 8 There are sixty queens,

And eighty concubines,

And virgins without number.

9 One is my dove, my perfect one,—

The only one of her mother,

The choice one of her that bare her.

The daughters saw her and called her blessed,—

Queens and concubines, and they extolled her.

Even here, where, if anywhere, notice of the difference of gender was to be expected, תִּרְחִי stands instead of the more accurate תִּרְחֵל (e.g. Gen. vi. 2). The number of the women of Solomon's court, 1 Kings xi. 3, is far greater (700 wives and 300 concubines); and those who deny the Solomonic authorship of the Song regard the poet, in this particular, as more historical than the historian. On our part, holding as we do the Solomonic authorship of the book, we conclude from these low numbers that the Song celebrates a love-relation of Solomon's at the commencement of his reign: his luxury had not then reached the enormous height to which he, the same Solomon, looks back, and which he designates, Eccles. ii. 8, as vanitas vanitatum. At any rate, the number of 60 תִּסְאָרִים, i.e. legitimate wives of equal rank with himself, is yet high enough; for, according to 2 Chron. xi. 21, Rehoboam had 18 wives and 60 concubines. The 60 occurred before, at iii. 7. If it be a round number, as sometimes, although rarely, sexaginta is thus used (Hitzig), it may be reduced only to 51, but not further, especially here, where 80 stands along with it. שְׁשִׁים־וָאֶחָד (שְׁנַיִם), Gr. πάλλαξ, παλλακή (Lat. peller), which in the form שְׁנַיִם (פְּלִקְתָּא) came back from the Greek to the Aramaic, is a word as yet unexplained. According to the formation, it may be compared to חֲרַמְתָּ, from חָרַם, to cut off; whence also the harem bears the (Arab.) name haram, or the separated gynaecoonitis, to which access is denied. An ending in is (שׁ) is known to the Assyr., but only as an adverbial ending, which, as 'istinis = לְבַדִּי, alone, solus, shows is connected with the pron. su. These two nouns appear as thus requiring to be referred to quadrilitera, with the annexed שׁ; perhaps פְּלִגְשׁ, in the sense of to break into splinters, from פָּלַג, to divide (whence a brook, as dividing itself in its channels, has the name of פְּלִגְתָּ), points to the polygamous relation as a breaking up of the marriage of one; so that a concubine has the name pillēgēsh, as a representant of polygamy in contrast to monogamy.

In the first line of ver. 9 אַחַת is subj. (one, who is my dove, my perfect one); in the second line, on the contrary, it is pred. (one, unica, is she of her mother). That Shulamith was her mother's only child does not, however, follow from this; אַחַת, unica, is equivalent to unice dilecta, as יְחִידָה, Prov. iv. 3, is equivalent to unice dilectus (cf. Keil's Zech. xiv. 7). The parall. בְּרִיָּה has its nearest signification electa (LXX., Syr., Jerome), not pura (Venet.); the fundamental idea of cutting and separating divides itself into the ideas of choosing and purifying. The Aorists, 9b, are the only ones in this book; they denote that Shulamith's look had, on the part of the women, this immediate result, that they willingly assigned to her the good fortune of being preferred to them all,—that to her the prize was due. The words, as also at Prov. xxxi. 28, are an echo of Gen. xxx. 13,—the books of the Chokma delight in references to Genesis, the book of pre-Israelitish origin. Here, in vers. 8, 9, the distinction between our typical and the allegorical interpretation is correctly seen. The latter is bound to explain what the 60 and the 80 mean, and how the wives, concubines, and "virgins" of the harem are to be distinguished from each other; but what till now has been attempted in this matter has, by reason of its very absurdity or folly, become an easy subject of wanton mockery. But the typical interpretation regards the 60 and the 80, and the unreckoned number, as what their names denote,—viz. favourites, concubines, and serving-maids. But to see an allegory of heavenly things in such a herd of women—a kind of thing which the Book of Genesis dates from the degradation of marriage in the line of Cain—is a profanation of that which is holy. The fact is, that by a violation of the law of God (Deut. xvii. 17), Solomon brings a cloud over the typical representation, which is not at all to be thought of in connection with the Antitype. Solomon, as Jul. Sturm rightly remarks, is not to be considered by himself, but only in his relation to Shulamith. In Christ, on the contrary, is no imperfection; sin remains in the congregation. In the Song, the bride is purer than the bridegroom; but in the fulfilling of the Song this relation is reversed: the bridegroom is purer than the bride.

FIFTH ACT.

SHULAMITH, THE ATTRACTIVELY FAIR BUT HUMBLE PRINCESS.—
CHAP. VI. 10—VIII. 4.

FIRST SCENE OF THE FIFTH ACT, VI. 10—VII. 6.

The fourth Act, notwithstanding little disturbances, gives a clear view of the unchanging love of the newly-married pair. This fifth shows how Shulamith, although raised to a royal throne, yet remains, in her childlike disposition and fondness for nature, a lily of the valley. The first scene places us in the midst of the royal gardens. Shulamith comes to view from its recesses, and goes to the daughters of Jerusalem, who, overpowered by the beauty of her heavenly appearance, cry out:

Ver. 10 Who is this that looketh forth like the morning-red,
Beautiful as the moon, pure as the sun,
Terrible as a battle-host?

The question, "Who is this?" is the same as at iii. 6. There, it refers to her who was brought to the king; here, it refers to her who moves in that which is his as her own. There, the "this" is followed by לָמָּה appositionally; here, by פְּשִׁיטָה [looking forth] determ., and thus more closely connected with it; but then indetermin., and thus apposit. predicates follow. The verb פָּשַׁטָּה signifies to bend forward, to overhang; whence the Hiph. פִּשְׁטָה and Niph. פִּשְׁטָה, to look out, since in doing so one bends forward (vid. under Ps. xiv. 2). The LXX. here translates it by ἐκκίπτουσα, the Venet. by παρακίπτουσα, both of which signify to look toward something with the head inclined forward. The point of comparison is, the rising up from the background: Shulamith breaks through the shades of the garden-grove like the morning-red, the morning dawn; or, also: she comes nearer and nearer, as the morning-red rises behind the mountains, and then fills always the more widely the whole horizon. The Venet. translates ὡς ἑωσφόρος; but the morning star is not שֶׁחַר, but שֶׁחַר בְּרִישַׁח, Isa. xiv. 12; shahhar, properly, the morning-dawn, means, in Heb., not only this, like the Arab. shahar, but rather, like the Arab. fajr, the morning-red,—i.e. the red tinge of the morning mist. From the morning-red the description proceeds to the moon, yet visible in the morning sky, before the sun has risen. It is usually called יָהּ, as being yellow; but here it is called לְבָנָה, as being white; as also the sun, which here is spoken of as having risen (Judg. v. 31), is designated not by the word שֶׁשֶׁשׁ, as the unwearied (Ps. xix. 6*b*, 6*a*), but, on account of the intensity of its warming light (Ps. xix. 7*b*), is called חַמָּה. These, in the language of poetry, are favourite names of the moon and the sun, because already the primitive meaning of the two other names had disappeared from common use; but with these, definite attributive ideas are immediately connected. Shulamith appears like the morning-red, which breaks through the darkness; beautiful, like the silver moon, which in soft still majesty shines in the heavens (Job xxxi. 26); pure (vid. regarding בָּר, בָּרוּר in this signification: smooth, bright, pure, under Isa. xlix. 2) as the sun, whose light (cf. חַמָּה with the Aram. חַמְמָה, mid-day brightness) is the purest of the pure, imposing as war-hosts with their standards (vid. vi. 4*b*). The answer of her who was drawing near, to this exclamation, sounds homely and childlike:

Ver. 11 To the nut garden I went down
To look at the shrubs of the valley,
To see whether the vine sprouted,
The pomegranates budded.

Ver. 12 I knew it not that my soul lifted me up
To the royal chariots of my people, a noble (one).

In her loneliness she is happy; she finds her delight in quietly moving about in the vegetable world; the vine and the pomegranate, brought from her home, are her favourites. Her soul—viz. love for Solomon, which fills her soul—raised her to the royal chariots of her people, the royal chariots of a noble (one), where she sits beside the king, who drives the chariot; she knew this, but she also knew it not for what she had become without any cause of her own, that she is without self-elation and without disavowal of her origin. These are Shulamith's thoughts and feelings, which we think we derive from these two verses without reading between the lines and without refining. I went down, she says, viz. from the royal palace, cf. vi. 2. Then, further, she speaks of a valley; and the whole sounds rural, so that we are led to think of Etam as the scene. This Etam, romantically (vid. Judg. xv. 8 f.) situated, was, as Josephus (Antt. viii. 7. 3) credibly informs us, Solomon's Belvedere. "In the royal stables," he says, "so great was the regard for beauty and swiftness, that nowhere else could horses of greater beauty or greater fleetness be found. All had to acknowledge that the appearance of the king's horses was wonderfully pleasing, and that their swiftness was incomparable. Their riders also served as an ornament to them. They were young men in the flower of their age, and were distinguished by their lofty stature and their flowing hair, and by their clothing, which was of Tyrian purple. They every day sprinkled their hair with dust of gold, so that their whole head sparkled when the sun shone upon it. In such array, armed and bearing bows, they formed a body-guard around the king, who was wont, clothed in a white garment, to go out of the city in the morning, and even to drive his chariot. These morning excursions were usually to a certain place which was about sixty stadia from Jerusalem, and which was called Etam; gardens and brooks made it as pleasant as it was fruitful." This Etam, from whence (the עֵיטָם <sup>1</sup>) a watercourse, the ruins of which are still visible, supplied the temple with water, has been identified by Robinson with a village called Artas (by Lumley called Urtas), about a mile and a half to the south of Bethlehem. At the upper end of the winding valley, at a considerable height above the bottom, are three old Solomonic pools,—large, oblong basins of considerable compass placed one behind the other in terraces. Almost at an equal height with the highest pool, at a distance of several hundred steps there is a strong fountain, which is carefully built over, and to which there is a descent by means of stairs inside the building. By it principally were the pools, which are just large reservoirs, fed, and the water was conducted by a subterranean conduit into the upper pool. Riding along the way close to the aqueduct, which still exists, one sees even at the present day the valley below clothed in rich vegetation; and it is easy to understand that here there may have been rich gardens and pleasure-grounds (Moritz Lüttke's Mittheilung). A more suitable place for this first scene of the fifth Act cannot be thought of; and what Josephus relates serves remarkably to illustrate not only the description of ver. 11, but also that of ver. 12.

fragrant and shady walnut tree; גַּן אֲנָחִים would not be a nut garden, but a garden of nuts, for the plur. signifies, Mishn. nuces (viz. juglandes = Jovis glandes, Pliny, xvii. 136, ed. Jan.), as גַּן אֲנָחִים, figs, in contradistinction to גַּן אֲנָחִים, a fig tree, only the Midrash uses גַּן אֲנָחִים here, elsewhere not occurring, of a tree. The object of her going down was one, viz. to observe the state of the vegetation; but it was manifold, as expressed in the manifold statements which follow יָרַדְתִּי. The first object was the nut garden. Then her intention was to observe the young shoots in the valley, which one has to think of as traversed by a river or brook; for נָחַל, like Wady, signifies both a valley and a valley-brook. The nut garden might lie in the valley, for the walnut tree is fond of a moderately cool, damp soil (Joseph. Bell. iii. 10. 8). But the אֲנָחִים are the young shoots with which the banks of a brook and the damp valley are usually adorned in the spring-time. אֲנָחִים, shoot, in the Heb. of budding and growth, in Aram. of the fruit-formation, comes from R. אָנַח, the weaker power of נָנַח, which signifies to expand and spread from within outward, and particularly to sprout up and to well forth. אֲנָחִים signifies here, as at Gen. xxxiv. 1, attentively to observe something, looking to be fixed upon it, to sink down into it. A further object was to observe whether the vine had broken out, or had budded (this is the meaning of פָּרַח, breaking out, to send forth, R. פָּרַח, to break),<sup>1</sup>—whether the pomegranate trees had gained flowers or flower-buds הִנְיָצוּ, not as Gesen. in his Thes. and Heb. Lex. states, the Hiph. of נָצַץ, which would be הִנְיָצוּ, but from נָצַץ instead of הִנְיָצוּ, with the same omission of Dagesh, after the forms הִרְעוּ, cf. Prov. vii. 13, R. נָצַץ, to glance, bloom (whence Nisan as the name of the flower-month, as Ab the name of the fruit-month).<sup>2</sup> Why the pomegranate tree (Punica granatum L.), which derives this its Latin name from its fruit being full of grains, bears the Semitic name of רִמּוֹן, (Arab.) rummān, is yet unexplained; the Arabians are so little acquainted with it, that they are uncertain whether ramm or raman (which, however, is not proved to exist) is to be regarded as the root-word. The question goes along with that regarding the origin and signification of Rimmon, the name of the Syrian god, which appears to denote<sup>3</sup> “sublimity;” and it is possible that the pomegranate tree has its name from this god as being consecrated to him.<sup>4</sup>

In ver. 12, Shulamith adds that, amid this her quiet delight in contemplating vegetable life, she had almost forgotten the position to which she had been elevated. לֹא יָדַעְתִּי may, according to the connection in which it is used, mean, "I know not," Gen. iv. 9, xxi. 26, as well as "I knew not," Gen. xxviii. 16, Prov. xxiii. 35; here the latter (LXX., Aquila, Jerome, Venet., Luther), for the expression runs parallel to יִרְדְּתִי, and is related to it as verifying or circumstantiating it. The connection לֹא יָדַעְתִּי נַפְשִׁי, whether we take the word נַפְשִׁי as permut. of the subject (Luther: My soul knew it not) or as the accus. of the object: I knew not myself (after Job ix. 21), is objectionable, because it robs the following שָׂמַנְתִּי of its subject, and makes the course of thought inappropriate. The accusative, without doubt, hits on what is right, since it gives the Rebia, corresponding to our colon, to יָדַעְתִּי; for that which follows with נַפְשִׁי שָׂטָה is just what she acknowledges not to have known or considered. For the meaning cannot be that her soul had placed or brought her in an unconscious way, i.e. involuntarily or unexpectedly, etc., for "I knew not," as such a declaration never forms the principal sentence, but, according to the nature of the case, always a subordinate sentence, and that either as a conditional clause with Var, Job ix. 5, or as a relative clause, Isa. xlvi. 11; cf. Ps. xlix. 21. Thus "I knew not" will be followed by what she was unconscious of; it follows in oratio directa instead of obliqua, as also elsewhere after יָדַעְתִּי, יָדַעְתִּי, elsewhere introducing the object of knowledge, is omitted, Ps. ix. 21; Amos v. 12. But if it remains unknown to her, if it has escaped her consciousness that her soul placed her, etc., then naphshi is here her own self, and that on the side of desire (Job xxiii. 13; Deut. xii. 15); thus, in contrast to external constraint, her own most inward impulse, the leading of her heart. Following this, she has been placed on the height on which she now finds herself, without being always mindful of it. It would certainly now be most natural to regard כָּרִכְבוֹת, after the usual constr. of the verb שָׂמַנְתִּי with the double accus., e.g. Gen. xxviii. 22, Isa. l. 2, Ps. xxxix. 9, as pred. accus. (Venet. ἔθετό με ὄχηματα), as e.g. Hengst.: I knew not, thus my soul brought me (i.e. brought me at unawares) to the chariots of my people, who are noble. But what does this mean? He adds the remark: "Shulamith stands in the place of the war-chariots of her people as their powerful protector, or by the heroic spirit residing in her." But apart from the syntactically false rendering of לֹא יָדַעְתִּי, and the unwarrantable allegorizing, this interpretation suffers from worm-holes; the worm which pierces it bears the strange name (דרימוני) הַה, Shabbath 90a.

wrecks itself on this, that "chariots" in themselves are not for protection, and thus without something further, especially in this designation by the word מרכבות, and not by רכב (2 Kings vi. 17; cf. 2 Kings ii. 12, xiii. 14), are not war-chariots. עמי מר will thus be the accus. of the object of motion. It is thus understood, e.g., by Ewald (sec. 281*d*): My soul brought me to the chariots, etc. The shepherd-hypothesis finds here the seduction of Shulamith. Holländer translates: "I perceived it not; suddenly, it can scarcely be said unconsciously, I was placed in the state-chariots of Amminadab." But the Masora expressly remarks that עמי נריב are not to be read as if forming one, but as two words, חרין מלין.<sup>1</sup> Hitzig proportionally better, thus: without any apprehension of such a coincidence, she saw herself carried to the chariots of her noble people, i.e. as Gesen. in his Thes. : inter currus comitatus principis. Any other explanation, says Hitzig, is not possible, since the accus. מרכב in itself signifies only in the direction whither, or in the neighbourhood whence. And certainly it is generally used of the aim or object toward which one directs himself or strives, e.g. Isa. xxxvii. 23. Kodēsh, "toward the sanctuary," Ps. cxxxiv. 2; cf. hashshā'rā, "toward the gate," Isa. xxii. 7. But the accus. mārom can also mean "on high," Isa. xxii. 16, the accus. hashshāmaim "in the heavens," 1 Kings viii. 32; and as hishlic hāiōrah is used, Ex. i. 22, of being cast into the Nile, and shalahh hāārēts of being sent into the land, Num. xiii. 27, thus may also sim mērkāvāh be used for sim b'mērkāvāh, 1 Sam. viii. 11, according to which the Syr. (b'mercabto) and the Quinta (εἰς ἄρματα) translate; on the contrary, Symm. and Jerome destroy the meaning by adopting the reading שפתי (my soul placed me in confusion). The plur. mark'voth is thus meant amplifi., like richvō, i. 9, and battēnu, i. 17. As regards the subject, 2 Sam. xv. 1 is to be compared; it is the king's chariot that is meant, yoked, according to i. 9, with Egypt. horses. It is a question whether nadiv is related adject. to ammi: my people, a noble (people),—a connection which gives prominence to the attribute appositionally, Gen. xxxvii. 2; Ps. cxliii. 10; Ezek. xxxiv. 12,—or permutat., so that the first gen. is exchanged for one defining more closely: to the royal chariot of my people, a prince. The latter has the preference, not merely because (leaving out of view the proper name Amminadab) wherever עם and נריב are used together they are meant of those who stand prominent above the people, Num. xxi. 18, Ps. xlvi. 10, cxiii. 8, but because this נָרִיב and בְּתֵ-נָרִיב evidently stand in interchangeable relation. Yet, even though we take נָרִיב and עָמִי together, the thought remains the same. Shulamith is not one who is abducted, but, as we read at iii. 6 ff., one who is honourably brought home; and she here expressly says that no kind of external force but her own loving soul raised her to the royal chariots of her people and their king. That she gives to the fact of her elevation just this expression, arises from the circumstance that she places her joy in the loneliness of nature, in contrast to her driving along in a splendid chariot. Designating the chariot that of her noble people, or that of her people, and, indeed, of a prince, she sees in both cases in Solomon the concentration and climax of the people's glory.

Encouraged by Shulamith's unassuming answer, the daughters of Jerusalem now give utterance to an entreaty which their astonishment at her beauty suggests to them.

Chap. vii. 1 Come back, come back, O Shulamith!

Come back, come back, that we may look upon thee!

She is now (vi. 10 ff.) on the way from the garden to the palace. The fourfold "come back" entreats her earnestly, yea, with tears, to return thither with them once more, and for this purpose, that they might find delight in looking upon her; for הָזִיהָ בָּ signifies to sink oneself into a thing, looking at it, to delight (feast) one's eyes in looking on a thing. Here for the first time Shulamith is addressed by name. But הַשֵּׁוּ cannot be a pure proper name, for the art. is vocat., as e.g. הַבַּת יִירוֹ, "O daughter of Jerusalem!" Pure proper names like שְׁלֹמֹה are so determ. in themselves that they exclude the article; only such as are at the same time also nouns, like יִרְדֵּן and לְבָנִן, are susceptible of the article, particularly also of the vocat., Ps. cxiv. 5; but cf. Zech. xi. 1 with Isa. x. 34. Thus הַשֵּׁוּ will be not so much a proper name as a name of descent, as generally nouns in הֵ (with a few exceptions, viz. of ordinal number, הַרְרִי, הַמְּנִי, etc.) are all gentilicia. The LXX. render הַשֵּׁוּ by ἡ Σουναμίτις, and this is indeed but another form for הַשֵּׁוּנִימִית, i.e. she who is from Sunem. Thus also was designated the exceedingly beautiful Abishag, 1 Kings i. 3, Elisha's excellent and pious hostess, 2 Kings iv. 8 ff. Sunem was in the tribe of Issachar (Josh. xix. 18), near to Little Hermon, from which it was separated by a valley, to the south-east of Carmel. This lower Galilean Sunem, which lies south from Nain, south-east from Nazareth, south-west from Tabor, is also called Skulem. Eusebius in his Onomasticon says regarding it: Σουβήμη (l. Σουλήμη) κλήρου Ἰσάχαρ. καὶ νῦν ἐστὶ κόμη Σουλῆμ κ.τ.λ., i.e. as Jerome translates it: Sunem in tribu Issachar. et usque hodie vicus ostenditur nomine Sulem in quinto miliario montis Thabor contra australem plagam. This place is found at the present day under the name of Suwlam (Sólam), at the west end of Jebel ed-Duhi (Little Hermon), not far from the great plain (Jisr'el, now Zer'én), which forms a convenient way of communication between Jordan and the sea-coast, but is yet so hidden in the mountain range that the Talmud is silent concerning this Sulem, as it is concerning Nazareth. Here was the home of the Shulamitess of the Song. The ancients interpret the name by εἰρηνεύουσα, or by ἐσकुλευμένη (vid. Lagarde's Onomastica), the former after Aquila and the Quinta, the latter after Symm. The Targum has the interpretation: ה' השלמה באמנותה עם ה' (vid. Rashi). But the form of the name (the Syr. writes שְׁלִימָתָא) is opposed to these allegorical interpretations. Rather it is to be assumed that the poet purposely used, not ה'שנ', but ה'שול', to assimilate her name to that of Solomon; and that it has the parallel meaning of one devoted to Solomon, and thus, as it were, of a passively-applied שְׁלִימָתָא = Σαλώμη, is the more probable, as the daughters of Jerusalem would scarcely venture thus to address her who was raised to the rank of a princess unless this name accorded with that of Solomon.

Not conscious of the greatness of her beauty, Shulamith asks,— 1b α What do you see in Shulamith?

She is not aware that anything particular is to be seen in her; but the daughters of Jerusalem are of a different opinion, and answer this childlike, modest, but so much the more touching question,— 1b β As the dance of Mahanāim!

They would thus see in her something like the dance of Mahanāim. If this be here the name of the Levitical town (now Mahneh) in the tribe of Gad, north of Jabbok, where Ishbosheth resided for two years, and where David was hospitably entertained on his flight from Absalom (Luthr.: “the dance to Mahanāim”), then we must suppose in this trans-Jordanic town such a popular festival as was kept in Shiloh, Judg. xxi. 19, and we may compare Abel-Meholah [= meadow of dancing], the name of Elisha's birth-place (cf. also Herod. i. 16: “To dance the dance of the Arcadian town of Tegea”). But the Song delights in retrospective references to Genesis (cf. iv. 11b, vii. 11). At xxxii. 3, however, by Mahanāim<sup>1</sup> is meant the double encampment of angels who protected Jacob's two companies

(xxxii. 8). The town of Mahanāim derives its name from this vision of Jacob's. The word, as the name of a town, is always without the article; and here, where it has the article, it is to be understood appellatively. The old translators, in rendering by "the dances of the camps" (Syr., Jerome, choros castrorum, Venet. θλασον στρατοπέδων), by which it remains uncertain whether a war-dance or a parade is meant, overlook the dual, and by exchanging מַחֲנִים with מַחֲנֵי, they obtain a figure which in this connection is incongruous and obscure. But, in truth, the figure is an angelic one. The daughters of Jerusalem wish to see Shulamith dance, and they designate that as an angelic sight. Mahanāim became in the post-bibl. dialect a name directly for angels. The dance of angels is only a step beyond the responsive song of the seraphim, Isa. vi. Engelkoere [angel-choir] and "heavenly host" are associated in the old German poetry.<sup>1</sup> The following description is undeniably that (let one only read how Hitzig in vain seeks to resist this interpretation) of one dancing. In this, according to biblical representation and ancient custom, there is nothing repulsive. The women of the ransomed people, with Miriam at their head, danced, as did also the women who celebrated David's victory over Goliath (Ex. xv. 20; 1 Sam. xviii. 66). David himself danced (2 Sam. vi.) before the ark of the covenant. Joy and dancing are, according to Old Testament conception, inseparable (Eccles. iii. 4); and joy not only as the happy feeling of youthful life, but also spiritual holy joy (Ps. lxxxvii. 7). The dance which the ladies of the court here desire to see, falls under the point of view of a play of rival individual artistes reciprocally acting for the sake of amusement. The play also is capable of moral nobility, if it is enacted within the limits of propriety, at the right time, in the right manner, and if the natural joyfulness, penetrated by intelligence, is consecrated by a spiritual aim. Thus Shulamith, when she dances, does not then become a Gaditanian (Martial, xiv. 203) or an Alma (the name given in Anterior Asia to those women who go about making it their business to dance mimic and partly lascivious dances); nor does she become a Bajadere (Isa. xxiii. 15 f.),<sup>2</sup> as also Miriam, Ex. xv. 20, Jephthah's daughter, Judg. xi. 34, the "daughters of Shiloh," Judg.

<sup>2</sup> Alma is the Arab. 'ualmah (one skilled, viz. in dancing and jonglerie), and Bajadere is the Portug. softening of baladera, a dancer, from balare (ballare), mediæv. Lat., and then Romanic: to move in a circle, to dance.

xxi. 21, and the women of Jerusalem, 1 Sam. xviii. 6, did not dishonour themselves by dancing; the dancing of virgins is even a feature of the times after the restoration, Jer. xxxi. 13. But that Shulamith actually danced in compliance with the earnest entreaty of the daughters of Jerusalem, is seen from the following description of her attractions, which begins with her feet and the vibration of her thighs.

After throwing aside her upper garments, so that she had only the light clothing of a shepherdess or vinedresser, Shulamith danced to and fro before the daughters of Jerusalem, and displayed all her attractions before them. Her feet, previously (v. 3) naked, or as yet only shod with sandals, she sets forth with the deportment of a prince's daughter.

Ver. 2a How beautiful are thy steps in the shoes, O prince's daughter!

The noun גִּיב, which signifies noble in disposition, and then noble by birth and rank (cf. the reverse relation of the meanings in generosus), is in the latter sense synon. and parallel to מְלִכָּה and שָׂרָה; Shulamith is here called a prince's daughter because she was raised to the rank of which Hannah, 1 Sam. ii. 8, cf. Ps. cxiii. 8, speaks, and to which she herself, vi. 12, points. Her beauty, from the first associated with unaffected dignity, now appears in native princely grace and majesty. פֶּעַם (from פָּעַם, pulsare, as in nunc pede libero pulsanda tellus) signifies step and foot,—in the latter sense the poet. Heb. and the vulgar Phoen. word for רִגְלָה; here the meanings pes and passus (Fr. pas, dance-step) flow into each other. The praise of the spectators now turns from the feet of the dancer to her thighs:

Ver. 2b The vibration of thy thighs like ornamental chains,

The work of an artist's hands.

The double-sided thighs, viewed from the spine and the lower part of the back, are called מְתִנִּים; from the upper part of the legs upwards, and the breast downwards (the lumbar region), thus seen on the front and sidewise, יָרְכָיִם or מְתִנִּים. Here the manifold twistings and windings of the upper part of the body by means of the thigh-joint are meant; such movements of a circular kind are called חֲפִיזִים, from חָפַז, v. 6. חֲפִיזִים is the plur. of חָפִיז = (Arab.) haly, as צִבְאִים (gazelles) of צִבִּי = zaby. The sing. חָפִיז (or חֲפִיזָה = (Arab.) halyah) signifies a female ornament, consisting of gold, silver, or precious stones, and that (according to the connection, Prov. xxv. 2; Hos. ii. 15) for the neck or the breast as a whole; the plur. חָפִיזִים, occurring only here, is therefore chosen because the bendings of the loins, full of life and beauty, are compared to the free swingings to and fro of such an ornament, and thus to a connected ornament of chains; for חֲפִיזִים are not the beauty-curves of the thighs at rest,—the connection here requires movement. In accordance with the united idea of חל, the appos. is not כַּעֲשֵׂי, but (according to the Palestin.) כַּעֲשֵׂיָה (LXX., Targ., Syr., Venet.). The artist is called אֲמָן (omman) (the forms אֲמָן and אֲמָן are also found), Syr. armon, Jewish-Aram. אֲמָן; he has, as the master of stability, a name like יָמֵן, the right hand: the hand, and especially the right hand, is the artifex among the members.<sup>1</sup> The eulogists pass from the loins to the middle part of the body. In dancing, especially in the Oriental style of dancing, which is the mimic representation of animated feeling, the breast and the body are raised, and the forms of the body appear through the clothing.

Ver. 3 Thy navel is a well-rounded basin—
 Let not mixed wine be wanting to it
 Thy body is a heap of wheat,
 Set round with lilies.

In interpreting these words, Hitzig proceeds as if a “voluptuary” were here speaking. He therefore changes אֲמָן into אֲמָןָה, “thy pudenda.” But (1) it is no voluptuary who speaks here, and particularly not a man, but women who speak; certainly, above all, it is the poet, who would not, however, be so inconsiderate as to put into the mouths of women immodest words which he could use if he wished to represent the king as speaking. Moreover (2) אֲמָן = (Arab.) surr, secret (that which is secret; in Arab. especially referred to the pudenda, both of man and woman), is a word that is<sup>2</sup> foreign to the Heb. language, which has for “Geheimnis” [secret] the corresponding word סוּר (vid. under Ps. ii. 2, xxv. 14), after the root-signification of its verbal stem (viz. to be firm, pressed together); and (3) the reference—preferred by Döpke, Magnus, Hahn, and others, also without any change of punctuation—of אֲמָן to the interfeminiū mulieris, is here excluded by the circumstance that the attractions of a woman dancing, as they unfold themselves, are here described. Like the Arab. surr, אֲמָן (= shurr), from אֲמָן, to bind fast, denotes properly the umbilical cord, Ezek. xvi. 4, and then the umbilical scar. Thus, Prov. iii. 8, where most recent critics prefer, for אֲמָןָה, to read, but without any proper reason, אֲמָןָהָה, “to thy flesh,” the navel comes there into view as the centre of the body,—which it always is with new-born infants, and is almost so with grown-up persons in respect of the length of the body,—and as, indeed, the centre, whence the pleasurable feeling of health diffuses its rays of heat. This middle and prominent point of the abdomen shows itself in one lightly clad and dancing when she breathes deeply, even through the clothing; and because the navel commonly forms a little funnel-like hollow (Böttch.: in the form almost of a whirling hollow in the water, as one may see in nude antique statues), therefore the daughters of Jerusalem compare Shulamith's navel to a "basin of roundness," i.e. which has this general property, and thus belongs to the class of things that are round. יָיִן does not mean a Becher (a cup), but a Becken (basin), pelvis; properly a washing basin, ijjanah (from יָיִן = ajan, to full, to wash = יָיִן); then a sprinkling basin, Ex. xxiv. 6; and generally a basin, Isa. xxii. 24; here, a mixing basin, in which wine was mingled with a proportion of water to render it palatable (κρατήρ, from κεραυνύωαι, temperare),—according to the Talm. with two-thirds of water. In this sense this passage is interpreted allegorically, Sanhedrin 14*b*, 37*a*, and elsewhere (vid. Aruch under יָיִן). יָיִן is not spiced wine, which is otherwise designated (viii. 2), but, as Hitzig rightly explains, mixed wine, i.e. mixed with water or snow (vid. under Isa. v. 22). יָיִן is not borrowed from the Greek μισγέειν (Grätz), but is a word native to all the three chief Semitic dialects,—the weaker form of יָיִן, which may have the meaning of "to pour in;" but not merely "to pour in," but, at the same time, "to mix" (vid. under Isa. v. 22; Prov. ix. 2). יָיִן, with יָיִן, represents the circular form (from יָיִן = יָיִן), corresponding to the navel ring; Kimchi thinks that the moon must be understood (cf. יָיִן, lunula): a moon-like round basin; according to which the Venet., also in Gr., choosing an excellent name for the moon, translates: ῥάντιστρον τῆς ἐκάτης. But "moon-basin" would be an insufficient expression for it; Ewald supposes that it is the name of a flower, without, however, establishing this opinion. The "basin of roundness" is the centre of the body a little depressed; and that which the clause, "may not mixed wine be lacking," expresses, as their wish for her, is soundness of health, for which no more appropriate and delicate figure can be given than hot wine tempered with fresh water.

The comparison in 3*b* is the same as that of R. Johanan's of beauty, Mezta 84*a*: "He who would gain an idea of beauty should take a silver cup, fill it with pomegranate flowers, and encircle its rim with a garland of roses."<sup>1</sup> To the present day, winnowed and sifted corn is piled up in great heaps of symmetrical half-spherical form, which are then frequently stuck over with things that move in the wind, for the purpose of protecting them against birds. "The appearance of such heaps of wheat," says Wetstein (Isa. p. 710), "which one may see in long parallel rows on the thrashing-floors of a village, is very pleasing to a peasant; and the comparison of the Song, vii. 3, every Arabian will regard as beautiful." Such a corn-heap is to the present day called ṣubbaḥ, while 'aramah is a heap of thrashed corn that has not yet been winnowed; here, with עֲרֵכָה, is to be connected the idea of a ṣubbaḥ, i.e. of a heap of wheat not only thrashed and winnowed, but also sifted (riddled) סָנָה, enclosed, fenced about (whence the post-bibl. סָנִי, a fence), is a part. pass. such as סָנָה, scattered (vid. under Ps. xcii. 12). The comparison refers to the beautiful appearance of the roundness, but, at the same time, also to the flesh-colour shining through the dress; for fancy sees more than the eyes, and concludes regarding that which is veiled from that which is visible. A wheat-colour was, according to the Moslem Sunna, the tint of the first created man. Wheat-yellow and lily-white is a subdued white, and denotes at once purity and health; by πυρός [wheat] one thinks of πῦρ—heaped up wheat develops a remarkable heat, a fact for which Biesenthal refers to Plutarch's Quaest. In accordance with the progress of the description, the breasts are now spoken of:

Ver. 4 Thy two breasts are like two fawns,
Twins of a gazelle.

iv. 5 is repeated, but with the omission of the attribute, "feeding among lilies," since lilies have already been applied to another figure. Instead of תְּאֵמִי there, we have here תְּאֵמִי (ta'ome), the former after the ground-form t'ām, the latter after the ground-form to'm (cf. תְּאֵמִי, Neh. xiii. 29, from תְּאֵמִי = תְּאֵמִי).

Ver. 5a Thy neck like an ivory tower

The article in תְּאֵמִי may be that designating species (vid. under i. 11); but, as at vii. 5 and iv. 4, it appears to be also here a definite tower which the comparison has in view: one covered externally with ivory tablets, a tower well known to all in and around Jerusalem, and visible far and wide, especially when the sun shone on it; had it been otherwise, as in the case of the comparison following, the locality would have been more definitely mentioned. So slender, so dazzlingly white, so imposing, and so captivating to the eye did Shulamith's neck appear. These and the following figures would be open to the objection of being without any occasion, and monstrous, if they referred to an ordinary beauty; but they refer to Solomon's spouse, they apply to a queen, and therefore are derived from that which is most splendid in the kingdom over which, along with him, she rules; and in this they have the justification of their grandeur.

Ver. 5b a Thine eyes pools in Heshbon,
At the gate of the populous (city).

Heshbon, formerly belonging to the Amorites, but at this time to the kingdom of Solomon, lay about  $5\frac{1}{2}$  hours to the east of the northern point of the Dead Sea, on an extensive, undulating, fruitful, high table-land, with a far-reaching prospect. Below the town, now existing only in heaps of ruins, a brook, which here takes its rise, flows westward, and streams towards the Ghôr as the Nahr Heshbân. It joins the Jordan not far above its entrance into the Dead Sea. The situation of the town was richly watered. There still exists a huge reservoir of excellent masonry in the valley, about half a mile from the foot of the hill on which the town stood. The comparison here supposes two such pools, but which are not necessarily together, though both are before the gate, i.e. near by, outside the town. Since עֵינַי, except at Isa. xiv. 31, is fem., בְּתַרְיָבִים, in the sense of רְבִיתֵי עֵם, Lam. i. 1 (cf. for the non-determin. of the adj., Ezek. xxi. 25), is to be referred to the town, not to the gate (Hitz.); Blau's<sup>1</sup> conjectural reading, bath'-akrabbim, does not recommend itself, because the craggy heights of the "ascent of Akrabbim" (Num. xxxiv. 4; Josh. xv. 3), which obliquely cross<sup>2</sup> the Ghôr to the south of the Dead Sea, and from remote times formed the southern boundary of the kingdom of the Amorites (Judg. i. 36), were too far off, and too seldom visited, to give its name to a gate of Heshbon. But generally the crowds of men at the gate and the topography of the gate are here nothing to the purpose; the splendour of the town, however, is for the figure of the famed cisterns like a golden border. בְּרִיכָה (from פָּרַח, to spread out, vid. Genesis, p. 98; Fleischer in Levy, I. 420*b*) denotes a skilfully built round or square pool. The comparison of the eyes to a pool means, as Wetstein<sup>3</sup> remarks, "either thus glistening like a water-mirror, or thus lovely in appearance, for the Arabian knows no greater pleasure than to look upon clear, gently rippling water." Both are perhaps to be taken together; the mirroring glance of the moist eyes (cf. Ovid, De Arte Am. ii. 722:

"Adspicies oculos tremulo fulgore micantes, Ut sol a liquida saepe refulget aqua"), and the spell of the charm holding fast the gaze of the beholder.

Ver. 5b  $\beta$  Thy nose like the tower of Lebanon,
Which looks towards Damascus.

This comparison also places us in the midst of the architectural and artistic splendours of the Solomonic reign. A definite town is here meant; the art. determines it, and the part. following appositionally without the art., with the expression "towards Damascus" defining it more nearly (vid. under iii. 6), describes it. הַלְבָנוֹן designates here "the whole Alpine range of mountains in the north of the land of Israel" (Furrer); for a tower which looks in the direction of Damascus (גִּבְעָה, accus., as אֶת־גִּבְעָה, 1 Sam. xxii. 4) is to be thought of as standing on one of the eastern spurs of Hermon, or on the top of Amana (iv. 8), whence the Amana (Barada) takes its rise, whether as a watch-tower (2 Sam. viii. 6), or only as a look-out from which might be enjoyed the paradisaical prospect. The nose gives to the face especially its physiognomical expression, and conditions its beauty. Its comparison to a tower on a lofty height is occasioned by the fact that Shulamith's nose, without being blunt or flat, formed a straight line from the brow downward, without bending to the right or left (Hitzig), a mark of symmetrical beauty combined with awe-inspiring dignity. After the praise of the nose it was natural to think of Carmel; Carmel is a promontory, and as such is called anf el-jebel ("nose of the mountain-range").

Ver. 6a  $\alpha$  Thy head upon thee as Carmel.

We say that the head is "on the man" (2 Kings vi. 31; Judith xiv. 18), for we think of a man ideally as the central unity of the members forming the external appearance of his body. Shulamith's head ruled her form, surpassing all in beauty and majesty, as Carmel with its noble and pleasing appearance ruled the land and sea at its feet. From the summit of Carmel, clothed with trees (Amos ix. 3; 1 Kings xviii. 42), a transition is made to the hair on the head, which the Moslem poets are fond of comparing to long leaves, as vine leaves and palm branches; as, on the other hand, the thick leafy wood is called (vid. under Isa. vii. 20) comata silva (cf. Oudendorp's Apuleii Metam. p. 744). Grätz, proceeding on the supposition of the existence of Persian words in the Song, regards כְּרִמָּל as the name of a colour; but (1) crimson is designated in the Heb.-Pers. not כְּרִמָּל, but כְּרִמְיָל, instead of תּוֹלַעַת שָׁנִי (vid. under Isa. i. 18; Prov. xxxi. 21); (2) if the hair of the head (if רֵאשִׁית might be directly understood of this) may indeed be compared to the glistening of purple, not, however, to the glistening of carmese or scarlet, then red and not black hair must be meant. But it is not the locks of hair, but the hair in locks that is meant. From this the eulogium finally passes to the hair of the head itself.

Ver. 6a β The flowing hair of thy head like purple—
A king fettered by locks.

Hitzig supposes that כרמל reminded the poet of פְּרִטִּיל (carmese), and that thus he hit upon אַרְנָבִין (purple); but one would rather think that Carmel itself would immediately lead him to purple, for near this promontory is the principal place where purple shell-fish are found (Seetzen's Reisen, IV. 277 f.). רִקָּה (from רָלַל, to dangle, to hang loose, Job xxviii, 4, Arab. tadladal) is res pendula, and particularly coma pendula. Hengst. remarks that the "purple" has caused much trouble to those who understand by רִלָה the hair of the head. He himself, with Gussetius, understands by it the temples, tempus capitis; but the word רִקָּה is used (iv. 3) for "temples," and "purple-like" hair hanging down could occasion trouble only to those who know not how to distinguish purple from carmese. Red purple, אַרְנָבִין (Assyr. argamannu, Aram., Arab., Pers., with departure from the primary meaning of the word, אַרְנָבִין), which derives this name from רָנַם = רָקַם, material of variegated colour, is dark-red, and almost glistening black, as Pliny says (Hist. Nat. ix. 135): Laus ei (the Tyrian purple) summa in colore sanguinis concreti, nigricans adspectu idemque suspectu (seen from the side) refulgens, unde et Homero purpureus dicitur sanguis. The purple hair of Nisus does not play a part in myth alone, but beautiful shining dark black hair is elsewhere also called purple, e.g. πυρφύρεος πλόκαμος in Lucian, πορφυραὶ χαῖται in Anacreon. With the words "like purple," the description closes; and to this the last characteristic distinguishing Shulamith there is added the exclamation: "A king fettered by locks!" For רָהִיטִים, from רָהַט, to run, flow, is also a name of flowing locks, not the ear-locks (Hitz.), i.e. long ringlets flowing down in front the same word (i. 17) signifies in its North Palest. form רָהִיטִים (Chethib), a water-trough, canalis. The locks of one beloved are frequently called in erotic poetry "the fetters" by which the lover is held fast, for "love wove her net in alluring ringlets" (Deshâmi in Joseph and Zuleika).<sup>1</sup> Goethe in his Westöst. Divan presents as a bold yet moderate example: "There are more than fifty hooks in each lock of thy hair;" and, on the other hand, one offensively extravagant, when it is said of a Sultan: "In the bonds of thy locks lies fastened the neck of the enemy." אֶסֶר signifies also in Arab. frequently one enslaved by love : astruha is equivalent to her lover.<sup>1</sup> The mention of the king now leads from the imagery of a dance to the scene which follows, where we again hear the king's voice. The scene and situation are now manifestly changed. We are transferred from the garden to the palace, where the two, without the presence of any spectators, carry on the following dialogue.

SECOND SCENE OF THE FIFTH ACT, VII. 7—VIII. 4.

It is the fundamental thought forming the motive and aim of the Song which now expresses itself in the words of Solomon.

Ver. 7 How beautiful art thou, and how charming,
O love, among delights!

It is a truth of all-embracing application which is here expressed. There is nothing more admirable than love, i.e. the uniting or mingling together of two lives, the one of which gives itself to the other, and so finds the complement of itself; nor than this self-devotion, which is at the same time self-enrichment. All this is true of earthly love, of which Walther v. d. Vogelweide says : “ minne ist zweier herzen wünne ” [love is the joy of two hearts], and it is true also of heavenly love; the former surpasses all earthly delights (also such as are purely sensuous, Eccles. ii. 8), and the latter is, as the apostle expresses himself in his spiritual “ Song of Songs,” 1 Cor. xiii. 13, in relation to faith and hope, “ greater than these,” greater than both of them, for it is their sacred, eternal aim. In יִפִּית it is indicated that the ideal, and in נְעֻמָּה that the eudaemonistic feature of the human soul attains its satisfaction in love. The LXX., obliterating this so true and beautiful a promotion of love above all other joys, translate ἐν ταῖς τρυφαῖς σου (in the enjoyment which thou impartest). The Syr., Jerome, and others also rob the Song of this its point of light and of elevation, by reading אֶהְבֶּה (O beloved!) instead of אֶהְבֶּה. The words then declare (yet contrary to the spirit of the Hebrew language, which knows neither אֶהְבֶּה nor אֶהְבֶּה as vocat.) what we already read at iv. 10; while, according to the traditional form of the text, they are the prelude of the love-song, to love as such, which is continued in viii. 6 f.

When Solomon now looks on the wife of his youth, she stands before him like a palm tree with its splendid leaf-branches, which the Arabians call ucht insdn (the sisters of men); and like a vine which climbs up on the wall of the house, and therefore is an emblem of the housewife, Ps. cxxviii. 3.

Ver. 8 Thy stature is like the palm tree;
And thy breasts clusters.

9 I thought: I will climb the palm,
Grasp its branches;
And thy breasts shall be to me
As clusters of the vine,
And the breath of thy nose like apples,
10a α And thy palate like the best wine.

Shulamith stands before him. As he surveys her from head to foot, he finds her stature like the stature of a slender, tall date-palm, and her breasts like the clusters of sweet fruit, into which, in due season, its blossoms are ripened. That קִמְתָּהּ (thy stature) is not thought of as height apart from the person, but as along with the person (cf. Ezek. xiii. 18), scarcely needs to be remarked. The palm derives its name, tāmār, from its slender stem rising upwards (vid. under Isa. xvii. 9, lxi. 6). This name is specially given to the Phoenix dactylifera, which is indigenous from Egypt to India, and which is principally cultivated (vid. under Gen. xiv. 7), the female flowers of which, set in panicles, develop into large clusters of juicy sweet fruit. These dark-brown or golden-yellow clusters, which crown the summit of the stem and impart a wonderful beauty to the appearance of the palm, especially when seen in the evening twilight, are here called אֶשְׁכְּלִיּוֹת (connecting form at Deut. xxxii. 32), as by the Arabians 'ithkal, plur. 'ithakyl (botri dactylorum). The perf. רָמְתָּהּ signifies aequata est = aequa est; for רָמָה, R. רָם, means, to make or to become plain, smooth, even. The perf. אֶמְרָתִי, on the other hand, will be meant retrospectively. As an expression of that which he just now purposed to do, it would be useless; and thus to notify with emphasis anything beforehand is unnatural and contrary to good taste and custom. But looking back, he can say that in view of this august attractive beauty the one thought filled him, to secure possession of her and of the enjoyment which she promised; as one climbs (עָלָה with פָּ, as Ps. xxiv. 3) a palm tree and seizes (אָרַז, fut. אֶרְיֶז, and אֶרְיֶז with פָּ, as at Job xxiii. 11) its branches (פְּנִימָיִם, so called, as it appears,<sup>1</sup> after the feather-like pointed leaves proceeding from the mid-rib on both sides), in order to break off the fulness of the sweet fruit under its leaves. As the cypress (sarwat), so also the palm is with the Moslem poets the figure of a loved one, and with the mystics, of God;<sup>2</sup> and accordingly the idea of possession is here particularly intended.  $\text{וַיִּהְיֶה נָא בְּתֹמַר}$  denotes what he then thought and aimed at. Instead of  $\text{בְּתֹמַר}$ , 9a, the punctuation  $\text{בְּתֹמַר}$  is undoubtedly to be preferred. The figure of the palm tree terminates with the words, "will grasp its branches." It was adequate in relation to stature, but less so in relation to the breasts; for dates are of a long oval form, and have a stony kernel. Therefore the figure departs from the date clusters to that of grape clusters, which are more appropriate, as they swell and become round and elastic the more they ripen. The breath of the nose, which is called  $\text{נַף}$ , from breathing hard, is that of the air breathed, going in and out through it; for, as a rule, a man breathes through his nostrils with closed mouth. Apples present themselves the more naturally for comparison, that the apple has the name  $\text{תְּפִיחָה}$  (from  $\text{נָפַח}$ , after the form  $\text{תְּמִכִּיחָה}$ ), from the fragrance which it exhales.

The dramatic structure of the Song becomes here more strongly manifest than elsewhere before. Shulamith interrupts the king, and continues his words as if echoing them, but again breaks off.

Ver. 10a  $\beta$  b Which goes down for my beloved smoothly,
Which makes the lips of sleepers move.

The LXX. had here  $\text{לְרִירִי}$  in the text. It might notwithstanding be a spurious reading. Hitzig suggests that it is erroneously repeated, as if from ver. 11. Ewald also (Hohesl. p. 137) did that before,—Heiligstedt, as usual, following him. But, as Ewald afterwards objected, the line would then be "too short, and not corresponding to that which follows." But how shall  $\text{לְרִירִי}$  now connect itself with Solomon's words? Ginsburg explains: "Her voice is not merely compared to wine, because it is sweet to everybody, but to such wine as would be sweet to a friend, and on that account is more valuable and pleasant." But that furnishes a thought digressing εἰς ἄλλο γένος ; and besides, Ewald rightly remarks that Shulamith always uses the word ררִי of her beloved, and that the king never uses it in a similar sense. He contends, however, against the idea that Shulamith here interrupts Solomon ; for he replies to me (Jahrb. IV. 75) : “ Such interruptions we certainly very frequently find in our ill-formed and dislocated plays ; in the Song, however, not a solitary example of this is found, and one ought to hesitate in imagining such a thing.” He prefers the reading לְדוֹדִים [beloved ones], although possibly לְרִרִי, with l, abbreviated after the popular style of speech from im, may be the same word. But is this l'dodim not a useless addition ? Is excellent wine good to the taste of friends merely ; and does it linger longer in the palate of those not beloved than of those loving ? And is the circumstance that Shulamith interrupts the king, and carries forward his words, not that which frequently also occurs in the Greek drama, as e.g. Eurip. Phocnissae, v. 608 ? The text as it stands before us requires an interchange of the speakers, and nothing prevents the supposition of such an interchange. In this idea Hengstenberg for once agrees with us. The Lamed in l'dodi is meant in the same sense as when the bride drinks to the bridegroom, using the expression l'dodi. The Lamed in לְמִישְׁרִים is that of the defining norm, as the Beth in בְּמִי, Prov. xxiii. 31, is that of the accompanying circumstance : that which tastes badly sticks in the palate, but that which tastes pleasantly glides down directly and smoothly. But what does the phrase וְנִי דוֹבֵב שִׁפְּי וְנִי translate by ικανούμενος χειλεσί μου και ὀδοῦσιν, “accommodating itself (Sym. προσπιθέμενος) to my lips and teeth.” Similarly Jerome (omitting at least the false μου), labisque et dentibus illius ad ruminandum, in which דִּבָּה, rumor, for דוֹבֵב, seems to have led him to ruminare. Equally contrary to the text with Luther's translation : “ which to my friend goes smoothly down, and speaks of the previous year ; ” a rendering which supposes אֲשֵׁנִים (as also the Venet.) instead of אֲשֵׁנִים (good wine which, as it were, tells of former years), and, besides, disregards שְׁפָתַי. The translation : “ which comes at un-awares upon the lips of the sleepers,” accords with the language (Heiligst., Hitz.). But that gives no meaning, as if one understood by אֲשֵׁנִים, as Gesen. and Ewald do, una in eodem toro cubantes ; but in this case the word ought to have been אֲשֵׁנִים. Since, besides, such a thing is known as sleeping through drink or speaking in sleep, but not of drinking in sleep, our earlier translation approves itself : which causes the lips of sleepers to speak. This interpretation is also supported by a proverb in the Talm. Jebamoth 97a, Jer. Moed Katan, iii. 7, etc., which, with reference to the passage under review, says that if any one in this world adduces the saying of a righteous man in his name (מרחשות or רחשות). But it is an error inherited from Buxtorf, that רובות means there loquuntur, and, accordingly, that רובב of this passage before us means loqui faciens. It rather means (vid. Aruch), bullire, stillare, manare (cogn. רב, טף, Syn. רחש), since, as that proverb signifies, the deceased experiences an after-taste of his saying, and this experience expresses itself in the smack of the lips; and ריובב, whether it be part. Kal or Po. = מְרֹבֵב, thus: brought into the condition of the overflowing, the after-experience of drink that has been partaken of, and which returns again, as it were, ruminando. The meaning "to speak" is, in spite of Parchon and Kimchi (whom the Venet., with its φθγγόμενος, follows), foreign to the verb; for רִבָּה also means, not discourse, but sneaking, and particularly sneaking calumny, and, generally, fama repens. The calumniator is called in Arab. dabúb, as in Heb. רָבִיל. We now leave it undecided whether in רובב, of this passage before us, that special idea connected with it in the Gemara is contained; but the roots רב and זב are certainly cogn., they have the fundamental idea of a soft, noiseless movement generally, and modify this according as they are referred to that which is solid or fluid. Consequently רִבָּב, as it means in lente incedere (whence the bear has the name רִב), is also capable of being interpreted leniter se movere, and trans. leniter movere, according to which the Syr. here translates, quod commovet labia mea et dentes meos (this absurd bringing in of the teeth is from the LXX. and Aq.), and the Targ. allegorizes, and whatever also in general is the meaning of the Gemara as far as it exchanges רובות for רחשות (vid. Levy under רחש). Besides, the translations qui commovet and qui loqui facit fall together according to the sense. For when it is said of generous wine, that it makes the lips of sleepers move, a movement is meant expressing itself in the sleeper speaking. But generous wine is a figure of the love-responses of the beloved, sipped in, as it were, with pleasing satisfaction, which hover still around the sleepers in delightful dreams, and fill them with hallucinations.

It is impossible that לרורי in ver. 10 has any other reference than it has in ver. 11, where it is without doubt Shulamith who speaks.

Ver. 11 I am my beloved's,

And to me goeth forth his desire.

After the words "I am my beloved's," we miss the "and my beloved is mine" of vi. 3, cf. ii. 16, which perhaps had dropped out. The second line here refers back to Gen. iii. 16, for here, as there, תְּשׁוּקָה, from שָׁק, to impel, move, is the impulse of love as a natural power.

When a wife is the object of such passion, it is possible that, on the one side, she feels herself very fortunate therein; and, on the other side, if the love, in its high commendations, becomes excessive, oppressed, and when she perceives that in her love-relation she is the observed of many eyes, troubled. It is these mingled feelings which move Shulamith when she continues the praise so richly lavished on her in words which denote what she might be to the king, but immediately breaks off in order that, as the following verse now shows, she might use this superabundance of his love for the purpose of setting forth her request, and thus of leading into another path; her simple, child-like disposition longs for the quietness and plainness of rural life, away from the bustle and display of city and court life.

Ver. 12 Up, my lover; we will go into the country, Lodge in the villages.

Hitzig here begins a new scene, to which he gives the superscription: "Shulamith making haste to return home with her lover." The advocate of the shepherd-hypothesis thinks that the faithful Shulamith, after hearing Solomon's panegyric, shakes her head and says: "I am my beloved's." To him she calls, "Come, my beloved;" for, as Ewald seeks to make this conceivable: the golden confidence of her near triumph lifts her in spirit forthwith above all that is present and all that is actual; only to him may she speak; and as if she were half here and half already there, in the midst of her rural home along with him, she says, "Let us go out into the fields," etc. In fact, there is nothing more incredible than this Shulamitess, whose dialogue with Solomon consists of Solomon's addresses, and of answers which are directed, not to Solomon, but in a monologue to her shepherd; and nothing more cowardly and more shadowy than this lover, who goes about in the moonlight seeking his beloved shepherdess whom he has lost, glancing here and there through the lattices of the windows and again disappearing. How much more justifiable is the drama of the Song by the French Jesuit C. F. Menestrier (born in Sion 1631, died 1705), who, in his two little works on the opera and the ballet, speaks of Solomon as the creator of the opera, and regards the Song as a shepherd-play, in which his love-relation to the daughter of the king of Egypt is set forth under the allegorical figures of the love of a shepherd and a shepherdess!<sup>1</sup> For Shulamith is thought of as a רֹעֵה [shepherdess], i. 8, and she thinks of Solomon as a רֹעֵה [shepherd]. She remains so in her inclination even after her elevation to the rank of a queen. The solitude and glory of external nature are dearer to her than the bustle and splendour of the city and the court. Hence her pressing out of the city to the country. הַצֹּרֶחַ is local, without external designation, like rus (to the country). כְּפָרִים (here and at 1 Chron. xxvii. 25) is plur. of the unused form כְּפָר (const. כְּפָר, Josh. xviii. 24) or כְּפָר, Arab. kafar (cf. the Syr. dimin. kafrūno, a little town), instead of which it is once pointed כְּפָר, 1 Sam. vi. 18, of that name of a district of level country with which a multitude of later Palest. names of places, such as כְּפָר נַחֲוִים, are connected. Ewald, indeed, understands k'phārim as at iv. 13: we will lodge among the fragrant Al-henna bushes. But yet כְּפָרִים cannot be equivalent to תַּחַת הַכְּפָרִים; and since לָן (probably changed from לַיִל) and הַשְּׂכִימִים, 13a, stand together, we must suppose that they wished to find a bed in the henna bushes; which, if it were conceivable, would be too gipsy-like, even for a pair of lovers of the rank of shepherds (vid. Job xxx. 7). No. Shulamith's words express a wish for a journey into the country: they will there be in freedom, and at night find shelter ('בכפ', as 1 Chron. xxvii. 25 and Neh. vi. 2, where also the plur. is similarly used), now in this and now in that country place. Spoken to the supposed shepherd, that would be comical, for a shepherd does not wander from village to village; and that, returning to their home, they wished to turn aside into villages and spend the night there, cannot at all be the meaning. But spoken of a shepherdess, or rather a vine-dresser, who has been raised to the rank of queen, it accords with her relation to Solomon,—they are married,—as well as with the inexpressible impulse of her heart after her earlier homely country-life. The former vine-dresser, the child of the Galilean hills, the lily of the valley, speaks in the verses following.

Ver. 13 In the morning we will start for the vineyards,

See whether the vine is in bloom,
Whether the vine-blossoms have opened,
The pomegranates budded—
There will I give thee my love.

14 The mandrakes breathe a pleasant odour,
And over our doors are all kinds of excellent fruits,
New, also old,
Which, my beloved, I have kept for thee.

As the rising up early follows the tarrying over night, the description of that which is longed for moves forward. As הַשְּׂכִימִים is denom. of שָׁכַם, and properly signifies only to shoulder, i.e. to rise, make oneself ready, when early going forth needs to be designated it has generally בִּפְתִּיחַ (cf. Josh. vi. 15) along with it; yet this word may also be wanting, 1 Sam. ix. 26, xvii. 16. נִשְׁכַּח לְבָרָה = נִשְׁכַּח לְבָרָה, an abbreviation of the expression which is also found in hist. prose, Gen. xix. 27; cf. 2 Kings xix. 9. They wished in the morning, when the life of nature can best be observed, and its growth and progress and striving upwards best contemplated, to see whether the vine had opened, i.e. unfolded (thus, vi. 11), whether the vine-blossom (vid. at ii. 13) had expanded (LXX. ἤρθησεν ὁ κυπρισμός), whether the pomegranate had its flowers or flower-buds (הַיָּבִיטָה, as at vi. 11); פָּתַח is here, as at Isa. xlvi. 8, lx. 11, used as internally transitive: to accomplish or to undergo the opening, as also (Arab.) fattah<sup>1</sup> is used of the blooming of flowers, for (Arab.) tafttah (to unfold). The vineyards, inasmuch as she does not say בְּרֵיבֵי, are not alone those of her family, but generally those of her home, but of her home; for these are the object of her desire, which in this pleasant journey with her beloved she at once in imagination reaches, flying, as it were, over the intermediate space. There, in undisturbed quietness, and in a lovely region consecrating love, will she give herself to him in the entire fulness of her love. By רֵיבֵי she means the evidences of her love (vid. under iv. 10, i. 2), which she will there grant to him as thankful responses to his own. Thus she speaks in the spring-time, in the month Ijjar, corresponding to our Wonnemond (pleasure-month, May), and seeks to give emphasis to her promise by this, that she directs him to the fragrant “mandragoras,” and to the precious fruits of all kinds which she has kept for him on the shelf in her native home.

רֵיבֵי (after the form רֵיבֵי), love’s flower, is the mandragora officinalis, L., with whitish green flowers and yellow apples of the size of nutmegs, belonging to the Solanaceae; its fruits and roots are used as an aphrodisiac, therefore this plant was called by the Arabs abd al-sal'm, the servant of love, postillon d’amour; the son of Leah found such mandrakes (LXX. Gen. xxx. 14, μῆλα μανδραγορῶν) at the time of the vintage, which falls in the month of Ijjar; they have a strong but pleasant odour. In Jerusalem mandrakes are rare; but so much the more abundantly are they found growing wild in Galilee, whither Shulamith is transported in spirit. Regarding the מְנִיבֵי (from מָנַב, occurring in the sing. exclusively in the blessing of Moses, Deut. xxxiii.), which in the Old Testament is peculiar to the Song, vid. iv. 13, 16. From “over our doors,” down to “I have kept for thee,” is, according to the LXX., Syr., Jerome, and others, one sentence, which in itself is not inadmissible; for the object can precede its verb, iii. 3*b*, and can stand as the subject between the place mentioned and the verb, Isa. xxxii. 13*a*, also as the object, 2 Chron. xxxi. 6, which, as in the passage before us, may be interpunctuated with Athnach for the sake of emphasis; in the bibl. Chald. this inverted sequence of the words is natural, e.g. Dan. ii. 17*b*. But such a long-winded sentence is at least not in the style of the Song, and one does not rightly see why just "over our doors" has the first place in it. I therefore formerly translated it as did Luther, dividing it into parts: "and over our doors are all kinds of precious fruits; I have," etc. But with this departure from the traditional division of the verse nothing is gained; for the "keeping" (laying up) refers naturally to the fruits of the preceding year, and in the first instance can by no means refer to fruits of this year, especially as Shulamith, according to the structure of the poem, has not visited her parental home since her home-bringing in marriage, and now for the first time, in the early summer, between the barley harvest and the wheat harvest, is carried away thither in her longing. Therefore the expression, "my beloved, I have kept for thee," is to be taken by itself, but not as an independent sentence (Böttch.), but is to be rendered, with Ewald, as a relative clause; and this, with Hitz., is to be referred to יִיִּץ (old). Col refers to the many sorts of precious fruits which, after the time of their ingathering, are divided into "new and old" (Matt. xiii. 52). The plur. "our doors" which as amplif. poet. would not be appropriate here, supposes several entrances into her parents' home; and since "I have kept" refers to a particular preserving of choice fruits, al does not (Hitzig) refer to a floor, such as the floor above the family dwelling or above the barn, but to the shelf above the inner doors, a board placed over them, on which certain things are wont to be laid past for some particular object. She speaks to the king like a child; for although highly elevated, she yet remains, without self-elation, a child.

If Solomon now complies with her request, yields to her invitation, then she will again see her parental home, where, in the days of her first love, she laid up for him that which was most precious, that she might thereby give him joy. Since she thus places herself with her whole soul back again in her home and amid its associations, the wish expressed in these words that follow rises up within her in the childlike purity of her love:

Chap. viii. 1 O that thou wert like a brother to me,
 Who sucked my mother's breasts!
 If I found thee without, I would kiss thee;
 They also could not despise me.

2 I would lead thee, bring thee into my mother's house;
 Thou wouldest instruct me—
 I would give thee to drink spiced wine,
 The must of my pomegranates.

Solomon is not her brother, who, with her, hung upon the same mother's breast; but she wishes, carried away in her dream into the reality of that she wished for, that she had him as her brother, or rather, since she says, not אָבִי, but אָבִיךָ (with יָ, which here has not, as at Ps. xxxv. 14, the meaning of tanquam, but of instar, as at Job xxiv. 14), that she had in him what a brother is to a sister. In that case, if she found him without, she would kiss him (hypoth. fut. in the protasis, and fut. without Vav in the apodosis, as at Job xx. 24; Hos. viii. 12; Ps. cxxxix. 18)—she could do this without putting any restraint on herself for the sake of propriety (cf. the kiss of the wanton harlot, Prov. vii. 13), and also (אָבִי) without needing to fear that they who saw it would treat it scornfully (אָבִי, as in the reminiscence, Prov. vi. 30). The close union which lies in the sisterly relationship thus appeared to her to be higher than the near connection established by the marriage relationship, and her childlike feeling deceived her not: the sisterly relationship is certainly purer, firmer, more enduring than that of marriage, so far as this does not deepen itself into an equality with the sisterly, and attain to friendship, yea, brotherhood (Prov. xvii. 17), within. That Shulamith thus feels herself happy in the thought that Solomon was to her as a brother, shows, in a characteristic manner, that "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life," were foreign to her. If he were her brother, she would take him by the hand,<sup>1</sup> and bring him into her mother's house, and he would then, under the eye of their common mother, become her teacher, and she would become his scholar. The LXX adds, after the words "into my mother's house," the phrase, καὶ εἰς ταμίειον τῆς συλλαβούσης με, cf. iii. 4. In the same manner also the Syr., which has not read the words διδάξεις με following, which are found in some Codd. of the LXX. Regarding the word ʿlamm'dene (thou wouldest instruct me) as incongruous, Hitzig asks: "What should he then teach her? He refers it to her mother: "who would teach me," namely, from her own earlier experience, how I might do everything rightly for him. "Were the meaning," he adds, "he should do it, then also it is she who ought to be represented as led home by him into his house, the bride by the bridegroom." But, correctly, Jerome, the Venet., and Luther: "Thou wouldest (shouldest) instruct me;" also the Targ.: "I would conduct thee, O King Messiah, and bring Thee into the house of my sanctuary; and Thou wouldest teach me (וְהִתְחַלְּמֵנִי) to fear God and to walk in His ways." Not her mother, but Solomon, is in possession of the wisdom which she covets; and if he were her brother, as she wishes, then she would constrain him to devote himself to her as her teacher. The view, favoured by Leo Hebraeus (Dialog. de amore, c. III.), John Pordage (Metaphysik, III. 617 ff.), and Rosenmüller, and which commends itself, after the analogy of the Gitagovinda, Boethius, and Dante, and appears also to show itself in the Syr. title of the book, "Wisdom of the Wise," that Shulamith is wisdom personified (cf. also viii. 2 with Prov. ix. 2, and viii. 3, ii. 6 with Prov. iv. 8), shatters itself against this הלמרי; the fact is rather the reverse: Solomon is wisdom in person, and Shulamith is the wisdom-loving soul,<sup>1</sup>—for Shulamith wishes to participate in Solomon's wisdom. What a deep view the "Thou wouldest teach me" affords into Shulamith's heart! She knew how much she yet came short of being to him all that a wife should be. But in Jerusalem the bustle of court life and the burden of his regal duties did not permit him to devote himself to her; but in her mother's house, if he were once there, he would instruct her, and she would requite him with her spiced wine and with the juice of the pomegranates. יַיִן הַרְקָח, vinum conditura, is appos. = genitiv. יַיִן הַרְקָח, vinum conditurae (ἀρωματιστής in Dioscorides and Pliny), like תִּרְיָהּ, Ps. vi. 5, מִיַּם לַחֵץ, 1 Kings xxii. 27, etc., vid. Philippi's Stat. Const. p. 86. אֶשְׁקֶךָ carries forward אֶשְׁקֶךָ in a beautiful play upon words. עָסִים designates the juice as pressed out: the Chald. עָסִי corresponds to the Heb. דָּרַךְ, used of treading the grapes. It is unnecessary to render רַפְּנֵי as apoc. plur., like מִנֵּי, Ps. xlv. 9 (Ewald, § 177a); rimmoni is the name she gives to the pomegranate trees belonging to her,—for it is true that this word, rimmon, can be used in a collective sense (Deut. viii. 8); but the connection with the possessive suff. excludes this; or by 'asis rimmoni she means the pomegranate must (cf. πότῆς = vinum e punicis, in Dioscorides and Pliny) belonging to her. Pomegranates are not to be thought of as an erotic symbol;<sup>2</sup> they are named as something beautiful and precious. "O Ali," says a proverb of

Resigning herself now dreamily to the idea that Solomon is her brother, whom she may freely and openly kiss, and her teacher besides, with whom she may sit in confidential intercourse under her mother's eye, she feels herself as if closely embraced by him, and calls from a distance to the daughters of Jerusalem not to disturb this her happy enjoyment:

Ver. 3 His left hand is under my head,
And his right doth embrace me:
4 I adjure you, ye daughters of Jerusalem,
That ye awake not and disturb not love
Till she please!

Instead of לְתַחַת, "underneath," there is here, as usual, תַּחַת (cf. 5*b*). Instead of אַם . . . וְאִם in the adjuration, there is here the equivalent מַה . . . וְמַה; the interrogative מַה, which in the Arab. má becomes negat., appears here, as at Job xxxi. 1, on the way toward this change of meaning. The per capreas vel per cervas agri is wanting, perhaps because the natural side of love is here broken, and the ἔπος strives up into ἀγάπη. The daughters of Jerusalem must not break in upon this holy love-festival, but leave it to its own course.

SIXTH ACT.

THE RATIFICATION OF THE COVENANT OF LOVE IN SHULAMITH'S NATIVE HOME.—CHAP. VIII. 5-14.

FIRST SCENE OF THE SIXTH ACT, VIII. 5-7.

Shulamith's longing wish attains its satisfaction. Arm in arm with Solomon, she comes forth and walks with him on her native ground. Sunem (Sulem), at the west end of Little Hermon (Gebel ed-Duht), lay something more than 1½ hour<sup>2</sup> to the north of Jezreel (Zera'ín), which also lay at the foot of a mountain, viz. on a N.-W. spur of Gilboa. Between the two lay the valley of Jezreel in the "great plain," which was called, 2 Chron. xxxv. 22, Zech. xii. 11, "the valley of Megiddo" [Esdraelon], now Merj ibn 'Amir—an extensive level plain, which, seen from the south Galilean hills in the springtime, appears "like a green sea encompassed by gently sloping banks." From this we will have to suppose that the loving pair from the town of Jezreel, the highest point of which afforded a wide, pleasant prospect, wandered on foot through the "valley of Jezreel," a beautiful, well-watered, fruitful valley, which is here called מרכר, as being uncultivated pasture land. They bend their way toward the little village lying in the valley, from which the dark sloping sides of Little Hermon rise up suddenly. Here in this valley are the countrymen (populares) of these wanderers, as yet unrecognised from a distance, into whose mouth the poet puts these words:

Ver. 5a Who is this coming up out of the wilderness,
Leaning on her beloved?

The third Act, iii. 6, began with a similar question to that with which the sixth here commences. The former closed the description of the growth of the love-relation, the latter closes that of the consummated love-relation. Instead of "out of the wilderness," the LXX. has "clothed in white" (λελευκανθισμένη); the translator has gathered מִתְהַרְהַרָה from the illegible consonants of his ms. before him. On the contrary, he translates מִתְהַרְהַרָה correctly by ἐπισηρῶμένη (Symm. ἐπερειδομένη, Venet. κεκμηκυῖα ἐπί, wearily supporting herself on . . .), while Jerome renders it unsuitably by deliciis affluens, interchanging the word with מִתְהַרְהַרָה. But הִתְרַפָּה, common to the Heb. with the Arab. and Aethiop., signifies to support oneself, from רָפָה, sublevare (French, soulager), Arab. rafaka, rafuka, to be helpful, serviceable, compliant, viii. irtafaka, to support oneself on the elbow, or (with the elbow) on a pillow (cf. rafik, fellow-traveller, rufka, a company of fellow-travellers, from the primary idea of mutually supporting or being helpful to each other); Aethiop. rafaka, to encamp for the purpose of taking food, ἀνακλί-νεσθαι (cf. John xiii. 23). That Shulamith leant on her beloved, arose not merely from her weariness, with the view of supplementing her own weakness from his fulness of strength, but also from the ardour of the love which gives to the happy and proud Solomon, raised above all fears, the feeling of his having her in absolute possession. The road brings the loving couple near to the apple tree over against Shulamith's parental home, which had been the witness of the beginning of their love.

Ver. 5b Under the apple tree I waked thy love:
There thy mother travailed with thee;
There travailed she that bare thee.

The words, "under the apple tree I waked thee," עִירְרִיתִי, might be regarded as those of Shulamith to Solomon : here, under this apple tree, where Solomon met with her, she won his first love ; for the words cannot mean that she wakened him from sleep under the apple tree, since עורר has nowhere the meaning of הִקִּיץ and הִעִיר here given to it by Hitzig, but only that of “ to stir, to stir up, to arouse ;” and only when sleep or a sleepy condition is the subject, does it mean “ to shake out of sleep, to rouse up ” (vid. under ii. 7). But it is impossible that “ there ” can be used by Shulamith even in the sense of the shepherd hypothesis ; for the pair of lovers do not wander to the parental home of the lover, but of his beloved. We must then here altogether change the punctuation of the text, and throughout restore the fem. suffix forms as those originally used : עוֹרְרֶיהָ, תְּחַבְּלֶתְהָ אֶמְצָה, and יִלְדֶתְהָ (cf. 'שׁ, Isa. xlvii. 10), in which we follow the example of the Syr. The allegorizing interpreters also meet only with trouble in regarding the words as those of Shulamith to Solomon. If הַתְּמָר were an emblem of the Mount of Olives, which, being wonderfully divided, gives back Israel's dead (Targ.), or an emblem of Sinai (Rashi), in both cases the words are more appropriately regarded as spoken to Shulamith than by her. Aben-Ezra correctly reads them as the words of Shulamith to Solomon, for he thinks on prayers, which are like golden apples in silver bowls ; Hahn, for he understands by the apple tree, Canaan, where with sorrow his people brought him forth as their king ; Hengstenberg, rising up to a remote-lying comparison, says, “ the mother of the heavenly Solomon is at the same time the mother of Shulamith.” Hoelemann thinks on Sur. xix. 32 f., according to which 'Isa, Miriam's son, was born under a palm tree ; but he is not able to answer the question, What now is the meaning here of the apple tree as Solomon's birthplace ? If it were indeed to be interpreted allegorically, then by the apple tree we would rather understand the “ tree of knowledge ” of Paradise, of which Aquila, followed by Jerome, with his ἐκεί διεφθάρη, appears to think,—a view which recently Godet approves of ;<sup>2</sup> there Shulamith, i.e. poor humanity, awakened the compassionate love of the heavenly Solomon, who then gave her, as a pledge of this love, the Protevangelium, and in the neighbourhood of this apple tree, i.e. on the ground and soil of humanity fallen, but yet destined to be saved, Shulamith's mother, i.e. the pre-Christian O. T. church, brought forth the Saviour from itself, who in love raised Shulamith from the depths to regal honour. But the Song of Songs does not anywhere set before us the task of extracting from it by an allegorizing process such far-fetched thoughts. If the masc. suff. is changed into the fem., we have a conversation perfectly corresponding to the situation. Solomon reminds Shulamith by that memorable apple tree of the time when he kindled within her the fire of first love; עֲרִיר elsewhere signifies energy (Ps. lxxx. 3), or passion (Prov. x. 12), put into a state of violent commotion; connected with the accus. of the person, it signifies, Zech. ix. 13, excited in a warlike manner; here, placed in a state of pleasant excitement of love that has not yet attained its object. Of how many references to contrasted affections the reflex. 'הַתַּע' is capable, is seen from Job xvii. 8, xxxi. 29; why not thus also עֲרִיר?

With שָׁמָּה Solomon's words are continued, but not in such a way as that what follows also took place under the apple tree. For Shulamith is not the child of Beduins, who in that case might even have been born under an apple tree. Among the Beduins, a maiden accidentally born at the watering-place (menhîl), on the way (rahîl), in the dew (tall) or snow (thelg), is called from that circumstance Munêhil, Ruhêla, Talla, or Thelga.<sup>1</sup> The birthplace of her love is not also the birthplace of her life. As הַתְּפִיחַ points to the apple tree to which their way led them, so שָׁמָּה points to the end of their way, the parental home lying near by (Hitzig). The LXX. translates well: ἐκεῖ ὠδύνησέ σε ἡ μήτηρ σου, for while the Arab. ḥabîda means concupere, and its Pi., ḥabbada, is the usual word for gravidam facere, הַיָּבֵל in the passage before us certainly appears to be<sup>2</sup> a denom.

by Herzog in the Zeit. für hist. Theol. 1861: malum = crux dominica. Th. Harms (1870) quotes ii. 3, and remarks: The church brings forth her children under the apple tree, Christ. Into such absurdities, in violation of the meaning of the words, do the allegorizing interpreters wander.

<sup>2</sup> The Arab. ḥabilat, she has conceived, and is in consequence pregnant, accords in the latter sense with ḥamilat, she bears, i.e. is pregnant, without, however, being, as Hitzig thinks, of a cognate root with it. For ḥamal signifies to carry; ḥabal, on the contrary, to comprehend and to receive (whence also the cord, figuratively, the tie of love, liaison, as enclosing, embracing, is called ḥabl, הַבֵּל), and like the Lat. concupere and suscipere, is used not only in a sexual, but also in an ethical sense, to

Pi. in the sense of "to bring forth with sorrow" (חֲבָלֵי הַיָּלָדָה). The LXX. further translates: ἐκέῖ ὠδίνουσέ σε ἡ τεκοῦσά σε, in which the σε is inserted, and is thus, as also by the Syr., Jerome, and Venet., translated, with the obliteration of the finite יָלְדָהּ, as if the reading were יָלְדָהּ. But not merely is the name of the mother intentionally changed, it is also carried forward from the labour, eniti, to the completed act of birth.

After Solomon has thus called to remembrance the commencement of their love-relation, which receives again a special consecration by the reference to Shulamith's parental home, and to her mother, Shulamith answers with a request to preserve for her this love.

- Ver. 6 Place me as a signet-ring on thy heart,
 As a signet-ring on thine arm !
 For strong as death is love ;
 Inexorable as hell is jealousy :
 Its flames are flames of fire,
 A flame of Jah.
- 7 Mighty waters are unable
 To quench such love,
 And rivers cannot overflow it.
 If a man would give
 All the wealth of his house for love,—
 He would only be contemned.

The signet-ring, which is called חֶתֶם (חֲתָם, to impress), was carried either by a string on the breast, Gen. xxxviii. 18, or also, as that which is called יָדָהּ denotes (from יָבַעַ, to sink into), on the hand, Jer. xxii. 24, cf. Gen. xli. 42, Esth. iii. 12, but not on the arm, like a bracelet, 2 Sam. i. 10 ; and since it is certainly permissible to say "hand" for "finger," but not "arm" for "hand," so we may not refer "on thine arm" to the figure of the signet-ring, as if Shulamith had said, as the poet might also introduce her as saying: Make me like a signet-ring (בְּחֶתֶם) on thy breast ; make me like a signet-ring "on thy hand," or "on thy right hand." The words, "set me on thy heart," and "(set me) on thine arm," must thus also, without regard to "as a signet-ring," express independent thoughts, although שִׁיבִי is chosen (vid. Hag. ii. 23) instead of יָבַעַ, in view of the comparison.<sup>1</sup> Thus, with right, Hitzig finds the conceive anger, to take up and cherish sorrow. The Assyr. habal, corresponding to the Heb. בָּן, is explained from this Arab. habl, concupere. On the supposition that the Heb. had a word, חָבַל, of the same meaning as the Arab. habl, then חָבַל might mean concupiendo generare ; but the Heb. sentence lying before us leads to the interpretation eniti.

thought therein expressed: "Press me close to thy breast, enclose me in thine arms." But it is the first request, and not the second, which is in the form על-זרועך, and not על-זרועתיך (שימני), which refers to embracing, since the subject is not the relation of person and thing, but of person and person. The signet-ring comes into view as a jewel, which one does not separate from himself; and the first request is to this effect, that he would bear her thus inalienably (the art. is that of the specific idea) on his heart (Ex. xxviii. 29); the meaning of the second, that he would take her thus inseparably as a signet-ring on his arm (cf. Hos. xi. 3: "I have taught Ephraim also to go, taking them by their arms"), so that she might lie always on his heart, and have him always at her side (cf. Ps. cx. 5): she wishes to be united and bound to him indissolubly in the affection of love and in the community of life's experience.

The reason for the double request following בִּי, abstracted from the individual case, rises to the universality of the fact realized by experience, which specializes itself herein, and celebrates the praise of love; for, assigning a reason for her "set me," she does not say, "my love," nor "thy love," but אהבה, "love" (as also in the address at vii. 7). She means love undivided, unfeigned, entire, and not transient, but enduring; thus true and genuine love, such as is real, what the word denotes, which exhausts the conception corresponding to the idea of love.

קִנְיָה, which is here parallel to "love," is the jealousy of love asserting its possession and right of property; the reaction of love against any diminution of its possession, against any reserve in its response, the "self-vindication of angry love."<sup>1</sup> Love is a passion, i.e. a human affection, powerful and lasting, as it comes to light in "jealousy." Zelus, as defined by Dav. Chyträus, est affectus mixtus ex amore et ira, cum videlicet amans aliquid irascitur illi, a quo laeditur res amata, wherefore here the adjectives עֲזִיבָה (strong) and קָשָׁה (hard, inexorable, firm, severe) are respectively assigned to "love" and "jealousy," as at Gen. xlix. 7 to "anger" and "wrath." It is much more remarkable that the energy of love, which, so to say, is the life of life, is compared to the energy of death and Hades; with at least equal right כְּמִוְתָא and מְשָׁאֵל might be used, for love scorns both, outlasts both, triumphs over both (Rom. viii. 38 f.; 1 Cor. xv. 54 f.). But the text does not speak of surpassing, but of equality; not of love and jealousy that they surpass death and Hades

Sanhedrin 21b: עוֹשָׂה אֹתָהּ כְּמִין קָמִיעַ וְתוֹלָה בְּזֵרֶת; but also there the amulet i thought of not as fastened to the finger, but as wound round the arm.

but that they are equal to it. The point of comparison in both cases is to be obtained from the predicates. נ, powerful, designates the person who, being assailed, cannot be overcome (Num. xiii. 28), and, assailing, cannot be withstood (Judg. xiv. 18). Death is obviously thought of as the assailer (Jer. ix. 20), against which nothing can hold its ground, from which nothing can escape, to whose sceptre all must finally yield (vid. Ps. xlix.). Love is like it in this, that it also seizes upon men with irresistible force (Böttcher: "He whom Death assails must die, whom Love assails must love"); and when she has once assailed him, she rests not till she has him wholly under her power; she kills him, as it were, in regard to everything else that is not the object of his love. חֲזָק, hard (opposed to רַך, 2 Sam. iii. 39), σκληρός, designates one on whom no impression is made, who will not yield (Ps. xlvi. 4, xix. 4), or one whom stern fate has made inwardly stubborn and obtuse (1 Sam. i. 15). Here the point of comparison is inflexibility; for Sheol, thought of with שֹׁאֵל, to ask (vid. under Isa. v. 14), is the God-ordained messenger of wrath, who inexorably gathers in all that are on the earth, and holds them fast when once they are swallowed up by him. So the jealousy of love wholly takes possession of the beloved object not only in arrest, but also in safe keeping; she holds her possession firmly, that it cannot be taken from her (Wisd. ii. 1), and burns relentlessly and inexorably against any one who does injury to her possession (Prov. vi. 34 f.). But when Shulamith wishes, in the words, "set me," etc., to be bound to the heart and to the arm of Solomon, has she in the clause assigning a reason the love in view with which she loves, or that with which she is loved? Certainly not the one to the exclusion of the other; but as certainly, first of all, the love with which she wishes to fill, and believes that she does fill, her beloved. If this is so, then with "for strong as death is love," she gives herself up to this love on the condition that it confesses itself willing to live only for her, and to be as if dead for all others; and with "inexorable as hell is jealousy," in such a manner that she takes shelter in the jealousy of this love against the occurrence of any fit of infidelity, since she consents therein to be wholly and completely absorbed by it.

To קָנָה, which proceeds from the primary idea of a red glow, there is connected the further description of this love to the sheltering and protecting power of which she gives herself up: "its flames, אֵשׁ, are flames of fire;" its sparkling is the sparkling of fire. The verb הִשָּׂרַח signifies, in Syr. and Arab., to creep along, to make short steps; in Heb. and Chald., to sparkle, to flame, which in Samar. is referred to impetuosity. Symmachus translates, after the Samar. (which Hitzig approves of): αἱ ὀρμαὶ αὐτοῦ ὀρμαὶ πύρινοι; the Venet., after Kimchi, ἀνθρακες, for he exchanges רָשָׁף with the probably non-cogn. רָצַף; others render it all with words which denote the bright glancings of fire. רָשָׁף (so here, according to the Masora; on the contrary, at Ps. lxxvi. 4, רָשָׁפִי) are effulgurations; the pred. says that these are not only of a bright shining, but of a fiery nature, which, as they proceed from fire, so also produce fire, for they set on fire and kindle.<sup>1</sup> Love, in its flashings up, is like fiery flashes of lightning; in short, it is שְׁלֵהֶבֶתָיָה,<sup>2</sup> which is thus to be written as one word with הַ raphatum, according to the Masora; but in this form of the word יה is also the name of God, and more than a meaningless superlative strengthening of the idea. As לְהִכָּה is formed from the Kal לָהֵב, to flame (R. לָב, to lick, like לָהֵט, R. לָט, to twist), so is שְׁלֵהֶבֶתָיָה, from the Shafel שָׁלַהֵב, to cause to flame; this active stem is frequently found, especially in the Aram., and has in the Assyr. almost wholly supplanted the Afel (vid. Schrader in Deut. Morg. Zeit. xxvi. 275). שְׁלֵהֶבֶתָיָה is thus related primarily to לָהֵב, as inflammatio to (Ger.) Flamme; יה thus presents itself the more naturally to be interpreted as gen. subjecti. Love of a right kind is a flame not kindled and inflamed by man (Job xx. 26), but by God—the divinely-influenced free inclination of two souls to each other, and at the same time, as is now further said, 7a, 7b, a situation supporting all adversities and assaults, and a pure personal relation conditioned by nothing material. It is a fire-flame which mighty waters (רַבִּים, great and many, as at Hab. iii. 15; cf. עַיִים, wild, Isa. xliii. 16) cannot extinguish, and streams cannot overflow it (cf. Ps. lxix. 3, cxxiv. 4) or sweep it away (cf. Job xiv. 19; Isa. xxviii. 17). Hitzig adopts the latter signification, but the figure of the fire makes the former more natural; no heaping up of adverse circumstances can extinguish true love, as many waters extinguish elemental fire ; no earthly power can suppress it by the strength of its assault, as streams drench all they sweep over in their flow—the flame of Jah is inextinguishable.

Nor can this love be bought ; any attempt to buy it would be scorned and counted madness. The expression is like Prov. vi. 30 f. ; cf. Num. xxii. 18 ; 1 Cor. xiii. 3. Regarding הן (from הן, (Arab.) han, levem esse), convenience, and that by which life is made comfortable, vid. at Prov. i. 13. According to the shepherd-hypothesis, here occurs the expression of the peculiar point of the story of the intercourse between Solomon and Shulamith ; she scorns the offers of Solomon ; her love is not to be bought, and it already belongs to another. But of offers we read nothing beyond i. 11, where, as in the following ver. 12, it is manifest that Shulamith is in reality excited in love. Hitzig also remarks under i. 12 : “ When the speaker says the fragrance of her nard is connected with the presence of the king, she means that only then does she smell the fragrance of nard, i.e. only his presence awakens in her heart pleasant sensations or sweet feelings.” Shulamith manifestly thus speaks, also emphasizing vi. 12, the spontaneousness of her relation to Solomon ; but Hitzig adds : “ These words, i. 12, are certainly spoken by a court lady.” But the Song knows only a chorus of the “ Daughters of Jerusalem ”—that court lady is only a phantom, by means of which Hitzig’s ingenuity seeks to prop up the shepherd-hypothesis, the weakness of which his penetration has discerned. As we understand the Song, ver. 7 refers to the love with which Shulamith loves, as decidedly as ôb to the love with which she is loved. Nothing in all the world is able to separate her from loving the king ; it is love to his person, not love called forth by a desire for riches which he disposes of, not even by the splendour of the position which awaited her, but free, responsive love with which she answered free love making its approach to her. The poet here represents Shulamith herself as expressing the idea of love embodied in her. That apple tree, where he awaked first love in her, is a witness of the renewal of their mutual covenant of love ; and it is significant that only here, just directly here, where the idea of the whole is expressed more fully, and in a richer manner than at vii. 7, is God denoted by His name, and that by His name as revealed in the history of redemption. Hitzig, Ewald, Olshausen, Böttcher, expand this concluding word, for the sake of rhythmic symmetry, to שְׁלֵהֲבֹתֶיהָ שְׁלֵהֲבֹתֶיהָ [its flames are flames of Jah] ; but a similar conclusion is found at Ps. xxiv. 6, xlvi. 7, and elsewhere.

“ I would almost close the book,” says Herder in his Lied der Lieder (Song of Songs), 1778, "with this divine seal. It is even as good as closed, for what follows appears only as an appended echo." Daniel Sanders (1845) closes it with ver. 7, places ver. 12 after i. 6, and cuts off vers. 8–11, 13, 14 as not original. Anthologists, like Döpke and Magnus, who treat the Song as the Fragmentists do the Pentateuch, find here their confused medley sanctioned. Umbreit also, 1820, although as for the rest recognising the Song as a compact whole, explains viii. 8–12, 13, 14 as a fragment, not belonging to the work itself. Hoelemann, however, in his Krone des Hohenedes [Crown of the Song], 1856 (thus he names the "concluding Act," viii. 5–14), believes that there is here represented, not only in vers. 6, 7, but further also in vers. 8–12, the essence of true love—what it is, and how it is won; and then in viii. 13 f. he hears the Song come to an end in pure idyllic tones. We see in ver. 8 ff. the continuation of the love story practically idealized and set forth in dramatic figures. There is no inner necessity for this continuance. It shapes itself after that which has happened; and although in all history divine reason and moral ideas realize themselves, yet the material by means of which this is done consists of accidental circumstances and free actions passing thereby into reciprocal action. But ver. 8 ff. is the actual continuance of the story on to the completed conclusion, not a mere appendix, which might be wanting without anything being thereby missed. For after the poet has set before us the loving pair as they wander arm in arm through the green pasture-land between Jezreel and Sunem till they reach the environs of the parental home, which reminds them of the commencement of their love relations, he cannot represent them as there turning back, but must present to us still a glimpse of what transpired on the occasion of their visit there. After that first Act of the concluding scene, there is yet wanting a second, to which the first points.

SECOND SCENE OF THE FIFTH ACT, VIII. 8–14.

The locality of this scene is Shulamith's parental home. It is she herself who speaks in these words:

Ver. 8 We have a sister, a little one,
 And she has no breasts:
 What shall we do with our sister
 In the day when she will be sued for?

Between vers. 8 and 7 is a blank. The figure of the wanderers is followed by the figure of the visitors. But who speaks here? The interchange of the scene permits that Shulamith conclude the one scene and begin the other, as in the first Act; or also that at the same time with the change of scene there is an interchange of persons, as e.g. in the third Act. But if Shulamith speaks, all her words are not by any means included in what is said from ver. 8 to ver. 10. Since, without doubt, she also speaks in ver. 11 f., this whole second figure consists of Shulamith's words, as does also the second of the second Act, iii. 1-5. But there Shulamith's address presents itself as the narrative of an experience, and the narrative dramatically framed in itself is thoroughly penetrated by the I of the speaker; but here, as e.g. Ewald, Heiligst., and Böttch. explain, she would begin with a dialogue with her brothers referable to herself, one that had formerly taken place—that little sister, Ewald remarks under ver. 10, stands here now grown up; she took notice of that severe word formerly spoken by her brothers, and can now joyfully before all exclaim, taking up the same flowery language, that she is a wall, etc. But that a monologue should begin with a dialogue without any introduction, is an impossibility; in this case the poet ought not to have left the expression, "of old my mother's sons said," to be supplemented by the reader or hearer. It is true, at iii. 2, v. 3, we have a former address introduced without any formal indication of the fact; but it is the address of the narrator herself. With ver. 8 there will thus begin a colloquy arising out of present circumstances. That in this conversation ver. 8 appertains to the brothers, is evident. This harsh entweder oder (aut . . . aut) is not appropriate as coming from Shulamith's mouth; it is her brothers alone, as Hoelemann rightly remarks, who utter these words, as might have been expected from them in view of i. 6. But does ver. 8 belong also to them? There may be two of them, says Hitzig, and the one may in ver. 9 reply to the question of the other in ver. 8; Shulamith, who has heard their conversation, suddenly interposes with ver. 10. But the transition from the first to the second scene is more easily explained if Shulamith proposes the question of ver. 8 for consideration. This is not set aside by Hitzig's questions: "Has she to determine in regard to her sister? and has she now for the first time come to do nothing in haste?" For (1) the dramatic figures of the Song follow each other chronologically, but not without blanks; and the poet does not at all require us to regard ver. 8 as Shulamith's first words after her entrance into her parental home; (2) but it is altogether seeming for Shulamith, who has now become independent, and who has been raised so high, to throw out this question of loving care for her sister. Besides, from the fact that with ver. 8 there commences the representation of a present occurrence, it is proved that the sister here spoken of is not Shulamith herself. If it were Shulamith herself, the words of vers. 8, 9 would look back to what had previously taken place, which, as we have shown, is impossible. Or does vi. 9 require that we should think of Shulamith as having no sister? Certainly not, for so understood, these words would be purposeless. The "only one," then, does not mean the only one numerically, but, as at Prov. iv. 3, it is emphatic (Hitzig); she is called by Solomon the "only one" of her mother in this sense, that she had not one her equal.

Thus it is Shulamith who here speaks, and she is not the "sister" referred to. The words, "we have a sister . . .," spoken in the family circle, whether regarded as uttered by Shulamith or not, have something strange in them, for one member of a family does not need thus to speak to another. We expect: With regard to our sister, who is as yet little and not of full age, the question arises, What will be done when she has grown to maturity to guard her innocence? Thus the expression would have stood, but the poet separates it into little symmetrical sentences; for poetry presents facts in a different style from prose. Hoelem. has on this remarked that the words are not to be translated: we have a little sister, which the order of the words  $\text{אָהוּת ק' וְנִי}$  would presuppose, Gen. xl. 20; cf. 2 Sam. iv. 4, xii. 2 f.; Isa. xxvi. 1, xxxiii. 21. "Little" is not immediately connected with "sister," but follows it as an apposition; and this appositional description lays the ground for the question: We may be now without concern; but when she is grown up and will be courted, what then? "Little" refers to age, as at 2 Kings v. 2; cf. Gen. xlv. 20. The description of the child in the words, "she has no breasts," has neither in itself nor particularly for Oriental feeling anything indecent in it (cf. mammæ sororiarunt, Ezek. xvi. 7). The  $\text{ל}$  following  $\text{מִיָּה פִּעֲטָה}$  is here not thus purely the dat. commodi, as e.g. Isa. lxiv. 3 (to act for some one), but indiff. dat. (what shall we do for her?); but  $\text{מִיָּה}$  is, according to the connection, as at Gen. xxvii. 37, 1 Sam. x. 2, Isa. v. 4, equivalent to: What conducing to her advantage? Instead of  $\text{בַּיּוֹם}$ , the form  $\text{בַּיּוֹם}$  lay syntactically nearer (cf. Ex. vi. 28); the art. in  $\text{בַּיּוֹם}$  is, as at Eccles. xii. 3, understood demonstr.: that day when she will be spoken for i.e. will attract the attention of a suitor.  $\text{אֶתְּ$  after  $\text{יִבְרַךְ}$  may have manifold significations (vid. under Ps. lxxxvii. 3); thus the general signification of "concerning," 1 Sam. xix. 3, is modified in the sense of courting a wife, 1 Sam. xxv. 39. The brothers now take speech in hand, and answer Shulamith's question as to what will have to be done for the future safety of their little sister when the time comes that she shall be sought for :

Ver. 9 If she be a wall,
 We will build upon her a pinnacle of silver ;
 And if she be a door,
 We will block her up with a board of cedar-wood.

The brothers are the nearest guardians and counsellors of the sister, and, particularly in the matter of marriage, have the precedence even of the father and mother, Gen. xxiv. 50, 55, xxxiv. 6-8. They suppose two cases which stand in contrast to each other, and announce their purpose with reference to each case. Hoelem. here affects a synonymous instead of the antithetic parallelism ; for he maintains that וְאִם (וְאִם) . . . אִם nowhere denotes a contrast, but, like sive . . . sive, essential indifference. But examples such as Deut. xviii. 3 (sive bovem, sive ovem) are not applicable here ; for this correl. אִם . . . אִם, denoting essential equality, never begins the antecedents of two principal sentences, but always stands in the component parts of one principal sentence. Wherever וְאִם . . . אִם commences two parallel conditional clauses, the parallelism is always, according to the contents of these clauses, either synonymous, Gen. xxxi. 50, Amos ix. 2-4, Eccles. xi. 3 (where the first וְאִם signifies ac si, and the second sive), or antithetic, Num. xvi. 29 f. ; Job xxxvi. 11 f. ; Isa. i. 19 f. The contrast between חוֹפֵה (from חָפַה, Arab. haman, Modern Syr. chamo, to preserve, protect) and דִּלְתָה (from דָּלַה, to hang loose, of doors, Prov. xxvi. 14, which move hither and thither on their hinges) is obvious. A wall stands firm and withstands every assault if it serves its purpose (which is here presupposed, where it is used as a figure of firmness of character). A door, on the contrary, is moveable ; and though it be for the present closed (דִּלְתָה is intentionally used, and not פָּתַח, vid. Gen. xix. 6), yet it is so formed that it can be opened again. A maiden inaccessible to seduction is like a wall, and one accessible to it is like a door. In the apodosis, 9a, the LXX. correctly renders טִירָה by ἐπάλαξις ; Jerome, by propugnacula. But it is not necessary to read טִירָה. The verb טָוֵר, cogn. דָּוַר, signifies to surround, whence tirah (= Arab. duḍr), a round encampment, Gen. xxv. 16, and, generally, a habitation, Ps. lxi. 25 ; and then also, to range together, whence טָוֵר, a rank, row (cf. Arab. thur and daur, which, in the manifoldness of their meanings, are parallel with the French tour), or also tirah, which, Ezek. xlvi. 23 (vid. Keil), denotes the row or layer of masonry,—in the passage before us, a row of battlements (Ew.), or a crown of the wall (Hitz.), i.e. battlements as a wreath on the summit of a wall. Is she a wall,—i.e. does she firmly and successfully withstand all immoral approaches?—then they will adorn this wall with silver pinnacles (cf. Isa. liv. 12), i.e. will bestow upon her the high honour which is due to her maidenly purity and firmness; silver is the symbol of holiness, as gold is the symbol of nobility. In the apodosis בָּלַעַר עַל is not otherwise meant than when used in a military sense of enclosing by means of besieging, but, like Isa. xxix. 3, with the obj.-accus., of that which is pressed against that which is to be excluded; צָרַר here means, forcibly to press against, as סָגַר, Gen. ii. 21, to unite by closing up.

לִי־אֶרֶז is a board or plank (cf. Ezek. xxvii. 5, of the double planks of a ship's side) of cedar wood (cf. Zeph. ii. 14, אֶרֶז־הַיָּם, cedar wainscot). Cedar wood comes here into view not on account of the beautiful polish which it takes on, but merely because of its hardness and durability. Is she a door, i.e. accessible to seduction? they will enclose this door around with a cedar plank, i.e. watch her in such a manner that no seducer or lover will be able to approach her. By this morally stern but faithful answer, Shulamith is carried back to the period of her own maidenhood, when her brothers, with good intention, dealt severely with her. Looking back to this time, she could joyfully confess:

Ver. 10 I was a wall,
And my breasts like towers;
Then I became in his eyes
Like one who findeth peace.

In the language of prose, the statement would be: Your conduct is good and wise, as my own example shows; of me also ye thus faithfully took care; and that I met this your solicitude with strenuous self-preservation, has become, to my joy and yours, the happiness of my life. That in this connection not חִוּמָה אֲנִי, but אֲנִי חִוּמָה has to be used, is clear: she compares herself with her sister, and the praise she takes to herself she takes to the honour of her brothers. The comparison of her breasts to towers is suggested by the comparison of her person to a wall; Kleuker rightly remarks that here the comparison is not of thing with thing, but of relation with relation: the breasts were those of her person, as the towers were of the wall, which, by virtue of the power of defence which they conceal within themselves, never permit the enemy, whose attention they attract, to approach them. The two substantival clauses, murus et ubera mea instar turrium, have not naturally a retrospective signification, as they would in a historical connection (vid. under Gen. ii. 10); but they become retrospective by the following "then I became," like Deut. xxvi. 5, by the historical tense following, where, however, it is to be remarked that the expression, having in itself no relation to time, which is incapable of being expressed in German, mentions the past not in a way that excludes the present, but as including it. She was a wall, and her breasts like the towers, i.e. all seductions rebounded from her, and ventured not near her awe-inspiring attractions; then (אָ, temporal, but at the same time consequent; thereupon, and for this reason, as at Ps. xl. 8, Jer. xxii. 15, etc.) she became in his (Solomon's) eyes as one who findeth peace. According to the shepherd-hypothesis, she says here: he deemed it good to forbear any further attempts, and to let me remain in peace (Ewald, Hitz., and others). But how is that possible? מָצָא שְׁלוֹם בְּעֵינַי is a variation of the frequently occurring מָצָא הוּן בְּעֵינַי, which is used especially of a woman gaining the affections of a man, Esth. ii. 17, Deut. xxiv. 1, Jer. xxxi. 2 f.; and the expression here used, "thus I was in his eyes as one who findeth peace," is only the more circumstantial expression for, "then I found (אָ מָצָאתִי) in his eyes peace," which doubtless means more than: I brought it to this, that he left me further unmolested; שְׁלוֹם in this case, as syn. of הוּן, means inward agreement, confidence, friendship, as at Ps. xli. 10; there it means, as in the salutation of peace and in a hundred other cases, a positive good. And why should she use שְׁלוֹם instead of הוּן, but that she might form a play upon the name which she immediately, 11*a*, thereafter utters, שְׁלֹמֹה, which signifies, 1 Chron. xxii. 9, "The man of peace." That Shulamith had found shalom (peace) with Sh'lomoh (Solomon), cannot be intended to mean that uninjured she escaped from him, but that she had entered into a relation to him which seemed to her a state of blessed peace. The delicate description, "in his eyes," is designed to indicate that she appeared to him in the time of her youthful discipline as one finding peace. The כ is כ veritatis, i.e. the comparison of the fact with its idea, Isa. xxix. 2, or of the individual with the general and common, Isa. xiii. 6; Ezek. xxvi. 10; Zech. xiv. 3. Here the meaning is, that Shulamith appeared to him corresponding to the idea of one finding peace, and thus as worthy to find peace with him. One "finding peace" is one who gains the heart of a man, so that he enters into a relation of esteem and affection for her. This generalization of the idea also opposes the notion of a history of seduction. מוֹצֵאת is from the ground-form matsiat, the parallel form to מוֹצֵאת, 2 Sam. xviii. 22. Solomon has won her, not by persuasion or violence; but because she could be no other man's, he entered with her into the marriage covenant of peace (cf. Prov. ii. 17 with Isa. liv. 10).

It now lies near, at least rather so than remote, that Shulamith, thinking of her brothers, presents her request before her royal husband :

Ver. 11 Solomon had a vineyard in Baal-hamon ;
He committed the vineyard to the keepers,
That each should bring for its fruit
A thousand in silver.

12 I myself disposed of my own vineyard :
The thousand is thine, Solomon,
And two hundred for the keepers of its fruit !

The words כָּרַם הָיָה לְשִׁי are to be translated after כָּרַם וְהוּ, 1 Kings xxi. 1, and לְדָרְיָי . . . , Isa. v. 1, "Solomon had a vineyard" (cf. 1 Sam. ix. 2 ; 2 Sam. vi. 23, xii. 2 ; 2 Kings i. 17 ; 1 Chron. xxiii. 17, xxvi. 10), not "Solomon has a vineyard," which would have required the words כָּרַם לְשִׁי, with the omission of הָיָה. I formerly explained, as also Böttcher : a vineyard became his, thus at present is his possession ; and thus explaining, one could suppose that it fell to him, on his taking possession of his government, as a component part of his domain ; but although in itself הָיָה לוֹ can mean, "this or that has become one's own" (e.g. Lev. xxi. 3), as well as "it became his own," yet here the historical sense is necessarily connected by הָיָה with the נָתַן foll. : Solomon has had . . . , he has given ; and since Solomon, after possessing the vineyard, would probably also preserve it, Hitzig draws from this the conclusion, that the poet thereby betrays the fact that he lived after the time of Solomon. But these are certainly words which he puts into Shulamith's mouth, and he cannot at least have forgotten that the heroine of his drama is a contemporary of Solomon ; and supposing that he had forgotten this for a moment, he must have at least once read over what he had written, and could not have been so blind as to have allowed this הָיָה which had escaped him to stand. We must thus assume that he did not in reality retain the vineyard, which, as Hitzig supposes, if he possessed it, he also "probably" retained, whether he gave it away, or exchanged it, or sold it, we know not ; but the poet might suppose that Shulamith knew it, since it refers to a piece of land lying not far from her home. For בְּעֵל הַמָּוֶן, LXX. Βεελαμών, is certainly the same as that mentioned in Judith viii. 3, according to which Judith's husband died from sunstroke in Bethulia, and was buried beside his fathers "between Dothaim and Balamon"<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This is certainly not the Baal-Meon (now Main) lying half an hour to the south of Heshbon ; there is also, however, a Meon (now Main) on this [the west] side of Jordan, Nabal's Maon, near to Carmel. Vid. art. "Maon," by Kleuker in Schenkel's Bibl. Lex.

(probably, as the sound of the word denotes, Belmen, or, more accurately, Belmain, as it is also called in Judith iv. 4, with which Kleuker in Schenkel's Bibl. Lex., de Bruyn in his Karte, and others, interchange it; and בִּלְמַן, Josh. xix. 28, lying in the tribe of Asher). This Balamōn lay not far from Dothan, and thus not far from Esdraēlon; for Dothan lay (cf. Judith iii. 10) south of the plain of Jezreel, where it has been discovered, under the name of Tell Dotan, in the midst of a smaller plain which lies embosomed in the hills of the south.<sup>1</sup> The ancients, since Aquila, Symm., Targ., Syr., and Jerome, make the name of the place Baal-hamon subservient to their allegorizing interpretation, but only by the aid of soap-bubble-like fancies; e.g. Hengst. makes Baal-hamon designate the world; nothrim [keepers], the nations; the 1000 pieces in silver, the duties comprehended in the ten commandments. Hamon is there understood of a large, noisy crowd. The place may, indeed, have its name from the multitude of its inhabitants, or from an annual market held there, or otherwise from revelry and riot; for, according to Hitzig,<sup>2</sup> there is no ground for co-ordinating it with names such as Baal-Gad and Baal-Zephon, in which Baal is the general, and what follows the special name of God. Amon, the Sun-God, specially worshipped in Egyptian Thebes, has the bibl. name אֲמוֹן, with which, after the sound of the word, accords the name of a place lying, according to Jer. Demai ii. 1, in the region of Tyrus, but not הַמֶּן. The reference to the Egypt. Amon Ra, which would direct rather to Baalbec, the Coele-Syrian Heliupolis, is improbable; because the poet would certainly not have introduced into his poem the name of the place where the vineyard lay, if this name did not call forth an idea corresponding to the connection. The Shulamitess, now become Solomon's, in order to support the request she makes to the king, relates an incident of no historical value in itself of the near-lying Sunem (Sulem), situated not far from Baal-hamon to the north, on the farther side of the plain of Jezreel. She belongs to a family whose inheritance consisted in vineyards, and she herself had acted in the capacity of the keeper of a vineyard, i. 6,—so much the less therefore is it to be wondered at that she takes an interest in the vineyard of Baal-hamon, which Solomon had let out to keepers on the condition that they should pay to him for its fruit-harvest the sum of 1000 shekels of silver (shekel is, according to Ges. § 120. 4, Anm. 2, to be supplied). כֶּסֶף, since we have interpreted הֵיחָד retrospectively, might also indeed be rendered imperfect. as equivalent to afferebat, or, according to Ewald, § 136c, afferre solebat; but since  $\text{נָתַן} = \text{ἐξέδοτο}$ , Matt. xxi. 33, denotes a gift laying the recipients under an obligation,  $\text{בָּא}$  is used in the sense of  $\text{בָּא (אִשֶּׁר) יָבִיא}$ ; however,  $\text{לָטַע}$  is not to be supplied (Symm. ἐνέγκη), but  $\text{בָּא}$  in itself signifies afferre debebat (he ought to bring), like  $\text{נָע}$ , Dan. i. 5, they should stand (wait upon), Ewald, § 136g. Certainly  $\text{נֹטְרִים}$  does not mean tenants, but watchers,—the post-bibl. language has  $\text{הִכִּיר}$ , to lease,  $\text{קָבַל}$ , to take on lease,  $\text{הִכִּיר}$ , rent, e.g. Mczta ix. 2,—but the subject here is a locatio conductio; for the vine-plants of that region are entrusted to the “keepers” for a rent, which they have to pay, not in fruits but in money, as the equivalent of a share of the produce (the  $\text{ב}$  in  $\text{בְּפָרָו}$  is the  $\text{ב}$  pretii). Isa. vii. 23 is usually compared; but there the money value of a particularly valuable portion of a vineyard, consisting of 1000 vines, is given at “1000 silverlings” (1 shekel); while, on the other hand, the 1000 shekels here are the rent for a portion of a vineyard, the extent of which is not mentioned. But that passage in Isaiah contains something explanatory of the one before us, inasmuch as we see from it that a vineyard was divided into portions of a definite number of vines in each. Such a division into m'komoth is also here supposed. For if each “keeper” to whom the vineyard was entrusted had to count 1000 shekels for its produce, then the vineyard was at the same time committed to several keepers, and thus was divided into small sections (Hitzig). It is self-evident that the gain of the produce that remained over after paying the rent fell to the “keepers;” but since the produce varied, and also the price of wine, this gain was not the same every year, and only in general are we to suppose from 12b, that it yielded on an average about 20 per cent. For the vineyard which Shulamith means in 12b is altogether different from that of Baalhamon. It is of herself she says, i. 6, that as the keeper of a vineyard, exposed to the heat of the day, she was not in a position to take care of her own vineyard. This her own vineyard is not her beloved (Hoelem.), which not only does not harmonize with i. 6 (for she there looks back to the time prior to her elevation), but her own person, as comprehending everything pleasant and lovely which constitutes her personality (iv. 12—v. 1), as kerem is the sum-total of the vines which together form a vineyard.

Of this figurative vineyard she says:  $\text{בְּרַמִּי שָׁלִי לְפָנָי}$ . This must mean, according to Hitzig, Hoelem., and others, that it was under her protection; but although the idea of affectionate care may, in certain circumstances, be connected with  $\text{לְפָנָי}$ , Gen. xvii. 18, Prov.

iv. 3, yet the phrase: this or that is לְפָנַי, wherever it has not merely a local or temporal, but an ethical signification, can mean nothing else than: it stands under my direction, Gen. xiii. 9, xx. 15, xlvii. 6; 2 Chron. xiv. 6; Gen. xxiv. 51; 1 Sam. xvi. 16. Rightly Heiligst., after Ewald: in potestate mea est. Shulamith also has a vineyard, which she is as free to dispose of as Solomon of his at Baal-hamon. It is the totality of her personal and mental endowments. This vineyard has been given over with free and joyful cordiality into Solomon's possession. This vineyard also has keepers (one here sees with what intention the poet has chosen in 11a just that word נֹטְרִים) — to whom Shulamith herself and to whom Solomon also owes it that as a chaste and virtuous maiden she became his possession. These are her brothers, the true keepers and protectors of her innocence. Must these be unrewarded? The full thousands, she says, turning to the king, which like the annual produce of the vineyard of Baal-hamon will thus also be the fruit of my own personal worth, shall belong to none else, O Solomon, than to thee, and two hundred to the keepers of its fruit! If the keepers in Baal-hamon do not unrewarded watch the vineyard, so the king owes thanks to those who so faithfully guarded his Shulamith. The poetry would be reduced to prose if there were found in Shulamith's words a hint that the king should reward her brothers with a gratification of 200 shekels. She makes the case of the vineyard in Baal-hamon a parable of her relation to Solomon on the one hand, and of her relation to her brothers on the other. From מֵאֵתֶיךָ, one may conclude that there were two brothers, thus that the rendering of thanks is thought of as כֶּעֶשְׂרִי (a tenth part); but so that the 200 are meant not as a tax on the thousand, but as a reward for the faithful rendering up of the thousand.

The king, who seems to this point to have silently looked on in inmost sympathy, now, on being addressed by Shulamith, takes speech in hand; he does not expressly refer to her request, but one perceives from his words that he heard it with pleasure. He expresses to her the wish that she would gratify the companions of her youth who were assembled around her, as well as himself, with a song, such as in former times she was wont to sing in these mountains and valleys.

Ver. 13 O thou (who art) at home in the gardens, Companions are listening for thy voice;
Let me hear!

We observe that in the rural paradise with which she is surrounded, she finds herself in her element. It is a primary feature of her character which herein comes to view: her longing after quietness and peace, her love for collectedness of mind and for contemplation; her delight in thoughts of the Creator suggested by the vegetable world, and particularly by the manifold soft beauty of flowers; she is again once more in the gardens of her home, but the address, "O thou at home in the gardens!" denotes that wherever she is, these gardens are her home as a fundamental feature of her nature. The חֲבֵרִים are not Solomon's companions, for she has come hither with Solomon alone, leaning on his arm. Also it is indicated in the expression: "are listening for thy voice," that they are such as have not for a long time heard the dear voice which was wont to cheer their hearts. The חֲבֵר are the companions of the former shepherdess and keeper of a vineyard, i. 6 f., the playmates of her youth, the friends of her home. With a fine tact the poet does not represent Solomon as saying חֲבֵרֵי הַכְּרִי nor חֲבֵרֵי הַכְּרִי: the former would be contrary to the closeness of his relation to Shulamith, the latter contrary to the dignity of the king. By חֲבֵרִים there is neither expressed a one-sided reference, nor is a double-sided excluded. That "for thy voice" refers not to her voice as speaking, but as the old good friends wish, as singing, is evident from הַשִּׁמְעֵנִי in connection with ii. 14, where also קוֹלְךָ is to be supplied, and the voice of song is meant. She complies with the request, and thus begins:

Ver. 14 Flee, my beloved,
 And be thou like a gazelle,
 Or a young one of the harts,
 Upon spicy mountains.

Hitzig supposes that with these words of refusal she bids him away from her, without, however, as "my beloved" shows, meaning them in a bad sense. They would thus, as Renan says, be bantering coquetry. If it is Solomon who makes the request, and thus also he who is addressed here, not the imaginary shepherd violently introduced into this closing scene in spite of the words "(the thousand) is thine, Solomon" (ver. 12), then Shulamith's ignoring of his request is scornful, for it would be as unseemly if she sang of her own accord to please her friends, as it would be wilful if she kept silent when requested by her royal husband. So far the Spanish author, Soto Major, is right (1599): jussa et rogata id non debuit nec potuit recusare. Thus with "flee" she begins a song which she sings, as at ii. 15 she commences one, in reponse to a similar request, with "catch us." Hoelem. finds in her present happiness, which fills her more than ever, the thought here expressed that her beloved, if he again went from her for a moment, would yet very speedily return to his longing, waiting bride.<sup>1</sup> But apart from the circumstance that Shulamith is no longer a bride, but is married, and that the wedding festival is long past, there is not a syllable of that thought in the text; the words must at least have been בָּרַח אֵלַי, if בָּרַח signified generally to hasten hither, and not to hasten forth. Thus, at least as little as כּוּב, ii. 17, without אֵלַי, signifies "turn thyself hither," can this בָּרַח mean "flee hither." The words of the song thus invite Solomon to disport himself, i.e. give way to frolicsome and aimless mirth on these spicy mountains. As sov l'cha is enlarged to sov d'meh-l'cha, ii. 17, for the sake of the added figures (vid. under ii. 9), so here b'rahh-l'cha (Gen. xxvii. 43) is enlarged to b'rahh ud'meh (udäme) l'cha. That "mountains of spices" occurs here instead of "cleft mountains," ii. 17b, has its reason, as has already been there remarked, and as Hitzig, Hoelem., and others have discovered, in the aim of the poet to conclude the pleasant song of love that has reached perfection and refinement with an absolutely pleasant word.

But with what intention does he call on Shulamith to sing to her beloved this בָּרַח, which obviously has here not the meaning of escaping away (according to the fundamental meaning, transversum currere), but only, as where it is used of fleeting time, Job ix. 25, xiv. 2, the sense of hastening? One might suppose that she whom he has addressed as at home in gardens replies to his request with the invitation to hasten forth among the mountains,—an exercise which gives pleasure to a man. But (1) Solomon, according to ii. 16, vi. 2 f., is also fond of gardens and flowers; and (2) if he took pleasure in ascending mountains, it doubled his joy, according to iv. 8, to share this joy with Shulamith; and (3) we ask, would this closing scene, and along with it the entire series of dramatic pictures, find a satisfactory conclusion, if either Solomon remained and gave no response to Shulamith's call, or if he, as directed, disappeared alone, and left Shulamith by herself among the men who surrounded her? Neither of these two things can have been intended by the poet, who shows himself elsewhere a master in the art of composition. In ii. 17 the matter lies otherwise. There the love-relation is as yet in progress, and the abandonment of love to uninterrupted fellowship places a limit to itself. Now, however, Shulamith is married, and the summons is unlimited. It reconciles itself neither with the strength of her love nor with the tenderness of the relation, that she should with so cheerful a spirit give occasion to her husband to leave her alone for an indefinite time. We will thus have to suppose that, when Shulamith sings the song, "Flee, my beloved," she goes forth leaning on Solomon's arm out into the country, or that she presumes that he will not make this flight into the mountains of her native home without her. With this song breaking forth in the joy of love and of life, the poet represents the loving couple as disappearing over the flowery hills, and at the same time the sweet charm of the Song of Songs, leaping gazelle-like from one fragrant scene to another, vanishes away.

REMARKS ON THE SONG BY DR. J. G. WETZSTEIN.

THE following aphoristic elucidations of the Song are partly collected from epistolary communications, but for the most part are taken from my friend's "Treatise on the Syrian thrashing-table" (in Bastian's Zeitsch. für Ethnographie, 1873), but not without these extracts having been submitted to him, and here and there enlarged by him.

The thrashing-table (lô<sup>h</sup> ed-derás) is an agricultural implement in common use from ancient times in the countries round the Mediterranean Sea. It consists of two boards of nut-tree wood or of oak, bound together by two cross timbers. These boards are bent upwards in front, after the manner of a sledge, so as to be able to glide without interruption over the heaps of straw; underneath they are set with stones (of porous basalt) in oblique rows, thus forming a rubbing and cutting apparatus, which serves to thrash out the grain and to chop the straw; for the thrashing-table drawn by one or two animals yoked to it, and driven by their keeper, moves round on the straw-heaps spread on the barn floor. The thrashing-table may have sometimes been used in ancient times for the purpose of destroying prisoners of war by a horrible death (2 Sam. xii. 31); at the present day it serves as the seat of honour for the bride and bridegroom, and also as a bier whereon the master of the house is laid when dead. The former of these its two functions is that which has given an opportunity to Wetzstein to sketch in that Treatise, under the title of "The Table in the King's-week," a picture of the marriage festival among the Syrian peasantry. This sketch contains not a few things that serve to throw light on the Song, which we here place in order, intermixed with other remarks by Wetzstein with reference to the Song and to our commentary on it.

i. 6. In August 1861, when on a visit to the hot springs El-hamma, between Domeir and Roheiba to the north of Damascus, I was the guest of the Sheik 'Id, who was encamped with his tribe, a branch of the Şoléb, at the sulphurous stream there (nahar el-mukebret).

Since the language of this people (who inhabited the Syrian desert previous to the Moslem period, were longest confessors of Christianity among the nomads, and therefore kept themselves free from intermingling with the tribes that at a later period had migrated from the peninsula) possesses its own remarkable peculiarities, I embraced the opportunity of having dictated and explained to me, for three whole days, Solebian poems. The introduction to one of these is as follows : " The poet is Solêbi Tuwês, nephew of (the already mentioned) Râshid. The latter had had a dispute with a certain Bishr; that Tuwês came to know, and now sent the following kasidah (poem) to Bishr, which begins with praise in regard to his uncle, and finally advises Bishr to let that man rest, lest he (Tuwês) should become his adversary and that of his party." The last verse is in these words :

" That say I to you, I shall become the adversary of the disturber of the peace,
Bend my right knee before him, and, as a second Zir, show myself on the field of battle (the menâch)."

Zir is a hero celebrated in the Dîwân of Benî Hilâl ; and to bend the right knee is to enter into a conflict for life or death : the figure is derived from the sword-dance.<sup>1</sup>

So much regarding the poem of Solêbi. From this can nothing be gained for the explanation of נִחַרְרֵבִי of the Song ? This is for the most part interpreted as the Niph. of נִחַרְרֵבִי or נִחַרְרֵבִי (to be inflamed, to be angry with one) ; but why not as the Pih. of נִחַר ? It is certainly most natural to interpret this נִחַר in the sense of nakhar, to breathe, snort ; but the LXX., Symm., Theod., in rendering by μαχέσσαντο (διεμαχέσσαντο), appear to have connected with nihharu the meaning of that (Arab.) tanahar, which comes from tahrn, the front of the neck. The outstretched neck of the camel, the breast, the head, the face, the brow, the nose, are, it is well known in the Arab., mere symbols for that which stands forward according to place, time, and rank. Of this nahrn, not only the Old Arab. (vid. Kāmūs under the word) but also the Modern Arab. has denom. verbal forms. In Damascus they say, alsyl nahara min alystan, "the torrent tore away a part of the garden opposing it;" and according to the Deutsch. mory. Zeitschr. xxii. 142, nahhar flana is "to strive forward after one." Hence tanaharua, to step opposite to (in a hostile manner), like takabalu, then to contend in words, to dispute; and nahir is, according to a vulgar mode of expression, one who places himself coram another, sits down to talk, discourses with him. These denominativa do not in themselves and without further addition express in the modern idioms the idea of "to take an opponent by the neck," or "to fight hand to hand with him."

<sup>1</sup> If this dance, e.g., is danced to celebrate a victory, it not seldom happens that the spectators call out to a young man particularly struck by the dancer : Kneel to her. He who is thus challenged steps into the circle, sinks down on his right knee, in which inconvenient attitude he endeavours to approach the dancer, who on her part falls down on both her knees ; sliding and fencing according to the beat of the music, she retreats, and at the same time seeks with all her might to keep her assailant back with a sword. He parries the strokes with his left arm, while he attempts to gain his object, viz. with his right hand to touch the head of the dancer. If he succeeds in this, he cries out, " Dancer, I touch ! " With that the play ends, and the victor leaves the arena amid the approving shouts of the throng, often bleeding from many wounds. Many a one has forfeited his life in his attempt to touch a celebrated beauty. Since such death was self-chosen, the maiden goes unpunished. If the assailant, as often happens, is the brother or father's brother's son of the dancer, in which case the venture is less perilous, he has the right to kiss the vanquished damsel, which is always for the spectator a great amusement.

i. 7. For עֵצִיָּה the Arab. عَيْيَا presents itself for comparison; with inhabitants of the town, as well as of the desert (Hadar and Bedu), alghadwat, "the (maiden) languishing with love," a very favourite designation for a maiden fatally in love; the mas. alghady (plur. alghudat) is used in the same sense of a young man. According to its proper signification, it denotes a maiden with a languishing eye, the deeply sunk glimmerings of whose eyelids veil the eye. In Damascus such eyes are called 'iwan dubbal, "pressed down eyes;" and in the Haurân, 'iwan mugharribat, "broken eyes;" and they are not often wanting in love songs there. Accordingly, she who speaks seeks to avoid the neighbourhood of the shepherds, from fear of the halkalsitr, i.e. for fear lest those who mocked would thus see the secret of her love, in accordance with the verse:

"By its symptoms love discovers itself to the world, As musk which one carries discovers itself by its aroma."

i. 17. The cypress never bears the name snawbar, which always denotes only the pine, one of the pine tribe. The cypress is only called serua, collect. seru. Since it is now very probable that ברוח (ברוש) is the old Heb. name of the cypress, and since there can at no time have been cypresses on the downs of Beirût, the connection of بیروت with ברוח is to be given up. Instead of the difficult Heb. word rahkhithenu, there is perhaps to be read v'hhethenu (from hhäith = hhäits), "and our walls." The word-form حَائِط may have come from the idiom of the Higâz, or from some other impure source, into the written language; the living language knows only hayt

ii. 11. "For lo, the winter is past, the rain is over—is gone."

These are the words of the enticing love of the bridegroom to his beloved, whom he seeks to raise to the rank of queen. "The fairest period in the life of a Syrian peasant," thus Wetzstein's description begins, "are the first seven days after his marriage, in which, along with his young wife, he plays the part of king (melik) and she of queen (melika), and both are treated and served as such in their own district and by the neighbouring communities." The greater part of village weddings take place for the most part in the month of March, the most beautiful month of the Syrian year, called from its loveliness (sahh<sup>a</sup>r) ádár = "prachtmonat" (magnificent month), to which the proverb refers: "If any one would see Paradise in its flowery splendour (fí ezhárihá), let him contemplate the earth in its month of splendour (fí ádárihá). Since the winter rains are past, and the sun now refreshes and revives, and does not, as in the following months, oppress by its heat, weddings are celebrated in the open air on the village thrashing-floor, which at this time, with few exceptions, is a flowery meadow. March is also suitable as the season for festivals, because at such a time there is little field labour, and, moreover, everything then abounds that is needed for a festival. During the winter the flocks have brought forth their young,—there are now lambs and kids, butter, milk, and cheese, and cattle for the slaughter, which have become fat on the spring pasture; the neighbouring desert yields for it brown, yellow, and white earth-nuts in such abundance, that a few children in one day may gather several camel-loads." The description passes over the marriage day itself, with its pomp, the sword-dance of the bride, and the great marriage feast, and begins where the newly married, on the morning after the marriage night,—which the young husband, even to this day, like the young Tobiah, spends sometimes in prayer,—appear as king and queen, and in their wedding attire receive the representative of the bride's-men, now their minister (mezér), who presents them with a morning meal. Then the bride's-men come, fetch the thrashing-table ("corn-drag") from the straw storehouse (metben), and erect a scaffolding on the thrashing-floor, with the table above it, which is spread with a variegated carpet, and with two ostrich-feather cushions studded with gold, which is the seat of honour (merteba) for the king and queen during the seven days. This beautiful custom has a good reason for it, and also fulfils a noble end. For the more oppressive, troublesome, and unhappy the condition of the Syro-Palestinian peasant, so much the more reasonable does it appear that he should be honoured for a few days at least, and be celebrated and made happy. And considering the facility and wantonness of divorces in the Orient, the recollection of the marriage week, begun so joyfully, serves as a counterpoise to hinder a separation.

iii. 11. עֲטָרָה. The custom of crowning the bridegroom no longer exists in Syria. The bride's crown, called in Damascus tâg-el-'arûs, is called in the Haurân 'orga (עֲרָגָה). This consists of a silver circlet, which is covered with a net of strings of corals of about three fingers' breadth. Gold coins are fastened in rows to this net, the largest being on the lowest row, those in the other rows upward becoming always smaller. At the wedding feast the hair of the bride is untied, and falls freely down over her neck and breast; and that it might not lose its wavy form, it is only oiled with some fragrant substances. The crowning thus begins: the headband is first bound on her head,—which on this day is not the Sembar (vid. Deut. morg. Zeit. xxii. 94), but the Kesmâja, a long, narrow, silken band, interwoven with dark-red and gold, and adorned at both ends with fringes, between which the Šumûch, silver, half-spherical little bells, hang down. The ends of the Kesmâja fall on both sides of the head, the one on the breast and the other on the back, so that the sound of the Šumûch is distinctly perceptible only during the sword-dance of the bride. Over the Kesmâja the crown is now placed in such a way that it rests more on the front of the head, and the front gold pieces of the under row come to lie on the naked brow. In the Sahka, partly referred to under vii. 2, the poet addresses the goldsmith:

<sup>1</sup> By nakkârât are meant those little tymbals (kettledrums) which are used to keep time with the dancing-song, when that is not done by the tambourine. The ladies of Damascus take them with them to every country party, where frequently, without any singing, they are the only accompaniment of the dance. They are thus used: a damsel seats herself on the bare ground, places the two (scarcely is there ever only one) saucers—large copper hemispheres—before her breast, and beats against them with two wooden mallets. Their strings are made of the skins of goats or gazelles, while, for the tambourine, preference is given to the throat-bag of the pelican. These tymbals, like our own, have an unequal sound; when out of tune, they are rectified by being heated over a brazier.

Etymologically considered, I believe that the word 'orga must be regarded as parallel with 'argûn (אָרְגִין), which in the Haurân is the foot-buckle; so that, from the root 'arag, "to be bent," it is the designation of a bow or circlet, which the word taj also certainly means. However, on one occasion in Korêa (to the east of Bosrâ), while we were looking at a bride's crown, one said to me: "They call it 'orga, because the coral strings do not hang directly down, but, running oblique (mu'arwajat), form a net of an elongated square."

iv. 14. אֶתְלוֹת. Who recognises in the Moorish nif, "the nose," the Heb. אֶתְ? And yet the two words are the same. The word אֶתְ, enf, "the nose," is used by the wandering Arabs, who are fond of the dimin. אֶתְיִ, "néf, which is changed into אֶתְ; for אֶ in the beginning of a word, particularly before a grave and accented syllable, readily falls away. From néf (neif), finally, comes nif, because the idiom of the Moorish Arabians rejects the diphthong ei.

Thus, also, it fared with the word אֶתְלוֹת, "the little tent," "the little house," as the three-cornered capsules of the cardamum are called,—an aromatic plant which is to the present day so ardently loved by the Hadar and the Bedu, on account of its heat, and especially its sweet aroma, that one would have been led to wonder if it were wanting in this passage of the Song. From אֶתְלוֹת there is formed the dimin. אֶתְלוֹלִי, and this is shortened into hél, which is at the present day the name of the cardamum, while the unabbreviated 'hel is retained as the caritative of the original meaning,—we say, ja' héli, "my dear tent- (i.e. tribal) companions." This linguistic process is observable in all the Semitic languages; it has given rise to a mass of new roots. That it began at an early period, is shown by the Phœnician language; for the bibl. names Hiram and Huram are abbreviated from Ahi-ram and Ahu-ram; and the Punic stones supply many analogues, e.g. the proper names Himilcath (= Ahhi-Milcath, restrictus reginae coeli) with Hethmilcath (= Ahith-Milcath) and the like. On one of the stones which I myself brought from Carthage is found the word אֶתְרִן instead of אֶתְרִין, "sir, master." In a similar way, the watering-place which receives so many diverse names by travellers, the Wéba (Weiba), in the Araba valley, will be an abbreviation of אֶתְרִיבָה, and this the dimin. of אֶתְרִיבָה, the name of an encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. xxi. 10). It had the name 'en ovoth, "the fountain of the water-bottles," perhaps coinage, thin but very large, and of the finest gold. It was carried as a charm against the evil eye. On a bride's crown it forms the lowermost row of coins.

from the multitude of water-bottles filled here by water-drawers, waiting one after another. This encampment has been sought elsewhere—certainly incorrectly. Of the harbour-town Elath (on the Red Sea), it has been said, in the geography of Ibn el-Bennâ (MSS. of the Royal Lib. in Berlin, Sect. Spr. Nr. 5), published in Jerusalem about the year 1000: “Weila, at the north end of the (eastern) arm of the Red Sea; prosperous and distinguished; rich in palms and fishes; the harbour of Palestine, and the granary of Higâz; is called Aila by the common people; but Aila is laid waste,—it lies quite in the neighbourhood.” Thus it will be correct to say, that the name Weila is abbreviated from וַיְלֵא, “Little-Aila,” and designated a settlement which gradually grew up in the neighbourhood of the old Aila, and to which, when the former was at last destroyed, the name was transferred, so that “Little-Aila” became Aila; therefore it is that the later Arab. geographers know nothing of Weila. I have already elsewhere mentioned, that at the root of the name of the well-known Port Sués lies the Arab. ‘sâs (= سِس), which, among all the Syrian tribes, has lost the initial letter Elif, and takes the form of Sâs. Hence the name Sués (Suwés), the diminutive. The place has its name from this, that it was built on the foundations of an older harbour.

Silv. de Sacy already (vid. Gesen. Thes. p. 33b) conjectured that אֶחָלוֹת means cardamums. But, as it appears, he based his proof less on the identity of the two words hél and ahalôt, than on the circumstance that he found the word kakula—the Jemanic, and perhaps originally Indian name of cardamums—in the hâhula of the Egyptians of the present day. But the Egyptian does not pronounce the k like h; he does not utter it at all, or at most like a Hamza, so that kakula is sounded by him not hâhula, but ‘d’ula. And who could presuppose the antiquity of this word, or that of its present pronunciation, in a land which has so radically changed both its language and its inhabitants as Egypt? And why should the Palestinians have received their Indian spices, together with their names, from Egypt? Why not much rather from Aila, to which they were brought from Jemen, either by ships or by the well-organized caravans (vid. Strabo, xvi. 4) which traded in the maritime country Tihâma? Or from Têma, the chief place in the desert (Job vi. 19; Isa. xxi. 14), whither they were brought from ‘Akir, the harbour of Gerrha, which, according to Strabo (as above), was the great Arab. spice market? But if Palestine obtained its spices from thence, it would also, with them, receive the foreign name for them unchanged,—kakula,—since all the Arab tribes express the k sound very distinctly. In short, the word אהלה has nothing to do with kakula; it is shown to be a pure Semitic word by the plur. formations ahaloth and ahalim (Prov. vii. 17). The punctuation does not contradict this. The inhabitants of Palestine received the word, with the thing itself, through the medium of the Arabs, among whom the Heb. אהל is at the present time, as in ancient times, pronounced אהל; thus the Arab vocalization is simply retained to distinguish it from אהל in its proper signification, without the name of the spice becoming thereby a meaningless foreign word. That the living language had a sing. for "a cardamum capsule" is self-evident. Interesting is the manner and way in which the modern Arabs help themselves with reference to this sing. Since hél does not discover the mutilated אהל, and the Arab. <sup>501</sup>اهل, besides, has modified its meaning (it signifies tent- and house-companions), the nom. unit. hela, "a cardamum capsule," is no longer formed from hél; the word geras, "the little bell," is therefore adopted, thereby forming a comparison of the firmly closed seed capsules, in which the loose seeds, on being shaken, give forth an audible rustling, with the little bells which are hung round the bell-wether and the leading camel. Thus they say: take three or four little bells (egrás), and not: telát, arba' hélát (which at most, as a mercantile expression, would denote, "parcels or kinds" of cardamum); they speak also of geras-el-hél ("hél little bells") and geras-et-tib ("spice little bells"). This "little bell" illustrates the ancient אהל. Supposing that kakula might have been the true name of the cardamum, then these would have been called אהלות קלה, "kakula-capsules," by the Heb. traders in spicery, who, as a matter of course, knew the foreign name; while, on the contrary, the people, ignoring the foreign name, would use the words אהלות (אהלי) בשם, "spice-capsules," or only ahaloth. Imported spices the people named from their appearance, without troubling themselves about their native names. An Arabian called the nutmeg góz-et-tib, "spice-nut," which would correspond to a Heb. אגוז בשם. So he called the clove-blossom mismár-et-tib, "spice-cloves," as we do, or merely mismár, "clove." The spice-merchant knows only the foreign word gurumful, "clove." It is very probable that hél, divested of its appellative signification by the word geras, in process of time disappeared from the living language.

That pounded cardamum is one of the usual ingredients in Arab. coffee, we see from a poem, only a single very defective copy of which could be obtained by Wallin (vid. Deutsch. morg. Zeit.

vi. 373). The verse alluded to, with a few grammatical and metrical changes which were required, is as follows :

“With a pot (of coffee) in which must be cardamum and nutmeg,
And twenty cloves, the right proportion for connoisseurs.”

The nut is not, as Wallin supposes, the cocoa-nut (gōz-el-Hind), but the nutmeg ; and ‘úd = “the small piece of wood,” is the clove, as Wallin also, rightly ; elsewhere ‘úd and ‘úda is the little stalk of the raisin.

v. 1. “Eat, friends, drink and be drunken, beloved.” With רעים here is compared פְּרָעִים, Judg. xiv. 11, where thirty companions are brought to Samson when he celebrated for seven days his marriage in Timnath, the so-called bride’s-men, who are called in post-bibl. Heb. שְׂרָפְיָנִים, and at the present day in Syria, shebáb el-‘arts, i.e. the bridegroom’s young men ; their chief is called the Shebín. “The designation ‘bride’s-men’ (Nymphagogen) is not wholly suitable. Certainly they have also to do service to the bride ; and if she is a stranger, they form the essential part of the armed escort on horseback which heads the marriage procession (el-fárida), and with mock fighting, which is enacted before the bride and the bride’s-maids (el-ferrádat), leads it into the bridegroom’s village ; but the chief duties of the shebáb on the marriage day and during the ‘king’s week’ belong properly to the bridegroom. This escort must be an ancient institution of the country. Perhaps it had its origin in a time of general insecurity in the land, when the ‘young men’ formed a watch-guard, during the festival, against attacks.” The names רַע and מִרְיָע Wetzstein derives from a ריע, “to be closely connected,” which is nearly related to רעה ; for he takes ריע, Job vi. 27, as the etymologically closer description of the former, and מִרְיָע (= מִרְיָע) he places parallel to the Arab. word mirjá, which signifies “the inseparable companion,” and among all the Syrian nomad tribes is the designation of the bell-wether, because it follows closely the steps of the shepherd, carries his bread-pouch, and receives a portion at every meal-time.

vii. 1. What would ye see in Shulamith?—

“As the dance of Mahanaim.”

“The sports during the days of the marriage festival are from time to time diversified with dances. The various kinds of dances are comprehended under the general names of sahka and debka. The sahka, pronounced by the Beduin sahée (= sahtsche), is a graceful solitary dance, danced by a single person, or in itself not involving several persons. The debka, “hanging dance,” because the dancers link themselves together by their little fingers ; if they were linked together by their hands, this would give the opportunity of pressing hands, which required to be avoided, because Arab ladies would not permit this from men who were strangers to them. For the most part, the debka appears as a circular dance. If it is danced by both sexes, it is called debka muvadda'a = 'the variegated debka.' The sahka must be of Beduin origin, and is accordingly always danced with a kasidah (poem or song) in the nomad idiom ; the debka is the peculiar national dance of the Syrian peasantry (Hadari), and the songs with which it is danced are exclusively in the language of the Hadari. They have the prevailing metre of the so-called Andalusian ode (— u — — | — u — — | — u —), and it is peculiar to the debka, that its strophes hang together like the links of a chain, or like the fingers of the dancers, while each following strophe begins with the words with which the preceding one closes [similar to the step-like rhythm of the psalms of degrees ; vid. Psalmen, ii. 257]. For the sahka and the debka they have a solo singer. Whenever he has sung a verse, the chorus of dancers and spectators takes up the kehrvers (meredd), which in the debka always consists of the two last lines of the first strophe of the poem. Instrumental music is not preferred in dancing ; only a little timbrel (deff), used by the solo singer, who is not himself (or herself) dancing, gently accompanies the song to give the proper beat" (cf. Ex. xv. 20 f., and Ps. lxxviii. 26).

To the sahka, which is danced after a kasidah (for the most part with the metre — — u — | — — u — | — — u — | — — u —) without the kehrvers in  $\frac{2}{4}$  time, belongs the sword-dance, which the bride dances on her marriage day. Wetzstein thus describes it in Deutsch. morg. Zeit. xxii. 106, having twice witnessed it : "The figure of the dancer (el-hashl, 'she who fills the ring,' or abu h'wesh, 'she who is in the ring'), the waving dark hair of her locks cast loose, her serious noble bearing, her downcast eyes, her graceful movements, the quick and secure step of her small naked feet, the lightning-like flashing of the blade, the skilful movements of her left hand, in which the dancer holds a handkerchief, the exact keeping of time, although the song of the munshid (the leader) becomes gradually quicker and the dance more animated—this is a scene which has imprinted itself indelibly on my memory. It is completed by the ring (h'wesh), the one half of which is composed of men and the other of women. They stand upright, gently move their shoulders, and accompany the beat of the time with a swaying to and fro of the upper part of their bodies, and a gentle beating of their hands stretched upwards before their breasts. The whole scene is brightened by a fire that has been kindled. The constant repetition of the words jā ḥalālī jā mallī, O my own, O my possession! [vid. Psalmen, ii. 384, Anm.], and the sword with which the husband protects his family and his property in the hand of the maiden, give to the sahka, celebrated in the days of domestic happiness, the stamp of an expression of thanks and joy over the possession of that which makes life pleasant—the family and property; for with the Ḥaḍarī and the Bedawī the word ḥalāl includes wife and child.”

“When the sahka is danced by a man, it is always a sword-dance. Only the form of this dance (it is called sahkat el-Gawāfina), as it is performed in Gôf, is after the manner of the contre-dance, danced by two rows of men standing opposite each other. The dancers do not move their hands, but only their shoulders; the women form the ring, and sing the refrain of the song led by the munshid, who may here be also one of the dancers.”

vii. 2. “How beautiful are thy steps in the shoes, O prince’s daughter!”

After the maidenhood of the newly married damsel has been established (cf. Deut. xxii. 13–21) before the tribunal (dīvān) of the wedding festival, there begins a great dance; the song sung to it refers only to the young couple, and the inevitable wasf, i.e. a description of the personal perfections and beauty of the two, forms its principal contents. Such a wasf was sung also yesterday during the sword-dance of the bride; that of to-day (the first of the seven wedding-festival days) is wholly in praise of the queen; and because she is now a wife, commends more those attractions which are visible than those which are veiled. In the Song, only vii. 2–6<sup>1</sup> is compared to this wasf. As for the rest, it is the lovers themselves who reciprocally sing. Yet this may also have been done under the influence of the custom of the wasf. The repetition, iv. 1-5 and vi. 4-7, are wholly after the manner of the wasf; in the Syrian wedding songs also, these encomiums are after one pattern.

We quote here by way of example such an encomium. It forms the conclusion of a sahka, which had its origin under the following circumstances: When, some forty years ago, the sheik of Nawá gave away his daughter in marriage, she declared on her wedding day that she would dance the usual sword-dance only along with a kasidah, composed specially for her by a noted Hauran poet. Otherwise nothing was to be done, for the Hauranian chief admired the pride of his daughter, because it was believed it would guard her from errors, and afford security for her family honour. The most distinguished poet of the district at that time was Kâsim el-Chinn, who had just shortly before returned from a journey to Mesopotamia to the phylarch of the Gerbá tribe, who had bestowed on him royal gifts. He lived in the district of Gâsim,<sup>1</sup> famed from of old for its poets, a mile (German) to the north of Nawá. A messenger on horseback was sent for him. The poet had no time to lose; he stuck some writing materials and paper into his girdle, mounted his ass, and composed his poem whilst on the way, the messenger going before him to announce his arrival. When Kâsim came, the fire was already kindled on the ground, the wedding guests were waiting, and the dancer in bridal attire, and with the sword in her hand, stood ready. Kâsim kissed her hand and took the place of leader of the song, since from want of time no one could repeat the poem; moreover, Kâsim had a fine voice. When the dance was over, the bride took her kesmâja from off her head, folded twenty Gâzi (about thirty thalers) in it, and threw it to the poet,—a large present considering the circumstances, for the kesmâja of a rich bride is costly. On the other hand, she required the poem to be delivered up to her. The plan of the poem shows great skill. Nawá, lying in the midst of the extremely fruitful Batanian plain, is interested in agriculture to an extent unequalled in any other part of Syria and Palestine; its sheik is proud of the fact that formerly Job's 500 yoke ploughed there, and Nawá claims to be Job's town.<sup>2</sup> Since the peasant, according to the well-known proverb, de bobus arator, has thought and concern for nothing more than for agriculture; so the poet might with certainty reckon on an understanding and an approbation of his poem if he makes it move within the sphere of country life. He does this. He begins with this, that a shekâra, i.e. a benefice, is sown for the dancer, which is wont to be sown only to the honour of one of great merit about the place. That the benefice might be worthy of the recipient, four sarwâmen (a sarwâma consists of six yoke) are required, and the poet has opportunity to present to his audience pleasing pictures of the great shekâra, of harvests, thrashings, measuring, loading, selling. Of the produce of the wheat the portion of the dancer is now bought, first the clothes, then the ornaments; both are described. The wasf forms the conclusion, which is here given below. In the autumn of 1860, I received the poem from a young man of Nawâ at the same time along with other poems of Kâsim's, all of which he knew by heart. The rest are much more artistic and complete in form than the saḥka. Who can say how many of the (particularly metrically) weak points of the latter are to be attributed to the poet, and to the rapidity with which it was composed; and how many are to be laid to the account of those by whom it was preserved?

Put it on, and live when the coward and the liar are long dead.

She said: Now shalt thou celebrate me in song, describe me in verse from head to foot!

I say: O fair one, thine attractions I am never able to relate,

And only the few will I describe which my eyes permit me to see:

Her head is like the crystal goblet, her hair like the black night,

Her black hair like the seven nights, the like are not in the whole year;<sup>1</sup>

In waves it moves hither and thither, like the rope of her who draws water,

And her side locks breathe all manner of fragrance, which kills me.

The new moon beams on her brow, and dimly illuminated are the balances,<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> These seven nights are the last four of February and the first three of March (of the old calendar). They are very cloudy, rainy, and dark, and are called el-mustakridât, “the borrowing nights,” either because they have a share of the clouds, rain, and darkness of all the other nights of the year, as if borrowed from them, or because the seven reciprocally dispose of their shares, so that, e.g., the darkness of each of these nights is sevenfold. The frequent hail which falls during these cold disagreeable days is called “old wives’ teeth” (asnân-el-agâiz), because many old people die during these days.

<sup>2</sup> While sometimes the light of the new moon is weak and that of the balances is very strong; the contrary is the case here. The balances are two constellations: the one is called the right balance (minzân-el-ḥakk), and consists of three very bright stars; the other is called the false balance (m. el-butl), and consists of two bright and one dimmer star.

And her eyebrows like the arch of the Nûn drawn by an artist's hand.<sup>1</sup>
 The witchery of her eyes makes me groan as if they were the eyes of a Kufic lady ;<sup>2</sup>
 Her nose is like the date of Irâk,<sup>3</sup> the edge of the Indian sword ;
 Her face like the full moon, and heart-breaking are her cheeks.
 Her mouth is a little crystal ring, and her teeth rows of pearls,
 And her tongue scatters pearls ; and, ah me, how beautiful her lips !
 Her spittle pure virgin honey, and healing for the bite of a viper.
 Comparable to elegant writing, the Sejâl<sup>4</sup> waves downwards on her chin,
 Thus black seeds of the fragrant Kezha<sup>5</sup> show themselves on white bread.
 The Mâni draws the neck down to itself with the spell written in Syr'an letters ;
 Her neck is like the neck of the roe which drinks out of the fountain of Kanawât.<sup>6</sup>
 Her breast like polished marble tablets, as ships bring them to ξê/â (Sidon),
 Thereon like apples of the pomegranate two glittering piles of jewels.
 Her arms are drawn swords, peeled cucumbers—oh that I had such !
 And incomparably beautiful her hands in the rose-red of the Hinnâ-leaf ;
 Her smooth, fine fingers are like the writing reed not yet cut ;
 The glance of her nails like the Dura-seeds which have lain overnight in milk ;<sup>7</sup>
 Her body is a mass of cotton wool which a master's hand has shaken into down,<sup>8</sup>
 And her legs marble pillars in the sacred house of the Omajads.

<sup>1</sup> The eyebrows are compared to the arch of the Arab. letter و inverted ; this comparison, in which the rural poets imitate the insipid city poets, is only admissible when one has before him a Nûn written by a calligraphic hand.

<sup>2</sup> The eyes of the Kufic or Babylonian lady (bâbilîja) are perfectly black, which for the Arabians are particularly dangerous. Also with the Babylonian sorceress Zuhara, who led astray the two angels Hârût and Mârût (vid. Kōrân ii. 26), her charms lay in her black eyes.

<sup>6</sup> Here it is not the well of the Wâdy Kanawât on the Haurân range that is meant, but the Kanawât stream, an arm of the Baradâ, which fills the tanks of the Damascus houses, so that the thought would be that the neck of the bride is white like that of a lady of the city, not brown like that of a peasant.

<sup>7</sup> The Dura of the Haurân is the millet, which, when laid in milk, receives a white glance, and enlarges, so that it may be compared to a finger-nail.

<sup>8</sup> The upholsterer (neddâf, usually called ḥallâg) has a bow above one fathom long, the string of which, consisting of a very thick gut-string, he places in contact with the wool or cotton-wool which is to be shaken loose, and then

There hast thou, fair one, thy attractions, receive this, nothing would be forgotten,
 And live and flourish when the coward and the liar are long ago dead!"

vii. 3. "Thy body a heap of wheat, set round with lilies."

In the fifth Excursus regarding the winnowing shovel and the winnowing fork in my Comment. on Isaiah, Wetzstein's illustration of this figure was before me. The dissertation regarding the thrashing-table contains many instructive supplements thereto. When the grain is thrashed, from that which is thrashed (derts), which consists of corn, chopped straw, and chaff, there is formed a new heap of winnowings, which is called 'arama. "According to its derivation (from 'aram, to be uncovered), 'arama means heaps of rubbish destitute of vegetation; 'arama, 'oreima, 'irám, are, in the Haurán and Golán, proper names of several Puys (conical hills formed by an eruption) covered with yellow or red volcanic rubbish. In the terminology of the thrashing-floor, the word always and without exception denotes the derts-heaps not yet winnowed; in the Heb., on the contrary, corn-heaps already winnowed. Such a heap serves (Ruth iii. 7) Boaz as a pillow for his head when he lay down and watched his property. Luther there incorrectly renders by 'behind a Mandel,' i.e. a heap of (fifteen) sheaves; on the contrary, correctly at the passage before us (Song vii. 3), 'like a heap of wheat,' viz. a heap of winnowed wheat. The wheat colour (el-lbn el-hinti) is in Syria regarded as the most beautiful colour of the human body."

INTRODUCTION.

IF we look at the world without God, it appears what it is,—a magnificent, graduated combination of diverse classes of beings, connected causes and effects, well-calculated means and ends. But thus contemplated, the world as a whole remains a mystery. If, with the atheist, we lay aside the idea of God, then, notwithstanding the law of causation, which is grounded in our mental nature, we abandon the question of the origin of the world. If, with the pantheist, we transfer the idea of God to the world itself, then the effect is made to be as one with the cause,—not, however, without the conception of God, which is inalienable in man, reacting against it; for one cannot but distinguish between substance and its phenomena. The mysteries of the world which meet man as a moral being remain, under this view of the world, altogether without solution. For the moral order of the world presupposes an absolutely good Being, from whom it has proceeded, and who sustains it; it demands a Lawgiver and a Judge. Apart from the reference to this Being, the distinction between good and evil loses its depth and sharpness. Either there is no God, or all that is and happens is a moment in the being and life of God Himself, who is identical with the world: thus must the world-destructive power of sin remain unrecognised. The opinion as to the state of the world will, from a pantheistic point of view, rise to optimism; just as, on the other hand, from an atheistic point of view, it will sink to pessimism. The commanding power of goodness even the atheist may recognise by virtue of the inner law peculiar to man as a moral being, but the divine consecration is wanting to this goodness; and if human life is a journey from nothing to nothing, then this will be the best of all goodness: that man set himself free from the evil reality, and put his confidence in nothing. "Him who views the world," says Buddhism, "as a water-bubble, a phantom, the king of death does not terrify. What pleasure, what joy is in this world? Behold the changing form—it is undone by old age; the diseased body—it dissolves and corrupts! 'I have sons and treasures; here will I dwell in the season of the cold, and there in the time of the heat:' thus thinks the fool; and cares not for, and sees not, the hindrances thereto. Him who is concerned about sons and treasures,—the man who has his heart so entangled,—death tears away, as the torrent from the forest sweeps away the slumbering village."

The view taken of the world, and the judgment formed regarding it, in the Book of Ecclesiastes, are wholly different. While in the Book of Esther faith in God remains so much in the background that there is nowhere in it express mention made of God, the name of God occurs in Ecclesiastes no fewer than thirty-seven times,<sup>1</sup> and that in such a way that the naming of Him is at the same time the confession of Him as the True God, the Exalted above the world, the Governor and the Ruler over all. And not only that: the book characterizes itself as a genuine product of the Israelitish Chokma by this, that, true to its motto, it places the command, "Fear thou God," v. 6 [7], xii. 13, in the foremost rank as a fundamental moral duty; that it makes, viii. 12, the happiness of man to be dependent thereon; that it makes, vii. 18, xi. 9, xii. 14, his final destiny to be conditioned by his fearing God; and that it contemplates the world as one that was created by God very good, iii. 11, vii. 29, and as arranged, iii. 14, and directed so that men should fear Him. These primary principles, to which the book again and again returns, are of special importance for a correct estimate of it.

Of like decisive importance for the right estimate of the theistic, and at the same time also the pessimistic, view of the world presented by Koheleth is this, that he knows of no future life compensating for the troubles of the present life, and resolving its mystery. It is true that he says, xii. 7, that the life-spirit of the man who dies returns to God who gave it, as the body returns to the dust of which it is formed; but the question asked in iii. 21 shows that this preferring of the life-spirit of man to that of a beast was not, in his regard, raised above all doubt. And what does this return to <sup>1</sup> הַאֱלֹהִים ii. 24, 26, iii. 11, 14 (twice), 15, 17, 18, iv. 17, v. 1, 5, 6, 17, 18a, 19, vi. 2 (twice), vii. 13, 14, 26, 29, viii. 15, 17, ix. 1, 7, xi. 5, 9, xii. 7, 13, 14. אֱלֹהִים iii. 10, 13, v. 3, 18b, vii. 18, viii. 2, 13.

God mean? By no means such a return unto God as amounts to the annihilation of the separate existence of the spirit of man; for, in the first place, there is the supposition of this separate existence running through the Bible; in the second place, נַחֲמָה, xii. 7*b*, does not point to an emanation; and in the third place, the idea of Hades prevailing in the consciousness of the ages before Christ, and which is also that of Koheleth, proves the contrary. Man exists also beyond the grave, but without the light and the force of thought and activity characterizing his present life, ix. 5, 10. The future life is not better, but is worse than the present, a dense darkness enduring "for ever," ix. 6, xi. 8, xii. 5*b*. It is true, indeed, that from the justice of God, and the experiences of the present life as standing in contradiction thereto, viii. 14, the conclusion is drawn, xii. 14, xi. 9, that there is a last decisive judgment, bringing all to light; but this great thought, in which the interest of the book in the progress of religious knowledge comes to a climax, is as yet only an abstract postulate of faith, and not powerful enough to brighten the future; and therefore, also, not powerful enough to lift us above the miseries of the present.

That the author gives utterance to such thoughts of the future as xii. 7 and xi. 9, xii. 14,—to which Wisd. iii. 1 ("The souls of the righteous are in God's hand, and no trouble moves them") and Dan. xii. 2 ("Many that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt") are related, as being their expansion,—warrants the supposition that he disputes as little as Job does in chap. xiv. the reality of a better future; but only that the knowledge of such a future was not yet given to him. In general, for the first time in the N. T. era, the hope of a better future becomes a common portion of the church's creed, resting on the basis of faith in the history of redemption warranting it; and is advanced beyond the isolated prophetic gleams of light, the mere postulates of faith that were ventured upon, and the unconfirmed opinions, of the times preceding Christ. The N. T. Scripture shows how altogether different this world of sin and of change appears to be since a world of recompense and of glory has been revealed as its background; since the Lord has pronounced as blessed those who weep, and not those who laugh; and since, with the apostle (Rom. viii. 18), we may be convinced that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed to us. The goal of human life, with its labour and its sufferings, is now carried beyond the grave. That which is done under the sun appears only as a segment of the universal and everlasting operation, governed by the wisdom of God, the separate portions of which can only be understood in their connection with the whole. The estimate taken of this present world, apart from its connection with the future, must be one-sided. There are two worlds : the future is the solution of the mystery of the present.

A N. T. believer would not be able to write such a book as that of Job, or even as that of Ecclesiastes, without sinning against revealed truth ; without renouncing the better knowledge meanwhile made possible ; without falling back to an O. T. standpoint. The author of the Book of Ecclesiastes is related to revealed religion in its O. T. manifestation,—he is a believer before the coming of Christ ; but not such an one as all, or as most were, but of peculiar character and position. There are some natures that have a tendency to joyfulness, and others to sadness. The author of this book does not belong to the latter class ; for if he did, the call to rejoice, xi. 9, viii. 15, etc., would not as it does pervade his book, as the χάλπερ, though in a deeper sense, pervades the Epistle to the Philippians. Neither does he belong to those superficial natures which see almost everything in a rosy light, which quickly and easily divest themselves of their own and of others' sorrows, and on which the stern earnestness of life can make no deep and lasting impressions. Nor is he a man of feeling, whom his own weakness makes a prophet of evil ; not a predominatingly passive man, who, before he could fully know the world, withdrew from it, and now criticises it from his own retired corner in a careless, inattentive mood ; but a man of action, with a penetrating understanding and a faculty of keen observation ; a man of the world, who, from his own experience, knows the world on all its sides ; a restless spirit, who has consumed himself in striving after that which truly satisfies. That this man, who was forced to confess that all that science and art, all that table dainties, and the love of women, and riches, and honour yielded him, was at last but vanity and vexation of spirit, and who gained so deep an insight into the transitoriness and vanity of all earthly things, into the sorrows of this world of sin and death, and their perplexing mysteries, does not yet conclude by resigning himself to atheism, putting "Nothing" (Nirvana), or blind Fate, in the place of God, but firmly holds that the fear of God is the highest duty and the condition of all true prosperity, as it is the highest truth and the surest knowledge—that such is the case with him may well excite our astonishment ; as well as this also, that he penetrates the known illusory character of earthly things in no over-strained manner, despising the world in itself, and also the gifts of God in it, but that he places his ultimatum as to the pure enjoyment of life within the limits of the fear of God, and extends it as widely as God permits. One might therefore call the Book of Koheleth, "The Song of the Fear of God," rather than, as H. Heine does, "The Song of Scepticism;" for however great the sorrow of the world which is therein expressed, the religious conviction of the author remains in undiminished strength; and in the midst of all the disappointments in the present world, his faith in God, and in the rectitude of God, and in the victory of the good, stands firm as a rock, against which all the waves dash themselves into foam. "This book," says another recent author,<sup>1</sup> "which contains almost as many contradictions as verses, may be regarded as the Breviary of the most modern materialism, and of extreme licentiousness." He who can thus speak has not read the book with intelligence. The appearance of materialism arises from this, that the author sees in the death of man an end similar to that of beasts; and that is certainly so far true, but it is not the whole truth. In the knowledge of the reverse side of the matter he does not come beyond the threshold, because His hand was not yet there—viz. the hand of the Arisen One—which could help him over it. And as for the supposed licentiousness, ix. 7-9 shows, by way of example, how greatly the fear of God had guarded him from concluding his search into all earthly things with the disgust of a worn-out libertine.

But there are certainly self-contradictions in the Book of Ecclesiastes. They have a twofold ground. They are, on the one hand, the reflection of the self-contradicting facts which the author affirms. Thus, e.g., iii. 11, he says that God has set eternity in the heart of man, but that man cannot find out from the beginning to the end the work which God maketh; iii. 12, 13, that the best thing in this world is for a man to enjoy life; but to be able to do this, is a gift of God; viii. 12, 14, that it goes well with them that fear God, but ill with the godless. But there is also the contrary—which is just the ground-tone of the book, that everything has its But; only the fear of God, after all that appertains to the world is found to be as vanitas vanitatum, remains as the kernel without the shell, but the commandment of the fear of God as a categorical imperative, the knowledge that the fear of God is in itself the highest happiness, and fellowship with God the highest good, remain unexpressed; the fear of God is not combined with the love of God, as e.g. in Ps. lxxiii. it serves only for warning and not for comfort. On the other hand, the book also contains contradictions, which consist in contrasts which the author is not in a condition to explain and adjust. Thus, eg., the question whether the spirit of a dying man, in contrast to that of a beast, takes its way upwards, iii. 21, is proposed as one capable of a double answer; but xii. 7 answers it directly in the affirmative; the author has good grounds for the affirmative, but yet no absolute proofs. And while he denies the light of consciousness and the energy of activity to those who have gone down to Hades, ix. 10, he maintains that there is a final decisive judgment of a holy and righteous God of all human conduct, xi. 9, xii. 14, which, since there is frequently not a righteous requital given on earth, viii. 14, and since generally the issue here does not bring to light, ix. 2, the distinction between the righteous and the wicked, will take place in eternity; but it is difficult to comprehend how he has reconciled the possibility of such a final judgment with the shadowy nature of existence after death.

The Book of Koheleth is, on the one side, a proof of the power of revealed religion which has grounded faith in God, the One God, the All-wise Creator and Governor of the world, so deeply and firmly in the religious consciousness, that even the most dissonant and confused impressions of the present world are unable to shake it; and, on the other side, it is a proof of the inadequacy of revealed religion in its O. T. form, since the discontent and the grief which the monotony, the confusion, and the misery of this earth occasion, remain thus long without a counterbalance, till the facts of the history of redemption shall have disclosed and unveiled the heavens above the earth. In none of the O. T. books does the Old Covenant appear as it does in the Book of Koheleth, as "that which decayeth and waxeth old, and is ready to vanish away" (Heb. viii. 13). If the darkness of earth must be enlightened, then a New Covenant must be established; for heavenly love, which is at the same time heavenly wisdom, enters into human nature and overcomes sin, death, and Hades, and removes the turning-point of the existence of man from this to the future life. The finger of prophecy points to this new era. And Koheleth, from amid his heaps of ruins, shows how necessary it is that the heavens should now soon open above the earth.

It is a view of the world, dark, and only broken by scattered gleams of light, not disowning its sullenness even where it recommends the happy enjoyment of life, which runs through the book in a long series of dissonances, and gives to it a peculiar character. It is thus intentionally a homogeneous whole; but is it also divided into separate parts according to a plan? That we may be able to answer this question, we subject the contents of the book to a searching analysis, step by step, yet steadily keeping the whole in view. This will at the same time also serve as a preparation for the exposition of the book.

Here below, all things under the sun are vanity. The labour of man effects nothing that is enduring, and all that is done is only a beginning and a vanishing away again, repeating itself in a never-ending circle: these are the thoughts of the book which stand as its motto, i. 2-11.

Koheleth-Solomon, who had been king, then begins to set forth the vanity of all earthly things from his own experience. The striving after secular knowledge, i. 12 ff., has proved to him unsatisfactory, as has also the striving after happiness in pleasure and in procuring the means of all imaginable gratifications, ii. 1-11; wisdom is vanity, for the wise man falls under the stroke of death as well as the fool, and is forgotten, ii. 12-17; and riches are vanity, for they become the inheritance, one knows not whether of a worthy or of an unworthy heir, ii. 18-21; and, besides, pure enjoyment, like wisdom and knowledge, depends not merely on the will of man, but both are the gift of God, ii. 22 ff. Everything has its time appointed by God, but man is unable to survey either backwards or forwards the work of God, which fills eternity, notwithstanding the impulse to search into it which is implanted within him; his dependence in all things, even in pure enjoyment, must become to him a school in which to learn the fear of God, who maintains all things unchangeably, who forms the course of that which is done, iii. 1-15. If he sees injustice prevailing in the place of justice, God's time for righteous interference has not yet come, iii. 16, 17. If God wishes to try men, they shall see that they are dependent like the beasts, and liable to death without any certain distinction from the beasts—there is nothing better than that this fleeting life should be enjoyed as well as may be, iii. 18 ff.

Koheleth now further records the evils that are under the sun: oppression, in view of which death is better than life, and not to have been at all is better than both, iv. 1-3; envy, iv. 4; the restlessness of labour, from which only the fool sets himself free, iv. 5, 6; the aimless trouble and parsimony of him who stands alone, iv. 7-12; the disappointment of the hopes placed on an upstart who has reached the throne, iv. 13-16.

Up to this point there is connection. There now follow rules, externally unconnected, for the relation of man to Him who is the Disposer of all things; regarding his frequenting the house of God, iv. 17 [v. 1]; prayer, v. 2; and praise, v. 3-6.

Then a catalogue of vanities is set forth: the insatiable covetous plundering of the lowly by those who are above them in despotic states, whereat the author praises, v. 7, 8, the patriarchal state based on agriculture; and the nothingness and uncertainty of riches, which do not make the rich happier than the labourer, v. 9-11; which sometimes are lost without any to inherit them, v. 12-14; and which their possessor, at all events, must leave behind him when he dies, v. 15, 16. Riches have only a value when by means of them a purer enjoyment is realized as the gift of God, v. 17 ff. For it happens that God gives to a man riches, but to a stranger the enjoyment thereof, vi. 1, 2. An untimely birth is better than a man who has an hundred children, a long life, and yet who has no enjoyment of life even to his death, vi. 3-6. Desire stretching on into the future is torment; only so much as a man truly enjoys has he of all his labour, vi. 7-9; what man shall be is predestinated, all contendings against it are useless: the knowledge of that which is good for him, and of the future, is in the power of no man, vi. 10 ff.

There now follow, without a premeditated plan, rules for the practical conduct of life, loosely connecting themselves with the "what is good," vi. 12, by the catchword "good:" first six (probably originally seven) proverbs of two things each, whereof the one is better than the other, vii. 1-9; then three with the same catchword, but without comparison, vii. 10, 11-12, 13-14. This series of proverbs is connected as a whole, for their ultimatum is a counsel to joy regulated by the fear of God within the narrow limits of this life, constituted by God of good and bad days, and terminating in the darkness of death. But this joy is also itself limited, for the deep seriousness of the memento mori is mingled with it, and sorrow is declared to be morally better than laughter.

With vii. 15, the I, speaking from personal experience, again comes into the foreground; but counsels and observations also here follow each other aphoristically, without any close connection with each other. Koheleth warns against an extreme tendency to the side of good as well as to that of evil: he who fears God knows how to avoid extremes, vii. 15-18. Nothing affords a stronger protection than wisdom, for (?) with all his righteousness a man makes false steps, vii. 19, 20. Thou shalt not always listen, lest thou hear something about thyself,—also thou thyself hast often spoken harshly regarding others, vii. 21, 22. He has tried everything, but in his strivings after wisdom, and in his observation of the distinction between wisdom and folly, he has found nothing more dangerous than the snares of women; among a thousand men he found one man; but one woman such as she ought to be, he found not; he found in general that God made men upright, but that they have devised many kinds of by-ways, vii. 23 ff.

As the wise man considers women and men in general, wisdom teaches him obedience to the king to whom he has sworn fealty, and, under despotic oppression, patient waiting for the time of God's righteous interference, viii. 1-9. In the time of despotic domination, it occurs that the godless are buried with honour, while the righteous are driven away and forgotten, viii. 10. God's sentence is to be waited for, the more deliberately men give themselves to evil; God is just, but, in contradiction to His justice, it is with the righteous as with the wicked, and with the wicked as with the righteous, here on earth, viii. 11-14. In view of these vanities, then, it is the most desirable thing for a man to eat and drink, and enjoy himself, for that abides with him of his labour during the day of his life God has given him, viii. 15. Restless labour here leads to nothing; all the efforts of man to comprehend the government of God are in vain, viii. 16 ff. For on closer consideration, it appears that the righteous also, with all their actions, are ruled by God, and generally that in nothing, not even in his affections, is man his own master; and, which is the worst thing of all, because it impels men to a wicked, mad abuse of life, to the righteous and the unrighteous, death at last comes alike; it is also the will of God towards man that he should spend this transient life in cheerful enjoyment and in vigorous activity before it sinks down into the night of Hades, ix. 1-10. The fruits of one's labour are not to be gained by force, even the best ability warrants it not, an incomprehensible fate finally frustrates all, ix. 11, 12.

There now follows, but in loose connection as to thought with the preceding, a section relating to wisdom and folly, and the discordances as to the estimate of both here below, along with diverse kinds of experiences and proverbs, ix. 13-x. 15. Only one proverb is out of harmony with the general theme, viz. x. 4, which commends resignation under the ebullition of the wrath of the ruler. The following proverb, x. 5, 6, returns to the theme, but connecting itself with the preceding; the relation of rulers and the ruled to each other is kept principally in view by Koheleth.

With a proverb relating to kings and princes, good and bad, a new departure is made. Riotous living leads to slothfulness; and in contrast to this (but not without the intervention of a warning not to curse the king) follow exhortations to provident, and, at the same time, bold and all-attempting activity; for the future is God's, and not to be reckoned on, x. 16—xi. 6. The light is sweet; and life, however long it may last, in view of the uncertain dark future, is worthy of being enjoyed, xi. 7, 8. Thus Koheleth, at the end of this last series of proverbs, has again reached his Ceterum censeo; he formulates it, in an exhortation to a young man to enjoy his life—but without forgetting God, to whom he owes it, and to whom he has to render an account—before grey-haired old age and death overtake him, into a full-toned finale, xi. 9—xii. 7. The last word of the book, xii. 8, is parallel with the first (i. 1): “O! vanity of vanities; All is vain!”

An epilogue, from the same hand as the book, seals its truth: it is written as from the very soul of Solomon; it issues from the same fountain of wisdom. The reader must not lose himself in reading many books, for the sum of all knowledge that is of value to man is comprehended in one sentence: “Fear God, for He shall bring every work into judgment,” xii. 9 ff.

If we look back on this compendious reproduction of the contents and of the course of thought of the book, there appears everywhere the same view of the world, along with the same ultimatum; and as a pictorial overture opens the book, a pictorial finale closes it. But a gradual development, a progressive demonstration, is wanting, and so far the grouping together of the parts is not fully carried out; the connection of the thoughts is more frequently determined by that which is external and accidental, and not unfrequently an incongruous element is introduced into the connected course of kindred matters. The Solomonic stamp impressed on chap. i. and ii. begins afterwards to be effaced. The connection of the confessions that are made becomes aphoristic in chap. iii.; and the proverbs that are introduced do not appropriately fall into their place. The grounds, occasions, and views which determine the author to place confessions and moral proverbs in such an order after one another, for the most part withdraw themselves from observation. All attempts to show, in the whole, not only oneness of spirit, but also a genetic progress, an all-embracing plan, and an organic connection, have hitherto failed, and must fail.<sup>1</sup>

In presenting this view of the spirit and plan of the Book of Koheleth, we have proceeded on the supposition that it is a post-exilic book, that it is one of the most recent of the books of the O. T. It is true, indeed, that tradition regards it as Solomonic. According to Bathra 15*a*, the Hezekiah - Collegium [vid. Del. on Proverbs, vol. I. p. 5] must have "written"—that is, collected into a written form—the Book of Isaiah, as also of the Proverbs, the Song, and Koheleth. The Midrash regards it as Solomon's, and as written in the evening of his days; while the Song was written in his youth, and the Proverbs when he was in middle age (Jalkut, under i. 1). If in Rosch haschana 21*b* it is said that Koheleth sought to be a second Moses, and to open the one of the fifty gates of knowledge which was unopened by Moses, but that this was denied to him, it is thereby assumed that he was the incomparable king, as Moses was the incomparable prophet. And Bloch, in his work on the origin and era of the Book of Koheleth (1872), is right in saying that all objections against the canonicity of the book leave the Solomonic authorship untouched. In the first Christian century, the Book of Koheleth was an antilegomenon. In the Introduction to the Song (p. 14) we have traced to their sources the two collections of legal authorities according to which the question of the canonicity of the Book of Koheleth is decided. The Synod of Jabne (Jamnia), about 90, decided the canonicity of the book against the school of Shammai. The reasons advanced by the latter against the canonicity are seen from Shabbath 30*b*, and Megilla 7*a*. From the former we learn that they regarded the words of the book, particularly ii. 2 (where they must have read מְהִלָּה, "worthy to be praised"), cf. vii. 3, and viii. 15, cf. 22, as contradictory (cf. Proverbs, vol. I. p. 44); and from the latter, that they hence did not recognise its inspiration. According to the Midrash Koheleth, under xi. 9, they were stumbled also by the call to the enjoyment of pleasure, and to walk in the way of the desire of the heart, which appeared to stand in contradiction to the Tóra (cf. xi. 9 with Num. xv. 39), and to savour of heresy. But belief in the Solomonic authorship remained, notwithstanding, uninjured; and the admonitions to the fear of God, with reference to the future judgment, carried them over the tendency of these observations. Already, at the time of Herod the Great (Bathra 4*a*), and afterwards, in the time of R. Gamaliel (Shabbath 30*b*), the book was cited as Holy Scripture; and when, instead of the book, the author was named, the formula of citation mentioned the name of Solomon; or the book was treated as equally Solomonic with Proverbs and the Song (Erubin 21*b*).

Even the doubtfulness of its contents could give rise to no manner of doubt as to the author. Down till the new era beginning with Christianity, and, in the main, even till the Reformation-century, no attention was paid to the inner and historico-literary marks which determine the time of the origin of a book. The Reformation first called into existence, along with the criticism of dogmatic traditions, at the same time also biblical criticism, which it raised to the place of an essential part of the science of Scripture. Luther, in his Tischreden (Table-Talk), is the first who explained the Preacher as one of the most recent books of the O. T.: he supposed that the book had not reached us in its completed form; that it was written by Sirach rather than by Solomon; and that it might be, "as a Talmud, collected from many books, perhaps from the library of King Ptolemy Euergetes, in Egypt."<sup>1</sup> These are only passing utterances, which have no scientific value; among his contemporaries, and till the middle of the century following, they found no acceptance. Hugo Grotius (1644) is the first who, like Luther, rejects its Solomonic authorship, erroneously supposing, with him, that it is a collection of diverse sayings of the wise, περὶ τῆς εὐδαιμονίας; but on one point he excellently hits the nail on the head: Argumentum ejus rei habeo multa vocabula, quae non alibi quam in Daniele, Esdra et Chaldaeis interpretibus reperias. This observation is warranted. If the Book of Koheleth were of old Solomonic origin, then there is no history of the Hebrew language. But Bernstein (Quaestiones nonnullae Kohelethanae, 1854) is right in saying that the history of the Hebrew language and literature is certainly divided into two epochs by the Babylonish exile, and that the Book of Koheleth bears the stamp of the post-exilian form of the language.

Arivonah, xii. 5; cf. Ma'seroth iv. 6, Berachoth 36a.

Adam, opp. ishak, only at vii. 28.

Izzen, Pi., only xii. 9; not Talm.

'ס, x. 16; י'ס, iv. 10, instead of the older א'ס; cf. ה', Ezek. ii. 10; like ל'ס, Shemoth rabba, c. 46; 'ס א, "Alas, how bad!"

- Targ. Jer. ii, Lev. xxvi. 29; 'ע יא, "Alas for the meek!" Berachoth 6b; cf. Sanhedrin 11a.
- Illu*, "if," vi. 6; Esth. vii. 4, of אס (יא) and לו (לא, read לא, Ezek. iii. 6); Targ. Deut. xxxii. 29 = Heb. לו, common in the Mishna, e.g. Maccoth i. 10.
- Asurim*, only vii. 26; cf. Judg. xv. 14; Seder olam rabba, c. 25; cf. at iv. 14.
- Baale asupoth*, only xii. 11; cf. Sanhedrin 12a, Jer. Sanhedrin x. 1.
- Bihel*, only v. 1, vii. 9; as Hiph. Esth. vi. 14; cf. the transitive use of the Pih. Esth. ii. 9, like Targ. bahel (= ithb'hel) and b'hilu, haste.
- Bur*, only ix. 1; cf. the Talm. al buriv, altogether free from error and sin.
- B'huroth*, only xi. 9, xii. 1; cf. Mib'hurav, Num. xi. 28.
- Batel*, xii. 3; elsewhere only in the Chald. of Ezra; common in the Mishna, e.g. Aboth i. 5.
- Beth olam* (cf. Ezek. xxvi. 20), xii. 5; cf. Tosifta Berachoth iii., Targ. Isa. xiv. 18, xlii. 11.
- B'chen*, viii. 10; Esth. iv. 16; elsewhere only Targ., e.g. Isa. xvi. 5.
- Baal hallashon*, x. 11; cf. baal bashar, corpulent, Berachoth 13b; baal hahhotam, the large-nosed, carrying the nose high, Taanith 29a.
- Gibber*, only at x. 10, to exert oneself; elsewhere: to prevail.
- Gummats*, only x. 8, Syr., and in the Targ. of the Hag. (cf. Targ. Ps. vii. 16).
- Divrath*, vid. under v.
- Hoveh*, ii. 22; cf. Shabbath vi. 6, Erubin i. 10, Jebamoth xv. 2.
- Holeloth*, i. 17, ii. 12, vii. 25, ix. 3; and holeluth, madness, only in the Book of Koheleth, x. 13.
- Zichron*, as primary form, i. 11, ii. 16; vid. at Lev. xxiii. 24, the connecting form.
- Z'man*, iii. 1; Neh. ii. 6; Esth. ix. 27, 31; elsewhere only in the bib. Chald. with אשע, ὥρα, the usual Mishnic word for καρπός and χρόνος.
- Holah* (malum), agrum, v. 12, 15; for this nahlah is used in Isa. xvii. 11; Nah. iii. 19; Jer. x. 19, xiv. 17.
- Ben-khorim* (liber, in contrast to evad, servus), x. 17; cf. הרות (freedom) on the coins of the Revolution of the Roman period; the usual Talm. word, even of possessions, such as praedium liberum, aedes liberae of the Roman law.
- Hhuts min*, only at ii. 25 (Chald. bar min); frequent in the Mishna, e.g. Middoth ii. 3.
- Hhush*, ii. 25; in the Talm. and Syr. of sorrowful experiences; here

(cf. Job xx. 2), of the experiences derived from the senses, and experiences in general, as in the Rabb. the five senses are called חושים.

Hhayalim, x. 10; everywhere else, also in Aram., meaning war-hosts, except at Isa. xxx. 6, where it denotes opes, treasures.

Hhesron, i. 15, a common word in the post-bibl. language.<sup>1</sup>

Hēphēts, iii. 1, 17, v. 7, viii. 6; cf. Isa. lviii. 3, 13. The primary unweakened meaning is found at v. 3, xii. 1, 10. The weakening of the original meaning may have already early begun; in the Book of Koheleth it has advanced as far as in the language of the Mishna, e.g. Mezia iv. 6.

Hheshbon, vii. 25, 27, ix. 10. Plur. at vii. 29, machinationes; only in 2 Chron. xxvi. 15 in the sense of machinae bellicae; but as in Koheleth, so also in Shabbath 150a.

Hhathkhatim, only at xii. 5.

Tahhanak, xii. 4; cf. t'hhon, Lam. v. 3, which is foreign to the Mishna, but is used as corresponding to the older rehhaim, in the same way as the vulgar Arab. mathanat and taḥwan, instead of the older raḥa.<sup>2</sup>

ṣāṣ, Pih., only ii. 20. Talm. Nithpa. נִתְּיָא, to abandon hope, e.g. Kelim xxvi. 8.

Y'giyah, only xii. 12; an abstract such as may be formed from all verbs, and particularly is more frequently formed in the more modern than in the more ancient language.

Yother, as a participial adj.: "that which remains" (cf. 1 Sam. xv. 15) = "gain," vi. 11, vii. 11; or "superiority," vi. 8. As an adv.: "more" (cf. Esth. vi. 6), "particularly," ii. 15, vii. 16; xii. 9, xii. 12. In the Talm. Heb., used in the sense of "remaining over" (Kiddushin 24b); and as an adv., in the sense of plus or magis (e.g. Chullin 57b).

Yaphēh, iii. 11, v. 17, as e.g. Jer. Pesachim ix. 9 (b. Pesachim 99a): "Silence is well-becoming (יָפֵה) the wise; how much more fools!"

Yithron, ii. 13 (twice), vii. 12 (synon. mothar, iii. 1); more frequently "real gain," i. 3, ii. 11, iii. 9, v. 15, x. 10; "superiority and gain," v. 8. Peculiar (= Aram. yuthran) to the Book of Koheleth, and in Rabb., whence it is derived.

K'ēhhad, xi. 6, Isa. lxv. 25, Chron., Ezra, Nehem., the Chald. kahhada; Syr. okchado; frequent in the Mish., e.g. Bechoroth vii. 4; Kilajim i. 9.

- K'var*, adv., i. 10, ii. 12, 16, iii. 15, iv. 2, vi. 10, ix. 6, 7; common in the Mishna, e.g. Erubin iv. 2, Nedarim v. 5; in Aram., more frequently in the sense of "perhaps" than of "formerly."
- Kasher*, xi. 6, Esth. viii. 5; in the Mishna, the word commonly used of that which is legally admissible; Hiph. verbal noun, hachshēr, only at x. 10; in the Mishna, of arranging according to order; in the superscription of the tract, macshirin, of making susceptible of uncleanness. Cf. e.g. Menachoth 48*b*. The word is generally pointed הַכָּשֵׁר, but more correctly הַכֶּשֶׁר.<sup>1</sup>
- Kishron*, only at ii. 21, iv. 4, v. 10; not found in the Mishna.
- L'vad*, tantummodo, vii. 29; similar, but not quite the same, at Isa. xxvi. 13.
- Lāhāg*, exclusively xii. 12; not Talm.; from the verb lāhāg (R. לה), to long eagerly for; Syr. lahgoz, vapour (of breathing, exhalare); cogn. higgāyon (hēgēh), according to which it is explained in Jer. Sanhedrin x. 1 and elsewhere.
- Lavah*, viii. 15, as in the Mishna: to conduct a guest, to accompany a traveller; whence the proverb: לוֹאֵי לוֹנִיָּה, he who gives a convoy to the dead, to him it will be given, Kethuboth 72*a*; cf. שֵׁם לוֹי, a standing surname, Negaim xiv. 6.
- M'dinah*, v. 7, and in no book besides before the Exile.
- Madda'*, x. 20; elsewhere only in the Chron. and Dan.; Targ. מַדְדָּע.
- M'leah*, gravida, only xi. 5, as in the Mishna, e.g. Jebamoth xvi. 1.
- Mālāk*, v. 5; cf. Mal. ii. 7, in the sense of the later sh'luahh shamaim, delegated of God.<sup>2</sup>
- Miskēn*, only iv. 13, ix. 15, 16; but cf. miskenuth, Deut. viii. 9, and m'sukan, Isa. xl. 20.
- Masm'roth*, xii. 11 = מַסֵּס, Jer. x. 4; cf. Isa. xli. 7; 1 Chron. xxii. 3; 2 Chron. iii. 9.
- M'attim*, v. 1; a plur. only at Ps. cix. 8.
- Mikrēh*, more frequently in the Book of Koheleth than in any other book; and at iii. 19, used as explained in the Comm.
- Merots*, exclusively ix. 11 (elsewhere m'rutsah).
- Māshāk*, ii. 3; cf. Chagiga 14*a*, Sifri 135*b*, ed. Friedmann.
- Mishlahhath*, viii. 8 (cf. Ps. lxxviii. 49).
- Nāgā'*, Hiph. with āl, viii. 14, as at Esth. ix. 26; Aram. מְנַטָּה, e.g. Targ. Jer. to Ex. xxxiii. 13.

- Nahhath*, vi. 5, as in the common phrase nahhath ruahh; cf. נוח לו ונו', "It were better for him," etc., Jer. Berachoth i. 2. This נוח לו, for Koheleth's נוח לו, is frequent.
- Nātā'*, xii. 11 (for which, Isa. xxii. 23, tākā'; Mishna, קבע; Jer. Sanhedrin x. 1), as Dan. xi. 45.
- סבל, Hithpa., only at xii. 5.
- Sof*, iii. 11, vii. 2, xii. 13; Joel ii. 20; 2 Chron. xx. 16, the more modern word which later displaced the word ahharith, vii. 8, x. 13 (cf. Berachoth i. 1), but which is not exactly equivalent to it; for sof dāvār, xii. 13,<sup>1</sup> which has the meaning of summa summarum, ahharith davar, would be inapplicable.
- Sīchāl*, ii. 19, vii. 17, x. 3 (twice), 14; Jer. iv. 22, v. 21; in the Book of Koheleth, the synon. of the yet more frequently used סכיל, the Targ. word.
- Sēchēl*, exclusively x. 6.
- Sichluth*, i. 17 (here with ש), ii. 3, 12, 13, vii. 25, x. 1, 13 (synon. k'siluth, Prov. ix. 13).
- סכן, Niph. x. 9; cf. Berachoth i. 3. The Targ.-Talm. Ithpa. אִתְּפַחֵן, "to be in danger," corresponds with the Niph.
- 'Avād, exclusively ix. 1, like the Syr. 'bad, Jewish-Aram. עֹבֵר.
- 'Adēn (formed of עֲדֵן, adhuc, with לָא, nondum, iv. 3.
- 'Adēnāh (of ād-hēnnāh), adhuc, iv. 2; Mishnic עֲדָן, e.g. Nedarim xi. 10.

- 'Amād, ii. 9, viii. 3, as Jer. xlvi. 11; Ps. cii. 27.
- Ummāth*, vid. under ש.
- 'Anāh, v. 19, x. 19.
- Inyān*, exclusively in the Book of Koheleth, i. 13, ii. 23, 26, iii. 10, iv. 8, v. 2, 13, viii. 16, one of the most extensive words of the post-bibl. Heb.; first, of the object of employment, e.g. Kiddushin 6*a*, "occupied with this object;" also Aram. Bathra 114*b*.
- 'Atsāltāyīm, double impurity, i.e. where the one hand is as impure as the other, only at x. 18.
- 'Asāh, with lēhhēm, x. 19, as at Dan. v. 1: āvād lēhhēm; in the N. T. Mark vi. 21, ποιεῖν δεῖπνον. Otherwise Ezek. iv. 15, where asah lehhem is used of preparing food. With the obj. of the time of life, vi. 12; cf. Acts xv. 33. With tov, not only "to do good," vii. 20, but also "to act well," "to spend a pleasant life," iii. 12.

Pardēs (Song iv. 13; Neh. ii. 8), plur. ii. 5, flower-gardens, parks, as Mez'a 103*a*, פּרדסי.

Pēshēr, explicatio, viii. 1, elsewhere only in the Chald. parts of Dan. Aram. for the older פּתּרין and שְׁכַר, of which the Targ. word is פִּשְׁר and פּוּשְׁרָן, Talm. פּוּשְׁרָה, "adjustment of a controverted matter."

Pithgam in the Chald. parts of Ezra and Daniel, but only as a Hebraised Persian word in viii. 11, Esth. i. 20; common in the Targ. and in the Syr., but not in the Talm.

Kilkāl (Kālāl, Ezek. i. 7; Dan. x. 6), exclusively at x. 10 (on the contrary, at Ezek. xxi. 26, it means "to agitate").

Rēuth, only v. 10; Keri, for which Chethib רֵאִית, which may be read רֵאִית, רֵאִית (cf. Ezek. xxviii. 17), or רֵאִית; the latter two of these forms are common in the Mishna, and have there their special meanings proceeding from the fundamental idea of seeing.

ררף, Niph. part., only iii. 15.

Rēuth, besides the Chald. parts of Ezra, occurs only seven times in the Book of Koheleth, i. 14, ii. 11, 17, 26, iv. 4, 6, vi. 9.

Ra'yon, i. 17, ii. 22, iv. 16; elsewhere only in the Chald. parts of Daniel and in the Targ.

ש, this in and of itself is in no respect modern, but, as the Babyl.-Assyr. sa, the Phoen. ש, shows, is the relative (originally demonstrative) belonging to the oldest period of the language, which in the Mishna has altogether supplanted the אֲשֶׁר of the older Heb. book-language. It is used in the Book of Koheleth quite in the same way as in the Mishna, but thus, that it stands first on the same line (rank) with אֲשֶׁר, and makes it doubtful whether this or that which occurs more frequently in the book (ש, according to Herzfeld, 68 times, and אֲשֶׁר 89 times) has the predominance (cf. e.g. i. 13 f., viii. 14, x. 14, where both are used promiscue). The use of asher as a relative pronoun and relative conjunction is not different from the use of this in the older literature: 'ad asher lo, in the sense of "before," xii. 1, 2, 6, Mishnic עַד שֶׁלֹּא, is only a natural turn to the fundamental meaning "till that not" (2 Sam. xvii. 13; 1 Kings xvii. 17); and mib'li asher lo = nisi quod non, iii. 11 (cf. bilti, Dan. xi. 18), for which the Mishnic שֶׁלֹּא וּבְלִבֵּי שֶׁלֹּא (e.g. Erubin i. 10), is only accidentally not further demonstrable. But how far the use of š has extended, will be seen by the following survey, from which we exclude š, standing alone as a relative pronoun or relative conjunction:—

Beshekevar, ii. 16. B'shel asher, eo quod, viii. 17 (cf. Jonah i. 7, 8, 12), corresponding to the Talm. בְּדִיל. Kol š, ii. 7, 9, and xi. 8. Kol-ummath š, v. 15, corresponding to the Chald. kol-kavel כַּל, Dan. ii. 40, etc. כֶּשׁ, v. 14, xii. 7, and in the sense of quum, ix. 12, x. 3. mah-š, i. 9, iii. 15, vi. 10, vii. 24, viii. 7, x. 14; meh š, iii. 22. כֶּשׁ, v. 4. 'Al-divrath šello, vii. 14 (cf. iii. 18, viii. 2). Shëgam, ii. 15, viii. 14.

Shiddah and plur. Shiddoth, exclusively ii. 8.

Shaharuth, exclusively xi. 10, to be understood after Nedarim iii. 8, "the black-headed," opposed to בעלי השיבוח, "the grey-haired."

šach, Hithpa., only viii. 10, the usual word in the Talm., e.g. Sanhedrin 13b.

Shalat, ii. 19, viii. 9, besides only in Nehemiah and Esther (cf. Bechoroth, vii. 6, etc.); Hiph. v. 18, vi. 2, elsewhere only Ps. cxix. 133.

Shilton, viii. 4, 8, nowhere else in O. T. Heb., but in the Mishna, e.g. Kiddushin iii. 6.

Shallith, with ב, only viii. 8 (cf. Ezek. xvi. 30); on the contrary, vii. 19, x. 5, as Gen. xlii. 6, in the political signification of a ruler.

šam, Hithpo., vii. 16.

Shiphluth, x. 18, elsewhere only Targ. Jer. xlix. 24.

Shithi, only x. 17.

Takath hashshëmësh, i. 3, agreeing with the Greek ὑφ' ἡλίφ, or ὑπὸ τὸν ἥλιον.

Takkiph, in O. T. Heb. only vi. 10; elsewhere in the Chald., Targ., Talm.

Takan, i. 15; Pih. vii. 13, xii. 9, a Mishna-word used in the Pih. and Hiph., whence tikkun ("putting right," e.g. in the text-hist. terminus technicus, tikkun sopherim, and "arrangement," e.g. Gittin iv. 2, "the ordering of the world") and tikkānāh (e.g. Gittin iv. 6, "welfare," frequently in the sense of "direction," "arrangement").

This survey of the forms peculiar to the Book of Koheleth, and only found in the most recent books of the O. T., partly only in the Chaldee portions of these, and in general use in the Aramaic, places it beyond all doubt that in this book we have a product of the post-exilian period, and, at the earliest, of the time of Ezra-Nehemiah. All that Wagenmann (Comm. 1856), von Essen (Der Predeger Salomo's, 1856), Böhl (De Aramaismis libri Coheleth, 1860), Hahn (Comm. 1860), Reusch (Tübinger Quartalschr. 1860), Warminski (Verfasser u. Abfassungszeit des B. Koheleth, 1867), Prof. Taylor Lewis (in the American ed. of Lange's Bibelwerk, 1869), Schäfer (Neue Untersuchungen ü d. B. Koheleth, 1870), Vegni (L'Ecclesiaste secondo il testo Ebraico, Florenz 1871) have advanced to the contrary, rests on grounds that are altogether untenable. If we possessed the original work of Sirach, we should then see more distinctly than from fragments<sup>1</sup> that the form of the language found in Koheleth, although older, is yet one that does not lie much further back; it is connected, yet loosely, with the old language, but at the same time it is in full accord with that new Heb. which we meet with in the Mishna and the Barajtha-Literature, which groups itself around it. To the modern aspects of the Heb. language the following forms belong:—

1. Verbs Lamed-Aleph, which from the first interchange their forms with those of verbs Lamed-He, are regularly treated in certain forms of inflexion in the Mishna as verbs Lamed-He; e.g. יִצְחָק is not used, but יִצְחָה.<sup>2</sup> This interchange of forms found in the later language reveals itself here in יִצְחָה, x. 5, used instead of יִצְחָה; and if, according to the Masora, הוֹטֵא (הוֹטֵא) is to be always written like הוֹטֵא at vii. 26 (except vii. 26*b*), the traditional text herein discloses a full and accurate knowledge of the linguistic character of the book. The Aram. יִשְנָא for יִשְנָה, at viii. 1, is not thus to be accounted for.

2. The richness of the old language in mood-forms is here disappearing. The optative of the first person (the cohortative) is only represented by אֶחְכֹּמֶה, vii. 23. The form of the subjunctive (jussive) is found in the prohibitive clauses, such as vii. 16, 17, 18, x. 4; but elsewhere the only certain examples found are שְׂיִלֶה, quod auferat secum, v. 14, and יִיָּיֵד, x. 10. In xii. 7, וְיִשָּׁב may also be read, although וְיִשָּׁב, under the influence of “ere ever” (xii. 6), is also admissible. On the contrary, יִהְיֶה, xi. 3, is indic. after the Mishn. יִהְיֶה, and so also is יִיָּיֵד (derived from יִיָּיֵד, not יִיָּיֵד), xii. 5. Yet more characteristic, however, is the circumstance that the historic tense, the so-called fut. consecutivum, which has wholly disappeared from the Mishna-language, also here, notwithstanding the occasions for its frequent use, occurs only three times, twice in the unabbreviated form, iv. 1, 7, and once in the form lengthened by the intentional ah, i. 17, which before its disappearance was in frequent use. It probably belonged more to the written than to the spoken language of the people (cf. the Song vi. 9b).

3. The complexion of the language peculiar to the Book of Koheleth is distinguished also by this, that the designation of the person already contained in the verbal form is yet particularly expressed, and without there being a contrast occasioning this emphasis, by the personal pronoun being added to and placed after it, e.g. i. 16, ii. 1, 11, 12, 13, 15, 18, 20, iii. 17, 18, iv. 1, 4, 7, v. 17, vii. 25, viii. 15, ix. 15. Among the more ancient authors, Hosea has the same peculiarity (cf. the Song v. 5); but there the personal pronoun stands always before the verb, e.g. viii. 13, xii. 11. The same thing is found in Ps. xxxix. 11, lxxxii. 6, etc. The inverse order of the words is found only at ii. 14, after the scheme of Job i. 15, as also ii. 15 follows the scheme of Gen. xxiv. 27. Mishna-forms of expressions such as מְדַרְרֵי, Nedarim i. 1, מְקַבְּלֵי, Jebamoth xvi. 7, are not homogeneous with that manner of subordinating the personal pronoun (cf. vii. 26, iv. 2). Thus we have here before us a separation of the subject and the predicate, instead of which, in the language of the Mishna, the form הִיְיָ אִמֵּר (אני) and the like (e.g. Berachoth i. 5) is used, which found for itself a place in the language of Koheleth, in so far as this book delights in the use of the participle to an extent scarcely met with in any other book of Scripture (vid. e.g. i. 6, viii. 12, x. 19).

4. The use of the demonstrative pronoun זֶה bears also a Mishnic stamp. We lay no particular stress on the fact that the author uses it, as regularly as the Mishna, always without the article; but it is characteristic that he always, where he does not make use of the masculine form in a neuter sense (as vii. 10, 18, 29, viii. 9, ix. 1, xi. 6, keeping out of view cases determined by attraction), employs no other feminine form than זֶה, Mishnic זֶה, in this sense, ii. 2, v. 15, 18, vii. 23, ix. 13. In other respects also the use of the pronouns approaches the Mishna language. In the use of the pronoun also in i. 10 and v. 18 there is an approach to the Mishnic זֶה, hic est, and זֵה, haec est. And the use of הִנֵּה and הִנְּהוּ for the personal verb reaches in iii. 18, ix. 4 (vid. Comm.), the extreme.

The enumeration of linguistic peculiarities betokening a late origin is not yet exhausted; we shall meet with many such in the course of the Exposition. Not only the language, however, but also the style and the artistic form of the book, show that it is the most recent product of the Bibl. Chokma literature, and belongs to a degenerated period of art. From the fact that the so-called metrical accent system of the three books—Psalms, Job, and Proverbs—is not used in Ecclesiastes, it does not follow that it is not a poetical book in the fullest sense of the word; for the Song and Lamentations, these masterpieces of the שיר and קינה, the Minnesong and the Elegy, are also excluded from that more elevated, more richly expressive, and more melodious form of discourse, perhaps to preserve the spiritual character of the one, and not to weaken the elegiac character of the other, to which a certain melancholy monotone andante is suitable. So also, to apply that system of accentuation to the Book of Koheleth was not at all possible, for the symmetrical stichs to which it is appropriate is for the most part wanting in Koheleth, which is almost wholly written in eloquent prose: unfolding its instruction in the form of sentences without symmetrical stichs.—It is, so to speak, a philosophical treatise in which “I saw,” and the like, as the expression of the result of experience; “I said,” as the expression of reflection on what was observed; “I perceived,” as the expression of knowledge obtained as a conclusion from a process of reasoning; and “this also,” as the expression of the result,—repeat themselves nearly terminologically. The reasoning tone prevails, and where the writer passes into gnomic poetry he enters into it suddenly, e.g. v. 9b, or holds himself ready to leave it quickly again, e.g. v. 12, vii. 13 f. Always, indeed, where the Mashal note is struck, the discourse begins to form itself into members arranged in order; and then the author sometimes rises in language, and in the order of his words, into the true classic form of the proverb set forth in parallel members, e.g. vii. 7, 9, ix. 8. The symmetry of the members is faultless, v. 5, viii. 8, ix. 11; but in other places, as v. 1, vii. 26, xi. 9, it fails, and in the long run the book, altogether peculiar in its stylistic and artistic character, cannot conceal its late origin: in the elevated classical style there quickly again intermingles that which is peculiar to the author, as representing the age in which he lived, e.g. vii. 19, x. 2 f., 6, 8–10, 16 f., xi. 3, 6. That in the age of the Mishna they knew how to imitate classic masterpieces, is seen from the beautiful enigma, in the form of a heptastich, by Bar-Kappara, jer. Moëd katan iii. 1, and the elegy, in the form of a hexastich on the death of R. Abina, by Bar-Kippuk, b. Moëd katan

25b.<sup>1</sup> One would thus be in error if he regarded such occasional classical pieces in the Book of Koheleth as borrowed. The book, however fragmentary it may seem to be on a superficial examination, is yet the product of one author.<sup>2</sup> In its oratorical ground-form, and in the proverbs introduced into it, it is a side-piece to Prov. i.-ix. We have shown, in the introduction to the Book of Proverbs, that in these proverbial discourses which form the introduction to the older Solomonic Book of Proverbs, which was probably published in the time of Jehoshaphat, the Mashal appears already rhetorically decomposed. This decomposition is much further advanced in the Book of Ecclesiastes. To it is applicable in a higher degree what is there (Proverbs, vol. I. 12 f.) said of Prov. i.-ix. The distich is represented in the integral, vii. 13, synonymous, xi. 4, and synthetic, vii. 1, and also, though rarely, in the antithetic form, vii. 4; but of the emblematic form there is only one example, x. 1. The author never attempted the beautiful numerical and priamel forms; the proverbial form also, beyond the limits of the distich, loses the firmness of its outline. The tetrastich, x. 20, is, however, a beautiful exception to this. But splendour of form would not be appropriate to such a sombre work as this is. Its external form is truly in keeping with its spirit. In the checkered and yet uniform manner of the book is reflected the image of the author, who tried everything and yet was satisfied with nothing; who hastened from one thing to another because nothing was able to captivate him. His style is like the view he takes of the world, which in its course turned to him only its dark side. He holds fast to the fear of God, and hopes in a final judgment; but his sceptical world-sorrow remains unmitigated, and his forced eudaemonism remains without the right consecration: these two stars do not turn the night into day; the significance of the book, with reference to the history of redemption, consists in the actual proof that humanity, in order to its being set free from its unhappiness, needs to be illuminated by the sun of a new revelation. But although the manner of the author's representation is the reflection of his own inner relation to the things represented, yet here and there he makes his representation, not without consciousness and art, the picture of his own manner of thought. Thus, e.g., the drawing tautologies in viii. 14, ix. 9, certainly do not escape from him against his will. And as was rightly remarked under Gen. ii. 1-3, that the discourse there is extended, and forms itself into a picture of rest after the work of the creation, so Koheleth, in i. 4-11 and xii. 2-7, shows himself a master of eloquence; for in the former passage he imitates in his style the everlasting unity of the course of the world, and in the latter he paints the exhausted and finally shattered life of man.

Not only, however, by the character of its thought and language and manner of representation, but also by other characteristic features, the book openly acknowledges that it was not written by Solomon himself, but by a Jewish thinker of a much later age, who sought to conceive of himself as in Solomon's position, and clothed his own life-experiences in the confessions of Solomon. The very title of the book does not leave us in doubt as to this. It is in these words: The words of Koheleth, the son of David, king in Jerusalem. The apposition, "king in Jerusalem," appertains, like e.g. 2 Chron. xxxv. 3, to the name of the speaker who is introduced; for nothing is here said as to the place in life held by David, but to that held by him who is thus figuratively named. The indeterminate "king" of itself would be untenable, as at Prov. xxxi. 1. As there the words "king of Massa" are to be taken together, so here "king" is determined by "in Jerusalem" added to it, so far that it is said what kind of king Koheleth was. That by this name Solomon is meant, follows, apart from i. 12 ff., from this, that David had only one son who was king, viz. Solomon. The opinion of Krochmal, that a later David, perhaps a governor of Jerusalem during the Persian domination, is meant,<sup>1</sup> is one of the many superfluities of this learned author. Koheleth is Solomon, but he who calls him "king in Jerusalem" is not Solomon himself. Solomon is called "king of Israel," e.g. 2 Kings xxiii. 13; and as in i. 12 he names himself "king over Israel," so, Neh. xiii. 26, he is called "king of Israel," and along with this designation, "king over all Israel;" but the title, "king in Jerusalem," nowhere else occurs. We read that Solomon "reigned in Jerusalem over all Israel," 1 Kings xi. 42, cf. xiv. 21; the title, "king in Jerusalem," is quite peculiar to the title of the book before us. Eichhorn supposes that it corresponds to the time subsequent to the division of the kingdom, when there were two different royal residences; but against this view Bloch rightly remarks, that the contrasted "in Samaria" occurs only very rarely (as 2 Kings xiv. 23). We think that in this expression, "king in Jerusalem," there is revealed a time in which Israel had ceased to be an independent kingdom, in which Jerusalem was no more a royal city.

That the book was not composed immediately by Solomon, is indicated by the circumstance that he is not called Solomon, nor Jedidiah (2 Sam. xii. 25), but is designated by a hitherto unheard of name, which, by its form, shows that it belongs, at earliest, to the Ezra-Nehemiah age, in which it was coined. We consider the name, first, without taking into account its feminine termination. In the Arab., kahal (cogn. kahal) signifies to be dry, hard, from the dryness and leather-like toughness of the skin of an old man; and, accordingly, Dindorf (Quomodo nomen Coheleth Salomoni tribuatur, 1791) and others understand Koheleth of an old man whose life is worn out; Coccejus and Schultens, with those of their school, understand it of the penitent who is dead to the world. But both views are opposed by this, that the form קהל (קהל, cf. קהל) would be more appropriate; but above all by this, that קהל, in this meaning, aridum, marcidum esse, is a verbal stem altogether foreign to the northern Semitic. The verb קהל signifies, in the Heb., Aram., and Assy., to call (cf. the Syr. kahlonitho, a quarrelsome woman), and particularly to call together; whence קהל, of the same Sanscrit-Semit. root as the words ἐκκλησία and con-cil-ium,<sup>1</sup>—an extension of the root קל, which, on another side, is extended in the Arab. kalah, Aethiop. kal'ha, to cry. This derivation of the name Koheleth shows that it cannot mean συναθροιστής (Grotius, not Aquila), in the sense of collector sententiarum; the Arab. translation alajam'at (also van Dyk) is faultless, because jam' can signify, to collect men as well as things together; but קהל is not used in that sense of in unum redigere. In close correspondence with the Heb. word, the LXX. translates, ὁ ἐκκλησιαστής; and the Graec. Venet., ἡ ἐκκλησιάζουσα (xii. 9: ἡ ἐκκλησιάζουσα). But in the nearest signification, "the collector," this would not be a significant name for the king represented as speaking in this book. In Solomon's reign there occurred an epoch-making assembly in Jerusalem, 1 Kings viii. 1, 2 Chron. v. 2—viz. for the purpose of consecrating the temple. The O. T. does not afford any other historical reference for the name; for although, in Prov. v. 14, xxvi. 26, קהל signifies coram populo, publice, yet it does not occur directly of the public appearance of Wisdom; the expressions for this are different, i. 20 f.,

viii. 1-4, ix. 3, though cognate. But on that great day of the consecration of the temple, Solomon not only called the people together, but he also preached to them,—he preached indirectly, for he consecrated the temple by prayer; and directly, for he blessed the people, and exhorted them to faithfulness, 1 Kings viii. 55-61. Thus Solomon appears not only as the assembler, but also as the preacher to those who were assembled; and in this sense of a teacher of the people (cf. xii. 9), Koheleth is an appropriate name of the king who was famed for his wisdom and for his cultivation of the popular Mashal. It is known that in proper names the Kal is frequently used in the sense of the Hiph. Thus Koheleth is not immediately what it may be etymologically = קָהֵל, caller, proclaimer; but is = מְקַהֵל, from קָהַל, to assemble, and to speak to the assembly, contionari; according to which Jerome, under i. 1, rightly explains: ἐκκλησιαστής, Graeco sermone appellatur qui coetum, id est ecclesiam congregat, quem nos nuncupare possumus contionatorem, eo quod loquatur ad populum et ejus sermo non specialiter ad unum, sed ad universos generaliter dirigatur. The interpretation: assembly = academy or collectivum, which Döderlein (Salomon's Prediger u. Hoheslied, 1784) and Kaiser (Koheleth, Das Collectivum der Davidischen Könige in Jerusalem, 1823) published, lightly disregards the form of the n. agentis; and Spohn's (Der Prediger Salomo, 1785) "O vanity of vanities, said the philosopher," itself belongs to the vanities.

Knobel in his Comm. (1836) has spoken excellently regarding the feminine form of the name; but when, at the close, he says: "Thus Koheleth properly signifies preaching, the office and business of the public speaker, but is then = קָהֵל, מְקַהֵל, public speaker before an assembly," he also, in an arbitrary manner, interchanges the n. agentis with the n. actionis. His remark, that "the rule that concreta, if they have a fem. termination, become abstracta, must also hold for participia," is a statement that cannot be confirmed. As חֲתָמָה signifies that which impresses (a seal), and פְּתִירָה that which twines about (chapter), so also חֲבֵרָה, Ex. xxvi. 10, that which joins together (the coupling); one can translate such fem. particip., when used as substantives, as abstracta, e.g. פְּלִאָה (from פָּלָה), destruction, utter ruin; but they are abstracta in themselves as little as the neutra in τὸ ταυτόν, which may be translated by "identity," or in immensum altitudinis, by immensity (in height). Also Arab. names of men with fem. forms are concreta. To the participial form Koheleth correspond, for the most part, such names as (Arab.) rawiyaton, narrator of tradition (fem. of rawyn); but essentially cogn.

also are such words as 'allamat, greatly learned man; also khalyfaton, which is by no means an inf. noun, like the Heb. הַיָּלְפָן, but is the fem. of the verbal adj. khalyf, successor, representative. The Arabic grammarians say that the fem. termination gives to the idea, if possible, a collective signification, e.g. jarrar, the puller, i.e. the drawer of a ship (helciaricus), and jarrarat, the multitude drawing, the company (taife) drawing the boat up the stream; or it also serves "as an exhaustive designation of the properties of the genus;" so that, e.g., 'allamat means one who unites in himself that which is peculiar to the very learned, and represents in his own person a plurality of very learned men. They also say that the fem. termination serves in such cases to strengthen the idea. But how can this strengthening result from a change in the gender? Without doubt the fem. in such cases discharges the function of a neut.; and since doctissimus is heightened to doctissimum, it is thereby implied that such an one is a pattern of a learned man,—the reality of the idea, or the realized ideal of such an one.

From these Arab. analogues respecting the import of the name Koheleth, it follows that the fem. is not to be referred to Chokma in such a way as that Solomon might be thereby designated as the representative, and, as it were, the incarnation of wisdom (Ewald, Hitzig, etc.),—an idea which the book by no means supports; for if the author had designed, in conformity with that signification of the name, to let Wisdom herself speak through Solomon's mouth, he would have let him speak as the author of Prov. i.-ix. speaks when he addresses the reader by the title, "my son," he would not have put expressions in his mouth such as i. 16-18, vii. 23 f. One should not appeal to vii. 27; for there, where the subject is the dangers of the love of women, Koheleth, in the sense of Wisdom preaching, is as little appropriate as elsewhere; just here was the masculine gender of the speaker to be accented, and Amrah Koheleth is thus an incorrect reading for Amar Hakkoheleth (xii. 8). The name Koheleth, without Chokma being supplied, is a man's name, of such recent formation as Sophereth, Neh. vii. 5, for which Ezra ii. 55, Hassophereth; cf. also Ezra ii. 57, הַיָּסֹפֶרֶת. The Mishna goes yet further in the coining of such names for men generis fem. As it generally prefers to use the part. passivi in an active sense, e.g. דָּבַר, thinking; רָכַב, riding; שָׁתָּה, having drunk; so also it forms fem. plurals with a masculine signification,—as Hadruchoth, press-treaders, Terumoth iii. 4; Hamm'shuhkoth, surveyors, Erubin iv. 11; Hall'uzoth, speakers in a foreign tongue, Megilla ii. 1,—and construes these with mas. predicates.<sup>1</sup> In these there can be nowhere anything said of a heightening of the idea effected by the transition to fem. forms. But the persons acting, although they are men, are thought of as neut.; and they appear, separated from the determination of their gender, as the representatives of the activity spoken of. According to this, Koheleth is, without regard to the gender, a preaching person. The Book of Koheleth thus bears, in its second word, as on its very forehead, the stamp of the Ezra-Nehemiah era to which it belongs.

As the woman of Endor, when she raised Samuel out of Hades at the request of Saul, sees "gods ascending out of the earth" (1 Sam. xxviii. 13), so it is not the veritable Solomon who speaks in this book, but his spirit, for which this neut. name Koheleth is appropriate. When he says, i. 12, "I, Koheleth, have been king over Israel in Jerusalem," he recognises himself not as the reigning monarch, but as having been king. The Talmudic Aggada has joined to this הייתי, the fable that Solomon was compelled to descend from the throne on account of his transgression of the law, which was then occupied by an angel in his stead, but externally bearing his likeness; and that he now went about begging, saying: "I, Koheleth, have been king over Israel in Jerusalem;" but that they struck him with a stick, and set before him a plate of groats; for they said to him: "How canst thou speak thus? There the king sits in his palace on his throne."<sup>2</sup> In this fiction there is at least grammatical intelligence. For it is a vain delusion for one to persuade himself that Solomon in his advanced age could say, with reference to the period of his life as ruler, "I have been king," fui rex—he was certainly always so during the forty years of his reign, and on to the last moment of his life. Or can the words מלך הייתי mean sum rex? The case is as follows: הייתי is never the expression of the abstract present, or of existence without regard to time; "I am a king" is expressed in this sense by the substantival clause ani mēlēk. In every case where one can translate הייתי by "I am," e.g. Ps. lxxxviii. 5, the present being is thought of as the result of an historical past (sum = factus sum). But at the most, הייתי, when it looks from the present back upon the past, out of which it arose, signifies "I have become," Gen. xxxii. 11; Ps. xxx. 8; Jer. xx. 7; or when it looks back into the past as such, "I have been," Josh. i. 5; Judg. xii. 2; Ps. xxxvii. 25. Whether this word, in the former sense, corresponds to the Greek perfect, and in the latter to the Greek aorist, is determined only by the situation and connection. Thus in Ex. ii. 22 it signifies, "I have become a stranger" (ἑγένονα = εἶμι); while, on the other hand, in Deut. xxiii. 8, "thou hast been a stranger" (ἑγένου, fuisti). That where the future is spoken of, הייתי can, by virtue of the consecutio temporum, also acquire the meaning of "I shall become, I shall be," e.g. 1 Kings i. 21, cf. 1 Chron. xix. 12, is of no importance to us here. In the more modern language the more delicate syntax, as well as that idea of "becoming," primarily inherent in the verb היה, is disappearing, and הייתי signifies either the past purely, "I have been," Neh. xiii. 6, or, though not so frequently, the past along with the present, "I was," e.g. Neh. i. 11. Accordingly, Solomon while still living would be able to say הייתי מלך only in the sense of "I have become (and still am) king;" but that does not accord with the following retrospective perfects.<sup>1</sup> This also does not harmonize with the more modern linguistic usage which is followed by Koheleth, e.g. i. 9, מהי'ש', id quod fuit; i. 10, בכר היה, pridem fuit. In conformity with this, the LXX. translates הייתי by ἑγενόμην, and the Graec. Venet. by ἕστηκα. But "I have been king," Solomon, yet living, cannot say, only Salomo redivivus here introduced, as the preacher can use such an expression.

The epilogue, xii. 9 ff., also furnishes an argument in favour of the late composition of this book, on the supposition that it is an appendix, not by another hand, but by the author himself. But that it is from the author's own hand, and does not, as Grätz supposes, belong to the period in which the school of Hillel had established the canonicity of the book, follows from this, that it is composed in a style of Hebrew approaching that used in the Mishna, yet of an earlier date than the Mishna; for in the Talmuds it is, clause by clause, a subject of uncertain interpretation,—the language used is plainly, for the Talmudic authorities, one that is antiquated, the expressions of which, because not immediately and unambiguously clear, need, in order to their explanation, to be translated into the language then in use. The author of the book makes it thus manifest that here in the epilogue, as in the book itself, Solomon is intentionally called Koheleth; and that the manner of expression, as well as of the formation of the sentences in this epilogue, can in all particulars be supported from the book itself. In "fear God," xii. 13*a*, the saying in v. 6, which is similarly formed, is repeated; and "this is the whole of man," xii. 13*b*, a thought written as it were more in cipher than in extenso, is in the same style as vi. 10*a*. The word יתר ("moreover"), frequently used by the author, and בעל, used in the formation of attributive names, x. 11, 20, v. 10, 12, viii. 8, we meet with also here. And as at xii. 9, 10, 11 a third idea connected ἀσυνδέτως follows two ideas connected by vav, so also at i. 7, vi. 5. But if this epilogue is the product of the author's own hand, then, in meaning and aim, it presents itself as its sequel. The author says that the Koheleth who appears in this book as "wise" is the same who composed the beautiful people's-book Mishle; that he sought out not only words of a pleasing form, but also all words of truth; that the words of the wise are like goads and nails which stand in collected rows and numbers—they are given from one Shepherd. The author of the book thereby denotes that the sentences therein collected, even though they are not wholly, as they lie before us, the words of Solomon, yet that, with the Proverbs of Solomon, and of the wise men generally, they go back to one giver and original author. The epilogue thus, by its historic reference to Solomon, recognises the fiction, and gives the reader to understand that the book loses nothing in its value from its not having been immediately composed by Solomon.

Of untruthfulness, of a so-called pia fraus, we cannot therefore speak. From early times, within the sphere of the most ancient Israelitish authorship, it was regarded as a justifiable undertaking for an author to reproduce in a rhetorical or poetical form the thoughts and feelings of memorable personages on special occasions. The Psalter contains not a few psalms bearing the superscription le-David, which were composed not by David himself, but by unknown poets, placing themselves, as it were, in David's position, and representing him, such e.g. as cxliv., which in the LXX. excellently bears the superscription πρὸς τὸν Γολιάδ. The chronicler, when he seeks to give the reader an idea of the music at the festival of the consecration of the tabernacle and then of the completed temple, allows himself so great freedom, that he puts into the mouth of David the Beracha of the fourth book of the Psalms (cvi. 48), along with the preceding verse of Ps. cvi. (1 Chron. xvi. 35 f.), and into Solomon's mouth verses of Ps. cxxxii. (2 Chron. vi. 41 f.). And the prophetic discourses communicated in the O. T. historical books are certainly partly of this sort, that they either may be regarded as original, as e.g. 1 Sam. ii. 27 ff., or must be so regarded, as 2 Kings xviii.—xx.;

but not merely where the utterances of the prophets are in general terms reproduced, as at Judg. vi. 8-10, 2 Kings xvii. 13, xxi. 10-15, but also elsewhere in most of the prophetic discourses which we read in the Books of Kings and Chronicles, the style of the historian makes itself perceptible. Consequently (as also Caspari in his work on the Syro-Ephraimite War, 1849, finds) the discourses in the Chronicles, apart from those which are common to them, bear an altogether different homogeneous character from those of the Book of Kings. It is the same as with the speeches, for instance, which are recorded in Thucydides, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Livy, and other Greek and Roman historians. Classen may be right in the opinion, that the speeches in Thucydides are not mere inventions, but that, nevertheless, as they lie before us, they are the work of the historian; even the letters that passed between Pausanias and Xerxes bear his stamp, although he composed them on the ground of the verbal reports of the Spartans. It is thus also with the speeches found in Tacitus. They are more Ciceronian than his own style is, and the discourses of Germans have less elaborated periods than those of the Romans; but so greatly was the writing of history by the ancients influenced by this custom of free reproduction, that even a speech of the Emperor Claudius, which is found engraven on brass, is given by Tacitus not in this its original, but in another and freer form, assimilated to his own manner of representation. So also sacred history, which in this respect follows the general ancient custom, depends not on the identity of the words, but of the spirit: it does not feign what it represents the historical person as saying, it follows traditions; but yet it is the power of its own subjectivity which thus recalls the past in all that was essential to it in actual life. The aim is not artistically to represent the imitation which is made as if it were genuine. The arts by which it is sought to impart to that which is introduced into a more recent period the appearance of genuineness, were unknown to antiquity. No pseudonymous work of antiquity shows any such imitation of an ancient style as, e.g., does Meinhold's Bernsteinheze, or such a forgery as Wagenfeld's Sanchuniathon. The historians reproduce always in their own individual way, without impressing on the speeches of different persons any distinct individual character. They abstain from every art aimed at the concealment of the actual facts of the case. It is thus also with the author of the Book of Koheleth. As the author of the "Wisdom of Solomon" openly gives himself out to be an Alexandrian, who makes Solomon his organ, so the author of the Book of Koheleth is so little concerned purposely to veil the fiction of the Solomon-discourse, in which he clothes his own peculiar life-experiences, that he rather in diverse ways discovers himself as one and the same person with the Salomo redivivus here presenting himself.

We do not reckon along with these such proverbs as have for their object the mutual relationship between the king and his subjects, viii. 3-5, x. 4, 16 f., 20, cf. v. 8; these do not betray in the speaker one who is an observer of rulers and not a ruler himself; for the two collections of "Proverbs of Solomon" in the Book of Proverbs contain a multitude of proverbs of the king, xvi. 10, 12-15, xix. 12, xx. 2, 8, 26, 28, xxv. 2, 3, 4 f., 6 f., which, although objectively speaking of the king, may quite well be looked on as old Solomonic,—for is there not a whole princely literature regarding princely government, as e.g. Friedrich II.'s Anti-Machiavel? But in the complaints against unrighteous judgment, iii. 16, iv. 1, v. 7, one is to be seen who suffers under it, or who is compelled to witness it without the power to change it; they are not appropriate in the mouth of the ruler, who should prevent injustice. It is the author himself who here puts his complaints into the mouth of Solomon; it is he who has to record life-experiences such as x. 5-7. The time in which he lived was one of public misgovernment and of dynastic oppression, in contrast with which the past shone out in a light so much the rosier, vii. 10, and it threw long dark shadows across his mind when he looked out into the world, and immediately also upon the confessions of his Koheleth. This Koheleth is not the historical Solomon, but an abstraction of the historical; he is not the theocratic king, but the king among the wise men; the actual Solomon could not speak, ii. 18, of the heir to his throne as of "the man that shall be after him,"—and he who was led astray by his wives into idolatry, and thus became an apostate (1 Kings xi. 4), must have sounded an altogether different note of penitential contrition from that which we read at vii. 26-28. This Solomon who tasted all, and in the midst of his enjoyment maintained the position of a wise man (ii. 9), is described by the author of this book from history and from sayings, just as he needs him, so as to make him an organ of himself; and so little does he think of making the fiction an illusion difficult to be seen through, that he represents Koheleth, i. 16, ii. 7, 9, as speaking as if he had behind him a long line of kings over the whole of Israel and Judah, while yet not he, but the author of the book, who conceals himself behind Salomo redivivus, could look back on such a series of kings in Jerusalem.

When did this anonymous author, who speaks instead of his Solomon, live and write? Let us first of all see what conclusion may be gathered regarding the book from the literary references it contains. In its thoughts, and in the form of its thoughts, it is an extremely original work. It even borrows nothing from the Solomonic Book of Proverbs, which in itself contains so many repetitions; proverbs such as vii. 16–18 and Prov. iii. 7 are somewhat like, but only accidentally. On the contrary, between v. 14 and Job i. 21, as well as between vii. 14 and Job ii. 10, there undoubtedly exists some kind of connection; here there lie before us thoughts which the author of the Book of Koheleth may have read in the Book of Job, and have quoted them from thence—also the mention of an untimely birth, vi. 3, cf. Job iii. 16, and the expression “one among a thousand,” vii. 28, cf. Job ix. 3, xxxiii. 23, may perhaps be reminiscences from the Book of Job occurring unconsciously to the author. This is not of any consequence as to the determination of the time of the composition of the Book of Koheleth, for the Book of Job is in any case much older. Dependence on the Book of Jeremiah would be of greater importance, but references such as vii. 2, cf. Jer. xvi. 8, ix. 11, cf. Jer. ix. 22, are doubtful, and guide to no definite conclusion. And who might venture, with Hitzig, to derive the golden lamp, xii. 10, from the vision of Zechariah, iv. 2, especially since the figure in the one place has an altogether different signification from what it has in the other? But we gain a more certain terminus a quo by comparing v. 5 with Mal. ii. 7. Malachi there designates the priests as messengers (delegated) of Jahve of hosts, along with which also there is the designation of the prophets as God’s messengers, iii. 1, Hag. i. 13. With the author of the Book of Koheleth “the messenger” is already, without any name of God being added, a priestly title not to be misunderstood; מלאך<sup>1</sup> (messenger) denotes the priest as vicarius Dei, the delegate of God, שלם דררמנא, according to the later title (Kiddushin 23b). And a terminus ad quem, beyond which the reckoning of the time of its composition cannot extend, is furnished by the “Wisdom of Solomon,” which is not a translation, but a work written originally in Alexandrine Greek; for that this book is older than the Book of Koheleth, as Hitzig maintains, is not only in itself improbable, since the latter shows not a trace of Greek influence, but in the light of the history of doctrine is altogether impossible, since it represents, in the history of the development of the doctrine of wisdom and the last things, the stage immediately preceding the last B.C., as Philo does the last; it is not earlier than the beginning of the persecution of the Jews by the Egyptians under Ptolemy VII., Physkon (Joseph. c. Ap. ii. 5), and at all events was written before Philo, since the combination of the Sophia and the Logos is here as yet incomplete. This Book of Wisdom must stand in some kind of historical relation to the Book of Koheleth. The fact that both authors make King Solomon the organ of their own peculiar view of the world, shows a connection that is not accidental. Accident is altogether excluded by the circumstance that the Alexandrian author stands in the same relation to the Palestinian that James stands in to the Pauline letters. As James directs himself not so much against Paul as against a Paulinism misleading to fatal consequences, so the Book of Wisdom is certainly not directly a work in opposition to the Book of Koheleth, as is assumed by J. E. Ch. Schmidt (Salomo's Prediger, 1794), Kelle (Die salom. Schriften, 1815), and others; but, as Knobel and Grimm assert, against a one-sided extreme interpretation of views and principles as set forth by Koheleth, not without an acquaintance with this book. The lovers of pleasure, who speak in Wisd. ii. 1-9, could support that saying by expressions from the Book of Koheleth, and the concluding words there sound like an appropriation of the words of Koheleth iii. 22, v. 17 (cf. LXX.); it is true they break off the point of the Book of Koheleth, for the exhortation to the fear of God, the Judge of the world, is not echoed; but to break off this point did not lie remote, since the old Chokma watchword, "fear God," hovered over the contents of the book rather than penetrated them. It is as if the author of the Book of Wisdom, i.-v., wished to show to what danger of abuse in the sense of a pure materialistic eudaemonism the wisdom presented in the Book of Koheleth is exposed. But he also opposes the pessimistic thoughts of Koheleth in the decided assertions of the contrary: (1) Koheleth says: "There is one event to the righteous and to the wicked," ix. 2; but he says: there is a difference between them wide as the heavens, Wisd. iii. 2 f., iv. 7, v. 15 f.; (2) Koheleth says: "He that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow," i. 18; but he says: wisdom bringeth not sorrow, but pure joy with it, Wisd. viii. 16; (3) Koheleth says that wisdom bringeth neither respect nor favour, ix. 11; but he says: it brings fame and honour, Wisd. viii. 10; (4) Koheleth says: "There is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool for ever," ii. 16; but he says of wisdom in contrast to folly: "I shall obtain by it a deathless name, and shall leave to my descendants an everlasting remembrance," Wisd. viii. 13.

The main distinction between the two books lies in this, that the comfortless view of Hades running through the Book of Koheleth is thoroughly surmounted by a wonderful rising above the O. T. standpoint by the author of the Book of Wisdom, and that hence there is in it an incomparably more satisfying Theodicee (cf. Wisd. xii. 2-18 with Eccles. vii. 15, viii. 14), and a more spiritual relation to this present time (cf. Wisd. viii. 21, ix. 17, with Eccles. ii. 24, iii. 13, etc.). The "Wisdom of Solomon" has indeed the appearance of an anti-Ecclesiastes, a side-piece to the Book of Koheleth, which aims partly at confuting it, partly at going beyond it; for it represents, in opposition to Koheleth not rising above earthly enjoyment with the But of the fear of God, a more ideal, more spiritual Solomon. If Koheleth says that God "hath made everything beautiful in his time," iii. 11, and hath made man upright, vii. 29; so, on the other hand, Solomon says that He hath made all things εἰς τὸ εἶναι, Wisd. i. 14, and hath made man ἐπ' ἀφθαρσίᾳ, ii. 23. There are many such parallels, e.g. v. 9, cf. Koh. viii. 13; viii. 5, cf. Koh. vii. 12; ix. 13-16, cf. Koh. iii. 10 f., but particularly Solomon's confession, vii. 1-21, with that of Koheleth, i. 12-18. Here, wisdom appears as a human acquisition; there (which agrees with 1 Kings iii. 11-13), as a gracious gift obtained in answer to prayer, which brings with it all that can make happy. If one keeps in his eye this mutual relation between the two books, there can be no doubt as to which is the older and which the younger. In the Book of Koheleth the Old Covenant digs for itself its own grave. It is also a "school-master to Christ," in so far as it awakens a longing after a better Covenant than the first.<sup>1</sup> But the Book of Wisdom is a precursor of this better covenant. The composition of the Book of Koheleth falls between the time of Malachi, who lived in the time of Nehemiah's second arrival at Jerusalem, probably under Darius Nothus (423-405 B.C.), and the Book of Wisdom, which at the earliest was written under Ptolemy Physkon (145-117), when the O. T. was already for the most part translated into the Greek language.<sup>2</sup>

Hitzig does not venture to place the Book of Koheleth so far back into the period of the Ptolemies; he reaches with his chain of evidence only the year 204, that in which Ptolemy Epiphanes (204-181) gained, under the guardianship of the Romans, the throne of his father,—he must be the minor whom the author has in his eye, x. 16. But the first link of his chain of proof is a falsum. For it is not true that Ptolemy Lagus was the first ruler who exacted from the Jews the "oath of God," viii. 2, i.e. the oath of fidelity; for

Josephus (Antt. xii. 1. 1) says directly, that Ptolemy Lagus did this with reference to the fidelity with which the Jews had kept to Alexander the Macedonian the oath of allegiance they had sworn to Darius, which he particularly describes, Antt. xi. 8. 3; besides, the covenant, e.g. 2 Sam. v. 3, concluded in the presence of Jahve with their own native kings included in it the oath of allegiance, and the oath of vassalage which, e.g., Zedekiah swore to Nebuchadnezzar, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 13, cf. Ezek. xvii. 13–19, had at the same time binding force on the citizens of the state that was in subjection. Also that “the oath of God” must mean the oath of allegiance sworn to a foreign ruler, and not that sworn to a native ruler, which would rather be called “the oath of Jahve,” does not stand the test: the author of the Book of Koheleth drives the cosmopolitanism of the Chokma so far, that he does not at all make use of the national name of God connected with the history of redemption, and Nehemiah also, xiii. 25, uses an oath “of God” where one would have expected an oath “of Jahve.” The first link of Hitzig’s chain of proof, then, shows itself on all sides to be worthless. The author says, viii. 2, substantially the same as Paul, Rom. xiii. 5, that one ought to be subject to the king, not only from fear of punishment, but for conscience’ sake.

Thus, then, viii. 10 will also stand without reference to the carrying away of the Jews captive by Ptolemy Lagus, especially since the subject there is by no means that of a mass-deportation; and, besides, those who were carried into Egypt by Lagus were partly from the regions round about Jerusalem, and partly from the holy city itself (Joseph. Antt. 12. 1. 1). And the old better times, vii. 10, were not those of the first three Ptolemies, especially since there are always men, and even in the best and most prosperous times, who praise the old times at the expense of the new. And also women who were a misfortune to their husbands or lovers there have always been, so that in vii. 26 one does not need to think of that Agathoclea who ruled over Ptolemy Philopator, and even had in her hands the power of life and death. Passages such as vii. 10 and vii. 26 afford no help in reference to the chronology. On the other hand, the author in ix. 13–16 relates, to all appearance, what he himself experienced. But the little city is certainly not the fortified town of Dora, on the sea-coast to the west of Carmel, which was besieged by Antiochus the Great (Polybius, v. 66) in the year 218, as at a later period, in the year 138, it was by Antiochus vii., Sidetes (Joseph. Bell. i. 2. 2); for this Dora was not then saved by a poor wise man within it,—of whom Polybius knows nothing,—but “by the strength of the place, and the help of those with Nicholaus.” A definite historical event is also certainly found in iv. 13–16. Hitzig sees in the old foolish king the spiritually contracted, but so much the more covetous, high priest Onias, under Ptolemy Euergetes; and in the poor but wise youth, Joseph (the son of Tobias), who robbed Onias of his place in the state, and raised himself to the office of general farmer of taxes. But here nothing agrees but that Onias was old and foolish, and that Joseph was then a young wise man (Joseph. Antt. xii. 4. 2); of the poverty of the latter nothing is heard—he was the nephew of Onias. And besides, he did not come out of the house “of prisoners” (הַסְּבִירִים); this word is pointed by Hitzig so as to mean, out of the house “of fugitives” (הַפְּטִירִים), perhaps, as he supposes, an allusion to the district Φεχόλα, which the author thus interprets as if it were derived from φεύγειν. Historical investigation has here degenerated into the boldest subjectivism. The Heb. tongue has never called “fugitives” הַסְּבִירִים; and to whom could the Heb. word פִּיטוּרָה (cf. Berachoth 28b) suggest—as Φύγελα did to Pliny and Mela—the Greek φεύγειν!

We have thus, in determining the time of the authorship of this book, to confine ourselves to the period subsequent to the Diadochs. It may be regarded as beyond a doubt that it was written under the Persian domination. Kleinert (Der Prediger Salomo, 1864) is in general right in saying that the political condition of the people which the book presupposes, is that in which they are placed under Satraps: the unrighteous judgment, iii. 16; and the despotic oppression, iv. 1, viii. 9, v. 7; the riotous court-life, x. 16–19; the raising of mean men to the highest places of honour, x. 5–7; the inexorable severity of the law of war-service, viii. 8;<sup>1</sup> the prudence required by the organized system of espionage<sup>2</sup> existing at such a time,—all these things were characteristic of this period. But if the Book of Koheleth is not at all older than Malachi, then it was written somewhere within the last century of the Persian kingdom, between Artaxerxes I., Longimanus (464–424), and Darius Codomannus (335–332): the better days for the Jewish people, of the Persian supremacy under the first five Achaemenides, were past (vii. 10). Indeed, in vi. 3 there appear to be reminiscences of Artaxerxes II., Mnemon (died about 360), who was 94 years old, and, according to Justin (x. 1), had 115 sons, and of Artaxerxes III., Ochus his successor, who was poisoned by the chief eunuch Bagoas, who, according to Aelian, Var. Hist. vi. 8, threw his (Ochus’) body to the cats, and caused sword-handles to be made from his bones. The book altogether contains many examples to which concrete instances in the Persian history correspond, from which they might be abstracted, in which strict harmony on all sides with historical fact is not to be required, since it did not concern the author. The event recorded iv. 13-16 refers to Cyrus rising to the supremacy of world-ruler (after dispossessing the old Median King Astyages), who left<sup>1</sup> nothing but misery to posterity. Such a rich man as is described in vi. 2, who had to leave all his treasures to a stranger, was Croesus, to whom Solon, as vii. 8a (cf. Herod. i. 32. 86), said that no one ought to be praised before his end. A case analogous at least to ix. 14-16, was the deliverance of Athens by the counsel of Themistocles (Justin, ii. 12), who finally, driven from Athens, was compelled to seek the protection of the Persian king, and ended his life in despair.<sup>2</sup> If we were not confined, for the history of the Persian kingdom and its provinces, from Artaxerxes I. to the appearance of Alexander of Macedon, to only a few and scanty sources of information (we know no Jewish events of this period, except the desecration of the temple by Bagoses, described by Josephus, Antt. xi. 7), we might probably be better able to understand many of the historical references of the Book of Koheleth. We should then be able to say to whom the author refers by the expression, "Woe to thy land when thy king is a child," x. 16; for Artaxerxes I., who, although only as yet a boy at the time of the murder of his father Xerxes (Justin, iii. 1), soon thereafter appeared manly enough, cannot be thought of. We should then, perhaps, be also in possession of the historical key to viii. 10; for with the reference to the deportation of many thousands of Jewish prisoners (Josephus, c. Ap. i. 22)—which, according to Syncellus and Orosius, must have occurred under Artaxerxes III., Ochus—the interpretation of that passage does not accord.<sup>3</sup> We should then also, perhaps, know to what political arrangement the author points when he says, vii. 19, that wisdom is a stronger protection to a city than "ten mighty men;" Grätz refers this to the decuriones of the Roman municipal cities and colonies; but probably it refers to the dynasties<sup>1</sup> (cf. Assyr. salat, governor) placed by the Persian kings over the cities of conquered countries. And generally, the oppressed spirit pervading the book would be so much clearer if we knew more of the sacrifices which the Jewish people in the later time of the Persians had to make, than merely that the Phœnicians, at the same time with "the Syrians in Palestine," had to contribute (Herod. vii. 87) to Xerxes for his Grecian expedition three hundred triremes; and also that the people who "dwelt in the Solymeian mountains" had to render him assistance in his expedition against Greece (Joseph. c. Ap. i. 22).

<sup>1</sup> According to Nicolaus of Damascus (Müller's Fragm. hist. Graec. III. 398), Cyrus was the child of poor parents; by "prison-house" (iv. 14), reference is made to his confinement in Persia, where access to him was prevented by guards (Herod. i. 123). Justin, i. 5: "A letter could not be openly brought to him, since the guards appointed by the king kept possession of all approaches to him."

The author was without doubt a Palestinian. In iv. 17 he speaks of himself as dwelling where the temple was, and also in the holy city, viii. 10; he lived, if not actually in it, at least in its near neighbourhood, x. 15; although, as Kleinert remarks, he appears, xi. 1, to make use of a similitude taken from the corn trade of a seaport town. From iv. 8 the supposition is natural that he was alone in the land, without children or brothers or sisters; but from the contents and spirit of the whole book, it appears more certain that, like his Koheleth, he was advanced in years, and had behind him a long checkered life. The symptoms of approaching death presenting themselves in old age, which he describes to the young, xii. 2 ff., he probably borrowed from his own experience. The whole book bears the marks of age, — a production of the Old Covenant which was stricken in age, and fading away.

The literature, down to 1860, of commentaries and monographs on the Book of Koheleth is very fully set forth in the English Commentary of Ginsburg, and from that time to 1867, in Zöckler's Commentary, which forms a part of Lange's Bibelwerk. Keil's Einleitung, 3d ed. 1873, contains a supplement to these, among which, however, the Bonner Theolog. Literaturblatt, 1874, Nr. 7, misses Pusey's and Reusch's (cf. the Tübingen Theol. Quartalschrift, 1860, pp. 430–469). It is not possible for any man to compass this literature. Zedner's Catalogue of the Hebrew books in the Library of the British Museum, 1867, contains a number of Jewish commentaries omitted by Ginsburg and Zöckler, but far from all. For example, the Commentary of Ahron B. Josef (for the first time printed at Eupatoria, 1834) now lies before me, with those of Moses Frankel (Dessau, 1809), and of Samuel David Luzzatto, in the journal, Ozar Nechmad 1864. Regarding the literature of English interpretation, see the American translation, by Tayler Lewis (1870), of Zöckler's Commentary. The catalogue there also is incomplete, for in 1873 a Commentary by Thomas Pelham Dale appeared; and a Monograph on chap. xii., under the title of The Dirge of Koheleth, by the Orientalist C. Taylor, appeared in 1874. The fourth volume of the Speaker's Commentary contains a Commentary on the Song by Kingsbury, and on Ecclesiastes by W. T. Bullock, who strenuously maintains its Solomonic authorship. The opinion that the book represents the conflict of two voices, the voice of true wisdom and that of pretended wisdom, has lately found advocates not only in a Hebrew Commentary by Ephraim Hirsch (Warsaw, 1871), but also in the article "Koheleth" by Schenkel in his Bibellesikon (vol. III., 1871). For the history and refutation of this attempt to represent the book in the form of a dialogue, we might refer to Zöckler's Introd. to his Commentary.

The old translations have been referred to at length by Ginsburg. Frederick Field, in his Hexapla (Poet. vol. 1867), has collected together the fragments of the Greek translations. Ge. Janichs, in his Animadversiones criticae (Breslau, 1871), has examined the Peshito of Koheleth and Ruth; vid. with reference thereto, Nöldeke's Anzeige in the Liter. Centralblatt 1871, Nr. 49, and cf. Middeldorpf's Symbolae exegetico-criticae ad librum Ecclesiasticis, 1811. The text of the Graecus Venetus lies before us now in a more accurate form than that by Villoison (1784), in Gebhardt's careful edition of certain Venetian manuscripts (Leipzig, Brockhaus 1874), containing this translation of the O. T. books.

"Ostendit omnia esse vanitati subjecta : in his quae propter homines facta sunt vanitas est mutabilitatis ; in his quae ab hominibus facta sunt vanitas est curiositatis ; in his quae in hominibus facta sunt vanitas mortalitatis."

HUGO OF ST. VICTOR († 1140).

THE title, i. 1, The words of Koheleth, son of David, king in Jerusalem, has been already explained in the Introduction. The verse, which does not admit of being properly halved, is rightly divided by "son of David" by the accent Zakef; for the apposition, "king in Jerusalem," does not belong to "David," but to "Koheleth." In several similar cases, such as Ezek. i. 3, the accentuation leaves the designation of the oppositional genitive undefined; in Gen. x. 21*b* it proceeds on an erroneous supposition; it is rightly defined in Amos i. 1*b*, for example, as in the passage before us. That "king" is without the article, is explained from this, that it is determined by "in Jerusalem," as elsewhere by "of Israel" ("Judah"). The expression (cf. 2 Kings xiv. 23) is singular.

PROLOGUE : THE EVERLASTING SAMENESS.—I. 2—11.

The book begins artistically with an opening section of the nature of a preamble. The ground-tone of the whole book at once sounds in ver. 2, which commences this section, "O vanity of vanities, saith Koheleth, O vanity of vanities! All is vain." As at Isa. xl. 1 (vid. l.c.) it is a question whether by "saith" is meant a future or a present utterance of God, so here and at xii. 8 whether "saith" designates the expression of Koheleth as belonging to history or as presently given forth. The language admits both interpretations, as e.g. "saith," with God as the subject, 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, is meant historically, and in Isa. xlix. 5 of the present time. We understand "saith" here, as e.g. Isa. xxxvi. 4, "Thus saith . . . the king of Assyria," of something said now, not of something said previously, since it is those presently living to whom the Solomon redivivus, and through him the author of this book, preaches the vanity of all earthly things. The old translators take "vanity of vanities" in the nominative, as if it were the predicate; but the repetition of the expression shows that it is an exclamation = O vanitatem vanitatum. The abbreviated connecting form of הֶבֶל is here not punctuated הֶבֶל, after the form חֶרֶר (חֶרֶר) and the like, but הֶבֶל, after the manner of the Aram. ground-form עֶבֶר; cf. Ewald, § 32*b*. Jerome read differently: In Hebraeo pro vanitate vanitatum ABAL ABALIM scriptum est, quod exceptis LXX. interpretibus omnes similiter transtulerunt ἀτμός ἀτμόων sive ἀτμών. Hēvel primarily signifies a breath, and still bears this meaning in post-bibl. Heb., e.g. Schabbath 119*b*: "The world exists merely for the sake of the breath of school-children" (who are the hope of the future). Breath, as the contrast of that which is firm and enduring, is the figure of that which has no support, no continuance. Regarding the superlative expression, "Vanity of vanities," vid. the Song i. 1. "Vanity of vanities" is the non plus ultra of vanity,—vanity in the highest degree. The double exclamation is followed by a statement which shows it to be the result of experience. "All is vain"—the whole (of the things, namely, which present themselves to us here below for our consideration and use) is vanity.

Ver. 3. With this verse commences the proof for this exclamation and statement: "What profit hath a man of all his labour which he laboureth in under the sun?!" An interrogative exclamation, which leads to the conclusion that never anything right, i.e. real, enduring, satisfying, comes of it. תִּרְוֹן, profit, synon. with mothar, iii. 19, is peculiar to this book (= Aram. יִתְרוֹן). A primary form, יִתְרוֹן, is unknown. The punctator Simson (Cod. 102*a* of the Leipzig University Lib. f. 5*a*) rightly blames those who use יִתְרוֹן, in a liturgical hymn, of the Day of Atonement. The word signifies that which remains over, either, as here, clear gain, profit, or that which has the pre-eminence, i.e. superiority, precedence, or is the foremost. "Under the sun" is the designation of the earth peculiar to this book,—the world of men, which we are wont to call the sublunary world. וְ has not the force of an accusative of manner, but of the obj. The author uses the expression, "Labour wherein I have laboured," ii. 19, 20, v. 17, as Euripides, similarly, μοχθεῖν μόχθον. He now proceeds to justify the negative contained in the question, "What profit?"

Ver. 4. "One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: and the earth remaineth for ever." The meaning is not that the earth remains standing, and thus (Hitz.) approaches no limit (for what limit for it could be had in view?); it is by this very immoveable condition that it fulfils, according to the ancient notion, its destiny, Ps. cxix. 90. The author rather intends to say that in this sphere nothing remains permanent as the fixed point around which all circles; generations pass away, others appear, and the earth is only the firm territory, the standing scene, of this ceaseless change. In reality, both things may be said of the earth: that it stands for ever without losing its place in the universe, and that it does not stand for ever, for it will be changed and become something else. But the latter thought, which appertains to the history of redemption, Ps. cii. 26 f., is remote from the Preacher; the stability of the earth appears to him only as the foil of the growth and decay everlastingly repeating themselves. Elster, in this fact, that the generations of men pass away, and that, on the contrary, the insensate earth under their feet remains, rightly sees something tragic, as Jerome had already done: Quid hac vanius vanitate, quam terram manere, quae hominum causa facta est, et hominem ipsum, terrae dominum, tam repente in pulverem dissolvi? The sun supplies the author with another figure. This, which he thinks of in contrast with the earth, is to him a second example of ceaseless change with perpetual sameness. As the generations of men come and go, so also does the sun.

Ver. 5. "And the sun ariseth, the sun goeth down, and it hasteth (back) to its place, there to rise again." It rises and sets again, but its setting is not a coming to rest; for from its place of resting in the west it must rise again in the morning in the east, hastening to fulfil its course. Thus Hitzig rightly, for he takes "there to rise again" as a relative clause; the words may be thus translated, but strictly taken, both participles stand on the same level; שׂוֹאֵף (panting, hastening) is like אֵף in ver. 4, the expression of the present, and יָי that of the fut. instans: ibi (rursus) oriturus; the accentuation also treats the two partic. as co-ordinate, for Tiphcha separates more than Tebir; but it is inappropriate that it gives to יָי the greater disjunctive Zakef Quaton (with Kadma going before). Ewald adopts this sequence of the accents, for he explains: the sun goes down, and that to its own place, viz. hastening back to it just by its going down, where, panting, it again ascends. But that the sun goes down to the place of its ascending, is a distorted thought. If "to its place" belongs to "goeth," then it can refer only to the place of the going down, as e.g. Benjamin el-Nahawendi (Neubauer, Aus der Petersb. Bibl. p. 108) explains: "and that to its place," viz. the place of the going down appointed for it by the Creator, with reference to Ps. civ. 19, "the sun knoweth his going down." But the  $\text{נש}$ , which refers back to "its place," opposes this interpretation; and the phrase  $\text{שׁוֹפֵף}$  cannot mean "panting, rising," since  $\text{שׁוֹפֵף}$  in itself does not signify to pant, but to snatch at, to long eagerly after anything, thus to strive, panting after it (cf. Job vii. 2; Ps. cxix. 131), which accords with the words "to its place," but not with the act of rising. And how unnatural to think of the rising sun, which gives the impression of renewed youth, as panting! No, the panting is said of the sun that has set, which, during the night, and thus without rest by day and night, must turn itself back again to the east (Ps. xix. 7), there anew to commence its daily course. Thus also Rashi, the LXX., Syr., Targ., Jerome, Venet., and Luther. Instead of  $\text{שׁוֹפֵף}$ , Grätz would read  $\text{שׁוֹבֵב}$ , redit (atque) etiam; but  $\text{שׁוֹבֵב}$  is as characteristic of the Preacher's manner of viewing the world as  $\text{שׁוֹבֵב}$  'וני, 6*b*, and 'ני, 8*a*. Thus much regarding the sun. Many old interpreters, recently Grätz, and among translators certainly the LXX., refer also 6*a* to the sun. The Targ. paraphrases the whole verse of the state of the sun by day and night, and at the spring and autumn equinox, according to which Rashi translates  $\text{לְרִצּוֹן}$ , la volonté (du soleil). But along with the sun, the wind is also referred to as a third example of restless motion always renewing itself. The division of the verses is correct; 6*a* used of the sun would overload the figure, and the whole of ver. 6 therefore refers to the wind.

Ver. 6. "It goeth to the south, and turneth to the north; the wind goeth ever circling, and the wind returneth again on its circuits." Thus designedly the verse is long-drawn and monotonous. It gives the impression of weariness.  $\text{שׁוֹפֵף}$  may be 3*d* pret. with the force of an abstract present, but the relation is here different from that in 5*a*, where the rising, setting, and returning stand together, and the two former lie backwards indeed against the latter; here, on the contrary, the circling motion and the return to a new beginning stand together on the same line;  $\text{שׁוֹפֵף}$  is thus a part., as the Syr. translates it. The participles represent continuance in motion. In ver. 4 the subjects stand foremost, because the ever anew beginning motion belongs to the subject; in vv. 5 and 6, on the contrary, the pred. stands foremost, and the subject in ver. 6 is therefore placed thus far back, because the first two pred. were not sufficient, but required a third for their completion. That the wind goes from the south (צָפוֹן, R. צָפֹן, the region of the most intense light) to the north (צָפוֹן, R. צָפֹן, the region of darkness), is not so exclusively true of it as it is of the sun that it goes from the east to the west; this expression requires the generalization "circling, circling goes the wind," i.e. turning in all directions here and there; for the repetition denotes that the circling movement exhausts all possibilities. The near defining part, which is subordinated to "goeth," elsewhere is annexed by "and," e.g. Jonah i. 11; cf. 2 Sam. xv. 30; here סוֹבֵב וְסוֹבֵב, in the sense of סוֹבֵב וְסוֹבֵב, Ezek. xxxvii. 2 (both times with Pasek between the words), precedes. סוֹבֵב is here the n. actionis of סוֹבֵב. And "on its circuits" is not to be taken adverbially: it turns back on its circuits, i.e. it turns back on the same paths (Knobel and others), but עַל and שָׁב are connected, as Prov. xxvi. 11; cf. Mal. iii. 24; Ps. xix. 7: the wind returns back to its circling movements to begin them anew (Hitzig). "The wind" is repeated (cf. ii. 10, iv. 1) according to the figure Epanaphora or Palindrome (vid. the Intro. to Isaiah, c. xl.-lxvi.). To all regions of the heavens, to all directions of the compass, its movement is ceaseless, ever repeating itself anew; there is nothing permanent but the fluctuation, and nothing new but that the old always repeats itself. The examples are thoughtfully chosen and arranged. From the currents of air, the author now passes to streams of water.

Ver. 7. "All rivers run into the sea, and the sea becomes not full; to the place whence the rivers came, thither they always return again." Instead of n<sup>h</sup>hârîm, n<sup>h</sup>halîm was preferred, because it is the more general name for flowing waters, brooks, and rivers; נַחַל (from נָחַל, cavare), אֶפְסַיִם (from אָפַס, continere), and (Arab.) wadîn (from the root-idea of stretching, extending), all three denote the channel or bed, and then the water flowing in it. The sentence, "all rivers run into the sea," is consistent with fact. Manifestly the author does not mean that they all immediately flow thither; and by "the sea" he does not mean this or that sea; nor does he think, as the Targ. explains, of the earth as a ring (אֶרֶץ אֶפְסַיִם, Pers. angusht-bâne, properly "finger-guard") surrounding the ocean: but the sea in general is meant, perhaps including also the ocean that is hidden. If we include this internal ocean, then the rivers which lose themselves in hollows, deserts, or inland lakes, which have no visible outlet, form no exception. But the expression refers first of all to the visible sea-basins, which gain no apparent increase by these masses of water being emptied into them: "the sea, it becomes not full," אֶרֶץ (Mishn. מִיָּם) has the reflex. pron., as at Ex. iii. 2, Lev. xiii. 34, and elsewhere. If the sea became full, then there would be a real change; but this sea, which, as Aristophanes says (Clouds, 1294 f.), οὐδὲν γίγνεται ἐπιπλέοντων τῶν ποταμῶν πλείων, represents also the eternal sameness. In ver. 7b, Symm., Jer., Luther, and also Zöckler, translate שׁ in the sense of “from whence;” others, as Ginsburg, venture to take מִשׁ in the sense of מִיָּם; both interpretations are linguistically inadmissible. Generally the author does not mean to say that the rivers return to their sources, since the sea replenishes the fountains, but that where they once flow, they always for ever flow without changing their course, viz. into the all-devouring sea (Elst.); for the water rising out of the sea in vapour, and collecting itself in rain-clouds, fills the course anew, and the rivers flow on anew, for the old repeats itself in the same direction to the same end. מִיָּם is followed by what is a virtual genitive (Ps. civ. 8); the accentuation rightly extends this only to הַלְּכִים; for אִשֶׁר, according to its relation, signifies in itself ubi, Gen. xxxix. 20, and quo, Num. xiii. 27; 1 Kings xii. 2 (never unde). מִשׁ, however, has after verbs of motion, as e.g. Jer. xxii. 27 after שׁב, and 1 Sam. ix. 6 after הָלַךְ, frequently the sense of שָׁבָה. And שׁב with ל and the infin. signifies to do something again, Hos. xi. 9, Job vii. 7, thus: to the place whither the rivers flow, thither they flow again, eo rursus eunt. The author here purposely uses only participles, because although there is constant change, yet that which renews itself is ever the same. He now proceeds, after this brief but comprehensive induction of particulars, to that which is general.

Ver. 8. “All things are in activity; no man can utter it; the eye is not satisfied with seeing, and the ear is not full with hearing.” All translators and interpreters who understand d’varim here of words (LXX., Syr., and Targ.) go astray; for if the author meant to say that no words can describe this everlasting sameness with perpetual change, then he would have expressed himself otherwise than by “all words weary” (Ew., Elst., Hengst., and others); he ought at least to have said מְיָרִיק יָג. But also “all things are wearisome” (Knob., Hitz.), or “full of labour” (Zöck.), i.e. it is wearisome to relate them all, cannot be the meaning of the sentence; for עָיִף does not denote that which causes weariness, but that which suffers weariness (Deut. xxv. 18; 2 Sam. vii. 2); and to refer the affection, instead of to the narrator, to that which is to be narrated, would be even for a poet too affected a quid pro quo. Rosenmüller essentially correctly: omnes res fatigantur h. e. in perpetua versantur vicissitudine, qua fatigantur quasi. But עָיִף is not appropriately rendered by fatigantur; the word means, becoming wearied, or perfectly feeble, or also: wearying oneself (cf. x. 15, xii. 12), working with a strain on one's strength, fatiguing oneself (cf. פִּיִּי, that which is gained by labour, work). This is just what these four examples are meant to show, viz. that a restless activity reaching no visible conclusion and end, always beginning again anew, pervades the whole world—all things, he says, summarizing, are in labour, i.e. are restless, hastening on, giving the impression of fatigue. Thus also in strict sequence of thought that which follows: this unrest in the outer world reflects itself in man, when he contemplates that which is done around him; human language cannot exhaust this coming and going, this growth and decay in constant circle, and the quodlibet is so great, that the eye cannot be satisfied with seeing, nor the ear with hearing; to the unrest of things without corresponds the unrest of the mind, which through this course, in these ever repeated variations, always bringing back the old again to view, is kept in ceaseless activity. The object to dabbēr is the totality of things. No words can comprehend this, no sensible perception exhaust it. That which is properly aimed at here is not the unsatisfiedness of the eyes (Prov. xxvii. 20), and generally of the mind, thus not the ever-new attractive power which appertains to the eye and the ear of him who observes, but the force with which the restless activity which surrounds us lays hold of and communicates itself to us, so that we also find no rest and contentment. With פִּיִּי, to be satisfied, of the eye, there is appropriately interchanged מִן, used of the funnel-shaped ear, to be filled, i.e. to be satisfied (as at vi. 7). The min connected with this latter word is explained by Zöck. after Hitz., "away from hearing," i.e. so that it may hear no more. This is not necessary. As sāvā' with its min may signify to be satisfied with anything, e.g. vi. 3, Job xix. 22, Ps. civ. 13; so also nimlā, with its min, to be full of anything, Ezek. xxxii. 6; cf. Kal, Isa. ii. 6, Pih. Jer. li. 34, Ps. cxxvii. 5. Thus mishsh'moa' is understood by all the old translators (e.g. Targ. מִן מִשְׁמֹעַ), and thus also, perhaps, the author meant it: the eye is not satisfied with seeing, and the ear is not filled (satisfied) with hearing; or yet more in accordance with the Heb. expression: there is not an eye, i.e. no eye is satisfied, etc., restlessly hastening, giving him who looks no rest, the world goes on in its circling course without revealing anything that is in reality new.

Ver. 9. "That which hath been is that which shall be, and that which is done is that which shall be done; and there is nothing new under the sun."—The older form of the language uses only אִשָּׁר instead of מִשָּׁר, in the sense of id quod, and in the sense of quid- quid, כל אשר (vi. 10, vii. 24); but māh is also used by it with the extinct force of an interrogative, in the sense of quodcumque, Job xiii. 13, aliquid (quidquam), Gen. xxxix. 8, Prov. ix. 13; and mi or mi asher, in the sense of quisquis, Ex. xxiv. 14, xxxii. 33. In ש הוא (cf. Gen. xlii. 14) are combined the meanings id (est) quod and idem (est) quod; hu is often the expression of the equality of two things, Job iii. 19, or of self-sameness, Ps. cii. 28. The double clause, quod fuit . . . quod factum est, comprehends that which is done in the world of nature and of men,—the natural and the historical. The bold clause, neque est quidquam novi sub sole, challenges contradiction; the author feels this, as the next verse shows.

Ver. 10. "Is there anything whereof it may be said: See, this is new?—it was long ago through the ages (aeons) which have been before us." The Semit. substantive verb שׁ (Assyr. isu) has here the force of a hypothetical antecedent: supposing that there is a thing of which one might say, etc. The הָ, with Makkeph, belongs as subject, as at vii. 27, 29 as object, to that which follows. פָּנֵר (vid. List, p. 193) properly denotes length or greatness of time (as פְּנֵרָה, length of way). The ל of לֵל is that of measure: this "long ago" measured (Hitz.) after infinitely long periods of time. אֵלָּנֵי, ante nos, follows the usage of אֵלָּנֵי, Isa. xli. 26, and אֵלָּנֵי, Judg. i. 10, etc.; the past time is spoken of as that which was before, for it is thought of as the beginning of the succession of time (vid. Orelli, Synon. der Zeit u. Ewigkeit, p. 14 f.). The singular הָיָה may also be viewed as pred. of a plur. inhumanus in order; but in connection, ii. 7, 9 (Gesen. § 147, An. 2), it is more probable that it is taken as a neut. verb. That which newly appears has already been, but had been forgotten; for generations come and generations go, and the one forgets the other.

Ver. 11. "There is no remembrance of ancestors; and also of the later ones who shall come into existence, there will be no remembrance for them with those who shall come into existence after them." With זָכְרוֹן (with Kametz) there is also זָכְרוֹן, the more common form by our author, in accordance with the usage of his age; Gesen., Elst., and others regard it here and at ii. 16 as constr., and thus אֵלָּנֵי as virtually object-gen. (Jerome, non est priorum memoria); but such refinements of the old syntaxis ornata are not to be expected in our author: he changes (according to the traditional punctuation) here the initial sound, as at i. 17 the final sound, to oth and uth. לֵל is the contrast of לֵל הָיָה: to attribute to one, to become partaker of. The use of the expression, "for them," gives emphasis to the statement. "With those who shall come after," points from the generation that is future to a remoter future, cf. Gen. xxxiii. 2. The Kametz of the prep. is that of the recompens. art.; cf. Num. ii. 31, where it denotes "the last" among the four hosts; for there אַחֲרָיִם is meant of the last in order, as here it is meant of the remotely future time.

KOHELETH'S EXPERIENCES AND THEIR RESULTS.—I. 12—IV. 16.

The Unsatisfactoriness of striving after Wisdom, i. 12—18.

After this prelude regarding the everlasting sameness of all that is done under the sun, Koheleth-Solomon unfolds the treasure of his life-experience as king.

Ver. 12. "I, Koheleth, have been king over Israel in Jerusalem." That of the two possible interpretations of אֲנִי הָיִיתִי, "I have become" and "I have been," not the former (Grätz), but the latter, is to be here adopted, has been already shown (p. 205). We translate better by "I have been"—for the verb here used is a pure perfect—than by "I was" (Ew., Elst., Hengst., Zöck.), with which Bullock (Speaker's Comm., vol. IV., 1873) compares the expression Quand j'étois roi! which was often used by Louis XIV. towards the end of his life. But here the expression is not a cry of complaint, like the "fuimus Troes," but a simple historical statement, by which the Preacher of the vanity of all earthly things here introduces himself,—it is Solomon, resuscitated by the author of the book, who here looks back on his life as king. "Israel" is the whole of Israel, and points to a period before the division of the kingdom; a king over Judah alone would not so describe himself. Instead of "king על (over) Israel," the old form of the language uses frequently simply "king of Israel," although also the former expression is sometimes found; cf. 1 Sam. xv. 26; 2 Sam. xix. 23; 1 Kings xi. 37. He has been king,—king over a great, peaceful, united people; king in Jerusalem, the celebrated, populous, highly-cultivated city,—and thus placed on an elevation having the widest survey, and having at his disposal whatever can make a man happy; endowed, in particular, with all the means of gaining knowledge, which accorded with the disposition of his heart searching after wisdom (cf. 1 Kings iii. 9–11, v. 9).

But in his search after worldly knowledge he found no satisfaction.

Ver. 13. "And I gave my heart to seek and to hold survey with wisdom over all that is done under the sun: a sore trouble it is which God has given to the children of men to be exercised therewith." The synonyms אֲחַרְכֵּיב (to seek) and אֲחַרְכֵּיב (to hold survey over) do not represent a lower and a higher degree of search (Zöck.), but two kinds of searching: one penetrating in depth, the other going out in extent; for the former of these verbs (from the root-idea of grinding, testing) signifies to investigate an object which one already has in hand, to penetrate into it, to search into it thoroughly; and the latter verb (from the root-idea of moving round about)<sup>1</sup> signifies to hold a survey,—look round in order to bring that which is unknown, or not comprehensively known, within the sphere of knowledge, and thus has the meaning of bākkēsh, one going the rounds. It is the usual word for the exploring of a country, i.e. the acquiring personal knowledge of its as yet unknown condition; the passing over to an intellectual search is peculiar to the Book of Koheleth, as it has the phrase לְבַבְךָ אֲנִי מְבַחֵשׁ, animum advertere, or applicare ad aliquid, in common only with Dan. x. 12. The beth of bahhoch'mah is that of the instrument; wisdom must be the means (organon) of knowledge in this searching and inquiry. With עַל is introduced the sphere into which it extends. Grotius paraphrases: Historiam animalium et satorum diligentissime inquisivi. But עֲשֵׂה does not refer to the world of nature, but to the world of men; only within this can anything be said of actions, only this has a proper history. But that which offers itself for research and observation there, brings neither joy nor contentment. Hitzig refers הוֹאֵה to human activity; but it relates to the research which has this activity as its object, and is here, on that account, called “a sore trouble,” because the attainment and result gained by the laborious effort are of so unsatisfactory a nature. Regarding עָנָה, which here goes back to עָנָה, to fatigue oneself, to trouble oneself with anything, and then to be engaged with it, vid. p. 194. The words עֵינַי רָע would mean trouble of an evil nature (vid. at Ps. lxxviii. 49; Prov. vi. 24); but better attested is the reading עֵינַי רָע, “a sore trouble.” הוֹאֵה is the subj., as at ii. 1 and elsewhere; the author uses it also in expressions where it is pred. And as frequently as he uses asher and שׁ, so also, when form and matter commend it, he uses the scheme of the attributive clause (elliptical relative clause), as here (cf. iii. 16), where certainly, in conformity with the old style, נִהְיֶה was to be used.

Ver. 14. He adduces proof of the wearisomeness of this work of research: “I saw all the works that are done under the sun; and, behold, all is vanity and striving after the wind.” The point of the sentence lies in וְהָיָה = וְהָיָה, so that thus raithi is the expression of the parallel fact (circumst. perfect). The result of his seeing, and that, as he has said ver. 13, of a by no means superficial and limited seeing, was a discovery of the fleeting, unsubstantial, fruitless nature of all human actions and endeavours. They had, as hevel expresses, no reality in them; and also, as denoted by r'uth ruahh (the LXX. render well by προαίρεσις πνεύματος), they had no actual consequences, no real issue. Hos. xii. 2 [1] also says: "Ephraim feedeth on wind," i.e. follows after, as the result of effort obtains, the wind, roeh ruahh; but only in the Book of Koheleth is this sentence transformed into an abstract terminus technicus (vid. under R'uth, p. 195).

Ver. 15. The judgment contained in the words, "vanity and a striving after the wind," is confirmed: "That which is crooked cannot become straight; and a deficit cannot be numerable," i.e. cannot be taken into account (thus Theod., after the Syro-Hex.), as if as much were present as is actually wanting; for, according to the proverb, "Where there is nothing, nothing further is to be counted." Hitzig thinks, by that which is crooked and wanting, according to vii. 13, of the divine order of the world: that which is unjust in it, man cannot alter; its wants he cannot complete. But the preceding statement refers only to labour under the sun, and to philosophical research and observation directed thereto. This places before the eyes of the observer irregularities and wants, brings such irregularities and wants to his consciousness,—which are certainly partly brought about and destined by God, but for the most part are due to the transgressions of man himself,—and what avails the observer the discovery and investigation?—he has only lamentation over it, for with all his wisdom he can bring no help. Instead of וְהָיָה (vid. under וְהָיָה, p. 196), וְהָיָה was to be expected. However, the old language also formed intransitive infinitives with transitive modification of the final vowels, e.g. שָׁבַח, etc. (cf. שָׁבַח, v. 11).

Having now gained such a result in his investigation and research by means of wisdom, he reaches the conclusion that wisdom itself is nothing.

Vv. 16–18. "I have communed with mine own heart, saying: Lo, I have gained great and always greater wisdom above all who were before me over Jerusalem; and my heart hath seen wisdom and knowledge in fulness. And I gave my heart to know what was in wisdom and knowledge, madness and folly—I have perceived that this also is a grasping after the wind." The evidence in which he bears witness to himself that striving after wisdom and knowledge brings with it no true satisfaction, reaches down to the close of ver. 17; וְהָיָה is the conclusion which is aimed at. The manner of expression is certainly so far involved, as he speaks of his heart to his heart what it had experienced, and to what he had purposely directed it. The אני leads us to think that a king speaks, for whom it is appropriate to write a capital I, or to multiply it into we; vid. regarding this "I," more pleonastic than emphatic, subordinated to its verb, § 3, p. 198. It is a question whether עם־לבי, after the phrase (את) עם־לבי, is meant of speaking with any one, colloqui, or of the place of speaking, as in "thou shalt consider in thine heart," Deut. viii. 5, it is used of the place of consciousness; cf. Job xv. 9, (עִפְרוֹ) היה עִפְיוּ = σύννοια ἐμαντῶ, and what is said in my Psychol. p. 134, regarding συνειδησις, consciousness, and συμμαρτυρεῖν. בְּלִבִּי, interchanging with עם־לבי, ii. 1, 15, cf. xv. 1, commends the latter meaning: in my heart (LXX., Targ., Jerome, Luther); but the cogn. expressions, m'dabbērēth al-libbah, 1 Sam. i. 13, and l'dabbēr el-libbi, Gen. xxiv. 45, suggest as more natural the former rendering, viz. as of a dialogue, which is expressed by the Gr. Venet. (more distinctly than by Aquila, Symm., and Syr.): διελεγμαί ἐγὼ εἰς τῆ καρδίᾳ μου. Also לְאֹמְרֵי, occurring only here in the Book of Koheleth, brings it near that the following oratio directa is directed to the heart, as it also directly assumes the form of an address, ii. 1, after בְּלִבִּי. The expression, הִגְדֵּנוּ הַכֹּ, "to make one's wisdom great," i.e. "to gain great wisdom," is without a parallel; for the words, הִנֵּנוּ הַכֹּ, Isa. xxviii. 29, quoted by Hitzig, signify to show and attest truly useful (beneficial) knowledge in a noble way. The annexed וְהִנֵּנוּ refers to the continued increase made to the great treasure already possessed (cf. ii. 9 and 1 Kings x. 7). The al connected therewith signifies, "above" (Gen. xlix. 26) all those who were over Jerusalem before me. This is like the sarrāni alik mahrija, "the kings who were my predecessors," which was frequently used by the Assyrian kings. The Targumist seeks to accommodate the words to the actual Solomon by thus distorting them: "above all the wise men who have been in Jerusalem before me," as if the word in the text were בְּיִרוּשָׁלַם<sup>1</sup> as it is indeed found in several Codd., and according to which also the LXX., Syr., Jerome, and the Venet. translate. Rather than think of the wise (חֲכָמִים), we are led to think of all those who from of old stood at the head of the Israelitish community. But there must have been well-known great men with whom Solomon measures himself, and these could not be such dissimilarly great men as the Canaanitish kings to the time of Melchizedek; and since the Jebusites, even under Saul, were in possession of Zion, and Jerusalem was for the first time completely subdued by David (2 Sam. v. 7, cf. Josh. xv. 63), it is evident that only one predecessor of Solomon in the office of ruler over Jerusalem can be spoken of, and that here an anachronism lies before us, occasioned by the circumstance that the Salomo redivivus, who has behind him the long list of kings whom in truth he had before him, here speaks. Regarding אשר היה, qu'il y eut, for אשר היו, qui furent, vid. at i. 10b. The seeing here ascribed to the heart (here = voûs, Psychol. p. 249) is meant of intellectual observation and apprehension; for "all perception, whether it be mediated by the organs of sense or not (as prophetic observing and contemplating), comprehends all, from mental discernment down to suffering, which veils itself in unconsciousness, and the Scripture designates it as a seeing" (Psychol. 234); the Book of Koheleth also uses the word ראה of every kind of human experience, bodily or mental, ii. 24, v. 17, vi. 6, ix. 9. It is commonly translated: "My heart saw much wisdom and knowledge" (thus e.g. Ewald); but that is contrary to the gram. structure of the sentence (Ew. § 287c). The adjct. harbêh<sup>1</sup> is always, and by Koheleth also, ii. 7, v. 6, 16, vi. 11, ix. 18, xi. 8, xii. 9, 12, placed after its subst.; thus it is here adv., as at v. 19, vii. 16 f. Rightly the Venet.: ἡ καρδία μου τεθέαται κατὰ πολλὴν σοφίαν καὶ γνῶσιω. Chokma signifies, properly, solidity, compactness; and then, like πικνότης, mental ability, secular wisdom; and, generally, solid knowledge of the true and the right. Dāath is connected with chokma here and at Isa. xxxiii. 6, as at Rom. xi. 33 γνώσις is with σοφία. Baumgarten-Crusius there remarks that σοφία refers to the general ordering of things, γνώσις to the determination of individual things; and Harless, that σοφία is knowledge which proposes the right aim, and γνώσις that which finds the right means thereto. In general, we may say that chokma is the fact of a powerful knowledge of the true and the right, and the property which arises out of this intellectual possession; but dāath is knowledge penetrating into the depth of the essence of things, by which wisdom is acquired and in which wisdom establishes itself.

Ver. 17. By the consecutive modus וְאַחֲרָיָהּ (aor. with ah, like Gen. xxxii. 6, xli. 11, and particularly in more modern writings; vid. p. 198, regarding the rare occurrence of the aorist form in the Book of Koheleth) he bears evidence to himself as to the end which, thus equipped with wisdom and knowledge, he gave his heart to attain unto (cf. 13*a*), i.e. toward which he directed the concentration of his intellectual strength. He wished to be clear regarding the real worth of wisdom and knowledge in their contrasts; he wished to become conscious of this, and to have joy in knowing what he had in wisdom and knowledge as distinguished from madness and folly. After the statement of the object lādaath, stands v'daath, briefly for וְדַעַת. Ginsburg wishes to get rid of the words holēloth v'sikluth, or at least would read in their stead חִבְיוּת וְשִׁכְלוּת (rendering them "intelligence and prudence"); Grätz, after the LXX. παραβολὰς καὶ ἐπιστήμην, reads כִּשְׁלוֹת וְשִׁכְלוֹת. But the text can remain as it is: the object of Koheleth is, on the one hand, to become acquainted with wisdom and knowledge; and, on the other, with their contraries, and to hold these opposite to each other in their operations and consequences. The LXX., Targ., Venet., and Luther err when they render sikluth here by ἐπιστήμη, etc. As sikluth, insight, intelligence, is in the Aram. written with the letter samek (instead of sin), so here, according to the Masora סכלות, madness is for once written with שׁ, being everywhere else in the book written with ס; the word is an ἐναντιόφωνον,<sup>1</sup> and has, whether written in the one way or in the other, a verb, sakal (שָׁכַל, שָׁכַל), which signifies "to twist together," as its root, and is referred partly to a complication and partly to a confusion of ideas. הִלְלוּ, from הָלַל, in the sense of "to cry out," "to rage," always in this book terminates in ōth, and only at x. 13 in ūth (vid. p. 191); the termination ūth is that of the abstr. sing.; but ōth, as we think we have shown at Prov. i. 20, is that of a fem. plur., meant intensively, like bogdoth, Zeph. ii. 4; binoth, chokmoth, cf. bogdim, Prov. xxiii. 28; hkovlim, Zech. xi. 7, 14; toqim, Prov. xi. 15 (Böttch. § 700*g* E). Twice v'sikluth presents what, speaking to his own heart, he bears testimony to before himself. By yādā'ti, which is connected with dibbarti (ver. 16) in the same rank, he shows the facit. הִי refers to the striving to become conscious of the superiority of secular wisdom and science to the love of pleasure and to ignorance. He perceived that this striving also was a grasping after the wind; with רָעִיתִי, 14*b*, is here interchanged רָעִיתִי (vid. p. 195). He proves to himself that nothing showed itself to be real, i.e. firm and enduring, unimpeachable and imperishable. And why not?

Ver. 18. "For in much wisdom is much grief; and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow." The German proverb: "Much wisdom causeth headache," is compared, xii. 12*b*, but not here, where עָצַב and מְצַחֵב express not merely bodily suffering, but also mental grief. Spinoza hits one side of the matter in his Ethics, IV. 17, where he remarks: "Veram boni et mali cognitionem saepe non satis valere ad cupiditates coercendas, quo facto homo imbecillitatem suam animadvertens cogitur exclamare: Video meliora proboque, deteriora sequor." In every reference, not merely in that which is moral, there is connected with knowledge the shadow of a sorrowful consciousness, in spite of every effort to drive it away. The wise man gains an insight into the thousand-fold woes of the natural world, and of the world of human beings, and this reflects itself in him without his being able to change it; hence the more numerous the observed forms of evil, suffering, and discord, so much greater the sadness (עָצַב, R. כּ.ם, cogn. ה.ם, perstringere) and the heart-sorrow (מְצַחֵב, crève-cœur) which the inutility of knowledge occasions. The form of 18*a* is like v. 6, and that of 18*b* like e.g. Prov. xviii. 22*a*. We change the clause v'yosiph daath into an antecedent, but in reality the two clauses stand together as the two members of a comparison: if one increaseth knowledge, he increaseth (at the same time) sorrow. "יִסְיָה", Isa. xxix. 14, xxxviii. 5, Eccles. ii. 18," says Ewald, § 169*a*, "stands alone as a part. act., from the stem reverting from Hiph. to Kal with י־ instead of ׀." But this is not unparalleled; in הֵן יִסְיָה the verb יִסְיָה is fin., in the same manner as יָסַר, Isa. xxviii. 16; הוֹצִיָה, Ps. xvi. 5, is Hiph., in the sense of amplificas, from הִצִּיָה; יָסַר, Prov. vi. 19 (vid. l.c.), is an attribut. clause, qui efficit, used as an adj.; and, at least, we need to suppose in the passage before us the confusion that the ē of kātēl (from kātil, originally kātal), which is only long, has somehow passed over into ē. Böttcher's remark to the contrary, "An impersonal fiens thus repeated is elsewhere altogether without a parallel," is set aside by the proverb formed exactly thus: "He that breathes the love of truth says what is right," Prov. xii. 17.

The Unsatisfying Nature of Worldly Joy, ii. 1–11.

After having proved that secular wisdom has no superiority to folly in bringing true happiness to man, he seeks his happiness in a different way, and gives himself up to cheerful enjoyment.

ii. 1. "I have said in mine heart: Up then, I will prove thee with mirth, and enjoy thou the good! And, lo, this also is vain." Speaking in the heart is not here merely, as at i. 16, 17*a*, speaking to the heart, but the words are formed into a direct address of the heart. The Targ. and Midrash obliterate this by interpreting as if the word were נִסְפָּנָה, "I will try it" (vii. 23). Jerome also, in rendering by vadam et affluam deliciis et fruam bonis, proceeds contrary to the usual reading of נָסַף (Niph. of נָסַף, vid. at Ps. ii. 6), as if this could mean, "I will pour over myself." It is an address of the heart, and כֹּ is, as at 1 Kings x. 1, that of the means: I will try thee with mirth, to see whether thy hunger after satisfaction can be appeased with mirth. נִסְפָּנָה also is an address; Grätz sees here, contrary to the Gramm., an infin. continuing the וְנִסְפָּנָה: urēh, Job x. 15, is the connect. form of the particip. adj. rāēh; and if rēh could be the inf. after the forms naqqēh, hinnāqqēh, it would be the inf. absol., instead of which נִסְפָּנָה was to be expected. It is the imper.: See good, sinking thyself therein, i.e. enjoy a cheerful life. Elsewhere the author connects נִסְפָּנָה less significantly with the accus.-obj., v. 17, vi. 6, ii. 24.

This was his intention; but this experiment also to find out the summum bonum proves itself a failure: he found a life of pleasure to be a hollow life; that also, viz. devotedness to mirth, was to him manifestly vanity.

Ver. 2. "To laughter I said: It is mad; and to mirth: What doth it issue in?" Laughter and mirth are personified; m'holāl is thus not neut. (Hitz., a foolish matter), but mas. The judgment which is pronounced regarding both has not the form of an address; we do not need to supply נִסְפָּנָה and נִסְפָּנָה, it is objectively like an oratio obliqua: that it is mad; cf. Ps. xlix. 12. In the midst of the laughter and revelling in sensual delight, the feeling came over him that this was not the way to true happiness, and he was compelled to say to laughter, It has become mad (part. Poal, as at Ps. cii. 9), it is like one who is raving mad, who finds his pleasure in self-destruction; and to joy (mirth), which disregards the earnestness of life and all due bounds, he is constrained to say, What does it result in? = that it produces nothing, i.e. that it brings forth no real fruit; that it produces only the opposite of true satisfaction; that instead of filling, it only enlarges the inner void. Others, e.g. Luther, "What doest thou?" i.e. How foolish is thy undertaking! Even if we thus explain, the point in any case lies in the inability of mirth to make man truly and lastingly happy,—in the inappropriateness of the means for the end aimed at. Therefore עֲשֵׂה is thus meant just as in עֲשֵׂה פְרִי (Hitz.), and מַעֲשֵׂה, effect, Isa. xxxii. 17. Thus Mendelssohn: What profit dost thou bring to me? Regarding הִי, vid. p. 198; מַה־זֶּה is = mah-zoth, Gen. iii. 13, where it is shown that the demonstrative pronoun serves here to sharpen the interrogative: What then, what in all the world!

After this revelling in sensual enjoyment has been proved to be a fruitless experiment, he searches whether wisdom and folly cannot be bound together in a way leading to the object aimed at.

Ver. 3. "I searched in my heart, (henceforth) to nourish my body with wine, while my heart had the direction by means of wisdom; and to lay hold on folly, till I might see what it was good for the children of men that they should do, all the number of the days of their life." After he became conscious that unbridled sensual intoxication does not lead to the wished-for end, he looked around him farther, and examined into the following receipt for happiness. Inappropriately, Zöckl, with Hengst.: "I essayed in my heart to nourish . . ." חיך does not mean probare, but explorare, to spy out, Num. x. 33, and frequently in the Book of Koheleth (here and at i. 13, vii. 25) of mental searching and discovery (Targ. אילל). With למשוך there then follows the new thing that is contrived. If we read משך and נהג in connection, then the idea of drawing a carriage, Isa. v. 18, cf. Deut. xxi. 3, and of driving a carriage, 2 Sam. vi. 3, lies near; according to which Hitzig explains: "Wine is compared to a draught beast such as a horse, and he places wisdom as the driver on the box, that his horse may not throw him into a ditch or a morass." But moshék is not the wine, but the person himself who makes the trial; and nohég is not the wisdom, but the heart,—the former thus only the means of guidance; no man expresses himself thus: I draw the carriage by means of a horse, and I guide it by means of a driver. Rightly the Syr.: "To delight (למכסך, from כסם, oblectare) my flesh with wine." Thus also the Targ. and the Venet., by "drawing the flesh." The metaphor does not accord with the Germ. ziehen = to nourish by caring for (for which זקה is used); it is more natural, with Gesen., to compare the passing of trahere into tractare, e.g. in the expression se benignius tractare (Horace, Ep. i. 17); but apart from the fact that trahere is a word of doubtful etymology,<sup>1</sup> tractare perhaps attains the meaning of attending to, using, managing, through the intermediate idea of moving hither and thither, which is foreign to the Heb. משך, which means only to draw,—to draw to oneself, and hold fast (attractum sive prehensum tenere). As the Talm. משך occurs in the sense of "to refresh," e.g. Chagiga 14a: "The Haggadists (in contradistinction to the Halachists) refresh the heart of a man as with water" (vid. p. 193); so here, "to draw the flesh" = to bring it into willing obedience by means of pleasant attractions.<sup>2</sup>

The phrase which follows: v'libbi noh'eg bahhochmāh, is conditioning: While my heart had the direction by means of wisdom; or, perhaps in accordance with the more modern usus loq. (vid. p. 194): While my heart guided, demeaned, behaved itself with wisdom. Then the inf. limshok, depending on tarti as its obj., is carried forward with v'lēhhoz b'sichluth. Plainly the subject treated of is an intermediate thing (Bardach: מְצִיעוּת). He wished to have enjoyment, but in measure, without losing himself in enjoyment, and thereby destroying himself. He wished to give himself over to sweet desipere, but yet with wise self-possession (because it is sadly true that ubi mel ibi fel) to lick the honey and avoid the gall. There are drinkers who know how to guide themselves so that they do not end in drunken madness; and there are habitual pleasure-seekers who yet know how so far to control themselves, that they do not at length become roués. Koheleth thus gave himself to a foolish life, yet tempered by wisdom, till there dawned upon him a better light upon the way to true happiness.

The expression of the donec viderem is old Heb. Instead of אֲרֵאִי בִּטְבוֹב, quidnam sit bonum in indirect interrog. (as xi. 6, cf. Jer. vi. 16), the old form אֲרֵאִי בִּיָּטְבוֹב (vi. 12) would lie at least nearer. Asher yāasu may be rendered: quod faciant or ut faciant; after ii. 24, iii. 22, v. 4, vii. 18, the latter is to be assumed. The accus. designation of time, "through the number of the days of their life," is like v. 17, vi. 12. We have not, indeed, to translate with Knobel: "the few days of their life," but yet there certainly lies in מְסַפֵּר the idea that the days of man's life are numbered, and that thus even if they are not few but many (vi. 3), they yet do not endure for ever.

The king now, in the verse following, relates his undertakings for the purpose of gaining the joys of life in fellowship with wisdom, and first, how he made architecture and gardening serviceable to this new style of life.

Vv. 4-6. "I undertook great works, built me houses, planted me vineyards. I made me gardens and parks, and planted therein all kinds of fruit-trees. I made me water-pools to water therewith a forest bringing forth trees." The expression, "I made great my works," is like i. 16; the verb contains the adj. as its obj. The love of wisdom, a sense of the beautiful in nature and art, a striving after splendour and dignity, are fundamental traits in Solomon's character.

this lies a raffinement. But why does he not rather say, "to bathe in wine"? If מְשִׁיחַ can mean "to embrocate," it may also mean "to bathe," and for בִּיין may be read בִּינֵי: in Grecian, i.e. Falernian, Chian, wine.

His reign was a period of undisturbed and assured peace. The nations far and near stood in manifold friendly relations with him. Solomon was "the man of rest," 1 Chron. xxii. 9; his whole appearance was as it were the embodied glory itself that had blossomed from out of the evils and wars of the reign of David. The Israelitish commonwealth hovered on a pinnacle of worldly glory till then unattained, but with the danger of falling and being lost in the world. The whole tendency of the time followed, as it were, a secular course, and it was Solomon first of all whom the danger of the love of the world, and of worldly conformity to which he was exposed, brought to ruin, and who, like so many of the O. T. worthies, began in the spirit and ended in the flesh. Regarding his buildings,—the house of the forest of Lebanon, the pillared hall (porch), the hall of judgment, the palace intended for himself and the daughter of Pharaoh,—vid. the description in 1 Kings vii. 1–12, gathered from the annals of the kingdom; 1 Kings ix. 15–22 = 2 Chron. viii. 3–6, gives an account of Solomon's separate buildings (to which also the city of Millo belongs), and of the cities which he built; the temple, store-cities, treasure-cities, etc., are naturally not in view in the passage before us, where it is not so much useful buildings, as rather buildings for pleasure (1 Kings ix. 19), that are referred to. Vineyards, according to 1 Chron. xxvii. 27, belonged to David's royal domain; a vineyard in Baal-hamon which Solomon possessed, but appears at a later period to have given up, is mentioned at the close of the Song. That he was fond of gardening, appears from manifold expressions in the Song; delight in the life and movements of the natural world, and particularly in plants, is a prominent feature in Solomon's character, in which he agrees with Shulamith. The Song, vi. 2, represents him in the garden at the palace. We have spoken under the Song, vi. 11 f., of the gardens and parks at Etam, on the south-west of Bethlehem. Regarding the originally Persian word pardēs (plur. pardesim, Mishnic pardesoth), vid. under Song iv. 13; regarding the primary meaning of b'rēchah (plur. const. b'rēchoth, in contradistinction to birchoth, blessings), the necessary information is found under Song vii. 5. These Solomonic pools are at the present day to be seen near old Etam, and the clause here denoting a purpose, "to water from them a forest which sprouted trees, i.e. brought forth sprouting trees," is suitable to these; for verbs of flowing and swarming, also verbs of growing, thought of transitively, may be connected with obj.-accus., Ewald, § 281*b*; cf. under Isa. v. 6. Thus, as he gave himself to the building of houses, the care of gardens, and the erection of pools, so also to the cultivation of forests, with the raising of new trees.

Another means, wisely considered as productive of happiness, was a large household and great flocks of cattle, which he procured for himself.

Ver. 7. "I procured servants and maidens, and also I obtained servants born in the house; also the possession of flocks; I obtained many horned and small cattle before all who were in Jerusalem before me." The obtaining of these possessions is, according to Gen. xvii. 12 ff., to be understood of purchase. There is a distinction between the slaves, male and female (mancipia), obtained by purchase, and those who were home-born (vernae), the בְּנֵי (יְלִידֵי) בַּיִת, who were regarded as the chief support of the house (Gen. xiv. 14), on account of their attachment to it, and to this day are called (Arab.) fada wayyt, as those who offer themselves a sacrifice for it, if need be. Regarding הָיָה לִי, in the sense of increasing possession, vid. Song, p. 155; and regarding הָיָה לְיָדַי, vid. at i. 10, 16; at all events, the sing. of the pred. may be explained from this, that the persons and things named are thought of in the mass, as at Zech. xi. 5, Joel i. 20 (although the idea there may be also individualizing); but in the use of the pass., as at Gen. xxxv. 26, Dan. ix. 24, the Semite custom is different, inasmuch as for it the passive has the force of an active without a definite subject, and thus with the most general subject; and as to the case lying before us in ver. 7, we see from Ex. xii. 49, cf. Gen. xv. 17, that הָיָה (יָהִי) in such instances is thought of as neut. According to Gen. xxvi. 14 and the passage before us, הָיָה לְיָדַי lay nearer than הָיָה לִי, but the primary form instead of the connecting form is here the traditional reading; we have thus apposition (Nebenordnung) instead of subordination (Annexion), as in š'vahim š'lamim, Ex. xxiv. 5, and in habbaqar hann'hosheth, 2 Kings xvi. 17, although vagar vatson may also be interpreted as the accus. of the more accurate definition: the possession of flocks consisting in cattle and sheep. But this manner of construction is, for a book of so late an origin, too artificial. What it represents Solomon as saying is consistent with historical fact; at the consecration of the temple he sacrificed hecatombs, 1 Kings viii. 63; and the daily supply for the royal kitchen, which will at the same time serve to show the extent of the royal household, was, according to 1 Kings v. 2 f., enormous.

There now follows the enumeration of riches and jewels which were a delight to the eye; and finally, the large provision made for revelling in the pleasures of music and of sensual love.

Ver. 8. "I heaped up for myself also silver and gold, and the peculiar property of kings and of countries; I gat me men singers and women singers, and the delights of the children of men: mistress and mistresses." The verb  $\text{שָׁבַבְתִּי בְנֵי שָׂרָיִם}$ , συνάγειω, is common to all Semitic dialects (also to the Assyr.), and especially peculiar to the more recent Heb., which forms from it the name of the religious community συναγωγή,  $\text{בְּנֵי שָׂרָיִם}$ ; it is used here of that which is brought together merely for the purpose of possession. S'gullah (from sagal, Targ., to make oneself possess), properly possession, and that something which specially and peculiarly belongs to one as his property; the word is here meant collect., as at 1 Chron. xxix. 3: that which only kings and individual countries possess. The interchange of m'lachim, which is without the article, with the determ. hamm'dinoth, is arbitrary: something special, such as that which a king possesses, the specialities which countries possess,—one country this, and another that. The hamm'dinoth are certainly not exclusively the regions embraced within the dominion of Solomon (Zöckl.), as, according to Esth. i. 1, the Persian kingdom was divided into 127 m'dinoth. Solomon had a fleet which went to Ophir, was in a friendly relation with the royal house of Tyre, the metropolis of many colonies, and ruled over a widely-extended kingdom, bound by commerce with Central Asia and Africa.—His desires had thus ample opportunity to stretch beyond the limits of his own kingdom, and facilities enough for procuring the peculiar natural and artistic productions which other lands could boast of. M'dinah is, first of all, a country, not as a territory, but as under one government (cf. v. 7); in the later philosophical language it is the Heb. word for the Greek πολιτεία; in the passage before us, m'dinoth is, however, not different from  $\text{מְדִינָה}$ .

From the singing men and singing women who come into view here, not as appertaining to the temple service (vid. the Targ.), with which no singing women were connected, but as connected with the festivities of the court (2 Sam. xix. 36; cf. Isa. v. 12), advance is made to shiddah v'shiddoth; and since these are designated by the preceding  $\text{וְחַמְדֵּי חַיִּים}$  (not  $\text{וְחַמְדֵּי חַיִּים}$ ) b'ne hāādām, especially as objects and means of earthly pleasure, and since, according to vii. 7, sexual love is the fairest and the most pleasant, in a word, the most attractive of all earthly delights (Solomon's luxus, also here contradicting the law of the king, Deut. xvii. 17, came to a height, according to 1 Kings xi. 3, after the example of Oriental rulers, in a harem of not fewer than one thousand women, princesses and concubines), of necessity, the expression shiddah v'shiddoth must denote a multitude of women whom the king possessed for his own pleasure. Cup-bearers, male and female (Syr., LXX.), cannot at all be understood, for although it may be said that the enumeration thus connects itself with the before-named בַּיִת, yet this class of female attendants are not numbered among the highest human pleasures; besides, with such an explanation one must read שָׂרָה וְשָׂרוֹת, and, in addition, שָׂרָה (to throw, to pour to, or pour out), to which this Heb. שָׂרָה may correspond, is nowhere used of the pouring out of wine. Rather might שָׂרָה, like שָׂרָה, hydria, be the name of a vessel from which one pours out anything, according to which Aq. translates by κυλλαιον και κυλλια, Symmachus, after Jerome, by mensurarum (read mensarum<sup>1</sup>) species et appositiones, and Jerome, scyphos et urceos in ministerio ad vina fundenda; but this word for h'le mashkeh, 1 Kings x. 21 (= 2 Chron. ix. 20), is not found. Also the Targ., which translates by dimasaya uve v'navan, public baths (δημόσια), and balneae, vindicates this translation by referring the word to the verb שָׂרָה, "with pipes which pour out (שָׂרָה) tepid water, and pipes which pour out hot water." But this explanation is imaginary; שָׂרָה occurs in the Mishna, Mikvaoth (of plunge-baths) vi. 5, but there it denotes a chest which, when it swims in the water, makes the plunge-bath unsuitable. Such an untenable conceit also is the translation suggested by Kimchi, בְּלִי וְסֵר, according to which the Venet. σύστημα και συστήματα (in a musical sense: concertus), and Luther: "all kinds of musical instruments;" the word has not this meaning; Orelli, Sanchuniathon, p. 33, combines therewith Σιδών, according to the Phœnician myth, the inventress of the artistic song. The explanation by Kimchi is headed, "Splendour of every kind;" Ewald, Elster, and Zöckler find therein a general expression, following taanugoth: great heap and heaps = in great abundance [die Hülle und Fülle]. But the synonym of כְּבוֹד, "splendour," is not שָׂרָה, but עָן; and that שָׂרָה, like עָנָה, is referred to a great number, is without proof. Thus shiddah v'shiddoth will denote something definite; besides, "a large number" finds its expression in the climactic union of words. In the Jerus. Talm. Taanith iv. 5, shiddah must, according to the gloss, be the name of a chariot, although the subject there is not that of motion forward, or moving quickly; it is there announced that Stichin, not far from Sepphoris, a place famed also for its pottery, formerly possessed 80 such shiddoth wholly of metal. The very same word is explained by Rashi, Baba kamma ix. 3, Shabbath 120a, Erubin 30b, Gittin 8b, 68a, Chagiga 25a, and elsewhere, of a carriage of wood, and especially of a chariot for women and distinguished persons. The combination of the synonyms, shiddah uthivah umigdal, does not in itself mean more than a chest; and Rashi himself explains, Kethuboth 65*a*, quolphi dashidah of the lock of a chest (argaz); and the author of Aruch knows no other meaning than that of a repository such as a chest. But in passages such as Gittin 8*b*, the shiddah is mentioned as a means of transport; it is to all appearance a chest going on wheels, moved forward by means of wheels, but on that very account not a state-chariot. Rashi's tradition cannot be verified. Böttcher, in the Neue Aehrenlese, adduces for comparison the Syr. Shyddlo, which, according to Castelli, signifies navis magna, corbita, arca; but from a merchant ship and a portable chest, it is a great way to a lady's palanquin. He translates: palanquin and palinquin = one consignment to the harem after another. Gesen., according to Rödiger, Theol. 1365*b*, thinks that women are to be understood; for he compares the Arab. z'ynat, which signifies a women's carriage, and then the woman herself (cf. our Frauenzimmer, women's apartment, women, like Odaliske, from the Turk. oda, apartment). But this all stands or falls with that gloss of Rashi's: 'agalah v'merkavoth nashim usarim. Meanwhile, of all the explanations as yet advanced, this last [of splendid coaches, palanquins] is the best; for it may certainly be supposed that the words shiddah v'shiddoth are meant of women. Aben Ezra explains on this supposition, shiddoth = sh'vuyoth, females captured in war; but unwarrantably, because as yet Solomon had not been engaged in war; others (vid. Pinsker's Zur Gesch. des Karaismus, p. 296), recently Bullock, connect it with shadäim, in the sense of (Arab.) nahidah (a maiden with swelling breast); Knobel explains after shadad, to barricade, to shut up, occlusa, the female held in custody (cf. v'thulah, the separated one, virgin, from bathal, cogn. badal); Hitzig, "cushions," "bolsters," from shanad, which, like (Arab.) firash, λέχος, is then transferred to the juncta toro. Nothing of all that is satisfactory. The Babyl. Gemara, Gittin 68*a*, glosses וְיָמֵי בָּתְּרֵי by "reservoirs and baths," and then further says that in the west (Palestine) they say אֲרָבָה, chests (according to Rashi: chariots); but that here in this country (i.e. in Babylon) they translate shiddah v'shiddoth by shedah v'shedathin, which is then explained, "demons and demonesses," which Solomon had made subservient to him.<sup>1</sup> This haggadic-mytholog. interpretation is, linguistically at least, on the right track. A demon is not so named from fluttering or moving to and fro (Levy, Schönhak), for there is no evidence in the Semitic language of the existence of a verb שׁוּר, to flee; also not from a verb sadad, which must correspond to the Heb. הִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה, in the sense of to adore (Oppert's Inscription du palais de Khorsabad, 1863, p. 96); for this meaning is more than doubtful, and, besides, שׁוּר is an active, and not a passive idea,—much rather שׁוּר, Assy. šd, Arab. sayyid, signifies the mighty, from שׁוּר, to force, Ps. xci. 6.<sup>1</sup> In the Arab. (cf. the Spanish Cid) it is uniformly the name of a lord, as subduing, ruling, mastering (sabid), and the fem. sayyidat, of a lady, whence the vulgar Arab. sitti = my lady, and šidi = my lord. Since שׁוּרִי means the same as שׁוּר, and in Heb. is more commonly used than it, so also the fem. form שׁוּרִיָּה is possible, so much the more as it may have originated from שׁוּרִיָּה, v. שׁוּרִי = שׁוּר, by a sharpening contraction, like סְנִיִּים, from סְנִיִּים (Olsh. § 83c), perhaps intentionally to make שׁוּרִיָּה, a demoness, and the name of a lady (donna = domina) unlike. Accordingly we translate, with Gesen. and Meyer in their Handwört.: “lady and ladies;” for we take shiddoth as a name of the ladies of the harem, like sheglath (Assyr. saklāti) and l'hhenath in the book of Daniel, on which Ahron b. Joseph the Karaite remarks: shedah hingaroth shagal.

<sup>1</sup> A demon, and generally a superhuman being, is called, as in Heb. דָּמּוּן, so in the Babyl.-Assyr. sidu, vid. Norris' Assyrian Dictionary, II. p. 668; cf. Schrader, in the Jena. Lit. Zeit. 1874, p. 218 f., according to which sidu, with alap, is the usual name of Adar formed like an ox.

The connection expressing an innumerable quantity, and at the same time the greatest diversity, is different from the genitival dor dorim, generation of generations, i.e. lasting through all generations, Ps. lxxii. 5, from the permutative heightening the idea: rahham rahhamathaim, one damsel, two damsels, Judg. v. 30, and from that formed by placing together the two gram. genders, comprehending every species of the generic conception: mash'en umash'enah, Isa. iii. 3 (vid. comm. l.c., and Ewald, § 172b). Also the words cited by Ewald (Syr.), rogo urogo, “all possible pleasures” (Cureton's Spicil. p. 10), do not altogether accord with this passage, for they heighten, like m'od m'od, by the repetition of the same expression. But similar is the Arab. scheme, mal wamawal, “possession and possessions,” i.e. exceeding great riches, where the collective idea, in itself affording by its indetermination free scope to the imagination, is multiplied by the plur. being further added.

After Koheleth has enumerated all that he had provided for the purpose of gratifying his lusts, but without losing himself therein, he draws the conclusion, which on this occasion also shows a perceptible deficit.

Vv. 9–11. “ And I became great, and was always greater than all that were before me in Jerusalem : also my wisdom remained with me. And all that mine eyes desired I kept not from them, I refused not any kind of joy to my heart ; for my heart had joy of all my labour : and this was my portion of all my labour. And I turned myself to all the works which my hands had done, and to the labour which I had laboured to accomplish : and, behold, all was vain, and windy effort, and there was no true profit under the sun.” In v'hosaphthi there is here no obj. as at i. 16 ; the obj. is the g'dullah, the greatness, to be concluded and thought of from v'gadalti, “ and I became great.” To the impers. הָיִיתִי לְגָדוֹל, 7*b*, cf. 7*a*, i. 16, 10. He became great, and always greater, viz. in the possession of all the good things, the possession of which seemed to make a man happy on this earth. And what he resolved upon, in the midst of this dulcis insania, viz. to deport himself as a wise man, he succeeded in doing : his wisdom forsook him not, viz. the means adapted to the end, and ruling over this colossal apparatus of sensual lust ; אָרַךְ, as e.g. at Ps. xvi. 6, belongs to the whole clause ; and עָמַד, with לְ, does not mean here to stand by, sustain (Herzfeld, Ewald, Elster), which it might mean as well as עָמַד עַל, Dan. xii. 1, but to continue (vid. p. 194), as Jerome, and after him, Luther, translates : sapientia quoque perseveravit mecum ; the Targ. connects the ideas of continuance (LXX., Syr., Venet.) and of help ; but the idea intended is that of continuance, for נָתַן, e.g., does not refer to helping, but self-maintaining.

Ver. 10. Thus become great and also continuing wise, he was not only in a condition to procure for himself every enjoyment, but he also indulged himself in everything ; all that his eyes desired, i.e. all that they saw, and after which they made him lust (Deut. xiv. 26) (cf. 1 John ii. 16), that he did not refuse to them (לֹא מָנַע, subtrahere), and he kept not back his heart from any kind of joy (לֹא מָנַע, with min of the thing refused, as at Num. xxiv. 11, etc., oftener with min, of him to whom it is refused, e.g. Gen. xxx. 2), for (here, after the foregoing negations, coinciding with immo) his heart had joy of all his work ; and this, viz. this enjoyment in full measure, was his part of all his work. The palindromic form is like i. 6, iv. 1 ; cf. Isa. p. 411. We say in Heb. as well as in German : to have joy in (an, בְּ) anything, joy over (über, עַל) anything, or joy of (von, מִן) anything ; Koheleth here purposely uses min, for he wishes to express not that the work itself was to him an object and reason of joy, but that it became to him a well of joy (cf. Prov. v. 18 ; 2 Chron. xx. 27). Falsely, Hahn and others : after my work (min, as e.g.

Ps. lxxiii. 20), for thereby the causative connection is obliterated : min is the expression of the mediate cause, as the concluding sentence says : Joy was that which he had of all his work—this itself brought care and toil to him ; joy, made possible to him thereby, was the share which came to him from it.

Ver. 11. But was this  $\text{יָתֵרֹן אֶת־הַקֶּלֶקֶל}$ —was this gain that fell to him a true, satisfying, pure gain ? With the words uphanithi ani (vid. p. 198) he proposes this question, and answers it.  $\text{פָּנִיָה}$  (to turn to) is elsewhere followed by expressions of motion to an end ; here, as at Job vi. 28, by  $\text{פָּנִיָה}$ , by virtue of a constructio praeagnans : I turned myself, fixing my attention on all my works which my hands accomplished. La'asoth is, as at Gen. ii. 3 (vid. l.c.), equivalent to perficiendo, carrying out, viz. such works of art and of all his labour. The exclamation “ behold ” introduces the summa summarum. Regarding  $\text{יָתֵרֹן}$ , vid. i. 3. Also this way of finding out that which was truly good showed itself to be false. Of all this enjoyment, there remained nothing but the feeling of emptiness. What he strove after appeared to him as the wind ; the satisfaction he sought to obtain at such an expense was nothing else than a momentary delusion. And since in this search after the true happiness of life he was in a position more favourable for such a purpose than almost any other man, he is constrained to draw the conclusion that there is no  $\text{יָתֵרֹן}$ , i.e. no real enduring and true happiness, from all labour under the sun.

The End of the Wise Man the same as that of the Fool, ii. 12–17.

After Koheleth has shown, i. 12 ff., that the striving after wisdom does not satisfy, inasmuch as, far from making men happy, its possession only increases their inward conflicts, he proposes to himself the question, whether or not there is a difference between wisdom and folly, whether the former does not far excel the latter. He proceeds to consider this question, for it is more appropriate to him, the old much-experienced king, than to others.

Ver. 12. “ And I turned myself to examine wisdom, and madness, and folly : for what is the man who could come after the king, him whom they have made so long ago ! ” Mendelssohn’s translation, 12a : “ I abandoned my design of seeking to connect wisdom with folly and madness, ” is impossible, because for such a rendering we should have had at least  $\text{לִקְרֹאתָו בְּלִי אִוֶּת}$  instead of  $\text{לִקְרֹאתָו}$ . Hitzig, otherwise followed by Stuart : “ I turned myself to examine me wisdom, and, lo, it was madness as well as folly. ” This rendering is impossible also, for in such a case  $\text{וַיִּהְיֶה}$  ought to have stood as the result, after חכמה. The passage, Zech. xiv. 6, cited by Hitz., does not prove the possibility of such a brachyology, for there we read not v'qaroth v'geppayon, but 'qaroth iq'ppa'ün (the splendid ones, i.e. the stars, will draw themselves together, i.e. will become dark bodies). The two vavs are not correlative, which is without example in the usage of this book, but copulative: he wishes to contemplate (Zöckler and others) wisdom on the one side, and madness and folly on the other, in their relation to each other, viz. in their relative worth. Hitzig's ingenuity goes yet further astray in 12*b*: "For what will the man do who comes after the king? (He shall do) what was long ago his (own) doing, i.e. inheriting from the king the throne, he will not also inherit his wisdom." Instead of äsühü, he reads äsöhü, after Ex. xviii. 18; but the more modern author, whose work we have here before us, would, instead of this anomalous form, use the regular form יִרְשֶׁהוּ; but, besides, the expression ēth asher-k'var 'asotho, "(he will do) what long ago was his doing," is not Heb.; the words ought to have been k'asotho k'var khih 'isah, or at least 'asähü. If we compare 12*b* with 18*b*, the man who comes after the king appears certainly to be his successor.<sup>1</sup> But by this supposition it is impossible to give just effect to the relation (assigning a reason or motive) of 12*b* to 12*a* expressed by וְ. When I considered, Knobel regards Koheleth as saying, that a fool would be heir to me a wise man, it appeared strange to me, and I was led to compare wisdom and folly to see whether or not the wise man has a superiority to the fool, or whether his labour and his fate are vanity, like those of the fool. This is in point of style absurd, but it is much more absurd logically. And who then gave the interpreter the right to stamp as a fool the man who comes after the king? In the answer: "That which has long ago been done," must lie its justification; for this that was done long ago naturally consists, as Zöckler remarks, in foolish and perverse undertakings, certainly in the destruction of that which was done by the wise predecessor, in the lavish squandering of the treasures and goods collected by him. More briefly, but in the same sense, Burger: Nihil quod a solita hominum agendi ratione recedit. But in ver. 19, Koheleth places it as a question whether his successor will be a wise man or a fool, while here he would presuppose that "naturally," or as a matter of course, he will be a fool. In the matter of style, we have nothing to object to the translation on which Zöckler, with Ramb., Rosenm., Knobel, Hengst.,

and others, proceeds; the supplying of the verb עָשָׂה to meh hāādām [= what can the man do?] is possible (cf. Mal. ii. 15), and the neut. interpret. of the suffix of עָשָׂהוּ is, after vii. 13, Amos i. 3, Job xxxi. 11, admissible; but the reference to a successor is not connected with the course of the thoughts, even although one attaches to the plain words a meaning which is foreign to them. The words עָשָׂהוּ . . . אִתּוֹ are accordingly not the answer to the question proposed, but a component part of the question itself. Thus Ewald, and with him Elster, Heiligst., construes: "How will the man be who will follow the king, compared with him whom they made (a king) long ago, i.e. with his predecessor?" But אִתּוֹ, in this pregnant sense, "compared with," is without example, at least in the Book of Koheleth, which generally does not use it as a prep.; and, besides, this rendering, by introducing the successor on the throne, offends against the logic of the relation of 12*b* to 12*a*. The motive of Koheleth's purpose, to weigh wisdom and folly against each other as to their worth, consists in this, that a king, especially such an one as Solomon was, has in the means at his disposal and in the extent of his observation so much more than every other, that no one who comes after him will reach a different experience. This motive would be satisfactorily expressed on the supposition that the answer begins with אִתּוֹ, if one should read עָשָׂהוּ for עָשָׂהוּ: he will be able to do (accomplish) nothing but what he (the king) has long ago done, i.e. he will only repeat, only be able to confirm, the king's report. But if we take the text as it here stands, the meaning is the same; and, besides, we get rid of the harsh ellipsis meh hāādām for meh yātsēh hāādām. We translate: for what is the man who might come after the king, him whom they have made so long ago! The king whom they made so long ago is Solomon, who has a richer experience, a more comprehensive knowledge, the longer the time (viz. from the present time backwards) since he occupied the throne. Regarding the expression eth asher = quem, instead of the asher simply, vid. Köhler under Zech. xii. 10. עָשָׂהוּ, with the most general subj., is not different from עָשָׂהוּ, which, particularly in the Book of Daniel (e.g. iv. 28 f.), has frequently an active construction, with the subject unnamed, instead of the passive (Ges. § 137, margin). The author of the Book of Koheleth, alienated from the theocratic side of the kingdom of Israel, makes use of it perhaps not unintentionally; besides, Solomon's elevation to the throne was, according to 1 Kings i., brought about very much by human agency; and one may, if he will, think of the people in the word 'asuhu also, according to 1 Kings i. 39, who at last decided the matter. Meh before the letters hhelk and ayin commonly occurs: according to the Masora, twenty-four times; before other initial letters than these, eight times, and three of these in the Book of Koheleth before the letter he, ii. 12, 22, vii. 10. The words are more an exclamation than a question; the exclamation means: What kind of a man is that who could come after the king! cf. "What wickedness is this!" etc., Judg. xx. 12, Josh. xxii. 16, Ex. xviii. 14, 1 Kings ix. 13, i.e. as standing behind with reference to me—the same figure of extenuatio, as mah adam, Ps. cxliv. 3; cf. viii. 5.

There now follows an account of what, on the one side, happened to him thus placed on a lofty watch-tower, such as no other occupied.

Vv. 13, 14a. "And I saw that wisdom has the advantage over folly, as light has the advantage over darkness. The wise man has eyes in his head; but the fool walketh in darkness." In the sacred Scriptures, "light" is generally the symbol of grace, Ps. xliii. 3, but also the contrast of an intellectually and morally darkened state, Isa. li. 4. To know a thing is equivalent to having light on it, and seeing it in its true light (Ps. xxxvi. 10); wisdom is thus compared to light; folly is once, Job xxxviii. 19, directly called "darkness." Thus wisdom stands so much higher than folly, as light stands above darkness. יִתְרֹן, which hitherto denoted actual result, enduring gain, signifies here preference (vid. p. 192); along with פִּיתְרֹן<sup>1</sup> there is also found the form בִּיתְרֹן<sup>2</sup> (vid. Prov. xxx. 17). The fool walks in darkness: he is blind although he has eyes (Isa. xliii. 8), and thus has as good as none,—he wants the spiritual eye of understanding (x. 3); the wise man, on the other hand, his eyes are in his head, or, as we also say: he has eyes in his head,—eyes truly seeing, looking at and examining persons and things. That is the one side of the relation of wisdom to folly as put to the test.

The other side of the relation is the sameness of the result in which the elevation of wisdom above folly terminates.

Vv. 14b, 15. "And I myself perceived that one experience happeneth to them all. And I said in my heart, As it will happen to the fool, it will happen also to me; and why have I then been specially wise? Thus I spake then in my heart, that this also is vain." Zöckler gives to ׀ an adversative sense; but this gam (= ὁμοως, similiter) stands always at the beginning of the clause, Ewald, § 354a. Gam-ani corresponds to the Lat. ego idem, which gives two predicates to one subject; while et ipse predicates the same of the one of two subjects as it does of the other (Zumpt, § 697). The second gam-

ani serves for the giving of prominence to the object, and here precedes, after the manner of a substantival clause (cf. Isa. xlv. 12; Ezek. xxxiii. 17; 2 Chron. xxviii. 10), as at Gen. xxiv. 27; cf. Gesen. § 121. 3. Migrēh (from קרה, to happen, to befall) is quiquid alicui accidit (in the later philosoph. terminol. accidens; Venet. συμβεβηκός); but here, as the connection shows, that which finally puts an end to life, the final event of death. By the word רי the author expresses what he had observed on reflection; by בל . . . אט, what he said inwardly to himself regarding it; and by רב בל, what sentence he passed thereon with himself. Lammah asks for the design, as maddu'a for the reason. אן is either understood temporally: then when it is finally not better with me than with the fool (Hitz. from the standpoint of the dying hour), or logically: if yet one and the same event happeneth to the wise man and to the fool (Elst.); in the consciousness of the author both are taken together. The ה of the conclusion refers, not, as at i. 17, to the endeavouring after and the possession of wisdom, but to this final result making no difference between wise men and fools. This fate, happening to all alike, is הכל, a vanity rendering all vain, a nullity levelling down all to nothing, something full of contradictions, irrational. Paul also (Rom. viii. 20) speaks of this destruction, which at last comes upon all, as a ματαιότης.

The author now assigns the reason for this discouraging result.

Ver. 16. "For no remembrance of the wise, as of the fool, remains for ever; since in the days that are to come they are all forgotten. And how dieth the wise man? as the fool!" As in i. 11, so here זכרון is the principal form, not different from זכרון. Having no remembrance for ever, is equivalent to having no eternal endurance, having simply no onward existence (ix. 6). עם is both times the comparat. combin., as at vii. 11; Job ix. 26, xxxvii. 18; cf. יחר, Ps. xlix. 11. There are, indeed, individual historically great men, the memory of whom is perpetuated from generation to generation in words and in monuments; but these are exceptions, which do not always show that posterity is able to distinguish between wise men and fools. As a rule, men have a long appreciating recollection of the wise as little as they have of the fools, for long ago (vid. b'shekvar, p. 196) in the coming days (הי ה, accus. of the time, like the ellipt. רב, Isa. xxvii. 6) all are forgotten; הבל is, as at Ps. xiv. 3, meant personally: the one as the other; and נשכח is rendered by the Masora, like ix. 6, בן אב, as the pausal form of the finite; but is perhaps thought of as part., denoting that which only in the coming days will become too soon a completed fact, since those who survive go from the burial of the one, as well as from that of the other, to the ordinary duties of the day. Death thus sinks the wise man, as it does the fool, in eternal oblivion; it comes to both, and brings the same to both, which extorted from the author the cry: How dieth the wise man? as the fool! Why is the fate which awaits both thus the same! This is the pointed, sarcastic חַיִּים (how!) of the satirical Mashal, e.g. Isa. xiv. 4, Ezek. xxvi. 17; and מוֹתוֹ is = moriendum est, as at 2 Sam. iii. 3, moriendum erat. Rambach well: חַיִּים est h. l. particula admirationis super rei indignitate.

What happened to the author from this sorrowful discovery he now states.

Ver. 17. "Then life became hateful to me; for the work which man accomplishes under the sun was grievous to me: because all is vain and windy effort." He hated life; and the labour which is done under the sun, i.e. the efforts of men, including the fate that befalls men, appeared to him to be evil (repugnant). The LXX. translate: πονηρὸν ἐπ' ἐμέ; the Venet.: κακὸν ἐπ' ἐμοί; and thus Hitzig: as a woful burden lying on me. But עָלַי is to be understood after tov al, Esth. iii. 9, etc., cf. Ps. xvi. 6, and as synon. with עָלַי or עָלַי (cf. Dan. iii. 32), according to which Symmachus: κακὸν γάρ μοι ἐφάνη. This al belongs to the more modern usus loq., cf. Ewald, § 217*i*. The end of the song was also again the grievous ceterum censeo: Vanity, and a labour which has wind as its goal, wind as its fruit.

The Vanity of Wealth gathered with Care and Privation, ii. 18-23.

In view of death, which snatches away the wise man equally with the fool, and of the night of death, which comes to the one as to the other, deep dejection came upon him from another side.

Ver. 18. "And I hated all my labour with which I laboured under the sun, that I should leave it to the man who shall be after me;" i.e. not: who shall come into existence after me, but: who shall occupy my place after me. The fiction discovers itself here in the expression: "The king," who would not thus express himself indefinitely and unsympathetically regarding his son and successor on the throne, is stripped of his historical individuality. The first and third ו are relat. pron. (quem, after the schema etymologicum מִי מִי, ver. 11, ix. 9, and qui), the second is relat. conj. (eo quod). The suffix of מִי מִי refers to the labour in the sense of that which is obtained by wearisome labour, accomplished or collected with labour; cf. בֵּרֶה, product, fruit, Gen. iv. 12; עֲבוּרָה, effect, Isa. xxxii. 17.

How this man will be circumstanced who will have at his disposal that for which he has not laboured, is uncertain.

Ver. 19. "And who knoweth whether he shall be wise or foolish? and he will have power over all my labour with which I had wearied myself, and had acted wisely, under the sun: this also is vain." אִי . . . הִי, instead of אִם . . . הִי, in the double question, as at Job xvi. 3. What kind of a man he will be no one can previously know, and yet this person will have free control (cf. שָׁלַט, p. 196) over all the labour that the testator has wisely gained by labour—a hendiadys, for הִקָּבֵם with the obj. accus. is only in such a connection possible: "my labour which I, acting wisely, gained by labour."

In view of this doubtful future of that which was with pains and wisely gained by him, his spirit sank within him.

Ver. 20. "Then I turned to give up my heart on account of [= to despair of] all the labour with which I wearied myself under the sun." As at 1 Sam. xxii. 17 f., Song ii. 17, Jer. xli. 14, סָבַב has here the intrans. meaning, to turn about (LXX. ἐπέστρεψα = ἐπέστρεψάμην). Hitzig remarks that פָּנָה and שָׁב signify, "to turn round in order to see," and סָבַב, on the contrary, "to turn round in order to do." But פָּנָה can also mean, "to turn round in order to do," e.g. Lev. xxvi. 9; and סָבַב, "to turn in order to examine more narrowly," vii. 25. The distinction lies in this, that פָּנָה signifies a clear turning round; סָבַב, a turning away from one thing to another, a turning in the direction of something new that presents itself (iv. 1, 7, ix. 11). The phrase, יָאֵשׁ אֶת־לִבִּי,<sup>1</sup> closely corresponds to the Lat. despondet animum, he gives up his spirits, lets them sink, i.e. he despairs. The old language knows only נָוֵשׂ, to give oneself up, i.e. to give up hope in regard to anything; and שָׁוֵשׂ, given up, having no prospect, in despair. The Talm., however, uses along with nithyālesh (vid. p. 192) not only noāsh, but also יָאֵשׁ, in the sense of despair, or the giving up of all hope (subst. יָאֵשׁ), Mezta 21b, from which it is at once evident that יָאֵשׁ is not to be thought of as causative (like the Arab. ajjasa and aiasa), but as simply transitive, with which, after the passage before us, לִבִּי is to be thought of as connected. He turned round to give up all heart. He had no more any heart to labour.

Ver. 21. "For there is a man who labours with wisdom, and knowledge, and ability; and to a man who has not laboured for it, must he leave it as his portion: also that is vain, and a great evil." Ewald renders: whose labour aims after wisdom. But בְּהָ' וְנִי do not denote obj. (for the obj. of עֵמֶל is certainly the portion which is to be inherited), but are particular designations of the way and manner of the labour. Instead of עֵמֶל, there is used the more emphatic form of the noun: שָׁעָמַל, who had his labour, and performed it; 1 Sam. vii. 17, cf. Jer. ix. 5 [6], "Thine habitation is in the midst of deceit," and Hitz. under Job ix. 27. Kishron is not ἀνδρεία (LXX.), manliness, moral energy (Elster), but aptness, ability, and (as a consequence connecting itself therewith) success, good fortune, thus skilfulness conducting to the end (vid. p. 193). בֹּא refers to the object, and יִהְיֶה to the result of the work; חֶלְקִי is the second obj.-accus., or, as we rather say, pred.-accus.: as his portion, viz. inheritance.

That what one has gained by skill and good fortune thus falls to the lot of another who perhaps recklessly squanders it, is an evil all the greater in proportion to the labour and care bestowed on its acquisition.

Vv. 22, 23. "For what has man of all his labour, and the endeavours of his heart with which he wearies himself under the sun? All his days are certainly in sorrows, and his activity in grief; his heart resteth not even in the night: also this is vain." The question literally is: What is (comes forth, results) to a man from all his labour; for "to become, to be, to fall to, happen to," is the fundamental idea of הוּהוּ (whence here הוּהוּ, γυμνόμενον, as at Neh. vi. 6, γυμνησόμενος) or הוּהוּ, the root signification of which is deorsum ferri, cadere, and then accidere, fieri, whence הוּהוּ, eagerness precipitating itself upon anything (vid. under Prov. x. 3), or object.: fall, catastrophe, destruction. Instead of שְׂהוּא, there is here to be written שְׂהוּא<sup>1</sup>, as at iii. 18 שְׂהוּא. The question looks forward to a negative answer. What comes out of his labour for man? Nothing comes of it, nothing but disagreeableness. This negative contained in the question is established by בִּי, 23a. The form of the clause, "all his days are sorrows," viz. as to their condition, follows the scheme, "the porch was 20 cubits," 2 Chron. iii. 4, viz. in measurement; or, "their feast is music and wine," Isa. v. 12, viz. in its combination (vid. Philippi's Stat. Const. p. 90 ff.). The parallel clause is וְכַעַס עֵינָיו, not וְכַעַס; for the final syllable, or that having the accent on the penult, immediately preceding the Athnach-word, takes Kametz, as

c.g. Lev. xviii. 5 ; Prov. xxv. 3 ; Isa. lxxv. 17 (cf. Olsh. § 224, p. 440).<sup>1</sup> Many interpreters falsely explain: at acritudo est velut quotidiana occupatio ejus. For the sake of the parallelism, ענינו (from ענה, to weary oneself with labour, or also to strive, aim; vid. Psalmen, ii. 390) is subj. not pred.: his endeavour is grief, i.e. brings only grief or vexation with it. Even in the night he has no rest; for even then, though he is not labouring, yet he is inwardly engaged about his labour and his plans. And this possession, acquired with such labour and restlessness, he must leave to others; for equally with the fool he falls under the stroke of death: he himself has no enjoyment, others have it; dying, he must leave all behind him,—a threefold הבל, vv. 17, 21, 23, and thus הבל הבלים.

Is it not then foolish thus restlessly and with so much self-torment to labour for nothing? In view of the night of darkness which awaits man, and the uncertain destiny of our possessions, it is better to make use of the present in a way as pleasant to ourselves as possible.

Ver. 24. "There is nothing better among men, than that one eat and drink, and that he should pamper his soul by his labour: this also have I seen, that it is in the hand of God." The LXX., as well as the other Greek transl., and Jerome, had before them the words באדם שיאכל. The former translates: "Man has not the good which he shall eat and drink," i.e. also this that he eats . . . is for him no true good; but the direct contrary of this is what Koheleth says. Jerome seeks to bring the thought which the text presents into the right track, by using the form of a question: nonne melius est comedere . . .; against this iii. 12, 22, viii. 15, are not to be cited where אין טוב stands in the dependent sentence; the thought is not thus to be improved; its form is not this, for טוב, beginning a sentence, is never interrog., but affirm.; thus אין טוב is not = הלא טוב, but is a negative statement. It is above all doubt, that instead of באדם שי' we must read באדם כשי', after iii. 12, 22, viii. 15; for, as at Job xxxiii. 17, the initial letter mem after the terminal mem has dropped out. Codd. of the LXX. have accordingly corrected δ into πλεον δ or εἰ μὴ δ (thus the Compl. Ald.), and the Syr. and Targ. render ש here by אלא and אלקון [unless that he eat];

Jerome also has non est bonum homini nisi quod in his Comm.; only the Venet. seeks to accommodate itself to the traditional text. Besides, only ב is to be inserted, not כ אם; for the phrase כ אם לְאֵלֶיךָ is used, but not ש אם כִּי. Instead of bāādām, the form lāādām would be more agreeable, as at vi. 12, viii. 15. Hitzig remarks, without proof, that bāādām is in accordance with later grammatical forms, which admit ב = "for" before the object. ב, x. 17, is neither prep. of the object, nor is év, Sir. iii. 7, the exponent of the dative (vid. Grimm). Bāādām signifies, as at 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, and as év avθ., Sir. xi. 14, inter homines; also iii. 12 designates by בָּאֵם טוֹב what among them (men) has to be regarded as good. It is interesting to see how here the ancient and the modern forms of the language run together, without the former wholly passing over into the latter; 'מִשִׁי, quam ut edat, is followed by norm. perfects, in accordance with that comprehensive peculiarity of the old syntax which Ewald, by an excellent figure, calls the dissolution of that which is coloured into grey. טוֹב . . . הָרַ is equivalent to לֹ הָי, Ps. xlix. 19, the causative rendering of the phrase רָאָה טוֹב, iii. 13, or טוֹבָה רַ, v. 17, vi. 6. It is well to attend to בְּעֵמְלֹ [by his labour], which forms an essential component part of that which is approved of as good. Not a useless sluggard-life, but a life which connects together enjoyment and labour, is that which Koheleth thinks the best in the world. But this enjoyment, lightening, embellishing, seasoning labour, has also its But: etiam hoc vidi e manu Dei esse (pendere). The order of the words harmonizes with this Lat.; it follows the scheme referred to at Gen. i 4; cf. on the contrary, iii. 6. Instead of בְּמִנְיָה, neut. by attraction, there is here the immediately neut. בְּמִנְיָה; the book uniformly makes use of this fem. form instead of זֹמַת (vid. p. 198). This or that is "in the hand of God," i.e. it is His gift, iii. 13, v. 18, and it is thus conditioned by Him, since man cannot give it to himself; cf. minni, Isa. xxx. 1; mimmēnni, Hos. viii. 4; mimmēnnu, 1 Kings xx. 33.

This dependence of the enjoyment of life on God is established.

Ver. 25. "For who can eat, and who can have enjoyment, without [= except from] Him?" Also here the traditional text is untenable: we have to read הוּן כִּטְנו, after the LXX. (which Jerome follows in his Comm.) and the Syr. If we adopt the text as it lies before us, then the meaning would be, as given by Gumpel,<sup>1</sup> and thus translated by Jerome: Quis ita devorabit et deliciis effluet ut ego? But (1) the question thus understood would require יִוְתַר כִּפְנֵי, which Gumpel and others silently substitute in place of הוּן כִּ;

(2) this question, in which the king adjudicates to himself an unparalleled right to eat and to enjoy himself, would stand out of connection with that which precedes and follows. Even though with Ginsburg, after Rashi, Aben Ezra, and Rashbam, we find in ver. 25 the thought that the labourer has the first and nearest title to the enjoyment of the fruit of his labour (חַי חַיָּן thus exemplif. as iv. 8, ע' . . . לְמִי), the continuation with חַי, ver. 26, is unsuitable; for the natural sequence of the thoughts would then be this: But the enjoyment, far from being connected with the labour as its self-consequence and fruit, is a gift of God, which He gives to one and withholds from another. If we read חַיָּן, then the sequence of the thoughts wants nothing in syllogistic exactness. חַיָּן here has nothing in common with חַיָּן = حاس, to proceed with a violent, impetuous motion, but, as at Job xx. 2, is = حَسَّ, stringere (whence hiss, a sensible impression); the experience (vid. p. 191) here meant is one mediated by means of a pleasant external enjoyment. The LXX., Theod., and Syr. translate: (and who can) drink, which Ewald approves of, for he compares (Arab.) hasa (inf. hasy), to drink, to sip. But this Arab. verb is unheard of in Heb.; with right, Heiligst. adheres to the Arab., and at the same time the modern Heb. hass, חַיָּן, sentire, according to which Schultens, quis sensibus indulserit. חַיָּן חַיָּן is not = חַיָּן, "except from him" (Hitz., Zöckl.), but חַיָּן חַיָּן together mean "except;" cf. e.g. the Mishnic חַיָּן לְזִמְנָה חַיָּן לְמִי, beyond the time and place suitable for the thank-offering, חַיָּן מֵאֲחֵר מֵהֵם, excepting one of the same, Menachoth vii. 3, for which the old Heb. would in the first case use בְּלֹא, and in the second וְזִלְתָּ חַיָּן (= Aram. חַיָּן) (vid. p. 191). Accordingly חַיָּן חַיָּן means praeter eum (Deum), i.e. unless he will it and make it possible, Old Heb. חַיָּן, Gen. xli. 44.

In enjoyment man is not free, it depends not on his own will: labour and the enjoyment of it do not stand in a necessary connection; but enjoyment is a gift which God imparts, according as He regards man as good, or as a sinner.

Ver. 26. "For to a man who appears to Him as good, He gave wisdom, and knowledge, and joy; but to the sinner He gave the work of gathering and heaping up, in order to give it to him who appears to Him as good: this also is vain, and grasping after the wind;" viz. this striving after enjoyment in and of the labour—it is "vain," for the purpose and the issue lie far apart; and "striving after the wind," because that which is striven for, when one thinks that he has it, only too often cannot be grasped, but vanishes into nothing. If we refer this sentence to a collecting and heaping up (Hengst., Grätz, and others), then the author would here come back to what has already been said, and that too in the foregoing section; the reference also to the arbitrary distribution of the good things of life on the part of God (Knobel) is inadmissible, because "this, although it might be called הַבֵּל, could not also be called רֵעוּת רַח" (Hitz.); and perfectly inadmissible the reference to the gifts of wisdom, knowledge, and joy (Bullock), for referred to these the sentence gains a meaning only by introducing all kinds of things into the text which here lie out of the connection. Besides, what is here said has indeed a deterministic character, and לַפְנָי, especially if it is thought of in connection with לֶחָ,<sup>1</sup> sounds as if to the good and the bad their objective worth and distinction should be adjudicated; but this is not the meaning of the author; the unreasonable thought that good or bad is what God's arbitrary ordinance and judgment stamp it to be, is wholly foreign to him. The "good before Him" is he who appears as good before God, and thus pleases Him, because he is truly good; and the חַוִּיתָא, placed in contrast, as at vii. 26, is the sinner, not merely such before God, but really such; here לַפְנָי has a different signification than when joined with טוֹב: one who sins in the sight of God, i.e. without regarding Him (Luke xv. 18, ἐνώπιον), serves sin. Regarding עָנָן, vid. under 23a: it denotes a business, negotium; but here such as one fatigues himself with, quod negotium facessit. Among the three charismata, joy stands last, because it is the turning-point of the series of thoughts: joy connected with wise, intelligent activity, is, like wisdom and intelligence themselves, a gift of God. The obj. of לָחֵת (that He may give it) is the store gathered together by the sinner; the thought is the same as that at Prov. xiii. 22, xxviii. 8, Job xxvii. 16 f. The perfect we have so translated, for that which is constantly repeating itself is here designated by the general expression of a thing thus once for all ordained, and thus always continued.

The Short-sightedness and Impotence of Man over against God the All-conditioning, iii. 1-15.

As pure enjoyment stands not in the power of man, much rather is a gift of God which He bestows or denies to man according to His own will, so in general all happens when and how God wills, according to a world-plan, comprehending all things which man can neither wholly understand, nor in any respect change,—feeling himself in all things dependent on God, he ought to learn to fear Him.

All that is done here below is ordered by God at a time appointed, and is done without any dependence on man's approbation, according to God's ordinance, arrangement, and providence.

iii. 1. "Everything has its time, and every purpose under the heavens its hour." The Germ. language is poor in synonyms of time. Zöckler translates: Everything has its Frist . . ., but by Frist we think only of a fixed term of duration, not of a period of beginning, which, though not exclusively, is yet here primarily meant; we have therefore adopted Luther's excellent translation. Certainly זמן (from זמן, cogn. זמן, signare), belonging to the more modern Heb. (vid. p. 191), means a Frist (e.g. Dan. ii. 16) as well as a Zeitpunkt, point of time; in the Semit. (also Assyr. simmu, simanu, with ס) it is the most common designation of the idea of time. עת is abbreviated either from עֲדַת (עַד, to determine) or from עֲנַת (from עָנָה, cogn. אָנָה, to go towards, to meet). In the first case it stands connected with כּוֹמֵר on the one side, and with עָרַן (from עָרַר, to count) on the other; in the latter case, with עוֹנֵה, Ex. xxi. 10 (perhaps also עַן and עֲנַת in כְּעֵן, כְּעֵנָה). It is difficult to decide this point; proportionally more, however, can be said for the original עֲנַת (Palest.-Aram. עֲנַתָּא), as also the prep. of participation אֵת is derived from אָנַת<sup>1</sup> (meeting, coming together). The author means to say, if we have regard to the root signification of the second conception of time—(1) that everything has its fore-determined time, in which there lies both a determined point of time when it happens, and a determined period of time during which it shall continue; and (2) that every matter has a time appointed for it, or one appropriate, suitable for it. The Greeks were guided by the right feeling when they rendered זמן by χρόνος, and עת by καιρός. Olympiodorus distinguishes too sharply when he understands the former of duration of time, and the latter of a point of time; while the state of the matter is this, that by χρόνος the idea comprehends the termini a quo and ad quem, while by καιρός it is limited to the terminus a quo. Regarding עָנַת, which proceeds from the ground-idea of being inclined to, and intention, and thus, like πρῶγμα and χρῆμα, to the general signification of design, undertaking, res gesta, res, vid. p. 192.

The illustration commences with the beginning and the ending of the life of man and (in near-lying connection of thought) of plants.

Ver. 2.<sup>1</sup> "To be born has its time, and to die has its time; to plant has its time, and to root up that which is planted has its time." The inf. לָרִית signifies nothing else than to bring forth; but when that which is brought forth comes more into view than she who brings forth, it is used in the sense of being born (cf. Jer. xxv. 34, לֵבָיִם = לְהַפְרִיחַ); ledah, Hos. ix. 11, is the birth; and in the Assy., li-id-tu, li-i-tu, li-da-a-tu, designates posterity, progenies. Since now lālēdēth has here lāmuth as contrast, and thus does not denote the birth-throes of the mother, but the child's beginning of life, the translation, "to be born has its time," is more appropriate to what is designed than "to bring forth has its time." What Zöckler, after Hitzig, objects that by ledēth a הַפְּצָה [an undertaking], and thus a conscious, intended act must be named, is not applicable; for לָבֵל standing at the beginning comprehends doing and suffering, and death also (apart from suicide) is certainly not an intended act, frequently even an unconscious suffering. Instead of לָטַעַת (for which the form לָפַעַת<sup>2</sup> is found, cf. לְמוֹת, Ps. lxxvi. 9), the older language uses לִנְטַעַת, Jer. i. 10. In still more modern Heb. the expression used would be לִיטַעַת, i.e. לָטַעַת (Shebith ii. 1). עָקַר has here its nearest signification: to root up (denom. of עָקַר, root), like עָקַר, 2 Kings iii. 25, where it is the Targ. word for הַפִּיל (to fell trees).

From out-rooting, which puts an end to the life of plants, the transition is now made to putting to death.

Ver. 3. "To put to death has its time, and to heal has its time; to pull down has its time, and to build has its time." That harog (to kill) is placed over against "to heal," Hitzig explains by the remark that harog does not here include the full consequences of the act, and is fitly rendered by "to wound." But "to put to death" is nowhere = "nearly to put to death,"—one who is harog

<sup>1</sup> These seven verses, 2–8, are in Codd and Edd., like Josh. xii. 9 ff., and Esth. ix. 7 ff., arranged in the form of a song, so that one עָרָה (time) always stands under another, after the scheme described in Megilla 16b, Massechet Sofrim xiii. 3, but without any express reference to this passage in Koheleth. J has a different manner of arranging the words, the first four lines of which we here adduce [read from right to left]:—

|      |                              |                      |
|------|------------------------------|----------------------|
| 'ēth | lāmoth v'eth          | lālēdēth 'eth |
| 'ēth | nathu'ā lā'āqor v'eth | lathā'āth     |
| 'ēth | lirpō v'eth           | lāhārog       |
| 'ēth | livnoth v'eth         | liphrots      |

is not otherwise to be healed than by resurrection from the dead, Ezek. xxxvii. 6. The contrast has no need for such ingenuity to justify it. The striking down of a sound life stands in contrast to the salvation of an endangered life by healing, and this in many situations of life, particularly in war, in the administration of justice, and in the defence of innocence against murder or injury, may be fitting. Since the author does not present these details from a moral point of view, the time here is not that which is morally right, but that which, be it morally right or not, has been determined by God, the Governor of the world and Former of history, who makes even that which is evil subservient to His plan. With the two pairs of γένεσις καὶ φθορά there are two others associated in ver. 3; with that, having reference, 2*b*, to the vegetable world, there here corresponds one referring to buildings; to פִּירוֹן (synon. הָרוּס, Jer. i. 10) stands opposed בְּנוֹת (which is more than פִּירוֹן), as at 2 Chron. xxxii. 5.

These contrasts between existence and non-existence are followed by contrasts within the limits of existence itself:—

Ver. 4. "To weep has its time, and to laugh has its time; to mourn has its time, and to dance has its time." It is possible that the author was led by the consonance from livnoth to livkoth, which immediately follows it; but the sequence of the thoughts is at the same time inwardly mediated, for sorrow kills and joy enlivens, Sir. xxxii. 21–24. סִפּוּר is particularly lamentation for the dead, Zech. xii. 10; and רִקְדָּה, dancing (in the more modern language the usual word for hholel, kirkār, hhägäg) at a marriage festival and on other festal occasions.

It is more difficult to say what leads the author to the two following pairs of contrasts:—

Ver. 5. "To throw stones has its time, and to gather together stones has its time; to embrace has its time, and to refrain from embracing has its time." Did the old Jewish custom exist at the time of the author, of throwing three shovelfuls of earth into the grave, and did this lead him to use the phrase 'הִשָּׂא אֶבְנֵי? But we do not need so incidental a connection of the thought, for the first pair accords with the specific idea of life and death; by the throwing of stones a field is destroyed, 2 Kings iii. 35, or as expressed at ver. 19, is marred; and by gathering the stones together and removing them (which is called סָקַל), it is brought under cultivation. Does 'הִשָּׂא, to embrace, now follow because it is done with the arms and hands? Scarcely; but the loving action of embracing stands beside the hostile, purposely injurious throwing of stones into a field, not exclusively (2 Kings iv. 16), but yet chiefly (as e.g. at Prov. v. 20) as referring to love for women; the intensive in the second member is introduced perhaps only for the purpose of avoiding the paronomasia lirrhog mahharog.

The following pair of contrasts is connected with the avoiding or refraining from the embrace of love:—

Ver. 6. "To seek has its time, and to lose has its time; to lay up has its time, and to throw away has its time." Vaihinger and others translate  $\text{לִּמְצוֹת}$ , to give up as lost, which the Pih. signifies first as the expression of a conscious act. The older language knows it only in the stronger sense of bringing to ruin, making to perish, wasting (Prov. xxix. 3). But in the more modern language,  $\text{אָבַד}$ , like the Lat. perdere, in the sense of "to lose," is the trans. to the intrans.  $\text{אָבַד}$ , e.g. Tahoroth viii. 3, "if one loses ( $\text{הִתְאַבַּד}$ ) anything," etc.; Sifri, at Deut. xxiv. 19, "he who has lost ( $\text{אָבַד$ ) a shekel," etc. In this sense the Palest.-Aram. uses the Aphel  $\text{אָבַד$ , e.g. Jer. Mezta ii. 5, "the queen had lost ( $\text{אָבַדָה$ ) her ornament." The intentional giving up, throwing away from oneself, finds its expression in  $\text{לְהִשָּׁרֵק}$ .

The following pair of contrasts refers the abandoning and preserving to articles of clothing:—

Ver. 7a. "To rend has its time, and to sew has its time." When evil tidings come, when the tidings of death come, then is the time for rending the garments (2 Sam. xiii. 31), whether as a spontaneous outbreak of sorrow, or merely as a traditionary custom.—The tempest of the affections, however, passes by, and that which was torn is again sewed together.

Perhaps it is the recollection of great calamities which leads to the following contrasts:—

Ver. 7b. "To keep silence has its time, and to speak has its time." Severe strokes of adversity turn the mind in quietness back upon itself; and the demeanour most befitting such adversity is silent resignation (cf 2 Kings ii. 3, 5). This mediation of the thought is so much the more probable, as in all these contrasts it is not so much the spontaneity of man that comes into view, as the pre-determination and providence of God.

The following contrasts proceed on the view that God has placed us in relations in which it is permitted to us to love, or in which our hatred is stirred up:—

Ver. 8. "To love has its time, and to hate has its time; war has its time, and peace has its time." In the two pairs of contrasts here, the contents of the first are, not exclusively indeed (Ps. cxx. 7), but yet chiefly referred to the mutual relations of peoples. It is the result of thoughtful intention that the quodlibet of  $2 \times 7$  pairs terminates this for and against in "peace;" and, besides, the author has made the termination emphatic by this, that here "instead of infinitives, he introduces proper nouns" (Hitz.).

Ver. 9. Since, then, everything has its time depending not on human influence, but on the determination and providence of God, the question arises: "What gain hath he that worketh in that where-with he wearieth himself?" It is the complaint of i. 3 which is here repeated. From all the labour there comes forth nothing which carries in it the security of its continuance; but in all he does man is conditioned by the change of times and circumstances and relations over which he has no control. And the converse of this his weakness is short-sightedness.

Vers. 10, 11. "I saw the travail, which God gave to the children of men to fatigue themselves with it—: He hath well arranged everything beautiful in its appointed time; He hath also put eternity in their heart, so that man cannot indeed wholly search through from beginning to end the work which God accomplisheth." As at i. 14, יִרְאֵהוּ is here seeing in the way of research, as elsewhere, e.g. at ii. 24, it is as the result of research. In ver. 10 the author says that he closely considered the labour of men, and in ver. 11 he states the result. It is impossible to render the word עֲנִין everywhere by the same German (or English) word: i. 13, wearisome trouble; ii. 26, business; here: Geschäftigkeit,—the idea is in all the three places the same, viz. an occupation which causes trouble, costs effort. What presented itself to the beholder was—(1) that He (viz. God, cf. ver. 10 and ver. 11) has made everything beautiful in its time. The author uses יָפֵה as synon. of טוֹב (v. 17); also in other languages the idea of the beautiful is gradually more and more generalized. The suffix in בְּעֵתוֹ does not refer to God, but to that which is in the time; this word is = ἐν καιρῷ ἰδὲν (Symm.), at its proper time (vid. Ps. i. 3, civ. 27; Jer. v. 24, etc.), since, as with יַחְדָּו (together with) and כֻּלּוֹ (every one), the suffix is no longer thought of as such. Like יָפֵה, בְּעֵתוֹ as pred. conception belongs to the verb: He has made everything beautiful; He has made everything (falling out) at its appointed time.—The beauty consists in this, that what is done is not done sooner or later than it ought to be, so as to connect itself as a constituent part to the whole of God's work. The pret. עָשָׂה is to be also interpreted as such: He "has made," viz. in His world-plan, all things beautiful, falling out at the appointed time; for that which acquires an actual form in the course of history has a previous ideal existence in the knowledge and will of God (vid. under Isa. xxii. 11, xxxvii. 26).

That which presented itself to the beholder was—(2) the fact that He (God) had put  $\text{לְעַלְמֵי־בְנֵי־אָדָם}$  in their hearts (i.e. the hearts of men). Gaab and Spohn interpret 'olam in the sense of the Arab. 'ilam, knowledge, understanding; and Hitz., pointing the word accordingly  $\text{לְעַלְמֵי}$ , translates: "He has also placed understanding in their heart, without which man," etc. The translation of  $\text{בְּלִי־אִשֶׁר}$  is not to be objected to; 'בְּלִי is, however, only seldom a conjunction, and is then to be translated by eo quod, Ex. xiv. 11, 2 Kings i. 3, 6, 16, which is not appropriate here; it will thus be here also a prep., and with asher following may mean "without which," as well as "without this, that" = "besides that" (Venet. ἀνευ τοῦ ὅτι, "except that"), as frequently  $\text{בְּלִי־אִשֶׁר}$ , e.g. at Amos ix. 8. But that Arab. 'ilam is quite foreign to the Heb., which has no word  $\text{לְעַלְמֵי}$  in the sense of "to rise up, to be visible, knowable," which is now also referred<sup>1</sup> to for the Assy. as the stem-word of  $\text{לְעַלְמֵי}$  = highland. It is true Hitzig believes that he has found the Heb.  $\text{לְעַלְמֵי}$  = wisdom, in Sir. vi. 21, where there is a play on the word with  $\text{נִגְעָלָם}$ , "concealed:" σοφία γὰρ κατὰ τὸ ὄνομα αὐτῆς ἐστὶ, καὶ οὐ πολλοῖς ἐστὶ φανερά. Drusius and Eichhorn have here already taken notice of the Arab. 'ilam; but Fritzsche with right asks, "Shall this word as Heb. be regarded as traceable only here and falsely pointed only at Eccles. iii. 11, and shall no trace of it whatever be found in the Chald., Syr., and Rabbin.?" We have also no need of it. That Ben-Sira has etymologically investigated the word  $\text{הַכְמָה}$  as going back to  $\text{חָכַם}$ , R.  $\text{חָכ}$ , "to be firm, shut up, dark" (vid. at Ps. x. 8), is certainly very improbable, but so much the more probable (as already suggested by Drusius) that he has introduced<sup>2</sup> into  $\text{הַכְמָה}$ , after the Aram.  $\text{כַּחֲמָה}$ , nigrescere, the idea of making dark. Does eth-ha'olam in this passage before us then mean "the world" (Jerome, Luther, Ewald), or "desire after the knowledge of the world" (Rashi), or "worldly-mindedness" (Gesen., Knobel)? The answer to this has been already given in my Psychol. p. 406 (2d ed.): "In post-bibl. Heb. 'olam denotes not only 'eternity' backwards and forwards as infinite duration, but also 'the world' as that which endures for ever (αἰών, seculum); the world in this latter sense is, however, not yet known<sup>1</sup> to the bibl. language, and we will thus not be able to interpret the words of Koheleth of the impulse of man to reflect on the whole world." In itself, the thought that God has placed the whole world in man's heart is not untrue: man is, indeed, a micro-cosmos, in which the macrocosmos mirrors itself (Elster), but the connection does not favour it; for the discussion does not proceed from this, that man is only a member in the great universe, and that God has given to each being its appointed place, but that in all his experience he is conditioned by time, and that in the course of history all that comes to him, according to God's world-plan, happens at its appointed time. But the idea by which that of time, עַתָּה (עֵת), is surpassed is not the world, but eternity, to which time is related as part is to the whole (Cicero, Inv. i. 26. 39, tempus est pars quaedam aeternitatis). The Mishna language contains, along with the meaning of world, also this older meaning of 'olam, and has formed from it an adv. עוֹלָמִית, acterne. The author means to say that God has not only assigned to each individually his appointed place in history, thereby bringing to the consciousness of man the fact of his being conditioned, but that He has also established in man an impulse leading him beyond that which is temporal toward the eternal: it lies in his nature not to be contented with the temporal, but to break through the limits which it draws around him, to escape from the bondage and the disquietude within which he is held, and amid the ceaseless changes of time to console himself by directing his thoughts to eternity.

<sup>1</sup> Vid. Fried. Delitzsch's Assyr. Stud. (1874), p. 39. Otherwise Fleischer, who connects 'alima, "to know," with 'alam, "to conceal," so that to know = to be concealed, sunk deep, initiated in something (with ba of the obj., as sh'ar, whence shá'ir, the poet as "one who marks").

This saying regarding the desiderium aeternitatis being planted in the heart of man, is one of the profoundest utterances of Koheleth. In fact, the impulse of man shows that his innermost wants cannot be satisfied by that which is temporal. He is a being limited by time, but as to his innermost nature he is related to eternity. That which is transient yields him no support, it carries him on like a rushing stream, and constrains him to save himself by laying hold on eternity. But it is not so much the practical as the intellectual side of this endowment and this peculiar dignity of human nature which Koheleth brings here to view.

It is not enough for man to know that everything that happens has its divinely-ordained time. There is an instinct peculiar to his nature impelling him to pass beyond this fragmentary knowledge and to comprehend eternity; but his effort is in vain, for (3) "man is unable to reach unto the work which God accomplisheth from the beginning to the end." The work of God is that which is completing itself in the history of the world, of which the life of individual men is a fragment. Of this work he says, that God has wrought it עָשָׂה; because, before it is wrought out in its separate "time," it is already completed in God's plan. Eternity and this work are related to each other as the accomplished and the being accomplished, they are interchangeably the πλήρωμα to each other. אֲנִי is potential, and the same in conception as at viii. 17, Job xi. 7, xxxvii. 23; a knowledge is meant which reaches to the object, and lays hold of it. A laying hold of this work is an impossibility, because eternity, as its name 'olam denotes, is the concealed, i.e. is both forwards and backwards immeasurable. The desiderium aeternitatis inherent in man thus remains under the sun unappeased. He would raise himself above the limits within which he is confined, and instead of being under the necessity of limiting his attention to isolated matters, gain a view of the whole of God's work which becomes manifest in time; but this all-embracing view is for him unattainable.

If Koheleth had known of a future life—which proves that as no instinct in the natural world is an illusion, so also the impulse toward the eternal, which is natural to man, is no illusion—he would have reached a better ultimatum than the following:—

Ver. 12. "Thus I then perceived that among them (men) there is nothing better than to enjoy themselves, and indulge themselves in their life." The resignation would acquire a reality if לָעַיִן טוֹב meant "to do good," i.e. right (LXX. Targ. Syr. Jer. Venet.); and this appears of necessity to be its meaning according to vii. 20. But, with right, Ginsburg remarks that nowhere else—neither at ii. 24, nor iii. 22, v. 17, viii. 15, ix. 7—is this moral rendering given to the ultimatum; also וְהָיָה טוֹב לָעַיִן טוֹב a eudemonistic sense. On the other hand, Zöckler is right in saying that for the meaning of עֲשֵׂת טוֹב, in the sense of "to be of good cheer" (Luth.), there is no example. Zirkel compares εὖ πράττειν, and regards it as a Graecism. But it either stands ellipt. for לָעַיִן לֹא טוֹב (= לְהִיטִיב לוֹ), or, with Grätz, we have to read לְרֵאוֹת טוֹב; in any case, an ethical signification is here excluded by the nearest connection, as well as by the parallels; it is not contrary to the view of Koheleth, but this is not the place to express it. Bam is to be understood after baadam, ii. 24. The plur., comprehending men, here, as at ver. 11, wholly passes over into the individualizing sing.

But this enjoyment of life also, Koheleth continues, this advisedly the best portion in the limited and restrained condition of man, is placed beyond his control:—

Ver. 13. "But also that he should eat and drink, and see good in all his labour, is for every man a gift of God." The inverted and yet anacoluthistic formation of the sentence is quite like that at v. 18.  $\text{כֹּל־הָאָדָם}$  signifies, properly, the totality of men = all men, e.g. Ps. cxvi. 11; but here and at v. 18, xii. 13, the author uses the two words so that the determ. second member of the st. constr. does not determine the first (which elsewhere sometimes occurs, as v'thulath Israel, a virgin of Israel, Deut. xxii. 19): every one of men (cf. πᾶς τις βροτῶν). The subst. clause col-haadam is subject: every one of men, in this that he eats . . . is dependent on God. Instead of  $\text{כִּי־יֵרָא}$  the word  $\text{מִיָּתֵר}$  (abbrev. from  $\text{מִיָּתֵרֵת}$ ) is here used, as at v. 18. The connection by v'gam is related to the preceding adversat.: and (= but) also (= notwithstanding that), as at vi. 7, Neh. v. 8, cf. Jer. iii. 10, where gam is strengthened by v'col-zoth. As for the rest, it follows from ver. 13, in connection with ii. 24–26, that for Koheleth εἰρωτά and εἰθυμλα reciprocally condition each other, without, however, a conclusion following therefrom justifying the translation "to do good," 12b. Men's being conditioned in the enjoyment of life, and, generally, their being conditioned by God the Absolute, has certainly an ethical end in view, as is expressed in the conclusion which Koheleth now reaches:—

Ver. 14. "Thus I discerned it then, that all that God will do exists for ever; nothing is to be added to it, and nothing taken from it: God has thus directed it, that men should fear before Him." This is a conclusion derived from the facts of experience, a truth that is valid for the present and for the time to come. We may with equal correctness render by quidquid facit and quidquid faciet. But the pred. shows that the fut. expression is also thought of as fut.; for  $\text{לְעַד לְעַד הוּא־יְהִי־לְעַד}$  does not mean: that is for ever (Hitz.), which would be expressed by the subst. clause  $\text{הוּא־לְעַד לְעַד}$ ; but: that shall be for ever (Zöck.), i.e. will always assert its validity. That which is affirmed here is true of God's directing and guiding events in the natural world, as well as of the announcements of His will and His controlling and directing providence in the history of human affairs. All this is removed beyond the power of the creature to alter it. The meaning is not that one ought not to add to or to take from it (Deut. xiii. 1; Prov. xxx. 6), but that such a thing cannot be done (vid. Sir. xviii. 5). And this unchangeableness characterizing the arrangements of God has this as its aim, that men should fear Him who is the All-conditioning and is Himself unconditioned: He has done it that they (men) should fear before Him, שׁוּפֵהוּ, fecit ut; cf. Ezek. xxxvi. 27. ποιεῖν ἵνα, Rev. xiii. 15; and "fear before Him," as at viii. 12 f.; cf. 1 Chron. xvi. 30 with Ps. xcvi. 9. The unchangeableness of God's action shows itself in this, that in the course of history similar phenomena repeat themselves; for the fundamental principles, the causal connections, the norms of God's government, remain always the same.

Ver. 15. "That which is now hath been long ago; and that which will be hath already been: God seeketh after that which was crowded out." The words: "hath been long ago" (כִּבְרַ הַיָּמִים), are used of that which the present represents as something that hath been, as the fruit of a development; the words: "hath already been" (כִּבְרַ הַיָּמִים), are used of the future (לְשׂוֹן, τὸ μέλλον, vid. Gesen. § 132. 1), as denying to it the right of being regarded as something new. The government of God is not to be changed, and does not change; His creative as well as His moral ordering of the world produces with the same laws the same phenomena (the ! corresponds to this line of thought here, as at 14*b*)—God seeks אַחֲרֵי (cf. vii. 7; Ewald, § 277*d*). Hengstenberg renders: God seeks the persecuted (LXX. Symm. Targ. Syr.), i.e. visits them with consolation and comfort Nirdaph here denotes that which is followed, hunted, pressed, by which we may think of that which is already driven into the past; that God seeks, seeks it purposely, and brings it back again into the present; for His government remains always, and brings thus always up again that which hath been. Thus Jerome: Deus instaurat quod abiit; the Venet.: ὁ θεὸς ζητήσῃ τὸ ἀπεληλαμένον; and thus Geier, among the post-Reform. interpreters: praestat ut quae propulsa sunt ac praeterierunt iterum innoventur ac redeant; and this is now the prevailing exposition, after Knobel, Ewald, and Hitzig. The thought is the same as if we were to translate: God seeks after the analogue. In the Arab., one word in relation to another is called muradif, if it is cogn. to it; and mutaradifat is the technical expression for a synonym. In Heb. the expression used is שׁוֹמֵת נִדְרָפִים, they who are followed the one by another,—one of which, as it were, treads on the heels of another. But this designation is mediated through the Arab. In evidence of the contrary, ancient examples are wanting.

Ver. 16. "And, moreover, I saw under the sun the place of judgment, that wickedness was there; and the place of righteousness, that wickedness was there." The structure of the verse is palindromic, like i. 6, ii. 10, iv. 1. We might also render מְקוֹם as the so-called casus absol., so that 'שָׁפָה' . . . 'מִק' is an emphatic בְּמִקְוֹם (Hitz.), and the construction like Jer. xlvi. 5; but the accentuation does not require this (cf. Gen. i. 1); and why should it not be at once the object to רָאִיתִי, which in any case it virtually is? These two words שָׁמָה הַרְשָׁע might be attribut. clauses: where wickedness (prevails), for the old scheme of the attributive clause (the sifat) is not foreign to the style of this book (vid. i. 13, nathan = n'ethano; and v. 12, raithi = r'ithiha); but why not rather virtual pred. accus.: vidi locum juris (quod) ibi impietas? Cf. Neh. xiii. 23 with Ps. xxxvii. 25. The place of "judgment" is the place where justice should be ascertained and executed; and the place of "righteousness," that where righteousness should ascertain and administer justice; for mishpat is the rule (of right), and the objective matter of fact; tsedek, a subjective property and manner of acting. רָשָׁע is in both cases the same: wickedness (see under Ps. i. 1), which bends justice, and is the contrary of tsēdek, i.e. upright and moral sternness. רָשָׁע elsewhere, like mēlek, tsēdek, preserves in p. its e, but here it takes rank along with מִסָּר, which in like manner fluctuates (cf. Ps. cxxx. 7 with Prov. xxi. 21). שָׁמָה is here = מִשָּׁ, as at Ps. cxxii. 5, etc.; the locative ah suits the question Where? as well as in the question Whither?—He now expresses how, in such a state of things, he arrived at satisfaction of mind.

Ver. 17. "I said in mine heart: God shall judge the righteous as well as the wicked: for there is there a time for every purpose and for every work." Since "the righteous" stands first, the word צַדִּיק has here the double sense of judging [richtens = setting upright] = acting uprightly, justly by one, as in the shofteni of Ps. vii. 9, xxvi. 1, etc., and of judging = inflicting punishment. To the righteous, as well as to the wicked,<sup>1</sup> God will administer that which of right belongs to them. But this does not immediately happen, and has to be waited for a long time, for there is a definite time for every undertaking <sup>1</sup> The LXX. (in Aquila's manner): σὺν τὸν δίκαιον καὶ σὺν τὸν ἀσεβῆ—according to the Talm. hermeneut. rule, that where the obj. is designated by אֵת, with that which is expressly named, something else is associated, and is to be thought of along with it.

(iii. 1), and for (לְעַי, in the more modern form of the language, interchanges promiscue with לְעַי and לְעַי, e.g. Jer. xix. 15; Ezek. xxii. 3; Ewald, § 217c) every work there is a "time." This עַי, defended by all the old interpreters, cannot have a temporal sense: tunc = in die iudicii (Jerome, Targ.), cf. Ps. xiv. 5, xxxvi. 13, for "a time of judgment there is for all one day" is not intended, since certainly the עַי (day of judgment) is this time itself, and not the time of this time. Ewald renders עַי as pointing to the past, for he thus construes: the righteous and the unrighteous God will judge (for there is a time for everything), and judge (vav thus explicat., "and that too," "and indeed") every act there, i.e. everything done before. But this עַי is not only heavy, but also ambiguous and purposeless; and besides, by this parenthesizing of the words עַי וְעַי [for there is a time for everything], the principal thought, that with God everything, even His act of judgment, has its time, is robbed of its independence and of the place in the principal clause appropriate to it. But if עַי is understood adverbially, it certainly has a local meaning connected with it: there, viz. with God, apud Deum; true, for this use of the word Gen. xlix. 24 affords the only example, and it stands there in the midst of a very solemn and earnest address. Therefore it lies near to read, with Houbig., Döderl., Palm., and Hitz., עַי, "a definite time . . . has He (God) ordained;" עַי (עַי) is the usual word for the ordinances of God in the natural world and in human history (Prov. viii. 29; Ex. xxi. 13; Num. xxiv. 23; Hab. i. 12, etc.), and, as in the Assyr. simtuv, so the Heb. עַי (עַי), 2 Sam. xiii. 32, signifies lot or fate, decree.<sup>1</sup> With this reading, Elster takes exception to the position of the words; but at Judg. vi. 19 also the object goes before עַי, and "unto every purpose and for every work" is certainly the complement of the object-conception, so that the position of the words is in reality no other than at x. 20a; Dan. ii. 17b. Quite untenable is Herzfeld's supposition (Fürst, Vaih.), that עַי has here the Talm. signification: aestimat, taxat, for (1) this עַי = Arab. sham, has not עַי, but the accus. after it; (2) the thought referring to the time on which ver. 18 rests is thereby interrupted. Whether we read עַי, or take עַי in the sense of עַי (Job xxv. 2, xxiii. 14, etc.), the thought is the same, and equally congruous: God will judge the innocent and the guilty; it shall be done some time, although not so soon as one might wish it, and think necessary, for God has for every undertaking and for every work its fixed time, also its judicial decision (vid. at Ps. lxxv. 3); He permits wickedness, lets it develop itself, waits long before He interposes (vid. under Isa. xviii. 4 f.).

Reflecting on God's delay to a time hidden from men, and known only to Himself, Koheleth explains the matter to himself in the following verse:—

Ver. 18. "Thus I said then in mine heart: (it happeneth) for the sake of the children of men that God might sift them, and that they might see that they are like the cattle, they in themselves." Regarding עַל־הֵבֶ' [for the sake of = on account of] as at viii. 2, vid. under Ps. cx. 4, where it signifies after (κατά) the state of the matter, and above at p. 195. The infin. לְבִר is not derived from בּוּר. — לְבִיר, ix. 1, is only the metaplastic form of לְבִר or לְבִיר, — but only from בָּרַר, whose infin. may take the form בִּר, after the form רַר, to tread down, Isa. xlv. 1, שָׁע, to bow, Jer. v. 26; but nowhere else is this infin. form found connected with a suff.; בְּקָהָם, Hos. xi. 3, would be in some measure to be compared, if it could be supposed that this = בְּקָהָתָם, sumendo eos. The root בּוּר proceeds, from the primary idea of cutting, on the one side to the idea of separating, winnowing, choosing out; and, on the other, to that of smoothing, polishing, purifying (vid. under Isa. xlix. 2). Here, by the connection, the meaning of winnowing, i.e. of separating the good from the bad, is intended, with which, however, as in לְבִיר, Dan. xi. 35, the meaning of making clear, making light, bringing forward into the light, easily connects itself (cf. Shabbath 138a, 74a), of which the meaning to winnow (cf. לְהִבִּיר, Jer. iv. 11) is only a particular form;<sup>1</sup> cf. Sanhedrin 7b: "when a matter is clear, בָּרוּר, to thee (free from ambiguity) as the morning, speak it out; and if not, do not speak it." In the expression לְבִר הָאֵל, the word הָאֵל is, without doubt, the subject, according to Gesen. § 133. 2. 3; Hitz. regards הָאֵל as genit., which, judged according to the Arab., is correct; it is true that for li-im'i-hānikim allahi (with genit. of the subj.), also allahu (with nominat. of the subj.) may be used; but the former expression is the more regular and more common (vid. Ewald's Gramm. Arab. § 649), but not always equally decisive with reference to the Heb. usus loq. That God delays His righteous interference till the time appointed beforehand, is for the sake of the children of men, with the intention, viz., that God may sift them, i.e. that, without breaking in upon the free development of their characters before the time, He may permit the distinction between the good and the bad to become manifest. Men, who are the obj. to 'לָב, are the subject to לְרֵאוֹת to be supplied: ut videant; it is unnecessary, with the LXX., Syr., and Jerome, to read לְרֵאוֹת (= 'וּלְהֵרָא): ut ostenderet. It is a question whether הִמָּה<sup>1</sup> is the expression of the copula: sunt (sint), or whether hēm̄mah lahēm is a closer definition, co-ordinate with sh'ehem b'hēm̄mah. The remark of Hitzig, that lahēm throws back the action on the subject, is not clear. Does he suppose that lahēm belongs to liroth? That is here impossible. If we look away from lahēm, the needlessly circumstantial expression 'שה . . . הם' can still be easily understood: hemmah takes up, as an echo, b'hēm̄mah, and completes the comparison (compare the battology in Hos. xiii. 2). This play upon words musically accompanying the thought remains also, when, according to the accentuation 'הָה' 'ה' 'הָה', we take hemmah along with lahēm, and the former as well as the latter of these two words is then better understood. The ל in להם is not that of the pure dat. (Aben Ezra: They (are like beasts) to themselves, i.e. in their own estimation), but that of reference, as at Gen. xvii. 20, "as for Ishmael;" cf. Ps. iii. 3; 2 Kings v. 7; cf. לָא, 1 Sam. i. 27, etc. Men shall see that they are cattle (beasts), they in reference to themselves, i.e. either they in reference to themselves mutually (Luther: among themselves), or: they in reference to themselves. To interpret the reference as that of mutual relation, would, in looking back to ver. 16, commend itself, for the condemnation and oppression of the innocent under the appearance of justice is an act of human brutishness. But the reason assigned in ver. 19 does not accord with this reciprocal rendering of lahēm. Thus lahēm will be meant reflexively, but it is not on that account pleonastic (Knobel), nor does it ironically form a climax: ipsissimi = höchstselbst (Ewald, § 315a); but "they in reference to themselves" is = they in and of themselves, i.e. viewed as men (viewed naturally). If one disregards the idea of God's interfering at a future time with the discordant human history, and, in general, if one loses sight of God, the distinction between the life of man and of beast disappears.

Ver. 19. "For the children of men are a chance, and the beast a chance, and they both have once chance: as the death of the one, so the death of the other, and they have all one breath; and there is no advantage to a man over a beast, for all is vain." If in both instances the word is pointed מִקְרָה (LXX.), the three-membered sentence would then have the form of an emblematical proverb (as c.g. Prov. xxv. 25): "For as the chance of men, so (vav of comparison) the chance of the beast; they have both one chance." מִקְרָה with segol cannot possibly be the connecting form (Luzz.), for in cases such as ט' מִעֵץ, Isa. iii. 24, the relation of the words is appositional, not genitival. This form מִקְרָה, thus found three times, is vindicated by the Targ. (also the Venet.) and by Mss.; Joseph Kimchi remarks that "all three have segol, and are thus forms of the absolutus." The author means that men, like beasts, are in their existence and in their death influenced accidentally, i.e. not of necessity, and are wholly conditioned, not by their own individual energy, but by a power from without—are dependent beings, as Solon (Herod. i. 32) says to Croesus: "Man is altogether συμφορή," i.e. the sport of accident. The first two sentences mean exclusively neither that men (apart from God) are, like beasts, the birth of a blind accident (Hitz.), nor that they are placed under the same law of transitoriness (Elst.); but of men, in the totality of their being, and doing, and suffering, it is first said that they are accidental beings; then, that which separates them from this, that they all, men like beasts, are finally exposed to one, i.e. to the same fate. As is the death of the one, so is the death of the other; and they all have one breath, i.e. men and beasts alike die, for this breath of life (רֵיחַ חַיִּים, which constitutes a beast—as well as a man a נַפְשׁ חַיָּה) departs from the body (Ps. civ. 29). In יָהּ . . . יָהּ (as at vi. 5, Ex. xiv. 20, and frequently), לָהֶם (mas. as genus potius) is separately referred to men and beasts. With the Mishnic בְּמוֹת = bibl. בָּמוֹ (cf. Maaser Sheni, v. 2), the בְּמוֹת here used has manifestly nothing to do. The noun מוֹתָר, which in the Book of Proverbs (xiv. 23, xxi. 5, not elsewhere) occurs in the sense of profit, gain, is here in the Book of Koheleth found as a synonym of יִתְרוֹן, "preference," advantage which is exclusively peculiar to it. From this, that men and beasts fall under the same law of death, the author concludes that there is no preference of a man to a beast; he doubtless means that in respect of the end man has no superiority; but he expresses himself thus generally because, as the matter presented itself to him, all-absorbing death annulled every distinction. He looks only to the present time, without encumbering himself with the historical account of the matter found in the beginning of the Tóra; and he adheres to the external phenomenon, without thinking, with the Psalmist in Ps. xlix., that although death is common to man with the beast, yet all men do not therefore die as the beast dies. That the beast dies because it must, but that in the midst of this necessity of nature man can maintain his freedom, is for him out of view.

Ver. 20. "All goes hence to one place; all has sprung out of the dust, and all returns to the dust again." The "one place" is (as at vi. 6) the earth, the great graveyard which finally receives all the living when dead. The art. of the first הָעֶפֶר is that denoting species; the art. of the second is retrospective: to the dust whence he sprang (cf. Ps. civ. 29, cxlvi. 4); otherwise, Gen. iii. 19 (cf. Job xxxiv. 15), "to dust shalt thou return," shalt become dust again. From dust to dust (Sir. xl. 11, xli. 10) is true of every living corporeal thing. It is true there exists the possibility that with the spirit of the dying man it may be different from what it is with the spirit of the dying beast, but yet that is open to question.

Ver. 21. "Who knoweth with regard to the spirit of the children of men, whether it mounteth upward; and with regard to the spirit of a beast, whether it goeth downward to the earth?" The interrogative meaning of הָעֹלָה and הַיֵּרֶדָה is recognised by all the old translators: LXX., Targ., Syr., Jerome, Venet., Luther. Among the moderns, Heyder (vid. Psychol. p. 410), Hengst., Hahn, Dale, and Bullock take the ה in both cases as the article: "Who knoweth the spirit of the children of men, that which goeth upward . . .?" But (1) thus rendered the question does not accord with the connection, which requires a sceptical question; (2) following "who knoweth," after ii. 19, vi. 12, cf. Josh. ii. 14, an interrogative continuance of the sentence was to be expected; and (3) in both cases הִיא stands as designation of the subject only for the purpose of marking the interrogative clause (cf. Jer. ii. 14), and of making it observable that ha'olah and hayoredeth are not appos. belonging as objects to וְרוח and וְרוח. It is questionable, indeed, whether the punctuation of these words, הָעֹלָה and הַיֵּרֶדָה, as they lie before us, proceeds from an interrogative rendering. Saadia in Emunoth c. vi., and Juda Halevi in the Kuzri ii. 80, deny this; and so also do Aben Ezra and Kimchi. And they may be right. For instead of הָעֹלָה, the pointing ought to have been הַעֹלָה (cf. הַעֹלָה, Job xiii. 25) when used as interrog. an ascendens; even before א the compens. lengthening of the interrog. ha is nowhere certainly found<sup>1</sup> instead of the virtual reduplication; and thus also the parallel הַיֵּרֶדָה is not to be judged after הַיֵּרֶדָה, Lev.

<sup>1</sup> For ה is to be read with a Pattach in Judg. vi. 31, xii. 5; Neh. vi. 11; cf. under Gen. xix. 9, xxvii. 21. In Num. xvi. 22 the ה of הַאֵשׁ is the art., the question is not formally designated. Cf. also הַעֵץ with ה interrog., Jer. xii. 9; and הַעֵץ with ה as the art., Gen. xv. 11.

x. 19, וְהִנֵּה, Ezek. xviii. 29,—we must allow that the punctuation seeks, by the removal of the two interrog. הִי (ה), to place that which is here said in accord with xii. 7. But there is no need for this. For הִי does not quite fall in with that which Lucretius says (Lib. I.):

“*Ignoratur enim quae sit natura animai,
Nata sit an contra nascentibus insinuetur?
An simul intereat nobiscum morte diremta?*”

It may certainly be said of mi yodé'a, as of ignoratur, that it does not exclude every kind of knowledge, but only a sure and certain knowledge resting on sufficient grounds; interire and הִי are also scarcely different, for neither of the two necessarily signifies annihilation, but both the discontinuance of independent individual existence. But the putting of the question by Koheleth is different, for it discloses more definitely than this by Lucretius, the possibility of a different end for the spirit of a man from that which awaits the spirit of a beast, and thus of a specific distinction between these two principles of life. In the formation even of the dilemma: Whether upwards or downwards, there lies an inquiring knowledge; and it cannot surprise us if Koheleth finally decides that the way of the spirit of a man is upwards, although it is not said that he rested this on the ground of demonstrative certainty. It is enough that, with the moral necessity of a final judgment beyond the sphere of this present life, at the same time also the continued existence of the spirit of man presented itself to him as a postulate of faith. One may conclude from the desiderium aeternitatis (iii. 11) implanted in man by the Creator, that, like the instincts implanted in the beasts, it will be calculated not for deception, but for satisfaction; and from the הִי, Prov. xv. 24,—i.e. the striving of a wise man rising above earthly, temporary, common things,—that death will not put an end to this striving, but will help it to reach its goal. But this is an indirect proof, which, however, is always inferior to the direct in force of argument. He presupposes that the Omnipotence and Wisdom which formed the world is also at the same time Love. Thus, though at last, it is faith which solves the dilemma, and we see from xii. 7 that this faith held sway over Koheleth. In the Book of Sirach, also, the old conception of Hades shows itself as yet dominant; but after the οὐκ ἀθάνατος υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου, xvii. 25, we read towards the end, where he speaks of Elias: καὶ γὰρ ἡμεῖς ζωὴν ζήσομεθα, xlvi. 11. In the passage before us, Koheleth remains in doubt, without getting over it by the hand of faith. In a certain reference the question he here proposes is to the present day unanswered; for the soul, or, more correctly, according to the biblical mode of conception, the spirit from which the soul-life of all corporeal beings proceeds, is a monas, and as such is indestructible. Do the future of the beast's soul and of man's soul not then stand in a solidaric mutual relation to each other? In fact, the future life presents to us mysteries the solution of which is beyond the power of human thought, and we need not wonder that Koheleth, this sober-minded, intelligent man, who was inaccessible to fantastic self-deception, arrives, by the line of thought commenced at ver. 16, also again at the ultimatum.

Ver. 22. "Thus I then saw that there is nothing better than that a man should rejoice in his works, for that is his portion; for who can bring him to this, that he gains an insight into that which shall be after him?" Hengstenberg, who has decided against the interrog. signification of the twice-repeated ה in ver. 21, now also explains אַחֲרָיו . . . בְּמָה, not: What shall become of him after it (his death)? but: What further shall be done after the state in which he now finds himself? Zöckler, although rightly understanding both ה as well as אַחֲרָיו (after him = when he will be separated, or separates from this life, vii. 14, ix. 3; cf. Gen. xxiv. 67), yet proceeds on that explanation of Hengstenberg's, and gives it the rendering: how things shall be on the earth after his departure. But (1) for this thought, as vi. 12 shows, the author had a more suitable form of expression; (2) this thought, after the author has, ver. 21, explained it as uncertain whether the spirit of a man in the act of death takes a different path from that of a beast, is altogether aside from the subject, and it is only an apologetic tendency not yet fully vanquished which here constrains him. The chain of thought is however this: How it will be with the spirit of a man when he dies, who knows? What will be after death is thus withdrawn from human knowledge. Thus it is best to enjoy the present, since we connect together (ii. 24) labour and enjoyment mediated thereby. This joy of a man in his work—i.e. as v. 18: which flows from his work as a fountain, and accompanies him in it (viii. 15)—is his portion, i.e. the best which he has of life in this world. Instead of בְּמָה־שׁ, the punctuation is בְּמָה, because שִׁירָה אַחֲרָיו is a kindred idea; vid. regarding מָה under ii. 22. And לִרְאוֹת בּוֹ is used, because it is not so much to be said of the living, that he cannot foresee how it shall be with him when he dies, as that he can gain no glimpse into that world because it is an object that has for him no fixity.

From unjust decisions a transition is now made to the subject of the haughty, unmerciful cruelty of the wide-extended oppressions inflicted by men.

iv. 1. "And again I saw all the oppressions that are done under the sun: and behold there the tears of the oppressed, and they have no comforter; and from the hand of their oppressors goeth forth violence; and they have no comforter." Incorrectly Hahn: And anew I saw,—the observation is different from that of iii. 16, though cognate. Thus: And again I saw,—the expression follows the syntactic scheme of Gen. xxvi. 18; regarding the fut. consec. brought into view here and at ver. 7, vid. above, p. 197, 2. The second הָעֵשׂ is part. pass.; the first, as at Job xxxv. 9, and also at Amos iii. 9, is abstract (i.e. bringing the many separate instances under one general idea) pluraletantum (cf. פְּרִיִי, redempti, Isa. xxxv. 10; and redemptio, pretium redemptionis, Num. iii. 46); the plur. אֲשֶׁר נָעַ need not appear strange, since even הַיָּמִים is connected with the plur. of the pred., e.g. Ps. xxxi. 11, lxxxviii. 4. הַיָּמֵת has, as at Isa. xxv. 8 (cf. Rev. xxiv. 4, πᾶν δάκρυον), a collective sense. The expression בְּחַ . . . וּמִיַּד is singular. According to the most natural impression, it seems to signify: "and from the hand of their oppressors no power of deliverance" (carrying forward אֵין); but the parallelism of the palindromically constructed verse (as at i. 6, ii. 10, iii. 16) excludes this meaning. Thus בְּחַ is here once—nowhere else—used, like the Greek βία, in the sense of violence; Luzzatto prefers the reading וּבְיַד, by which the expression would be in conformity with the linguistic usage; but also מִיַּד is explained: the force which they have in their hands is, in going forth from their hands, thought of as abused, and, as taking the form of יָשַׁר or הַיָּקָה. In view of this sorrow which men bring upon their fellow-men, life for Koheleth lost all its worth and attraction.

Vers. 2, 3. "And I praised the dead who were long ago dead, more than the living who are yet in life; and as happier than both, him who has not yet come into existence, who hath not seen the evil work which is done under the sun." הַיָּשֵׁבֶת is hardly thought of as part., like יִקְשִׁים = מִיִּקְשִׁים, ix. 12; the ט of the part. Pih. is not usually thrown away, only מִיָּהַר, Zeph. i. 14, is perhaps = מִיָּמְהָר, but for the same reason as בְּיַת־אֵל, 2 Kings ii. 3, is = בְּבֵית־אֵל. Thus הַיָּשֵׁבֶת, like וְנִתֵּן, viii. 9, is inf. absol., which is used to continue, in an adverbially subord. manner, the preceding finite with the same subject,<sup>1</sup> Gen. xli. 43; Lev. xxv. 14; Judg. vii. 19, etc.; cf. especially Ex. viii. 11: "Pharaoh saw . . . and hardened (וְהִקְבִּיר) his heart;" just in the same manner as שָׁבַח here connects itself with אֲנִי רֵשׁ אֲנִי אֲנִי. Only the annexed designation of the subject is peculiar; the syntactic possibility of this connection is established by Num. xix. 35, Ps. xv. 5, Job xl. 2, and, in the second rank, by Gen. xvii. 10, Ezek. v. 14. Yet אֲנִי might well enough have been omitted had רֵשׁ אֲנִי רֵשׁ not stood too remote. Regarding עֲרִיבָה<sup>2</sup> and עָרֶן, adhuc, vid. p. 194. The circumstantial form of the expression: prae vivis qui vivi sunt adhuc, is intentional: they who are as yet living must be witnesses of the manifold and comfortless human miseries.

It is a question whether ver. 3 begins a new clause (LXX., Syr., and Venet.) or not. That אֵת, like the Arab. aiya, sometimes serves to give prominence to the subject, cannot be denied (vid. Böttcher, § 516, and Mühlau's remarks thereto). The Mishnic expressions אִוְרוֹ הַיּוֹם, that day, אִוְרוֹתֵי הָאָרֶץ, that land, and the like (Geiger, § 14. 2), presuppose a certain preparation in the older language; and we might, with Weiss (Stud. ueber d. Spr. der Mishna, p. 112), interpret אֵת אֲשֶׁר in the sense of אִוְרוֹי אֲשֶׁר, is qui. But the accus. rendering is more natural. Certainly the expression שָׁבַח טוֹב, "to praise," "to pronounce happy," is not used; but to טוֹב it is natural to suppose וְקִרְאֵי added. Jerome accordingly translates: et feliciorum utroque judicavi qui necdum natus est. קִרְע has the double Kametz, as is generally the case, except at Ps. liv. 7 and Mic. vii. 3.<sup>3</sup> Better than he who is born is the unborn, who does not become conscious of the wicked actions that are done under the sun. A similar thought, with many variations in its expression, is found in Greek writers; see regarding these shrill discordances, which run through all the joy of the beauty and splendour of Hellenic life, my Apologetik, p. 116. Buddhism accordingly gives to nirvāna the place of the highest good. That we find Koheleth on the same path (cf. vi. 3, vii. 1), has its reason in this, that so long as the central point of man's existence lies in the present life, and this is not viewed as the fore-court of eternity, there is no enduring consolation to lift us above the miseries of this present world.

There follow two other observations, mutually related and issuing in "windy effort:"—

Ver. 4. "And I saw all the labour and all the skill of business, that it is an envious surpassing of the one by the other: also this is vain and windy effort." The  $\text{אִתִּי}$  refers to this exertion of vigorous effort and skill. The Graec. Venet., by rendering here and at ii. 24  $\text{אִתִּי}$  by καθάρτης, betrays himself as a Jew. With  $\text{וְזוֹ$ , quod, that which forms the pred. follows the object. The min in meré'ehu is as in amatz min, Ps. xviii. 18, and the like—the same as the compar.: aemulatio qua unus prae altero eminere studet. All this expenditure of strength and art has covetousness and envy, with which one seeks to surpass another, as its poisoned sting.

Ver. 5. There ought certainly to be activity according to our calling; indolence is self-destruction: "The fool foldeth his hands, and eateth his own flesh." He layeth his hands together (Prov. vi. 10 = xxiv. 33),—placeth them in his bosom, instead of using them in working,—and thereby he eateth himself up, i.e. bringeth ruin upon himself (Ps. xxvii. 2; Mic. iii. 3; Isa. xlix. 26); for instead of nourishing himself by the labour of his hands, he feeds on his own flesh, and thus wasteth away. The emphasis does not lie on the subject (the fool, and only the fool), but on the pred.

Ver. 6. The fifth verse stands in a relation of contrast to this which follows: "Better is one hand full of quietness, than both fists full of labour and windy effort." Mendelssohn and others interpret ver. 5 as the objection of the industrious, and ver. 6 as the reply of the slothful. Zöckler agrees with Hitz., and lapses into the hypothesis of a dialogue otherwise rejected by him (vid. above, p. 217). As everywhere, so also here it preserves the unity of the combination of thoughts.  $\text{נַחַת}$  signifies here, as little as it does anywhere else, the rest of sloth; but rest, in contrast to such activity in labour as robs a man of himself, to the hunting after gain and honour which never has enough, to the rivalry which places its goal always higher and higher, and seeks to be before others—it is rest connected with well-being (vi. 5), gentle quietness (ix. 17), resting from self-activity (Isa. xxx. 15); cf. the post-bibl.  $\text{נַחַת רַיָּה}$ , satisfaction, contentment, comfort. In a word, nahath has not here the sense of being idle or lazy. The sequence of the thoughts is this: The fool in idleness consumes his own life-strength; but, on the other hand, a little of true rest is better than the labour of windy effort, urged on by rivalry yielding no rest.  $\text{פֶּה}$  is the open hollow hand, and  $\text{אִתִּי}$ (Assyr. hupunnu) the hand closed like a ball, the fist. "Rest" and "labour and windy effort" are the accusatives of that to which the designation of measure refers (Ges. § 118. 3); the accus. connection lay here so much the nearer, as  $\text{מְלֵא}$  is connected with the accus. of that with which anything is full. In "and windy effort" lies the reason for the judgment pronounced. The striving of a man who laboriously seeks only himself and loses himself in restlessness, is truly a striving which has wind for its object, and has the property of wind.

The Aimless Labour and Penuriousness of him who stands alone,
iv. 7-12.

Another sorrowful spectacle is the endless labour and the insatiable covetousness of the isolated man, which does good neither to himself nor to any other:

Vers. 7, 8. "There is one without a second, also son and brother he has not; and there is no end of his labour; his eyes nevertheless are not satisfied with riches: For whom do I labour, then, and deny all good to my soul? Also this is vain, and it is a sore trouble." That  $\text{לֹא־יֵשׁ}$ , as in Ps. civ. 25, cv. 34, has the meaning of  $\text{לֹא־יֵשׁ}$ , absque, Nolde has already observed in his Partik.-Concordanz: a solitarius, without one standing by his side, a second standing near him, i.e. without wife and without friend; also, as the words following show, without son and brother. Regarding  $\text{לֹא־יֵשׁ}$ , for which, with the connect. accus.,  $\text{לֹא־יֵשׁ}$  might be expected (cf. also ii. 7,  $\text{לֹא־יֵשׁ}$  with Mahpach; and, on the other hand, ii. 23,  $\text{לֹא־יֵשׁ}$  with Pashta), vid. under Ps. lv. 10. Gam may be interpreted in the sense of "also" as well as of "nevertheless" (Ewald, 354a); the latter is to be preferred, since the endless labour includes in itself a restless striving after an increase of possession. The Keri, in an awkward way, changes  $\text{עֵינָי}$  into  $\text{עֵינִי}$ ; the taking together the two eyes as one would here be unnatural, since the avaricious man devours gold, silver, and precious things really with both his eyes, and yet, however great be his wealth, still more does he wish to see in his possession; the sing. of the pred. is as at 1 Sam. iv. 15; Mic. iv. 11. With ulmi ani, Koheleth puts himself in the place of such a friendless, childless man; yet this change of the description into a self-confession may be occasioned by this, that the author in his old age was really thus isolated, and stood alone. Regarding  $\text{לֹא־יֵשׁ}$  with the accus. of the person, to whom, and min of the matter, in respect of which there is want, vid. under Ps. viii. 6. That the author stands in sympathy with the sorrowful condition here exposed, may also be remarked from the fact that he now proceeds to show the value of companionship and the miseries of isolation :

Ver. 9. " Better are two together than one, seeing they have a good reward in their labour." By hashsh'nāim, the author refers to such a pair ; hāehhad is one such as is just described. The good reward consists in this, that each one of the two has the pleasant consciousness of doing good to the other by his labour, and especially of being helpful to him. In this latter general sense is grounded the idea of the reward of faithful fellowship :

Ver. 10. " For if they fall, the one can raise up his fellow : but woe to the one who falleth, and there is not a second there to lift him up." Only the Targ., which Grätz follows, confounds אֵילִים<sup>1</sup> with אֵילִים (vid. above, pp. 191 and 192) ; it is equivalent to אֵילִים, Isa. iii. 9, or אֵילִים, Ezek. xiii. 18. Hāehhad is appos. connecting itself to the pronominal suff., as, e.g., in a far more inappropriate manner, Ps. lxxxvi. 2 ; the prep. is not in appos. usually repeated, Gen. ii. 19, ix. 4 (exceptions : Ps. xviii. 51, lxxiv. 14). Whether we translate אֵילִים by qui ceciderit (xi. 3), or by quum ceciderit (Jerome), is all one. אֵילִים is potential : it is possible and probable that it will be done, provided he is a חֵבֶר טוֹב, i.e. a true friend (Pirke aboth, ii. 13).

Ver. 11. " Moreover, if two lie together, then there is heat to them : but how can it be warm with one who is alone?" The marriage relation is not excluded, but it remains in the background ; the author has two friends in his eye, who, lying in a cold night under one covering (Ex. xxii. 26 ; Isa. xxviii. 20), cherish one another, and impart mutual warmth. Also in Aboth de-Rabbi Nathan, c. 8, the sleeping of two together is spoken of as an evidence of friendship. The vav in v'ham is that of the consequent ; it is wanting, 10a, according to rule, in hāehhad, because it commonly comes into use with the verb, seldom (e.g. Gen. xxii. 1) with the preceding subj.

Ver. 12. " And if one shall violently assail him who is alone, two shall withstand him ; and (finally) a threefold cord is not quickly broken asunder." The form yithq'pho for yithq'phehu, Job xv. 24, is like yird'pho, Hos. viii. 3 = yird'phehu, Judg. ix. 40. If we take תִּקַּח in the sense of to overpower, then the meaning is : If one can overpower him who is alone, then, on the contrary, two can maintain their ground against him (Herzf.) ; but the two אֵילִים, vers. 10, 11, which are equivalent to éav, exclude such a pure logical et. And why should תִּקַּח, if it can mean overpowering, not also mean doing violence to by means of a sudden attack? In the Mishnic and Arab. it signifies to seize, to lay hold of; in the Aram. אֶתְקַף = הִחֲזִיק, and also at Job xiv. 20, xv. 24 (vid. Comm.), it may be understood of a violent assault, as well as of a completed subjugation; as נָשָׂא means to lift up and carry; עָמַד, to tread and to stand. But whether it be understood inchoat. or not, in any case הֶאֱחָזַק is not the assailant, who is much rather the unnamed subj. in יִתְקַפֵּי, but the one (the solitarius) who, if he is alone, must succumb; the construction of yithq'pho häehhad follows the scheme of Ex. ii. 6, "she saw it, the child." To the assault expressed by תְּקַף, there stands opposed the expression עָמַד נָדָר, which means to withstand any one with success; as עָמַד לְפָנַי, 2 Kings x. 4, Ps. cxlvii. 17, Dan. viii. 7, means to maintain one's ground. Of three who hold together, 12*a* says nothing; the advance from two to three is thus made in the manner of a numerical proverb (vid. Proverbs, vol. I. p. 13). If two hold together, that is seen to be good; but if there be three, this threefold bond is likened to a cord formed of three threads, which cannot easily be broken. Instead of the definite specific art. הַיֵּהוּ 'הַיֵּהוּ', we make use of the indefinite. Funiculus triplex difficile rumpitur is one of the winged expressions used by Koheleth.

The People's Enthusiasm for the new King, and its Extinction, iv. 13–16.

A political observation follows in an aphoristic manner the observations relating to social life, viz. how popularity vanishes away and passes even into its opposite. The author, who here plainly quotes from actual events, begins with a general statement:

Ver. 13. "Better is a youth poor and wise, than a king old and foolish, who no longer understands how to be warned,"—i.e. who increases his folly by this, that he is "wise in his own eyes," Prov. xxvi. 12; earlier, as עוֹד denotes, he was, in some measure, accessible to the instruction of others in respect of what was wanting to him; but now in his advanced age he is hardened in his folly, bids defiance to all warning counsel, and undermines his throne. The connection of the verb יָדַע with ל and the inf. (for which elsewhere only the inf. is used) is a favourite form with the author; it means to know anything well, v. 1, vi. 8, x. 15; here is meant an understanding resting on the knowledge of oneself and on the knowledge of men. נִיָּהַר is here and at xii. 12, Ps. xix. 12, a Niph. tolerativum, such as the synonym נוֹסֵר, Ps. ii. 10: to let oneself be cleared up, made wiser, enlightened, warned. After this contrast, the idea connected with הִכָּם also defines itself. A young man (נָלֵךְ, as at Dan. i. 4, but also Gen. iv. 23) is meant who (vid. above, p. 193, under misken) yet excels the old imbecile and childish king, in that he perceives the necessity of a fundamental change in the present state of public matters, and knows how to master the situation to such a degree that he raises himself to the place of ruler over the neglected community.

Ver. 14. "For out of the prison-house he goeth forth to reign as king, although he was born as a poor man in his kingdom." With כִּי the properties of poverty and wisdom attributed to the young man are verified,—wisdom in this, that he knew how to find the way from a prison to a throne. As harammim, 2 Chron. xxii. 5 = haarammim, 2 Kings viii. 28, so hasurim = haasurim (cf. masoreth = maasoreth, Ezek. xx. 37); beth haasirim (Keri: haasurim), Judg. xvi. 21, 25, and beth haesur, Jer. xxxvii. 15, designate the prison; cf. Moed katan, iii. 1. The modern form of the language prefers this elision of the א, e.g. אֶפְסֵלֵי = אֶפְסֵי אֶלֶי, אֶלְתֵּר = אֶלְתֵּר בְּחֵר, post = בְּאַחֵר contra, etc. The perf. אָצַף is also thought of as such; for the comparison, ver. 13, would have no meaning if the poor and wise youth were not thought of as having reached the throne, and having pre-eminence assigned to him as such. He has come forth from the prison to become king, וְשָׁרָה . . . כִּי. Zöckler translates: "Whereas also he that was born in his kingdom was poor," and adds the remark: "כי נם, after the כי of the preceding clause, does not so much introduce a verification of it, as much rather an intensification; by which is expressed, that the prisoner has not merely transitorily fallen into such misery, but that he was born in poor and lowly circumstances, and that in his own kingdom 'בְּמֵטְרִי, i.e. in the same land which he should afterwards rule as king." But כי נם is nowhere used by Koheleth in the sense of "ja auch" (= whereas also); and also where it is thus to be translated, as at Jer. xiv. 18, xxiii. 11, it is used in the sense of "denn auch" (= for also), assigning proof. The fact is, that this group of particles, according as כי is thought of as demonstr. or relat., means either "denn auch," iv. 16, vii. 22, viii. 16, or "wenn auch" = èàn kal, as here and at viii. 12. In the latter case, it is related to כִּי נִם (sometimes also merely נִם, Ps. xc. 9; Mal. iii. 15), as èàn (ei) kal, although, notwithstanding, is to καὶ ἐὰν (ei), even although.<sup>1</sup> Thus 14b, connecting itself with לְמִלְכָה, is to be translated: "although he was born (נולד, not נולד) in his kingdom as a poor man."<sup>2</sup> We cannot also concur with Zöckler in the view that the suff. of 'בַּמַּלְכוּת refers to the young upstart: in the kingdom which should afterwards become his; for this reason, that the suff. of 'הַמֶּלֶךְ, ver. 16*b*, refers to the old king, and thus also that this designation may be mediated, 'בַּמַּלְכוּת must refer to him. מַלְכוּת signifies kingdom, reign, realm; here, the realm, as at Neh. ix. 35, Dan. v. 11, vi. 29. Grätz thinks vers. 13–16 ought to drive expositors to despair. But hitherto we have found no room for despair in obtaining a meaning from them. What follows also does not perplex us. The author describes how all the world hails the entrance of the new youthful king on his government, and gathers together under his sceptre.

Vers. 15, 16*a*. "I saw all the living which walk under the sun on the side of the youth, the second who shall enter upon the place of the former: no end of all the people, all those at whose head he stands." The author, by the expression "I saw," places himself back in the time of the change of government. If we suppose that he represents this to himself in a lively manner, then the words are to be translated: of the second who shall be his successor; but if we suppose that he seeks to express from the standpoint of the past that which, lying farther back in the past, was now for the first time future, then the future represents the time to come in the past, as at 2 Kings iii. 27; Ps. lxxviii. 6; Job xv. 28 (Hitz.): of the second who should enter on his place (עָמַד, to step to, to step forth, of the new king, Dan. viii. 23, xi. 2 f.; cf קָיָם, 1 Kings viii. 20). The designation of the crowd which, as the pregnant עַם expresses, gathered by the side of the young successor to the old king, by "all the living, those walking under the sun" (הַחַיִּים, perhaps intentionally the pathetic word for הַלְּבָבִים, Isa. xlii. 5)," would remain a hyperbole, even although the throne of the Asiatic world-ruler had been intended; still the expression, so absolute in its universality, would in that case be more natural (vid. the conjectural reference to Cyrus and Astyages, above, at p. 215). הַשֵּׁנִי, Ewald refers to the successor to the king, the second after the king, and translates: "to the second man who should reign in his stead;" but the second man in this sense has certainly never been the child of fortune; one must then think of Joseph, who, however, remains the second man. Hitzig rightly: "The youth is the second שֵׁנִי, not אַחֲרָי, in contrast to the king, who, as his predecessor, is the first." "Yet," he continues, "הַיָּלֵד should be the appos. and הַשֵּׁנִי the principal word," i.e. instead of: with the second youth, was to be expected: with the second, the youth. It language; but no intelligent linguist will use נִלְוֵה רֵשׁ of a man in any other sense than that he is originally poor.

is true, we may either translate : with the second youth, or : with the second, the youth,—the form of expression has in it something incorrect, for it has the appearance as if it treated of two youths. But similar are the expressions, Matt. viii. 21, ἕτερος κ.τ.λ., “another, and that, too, one of His disciples ;” and Luke xxiii. 32, ἄλλοιο κ.τ.λ. All the world ranks itself by the side (thus we may also express it) of the second youthful king, so that he comes to stand at the head of an endless multitude. The LXX., Jerome, and the Venet. render incorrectly the all (the multitude) as the subject of the relative clause, which Luther, after the Syr., corrects by reading לפניוּם for לפנייהוּם : of the people that went for him there was no end. Rightly the Targ. : at whose head (= פְּרִישִׁיהוּן) he had the direction, לְפָנָי, as with וְצֵא וְבֵא, 1 Sam. xviii. 16 ; 2 Chron. i. 10 ; Ps. lxxviii. 8, etc. All the world congregates about him, follows his leadership ; but his history thus splendidly begun, viewed backwards, is a history of hopes falsified.

Ver. 16b. “And yet they who come after do not rejoice in him : for that also is vain, and a grasping after the wind.” For all that, and in spite of that (gam has here this meaning, as at vi. 7 ; Jer. vi. 15 ; Ps. cxxix. 2 ; Ewald, § 354a), posterity (אֲחֵרִים, as at i. 11 ; cf. Isa. xli. 4) has no joy in this king,—the hopes which his contemporaries placed in the young king, who had seized the throne and conquered their hearts, afterwards proved to be delusions ; and also this history, at first so beautiful, and afterwards so hateful, contributed finally to the confirmation of the truth, that all under the sun is vain. As to the historical reminiscence from the time of the Ptolemies, in conformity with which Hitzig (in his Comm.) thinks this figure is constructed, vid. above, p. 213 ; Grätz here, as always, rocks himself in Herodian dreams. In his Comm., Hitz. guesses first of Jeroboam, along with Rehoboam the יִלְרָשָׁי, who rebelled against King Solomon, who in his old age had become foolish. In an essay, “Zur Exeg. u. Kritik des B. Koheleth,” in Hilgenfeld’s Zeitschr. XIV. 566 ff., Saul, on the contrary, appears to him to be the old and foolish king, and David the poor wise youth who rose to the throne, and took possession of the whole kingdom, but in his latter days experienced desertion and adversities ; for those who came after (the younger men) had no delight in him, but rebelled against him. But in relation to Saul, who came from the plough to be king, David, who was called from being a shepherd, is not נִלְדָּר רֶשֶׁת ; and to Jewish history this Saul, whose nobler self is darkened by melancholy, but again brightens forth, and who to his death maintained the dignity of a king of Israel, never at any time appears as מֶלֶךְ . . . וְכֹסֵל. Moreover, by both combinations of that which is related with the בית הַסּוּרִים (for which הַסּ is written) of the history of the old Israelitish kings, a meaning contrary to the usage of the language must be extracted. It is true that סּוּר, as the so-called particip. perfecti, may mean "gone aside (to a distance)," Isa. xlix. 21, Jer. xvii. 13; and we may, at any rate, by סּוּרִים, think on that poor rabble which at first gathered around David, 1 Sam. xxii. 2, regarded as outcasts from honourable society. But בית will not accord therewith. That David came forth from the house (home) of the estranged or separated, is and remains historically an awkward expression, linguistically obscure, and not in accordance with the style of Koheleth. In order to avoid this incongruity, Böttcher regards Antiochus the Great as the original of the יָלֵד. He was the second son of his father, who died 225. When a hopeful youth of fifteen years of age, he was recalled to the throne from a voluntary banishment into Farther Asia, very soon gained against his old cousin and rival Achæus, who was supported by Egypt, a large party, and remained for several years esteemed as a prince and captain; he disappointed, however, at a later time, the confidence which was reposed in him. But granting that the voluntary exile of Antiochus might be designated as בית האס, he was yet not a poor man, born poor, but was the son of King Seleucus Callinicus; and his older relative and rival Achæus wished indeed to become king, but never attained unto it. Hence הַיָּשָׁעִי is not the youth as second son of his father, but as second on the throne, in relation to the dethroned king reckoned as the first. Thus, far from making it probable that the Book of Koheleth originated in the time of the Diadochs, this combination of Böttcher's also stands on a feeble foundation, and falls in ruins when assailed.

The section i. 12–iv. 16, to which we have prefixed the superscription, "Koheleth's Experiences and their Results," has now reached its termination, and here for the first time we meet with a characteristic peculiarity in the composition of the book: the narrative sections, in which Koheleth, on the ground of his own experiences and observations, registers the vanities of earthly life, terminate in series of proverbs in which the I of the preacher retires behind the objectivity of the exhortations, rules, and principles obtained from experience, here recorded. The first of these series of proverbs which here follows is the briefest, but also the most complete in internal connection.

FIRST CONCLUDING SECTION.

PROVERBS REGARDING THE WORSHIP OF GOD.—IV. 17 [v. 1]—v. 6 [7]

As an appendix and interlude, these proverbs directly follow the personal section preceding. The first rule here laid down refers to the going to the house of God.

iv. 17 [v. 1]. "Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of God, and to go to hear is better than that fools give a sacrifice; for the want of knowledge leads them to do evil." The "house of God" is like the "house of Jahve," 2 Sam. xii. 20, Isa. xxxvii. 1, the temple; אֵל, altogether like אֵל-בְּאֵל, Ps. lxxiii. 17. The Chethb רַגְלֶיךָ is admissible, for elsewhere also this plur. ("thy feet") occurs in a moral connection and with a spiritual reference, e.g. Ps. cxix. 59; but more frequently, however, the comprehensive sing. occurs, Ps. cxix. 105, Prov. i. 15, iv. 26 f., and the Keri thus follows the right note. The correct understanding of what follows depends on רַע... יָדָי. Interpreters have here adopted all manner of impossible views. Hitzig's translation: "for they know not how to be sorrowful," has even found in Stuart at least one imitator; but עֲשׂוֹת רַע would, as the contrast of 'asoth tov, iii. 12, mean nothing else than, "to do that which is unpleasant, disagreeable, bad," like 'asah ra'ah, 2 Sam. xii. 18. Gesen., Ewald (§ 336b), Elster, Heiligst., Burger, Zöckl., Dale, and Bullock translate: "they know not that they do evil;" but for such a rendering the words ought to have been רַע עֲשׂוֹתָם (cf. Jer. xv. 15); the only example for the translation of לעֲשׂוֹת after the manner of the acc. c. inf. = se facere malum—viz. at 1 Kings xix. 4—is incongruous, for לָמוֹת does not here mean se mori, but ut moreretur. Yet more incorrect is the translation of Jerome, which is followed by Luther: nesciunt quid faciant mali. It lies near, as at ii. 24 so also here, to suppose an injury done to the text. Aben Ezra introduced אֵל before לעֲשׂוֹת, but Koheleth never uses this limiting particle; we would have to write אֵל-לְעֲשׂוֹת, after iii. 12, viii. 15. Anything thus attained, however, is not worth the violent means thus used; for the ratifying clause is not ratifying, and also in itself, affirmed of the בְּסֵלִים, who, however, are not the same as the r'sha'im and the hattaim, is inappropriate. Rather it might be said: they know not to do good (thus the Syr.); or: they know not whether it be good or bad to do, i.e. they have no moral feeling, and act not from moral motives (so the Targ.). Not less violent than this remodelling of the text is the expedient of Herzberg, Philippson, and Ginsburg, who from לִשְׁמַע derive the subject-conception of the obedient (הַשְּׂמַעִים): "For those understand not at all to do evil;" the subj. ought to have been expressed if it must be something different from the immediately preceding בְּסוּלִים. We may thus render enam uod'im, after Ps. lxxxii. 5, Isa. lvi. 10, as complete in itself: they (the fools) are devoid of knowledge to do evil = so that they do evil; i.e., want of knowledge brings them to this, that they do evil. Similarly also Knobel: they concern themselves not,—are unconcerned (viz. about the right mode of worshipping God),—so that they do evil, with the correct remark that the consequence of their perverse conduct is here represented as their intention. But לֹא יִרְעוּ, absol., does not mean to be unconcerned (wanton), but to be without knowledge. Rashbam, in substance correctly: they are predisposed by their ignorance to do evil; and thus also Hahn; Mendelssohn translates directly: "they sin because they are ignorant." If this interpretation is correct, then for לִשְׁמַע it follows that it does not mean "to obey" (thus e.g. Zöckler), which in general it never means without some words being added to it (cf. on the contrary, 1 Sam. xv. 22), but "to hear,"—viz. the word of God, which is to be heard in the house of God,—whereby, it is true, a hearing is meant which leads to obedience. In the word הוֹרִיתוּ, priests are not perhaps thought of, although the comparison of ver. 5 (הַמְלִאךְ) with Mal. ii. 7 makes it certainly natural; priestly instruction limited itself to information regarding the performance of the law already given in Scripture, Lev. x. 11, Deut. xxxiii. 9 f., and to deciding on questions arising in the region of legal praxis, Deut. xxiv. 8; Hag. ii. 11. The priesthood did not belong to the teaching class in the sense of preaching. Preaching was never a part of the temple cultus, but, for the first time, after the exile became a part of the synagogue worship. The preachers under the O. T. were the prophets,—preachers by a supernatural divine call, and by the immediate impulse of the Spirit; we know from the Book of Jeremiah that they sometimes went into the temple, or there caused their books of prophecy to be read; yet the author, by the word לִשְׁמַע of the foregoing proverb, scarcely thinks of them. But apart from the teaching of the priests, which referred to the realization of the letter of the law, and the teaching of the prophets to the realization of the spirit of the law, the word formed an essential part of the sacred worship of the temple: the Tefilla, the Beracha, the singing of psalms, and certainly, at the time of Koheleth, the reading of certain sections of the Bible. When thou goest to the house of God, says Koheleth, take heed to thy step, well reflecting whither thou goest and how thou hast there to appear;

and (with this ? he connects with this first nota bene a second) drawing near to hear exceeds the sacrifice-offering of fools, for they are ignorant (just because they hear not), which leads to this result, that they do evil. קָרוֹב, prae, expresses also, without an adj., precedence in number, Isa. x. 10, or activity, ix. 17, or worth, Ezek. xv. 2. קָרוֹב is inf. absol. Böttcher seeks to subordinate it as such to שָׁמַר: take heed to thy foot . . . and to the coming near to hear more than to . . . But these obj. to שָׁמַר would be incongruous, and מַחַת וּנִי clumsy and even distorted in expression; it ought rather to be מִתְחַדֵּר בְּכַסְיִים זָכָה. As the inf. absol. can take the place of the obj., Isa. vii. 15, xlii. 24, Lam. iii. 45, so also the place of the subj. (Ewald, § 240a), although Prov. xxv. 27 is a doubtful example of this. That the use of the inf. absol. has a wide application with the author of this book, we have already seen under iv. 2. Regarding the sequence of ideas in זָכָה . . . מִתְחַדֵּר (first the subj., then the obj.), vid. Gesen. § 133. 3, and cf. above at iii. 18. זָכָה (זָכָהִים), along with its general signification comprehending all animal sacrifices, according to which the altar bears the name מִזְבֵּחַ, early acquired also a more special signification: it denotes, in contradistinction to עֹלָה, such sacrifices as are only partly laid on the altar, and for the most part are devoted to a sacrificial festival, Ex. xviii. 12 (cf. Ex. xii. 27), the so-called sh'lamim, or also zivhhe sh'lamim, Prov. vii. 14. The expression נָתַן זָכָה makes it probable that here, particularly, is intended the festival (1 Kings i. 41) connected with this kind of sacrifice, and easily degenerating to worldly merriment (vid. under Prov. vii. 14); for the more common word for נָתַן would have been שָׁחַט or הִקְרִיב; in נָתַן it seems to be indicated that it means not only to present something to God, but also to give at the same time something to man. The most recent canonical Chokma-book agrees with Prov. xxi. 3 in this depreciation of sacrifice. But the Chokma does not in this stand alone. The great word of Samuel, 1 Sam. xv. 22 f., that self-denying obedience to God is better than all sacrifices, echoes through the whole of the Psalms. And the prophets go to the utmost in depreciating the sacrificial cultus.

The second rule relates to prayer.

v. 1, 2 [2, 3]. "Be not hasty with thy mouth, and let not thy heart hasten to speak a word before God: for God is in heaven, and thou art upon earth; therefore let thy words be few. For by much business cometh dreaming, and by much talk the noise of fools." As we say in German: auf Flügeln fliegen [to flee on wings], auf Einem Auge nicht sehen [not to see with one eye], auf der Flöte blasen [to blow on the flute], so in Heb. we say that one slandereth with (auf) his tongue (Ps. xv. 3), or, as here, that he hasteth with his mouth, i.e. is forward with his mouth, inasmuch as the word goes before the thought. It is the same usage as when the post-bibl. Heb., in contradistinction to התורה שבכתב, the law given in the Scripture, calls the oral law ה'ת' שב'על-פה, i.e. the law mediated על-פה, oraliter = oralis traditio (Shabbath 31*a*; cf. Gittin 60*b*). The instrument and means is here regarded as the substratum of the action—as that which this lays as a foundation. The phrase: “to take on the lips,” Ps. xvi. 4, which needs no explanation, is different. Regarding בהל, festinare, which is, like כהר, the intens. of Kal, vid. above, p. 191; once it occurs quite like our “sich beeilen” [to hasten], with reflex. accus. suff., 2 Chron. xxxv. 21. Man, when he prays, should not give the reins to his tongue, and multiply words as one begins and repeats over a form which he has learnt, knowing certainly that it is God of whom and to whom he speaks, but without being conscious that God is an infinitely exalted Being, to whom one may not carelessly approach without collecting his thoughts, and irreverently, without lifting up his soul. As the heavens, God’s throne, are exalted above the earth, the dwelling-place of man, so exalted is the heavenly God above earthly man, standing far beneath him; therefore ought the words of a man before God to be few,—few, well-chosen reverential words, in which one expresses his whole soul. The older language forms no plur. from the subst. קָעַט (fewness) used as an adv.; but the more recent treats it as an adj., and forms from it the plur. קְעָטִים (here and in Ps. cix. 8, which bears the superscription le-david, but has the marks of Jeremiah’s style); the post-bibl. places in the room of the apparent adj. the particip. adj. מוֹעֵט with the plur. מוֹעֵטִים (מוֹעֵטִין), e.g. Berachoth 61*a*: “always let the words of a man before the Holy One (blessed be His name!) be few” (טען). Few ought the words to be; for where they are many, it is not without folly. This is what is to be understood, ver. 2, by the comparison; the two parts of the verse stand here in closer mutual relation than vii. 1,—the proverb is not merely syn- thetical, but, like Job v. 7, parabolical. The ב is both times that of the cause. The dream happens, or, as we say, dreams happen בְּרִב עֵינָי; not: by much labour; for labour in itself, as the expenditure of strength making one weary, has as its consequence, v. 11, sweet sleep undisturbed by dreams; but: by much self-vexation in a man’s striving after high and remote ends beyond what is possible (Targ., in manifold project-making); the care of such a man trans- plants itself from the waking to the sleeping life, if it does not wholly deprive him of sleep, v. 11*b*, viii. 16,—all kinds of images of the labours of the day, and fleeting phantoms and terrifying pictures hover before his mind. And as dreams of such a nature appear when a man wearies himself inwardly as well as outwardly by the labours of the day, so, with the same inward necessity, where many words are spoken folly makes its appearance. Hitzig renders כָּסִיל, in the connection קוֹל פֶּן, as adj.; but, like אָיִל (which forms an adj. evil), כָּסִיל is always a subst., or, more correctly, it is a name occurring always only of a living being, never of a thing. There is sound without any solid content, mere blustering bawling without sense and intelligence. The talking of a fool is in itself of this kind (x. 14); but if one who is not just a fool falls into much talk, it is scarcely possible but that in this flow of words empty bombast should appear.

Another rule regarding the worship of God refers to vowing.

Vers. 3 [4]-6 [7]. "When thou hast made a vow to God, delay not to fulfil it; for there is no pleasure in fools: that which thou hast vowed fulfil. Better that thou vowest not, than that thou vowest and fulfilllest not. Let not thy mouth bring thy body into punishment; and say not before the messenger of God that it was precipitation: why shall God be angry at thy talk, and destroy the work of thy hands? For in many dreams and words there are also many vanities: much rather fear God!" If they abstained, after Shabbath 30*b*, from treating the Book of Koheleth as apocryphal, because it begins with דְּבַרֵי הוֹרָה (cf. at i. 3) and closes in the same way, and hence warrants the conclusion that that which lies between will also be דְּבַרֵי הוֹרָה, this is in a special manner true of the passage before us regarding the vow which, in thought and expression, is the echo of Deut. xxiii. 22-24. Instead of kaashēr tiddor, we find there the words ki tiddor; instead of lelohim (= le'elohim, always only of the one true God), there we have lahovah elohēcha; and instead of al-t'ahher, there lo t'ahher. There the reason is: "for the Lord thy God will surely require it of thee; and it would be sin in thee;" here: for there is no pleasure in fools, i.e. it is not possible that any one, not to speak of God, could have a particular inclination toward fools, who speak in vain, and make promises in which their heart is not, and which they do not keep. Whatever thou vowest, continues Koheleth, fulfil it; it is better (Ewald, § 336*a*) that thou vowest not, than to vow and not to pay; for which the Tóra says: "If thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin in thee" (Deut. xxiii. 22). נָדַר, which, according to the stem-word, denotes first the vow of consecration or setting apart (cogn. Arab. nadar, to separate, נָדַר, whence נִזְיָר), the so-called אָסֵר [vid. Num. xxx. 3], is here a vow in its widest sense; the author, however, may have had, as there, the law (cf. ver. 24), especially shalme nedër, in view, i.e. such peace-offerings as the law does not enjoin, but which the offerer promises (cogn. with the shalme n'davah, i.e. such as rest on free-will, but not on any obligation arising from a previous promise) from his own inclination, for the event that God may do this or that for him. The verb שָׁלַם is not, however, related to this name for sacrifices, as קָפַת is to תָּפַת, but denotes the fulfilling or discharge as a performance fully accordant with duty. To the expression קָפַת . . . הִיָּה (twice occurring in the passage of Deut. referred to above) there is added the warning: let not thy mouth bring thy body into sin. The verb nathan, with Lamed and the inf. following, signifies to allow, to permit, Gen. xx. 6; Judg. i. 34; Job xxxi. 30. The inf. is with equal right translated: not to bring into punishment; for קָפַת—the syncop. Hiph. of which, according to an old, and, in the Pentateuch, favourite form, is נִיָּתַת—signifies to sin, and also (e.g. Gen. xxxix. 9; cf. the play on the word, Hos. viii. 11) to expiate sin; sin-burdened and guilty, or liable to punishment, mean the same thing. Incorrectly, Ginsburg, Zöck., and others: “Do not suffer thy mouth to cause thy flesh to sin;” for (1) the formula: “the flesh sins,” is not in accordance with the formation of O. T. ideas; the N. T., it is true, uses the expression σὰρξ ἁμαρτίας, Rom. viii. 3, but not ἁμαρτάνουσα, that which sins is not the flesh, but the will determined by the flesh, or by fleshly lust; (2) the mouth here is not merely that which leads to sin, but the person who sins through thoughtless haste,—who, by his haste, brings sin upon his flesh, for this suffers, for the breach of vow, by penalties inflicted by God; the mouth is, like the eye and the hand, a member of the ὄλον τὸ σῶμα (Matt. v. 24 f.), which is here called בָּשָׂר; the whole man in its sensitive nature (opp. כֶּבֶד, ii. 3, xi. 10; Prov. xiv. 30) has to suffer chastisement on account of that which the mouth hath spoken. Gesen. compares this passage, correctly, with Deut. xxiv. 4, for the meaning peccati reum facere; Isa. xxix. 21 is also similar.

The further warning refers to the lessening of the sin of a rash vow unfulfilled as an unintentional, easily expiable offence: “and say not before the messenger of God that it was a שְׁנַנְנָה, a sin of weakness.” Without doubt hammäläch is an official byname of a priest (vid. above, p. 193), and that such as was in common use at the time of the author (vid. p. 210). But as for the rest, it is not easy to make the matter of the warning clear. That it is not easy, may be concluded from this, that with Jewish interpreters it lies remote to think of a priest in the word hammalāch. By this word the Targ. understands the angel to whom the execution of the sentence of punishment shall be committed on the day of judgment; Aben Ezra: the angel who writes down all the words of a man; similarly Jerome, after his Jewish teacher. Under this passage Ginsburg has an entire excursus regarding the angels. The LXX. and Syr. translate "before God," as if the words of the text were "בְּפָנֵי אֱלֹהִים," Ps. cxxxviii. 1, or as if hammalach could of itself mean God, as presenting Himself in history. Supposing that hammalach is the official name of a man, and that of a priest, we appear to be under the necessity of imagining that he who is charged with the obligation of a vow turns to the priest with the desire that he would release him from it, and thus dissolve (bibl. הִפִּיר, Mishnic הִתִּיר) the vow. But there is no evidence that the priests had the power of releasing from vows. Individual cases in which a husband can dissolve the vow of his wife, and a father the vow of his daughter, are enumerated in Num. xxx.; besides, in the traditional law, we find the sentence: "A vow, which one who makes it repents of, can be dissolved by a learned man (חכם), or, where none is present, by three laymen," Bechoroth 36b; the matter cannot be settled by any middle person (שליח), but he who has taken the vow (הנודר) must appear personally, Jore deah c. 228, § 16. Of the priest as such nothing is said here. Therefore the passage cannot at all be traditionally understood of an official dissolution of an oath. Where the Talm. applies it juristically, Shabbath 32b, etc., Rashi explains hammalach by gizbar shel-haqdesh, i.e. treasurer of the revenues of the sanctuary; and in the Comm. to Kohemoth he supposes that some one has publicly resolved on an act of charity (צדקה), i.e. has determined it with himself, and that now the representative of the congregation (שליח) comes to demand it. But that is altogether fanciful. If we proceed on the idea that liphne hammalach is of the same meaning as liphne hakkohen, Lev. xxvii. 8, 11, Num. ix. 6, xxvii. 2, etc., we have then to derive the figure from such passages relating to the law of sacrifice as Num. xv. 22-26, from which the words ki sh'gagah hi (Num. xv. 25b) originate. We have to suppose that he who has made a vow, and has not kept it, comes to terms with God with an easier and less costly offering, since in the confession (ודוי) which he makes before the priest he explains that the vow was a sh'gagah, a declaration that inconsiderately escaped him. The author, in giving it to be understood that under these circumstances the offering of the sacrifice is just the direct contrary of a good work, calls to the conscience of the inconsiderate נודר: why should God be angry on account of thy voice with which thou dost excuse thy sins of omission, and destroy (vid. regarding הַיָּדָיִם under Isa. x. 27) the work of thy hands (vid. under Ps. xc. 17), for He destroys what thou hast done, and causes to fail what thou purposest? The question with lammah resembles those in Ezra iv. 22, vii. 23, and is of the same kind as at vii. 16 f.; it leads us to consider what a mad self-destruction that would be (Jer. xlv. 7, cf. under Isa. i. 5).

The reason [for the foregoing admonition] now following places the inconsiderate vow under the general rubric of inconsiderate words. We cannot succeed in interpreting ver. 6 [7] (in so far as we do not supply, after the LXX. and Syr. with the Targ.: ne credas; or better, with Ginsburg, וְהִיא = it is) without taking one of the vavs in the sense of "also." That the Heb. vav, like the Greek καί, the Lat. et, may have this comparative or intensifying sense rising above that which is purely copulative, is seen from e.g. Num. ix. 14, cf. also Josh. xiv. 11. In many cases, it is true, we are not under the necessity of translating vav by "also;" but since the "and" here does not merely externally connect, but expresses correlation of things homogeneous, an "also" or a similar particle involuntarily substitutes itself for the "and," e.g. Gen. xvii. 20 (Jerome): super Ismael quoque; Ex. xxix. 8: filios quoque; Deut. i. 32: et nec sic quidem credidistis; ix. 8: nam et in Horeb; cf. Josh. xv. 19; 1 Sam. xxv. 43; 2 Sam. xix. 25; 1 Kings ii. 22, xi. 26; Isa. xlix. 6, "I have also given to thee." But there are also passages in which it cannot be otherwise translated than by "also." We do not reckon among these Ps. xxxi. 12, where we do not translate "also my neighbours," and Amos iv. 10, where the words are to be translated, "and that in your nostrils." On the contrary, Isa. xxxii. 7 is scarcely otherwise to be translated than "also when the poor maketh good his right," like 2 Sam. i. 23, "also in their death they are not divided." In 2 Chron. xxvii. 5, in like manner, the two vavs are scarcely correlative, but we have, with Keil, to translate, "also in the second and third year." And in Hos. viii. 6, וְהִיא, at least according to the punctuation, signifies "also it," as Jerome translates: ex Israele et ipse est. According to the interpunction of the passage before us, וְהִיא is the pred., and thus, with the Venet., is to be translated: "For in many dreams and vanities there are also many words." We could at all events render the vav, as also at x. 11, Ex. xvi. 6, as vav apod.; but וְהִיא has not the character of a virtual antecedent,—the meaning of the expression remains as for the rest the same; but Hitzig's objection is of force against it (as also against Ewald's disposition of the words, like that of Symmachus, Jerome, and Luther: "for where there are many dreams, there are also vanities, and many words"), that it does not accord with the connection, which certainly in the first place requires a reason referable to inconsiderate talk, and that the second half is, in fact, erroneous, for between dreams and many words there exists no necessary inward mutual relation. Hitzig, as Knobel before him, seeks to help this, for he explains: "for in many dreams are also vanities, i.e. things from which nothing comes, and (the like) in many words." But not only is this assumed carrying forward of the ו doubtful, but the principal thing would be made a secondary matter, and would drag heavily. The relation in ver. 2 is different where vav is that of comparison, and that which is compared follows the comparison. Apparently the text (although the LXX. had it before them, as it is before us) has undergone dislocation, and is thus to be arranged: כי ברב חלמות ודברים הרבה והבלים: for in many dreams and many words there are also vanities, i.e. illusions by which one deceives himself and others. Thus also Bullock renders, but without assigning a reason for it. That dreams are named first, arises from a reference back to ver. 2, according to which they are the images of what a man is externally and mentally busied and engaged with. But the principal stress lies on הרבה ודברים, to which also the too rash, inconsiderate vows belong. The pred. והבלים, however, connects itself with "vanity of vanities," which is Koheleth's final judgment regarding all that is earthly. The כי following connects itself with the thought lying in 6a, that much talk, like being much given to dreams, ought to be avoided: it ought not to be; much rather (imo, Symm. ἀλλὰ) fear God, Him before whom one should say nothing, but that which contains in it the whole heart.

CONTINUATION OF THE CATALOGUE OF VANITIES.

THE GRADATIONS OF OPPRESSION IN DESPOTIC STATES.—V. 7, 8 [8, 9].

"Fear God," says the proverb (Prov. xxiv. 21), "and the king." The whole Book of Koheleth shows how full its author is of this fundamental thought. Thus the transition to the theme now following was at least inwardly mediated. The state-government, however, although one should be subject to it for conscience' sake, corresponds very little to his idea: the ascending scale of the powers is an ascending scale of violence and oppression.

Ver. 7 [8]. "If thou seest the oppression of the poor and the robbery of right and of justice in the state, marvel not at the matter: for one higher watches over him who is high; and others are high above both." Like rash, mishpat vatsēdēq are also the gen. of the obj.; "robbery of the right and of justice" is an expression not found elsewhere, but not on that account, as Grätz supposes, impossible: mishpat is right, rectitude, and conformity to law; and tsēdēq, judicial administration, or also social deportment according to these norms; גַּזְלֵי, a wicked, shameless depriving of a just claim, and withholding of the showing of right which is due. If one gets a sight of such things as these in a m'dinah, i.e. in a territorial district under a common government, he ought not to wonder at the matter. הִמְיָה means to be startled, astonished, and, in the sense of "to wonder," is the word commonly used in modern Heb. But הִפְיָז has here the colourless general signification of res, according to which the Syr. translates it (vid. under iii. 1); every attempt in passages such as this to retain the unweakened primary meaning of the word runs out into groundless and fruitless subtlety. Cf. Berachoth 5a, אָרַם . . . הִפְיָז לָהּ, "a man who buys a thing from another." On the other hand, there is doubt about the meaning of the clause assigning the reason. It seems to be intended, that over him who is high, who oppresses those under him, there stands one who is higher, who in turn oppresses him, and thereby becomes the executor of punishment upon him; and that these, the high and the higher, have over them a Most High, viz. God, who will bring them to an account (Knobel, Ew., Elst., Vaih., Hengst., Zöckl.). None of the old translators and expositors rises, it is true, to the knowledge that גְּבוּיִים may be pl. majestatis,<sup>1</sup> but the first גְּבוּיִים the Targ. renders by אֱלֹהֵי אֲדִירִי. This was natural to the Jewish usus loq., for גְּבוּיִים in the post-bibl. Heb. is a favourite name for God, e.g. Beza 20b, Jebamoth 87a, Kamma 13a: "from the table of God" (מִשְׁלַחַן גְּבוּיִים), i.e. the altar (cf. Heb. xiii. 10; 1 Cor. x. 21).<sup>2</sup> The interpretation of גְּבוּיִים, however, as the pl. majest., has in the Book of Koheleth itself a support in בּוֹרְאֵי, xii. 1; and the thought in which 7b climactically terminates accords essentially with iii. 17. This explanation, however, of 7b does not stand the test. For if an unrighteous

<sup>1</sup> That is surprising, since the Talm. interpretation, Menachoth 110a, even brings it about that לב, v. 10, is to be understood of God.

<sup>2</sup> חֲלֵק גְּבוּיִים is also a common Rabbin. name for the tithes and offerings (cf. e.g. Nachmani under Gen. xiv. 20). Along with חֲלֵק הַגְּבוּיִים, the sacrifices are also called (in Hurwitz' work on the Heb. rites, known by the abbreviated title ש"ל) המורם לגְּבוּיִים; vid. 85b of the ed. 1764, and 23b of the Amsterdam ed. 1707 of the abridgment.

administration of justice, if violence is in vogue instead of right, that is an actual proof that over him who is high no human higher one watches who may put a check upon him, and to whom he feels that he is responsible. And that above them both one who is Most High stands, who will punish injustice and avenge it, is a consolatory argument against vexation, but is no explanatory reason of the phenomenon, such as we expect after the noli mirari; for אֲלֹהֵינוּ does not signify "be not offended" (John xvi. 1), or, "think it not strange" (1 Pet. iv. 12), which would be otherwise expressed (cf. under Ps. xxxvii. 1), but μὴ θαυμάσῃς (LXX.). Also the contrast, ver. 8, warrants the conclusion that in ver. 7 the author seeks to explain the want of legal order from the constitution of a despotic state as distinguished from patriarchal government. For this reason שָׂמַר will not be meant of over-watching, which has its aim in the execution of legal justice and official duty, but of egoistic watching,—not, however, as Hitzig understands it: "they mutually protect each other's advantage; one crow does not peck out the eyes of another,"—but, on the contrary, in the sense of hostile watching, as at 1 Sam. xix. 11, 2 Sam. xi. 16, as B. Bardach understands it: "he watches for the time when he may gain the advantage over him who is high, who is yet lower than himself, and may strengthen and enrich himself with his flesh or his goods." Over the one who is high, who oppresses the poor and is a robber in respect of right and justice, there stands a higher, who on his part watches how he can plunder him to his own aggrandisement; and over both there are again other high ones, who in their own interest oppress these, as these do such as are under them. This was the state of matters in the Persian Empire in the time of the author. The satrap stood at the head of state officers. In many cases he fleeced the province to fatten himself. But over the satrap stood inspectors, who often enough built up their own fortunes by fatal denunciations; and over all stood the king, or rather the court, with its rivalry of intrigues among courtiers and royal women. The cruel death-punishments to which disagreeable officials were subjected were fearful. There was a gradation of bad government and arbitrary domination from high to low and from low to high, and no word is more fitting for this state of things in Persia than שָׂמַר; for watching, artfully lurking as spies for an opportunity to accomplish the downfall of each other, was prevalent in the Persian Empire, especially when falling into decay.

Ver. 8 [9]. The author, on the other hand, now praises the patriarchal form of government based on agriculture, whose king takes pride, not in bloody conquests and tyrannical caprice, but in the peaceful promotion of the welfare of his people: "But the advantage of a country consists always in a king given to the arable land." What impossibilities have been found here, even by the most recent expositors! Ewald, Heiligst., Elster, Zöckl. translate: rex agro factus = terrae praefectus; but, in the language of this book, not עבר but מלך עשה is the expression used for "to make a king." Gesen., Win., de Wette, Knobel, Vaih. translate: rex qui colitur a terra (civibus). But could a country, in the sense of its population in subjection to the king, be more inappropriately designated than by שָׂרָה? Besides, עבר certainly gains the meaning of colere where God is the object; but with a human ruler as the object it means servire and nothing more, and נִעְבְּרָה<sup>1</sup> can mean nothing else than "dienstbar gemacht" [made subject to], not "honoured." Along with this signification, related denom. to עָבַר, נִעְבְּרָה, referred from its primary signification to שָׂרָה, the open fields (from שָׂרָה, to go out in length and breadth), may also, after the phrase עֲבַר הָאֲדוּמָה, signify cultivated, wrought, tilled; and while the phrase "made subject to" must be certainly held as possible (Rashi, Aben Ezra, and others assume it without hesitation), but is without example, the Niph. occurs, e.g. at Ezek. xxxvi. 9, in the latter signification, of the mountains of Israel: "ye shall be tilled." Under 8a, Hitzig, and with him Stuart and Zöckler, makes the misleading remark that the Chethib is בְּכַל־הָיָא, and that it is = בְּכַל־יָאֵת, according to which the explanation is then given: the protection and security which an earthly ruler secures is, notwithstanding this, not to be disparaged. But הָיָא is Chethib, for which the Keri substitutes הָיָא; בְּכַל is Chethib without Keri; and that בְּכַל is thus a modification of the text, and that, too, an objectionable one, since בְּכַל־הָיָא, in the sense of "in all this," is unheard of. The Keri seeks, without any necessity, to make the pred. and subj. like one another in gender; without necessity, for הָיָא may also be neut.: the advantage of a land is this, viz. what follows. And how בְּכַל is to be understood is seen from Ezra x. 17, where it is to be explained: And they prepared<sup>2</sup> the sum of the men, i.e. the list of the men, of such as had married strange wives; cf. 1 Chron. vii. 5. Accordingly כָּל means, as the author generally uses הָכֵל mostly in the impersonal sense of omnia: in omnibus, in all things = by all means; or: in universum, in general. Were the words accentuated מֶלֶךְ לְשָׂדֶה נֶעֱבֵר, the adjct. connection of 'נע' ל'ש' would thereby be shown; according to which the LXX. and Theod. translate τοῦ ἀγροῦ εἰργασμένου; Symm., with the Syr., דָּהַי חֹרֶף עֵיִרְגָּאִסְמֵינְי: "a king for the cultivated land," i.e. one who regards this as a chief object. Luzz. thus indeed accentuates; but the best established accentuation is מֶלֶךְ לְשָׂדֶה נֶעֱבֵר. This separation of נֶעֱבֵר from ל'ש' can only be intended to denote that נֶעֱבֵר is to be referred not to it, but to מֶלֶךְ, according to which the Targ. paraphrases. The meaning remains the same: a king subject (who has become a servus) to the cultivated land, rex agro addictus, as Dathe, Rosenm., and others translate, is a still more distinct expression of that which "a king for the well-cultivated field" would denote: an agriculture-king,—one who is addicted, not to wars, law-suits, and sovereign stubbornness in his opinions, but who delights in the peaceful advancement of the prosperity of his country, and especially takes a lively interest in husbandry and the cultivation of the land. The order of the words in 8b is like that at ix. 2; cf. Isa. viii. 22, xxii. 2. The author thus praises, in contrast to a despotic state, a patriarchal kingdom based on agriculture.

THE UNCERTAINTY OF RICHES, AND THE CHEERFUL ENJOYMENT OF LIFE
WHICH ALONE IS PRAISEWORTHY.—V. 9 [10]—VI. 6.

If we fix our attention on the word תְּבִיאָה 9a, which properly denotes that which comes into the barn from without (eg. Prov. xiv. 4), ver. 9 seems to continue the praise of husbandry, as Rashi, Aben Ezra, Luzzatto, Bardach, and others have already concluded. But the thought that one cannot eat money is certainly not that which is intended in 9a; and in 9b the thought would be awkwardly and insufficiently expressed, that it is vain to love riches, and not, on the contrary, the fruit of agriculture. Therefore we are decidedly of opinion that here (cf. above, p. 182), with ver. 9, the foregoing series of proverbs does not come to a close, but makes a new departure.

Ver. 9 [10]. "He who loveth silver is not satisfied with silver; and he whose love cleaveth to abundance, hath nothing of it: also this is vain." The transition in this series of proverbs is not unmediated; for the injustice which, according to ver. 7, prevails in the state as it now is becomes subservient to covetousness, in the very nature of which there lies insatiableness: semper avarus eget, hunc nulla pecunia replet. That the author speaks of the "sacra fames argenti" (not auri) arises from this, that not זָהָב, but כֶּסֶף, is the specific word for coin.<sup>1</sup> Mendelssohn-Friedländer also explains: "He who loveth silver is not satisfied with silver," i.e. it does not make him full; that might perhaps be linguistically possible (cf. e.g. Prov. xii. 11), although the author would in that case probably have written the words הַכֶּסֶף לֹא יִשְׂבֵּר, after vi. 3; but "to be not full of money" is, after i. 8, and especially iv. 8, Hab. ii. 5, cf. Prov. xxvii. 20 = never to have enough of money, but always to desire more.

That which follows, 9aβ, is, according to Hitz., a question: And who hath joy in abundance, which bringeth nothing in? But such questions, with the answer to be supplied, are not in Koheleth's style; and what would then be understood by capital without interest? Others, as Zöckler, supply עֲצֵר: and he that loveth abundance of possessions (is) not (full) of income; but that which is gained by these hard ellipses is only a tautology. With right, the Targ., Syr., Jerome, the Venet., and Luther take lo t'vuah as the answer or conclusion: and who clings to abundance of possessions with his love?—he has no fruit thereof; or, with a weakening of the interrog. pronoun into the relative (as at i. 9; cf. under Ps. xxxiv. 13): he who . . . clings has nothing of it. Hamon signifies a tumult, a noisy multitude, particularly of earthly goods, as at Ps. xxxvii. 16; 1 Chron. xxix. 16; Isa. lx. 5. The connection of הָמָוֶה with ב, occurring only here, follows the analogy of בַּיְדֵי and the like. The conclusion is synon. with t'vilti ho'il; e.g. Isa. xlv. 10; Jer. vii. 8. All the Codd. read לֹא; לֹא in this sense would be meaningless.<sup>2</sup> The designation of advantage by t'vuah may be occasioned by the foregoing agricultural proverb. In the t'vuah, the farmer enjoys the fruit of his labour; but he who hangs his heart on the continual tumult, noise, pomp of more numerous and greater possessions if possible, to him all real profit—i.e. all pleasant, peaceful enjoyment—is lost. With the increase of the possessions there is an increase also of unrest, and the possessor has in reality nothing but the sight of them.

Ver. 10 [11]. "When property and goods increase, they become many who consume them; and what advantage hath the owner thereof but the sight of [them with] his eyes?" The verb רָבַה signifies to increase, and רַבִּים, to be many; but also (which Böttch. denies) inchoatively: to become many, Gen. vi. 1; rightly, the LXX., ἐπληθύν- θησαν. The author has not a miser in view, who shuts up his money in chests, and only feeds himself in looking at it with closed doors; but a covetous man, of the sort spoken of in Ps. xlix. 12, Isa. v. 8. If the hattovah, the possession of such an one, increases, in like manner the number of people whom he must maintain increases also, and thus the number of those who eat of it along with him, and at the same time also his disquiet and care, increase; and what advantage, what useful result (vid. regarding Kishron, above, p. 193, and under ii. 21) has the owner of these good things from them but the beholding of them (r<sup>e</sup>ith; Keré, r<sup>e</sup>uth; cf. the reverse case, Ps. cxxvi. 4)?—the possession does not in itself bring happiness, for it is never great enough to satisfy him, but is yet great enough to fill him with great care as to whether he may be able to support the demands of so great a household: the fortune which it brings to him consists finally only in this, that he can look on all he has accumulated with proud self-complacency.

Ver. 11 [12]. He can also eat that which is good, and can eat much; but he does not on that account sleep more quietly than the labourer who lives from hand to mouth: "Sweet is the sleep of the labourer, whether he eats little or much; but, on the contrary, the abundance of the rich does not permit him to sleep." The LXX., instead of "labourer," uses the word "slave" (δούλου), as if the original were עֶבֶר. But, as a rule, sound sleep is the reward of earnest labour; and since there are idle servants as well as active masters, there is no privilege to servants. The Venet. renders rightly by "of the husbandman" (ἐργάτου), the עֶבֶר הָאֲדָמָה; the "labourer" in general is called עַמֵּל, iv. 8 and Judg. v. 26, post-bibl. פֶּעַל. The labourer enjoys sweet, i.e. refreshing, sound sleep, whether his fare be abundant or scanty—the labour rewards him by sweet sleep, notwithstanding his poverty; while, on the contrary, the sleep of the rich is hindered and disturbed by his abundance, not: by his satiety, viz. repletion, as Jerome remarks: incocto cibo in stomachi angustiis aestuante; for the labourer also, if he eats much, eats his fill; and why should sufficiency have a different result in the one from what it has in the other? As עֶבֶר means satiety, not over-satiety; so, on the other hand, it means, objectively, sufficient and plentifully existing fulness to meet the wants of man, Prov. iii. 10, and the word is meant thus objectively here: the fulness of possession which the rich has at his disposal does not permit him to sleep, for all kinds of projects, cares, anxieties regarding it rise within him, which follow him into the night, and do not suffer his mind to be at rest, which is a condition of sleep. The expression עֶבֶר הָאֲדָמָה is the circum- locutio of the genit. relation, like 'לב . . . 'הל, Ruth ii. 3; 'אמ . . . 'נע (LXX. 'Αμνὸν τῆς 'Αχινόαμ), 2 Sam. iii. 2. Heiligstedt remarks that it stands for שָׁבַע העשיר; but the nouns צָמַץ, רָעַב, שָׁבַע form no const., for which reason the circumloc. was necessary; שָׁבַע is the constr. of שָׁבַע. Falsely, Ginsburg: "aber der Ueberfluss den Reichen —er lässt ihn nicht schlafen" [but superabundance the rich—it doth not suffer him to sleep]; but this construction is neither in accordance with the genius of the German nor of the Heb. language. Only the subject is resumed in אֵינִי (as in i. 7); the construction of הִינִי is as at 1 Chron. xvi. 21; cf. Ps. cv. 14. Of the two Hiphil forms, the properly Heb. הִינִי and the Aramaizing הִינִי, the latter is used in the weakened meaning of éâv, sinere.

After showing that riches bring to their possessor no real gain, but, instead of that, dispeace, care, and unrest, the author records as a great evil the loss, sometimes suddenly, of wealth carefully amassed.

Vers. 12, 13 [13, 14]. "There is a sore evil which I have seen under the sun, riches kept by their possessor to his hurt: the same riches perish by an evil event; and he hath begotten a son, thus this one hath nothing in his hand." There is a gradation of evils. רָעָה (cf. חֹלָה רָע, vi. 2) is not an ordinary, but a morbid evil, i.e. a deep hurtful evil; as a wound, not a common one, but one particularly severe and scarcely curable, is called נִחְלָה, e.g. Nah. iii. 19. 'הש . . . 'רא is, as at x. 5, an ellipt. relat. clause; cf. on the other hand, vi. 1; the author elsewhere uses the scheme of the relat. clause without relat. pron. (vid. under i. 13, iii. 16); the old language would use רָאִיתִי, instead of רָאִיתִי, with the reflex. pron. The great evil consists in this, that riches are not seldom kept by their owner to his own hurt. Certainly שָׁמַר לְ can also mean that which is kept for another, 1 Sam. ix. 24; but how involved and constrained is Ginsburg's explanation: "hoarded up (by the rich man) for their (future) owner," viz. the heir to whom he intends to leave them! That לְ can be used with the passive as a designation of the subj., vid. Ewald, § 295c; certainly it corresponds as little as ἵν with the Greek ἵπó, but in Greek we say also πλοῦτος φυλαχθεὶς τῷ κερτημένῳ, vid. Rost's Syntax, § 112. 4. The suff. of l'ra'atho refers to b'alav, the plur. form of which can so far remain out of view, that we even say adonim qosheh, Isa. xix. 4, etc. "To his hurt," i.e. at the last suddenly to lose that which has been carefully guarded. The narrative explanation of this, "to his hurt," begins with van explic. Regarding 'inyan ra', vid. above, p. 194. It is a casus adversus that is meant, such a stroke upon stroke as destroyed Job's possessions. The perf. 'הוּ supposes the case that the man thus suddenly made poor is the father of a son ; the clause is logically related to that which follows as hypothet. antecedent, after the scheme, Gen. xxxiii. 13*b*. The loss of riches would of itself make one who is alone unhappy, for the misfortune to be poor is less than the misfortunes to be rich and then to become poor ; but still more unfortunate is the father who thought that by well-guarded wealth he had secured the future of his son, and who now leaves him with an empty hand.

What now follows is true of this rich man, but is generalized into a reference to every rich man, and then is recorded as a second great evil. As a man comes naked into the world, so also he departs from it again without being able to take with him any of the earthly wealth he has acquired.

Ver. 14 [15]. "As he came forth from his mother's womb, naked shall he again depart as he came, and not the least will he carry away for his labour, which he could take with him in his hand." In 13*a* the author has the case of Job in his mind ; this verse before us is a reminiscence from Job i. 21, with the setting aside of the difficult word שָׁמַח found there, which Sirach xl. 1 exhibits. With "naked" begins emphatically the main subject ; כָּאֵשֶׁר בָּא = כִּשְׁבָא is the intensifying resumption of the comparison ; the contrast of לָקַח, going away, excedere vitā, is בֵּא of the entrance on life, coming into the world. מֵאֵינָה (according to the root meaning and use, corresponding to the French point, Olsh. § 205*a*) emphatically precedes the negation, as at Judg. xiv. 6 (cf. the emphasis reached in a different way, Ps. xlix. 18). אֵשׁ signifies here, as at ver. 18, Ps. xxiv. 5, to take hence, to take forth, to carry away. The ב of בָּעַ is not partitive (Aben Ezra compares Lev. viii. 32), according to which Jerome and Luther translate de labore suo, but is the Beth pretii, as e.g. at 1 Kings xvi. 34, as the Chald. understands it ; Nolde cites for this Beth pretii passages such as ii. 24, but incorrectly. Regarding the subjunctive שִׁיבֶה, quod auferat, vid. above, No. 2, p. 197. We might also with the LXX. and Symm. punctuate שִׁיבֶה : which might accompany him in his hand, but which could by no means denote, as Hitzig thinks : (for his trouble), which goes through his hand. Such an expression is not used ; and Hitzig's supposition, that here the rich man who has lost his wealth is the subject, does not approve itself.

Ver. 15 [16]. A transition is now made to rich men as such, and the registering formula which should go before ver. 14 here follows : "And this also is a sore evil : altogether exactly as he came, thus shall he depart : and what gain hath he that laboureth in the wind ?"

Regarding הַ, vid. above, No. 4, p. 198 ; and regarding שׁ בְּלֵעַ<sup>1</sup> vid. p. 196. The writing of these first two as one word [vid. note below] accords with Ibn-Giat's view, accidentally quoted by Kimchi, that the word is compounded of כּ of comparison, and the frequently occurring לְעַמַּת always retaining its ל, and ought properly to be pointed בְּלֵעַ (cf. מִלְּךָ, 1 Kings vii. 20). עֲמָה signifies combination, society, one thing along with or parallel to another ; and thus לְעַמַּת bears no כּ, since it is itself a word of comparison, בְּלֵעַמַּת "altogether parallel," "altogether the same." The question : what kind of advantage (vid. i. 3) is to him (has he) of this that . . . , carries its answer in itself. Labouring for the wind or in the wind, his labour is רְעוּיָהּ (רְעוּיָהּ), and thus fruitless. And, moreover, how miserable an existence is this life of labour leading to nothing !

Ver. 16 [17]. "Also all his life long he eateth in darkness and grieveth himself much, and oh for his sorrow and hatred !" We might place ver. 16 under the regimen of the שׁ of 'שׂע' of ver. 15*b* ; but the Heb. style prefers the self-dependent form of sentences to that which is governed. The expression 16*a* has something strange. This strangeness disappears if, with Ewald and Heiligst., after the LXX. and Jerome, for יֹאכֵל we read יֹאכֵל : καὶ ἐν πένθει ; Böttch. prefers וְאִפְּלַי, "and in darkness." Or also, if we read יֹאכֵל for יֹאכֵל ; thus the Midrash here, and several codd. by Kennicott ; but the Targ., Syr., and Masora read יֹאכֵל. Hitzig gets rid of that which is strange in this passage by taking בְּלֵי־יָמָיו as accus. of the obj., not of the time : all his days, his whole life he consumes in darkness ; but in Heb. as in Lat. we say : consumere dies vitae, Job xxi. 13, xxxvi. 11, but not comedere ; and why should the expression, "to eat in darkness," not be a figurative expression for a faithless, gloomy life, as elsewhere "to sit in darkness" (Mic. vii. 8), and "to walk in darkness" ? It is meant that all his life long he ate לֶחֶם אֲוִיִּים, the bread of sorrow, or לֶחֶם לַחַיִּי, prison fare ; he did not allow himself pleasant table comforts in a room comfortably or splendidly lighted, for it is unnecessary to understand הַשֶּׁזֶּף subjectively and figuratively (Hitz., Zöck.).

In 16*b* the traditional punctuation is וְיֹכֵעַם.<sup>2</sup> The perf. ruled by the preceding fut. is syntactically correct, and the verb יֹכֵעַם is common with the author, vii. 9. Hitzig regards the text as corrupt, and reads בהליו and בנעם, and explains: and (he consumes or swallows) much grief in his, etc.; the phrase, "to eat sorrow," may be allowed (cf. Prov. xxvi. 6, cf. Job xv. 16); but יאכל, as the representative of two so bold and essentially different metaphors, would be in point of style in bad taste. If the text is corrupt, it may be more easily rectified by reading וְנֶעַם הַרְבֵּה וְהָלִי לוֹ וְקָ: and grief in abundance, and sorrow has he, and wrath. We merely suggest this. Ewald, Burger, and Böttch. read only וְנֶעַם הַרְבֵּה וְהָלִי; but לוֹ is not to be dispensed with, and can easily be reduced to a mere vav. Elster retains וְנֶעַם, and reads, like Hitzig, בהליו: he grieves himself much in his sorrow and wrath; but in that case the word וקצפו was to be expected; also in this way the ideas do not psychologically accord with each other. However the text is taken, we must interpret והליו וקצף as an exclamation, like הֵפֵּה, Isa. xxix. 16; הֵפֵּה, Jer. xlix. 16; Ewald, § 328a, as we have done above. That וְהָ of itself is a subst. clause = והליו is untenable; the rendering of the noun as forming a clause, spoken of under ii. 21, is of a different character.<sup>1</sup> He who by his labour and care aims at becoming rich, will not only lay upon himself unnecessary privations, but also have many sorrows; for many of his plans fail, and the greater success of others awakens his envy, and neither he himself nor others satisfy him; he is morbidly disposed, and as he is diseased in mind, so also in body, and his constantly increasing dissatisfaction becomes at last קצף, he grumbles at himself, at God, and all the world. From observing such persons, Paul says of them (1 Tim. vi. 6 f.): "They have pierced themselves through (transfoderunt) with many sorrows."

<sup>1</sup> In H. written as one word : בְּלֵעַמַּת. Parchon (Lex. under עַמַּת) had this form before him. In his Lex. Kimchi bears evidence in favour of the correct writing as two words.

<sup>2</sup> Thus in correct texts, in H. with the note : ב' מִלְרַע, viz. here and at Ps. cxii. 10, only there y has, according to tradition, the Kametz. Cf. Mas. fin. 52*b*, and Baer's Ed. of Psalter, under Ps. cxii. 10.

In view of these great evils, with which the possession of riches also is connected: of their deceitful instability, and their merely belonging to this present life, Koheleth returns to his ceterum censeo.

Ver. 17 [18]. "Behold then what I have seen as good, what as beautiful (is this): that one eat and drink and see good in all his labour with which he wearieth himself, under the sun, throughout the number of the days of his life which God hath given him; for that is his portion." Toward this seeing, i.e. knowing from his own experience, his effort went forth, according to ii. 3; and what he here, vers. 17, 18, expresses as his resultat, he has already acknowledged at ii. 24 and iii. 12 f. With "behold" he here returns to it; for he says, that from the observations just spoken of, as from others, no other resultat befell him. Instead of ר' טֹבָה (here and at vi. 6), he as often uses the words ראה טוב, iii. 13, ii. 24, or בְּטוֹב, ii. 1. In רָא, the seeing is meant of that of mental apperception; in רָא, of immediate perception, experience. Our translation above does not correspond with the accentuation of the verse, which belongs to the class of disproportionately long verses without Athnach; cf. Gen. xxi. 9; Num. ix. 1; Isa. xxxvi. 1; Jer. xiii. 13, li. 37; Ezek. xlii. 10; Amos v. 1; 1 Chron. xxvi. 26, xxviii. 1; 2 Chron. xxiii. 1. The sentence וְאֵי ... הִנֵּה (with pausal āni with Rebia) constitutes the beginning of the verse, in the form, as it were, of a superscription; and then its second part, the main proposition, is divided by the disjunctives following each other: Telisha Gedhola, Geresh, Legarmeh, Rebia, Tebir, Tifcha, Silluk (cf. Jer. viii. 1, where Pazer instead of Telisha Gedhola; but as for the rest, the sequence of the accents is the same). Among the moderns, Hengst. holds to the accents, for he translates in strict accordance therewith, as Tremellius does: "Behold what I have seen: that it is fine and good (Trem. bonum pulchrum) to eat..." The asher in the phrase, tov asher-yapheh, then connects it together: good which is at the same time beautiful; Grätz sees here the Greek καλὸν κάγαθόν. But the only passage to which, since Kimchi, reference is made for this use of asher, viz. Hos. xii. 8, does not prove it; for we are not, with Drusius, to translate there by: iniquitas quae sit peccatum, but by quae poenam mereat. The accentuation here is not correct. The second asher is without doubt the resumption of the first; and the translation—as already Dachsel in his Biblia Accentuata indicated: ecce itaque quod vidi bonum, quod pulchrum (hoc est ut quis edat)—presents the true relation of the component parts of the sentence. The suffix of וְאֵי refers to the general subj. contained in the inf.; cf. viii. 15. The period of time denoted by מִסְפֵּר is as at ii. 3, vi. 12. Also we read הֵלֵל ... בֵּי, iii. 22, in the same connection.

Ver. 18 [19]. This verse, expressing the same, is constructed anakolouthistically, altogether like iii. 13: "Also for every man to whom God hath given riches and treasures, and hath given him power to eat thereof, and to take his portion, and to rejoice in his labour; just this is a gift of God." The anakolouthon can be rendered [into English] here as little as it can at iii. 13; for if we allow the phrase, "also every man," the "also" remains fixed to the nearest conception, while in the Heb. it governs the whole long sentence, and, at the nearest, belongs to הֵלֵל. Cheerful enjoyment is in this life that which is most advisable; but also it is not made possible in itself by the possession of earthly treasures,—it is yet a special gift of God added thereto. N'chasim, besides here, occurs also in Josh. xxii. 8; 2 Chron. i. 11 f.; and in the Chald. of the Book of Ezra, vi. 8, vii. 26. Also hishlit, to empower, to make possible, is Aram., Dan. ii. 38, 48, as well as Heb., Ps. cxix. 133; the prevalence of the verbal stem שִׁלַּח is characteristic of the Book of Koheleth. Helqo, "his portion," is just the cheerful enjoyment as that which man has here below of life, if he has any of it at all.

Ver. 19 [20]. Over this enjoyment he forgets the frailty and the darkened side of this life. It proves itself to be a gift of God, a gift from above: "For he doth not (then) think much of the days of his life; because God answereth the joy of his heart." Such an one, permitted by God to enjoy this happiness of life, is thereby prevented from tormenting himself by reflections regarding its transitoriness. Incorrectly, Hengst.: Remembrance and enjoyment of this life do not indeed last long, according to Ewald, who now, however, rightly explains: He will not, by constant reflection on the brevity of his life, too much embitter this enjoyment; because God, indeed, grants to him true heart-joy as the fairest gift. The meaning of 19b is also, in general, hit upon. The LXX. translates: "because God occupies him with the joy of his heart;" but for that we ought to have had the word מְעַנֶּה; Jerome helps it, for he reads בְּשִׂמְחָה instead of בְּשִׂמְחָה: eo quod Deus occupet deliciis cor ejus. But also, in this form, this explanation of מְעַנֶּה is untenable; for עָנָה, the causat. of which would be מְעַנֶּה, signifies, in the style of Koheleth, not in general to busy oneself with something, but to weary oneself with something; hence עָנָה בֵּשׂ cannot mean: to be occupied with joy, and thereby to be drawn away from some other thing. And since the explanation: "he makes him sing," needs no argument to dispose of it, מְעַנֶּה thus remains only as the Hiph. of עָנָה, to meet, to respond to, grant a request. Accordingly, Hitz., like Aben Ezra and Kimchi, comparing Hos. ii. 23 f.: God makes to answer, i.e. so works that all things which have in or of themselves that which can make him glad, must respond to his wish. But the omission of the obj.—of which Hitz. remarks, that because indefinite it is left indefinite—is insufferably hard, and the explanation thus ambiguous. Most interpreters translate: for God answers (Ges. Heb. Wört. B., incorrectly: answered) him with joy of his heart, i.e. grants this to him in the way of answer. Ewald compares Ps. lxxv. 6; but that affords no voucher for the expression: to answer one with something = to grant it to him; for עָנָה is there connected with a double accus., and בְּצִדְקָה is the adv. statement of the way and manner. But above all, against this interpretation is the fact of the want of the personal obj.

The author behoved to have written מענה אהו or מענהי. We take the Hiph. as in the sense of the Kal, but give it its nearest signification: to answer, and explain, as in a similar manner Seb. Schmid, Rambam, and others have already done: God answers to the joy of his heart, i.e. He assents to it, or (using an expression which is an exact equivalent), He corresponds to it. This makes the joy a heart-joy, i.e. a joy which a man feels not merely externally, but in the deepest recess of his heart, for the joy penetrates his heart and satisfies it (Song iii. 11; Isa. xxx. 29; Jer. xv. 16). A similar expression, elsewhere not found, we had at ver. 9 in אהב ב. Why should not ב ענה (הענה) be possible with ענהי, just as ἀμείβεσθαι πρὸς τι is with ἀμείβεσθαι τινι? For the rest, בש' לב' is not needed as obj.; we can take it also as an expression of the state or condition: God gives answer in the heart-joy of such an one. In ענה, to answer, to hear the answer, is thought of as granting a request; here, as giving assent to. Job xxxv. 9 affords a twofold suitable example, that the Hiph. can have an enlarged Kal signification.

After the author has taken the opportunity of once more expressing his ultimatum, he continues to register the sad evils that cling to wealth.

vi. 1, 2. "There is an evil which I have seen under the sun, and in great weight it lies upon man: a man to whom God giveth riches, and treasures, and honour, and he wanteth nothing for his soul of all that he may wish, but God giveth him not power to have enjoyment of it, for a strange man hath the enjoyment: that is vanity and an evil disease." The author presents the result of personal observation; but inasmuch as he relates it in the second tense, he generalizes the matter, and places it scenically before the eyes of the reader. A similar introduction with אש, but without the unnecessary asher, is found at v. 12, x. 5. Regarding רבה, vid. under viii. 6; על does not denote the subj., as at ii. 17: it appears great to a man, but it has its nearest lying local meaning; it is a great (ii. 21) evil, pressing in its greatness heavily upon man. The evil is not the man himself, but the condition in which he is placed, as when, e.g., the kingdom of heaven is compared to a merchant (Matt. xiii. 45 f.),—not the merchant in himself, but his conduct and life is a figure of the kingdom of heaven.

Ver. 2. To עשר ונב', as at 2 Chron i. 11, ונב' [and honour] is added as a third thing. What follows we do not translate: "and there is nothing wanting . . .;" for that איןני with the pleonastic suff. may mean: "there is not," is not to be proved from Gen. xxxix. 9, thus: and he spares not for his soul (LXX. καὶ οὐκ κ.τ.λ.) what he always desires. הָסֵר is adj. in the sense of wanting, lacking, as at 1 Sam. xxi. 16 ; 1 Kings xi. 22 ; Prov. xii. 9. לְנַפְשׁוֹ, "for his soul," i.e. his person, is = the synon. לְעַצְמוֹ found in the later usage of the language ; מִן (different from the min, iv. 8) is, as at Gen. vi. 2, partitive. The נִכְרִי, to whom this considerable estate, satisfying every wish, finally comes, is certainly not the legal heir (for that he enters into possession, in spite of the uncertainty of his moral character, ii. 19, would be in itself nothing less than a misfortune, yet perfectly in order, v. 13 [14]), but some stranger without any just claim, not directly a foreigner (Heiligst.), but, as Burger explains: talis qui proprie nullum habet jus in bona ejus cui נכרי dicitur (cf. נְכַרְיָהּ of the unmarried wife in the Book of Proverbs).

That wealth without enjoyment is nothing but vanity and an evil disease, the author now shows by introducing another historical figure, and thereby showing that life without enjoyment is worse than never to have come into existence at all :

Ver. 3. "If a man begat an hundred, and lived many years, and the amount of the days of his years was great, and his soul satisfied not itself in good, and also he had no grave, then I say : Better than he is the untimely birth." The accentuation of 3*a* is like that of 2*a*. The disjunctives follow the Athnach, as at 2 Kings xxiii. 13, only that there Telisha Gedhola stands for Pazer. Hitzig finds difficulty with the clause לִי . . . וְנֹכַח, and regards it as a marginal gloss to 5*a*, taken up into the text at a wrong place. But just the unexpected form and the accidental nature, more than the inward necessity of this feature in the figure, leads us to conclude that the author here connects together historical facts, as conjecturally noted above at pp. 214, 215, into one fanciful picture. מֵאָהָה is obviously to be supplemented by בניים (ובנות) ; the Targ. and Midrash make this man to be Cain, Ahab, Haman, and show at least in this that they extend down into the time of the Persian kingdom a spark of historical intelligence. שָׁנָי הֵרָב interchanges with שָׁנָי הֵרָב, xi. 8, as at Neh. xi. 30. In order to designate the long life emphatically, the author expresses the years particularly in days : "and if it is much which (Heiligst. : multum est quod) the days of his years amount to ;" cf. יְהִי יָמֵי in Gen. v. With v'naphsho there follows the reverse side of this long life with many children : (1) his soul satisfies not itself, i.e. has no self-satisfying enjoyment of the good (min, as at Ps. civ. 13, etc.), i.e. of all the good things which he possesses,—in a word, he is not happy in his life ; and (2) an honourable burial is not granted to him, but קֵבֶר הָיָה, Jer. xxii. 19, which is the contrary of a burial such as becomes a man (the body of Artaxerxes Ochus was thrown to the cats); whereupon Elster rightly remarks that in an honourable burial and an honourable remembrance, good fortune, albeit shaded with sadness, might be seen. But when now, to one so rich in children and so long-lived, neither enjoyment of his good fortune nor even this shaded glory of an honourable burial is allowed, the author cannot otherwise judge than that the untimely birth is better than he. In this section regarding the uncertainty of riches, we have already, v. 14, fallen on a reminiscence from the Book of Job; it is so much the more probable that here also Job iii. 16 has an influence on the formation of the thought. נֶפֶל is the foetus which comes lifeless from the mother's womb.

Vers. 4, 5. The comparison of an untimely birth with such a man is in favour of the former: "For it cometh in nothingness and departeth in darkness; and with darkness its name is covered. Moreover, it hath not seen the sun, and hath not known: it is better with it than with that other." It has entered into existence, בְּהֶבֶל, because it was a lifeless existence into which it entered when its independent life should have begun; and בְּחֹשֶׁךְ, it departeth, for it is carried away in all quietness, without noise or ceremony, and "with darkness" its name is covered, for it receives no name and remains a nameless existence, and is forgotten as if it had never been. Not having entered into a living existence, it is also (gam) thus happy to have neither seen the sun nor known and named it, and thus it is spared the sight and the knowledge of all the vanities and evils, the deceptions and sorrows, that are under the sun. When we compare its fate with the long joyless life of that man, the conclusion is apparent: 'ק' . . . נִחַת, plus quietis est huic quam illi, which, with the generalization of the idea of rest (Job iii. 13) in a wider sense (vid. above, p. 194), is = melius est huic quam illi (וְהוּא . . . וְהוּא, as at iii. 19). The generalization of the idea proceeds yet further in the Mishn. נוח לו, e.g.: "It is better (נוח לו לאדם) for a man that he throw himself into a lime-kiln than that (ואל), etc." From this usage Symm. renders 'ק' . . . נִחַת as obj. to לֹא יָדַע, and translates: οὐδὲ ἐπειράθη; διαφορᾶς ἑτέρου πράγματος πρὸς ἕτερον; and Jerome: neque cognovit distantiam boni et mali,—a rendering which is to be rejected, because thus the point of the comparison in which it terminates is broken, for 5b draws the facit. It is true that this contains a thought to which it is not easy to reconcile oneself. For supposing that life were not in itself, as over against non-existence, a good, there is yet scarcely any life that is absolutely joyless; and a man who has become the father of an hundred children, has, as it appears, sought the enjoyment of life principally in sexual love, and then also has found it richly. But also, if we consider his life less as relating to sense: his children, though not all, yet partly, will have been a joy to him; and has a family life, so lengthened and rich in blessings, only thorns, and no roses at all? And, moreover, how can anything be said of the rest of an untimely birth, which has been without motion and without life, as of a rest excelling the termination of the life of him who has lived long, since rest without a subjective reflection, a rest not felt, certainly does not fall under the point of view of more or less, good or evil? The saying of the author on no side bears the probe of exact thinking. In the main he designs to say: Better, certainly, is no life than a joyless life, and, moreover, one ending dishonourably. And this is only a speciality of the general clause, iv. 2 f., that death is better than life, and not being born is better than both. The author misunderstands the fact that the earthly life has its chief end beyond itself; and his false eudaemonism, failing to penetrate to the inward fountain of true happiness, which is independent of the outward lot, makes exaggerated and ungrateful demands on the earthly life.

Ver. 6. A life extending to more than even a thousand years without enjoyment appears to him worthless: "And if he has lived twice a thousand years long, and not seen good—Do not all go hence to one place?" This long period of life, as well as the shortest, sinks into the night of Sheol, and has advantage over the shortest if it wants the רְאוּת ט', i.e. the enjoyment of that which can make man happy. That would be correct if "good" were understood inwardly, ethically, spiritually; but although, according to Koheleth's view, the fear of God presides over the enjoyment of life, regulating and hallowing it, yet it remains unknown to him that life deepened into fellowship with God is in itself a most real and blessed, and thus the highest good. Regarding אֵלֵי (here, as at Esth. vii. 4, with perf. foll.: etsi vixisset, tamen interrogarem: nonne, etc.), vid. above, p. 191; it occurs also in the oldest liturgical Tefilla, as well as in the prayer Nishmath (vid. Baer's Siddur, Abodath Jisrael, p. 207). ב' . . . אֵלֵי, a thousand years twice, and thus an Adam's life once and yet again. Otherwise Aben Ezra: 1000 years multiplied by itself, thus a million, like עֶשְׂרִים בְּעַמִּים,  $20 \times 20 = 400$ ; cf. Targ. Isa. xxx. 26, which translates שְׁבַעֵתִים by  $343 = 7 \times 7 \times 7$ . Perhaps that is right; for why was not the expression אֵלֵי שְׁנֵי directly used? The "one place" is, as at iii. 20, the grave and Hades, into which all the living fall. A life extending even to a million of years is worthless, for it terminates at last in nothing. Life has only as much value as it yields of enjoyment.

OBTAINING BETTER THAN DESIRING.—VI. 7-9.

All labour aims at enjoyment, and present actual enjoyment is always better than that which is sought for in the future.

Ver. 7. "All the labour of man is for his mouth, and yet his soul has never enough;" or, properly, it is not filled, so that it desires nothing further and nothing more; נִפְּלָא used as appropriately of the soul as of the ear, i. 8; for that the mouth and the soul are here placed opposite to one another as "organs of the purely sensual and therefore transitory enjoyment, and of the deeper and more spiritual and therefore more lasting kind of joys" (Zöck.), is an assertion which brings out of the text what it wishes to be in it,—נִפְּשׁ and נֶפֶשׁ stand here so little in contrast, that, as at Prov. xvi. 26, Isa. v. 14, xxix. 8, instead of the soul the stomach could also be named; for it is the soul longing, and that after the means from without of self-preservation, that is here meant; נֶפֶשׁ הַיָּפֶה, "beautiful soul," Chullin iv. 7, is an appetite which is not fastidious, but is contented. וְיִם, καὶ ὄμωσ, ὄμωσ δέ, as at iii. 13; Ps. cxxix. 2. All labour, the author means to say, is in the service of the impulse after self-preservation; and yet, although it concentrates all its efforts after this end, it does not bring full satisfaction to the longing soul. This is grounded in the fact that, however in other respects most unlike, men are the same in their unsatisfied longing.

Ver. 8. "For what hath the wise more than the fool; what the poor who knoweth to walk before the living?" The old translators present nothing for the interpretation, but defend the traditional text; for Jerome, like the Syr., which translates freely, follows the Midrash (fixed in the Targ.), which understands הַחַיִּים, contrary to the spirit of the book, of the blessed future. The question would be easier if we could, with Bernst. and Ginsburg, introduce a comparat. min before יִרְעֵ; we would then require to understand by him who knows to walk before the living, some one who acts a part in public life; but how strange a designation of distinguished persons would that be! Thus, as the text stands, יִרְעֵ is attrib. to לְעָנִי, what preference hath the poor, such an one, viz., as understands (vid. regarding יִרְעֵ instead of הַיִּירְעֵ, under Ps. cxliiii. 10); not: who is intelligent (Aben Ezra); יִרְעֵ is not, as at ix. 11, an idea contained in itself, but by the foll. הַחַיִּים... לְהַיִּים (cf. iv. 13, 17; and the inf. form, Ex. iii. 19; Num. xxii. 13; Job xxxiv. 23) obtains the supplement and colouring required: the sequence of the accents (Zakeph, Tifcha, Silluk, as e.g. at Gen. vii. 4) is not against this. How the LXX. understood its πορευθῆναι κατέναντι τῆς ζῶης, and the Venet. its ἀπιέναι ἀντικρὺ τῆς ζωῆς, is not clear; scarcely as Grätz, with Mendelss. : who, to go against (נגד, as at iv. 12) life, to fight against it, has to exercise himself in self-denial and patience; for “to fight with life” is an expression of modern coinage. 'חַיִּים signifies here, without doubt, not life, but the living. But we explain now, not as Ewald, who separates יוֹצֵר from the foll. inf. לִהְיוֹת: What profit has then the wise man, the intelligent, patient man, above the fool, that he walks before the living?—by which is meant (but how does this interrog. form agree thereto?), that the wise, patient man has thereby an advantage which makes life endurable by him, in this, that he does not suffer destroying eagerness of desire so to rule over him, but is satisfied to live in quietness. Also this meaning of a quiet life does not lie in the words 'חַיִּים . . . הֵלֵךְ. “To know to walk before the living” is, as is now generally acknowledged = to understand the right rule of life (Elst.), to possess the savoir vivre (Heiligst.), to be experienced in the right art of living. The question accordingly is: What advantage has the wise above the fool; and what the poor, who, although poor, yet knows how to maintain his social position? The matter treated of is the insatiable nature of sensual desire. The wise seeks to control his desire; and he who is more closely designated poor, knows how to conceal it; for he lays upon himself restraints, that he may be able to appear and make something of himself. But desire is present in both; and they have in this nothing above the fool, who follows the bent of his desire and lives for the day. He is a fool because he acts as one not free, and without consideration; but, in itself, it is and remains true, that enjoyment and satisfaction stand higher than striving and longing for a thing.

Ver. 9. “Better is the sight of the eyes than the wandering of the soul: also this is vain and windy effort.” We see from the inf. 'לִהְיוֹת interchanging with 'פָּרַח that the latter is not meant of the object (xi. 9), but of the action, viz. the “rejoicing in that which one has” (Targ.); but this does not signify grassatio,—i.e. impetus animae appetentis, ὄρησις τῆς ψυχῆς (cf. Marcus Aurelius, iii. 16), which Knobel, Heiligst., and Ginsburg compare (for הֵלֵךְ means grassari only with certain subjects, as fire, contagion, and the like; and in certain forms, as הֵלֵךְ for הֵלֵךְ, to which הֵלֵךְ = לָכַח does not belong),—but erratio, a going out in extent, roving to a distance (cf. הֵלֵךְ, wanderer), ρεμβασμὸς ἐπιθυμίας, Wisd. iv. 12.—Going is the contrast of rest; the soul which does not become full or satisfied goes out, and seeks and reaches not its aim. This insatiableness, characteristic of the soul, this endless unrest, belongs also to the miseries of this present life; for to have and to enjoy is better than this constant

Hungern und Lungern [hungering and longing]. More must not be put into 9a than already lies in it, as Elster does: "the only enduring enjoyment of life consists in the quiet contemplation of that which, as pleasant and beautiful, it affords, without this mental joy mingling with the desire for the possession of sensual enjoyment." The conception of "the sight of the eyes" is certainly very beautifully idealized, but in opposition to the text. If 9a must be a moral proverb, then Luther's rendering is the best: "It is better to enjoy the present good, than to think about other good."

THE WEAKNESS AND SHORT-SIGHTEDNESS OF MAN OVER AGAINST HIS DESTINY.—VI. 10–12.

The future, toward which the soul stretches itself out to find what may satisfy it, is not man's: a power against which man is helpless fashions it.

Ver. 10. "That which hath been, its name hath long ago been named; and it is determined what a man shall be: and he cannot dispute with Him who is stronger than he." According to the usage of the tense, it would be more correct to translate: That which (at any time) has made its appearance, the name of which was long ago named, i.e. of which the What? and the How? were long ago determined, and, so to speak, formulated. This פְּכָר . . . שֵׁי does not stand parallel to כָּבַר הָיָה, i. 10; for the expression here does not refer to the sphere of that which is done, but of the predetermination. Accordingly, וְנִי' . . . אָדָם is also to be understood. Against the accents, inconsistently periodizing and losing sight of the comprehensiveness of אָדָם . . . אִישׁ, Hitzig renders: "and it is known that, if one is a man, he cannot contend," etc., which is impossible for this reason, that הוּא אָדָם cannot be a conditional clause enclosed within the sentence אִישׁ . . . יוּכַל. Obviously וְנוֹדַע, which in the sense of constat would be a useless waste of words, stands parallel to נִקְרָא שְׂמוֹ, and signifies known, viz. previously known, as passive of יָדַע, in the sense of Zech. xiv. 7; cf. Ps. cxxxix. 1 f. Bullock rightly compares Acts xv. 18. After יָדַע, asher, like ki, which is more common, may signify "that," viii. 12, Ezek. xx. 26; but neither "that he is a man" (Knobel, Vaih., Luzz., Hengst., Ginsb.), nor "that he is the man" (Ewald, Elst., Zöckler), affords a consistent meaning. As mah after yada' means quid, so asher after it may mean quod = that which (cf. Dan. viii. 19, although it does not at all stand in need of proof); and id quod homo est (we cannot render הוּא without the expression of a definite conception of time) is intended to mean that the whole being of a man, whether of this one or that one, at all times and on all sides, is previously known; cf. to this pregnant substantival sentence, xii. 13. Against this formation of his nature and of his fate by a higher hand, man cannot utter a word.

The thought in 10*b* is the same as that at Isa. xlv. 9; Rom. ix. 20 f. The Chethhb שְׁהִתְקִיף<sup>1</sup> is not inadmissible, for the stronger than man is מְנִי . . . מְרִי. Also הִתְקִיף might in any case be read: with one who overcomes him, has and manifests the ascendancy over him. There is indeed no Hiph. הִתְּ found in the language of the Bible (Herzf. and Fürst compare הִתְּ, Ps. xii. 5); but in the Targ., אִתְּקִיף is common; and in the school-language of the Talm., הִתְּ is used of the raising of weighty objections, e.g. Kamma 71*a*. The verb, however, especially in the perf., is in the passage before us less appropriate. In לֹא יִיבֹל lie together the ideas of physical (cf. Gen. xliii. 32; Deut. xii. 17, xvi. 5, etc.) and moral inability.

Ver. 11. "For there are many words which increase vanity: What cometh forth therefrom for man?" The dispute (objection), דִּיּוֹ, takes place in words; דְּבָרִים here will thus not mean "things" (Hengst., Ginsb., Zöckl., Bullock, etc.), but "words." As that wrestling or contending against God's decision and providence is vain and worthless, nothing else remains for man but to be submissive, and to acknowledge his limitation by the fear of God; thus there are also many words which only increase yet more the multitude of vanities already existing in this world, for, because they are resultless, they bring no advantage for man. Rightly, Elster finds herein a hint pointing to the influence of the learning of the Jewish schools already existing in Koheleth's time. We know from Josephus that the problem of human freedom and of God's absoluteness was a point of controversy between opposing parties: the Sadducees so emphasized human freedom, that they not only excluded (Antt. xiii. 5. 9; Bell. ii. 8. 14) all divine predetermination, but also co-operation; the Pharisees, on the contrary, supposed an interconnection between divine predetermination (ειμαρμένον) and human freedom (Antt. xiii. 5. 9, xviii. 1. 3; Bell. ii. 8. 14). The Talm. affords us a glance at this controversy; but the statement in the Talm. (in Berachoth 33*a*, and elsewhere), which conditions all by the power of God manifesting itself in history, but defends the freedom of the religious-moral self-determination of man, may be regarded as a Pharisaic maxim. In Rom. ix., Paul places himself on this side; and the author of the Book of Koheleth would subscribe this passage as his testimony, for the "fear God" is the "kern und stern" [kernel and star] of his pessimistic book.

Ver. 12. Man ought to fear God, and also, without dispute and murmuring, submit to His sway: "For who knoweth what is good for man in life during the number of the days of his vain life, and which he spendeth like a shadow? No one can certainly show a man what shall be after him under the sun." We translate וְיָשָׁר only by "ja" ("certainly"), because in Germ. no interrogative can follow "dieweil" ("because"). The clause with asher (as at iv. 9, viii. 11, x. 15; cf. Song, under v. 2), according to its meaning not different from ki, is related in the way of proof to that beginning with ki. Man is placed in our presence. To be able to say to him what is good for him,—i.e. what position he must take in life, what direction he must give to his activity, what decision he must adopt in difficult and important cases,—we ought not only to be able to penetrate his future, but, generally, the future; but, as Tropfen [drops] in the stream of history, we are poor Tröpfle [simpletons], who are hedged up within the present. Regarding the accus. of duration, מִסְפָּר יוֹם, pointing to the brevity of human life, vid. at ii. 3. With הִבְלֵהוּ, the attribute of breath-like transitivity is assigned to life (as at vii. 15, ix. 9) (as already in the name given to Abel, the second son of Adam), which is continued by כִּי with the force of a relative clause, which is frequently the case after preceding part. attrib., e.g. Isa. v. 23. We translate: which he spendeth like the (a) shadow [in the nom.] (after viii. 13; Job xiv. 2); not: like a shadow [in the accus.]; for although the days of life are also likened to a shadow, Ps. cxliv. 4, etc., yet this use of עֲשֶׂה does not accord therewith, which, without being a Graecism (Zirkel, Grätz), harmonises with the Greek phrase, ποιεῖν χρόνον, Acts xv. 33; cf. Prov. xiii. 23, LXX. (also with the Lat. facere dies of Cicero, etc.). Thus also in the Syr. and Palest.-Aram. lacad is used of time, in the sense of transigere. Aharav does not mean: after his present condition (Zöckl.); but, as at iii. 22, vii. 14: after he has passed away from this scene. Luzz. explains it correctly: Whether his children will remain in life? Whether the wealth he has wearied himself in acquiring will remain and be useful to them? But these are only illustrations. The author means to say, that a man can say, neither to himself nor to another, what in definite cases is the real advantage; because, in order to say this, he must be able to look far into the future beyond the limits of the individual life of man, which is only a small member of a great whole.

SECOND CONCLUDING SECTION.

PROVERBS OF BETTER THINGS, THINGS SUPPOSED TO BE BETTER, GOOD THINGS, GOOD AND BAD DAYS.—VII. 1-14.

We find ourselves here in the middle of the book. Of its 220 verses, vi. 10 is that which stands in the middle, and with vii. 1 begins the third of the four Sedarim<sup>1</sup> into which the Masora divides the book. The series of proverbs here first following, vii. 1-10, has, as we remarked above, p. 189, the word tov as their common catchword, and mah-tov, vi. 12, as the hook on which they hang. But at least the first three proverbs do not stand merely in this external connection with the preceding; they continue the lowly and dark estimate of the earthly life contained in vi. 3 ff.

The first proverb is a synthetic distich. The thought aimed at is that of the second half of the distich.

vii. 1. "Better is a name than precious ointment; and better is the day of death than the day when one is born." Like רָאִי and נָרָא, so שֵׁם and טוֹב stand to each other in the relation of a paronomasia (vid. Song under i. 3). Luther translates: "Ein gut Gerücht ist besser denn gute Salbe" ["a good odour (= reputation) is better than good ointment]. If we substitute the expression denn Wolgeruch [than sweet scent], that would be the best possible rendering of the paronomasia. In the arrangement טוֹב . . . שֵׁם טוֹב, tov would be adj. to shem (a good reputation goes beyond sweet scent); but tov standing first in the sentence is pred., and shem thus in itself alone, as in the cogn. prov., Prov. xxii. 1, signifies a good, well-sounding, honourable, if not venerable name; cf. anshē hashshem, Gen. vi. 4; v'li-shem, nameless, Job xxx. 8. The author gives the dark reverse to this bright side of the distich: the day of death better than the day in which one (a man), or he (the man), is born; cf. for this reference of the pronoun, iv. 12, v. 17. It is the same lamentation as at iv. 2 f., which sounds less strange from the mouth of a Greek than from that of an Israelite; a Thracian tribe, the Trausi, actually celebrated their birthdays as days of sadness, and the day of death as a day of rejoicing (vid. Bähr's Germ. transl. of Herodotus, v. 4).—Among the people of the Old Covenant this was not possible; also a saying such as lō is not in the spirit of the O. T. revelation of religion; yet it is significant that it was possible<sup>1</sup> within it, without apostasy from it; within the N. T. revelation of religion, except in such references as Matt. xxvi. 24, it is absolutely impossible without apostasy from it, or without rejection of its fundamental meaning.

Ver. 2. Still more in the spirit of the N. T. (cf. e.g. Luke vi. 25) are these words of this singular book which stands on the border of both Testaments: "It is better to go into a house of mourning than to go into a house of carousal (drinking): for that is the end of every man; and the living layeth it to heart." A house is meant in which there is sorrow on account of a death; the lamentation continued for seven days (Sirach xxii. 10), and extended sometimes, as in the case of the death of Aaron and Moses, to thirty days; the later practice distinguished the lamentations (אֲנִינִית) for the dead till the time of burial, and the mournings for the dead (אֲבִלִית), which were divided into seven and twenty-three days of greater and lesser mourning; on the return from carrying away the corpse, there was a Trostmahl (a comforting repast), to which, according as it appears to an ancient custom, those who were to be partakers of it contributed (Jer. xvi. 7; Hos. ix. 4; Job iv. 17, funde vinum tuum et panem tuum super sepulchra justorum).<sup>2</sup> This feast of sorrow the above proverb leaves out of view, although also in reference to it the contrast between the "house of carousal" and "house of mourning" remains, that in the latter the drinking must be in moderation, and not to drunkenness.<sup>3</sup> The going into the house of mourning is certainly thought of as a visit for the purpose of showing sympathy and of imparting consolation during the first seven days of mourning (John xi. 31).<sup>4</sup> Thus to go into the house of sorrow, and to show one's sympathy with the mourners there, is better than to go into a house of drinking, where all is festivity and merriment; viz. because the former (that he is mourned over as dead) is the end of every man, and the survivor takes it to heart, viz. this, that he too must die. אָהֵב follows attractionally the gender of סוֹף (cf. Job xxxi. 11, Kerē). What is said at iii. 13 regarding 'פֶּלֶה is appropriate to the passage before us. הָיִי is rightly vocalised; regarding the form  $\text{הָיָה}$ , vid. Baer in the critical remarks of our ed. of Isaiah under iii. 22. The phrase  $\text{נָתַן אֱלֹהִים לֵב$  here and at ix. 1 is synon. with  $\text{שָׂים אֱלֹהִים עַל־לֵב}$  (e.g. Isa. lvii. 1) and  $\text{שָׂים לֵב}$ . How this saying agrees with Koheleth's ultimatum: There is nothing better than to eat and drink, etc. (ii. 24, etc.), the Talmudists have been utterly perplexed to discover; Manasse ben-Israel in his Conciliador (1632) loses himself in much useless discussion.<sup>1</sup> The solution of the difficulty is easy. The ultimatum does not relate to an unconditional enjoyment of life, but to an enjoyment conditioned by the fear of God. When man looks death in the face, the two things occur to him, that he should make use of his brief life, but make use of it in view of the end, thus in a manner for which he is responsible before God.

Vers. 3, 4. The joy of life must thus be not riot and tumult, but a joy tempered with seriousness: "Better is sorrow than laughter: for with a sad countenance it is well with the heart. The heart of the wise is in the house of mourning, and the heart of fools in the house of mirth." Grief and sorrow,  $\text{צָעַם}$ , whether for ourselves or occasioned by others, is better, viz. morally better, than extravagant merriment; the heart is with  $\text{רַע פָּן}$  (inf. as  $\text{רַע}$ , Jer. vii. 6; cf.  $\text{פִּי רָה}$ , Gen. xl. 7; Neh. ii. 2), a sorrowful countenance, better than with laughter, which only masks the feeling of disquiet peculiar to man, Prov. xiv. 13. Elsewhere  $\text{לֵב יָטִיב}$  = "the heart is (may be) of good cheer," e.g. Ruth iii. 7, Judg. xix. 6; here also joyful experience is meant, but well becoming man as a religious moral being. With a sad countenance it may be far better as regards the heart than with a merry countenance in boisterous company. Luther, in the main correct, after Jerome, who on his part follows Symmachus: "The heart is made better by sorrow." The well-being is here meant as the reflex of a moral: bene se habere.

Sorrow penetrates the heart, draws the thought upwards, purifies, transforms. Therefore is the heart of the wise in the house of sorrow; and, on the other hand, the heart of fools is in the house of joy, i.e. the impulse of their heart goes thither, there they feel themselves at home; a house of joy is one where there are continual feasts, or where there is at the time a revelling in joy. That ver. 4 is divided not by Athnach, but by Zakef, has its reason in this, that of the words following  $\text{אֵין בָּלִי}$ , none consists of three syllables; cf. on the contrary, vii. 7,  $\text{הִנֵּם הָיָה}$ . From this point forward the internal relation of the contents is broken up, according to which this series of

Vers. 5, 6. A fourth proverb of that which is better (טוב מן) presents, like the third, the fools and the wise over against each other: "Better to hear the reproof of a wise man, than that one should hear the song of fools. For like the crackling of Nesseln (nettles) under the Kessel (kettle), so the laughter of the fool: also this is vain." As at Prov. xiii. 1, xvii. 10, נְעִירָה is the earnest and severe words of the wise, which impressively reprove, emphatically warn, and salutarily alarm. נְשִׁיר in itself means only song, to the exclusion, however, of the plaintive song; the song of fools is, if not immoral, yet morally and spiritually hollow, senseless, and unbridled madness. Instead of נְשִׁיר, the words נִא' ט' are used, for the twofold act of hearing is divided between different subjects. A fire of thorn-twigs flickers up quickly and crackles merrily, but also exhausts itself quickly (Ps. cxviii. 12), without sufficiently boiling the flesh in the pot; whilst a log of wood, without making any noise, accomplishes this quietly and surely. We agree with Knobel and Vaihinger in copying the paronomasia [Nessel—Kessel]. When, on the other hand, Zöckler remarks that a fire of nettles could scarcely crackle, we advise our friend to try it for once in the end of summer with a bundle of stalks of tall dry nettles. They yield a clear blaze, a quickly expiring fire, to which here, as he well remarks, the empty laughter of foolish men is compared, who are devoid of all earnestness, and of all deep moral principles of life. This laughter is vain, like that crackling. There is a hiatus between vers. 6 and 7. For how ver. 7 can be related to ver. 6 as furnishing evidence, no interpreter has as yet been able to say. Hitzig regards 6a as assigning a reason for ver. 5, but 6b as a reply (as ver. 7 containing its motive shows) to the assertion of ver. 5,—a piece of ingenious thinking which no one imitates. Elster translates: "Yet injustice befools a wise man," being prudently silent about this "yet." Zöckler finds, as Knobel and Ewald do, the mediating thought in this, that the vanity of fools infects and also easily befools the wise. But the subject spoken of is not the folly of fools in general, but of their singing and laughter, to which ver. 7 has not the most remote reference. Otherwise Hengst.: "In ver. 7, the reason is given why the happiness of fools is so brief; first, the mens sana is lost, and then destruction follows." But in that case the words ought to have been יהוה כסיל; the remark, that חכם here denotes one who ought to be and might be such, is a pure volte. Ginsburg thinks that the two verses are co-ordinated by כי; that ver. 6 gives the reason for 5*b*, and ver. 7 that for 5*a*, since here, by way of example, one accessible to bribery is introduced, who would act prudently in letting himself therefore be directed by a wise man. But if he had wished to be thus understood, the author would have used another word instead of חכם, 7*a*, and not designated both him who reproves and him who merits reproof by the one word—the former directly, the latter at least indirectly. We do not further continue the account of the many vain attempts that have been made to bring ver. 7 into connection with vers. 6 and 5. Our opinion is, that ver. 7 is the second half of a tetrastich, the first half of which is lost, which began, as is to be supposed, with tov. The first half was almost the same as Ps. xxxvii. 16, or better still, as Prov. xvi. 8, and the whole proverb stood thus:

טוֹב מַעַט בְּצַדִּיקָה
מְרִיב תְּבוֹאוֹת בְּלֹא מִשְׁפָּט:

[and then follows ver. 7 as it lies before us in the text, formed into a distich, the first line of which terminates with חכם]. We go still further, and suppose that after the first half of the tetrastich was lost, that expression, “also this is vain,” added to ver. 6 by the punctuation, was inserted for the purpose of forming a connection for כִּי עֵשָׂק: Also this is vain, that, etc. (כִּי, like asher, viii. 14).

Ver. 7. Without further trying to explain the mystery of the כִּי, we translate this verse: “. . . For oppression maketh wise men mad, and corruption destroyeth the understanding.” From the lost first half of the verse, it appears that the subject here treated of is the duties of a judge, including those of a ruler into whose hands his subjects, with their property and life, are given. The second half is like an echo of Ex. xxiii. 8, Deut. xvi. 19. That which שָׁחַר there means is here, as at Prov. xv. 27, denoted by מַחְנִיחַ; and עֵשָׂק is accordingly oppression as it is exercised by one who constrains others who need legal aid and help generally to purchase it by means of presents. Such oppression for the sake of gain, even if it does not proceed to the perversion of justice, but only aims at courting and paying for favour, makes a wise man mad (הוֹלֵל, as at Job xii. 17; Isa. xliv. 25), i.e. it hurries him forth, since the greed of gold increases more and more, to the most blinding immorality and regardlessness; and such presents for the purpose of swaying the judgment, and of bribery, destroys the heart, i.e. the understanding (cf. Hos. iv. 11, Bereschith rabba, ch. lvi.), for they obscure the judgment, blunt the conscience, and make a man the slave of his passion. The conjecture הָעֵשֶׂר (riches) instead of the word הַעֲשֶׂק (Burger, as earlier Ewald) is accordingly unnecessary; it has the parallelism against it, and thus generally used gives an untrue thought. The word הוֹלֵל does not mean "gives lustre" (Desvoeux), or "makes shine forth = makes manifest" (Tyler); thus also nothing is gained for a better connection of ver. 7 with ver. 6. The Venet. excellently: ἐκστήσει. Aben Ezra supposes that מוֹתֵה is here = דִּבְרֵי מוֹתֵה; Mendelssohn repeats it, although otherwise the consciousness of the syntactical rule, Gesen. § 147a, does not fail him.

Vers. 8, 9. There now follows a fourth, or, taking into account the mutilated one, a fifth proverb of that which is better: "Better the end of a thing than its beginning; better one who forbears than one who is haughty. Hasten thyself not in thy spirit to become angry: for anger lieth down in the bosom of fools." The clause 8a is first thus to be objectively understood as it stands. It is not without limitation true; for of a matter in itself evil, the very contrary is true, Prov. v. 4, xxiii. 32. But if a thing is not in itself evil, the end of its progress, the reaching to its goal, the completion of its destination, is always better than its beginning, which leaves it uncertain whether it will lead to a prosperous issue. An example of this is Solon's saying to Croesus, that only he is to be pronounced happy whose good fortune it is to end his life well in the possession of his wealth (Herod. i. 32).

The proverb 8b will stand in some kind of connection with 8a, since what it says is further continued in ver. 9. In itself, the frequently long and tedious development between the beginning and the end of a thing requires expectant patience. But if it is in the interest of a man to see the matter brought to an issue, an אִרְוֹת אִפְּ will, notwithstanding, wait with self-control in all quietness for the end; while it lies in the nature of the גִּבְיָה רִיחַ, the haughty, to fret at the delay, and to seek to reach the end by violent means; for the haughty man thinks that everything must at once be subservient to his wish, and he measures what others should do by his own measureless self-complacency. We may with Hitzig translate: "Better is patience (אִרְוֹת = אִרְוֹת) than haughtiness" (גִּבְיָה, inf., as שֹׁפֵט, xii. 4; Prov. xvi. 19). But there exists no reason for this; גִּבְיָה is not to be held, as at Prov. xvi. 5, and elsewhere generally, as the connecting form of גִּבְיָה, and so אִרְוֹת for that of אִרְוֹת; it amounts to the same thing whether the two properties (characters) or the persons possessing them are compared.

Ver. 9. In this verse the author warns against this pride which, when everything does not go according to its mind, falls into passionate excitement, and thoughtlessly judges, or with a violent rude hand anticipates the end. אַל־תִּבֹּן : do not overturn, hasten not, rush not, as at v. 1. Why the word בְּרִיחָךְ, and not בַּנֶּפֶשׁ or בְּלִבְךָ, is used, vid. Psychol. pp. 197-199 : passionate excitements overcome a man according to the biblical representation of his spirit, Prov. xxv. 28, and in the proving of the spirit that which is in the heart comes forth in the mood and disposition, Prov. xv. 13. פְּעוּט is an infin., like יִשָּׁן, v. 11. The warning has its reason in this, that anger or (כַּעַס, taken more potentially than actually) fretfulness rests in the bosom of fools, i.e. is cherished and nourished, and thus is at home, and, as it were (thought of personally, as if it were a wicked demon), feels itself at home (נִיחָה, as at Prov. xiv. 33). The haughty impetuous person, and one speaking out rashly, thus acts like a fool. In fact, it is folly to let oneself be impelled by contradictions to anger, which disturbs the brightness of the soul, takes away the considerateness of judgment, and undermines the health, instead of maintaining oneself with equanimity, i.e. without stormy excitement, and losing the equilibrium of the soul under every opposition to our wish.

From this point the proverb loses the form "better than," but tov still remains the catchword of the following proverbs. The proverb here first following is so far cogn., as it is directed against a particular kind of ka'as (anger), viz. discontentment with the present.

Ver. 10. "Say not : How comes it that the former times were better than these now ? for thou dost not, from wisdom, ask after this." Cf. these lines from Horace (Poet. 173, 4) :

"Difficilis, querulus, laudator temporis acti Se puero, censor castigatque minorum."

Such an one finds the earlier days—not only the old days described in history (Deut. iv. 32), but also those he lived in before the present time (cf. e.g. 2 Chron. ix. 29)—thus by contrast so much better than the present ones, that in astonishment he asks : "What is it = how comes it that ?" etc. The author designates this question as one not proceeding from wisdom : מִתּוֹךְ חִכְמָה, like the Mishnic כִּיתוּךְ חִכְמָה, and אֶל־עַל, as at Neh. i. 2 ; 'al-zeh refers to that question, after the ground of the contrast, which is at the same time an exclamation of wonder. The כִּי, assigning a reason for the dissuasion, does not mean that the cause of the difference between the present and the good old times is easily seen ; but it denotes that the supposition of this difference is foolish, because in truth every age has its bright and its dark sides ; and this division of light and shadow between the past and the present betrays a want of understanding of the signs of the times and of the ways of God. This proverb does not furnish any point of support for the determination of the date of the authorship of the Book of Koheleth (vid. above, p. 213). But if it was composed in the last century of the Persian domination, this dissatisfaction with the present times is explained, over against which Koheleth leads us to consider that it is self-deception and one-sidedness to regard the present as all dark and the past as all bright and rosy.

Vers. 11, 12. Externally connecting itself with "from wisdom," there now follows another proverb, which declares that wisdom along with an inheritance is good, but that wisdom is nevertheless of itself better than money and possessions: "Wisdom is good with family possessions, and an advantage for those who see the sun. For wisdom affordeth a shadow, money affordeth a shadow; yet the advantage of knowledge is this, that wisdom preserveth life to its possessor." Most of the English interpreters, from Desvoeux to Tyler, translate: "Wisdom is as good as an inheritance;" and Bullock, who translates: "with an inheritance," says of this and the other translations: "The difference is not material." But the thought is different, and thus the distinction is not merely a formal one. Zöckl explains it as undoubted that עַם here, as at ii. 16 (vid. l.c.), means aeque ac; but (1) that aeque ac has occurred to no ancient translator, till the Venet. and Luther, nor to the Syr., which translates: "better is wisdom than weapons (מִטָּנָה וְיָמִינָה)," in a singular way making 11a a duplette of ix. 18a; (2) instead of "wisdom is as good as wealth," would much rather be said: "wisdom is better than wealth," as e.g. Prov. viii. 11; (3) the proverb is formed like Abboth ii. 2, "good is study connected with a citizen-like occupation," and similar proverbs; (4) one may indeed say: "the wise man dieth with (together with) the fool" = just as well as the fool; but "good is wisdom with wealth" can neither be equivalent to "as well as wealth," nor: "in comparison with wealth" (Ewald, Elster), but only: "in connection with wealth (possessions);" aeque ac may be translated for una cum where the subject is common action and suffering, but not in a substantival clause consisting of a subst. as subject and an adj. as pred., having the form of a categorical judgment. נְחִלָּה denotes a possession inherited and hereditary (cf. Prov. xx. 21); and this is evidence in favour of the view that עַם is meant not of comparison, but of connection; the expression would otherwise be עַם-עֵשֶׂר. וְיִתֵּר is now also explained. It is not to be rendered: "and better still" (than wealth), as Herzf., Hitz., and Hengst. render it; but in spite of Hengst., who decides in his own way, "וְיִתֵּר" never means advantage, gain," it denotes a prevailing good, avantage (vid. above, p. 192); and it is explained also why men are here named "those who see the sun"—certainly not merely thus describing them poetically, as in Homer ζῶειν is described and coloured by ὄραν φάος ἡελίοιο. To see the sun, is = to have entered upon this earthly life, in which, along with wisdom, also no inheritance is to be despised. For wisdom affords protection as well as money, but the former still more than the latter. So far, the general meaning of ver. 12 is undisputed. But how is 12*a* to be construed? Knobel, Hitz., and others regard כ as the so-called beth essentialis: a shadow (protection) is wisdom, a shadow is money,—very expressive, yet out of harmony, if not with the language of that period, yet with the style of Koheleth; and how useless and misleading would this doubled א be here! Hengstenberg translates: in the shadow of wisdom, in the shadow of silver; and Zöckler introduces between the two clauses "it is as." But (1) here the shadow of wisdom, at least according to our understanding of ver. 11, is not likened to the shadow of silver; but in conformity with that עמ, it must be said that wisdom, and also that money, affords a shadow; (2) but that interpretation goes quite beyond the limits of gnomic brachyology. We explain: for in the shadow (צַל, like צַל, Jonah iv. 5) is wisdom, in the shadow, money; by which, without any particularly bold poetic licence, is meant that he who possesses wisdom, he who possesses money, finds himself in a shadow, i.e. of pleasant security; to be in the shadow, spoken of wisdom and money, is = to sit in the shadow of the persons who possess both.

Ver. 12*b*. The exposition of this clause is agreed upon. It is to be construed according to the accentuation: and the advantage of knowledge is this, that "wisdom preserveth life to its possessors." The Targ. regards דעת ההכמה as connected genit.; that might be possible (cf. i. 17, viii. 16), but yet is improbable. Wherever the author uses דעת as subst., it is an independent conception placed beside חכ, i. 16, ii. 26, etc. We now translate, not: wisdom gives life (LXX., Jerome, Venet., Luther) to its possessors; for הַיָּה always means only either to revive (thus Hengst., after Ps. cxix. 25; cf. lxxi. 20) or to keep in life; and this latter meaning is more appropriate to this book than the former,—thus (cf. Prov. iii. 18): wisdom preserves in life,—since, after Hitzig, it accomplishes this, not by rash utterances of denunciation,—a thought lying far behind ver. 10, and altogether too mean,—but since it secures it against self-destruction by vice and passions and emotions, e.g. anger (ver. 9), which consume life. The shadow in which wisdom (the wise man) sits keeps it fresh and sound,—a result which the shadow in which money (the capitalist) sits does not afford: it has frequently the directly contrary effect.

Vers. 13, 14. There now follows a proverb of devout submission to the providence of God, connecting itself with the contents of ver. 10: "Consider the work of God: for who can make that straight which He hath made crooked! In the good day be of good cheer, and in the day of misfortune observe: God hath also made this equal to that, to the end that man need not experience anything (further) after his death." While רָאָה, i. 10, vii. 27, 29, is not different from הִנֵּה, and in ix. 9 has the meaning of "enjoy," here the meaning of contemplative observation, mental seeing, connects itself both times with it. יָ before כִּי can as little mean quod, as asher, vi. 12, before mi can mean quoniam. "Consider God's work" means: recognise in all that is done the government of God, which has its motive in this, that, as the question leads us to suppose, no creature is able (cf. vi. 10 and i. 15) to put right God's work in cases where it seems to contradict that which is right (Job viii. 3, xxxiv. 12), or to make straight that which He has made crooked (Ps. cxlvi. 9).

Ver. 14a a. The call here expressed is parallel to Sir. xiv. 14 (Fritz.): "Withdraw not thyself from a good day, and let not thyself lose participation in a right enjoyment." The נ of בְּטוֹב is, as little as that of בְּצֵל, the beth essentiae—it is not a designation of quality, but of condition: in good, i.e. cheerful mood. He who is, Jer. xlv. 17, personally tov, cheerful (= tov lev), is b'tov (cf. Ps. xxv. 13, also Job xxi. 13). The reverse side of the call, 14a β, is of course not to be translated: and suffer or bear the bad day (Ewald, Heiligst.), for in this sense we use the expression רָאָה רָעָה, Jer. xlv. 17, but not רָאָה בְּרָעָה, which much rather, Obad. 13, means a malicious contemplation of the misfortune of a stranger, although once, Gen. xxi. 16, רָאָה בְּ also occurs in the sense of a compassionate, sympathizing look, and, moreover, the parall. shows that בְּיוֹם רָעָה is not the obj., but the adv. designation of time. Also not: look to = be attentive to (Salomon), or bear it patiently (Burger), for רָאָה cannot of itself have that meaning.<sup>1</sup> But: in the day of misfortune observe, i.e. perceive and reflect: God has also made (cf. Job ii. 10) the latter לְעֵפֶת לְעֹפֶת corresponding, parallel, like to (cf. under v. 15) the former.

So much the more difficult is the statement of the object of this mingling by God of good and evil in the life of man. It is translated: that man may find nothing behind him; this is literal, but it is meaningless. The meaning, according to most interpreters, is this : that man may investigate nothing that lies behind his present time,—thus, that belongs to the future ; in other words : that man may never know what is before him. But aharav is never (not at vi. 12) = in the future, lying out from the present of a man ; but always = after his present life. Accordingly, Ewald explains, and Heiligst. with him : that he may find nothing which, dying, he could take with him. But this rendering (cf. v. 14) is here unsuitable. Better, Hitzig : because God wills it that man shall be rid of all things after his death, He puts evil into the period of his life, and lets it alternate with good, instead of visiting him therewith after his death. This explanation proceeds from a right interpretation of the words : idcirco ut (cf. iii. 18) non inveniat homo post se quidquam, scil. quod non expertus sit, but gives a meaning to the expression which the author would reject as unworthy of his conception of God. What is meant is much more this, that God causes man to experience good and evil that he may pass through the whole school of life, and when he departs hence that nothing may be outstanding (in arrears) which he has not experienced.

CONTINUATION OF EXPERIENCES AND THEIR RESULTS.—VII. 15-IX. 12.

The Injuriousness of Excesses, vii. 15-18.

The concluding section, vii. 1-14, is now followed by I-sections, i.e. advices in the form of actually experienced facts, in which again the I of the author comes into the foreground.

Vers. 15-18. The first of these counsels warns against extremes, on the side of good as well as on that of evil : "All have I seen in the days of my vanity : there are righteous men who perish by their righteousness, and there are wicked men who continue long by their wickedness. Be not righteous over-much, and show not thyself wise beyond measure : why wilt thou ruin thyself ? Be not wicked over-much, and be no fool : why wilt thou die before thy time is ? It is good that thou holdest thyself to the one, and also from the other withdrawest not thine hand : for he that feareth God accomplisheth it all." One of the most original English interpreters of the Book of Koheleth, T. Tyler (1874), finds in the thoughts of the book—composed, according to his view, about 200 B.C.—and in their expression, references to the post-Aristotelian philosophy, particularly to the Stoic, variously interwoven with orientalism. But here, in vers. 15-18, we perceive, not so much the principle of the Stoical ethics—τῇ φύσει ὁμολογουμένως ζῆν—as that of the Aristotelian, according to which virtue consists in the art μέσως ἔχειν, the art of holding the middle between extremes.<sup>1</sup> Also, we do not find here a reference to the contrasts between Pharisaism and Sadduceeism (Zöckl.), viz. those already in growth in the time of the author; for if it should be also true, as Tyler conjectures, that the Sadducees had such a predilection for Epicurism,—as, according to Josephus (Vit. c. 2), “the doctrine of the Pharisees is of kin to that of the Stoics,”—yet צדקה and רשעה are not apportioned between these two parties, especially since the overstraining of conformity to the law by the Pharisees related not to the moral, but to the ceremonial law. We derive nothing for the right understanding of the passage from referring the wisdom of life here recommended to the tendencies of the time. The author proceeds from observation, over against which the O. T. saints knew not how to place any satisfying theodicee. ימי הקבלי (vid. vi. 12) he so designates the long, but for the most part uselessly spent life lying behind him. אֵת־הַכֹּל is not “everything possible” (Zöckl.), but “all, of all kinds” (Luth.), which is defined by 15*b* as of two kinds; for 15*a* is the introduction of the following experience relative to the righteous and the unrighteous, and thus to the two classes into which all men are divided. We do not translate: there are the righteous, who by their righteousness, etc. (Umbr., Hitzig, and others); for if the author should thus commence, it would appear as if he wished to give unrighteousness the preference to righteousness, which, however, was far from him. To perish in or by his righteousness, to live long in or by his wickedness (מֵאֲרִיץ, scil. ימים, viii. 13, as at Prov. xxviii. 2), is = to die in spite of righteousness, to live in spite of wickedness, as e.g. Deut. i. 32: “in this thing” = in spite of, etc. Righteousness has the promise of long life as its reward; but if this is the rule, it has yet its exceptions, and the author thence deduces the doctrine that one should not exaggerate righteousness; for if it occurs that a righteous man, in spite of his righteousness, perishes, this happens, at earliest, in the case in which, in the practice of righteousness, he goes beyond the right measure and limit. The relative conceptions הַיָּמֶה and יוֹתֵר have here, since they are referred to the idea of the right measure, the meaning of nimis. הַתְּחִבָּם could mean, “to play the wise man;” but that, whether more or less done, is objectionable. It means, as at Ex. i. 10, to act wisely (cf. Ps. cv. 25, הָהָ, to act cunningly). And הָשָׁה, which is elsewhere used of being inwardly torpid, i.e. being astonished, obstupescere, has here the meaning of placing oneself in a benumbed, disordered state, or also, passively, of becoming disconcerted; not of becoming desolate or being deserted (Hitz., Ginsburg, and others), which it could only mean in highly poetic discourse (Isa. liv. 1). The form לִשְׁׁוֹתָם is syncop., like לִבָּי, Num. xxi. 27; and the question, with לִמָּה, here and at 17*b*, is of the same kind as v. 5; Luther, weakening it: "that thou mayest not destroy thyself."

Ver. 17. Up to this point all is clear: righteousness and wisdom are good and wholesome, and worth striving for; but even in these a transgressing of the right measure is possible (Luther remembers the summum jus summa injuria), which has as a consequence, that they become destructive to man, because he thereby becomes a caricature, and either perishes rushing from one extreme into another, or is removed out of the way by others whose hatred he provokes. But it is strange that the author now warns against an excess in wickedness, so that he seems to find wickedness, up to a certain degree, praiseworthy and advisable. So much the stranger, since "be no fool" stands as contrast to "show not thyself wise," etc.; so that "but also be no wicked person" was much rather to be expected as contrast to "be not righteous over-much." Zöckler seeks to get over this difficulty with the remark: "Koheleth does not recommend a certain moderation in wickedness as if he considered it allowable, but only because he recognises the fact as established, that every man is by nature somewhat wicked." The meaning would then be: man's life is not free from wickedness, but be only not too wicked! The offensiveness of the advice is not thus removed; and besides, 18*a* demands, in a certain sense, an intentional wickedness,—indeed, as 18*b* shows, a wickedness in union with the fear of God. The correct meaning of "be not wicked over-much" may be found if for תִּרְשַׁע we substitute תִּתְחַטֵּא; in this form the good counsel at once appears as impossible, for it would be immoral, since "sinning," in all circumstances, is an act which carries in itself its own sentence of condemnation. Thus רִשַׁע must here be a setting oneself free from the severity of the law, which, although sin in the eyes of the over-righteous, is yet no sin in itself; and the author here thinks, in accordance with the spirit of his book, principally of that fresh, free, joyous life to which he called the young, that joy of life in its fulness which appeared to him as the best and fairest reality in this present time; but along with that, perhaps also of transgressions of the letter of the law, of shaking off the scruples of conscience which conformity to God-ordained circumstances brings along with it. He means to say: be not a narrow rigorist,—enjoy life, accommodate thyself to life; but let not the reins be too loose; and be no fool who wantonly places himself above law and discipline: Why wilt thou destroy thy life before the time by suffering vice to kill thee (Ps. xxxiv. 22), and by want of understanding ruin thyself (Prov. x. 21)?<sup>1</sup>

Ver. 18. "It is good that thou holdest fast to the one,"—viz. righteousness and wisdom,—and withdrawest not thy hand from the other,—viz. a wickedness which renounces over-righteousness and over-wisdom, or an unrestrained life;—for he who fears God accomplishes all, i.e. both, the one as well as the other. Luther, against the Vulg.: "for he who fears God escapes all." But what "all"? Tyler, Bullock, and others reply: "All the perplexities of life;" but no such thing is found in the text here, however many perplexities may be in the book. Better, Zöckler: the evil results of the extreme of false righteousness as of bold wickedness. But that he does not destroy himself and does not die before his time, is yet only essentially one thing which he escapes; also, from ver. 15, only one thing, אַבֵּר, is taken. Thus either: the extremes (Umbr.), or: the extremes together with their consequences. The thought presents a connected, worthy conclusion. But if eth-kullam, with its retrospective suffix, can be referred to that which immediately precedes, this ought to have the preference. Ginsburg, with Hitzig: "Whoso feareth God will make his way with both;" but what an improbable phrase! Jerome, with his vague  nihil negligit, is right as to the meaning. In the Bible, the phrase 'הָ . . . יָצָא, egressus est urbem, Gen. xlv. 4, cf. Jer. x. 20, is used; and in the Mishna, יָצָא אֶת־יְדֵי הַחֹבָהוּ, i.e. he has discharged his duty, he is quit of it by fulfilling it. For the most part, יָצָא merely is used: he has satisfied his duty; and לֹא יָצָא, he has not satisfied it, e.g. Berachoth ii. 1. Accordingly יָצָא—since eth-kullam relates to, "these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone," Matt. xxiii. 23—here means: he who fears God will set himself free from all, will acquit himself of the one as well as of the other, will perform both, and thus preserve the golden via media.

What protects him who with all his Righteousness is not free from Sin, and what becomes him, vii. 19-22.

The thought with which the following sentence is introduced is not incongruous to that going before. But each one of these moral proverbs and aphorisms is in itself a little whole, and the deeper connections, in the discovery of which interpreters vie with each other, are destitute of exegetical value. One must not seek to be over-wise; but the possession of wisdom deserves to be highly valued.

Ver. 19. "Wisdom affords strong protection to the wise man more than ten mighty men who are in the city." We have to distinguish, as is shown under Ps. xxxi. 3, the verbs  $\text{עָזַר}$ , to be strong, and  $\text{נָצַח}$ , to flee for refuge;  $\text{עָזַר}$  is the fut. of the former, whence  $\text{עָזָר}$ , stronghold, safe retreat, protection, and with  $\text{בָּ}$ , since  $\text{עָזַר}$  means not only to be strong, but also to show oneself strong, as at ix. 20, to feel and act as one strong; it has also the trans. meaning, to strengthen, as shown in Ps. lxxviii. 29, but here the intrans. suffices: wisdom proves itself strong for the wise man. The ten shallithim are not, with Ginsburg, to be multiplied indefinitely into "many mighty men." And it is not necessary, with Desvoeux, Hitz., Zöckl, and others, to think of ten chiefs (commanders of forces), including the portions of the city garrison which they commanded. The author probably in this refers to some definite political arrangement (vid. above, p. 216), perhaps to the ten archons, like those Assyrian salat, vice-regents, after whom as eponyms the year was named by the Greeks.  $\text{שָׂרֵי־ט}$ , in the Asiatic kingdom, was not properly a military title. And did a town then need protection only in the time of war, and not also at other times, against injury threatening its trade, against encroachments on its order, against the spread of infectious diseases, against the force of the elements? As the Deutero-Isaiah (lx. 17) says of Jerusalem: "I will make thy officers peace, and thine exactors righteousness," so Koheleth says here that wisdom affords a wise man as strong a protection as a powerful decemvirate a city; cf. Prov. xxiv. 5a: "A wise man is ba'oz," i.e. mighty.

Ver. 20. "For among men there is not a righteous man on the earth, who doeth good, and sinneth not." The original passage, found in Solomon's prayer at the consecration of the temple, is briefer, 1 Kings viii. 46: "There is no man who sinneth not." Here the words might be  $\text{אֵין אָדָם צַדִּיק וְגו'$ , there is no righteous man . . . Adam stands here as representing the species, as when we say in Germ.: Menschen gibt es keine gerechten auf Erden [men, there are none righteous on earth]; cf. Ex. v. 16: "Straw, none was given." The verification of ver. 19 by reference to the fact of the common sinfulness from which even the most righteous cannot free himself, does not contradict all expectation to the same degree as the ki in vii. 7; but yet it surprises us, so that Mercer and Grätz, with Aben Ezra, take ver. 20 as the verification of ver. 16, here first adduced, and Knobel and Heiligst. and others connect it with vers. 21, 22, translating: "Because there is not a just man . . . , therefore it is also the part of wisdom to take no heed unto all words," etc. But these are all forced interpretations; instead of the latter, we would rather suppose that ver. 20 originally stood after ver. 22, and is separated from its correct place. But yet the sequence of thought lying before us may be conceived, and that not merely as of necessity, but as that which was intended by the author. On the whole, Hitzig is correct: "For every one, even the wise man, sins; in which case virtue, which has forsaken him, does not protect him, but wisdom proves itself as his means of defence." Zöckler adds: "against the judicial justice of God;" but one escapes from this by a penitent appeal to grace, for which there is no need for the personal property of wisdom; there is thus reason rather for thinking on the dangerous consequences which often a single false step has for a man in other respects moral; in the threatening complications in which he is thereby involved, it is wisdom which then protects him and delivers him. Otherwise Tyler, who by the  $\text{ח}$ , which the wise has in wisdom, understands power over evil, which is always moving itself even in the righteous. But the sinning spoken of in ver. 20 is that which is unavoidable, which even wisdom cannot prevent or make inefficacious. On the contrary, it knows how to prevent the destruction which threatens man from his transgressions, and to remove the difficulties and derangements which thence arise. The good counsel following is connected by gam with the foregoing. The exhortation to strive after wisdom, contained in ver. 19, which affords protection against the evil effects of the failures which run through the life of the righteous, is followed by the exhortation, that one conscious that he himself is not free from transgression, should take heed to avoid that tale-bearing which finds pleasure in exposing to view the shortcomings of others.

Vers. 21, 22. "Also give not thy heart to all the words which one speaketh, lest thou shouldest hear thy servant curse thee. For thy heart knoweth in many cases that thou also hast cursed others." The talk of the people, who are the indef. subj. of  $\text{לְיָדֵי}$  (LXX., Targ., Syr. supply ἀσεβείς), is not about "thee who givest heed to the counsels just given" (Hitz., Zöckl.), for the restrictive  $\text{לְעַלְמֵי}$  is wanting; and why should a servant be zealous to utter imprecations on the conduct of his master, which rests on the best maxims? It is the babbling of the people in general that is meant. To this one ought not to turn his heart ( $\text{לֹא תִתֶּן$ , as at i. 13, 17, viii. 9, 16), i.e. give wilful attention, ne ( $\text{לֹא תִשְׁמַע} = \text{לֹא}$ , which does not occur in the Book of Koheleth) audias servum tuum tibi maledicere; the particip. expression of the pred. obj. follows the analogy of Gen. xxi. 9, Ewald, § 284*b*, and is not a Graecism; for since in this place hearing is meant, not immediately, but mediated through others, the expression would not in good Greek be with the LXX. . . . τοῦ δούλου σου καταρωμένου σε, but τὸν δούλόν σου καταρᾶσθαι σε. The warning has its motive in this, that by such round-about hearing one generally hears most unpleasant things; and on hearsay no reliance can be placed. Such gossiping one should ignore, should not listen to it at all; and if, nevertheless, something so bad is reported as that our own servant has spoken words of imprecation against us, yet we ought to pass that by unheeded, well knowing that we ourselves have often spoken harsh words against others. The expression 'וַיֵּן, "thou art conscious to thyself that," is like 'וְגַ, 1 Kings ii. 44, not the obj. accus. dependent on וַיֵּן (Hitz.), "many cases where also thou . . .," but the adv. accus. of time to וַיֵּן; the words are inverted (Ewald, § 336*b*), the style of Koheleth being fond of thus giving prominence to the chief conception (ver. 20, v. 18, iii. 13). The first gam, although it belongs to "thine, thy," as at 22*b* it is also connected with "thou,"<sup>1</sup> stands at the beginning of the sentence, after such syntactical examples as Hos. vi. 11; Zech. ix. 11; and even with a two-membered sentence, Job ii. 10.

The author makes here a pause, looks back at the teaching regarding prudence, already given particularly from ver. 15, and acknowledges wisdom as the goal of his effort, especially, however, that for him this goal does not lie behind him, but before him in the remote distance.

Ver. 23. "All this have I proved by wisdom: I thought, Wise I will become; but it remained far from me." The כ in בְּהִקְדָּמָה is, as at i. 13, that designating the organon, the means of knowledge. Thus he possessed wisdom up to a certain degree, and in part; but his purpose, comprehended in the one word אֶהְיֶה כָּמֹן (vid. above, p. 197, § 2), was to possess it fully and completely; i.e. not merely to be able to record observations and communicate advices, but to adjust the contradictions of life, to expound the mysteries of time and eternity, and generally to solve the most weighty and important questions which perplex men. But this wisdom was for him still in the remote distance. It is the wisdom after which Job, chap. xxviii., made inquiry in all regions of the world and at all creatures, at last to discover that God has appointed to man only a limited share of wisdom. Koheleth briefly condenses Job xxviii. 12-22 in the words following:

Ver. 24. "For that which is, is far off, and deep,—yes, deep; who can reach it?" Knobel, Hitz., Vaih., and Bullock translate: for what is remote and deep, deep, who can find it? i.e. investigate it; but mah-shehayah is everywhere an idea by itself, and means either id quod fuit, or id quod exstitit, i. 9, iii. 15, vi. 10; in the former sense it is the contrast of mah-she'ihyeh, viii. 7, x. 14, cf. iii. 22; in the latter, it is the contrast of that which does not exist, because it has not come into existence. In this way it is also not to be translated: For it is far off what it (wisdom) is (Zöckl.) [= what wisdom is lies far off from human knowledge], or: what it is (the essence of wisdom), is far off (Elst.)—which would be expressed by the words מה-שהיה. And if מה-שהיה is an idea complete in itself, it is evidently not that which is past that is meant (thus e.g. Rosenm., quod ante aderat), for that is a limitation of the obj. of knowledge, which is unsuitable here, but that which has come into existence. Rightly, Hengst.: that which has being, for wisdom is τὼν ὄντων γινώσκis ἀψευδής, Wisd. vii. 17. He compares Judg. iii. 11, "the work which God does," and viii. 17, "the work which is done under the sun." What Koheleth there says of the totality of the historical, he here says of the world of things: this (in its essence and its grounds) remains far off from man; it is for him, and also in itself and for all creatures, far too deep (עמק עמק, the ancient expression for the superlative): Who can intelligibly reach (יָמַץ, from מָצָא, assequi, in an intellectual sense, as at iii. 11, viii. 17; cf. Job xi. 7) it (this all of being)? The author appears in the book as a teacher of wisdom, and emphatically here makes confession of the limitation of his wisdom; for the consciousness of this limitation comes over him in the midst of his teaching.

Ver. 25. But, on the other side, he can bear testimony to himself that he has honestly exercised himself in seeking to go to the foundation of things: "I turned myself, and my heart was there to discern, and to explore, and to seek wisdom, and the account, and to perceive wickedness as folly, and folly as madness." Regarding sabbothi, vid. under ii. 20: a turning is meant to the theme as given in what follows, which, as we have to suppose, was connected with a turning away from superficiality and frivolity. Almost all interpreters—as also the accentuation does—connect the two words יָמַץ; but "I and my heart" is so unpsychological an expression, without example, that many Codd. (28 of Kennicott, 44 of de Rossi) read  $\text{בְּלִבִּי}$  [with my heart]. The erasure of the vav (as e.g. Luther: "I applied my heart") would at the same time require the change of  $\text{סְבוּתִי}$  into  $\text{הַסְבוּתִי}$ . The Targ., Jerome, and the Venet. render the word  $\text{בְּלִבִּי}$ ; the LXX. and Syr., on the contrary,  $\text{וּלְבִי}$ ; and this also is allowable, if we place the disjunctive on  $\text{אֲנִי}$  and take  $\text{וּלְבִי}$  as consequent: my heart, i.e. my striving and effort, was to discern (Aben Ezra, Herzf., Stuart),—a substantival clause instead of the verbal  $\text{וַיִּתְחַי אֶת־קִבְּבִי}$ , i. 13, i. 17. Regarding tur in an intellectual sense, vid. i. 13. Hhëshbon (vid. above, p. 192), with hhochmah, we have translated by "Rechenschaft" [account, ratio]; for we understand by it a knowledge well grounded and exact, and able to be established,—the facit of a calculation of all the facts and circumstances relating thereto;  $\text{נֶתַן הַשְׁבִּי}$  is Mishnic, and = the N. T.  $\text{λόγον ἀποδοιδόναι}$ . Of the two accus. 25*b* following  $\text{לְרַעַת}$ , the first, as may be supposed, and as the determination in the second member shows, is that of the obj., the second that of the pred. (Ewald, § 284*b*): that  $\text{רַעַת}$ , i.e. conduct separating from God and from the law of that which is good, is kēsäl, Thorheit, folly (since, as Socrates also taught, all sinning rests on a false calculation, to the sinner's own injury); and that hassichluth, Narrheit, foolishness, stultitia (vid. sachal, p. 194, and i. 17), is to be thus translated (in contradistinction to  $\text{בְּפִסְלִי}$ ), i.e. an intellectual and moral obtuseness, living for the day, rising up into foolery, not different from holeloth, fury, madness, and thus like a physical malady, under which men are out of themselves, rage, and are mad. Koheleth's striving after wisdom thus, at least in the second instance ( $\text{וּלְרַעַת}$ ), with a renunciation of the transcendental, went towards a practical end. And now he expresses by  $\text{וּמֵרֵצָה}$  one of the experiences he had reached in this way of research. How much value he attaches to this experience is evident from the long preface, by means of which it is as it were distilled. We see him there on the way to wisdom, to metaphysical wisdom, if we may so speak—it remains as far off from him as he seeks to come near to it. We then see him, yet not renouncing the effort after wisdom, on the way toward practical wisdom, which exercises itself in searching into the good and the bad; and that which has presented itself to him as the bitterest of the bitter is—a woman.

Ver. 26. "And I found woman more bitter than death; she is like hunting-nets, and like snares is her heart, her hands are bands: he who pleaseth God will escape from her; but the sinner is caught by them." As  $\text{נָסָה}$  iv. 2, so here  $\text{נָסָה}$  (vid. above, p. 197, 1, and 198, 3) gains by the preceding וַיִּסְבּוּתִי אֲנִי a past sense;<sup>1</sup> the particip. clause stands frequently thus, not only as a circumstantial clause, Gen. xiv. 12 f., but also as principal clause, Gen. ii. 10, in an historical connection. The preceding pred. בָּרַ, in the mas. ground-form, follows the rule, Gesen. § 147. Regarding the construction of the relative clause, Hitzig judges quite correctly: "הִיא is copula between subj. and pred., and precedes for the sake of the contrast, giving emphasis to the pred. It cannot be a nomin., which would be taken up by the suff. in לְבַיָּתָהּ, since if this latter were subject also to מִצֵּי הִיא would not certainly be found. Also asher here is not a conj." This הִיא (הִיא), which in relative substantival clauses represents the copula, for the most part stands separated from asher, e.g. Gen. vii. 2, xvii. 12, Num. xvii. 5, Deut. xvii. 15; less frequently immediately with it, Num. xxxv. 31; 1 Sam. x. 19; 2 Kings xxv. 19; Lev. xi. 26; Deut. xx. 20. But this asher hu (הִיא) never represents the subj., placed foremost and again resumed by the reflex. pronoun, so as to be construed as the accentuation requires: quae quidem retia et laquei cor ejus = cujus quidem cor sunt retia et laquei (Heiligst.). מִצֵּד is the means of searching, i.e. either of hunting: hunting-net (mitsodah, ix. 12), or of blockading: siege-work, bulwarks, ix. 14; here it is the plur. of the word in the former meaning. הַרְרִים, Hab. i. 14, plur. Ezek. xxvi. 5, etc. (perhaps from הָרַם, to pierce, bore through), is one of the many synon. for fishing-net. אֲסָרִים, fetters, the hands (arms) of voluptuous embrace (cf. above, p. 191). The primary form, after Jer. xxxvii. 15, is אֲסָרִים; cf. אֲבִים, Job xxxix. 9. Of the three clauses following asher, vav is found in the second and is wanting to the third, as at Deut. xxix. 22, Job xlii. 9, Ps. xlv. 9, Isa. i. 13; cf. on the other hand, Isa. xxxiii. 6. Similar in their import are these Leonine verses:

"Femina praeclara facie quasi pestis amara, Et quasi fermentum corrumpit cor sapientum."

That the author is in full earnest in this harsh judgment regarding woman, is shown by 26b: he who appears to God as good (cf. ii. 26) escapes from her (the fut. of the consequence of this his relation to God); but the sinner (הַיּוֹטֵא, cf. above, p. 254, note) is caught by her, or, properly, in her, viz. the net-like woman, or the net to which she is compared (Ps. ix. 16; Isa. xxiv. 18). The harsh judgment is, however, not applicable to woman as such, but to woman as she is, with only rare exceptions; among a thousand women he has not found one corresponding to the idea of a woman.

Vers. 27, 28. "Behold what I have found, saith Koheleth, adding one thing to another, to find out the account: What my soul hath still sought, and I have not found, (is this): one man among a thousand have I found; and a woman among all these have I not found." It is the ascertained result, "one man, etc.," which is solemnly introduced by the words preceding. Instead of אִישׁ אֶחָד, the words אֶחָד אִישׁ are to be read, after xii. 8, as is now generally acknowledged; errors of transcription of a similar kind are found at 2 Sam. v. 2; Job xxxviii. 12. Ginsburg in vain disputes this, maintaining that the name Koheleth, as denoting wisdom personified, may be regarded as fem. as well as mas.; here, where the female sex is so much depreciated, was the fem. self-designation of the stern judge specially unsuitable (cf. above, p. 204). Hengst. supposes that Koheleth is purposely fem. in this one passage, since true wisdom, represented by Solomon, stands opposite to false philosophy. But this reason for the fem. rests on the false opinion that woman here is heresy personified; he further remarks that it is significant for this fem. personification, that there is "no writing of female authorship in the whole canon of the O. and N. T." But what of Deborah's triumphal song, the song of Hannah, the magnificat of Mary? We hand this absurdity over to the Clementines! The woman here was flesh and blood, but pulchra quamvis pellis est mens tamen plena procellis; and Koheleth is not incarnate wisdom, but the official name of a preacher, as in Assyr., for חֲזַנִּים, curators, overseers, hazandti<sup>1</sup> is used. וְהָ, 27a, points, as at i. 10, to what follows. אֶחָד אֶחָד, one thing to another (cf. Isa. xxvii. 12), must have been, like summa summarum and the like, a common arithmetical and dialectical formula, which is here subordinate to אֶחָד, since an adv. inf. such as אֶחָד אֶחָד is to be supplemented: taking one thing to another to find out the הַשְׁבֵּת, i.e. the balance of the account, and thus to reach a facit, a resultat.<sup>2</sup>

That which presented itself to him in this way now follows. It was, in relation to woman, a negative experience: "What my soul sought on and on, and I found not, (is this)." The words are like the superscription of the following result, in which finally the וְהָ of 27a terminates. Ginsburg, incorrectly: "what my soul is still seeking," which would have required בְּקִשָּׁה. The pret. בְּקִשָּׁה (with

פ without Dagesh,<sup>1</sup> as at ver. 29) is retrospective; and עָרַד, from עָרַד, means redire, again and again, continually, as at Gen. xlv. 29. He always anew sought, and that, as biqshah naphshi for בִּקְשֵׁה נַפְשִׁי denotes, with urgent striving, violent longing, and never found, viz. a woman such as she ought to be: a man, one of a thousand, I have found, etc. With right, the accentuation gives Garshayim to adam; it stands forth, as at ver. 20, as a general denominator—the sequence of accents, Geresh, Pashta, Zakef, is as at Gen. i. 9. “One among a thousand” reminds us of Job xxxiii. 23, cf. ix. 3; the old interpreters (vid. Dachsel’s Bibl. Accentuata), with reference to these parallels, connect with the one man among a thousand all kinds of incongruous christological thoughts. Only, here adam, like the Romanic l’homme and the like, means man in sexual contrast to woman. It is thus ideally meant, like ish, 1 Sam. iv. 9, xlv. 15, and accordingly also the parall. אִשָּׁה. For it is not to be supposed that the author denies thereby perfect human nature to woman. But also Burger’s explanation: “a human being, whether man or woman,” is a useless evasion. Man has the name adam κατ’ ἐξ. by primitive hist. right: “for the man is not of the woman, but the woman of the man,” 1 Cor. xi. 8. The meaning, besides, is not that among a thousand human beings he found one upright man, but not a good woman (Hitz.),—for then the thousand ought to have had its proper denominator, בְּנֵי אָדָם,—but that among a thousand persons of the male sex he found only one man such as he ought to be, and among a thousand of the female sex not one woman such as she ought to be; “among all these” is thus = among an equal number. Since he thus actually found the ideal of man only seldom, and that of woman still seldomer (for more than this is not denoted by the round numbers), the more surely does he resign himself to the following resultat, which he introduces by the word לְבַר (only, alone), as the clear gain of his searching:

Ver. 29. “Lo, this only have I found, that God created man upright; but they seek many arts.” Also here the order of the words is inverted, since וְהוּא, belonging as obj. to מָצָאתִי (have I found), which is restricted by לְבַר (vid. above, p. 193), is amalgamated with וְהוּא (Lo! see!). The author means to say: Only this (solummodo hocce) have I found, that . . .; the וְהוּא is an interjected nota bene. The expression: God has made man יָשָׁר, is dogmatically significant. Man, as he came from the Creator’s hand, was not placed in the state of moral decision, nor yet in the state of absolute indifference between good and evil; he was not neither good nor bad, but he was טוב, or, which is the same thing, ישר; i.e. in every respect normal, so that he could normally develop himself from this positively good foundation. But by the expression עשה ישר, Koheleth has certainly not exclusively his origin in view, but at the same time his relative continuation in the propagation of himself, not without the concurrence of the Creator; also of man after the fall the words are true, עשה ישר, in so far as man still possesses the moral ability not to indulge sinful affections within him, nor suffer them to become sinful actions. But the sinful affections in the inborn nature of weak sinful man have derived so strong a support from his freedom, that the power of the will over against this power of nature is for the most part as weakness; the dominance of sin, where it is not counteracted by the grace of God, has always shown itself so powerful, that Koheleth has to complain of men of all times and in all circles of life: they seek many arts (as Luther well renders it), or properly, calculations, inventions, devices (hhishsh'vonoth,<sup>1</sup> as at 2 Chron. xxvi. 15, from hhishsh'von, which is as little distinguished from the formation hheshbon, as hhizzayon from hhazyon), viz. of means and ways, by which they go astray from the normal natural development into abnormities. In other words: inventive refined degeneracy has come into the place of moral simplicity, ἀπλότης (2 Chron. xi. 3). As to the opinion that caricatures of true human nature, contrasts between the actual and that which ought to be (the ideal), are common, particularly among the female sex, the author has testimonies in support of it from all nations. It is confirmed by the primitive history itself, in which the woman appears as the first that was led astray, and as the seducer (cf. Psychol. pp. 103-106). With reference to this an old proverb says: "Women carry in themselves a frivolous mind," Kiddushin 80b.<sup>2</sup> And because a woman, when she has fallen into evil, surpasses a man in fiendish superiority therein, the Midrash reckons under this passage before us fifteen things of which the one is worse than the other; the thirteenth is death, and the fourteenth a bad woman.<sup>3</sup> Hitzig supposes that the author has before him as his model Agathoclea, the mistress of the fourth Ptolemy Philopator. But also the history of the Persian Court affords dreadful examples of the truth of the proverb: "Woe to the age whose leader is a woman;"<sup>4</sup> and generally the harem is a den of female wickedness.

viii. 1-9.

If now the sentence first following sings the praise of wisdom, it does not stand out of connection with the striving after wisdom, which the author, vii. 23 f., has confessed, and with the experiences announced in vii. 25 ff., which have presented themselves to him in the way of the search after wisdom, so far as wisdom was attainable. It is the incomparable superiority of the wise man which the first verse here announces and verifies.

viii. 1. "Who is like the wise? and who understandeth the interpretation of things? The wisdom of a man maketh his face bright, and the rudeness of his face is changed." Unlike this saying: "Who is like the wise?" are the formulas מִי הָכֵם, Hos. xiv. 10, Jer. xi. 11, Ps. cvii. 43, which are compared by Hitzig and others. "Who is like the wise?" means: Who is equal to him? and this question, after the scheme מִי כְמֹכָה, Ex. xv. 11, presents him as one who has not his like among men. Instead of כְּהָ the word כְּהָכֵם might be used, after לְהָכֵם, ii. 16, etc. The syncope is, as at Ezek. xl. 25, omitted, which frequently occurs, particularly in the more modern books, Ezek. xlvi. 22; 2 Chron. x. 7, xxv. 10, xxix. 27; Neh. ix. 19, xii. 38. The regular giving of Dagesh to כ after מִי, with Jethib, not Mahpach, is as at ver. 7 after כִּי; Jethib is a disjunctive. The second question is not וּמִי כִּי יוֹדֵעַ, but וּמִי יוֹדֵעַ, and thus does not mean: who is like the man of understanding, but: who understands, viz. as the wise man does; thus it characterizes the incomparably excellent as such. Many interpreters (Oetinger, Ewald, Hitz., Heiligst., Burg., Elst., Zöck.) persuade themselves that מִי יוֹדֵעַ is meant of the understanding of the proverb, 8b. The absence of the art., says Hitzig, does not mislead us: of a proverb, viz. the following; but in this manner determinate ideas may be made from all indeterminate ones. Rightly, Gesenius: explicationem ullius rei; better, as at vii. 8: cujusvis rei. Ginsburg compares וּבְנוֹן דְּבָר, 1 Sam. xvi. 18, which, however, does not mean him who has the knowledge of things, but who is well acquainted with words. It is true that here also the chief idea יֹדֵעַ first leads to the meaning verbum (according to which the LXX., Jer., the Targ., and Syr. translate; the Venet.: ἐρμηνείαν λόγου); but since the unfolding or explaining (pëshër) refers to the actual contents of the thing spoken, verbi and rei coincide. The wise man knows how to explain difficult things, to unfold mysterious things; in short, he understands how to go to the foundation of things.

What now follows, 1b, might be introduced by the confirming כי, but after the manner of synonymous parallelism it places itself in the same rank with 1a, since, that the wise man stands so high, and no one like him looks through the centre of things, is repeated in another form: "Wisdom maketh his face bright" is thus to be understood after Ps. cxix. 130 and xix. 9, wisdom draws the veil from his countenance, and makes it clear; for wisdom is related to folly as light is to darkness, ii. 13. The contrast, 'שׁ . . . וְעָן ("and the rudeness of his face is changed"), shows, however, that not merely the brightening of the countenance, but in general that intellectual and ethical transfiguration of the countenance is meant, in which at once, even though it should not in itself be beautiful, we discover the educated man rising above the common rank. To translate, with Ewald: and the brightness of his countenance is doubled, is untenable; even supposing that שִׁנְיָא can mean, like the Arab. yuthattay, duplicatur, still עָן, in the meaning of brightness, is in itself, and especially with פָּנָיו, impossible, along with which it is, without doubt, to be understood after az panim, Deut. xxviii. 50, Dan. viii. 23, and hē'ez panim, Prov. vii. 13, or b'phanim, Prov. xxi. 29, so that thus פָּנָיו עָן has the same meaning as the post-bibl. עֲוִיּוֹת פָּנִים, stiffness, hardness, rudeness of countenance = boldness, want of bashfulness, regardlessness, e.g. Shabbath 30b, where we find a prayer in these words: O keep me this day from עֲוִי פָנִים and from עֲוִיּוֹת פָּנֶיךָ (that I may not incur the former or the latter). The Talm. Taanith 7b, thus explaining, says: "Every man to whom עֲוִיּוֹת פָּנֶיךָ belongs, him one may hate, as the scripture says, וְעָן . . . וְשִׁנְיָא (do not read שִׁנְיָא)." The LXX. translates μισσηθήσεται [will be hated], and thus also the Syr.; both have thus read as the Talm. has done, which, however, bears witness in favour of שִׁנְיָא as the traditional reading. It is not at all necessary, with Hitzig, after Zirkel, to read שִׁנְיָא: but boldness disfigureth his countenance; עָן in itself alone, in the meaning of boldness, would, it is true, along with פָּנָיו as the obj. of the verb, be tenable; but the change is unnecessary, the passive affords a perfectly intelligible meaning: the boldness, or rudeness, of his visage is changed, viz. by wisdom (Böttch., Ginsb., Zöckl.). The verb שִׁנְיָא (שָׁנָה, Lam. iv. 1) means, Mal. iii. 6, merely "to change, to become different;" the Pih. שִׁנְיָא, Jer. lii. 33, שִׁנְיָא, 2 Kings xxv. 29, denotes in these two passages a change in melius, and the proverb of the Greek, Sir. xiii. 24,—

Καρδία ἀνθρώπου ἀλλοιοῖ τὸ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ, ἐάν τε εἰς ἀγαθὰ ἐάν τε εἰς κακά,

is preserved to us in its original form thus :

ECCLES.

Y

לֵב אָדָם יִשָּׂנָה פָּנָיו
בֵּין לְטוֹב וּבֵין לְרָע :

so that thus שָׂנָה, in the sense of being changed as to the sternness of the expression of the countenance, is as good as established. What Ovid says of science: emollit mores nec sinit esse ferus, thus tolerably falls in with what is here said of wisdom: Wisdom gives bright eyes to a man, a gentle countenance, a noble expression; it refines and dignifies his external appearance and his demeanour; the hitherto rude external, and the regardless, selfish, and bold deportment, are changed into their contraries. If, now, ver. 1 is not to be regarded as an independent proverb, it will bear somewhat the relation of a prologue to what follows. Luther and others regard 1a as of the nature of an epilogue to what goes before; parallels, such as Hos. xiv. 10, make that appear probable; but it cannot be yielded, because the words are not מי רכב, but מי כרה. But that which follows easily subordinates itself to ver. 1, in as far as fidelity to duty and thoughtfulness amid critical social relations are proofs of that wisdom which sets a man free from impetuous rudeness, and fits him intelligently and with a clear mind to accommodate himself to the time.

Ver. 2. The faithfulness of subjects, Koheleth says, is a religious duty: "I say: Observe well the king's command, and that because of the oath of God." The author cannot have written 2a as it here stands; אֲנִי hovers in the air. Hitzig reads, with Jerome, שָׁמַר, and hears in vers. 2-4 a servile person speaking who veils himself in the cloak of religion; in vers. 5-8 follows the censura of this corrupt theory. But we have already (vid. above, p. 213) remarked that ver. 2 accords with Rom. xiii. 5, and is thus not a corrupt theory; besides, this distribution of the expressions of the Book of Koheleth between different speakers is throughout an expedient resting on a delusion. Luther translates: I keep the word of the king, and thus reads אֲשָׁמַר; as also does the Jer. Sanhedrin 21b, and Koheleth rabba, under this passage: I observe the command of the king, of the queen. In any case, it is not God who is meant here by "the king;" the words: "and that because of the oath of God," render this impossible, although Hengst. regards it as possible; for (1) "the oath of God" he understands, against all usage, of the oath which is taken to God; and (2) he maintains that in the O. T. scarcely any passage is to be found where obedience to a heathen master is set forth as a religious duty. But the prophets show themselves as morally great men, without a stain, just in this, that they decidedly condemn and unhesitatingly chastise any breach of faith committed against the Assyrian or Chaldean oppressor, e.g. Isa. xxviii. 15, xxx. 1; Ezek. xvii. 15; cf. Jer. xxvii. 12. However, although we understand mēlek not of the heavenly, but of an earthly king, yet אֱשֶׁר does not recommend itself, for Koheleth records his experience, and derives therefrom warnings and admonitions; but he never in this manner presents himself as an example of virtue. The paraenetic imper. שָׁמֵר is thus not to be touched. Can we then use ani elliptically, as equivalent to "I say as follows"? Passages such as Jer. xx. 10 (Elst.), where לֹא־אָמַר is omitted, are not at all the same. Also Ezek. xxxiv. 11, where הֲנִי is strengthened by ani, and the expression is not elliptical, is not in point here. And Isa. v. 9 also does not apply to the case of the supposed ellipsis here. In an ingenious bold manner the Midrash helps itself in Lev. xviii. and Num. xiv., for with reference to the self-introduction of royal words like אֲנִי פִרְעָה it explains: "Observe the I from the mouth of the king." This explanation is worthy of mention, but it has little need of refutation; it is also contrary to the accentuation, which gives Pashta to ani, as to רֵאִיָּה, vii. 27, and לִבְרִי, vii. 29, and thus places it by itself. Now, since this elliptical I, after which we would place a colon, is insufferably harsh, and since also it does not recommend itself to omit it, as is done by the LXX., the Targ., and Syr.—for the words must then have a different order, שָׁמֵר פִּי הַמֶּלֶךְ,—it is most advisable to supply אֲמַרְהִי, and to write אֲנִי אָמַר or אָמַר אֲנִי, after ii. 1, iii. 17, 18. We find ourselves here, besides, within an I section, consisting of sentences interwoven in a Mashal form. The admonition is solemnly introduced, since Koheleth, himself a king, and a wise man in addition, gives it the support of the authority of his person, in which it is to be observed that the religious motive introduced by וְ explicit. (vid. Ewald, § 340*b*) is not merely an appendix, but the very point of the admonition. Kleinert, incorrectly: "Direct thyself according to the mouth of the king, and that, too, as according to an oath of God." Were this the meaning, then we might certainly wish that it were a servile Alexandrian court-Jew who said it. But why should that be the meaning? The meaning "wegen" [because of], which is usually attributed to the word-connection עַל-דִּבְרָה here and at iii. 18, vii. 14, Kleinert maintains to be an arbitrary invention. But it alone fits these three passages, and why an arbitrary invention? If עַל-דִּבְרָה, Ps. xlv. 5, lxxix. 9, etc., means "von wegen" [on account of], then also עַל-דִּבְרָה will signify "propter rationem, naturam," as well as (Ps. cx. 4) ad rationem. שָׁב' אֵל is, as elsewhere יֵה' שָׁב', e.g. Ex. xxii. 10, a promise given under an appeal to God, a declaration or promise strengthened by an oath. Here it is the oath of obedience which is meant, which the covenant between a king and his people includes, though it is not expressly entered into by individuals. The king is designated neither as belonging to the nation, nor as a foreigner; that which is said is valid also in the case of the latter. Daniel, Nehemiah, Mordecai, etc., acted in conformity with the words of Koheleth, and the oath of vassalage which the kings of Israel and Judah swore to the kings of Assyria and of Babylon is regarded by the prophets of both kingdoms as binding on king and people (vid. above, p. 213).

Ver. 3. The warning, corresponding to the exhortation, now follows: One must not thoughtlessly avoid the duty of service and homage due to the king: "Hasten not to go away from him: join not in an evil matter; for he executeth all that he desireth." Regarding the connection, of two verbs with one idea, lying before us in  $\text{אַל} \dots \text{תִּלָּךְ}$ , as e.g. at Zech. viii. 15, Hos. i. 6, vid. Gesen. § 142. 3b. Instead of this sentence, we might use  $\text{אַל-תְּחַבֵּהוּ לְלִבָּת מַפְנִי}$ , as e.g. Aboth v. 8: "The wise man does not interrupt another, and hastens not to answer," i.e. is not too hasty in answering. As with  $\text{עִם}$ , to be with the king, iv. 15 = to hold with him, so here  $\text{מַפְנִי הֵלֵךְ}$  means to take oneself away from him, or, as it is expressed in x. 4, to leave one's station; cf. Hos. xi. 2: "They (the prophets of Jahve) called to them, forthwith they betook themselves away from them." It is possible that in the choice of the expression, the phrase  $\text{נִבְהַל מַפְנִי}$ , "to be put into a state of alarm before any one," Job xxiii. 15, was not without influence. The indef.  $\text{רָע דְּבַר רָע}$ , Deut. xvii. 1, xxiii. 10, cf. xiii. 12, xix. 20, 2 Kings iv. 41, etc., is to be referred (with Rosenm., Knobel, Bullock, and others) to undertakings which aim at resisting the will of the king, and reach their climax in conspiracy against the king's throne and life (Prov. xxiv. 21b).  $\text{אַל-תִּעַמְדוּ בָּ}$  might mean: persist not in it; but the warning does not presuppose that the entrance thereon had already taken place, but seeks to prevent it, thus: enter not, go not, engage not, like 'amad v'derek, Ps. i. 1; 'amad babrith, 2 Kings xxiii. 3; cf. Ps. cvi. 23; Jer. xxiii. 18. Also the Arab. 'amada li = intendit, proposuit sibi rem, is compared; it is used in the general sense of "to make toward something, to stretch to something." Otherwise Ewald, Elst., Ginsb., and Zöckl.: stand not at an evil word (of the king), provoking him to anger thereby still more,—against ver. 5, where  $\text{רָע דְּבַר רָע}$ , as generally (cf. Ps. cxli. 4), means an evil thing, and against the close connection of  $\text{עַמְדוּ בָּ}$ , which is to be presupposed. Hitzig even: stand not at an evil command, i.e. hesitate not to do even that which is evil, which the king commands, with the remark that here a servilismus is introduced as speaking, who, in saying of the king, "All that pleaseth him he doeth," uses words which are used only of God the Almighty, John i. 14, Ps. xxxiii. 9, etc. Hengst., Hahn, Dale, and others therefore dream of the heavenly King in the text. But proverbs of the earthly king, such as Prov. xx. 2, say the very same thing; and if the Mishna Sanhedrin ii. 2, to which Tyler refers, says of the king, "The king cannot himself be a judge, nor can any one judge him; he does not give evidence, and no evidence can be given against him," a sovereignty is thus attributed to the king, which is formulated in 3*b* and established in the verse following.

Ver. 4. "Inasmuch as the word of a king is powerful; and who can say to him: What doest thou?" The same thing is said of God, Job ix. 12, Isa. xlv. 9, Dan. iv. 32, Wisd. xii. 12, but also of the king, especially of the unlimited monarch of a despotic state. Baasher verifies as שָׁרָא at ii. 16; cf. Gen. xxxix. 9, 23; Greek, ἐν ᾧ and ἐφ' ᾧ. Burger arbitrarily: quae dixit (רָצָה for רָצָה), rex, in ea potestatem habet. The adjectival impers. use of the noun shilton = potestatem habens, is peculiar; in the Talm. and Midrash, shilton, like the Assy. siltannu,<sup>1</sup> means the ruler (vid. under v. 8). That which now follows is not, as Hitzig supposes, an opposing voice which makes itself heard, but as ver. 2 is compared with Rom. xiii. 5, so is ver. 5 with Rom. xiii. 3.

Ver. 5. "Whoso remaineth true to the commandment will experience nothing evil; and the heart of the wise man will know a time and judicial decision." That by מִצְוָה is here to be understood not the commandment of God, at least not immediately, as at Prov. xix. 16 (Ewald), but that of the king, and generally an injunction and appointment of the superior authority, is seen from the context, which treats not of God, but of the ruler over a state. Knobel and others explain: He who observeth the commandment engageth not with an evil thing, and the wise mind knoweth time and right. But יָרַע is never thus used (the author uses for this, אָרַע עֵשֶׂר), and the same meaning is to be supposed for the repeated יָרַע: it means to arrive at the knowledge of; in the first instance: to suffer, Ezek. xxv. 14; cf. Isa. ix. 8; Hos. ix. 7; in the second, to experience, Josh. xxiv. 31; Ps. xvi. 11. It may also, indeed, be translated after ix. 12: a wise heart knoweth time and judgment, viz. that they will not fail; but why should we not render יָרַע both times fut., since nothing stands in the way? We do not translate: a wise heart, a wise mind (Knobel), although this is possible, 1 Kings iii. 12 (cf. Ps. xc. 12), but: the heart of a wise man, which is made more natural by x. 2, Prov. xvi. 23. The heart of a wise man, which is not hurried forward by dynastic oppression to a selfish forgetfulness of duty, but in quietness and hope (Lam. iii. 26) awaits the interposition of God, will come to the knowledge that there is an eth, a time, when oppression has an end, and a mishpat, when it suffers punishment. Well adapted to the sense in which eth is here used is the remark of Elia Levita in his Tishbi, that  $\text{תָּי}$  corresponds to the German Zeit and the Romanic tempo, but  $\text{תָּי}$  to the German Ziel and the Romanic termino. The LXX. translates  $\text{καὶρὸν κλίσεως}$ ; and, in fact,  $\text{וַיָּטוּ}$  is a hendidays, which, however, consists in the division of one conception into two. The heart of the wise man remaining true to duty will come to learn that there is a terminus and judicial decision, for everything has an end when it falls under the fate for which it is ripe, especially the sinner.

Ver. 6. "For there is a time and decision for everything, for the wickedness of man becomes too great." From 6*a* there follow four clauses with  $\text{כִּי}$ ; by such monotonous repetition of one and the same word, the author also elsewhere renders the exposition difficult, affording too free a space for understanding the  $\text{כִּי}$  as confirming, or as hypothetical, and for co-ordinating or subordinating to each other the clauses with  $\text{כִּי}$ . Presupposing the correctness of our exposition of 5*a*, the clause 6*a* with  $\text{כִּי}$  may be rendered parenthetically, and that with  $\text{כִּי}$  in 6*b* hypothetically: "an end and decision the heart of the wise man will come to experience (because for everything there is an end and decision), supposing that the wickedness of man has become great upon him, i.e. his burden of guilt has reached its full measure." We suppose thereby (1) that  $\text{רַבְּנָה}$ , which appears from the accent on the ult. to be an adj., can also be the 3d pret., since before  $\text{ו}$  the tone has gone back to áh (cf. Gen. xxvi. 10; Isa. xi. 1), to protect it from being put aside; but generally the accenting of such forms of  $\text{ע"ע}$  hovers between the penult. and the ult., e.g. Ps. lxix. 5, lv. 22; Prov. xiv. 19. Then (2) that  $\text{עָלָיו}$  goes back to  $\text{הָאָדָם}$ , without distinction of persons, which has a support in vi. 1, and that thus a great  $\text{רָעָה}$  is meant lying upon man, which finally finds its punishment. But this view of the relation of the clauses fails, in that it affords no connection for ver. 7. It appears to be best to co-ordinate all the four  $\text{כִּי}$  as members of one chain of proof, which reaches its point in 8*b*, viz. in the following manner: the heart of a wise man will see the time and the judgment of the ruler, laying to his heart the temptation to rebellion; for (1) as the author has already said, iii. 17: "God will judge the righteous as well as the wicked, for there is with Him a time for every purpose and for every act;" (2) the wickedness of man (by which, as ver. 9 shows, despots are aimed at) which he has committed, becomes great upon him, so that suddenly at once the judgment of God will break in upon him; (3) he knows not what will be done; (4) no one can tell him how (quomodo) it, the future, will be, so that he might in any way anticipate it—the judgment will overwhelm him unexpectedly and irretrievably: wickedness does not save its possessor.

Vers. 7 and 8 thus continue the For and For: "For he knoweth not that which shall be; for who can tell him how it will be? There is no man who has power over the wind, to restrain the wind; and no one has authority over the day of death; and there is no discharge in the war; and wickedness does not save its possessor." The actor has the sin upon himself, and bears it; if it reaches the terminus of full measure, it suddenly overwhelms him in punishment, and the too great burden oppresses its bearer (Hitzig, under Isa. xxiv. 20). This 'עַתָּה וְיָמֵינוּ' comes unforeseen, for he (the man who heaps up sins) knoweth not id quod fiet; it arrives unforeseen, for quomodo fiet, who can show it to him? Thus, e.g., the tyrant knows not that he will die by assassination, and no one can say to him how that will happen, so that he might make arrangements for his protection. Rightly the LXX. καθὼς ἔσται; on the contrary, the Targ., Hitzig, and Ginsburg: when it will be;<sup>1</sup> but בְּאִשְׁרֵי signifies quum, iv. 17, v. 3, viii. 16, but not quando, which must be expressed by כִּתִּי (Mishnic אִיכָתִי אִיכָתִי כִתִּי).

Now follows the concluding thought of the four כִּי, whereby 5b is established. There are four impossibilities enumerated; the fourth is the point of the enumeration constructed in the form of a numerical proverb. (1) No man has power over the wind, to check the wind. Ewald, Hengst., Zöckl., and others understand רִיחַ, with the Targ., Jerome, and Luther, of the Spirit (רוּחַ הַיְיִם); but man can limit this physically when he puts a violent termination to life, and must restrain it morally by ruling it, Prov. xvi. 32, xxv. 28. On the contrary, the wind הַרְוּחַ is, after xi. 5, incalculable, and to rule over it is the exclusive prerogative of Divine Omnipotence, Prov. xxx. 4.

The transition to the second impossibility is mediated by this, that in רוּחַ, according to the usus loq., the ideas of the breath of animal life, and of wind as the breath as it were of the life of the whole of nature, are interwoven. (2) No one has power over the day of death : death, viz. natural death, comes to a man without his being able to see it before, to determine it, or to change it. With שְׁלֵיט there here interchanges שְׁלֵטוֹן, which is rendered by the LXX. and Venet. as abstr., also by the Syr. But as at Dan. iii. 2, so also above at ver. 4, it is concr., and will be so also in the passage before us, as generally in the Talm. and Midrash, in contradistinction to the abstr., which is שְׁלֵטוֹן, after the forms אֲבָרָן, דְּרִיבָן, etc., e.g. Bere-shith rabba, c. 85 extr. : "Every king and ruler שְׁלֵטוֹן who had not a שְׁלֵטוֹן, a command (government, sway) in the land, said that that did not satisfy him, the king of Babylon had to place an under-Caesar in Jericho," etc.<sup>1</sup> Thus: no man possesses rule or is a ruler . . .

A transition is made from the inevitable law of death to the inexorable severity of the law of war; (3) there is no discharge, no dispensation, whether for a time merely (missio), or a full discharge (dimissio), in war, which in its fearful rigour (vid. on the contrary, Deut. xx. 5-8) was the Persian law (cf. above, p. 214). Even so, every possibility of escape is cut off by the law of the divine requital; (4) wickedness will not save (מַלְטָה, causative, as always) its lord (cf. the proverb: "Unfaithfulness strikes its own master") or possessor; i.e. the wicked person, when the עַת וְיָוֵם comes, is hopelessly lost. Grätz would adopt the reading עֵשֶׂר instead of רִשָּׁע; but the fate of the בְּעַל רִשָּׁע, or of the רִשָּׁע, is certainly that to which the concatenation of thought from ver. 6 leads, as also the disjunctive accent at the end of the three first clauses of ver. 8 denotes. But that in the words ba'al resha' (not בְּעַלִּי) a despotic king is thought of (בְּעַלִּי, as at v. 10, 12, vii. 12; Prov. iii. 27; cf. under Prov. i. 19), is placed beyond a doubt by the epilogistic verse:

Ver. 9. "All that I have seen, and that, too, directing my heart to all the labour that is done under the sun: to the time when a man rules over a man to his hurt." The relation of the clauses is mistaken by Jerome, Luther, Hengst., Vaih., Ginsburg, and others, who begin a new clause with עֵת: "there is a time," etc.; and Zöckl., who ventures to interpret עַת וְיָוֵם as epexegetical of וְיָוֵם בְּכָל-מַעַל ( "every work that is done under the sun"). The clause וְנִתְחַן is an adverbial subordinate clause (vid. under iv. 2): et advertendo quidem animum. עֵת is accus. of time, as at Jer. li. 33; cf. Ps. iv. 8, the relation of 'eth asher, like מִקְשׁ, i. 7, xi. 3. All that, viz. the wisdom of patient fidelity to duty, the perniciousness of revolutionary selfishness, and the suddenness with which the judgment comes, he has seen (for he observed the actions done under the sun), with his own eyes, at the time when man ruled over man לֹרַע לֵאלֹהֵי, not: to his own [the ruler's] injury (Symm., Jerome), but: to the injury (LXX., Theod., τοῦ κακῶσαι αὐτόν, and thus also the Targ. and Syr.) of this second man; for after 'eth asher, a description and not a judgment was to be expected. The man who rules over man to the hurt of the latter rules as a tyrant; and this whole section, beginning with viii. 1, treats of the right wisdom of life at a time of tyrannical government.

It is with the Righteous as with the Wicked, and with the Wicked as with the Righteous,—it is best to enjoy Life as long as God grants it, viii. 10-15.

The theme of the following section shows itself by “and then” to be cognate. It is the opposition of the fate of the wicked and of the righteous to the inalienable consciousness of a moral government of the world; this opposition comes forth, under the unhappy tyrannical government of which the foregoing section treats, as a prominent phenomenon.

Ver. 10. “And then I have seen the wicked buried, and they came to rest; but away from the holy place they had to depart, and were forgotten in the city, such as acted justly: also this is vain.” The double particle בְּבִי signifies, in such a manner, or under such circumstances; with “I have seen” following, it may introduce an observation coming under that which precedes (בְּכֵן = Mishnic בְּכֵן), or, with the force of the Lat. inde, introduce a further observation of that ruler; this temporal signification “then” (= אָז), according to which we have translated, it has in the Targ. (vid. Levy's W. B.)<sup>1</sup> Apparently the observation has two different classes of men in view, and refers to their fate, contradicting, according to appearance, the rectitude of God. Opposite to the רָשָׁע (“the wicked”) stand they who are described as אֲשֶׁר יוֹנֵי: they who have practised what is rightly directed, what stands in a right relation (vid. regarding יָדָה, as noun, under Prov. xi. 19), have brought the morally right into practice, i.e. have acted with fidelity and honour (עָשָׂה בְּיָדָה, as at 2 Kings vii. 9). Koheleth has seen the wicked buried; רָאָה is followed by the particip. as predic. obj., as is שָׂמַע, vii. 21; but קִבְּרֵי־מֵתִים is not followed by יִבְרָאִים (which, besides not being distinct enough as part. perfecti, would be, as at Neh. xiii. 22, part. præs.), but, according to the favourite transition of the particip. into the finite, Gesen. § 134. 2, by  $\text{בָּנִי}$ , not  $\text{בְּנֵי}$ ; for the disjunctive Rebba has the fuller form with  $\text{י}$ ; cf. Isa. xlv. 20 with Job xvii. 10, and above, at ii. 23. "To enter in" is here, after Isa. xlvii. 2, = to enter into peace, come to rest.<sup>1</sup> That what follows 'ומט' does not relate to the wicked, has been mistaken by the LXX., Aquila, Symm., Theod., and Jerome, who translate by ἐπηγήθησαν, laudabantur, and thus read  $\text{יִשְׁתַּחֲוּוּ$  (the Hithpa., Ps. cvi. 47, in the pass. sense), a word which is used in the Talm. and Midrash along with  $\text{יִשְׁתַּחֲוּוּ$ .<sup>2</sup> The latter, testified to by the Targ. and Syr., is without doubt the correct reading: the structure of the antithetical parallel members is chiasitic; the naming of the persons in 1aa precedes that which is declared, and in 1aβ it follows it; cf. Ps. lxx. 5b, lxxv. 9b. The fut. forms here gain, by the retrospective perfects going before, a past signification.  $\text{מִקְדָּשׁ}$ , "the place of the holy," is equivalent to  $\text{מִקְדָּשׁ קֹדֶשׁ}$ , as also at Lev. vii. 6. Ewald understands by it the place of burial: "the upright were driven away (cast out) from the holy place of graves." Thus e.g. also Zöckl, who renders: but wandered far from the place of the holy . . . those who did righteously, i.e. they had to be buried in graves neither holy nor honourable. But this form of expression is not found among the many designations of a burial-place used by the Jews (vid. below, xii. 5, and Hamburger's Real-Encykl. für Bibel u. Talm., article "Grab"). God's-acre is called the "good place,"<sup>3</sup> but not the "holy place." The "holy place," if not Jerusalem itself, which is called by Isaiah II. (xlviii. 2), Neh., and Dan., 'ir haqqodesh (as now el-kuds), is the holy ground of the temple of God, the τόπος ἅγιος (Matt. xxiv. 15), as Aquila and Symm. translate. If, now, we find min connected with the verb halak, it is to be presupposed that the min designates the point of departure, as also  $\text{מִן הַשְּׁלַךְ}$ , Isa. xiv. 19. Thus not: to wander far from the holy place; nor as Hitz., who points  $\text{יִהְיֶינָה}$ : they pass away (perish) far from the holy place. The subject is the being driven away from the holy place, but not as if  $\text{יִהְיֶינָה}$  were causative, in the sense of  $\text{יִלְכִי}$ , and meant ejiciunt, with an indef. subj. (Ewald, Heiligst., Elst.),—it is also, iv. 15, xi. 9, only the intens. of Kal.,—but  $\text{יִהְיֶינָה}$  denotes, after Ps. xxxviii. 7, Job xxx. 28, cf. xxiv. 10, the meditative, dull, slow walk of those who are compelled against their will to depart from the place which they love (Ps. xxvi. 8, lxxxiv. 2 ff.). They must go forth (whither, is not said, but probably into a foreign country; cf. Amos vii. 17), and only too soon are they forgotten in the city, viz. the holy city; a younger generation knows nothing more of them, and not even a gravestone brings them back to the memory of their people. Also this is a vanity, like the many others already registered—this, viz., that the wicked while living, and also in their death, possess the sacred native soil; while, on the contrary, the upright are constrained to depart from it, and are soon forgotten. Divine rectitude is herein missed. Certainly it exists, and is also recognised, but it does not show itself always when we should expect it, nor so soon as appears to us to be salutary.

Ver. 11. "Because judgment against the work of the wicked man is not speedily executed, for this reason the heart of the children of men is full within them, to this, that they do evil." The clause with asher is connected first with the foregoing gam-zeh havel: thus vain, after the nature of a perverted world (inversus ordo), events go on, because . . . (asher, as at iv. 3, vi. 12b; cf. Deut. iii. 24); but the following clause with 'al-ken makes this clause with asher reflex. an antecedent of itself (asher = 'al-asher)—originally it is not meant as an antecedent. אֲשֶׁר־כֵּן<sup>1</sup> (here to be written after נַעֲשֶׂה, with אֲרַפְהֶם, and, besides, also with אֲרַפְהֶם), in the post-exilic books, is the Persian paigam, Armen. patgam, which is derived from the ancient Pers. paiti-gama: "Something that has happened, tidings, news." The Heb. has adopted the word in the general sense of "sentence;" in the passage before us it signifies the saying or sentence of the judge, as the Pers. word, like the Arab. naban, is used principally of the sayings of a prophet (who is called peighám-bar). Zirkel regards it as the Greek φθέγμα; but thus, also, the words אֲשֶׁר־כֵּן, אֲשֶׁר־כֵּן strangely agree in sound with σμύλη, φορέιον, without being borrowed from the Greek. The long a of the word is, as Elst. shows, i. 20, invariable; also here אֲשֶׁר־כֵּן is the constr. To point אֲשֶׁר־כֵּן, with Heiligst. and Burg., is thus unwarrantable. It is more remarkable that the word is construed fem. instead of mas. For since אֲשֶׁר is construed<sup>2</sup> neither in the bibl. nor in the Mishnic

<sup>1</sup> With אֲרַפְהֶם in H. P. and the older edd., as also Esth. i. 20; Dan. iii. 16. Thus also the punctuator Jekuthiel in his En hakore to Esth. i. 20.

<sup>2</sup> Ginsburg points in favour of אֲשֶׁר־כֵּן as fin. to Ex. iii. 2, but there אֲשֶׁר־כֵּן is particip.; to Jer. xxxviii. 5, but there אֲשֶׁר־כֵּן (if it is not to be read אֲשֶׁר־כֵּן) represents an attributive clause; and to Job xxxv. 15, but there the word is rightly pointed אֲשֶׁר, not אֲשֶׁר; and this, like the vulg. Arab. laysa, is used as an emphatic אֲשֶׁר.

style with the finite of the verb, נִעֲשֶׂה is not the 3d pret., but the participle. It is not, however, necessary, with Hitz., to read נִעֲשֶׂה. The foreign word, like the (Arab.) firdans, παράδεισος, admits of use in the double gen. (Ewald, § 174g); but it is also possible that the fem. נִעֲשֶׂה is per. attract. occasioned by הִרְצֵה, as Kimchi, Michlol 10a, supposes (cf. besides, under x. 15). מִנְעִשֶׂה is const. governed by phithgam, and hara'ah is thus obj. gen. The LXX., Syr., and Jerome read מִנְעִשִׁי, which would be possible only if phithgam min—after the analogy of the Heb.-Aram. phrase, niphra' ('ithp'ra') min, to take one's due of any one, i.e. to take vengeance on him, to punish him—could mean the full execution of punishment on any one; but it means here, as Jerome rightly translates, sententia; impossible, however, with me'ose hara'ah, sententia contra malos. Hengst. supposes that not only the traditional text, but also the accentuation, is correct, for he construes: because a sentence (of the heavenly Judge) is not executed, the work of wickedness is haste, i.e. speedy. Thus also Dachsel in the Biblia accentuata. Mercerus, on the contrary, remarks that the accents are not in the first instance marks of interpunction, but of cantillation. In fact, genit. word-connections do not exclude the keeping them asunder by distinctives such as Pashta and Tiphcha, Isa. x. 2, and also Zakeph, as e.g. Esth. i. 4. The LXX. well renders: "Therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully persuaded in them to do evil;" for which Jerome, freely, after Symm.: absque timore ullo filii hominum perpetrant mala. The heart of one becomes full to do anything, is = it acquires full courage thereto (Luzzatto, § 590: gli blastò l'animo); cf. Esth. vii. 5: "Where is he who has his heart filled to do?" (thus rightly, Keil), i.e. whom it has encouraged to so bold an undertaking. בָּקֵם in itself unnecessarily heightens the expression of the inwardness of the destructive work (vid. Psychol. p. 151 f.). The sentence of punishment does not take effect m'hera, hastily (adv. accus. for bimherah, iv. 12), therefore men are secure, and they give themselves with full, i.e. with fearless and shameless, boldness to the practice of evil. The author confirms this further, but not without expressing his own conviction that there is a righteous requital which contradicts this appearance.

Vers. 12, 13. "Because a sinner doeth evil an hundred times, and he becometh old therein, although I know that it will go well with them that fear God, that fear before Him: but it will not go well with the wicked, and he shall not live long, like a shadow; because he feareth not before God." Ewald (whom Heiligst., Elst., and Zöckl. follow), as among the ancients, e.g. Mendelssohn, translates ver. 12: "Though a sinner do evil an hundred times, and live long, yet I know," etc. That an antecedent may begin with asher is admissible, Lev. iv. 22, Deut. xviii. 22; but in the case lying before us, still less acceptable than at ver. 11. For, in the first place, this asher of the antecedent cannot mean "although," but only "considering that;" and in places such as vi. 3, where this "considering that" may be exchanged with "although," there follows not the part., but the fut. natural to the concessive clause; then, in the second place, by this antecedent rendering of asher a closer connection of 12a and 12b is indeed gained, but the mediation of ver. 12 and ver. 11 is lost; in the third place, בִּי נָם, in the meaning "however" (gam, ὁμως, with affirmative ki), is not found; not asher, but just this ki gam,<sup>1</sup> signifies, in the passage before us, as at iv. 14, εἰ καί, although,—only a somewhat otherwise applied gam ki, Ewald, § 362b, as בִּי עַל-כֵּן is a somewhat otherwise applied כִּי עַל-כֵּן. Rightly, Hitzig: "In 12a, 11a is again resumed, and it is explained how tardy justice has such a consequence." The sinner is thereby encouraged in sinning, because he does evil, and always again evil, and yet enjoys himself in all the pleasures of long life. Regarding הִטָּא for הִטָּא, vid. above, p. 197, 1. מֵאָה is = מֵאָה פְּעָמִים, an hundred times, as אַהַת, Job xl. 5, is = פַּעַם אַהַת; Hengst. and others, inexactly: an hundredfold, which would have required the word מֵאָהִים; and falsely, Ginsburg, with the Targ.: an hundred years, which would have required מֵאָה, scil. שָׁנָה, Gen. xvii. 17. This centies (Jerome) is, like מֵאָה, scil. בְּנִים, vi. 3, a round number for a great many, as at Prov. xvii. 10, and frequently in the Talm. and Midrash, e.g. Wajikra rabba, c. 27: "an hundred deeply-breathed sighs (מֵאָה פְּעוּיָה) the mother gave forth."<sup>2</sup> The meaning of לֹא יִמְאָרֶיךָ is in general clear: he becomes therein old. Jerome, improbable: et per patientiam sustentatur, as Mendelssohn: he experiences forbearance, for they supply אִפּוֹ (Isa. xlvi. 9), and make God the subject. לֹא is in any case the so-called dat. ethic.; and the only question is, whether the doing of evil has to be taken from עֲשֵׂה רָע,<sup>3</sup> as obj. to וּמֵאָה: he practises it to him long, or whether, which is more probable, יָמִים is to be supplied after 13*a*, so that האריך signifies to live long, as at Prov. xxviii. 2, to last long; the dat. ethic. gives the idea of the feeling of contentment connected with long life: he thereupon sins wantonly, and becomes old in it in good health.

<sup>1</sup> That נָם is not pointed נָם, has its reason in the disjunctive Jethib with כִּי, which is not interchanged with the conjunctive Mahpach. Thus, viii. 1, כִּי בְּ, and viii. 7, כִּי בְּ.

<sup>3</sup> We expect these two words (cf. Gen. xxxi. 12) with the retrogression of the tone; but as this ceases, as a rule, with Mercha before Tifcha and Pashta, Gen. xlvi. 3, Ex. xviii. 5, Deut. iv. 42, xix. 4, Isa. x. 14 (cf. the penult. accent of יִמְאָל, Lev. xxii. 10, 19, and בְּנָה, Gen. iv. 17, with the ult. accent Lev. xxii. 14; Hab.

That is the actual state of the case, which the author cannot conceal from himself; although, on the other hand, as by way of limitation he adds ki . . . ani, he well knows that there is a moral government of the world, and that this must finally prevail. We may not translate: that it should go well, but rather: that it must go well; but there is no reason not to interpret the fut. as a pure indic.: that it shall go well, viz. finally,—it is a postulate of his consciousness which the author here expresses; that which exists in appearance contradicts this consciousness, which, however, in spite of this, asserts itself. That to לִירֵי הָאֵל the clause אֲשֶׁר סִי, explaining idem per idem, is added, has certainly its reason in this, that at the time of the author the name “fearers of God” [Gottesfürchtige] had come into use. “The fearers of God, who fear before (סִיפִי, as at iii. 14) Him,” are such as are in reality what they are called.

In ver. 13, Hitzig, followed by Elster, Burg, and Zöckl., places the division at ימים: like the shadow is he who fears not before God. Nothing can in point of syntax be said against this (cf. 1 Chron. xxix. 15), although בְּצֵל אֲשֶׁר, “like the shadow is he who,” is in point of style awkward. But that the author did not use so rude a style is manifest from vi. 12, according to which כָּל is rightly referred to ימים . . . וְלֹא־. Is then the shadow, asks Hitzig, because it does not “prolong its days,” therefore קִצֵּר יָמִים? How subtle and literal is this use of ימים! Certainly the shadow survives not a day; but for that very reason it is short-lived, it may even indeed be called קִצֵּר יָמִים, because it has not existence for a single day. In general, q̄tsel, ὡς σκιά, is applicable to the life of all men, Ps. cxliv. 4, Wisd. ii. 5, etc. It is true of the wicked, if we keep in view the righteous divine requital, especially that he is short-lived like the shadow, “because he has no fear before God,” and that in consequence of this want of fear his life is shortened by his sin inflicting its own punishment, and by the act of God. Asher, 13*b*, as at 11*a*, 12*a*, is the relative conj. Also in ver. 14, אֲשֶׁר (ש) as a pronoun, and אֲשֶׁר (ש) as a conj., are mixed together. After the author has declared the reality of a moral government of the world as an inalienable fact of human consciousness, and particularly of his own consciousness, he places over against this fact ii. 12), so with Mercha sometimes also before other disjunctives, as here before Tebir.

Ver. 14. "There is a vanity which is done on the earth; that there be just men, to whom it happeneth according to the conduct of the wicked; and that there be wicked men, to whom it happeneth according to the conduct of the righteous—I said, that also this is vain." The limiting clause with ki gam, 12*b*, 13, is subordinated to the observation specified in vers. 10–12*a*, and the confirmation of it is continued here in ver. 14. Regarding הֵיטִיב, to happen, vid. above, p. 193, under נָגַע. Jerome translates בְּמַ' הֵרָ' by quasi opera egerint impiorum, and בְּמַ' הֵצִ' by quasi justorum facta habeant; instar operis . . . would be better, such as is conformable to the mode of acting of the one and of the other; for כ is in the Semitic style of speech a nomen, which annexes to itself the word that follows it in the genitive, and runs through all the relations of case. This contradictory distribution of destiny deceives, misleads, and causes to err; it belongs to the illusory shadowy side of this present life, it is a hevel. The concluding clause of this verse: "I said, that also this is vain," begins to draw the facit from the observation, and is continued in the verse following.

Ver. 15. "And I commended joy, that there is nothing better for a man under the sun than to eat and drink and enjoy himself; and that this accompanies him in his labour throughout all the days of his life, which God hath given him under the sun." We already read the ultimatum, 15*a*, in a similar form at ii. 24, iii. 12, 22; cf. v. 17. With הֵיטִיב either begins a new clause, and the fut. is then jussive: "let this accompany him," or it is subordinate to the foregoing infinitives, and the fut. is then subjunctive: et ut id eum comitetur. The LXX. and other Greeks translate less appropriately indicat.: καὶ αὐτὸ συμπροσέσται αὐτῷ. Thus also Ewald, Hengst., Zöckl., and others: and this clings to him, which, however, would rather be expressed by יהוּא יִהְרֹן לִי or הוּא הִלְקִין לִי. The verb לִי (R. לָ, to twist, to bend) does not mean to cling to = to remain, but to adhere to, to follow, to accompany; cf. under Gen. xviii. 16. The possibility of the meaning, "to accompany," for the Kal, is supported by the derivatives לָיִה and לָיִי (particularly לָיִית הַמַּתִּים, convoy of the dead); the verb, however, in this signification extra-bibl. is found only in Pih. and Hiph.<sup>1</sup>

Like the distributions of destiny, so also labour and toil here below appear to the author to be on all sides an inextricable series of mysteries. Far from drawing atheistical conclusions therefrom, he sees in all that is done, viewed in its last causality, the work of God, i.e. the carrying out into execution of a divine law, the accomplishment of a divine plan. But this work of God, in spite of all his earnest endeavours, remains for man a subject of research for the future. Treating of this inexplicable difficulty, the words here used by the author himself are also hard to be understood.

Vers. 16, 17: "When I gave my heart to know wisdom, and to view the business which is done on the earth (for neither day nor night doth he see sleep with his eyes): then have I seen all the work of God, that a man is unable to find out the work which is done under the sun: therefore that a man wearieth himself to seek out, and yet findeth not; and although a wise man taketh in hand to know,—he is unable to find." A long period without a premeditated plan has here formed itself under the hand of the author. As it lies before us, it is halved by the vav in v'raithi ("then I have seen"); the principal clause, introduced by "when I gave," can nowhere otherwise begin than here; but it is not indicated by the syntactical structure. Yet in Chron. and Neh. apodoses of כָּאֲשֶׁר begin with the second consec. modus, e.g. 1 Chron. xvii. 1, Neh. iv. 1, and frequently; but the author here uses this modus only rarely, and not (vid. iv. 1, 7) as a sign of an apodosis.

We consider, first, the protasis, with the parenthesis in which it terminates. The phrase יָתֵן אֶת־הַלֵּב לְ, to direct the heart, to give attention and effort toward something, we have now frequently met with from i. 13 down. The aim is here twofold: (1) "to know wisdom" (cf. i. 17), i.e. to gain the knowledge of that which is wisdom, and which is to be regarded as wisdom, viz. solid knowledge regarding the essence, causes, and objects of things; (2) by such knowledge about that which wisdom is in itself "to see earthly labour;" and—this arises from the combination of the two resolutions—to comprehend this labour in accordance with the claims of true wisdom from the point of view of its last ground and aim. Regarding 'inyan, vid. under iii. 10. "On the earth" and "under the sun" are parallel designations of this world.

With כִּי begins a parenthetical clause. Ki may also, it is true, be rendered as at 17*a*: the labour on the earth, that he, etc. (Zöckl); but this restlessness, almost renouncing sleep, is thereby pressed too much into the foreground as the special obj. of the r'uth (therefore Ginsburg introduces "how that"); thus better to render this clause with ki gam, as establishing the fact that there is 'inyan, self-tormenting, restless labour on the earth. Thus also אִינְיָנִי is easier explained, which scarcely goes back to lāadam, 15a (Hitz.), but shows that the author, by 'inyan, has specially men in view. 'לְיָמֵי . . . יוֹמִים is = 'נֶגַם בַּיּוֹם בֵּינָם בַּלַּיְלָה: as well by day as by night, with the negat. following (cf. Num. xxiii. 25; Isa. xlviii. 8): neither by day nor by night; not only by day, but also in the night, not. "To see sleep" is a phrase occurring only here; cf. Terence, Heautontim. iii. 1. 82, Somnum hercle ego hac nocte oculis non vidi meis, for which we use the expression: "In this whole night my eyes have seen no sleep." The not wishing to sleep, and not being able to sleep, is such an hyperbole, carrying its limitation in itself, as is found in Cicero (ad Famil. vii. 30): Fuit mirifica vigilantia, qui toto suo consulatu somnum non vidit.

With 'וָרָ, "Then I have seen," begins the apodosis: vidi totum Dei opus non posse hominem assequi. As at ii. 24b, the author places the obj. in the foreground, and lets the pred. with ki follow (for other examples of this so-called antiposis, vid. under Gen. i. 4). He sees in the labour here below one side of God's work carrying itself forward amid this restless confusion, and sets forth this work of God, as at iii. 11 (but where the connection of the thoughts is different), as an object of knowledge remaining beyond the reach of man. He cannot come to it, or, as מַצָּח properly means, he reaches not to it, therefore "that a man wearies himself to seek, and yet finds not," i.e. that the search on the part of a man with all his endeavours comes not to its aim. בְּכֹל אִשֶּׁר [Ewald's emendation, instead of the words of the text before us]: for all this, that quantumcumque (Ewald, § 362c), which seems to have been approved of by the LXX., Syr., and Jerome, is rightly rejected by Hitzig; b'shel asher is Heb., exactly equivalent to Aram. בְּדִילָךְ, e.g. Gen. vi. 3; and is rightly glossed by Rashi, Kimchi, Michlol 47b, by בְּשִׁבְלֵיךְ and בְּעֵבֹרֵיךְ. The accent dividing the verse stands on yim'tsa, for to this word extends the first half of the apodosis, with v'gam begins the second. Gam im is = ei kal, as gam ki is = èav kal. יִאמַר is to be understood after 'אִמַּר אֱמֹר, vii. 23: also if (although) the wise man resolves to know, he cannot reach that which is to be known. The characteristic mark of the wise man is thus not so much the possession as the striving after it. He strives after knowledge, but the highest problems remain unsolved by him, and his ideal of knowledge unrealized.

The Power of Fate, and the best possible Thing for Man in his Want of Freedom, ix. 1-12.

He cannot attain unto it, for to the thoughts as well as to the acts of man God has put a limit.

ix. 1. "For all this I brought to my consciousness, and all this I sought to make clear to me, that the righteous, and the wise, and their deeds, are in God's hands: neither love nor hatred stands in the knowledge of man, all lies before them." With ki follows the verification of what is said in viii. 17*b*, "is unable to find out," from the fact of men, even the best and the wisest of men, being on all sides conditioned. This conditioning is a fact which he layeth to his heart (vii. 2), or (since he here presents himself less as a feeling than as a thinking man, and the heart as reflecting) which he has brought to his consciousness, and which he has sought to bring out into clearness. לָבוֹר has here not the force of an inf. absol., so that it subordinates itself in an adverbial manner (et ventilando quidem)—for it nowhere stands in the same rank with the inf. absol.; but the inf. with לָ (לֵ) has the force of an intentional (with a tendency) fut., since the governing הַיְיָיִתִי, as at iii. 15*a*, הָיָה, and at Hab. i. 17*b*, יִהְיֶה, is to be supplied (vid. comm. on these passages, and under Isa. xlv. 14): operam dedi ut ventilarem (excuterem), or shorter: ventilaturus fui. Regarding the form לָבוֹר, which is metapl. for לָבַר, and the double idea of sifting (particularly winnowing, ventilare) of the R. בַּר, vid. under iii. 18. In the post-bibl. Heb. the words לַהַעֲמִיר בּוֹרִי would denote the very same as is here expressed by the brief significant word לָבוֹר; a matter in the clearness of its actual condition is called דְּבַר עַל בּוֹרִי (from בָּרַי, after the form הָלִי, purity, vid. Buxtorf's Lex. Talm. col. 366). The LXX. and Syr. have read לָבִי רָאָה instead of לָבוֹר, apparently because they could not see their way with it: "And my heart has seen all this." The expression "all this" refers both times to what follows; asher is, as at viii. 12, relat. conj., in the sense of ὅτι, quod, and introduces, as at vii. 29, cf. viii. 14, the unfolding of the הָיָה,—an unfolding, viz., of the conditioning of man, which viii. 17 declared on one side of it, and whose further verification is here placed in view with ki, 1*a*. The righteous, and the wise, and their doings, are in God's hand, i.e. power (Ps. xxxi. 16; Prov. xxi. 1; Job xii. 10, etc.); as well their persons as their actions, in respect of their last cause, are conditioned by God, the Governor of the world and the Former of history; also the righteous and the wise learn to feel this dependence, not only in their being and in what befalls them, but also in their conduct; also this is not fully attained, לֹא דם, they are also therein not sufficient of themselves. Regarding 'avadēhēm, corresponding to the Aram. 'ovadēhon, vid. 'avad, p. 194.

The expression now following cannot mean that man does not know whether he will experience the love or hatred of God, i.e. providences of a happy nature proceeding from the love of God, or of an unhappy nature proceeding from the hatred of God (J. D. Michaelis, Knobel, Vaih., Hengst., Zöckl.), for אֲהַבָה and אֲשֵׁר are too general for this,—man is thus, as the expression denotes, not the obj., but the subj. to both. Rightly, Hitz., as also Ewald: "Since man has not his actions in his own power, he knows not whether he will love or hate." Certainly this sounds deterministic; but is it not true that personal sympathies and antipathies, from which love and hatred unfold themselves, come within the sphere of man, not only as to their objects, in consequence of the divine arrangement, but also in themselves anticipate the knowledge and the will of man? and is it less true that the love which he now cherishes toward another man changes itself, without his previous knowledge, by means of unexpected causes, into hatred, and, on the other hand, the hatred into love? Neither love nor hatred is the product of a man's self-determination; but self-determination, and with it the function of freedom, begins for the first time over against those already present, in their beginnings. In הַכֹּל לְפָנָי, "by all that is before him," that is brought to a general expression, in which לְפָנָי has not the ethical meaning proceeding from the local: before them, prae = penes eos (vid. Song, under viii. 12a), but the purely local meaning, and referred to time: love, hatred, and generally all things, stand before man; God causes them to meet him (cf. the use of הִקְרִיב); they belong to the future, which is beyond his power. Thus the Targ., Symm., and most modern interpreters; on the contrary, Luther: "neither the love nor the hatred of any one which he has for himself," which is, linguistically, purely impossible; Kleinert: "Neither the love nor the hatred of things does man see through, nor anything else which is before his eyes," for which we ought at least to have had the words נִם הַכֹּל אִשֶׁר לְפָנָי; and Tyler: "Men discern neither love nor hatred in all that is before them," as if the text were בְּכֹל אִשֶׁר. The future can, it is true, be designated by אַחֲרָיִת, and the past by לְפָנָיִם, but according to the most natural way of representation (vid. Orelli's Synon. der Zeit, p. 14) the future is that which lies before a man, and the past that which is behind him. The question is of importance, which of the two words הַכֹּל לְפָנָי has the accent. If the accent be on לְפָנָי, then the meaning is, that all lies before men deprived of their freedom; if the accent be on הַכֹּל, then the meaning is, that all things, events of all kinds, lie before them, and that God determines which shall happen to them. The latter is more accordant with the order of words lying before us, and shows itself to be that which is intended by the further progress of the thoughts. Every possible thing may befall a man—what actually meets him is the determination and providence of God. The determination is not according to the moral condition of a man, so that the one can guide to no certain conclusion as to the other.

Ver. 2. "All is the same which comes to all: one event happens to the righteous and the wicked, to the good and the pure and the impure; to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not: as with the good, so is it with the sinner; with him that sweareth, as with him that feareth an oath." Hitzig translates: "All are alike, one fate comes on all," adding the remark, that to make מקרה אחד at the same time pred. to הכל and subj. to כאשר לכל was, for the punctator, too much. This translation is indeed in matter, as well as in point of syntax, difficult to be comprehended. Rather, with Ewald, translate: All is as if all had one fate (death); but why then this useless hevel haasher, only darkening the thought? But certainly, since in הכל<sup>1</sup> the past is again resumed, it is to be supposed that it does not mean personally, omnes, but neut., omnia; and לכל, on the contrary, manifestly refers (as at x. 3) to persons. Herein agreeing with Ewald, and, besides, with Knobel, Zöckl, and others, we accept the interpunction as it lies before us. The apparently meaningless clause, omnia sicut omnibus, gives, if we separate sicut into sic and ut, the brief but pregnant thought: All is (thus) as it happens to all, i.e. there is no distinction of their experiences nor of their persons; all of every sort happens in the same way to all men of every sort. The thought, written in cyphers in this manner, is then illustrated; the lameds following leave no doubt as to the meaning of לכל. Men are classified according to their different kinds. The good and the pure stand opposite the impure; טמא is thus the defiled, Hos. v. 3, cf. Ezek. xxxvi. 25, in body and soul. That the author has here in his mind the precepts of the law regarding the pure and the impure, is to be concluded from the following contrast: he who offers sacrifice, and he who does not offer sacrifice, i.e. he who not only does not bring free-will offerings, but not even the sacrifices that are obligatory. Finally, he who swears, and he who is afraid of an oath, are distinguished. Thus, Zech. v. 3, he who swears stands along with him who steals. In itself, certainly, swearing an oath is not a sin; in certain circumstances (vid. viii. 2) it is a necessary, solemn act (Isa. lxxv. 16). But here, in the passage from Zechariah, swearing of an unrighteous kind is meant, i.e. wanton swearing, a calling upon God when it is not necessary, and, it may be, even to confirm an untruth, Ex. xx. 7. Compare Matt. v. 34. The order of the words 'שָׁב' יָר' (cf. as to the expression, the Mishnic יָרָא הָטָא) is as at Nah. iii. 1; Isa. xxii. 2; cf. above, v. 8*b*. One event befalls all these men of different characters, by which here not death exclusively is meant (as at iii. 19, ii. 14), but this only chiefly as the same end of these experiences which are not determined according to the moral condition of men. In the expression of the equality, there is an example of stylistic refinement in a threefold change; 'הָטוֹב כִּי' denotes that the experience of the good is the experience of the sinner, and may be translated, "wie der Gute so der Sünder" [as the good, so the sinner], as well as "so der Gute wie der Sünder" [so the good as the sinner] (cf. Köhler, under Hag. ii. 3). This sameness of fate, in which we perceive the want of the inter-connection of the physical and moral order of the world, is in itself and in its influence an evil matter.

Ver. 3. "This is an evil in all that is done under the sun, that one event happeneth to all: and also the heart of the children of men is full of evil; and madness possesseth their heart during their life, and after it they go to the dead." As וְהָאֵל, 1*a*, points to the asher following, in which it unfolds itself, so here to the ki following. We do not translate: This is the worst thing (Jerome: hoc est pessimum), which, after Josh. xiv. 15, Judg. vi. 15, Song i. 8, would have required the words הָרַע בְּכָל—the author does not designate the equality of fate as the greatest evil, but as an evil mixed with all earthly events. It is an evil in itself, as being a contradiction to the moral order of the world; and it is such also on account of its demoralizing influences. The author here repeats what he had already, viii. 11, said in a more special reference, that because evil is not in this world visibly punished, men become confident and bold in sinning. V<sup>e</sup>gam (referable to the whole clause, at the beginning of which it is placed) stands beside zeh ra', connecting with that which is evil in itself its evil influences. קָלִיל might be an adj., for this (only once, Jer. vi. 11), like the verb, is connected with the accus., e.g. Deut. xxxiii. 23. But, since not a statement but a factum had to be uttered, it is finite, as at viii. 11. Thus Jerome, after Symm.: sed et cor filiorum hominum repletur malitia et procacitate juxta cor eorum in vita sua. Keeping out of view the false sed, this translation corresponds to the accenting which gives the conjunctive Kadma to עָ. But without doubt an independent substantival clause begins with 'הָ: and madness is in their heart (vid. i. 17) their life long; for, without taking heed to God's will and to what is pleasing to God, or seeking after instruction, they think only of the satisfaction of their inclinations and lusts.

"And after that they go to the dead"—they who had so given themselves up to evil, and revelled in fleshly lusts with security, go the way of all flesh, as do the righteous, and the wise, and just, because they know that they go beyond all restraining bounds. Most modern interpreters (Hitz., Ew., etc.) render aharav, after Jer. li. 46, adverbially, with the suffix understood neut.: afterwards (Jerome, post hæc). But at iii. 22, vi. 12, vii. 14, the suffix refers to man: after him, him who liveth here = after he has laid down his life. Why should it not be thus understood also here? It is true 'הָ precedes it; but in the reverse way, sing. and plur. also interchange in ver. 1; cf. iii. 12. Rightly the Targ., as with Kleinert and others, we also explain: after their (his) lifetime. A man's life finally falls into the past, it lies behind him, and he goes forth to the dead; and along with self-consciousness, all the pleasures and joy of life at the same time come to an end.

Ver. 4. "For (to him) who shall be always joined to all the living, there is hope: for even a living dog is better than a dead lion." The interrog. מִי אֲשֶׁר, quis est qui, acquires the force of a relative, quisquis (quicumque), and may be interpreted, Ex. xxxii. 33, 2 Sam. xx. 12, just as here (cf. the simple mi, v. 9), in both ways; particularly the latter passage (2 Sam. xx. 11) is also analogous to the one before us in the formation of the apodosis. The Chethib יבחר does not admit of any tenable meaning. In conformity with the usus loq., Elster reads מִי אֲשֶׁר יבחר, "who has a choice?" But this rendering has no connection with what follows; the sequence of thoughts fails. Most interpreters, in opposition to the usus loq., by pointing יבחר or יבחר, render: Who is (more correctly: will be) excepted? or also: Who is it that is to be preferred (the living or the dead)? The verb בָּחַר signifies to choose, to select; and the choice may be connected with an exception, a preference; but in itself the verb means neither excipere nor præferre.<sup>1</sup> All the old translators, with right, follow the Keri, and the Syr. renders it correctly, word for word: to every one who is joined (שׁוּתָהּ, Aram. = Heb. תָּחִיר) to all the living there is hope; and this translation is more probable than that on which Symm. ("who shall always continue to live?") and Jerome (nemo est qui semper vivat et qui hujus rei habeat fiduciam) proceed: Who is he that is joined to the whole? i.e. to the absolute life; or as Hitzig: Who is he who would join himself to all the living (like the saying, "The everlasting Jew")? The expression 'יש בָּפֶה' does not connect itself so easily and directly with these two latter renderings as with that we have adopted, in which, as also in the other two, a different accentuation of the half-verse is to be adopted as follows:

כִּי מִי אֲשֶׁר יִחְבֵּר אֶל־כָּל־הַחַיִּים יֵשׁ בְּפִתּוֹן

The accentuation lying before us in the text, which gives a great disjunctive to 'יחבר' as well as to 'יה', appears to warrant the Chethib (cf. Hitzig under Ezek. xxii. 24), by which it is possible to interpret 'יב... מי' as in itself an interrog. clause. The Keri 'יה' does not admit of this, for Dachsel's quis associabit se (sc. mortuis? = nemo socius mortuorum fieri vult) is a linguistic impossibility; the reflex may be used for the pass., but not the pass. for the reflex., which is also an argument against Ewald's translation: Who is joined to the living has hope. Also the Targ. and Rashi, although explaining according to the Midrash, cannot forbear connecting 'אל כל־הח' with 'יה', and thus dividing the verse at 'הח' instead of at 'יה'. It is not, however, to be supposed that the accentuation refers to the Chethib; it proceeds on some interpretation, contrary to the connection, such as this: he who is received into God's fellowship has to hope for the full life (in eternity). The true meaning, according to the connection, is this: that whoever (quicumque) is only always joined (whether by birth or the preservation of life) to all the living, i.e. to living beings, be they who they may, has full confidence, hope, and joy; for in respect to a living dog, this is even better than a dead lion. Symmachus translates: κυνὶ ζῶντι βέλτιόν ἐστιν ἢ λέοντι τεθνηκότι, which Rosenm., Herzf., and Grätz approve of. But apart from the obliquity of the comparison, that with a living dog it is better than with a dead lion, since with the latter is neither good nor evil (vid. however, vi. 5*b*), for such a meaning the words ought to have been: chélév hái tov lo min ha'aryéh hammeth.

As the verifying clause stands before us, it is connected not with 'יש בָּפֶה', but with 'אֶל כָּל־הַ', of that which is to be verified; the ל gives emphatic prominence (Ewald, § 310*b*) to the subject, to which the expression refers as at Ps. lxxxix. 19, 2 Chron. vii. 21 (cf. Jer. xviii. 16), Isa. xxxii. 1: A living dog is better than a dead lion, i.e. it is better to be a dog which lives, than that lion which is dead. The dog, which occurs in the Holy Scriptures only in relation to a shepherd's dog (Job xxx. 1), and as for the rest, appears as a voracious filthy beast, roaming about without a master, is the proverbial emblem of that which is common, or low, or contemptible, 1 Sam. xvii. 43; cf. "dog's head," 2 Sam. iii. 8; "dead dog," 1 Sam. xxiv. 15; 2 Sam. ix. 8, xvi. 9. The lion, on the other hand, is the king, or, as Agur (Prov. xxx. 30) calls it, the hero among beasts. But if it be dead, then all is over with its dignity and its strength; the existence of a living dog is to be preferred to that of the dead lion. The art. in <sup>ל</sup>דָּג <sup>ל</sup>מָוֶת is not that denoting species (Dale), which is excluded by hammēth, but it points to the carcase of a lion which is present. The author, who elsewhere prefers death and nonentity to life, iv. 2 f., vii. 1, appears to have fallen into contradiction with himself; but there he views life pessimistically in its, for the most part, unhappy experiences, while here he regards it in itself as a good affording the possibility of enjoyment. It lies, however, in the nature of his standpoint that he should not be able to find the right medium between the sorrow of the world and the pleasure of life. Although postulating a retribution in eternity, yet in his thoughts about the future he does not rise above the comfortless idea of Hades.

Vers. 5, 6. He sarcastically verifies his comparison in favour of a living dog. "For the living know that they shall die; but the dead know not anything, and have no more a reward; for their memory is forgotten. Their love, as well as their hatred and their envy, has long ago perished, and they have part no more for ever in all that is done under the sun." The description of the condition of death begins sarcastically and then becomes elegiac. "They have no reward further," viz. in this upper world, since there it is only too soon forgotten that they once existed, and that they did anything worthy of being remembered; Koheleth might here indeed, with his view shrouded in dark clouds, even suppose that God also forgot them, Job xiv. 13. The suff. of <sup>ל</sup>אֵינָם, etc., present themselves as subjective, and there is no reason, with Knobel and Ginsburg, to render them objectively: not merely the objects of their love, and hatred, and envy, are lost to them, but these their affections and strivings themselves have ceased (Rosenm., Hitzig, Zöckl., and others), they lie (K<sup>e</sup>var'avadah) far behind them as absolutely gone; for the dead have no part more in the history which is unfolding itself amid the light of the upper world, and they can have no more any part therein, for the dead as not living are not only without knowledge, but also without feeling and desire. The representation of the state after death is here more comfortless than anywhere else. For elsewhere we read that those who have been living here spend in Sheol, i.e. in the deep (R. šw, to be loose, to hang down, to go downwards) realm of the dead, as r<sup>h</sup>phaim (Isa. xiv. 9, etc.), lying beneath the upper world, far from the love and the praise of God (Ps. vi. 3, xxx. 10), a prospectless (Job vii. 7 f., xiv. 6-12; Ps. lxxxviii. 11-13), dark, shadowy existence; the soul in Hades, though neither annihilated nor sleeping, finds itself in a state of death no less than does the body in the grave. But here the state of death is not even set forth over against the idea of the dissolution of life, the complete annihilation of individuality, much less that a retribution in eternity, i.e. a retribution executed, if not here, yet at some time, postulated elsewhere by the author, throws a ray of light into the night of death. The apocryphal book of the Wisdom of Solomon, which distinguishes between a state of blessedness and a state of misery measured out to men in the future following death, has in this surpassed the canonical Book of Koheleth. In vain do the Targ., Midrash, and the older Christian interpreters refer that which is said to the wicked dead; others regard Koheleth as introducing here the discourse of atheists (e.g. Oetinger), and interpret, under the influence of monstrous self-deception, ver. 7 as the voice of the spirit (Hengst.) opposing the voice of the flesh. But that which Koheleth expresses here only in a particularly rugged way is the view of Hades predominating in the O. T. It is the consequence of viewing death from the side of its anger. Revelation intentionally permits this manner of viewing it to remain; but from premises which the revelation sets forth, the religious consciousness in the course of time draws always more decidedly the conclusion, that the man who is united to God will fully reach through death that which since the entrance of sin into the world cannot be reached without the loss of this present life, i.e. without death, viz. a more perfect life in fellowship with God. Yet the confusion of the O. T. representation of Hades remains; in the Book of Sirach it also still throws its deep shadows (xvii. 22 f.) into the contemplation of the future; for the first time the N. T. solution actually removes the confusion, and turns the scale in favour of the view of death on its side of light. In this history of the ideas of eternity moving forward amid many fluctuations to the N. T. goal, a significant place belongs to the Book of Koheleth; certainly the Christian interpreter ought not to have an interest in explaining away and concealing the imperfections of knowledge which made it impossible for the author spiritually to rise above his pessimism. He does not rise, in contrast to his pessimism, above an eudaemonism which is earthly, which, without knowing of a future life (not like the modern pessimism, without wishing to know of a future life), recommends a pleasant enjoyment of the present life, so far as that is morally allowable:

Vers. 7–10. “Go, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for long ago hath God accepted thy work. Let thy garments be always white; and let not oil be wanting to thy head. Enjoy life with a wife whom thou lovest through all the days of thy vain life, which He hath given thee under the sun—through all thy vain days: for that is thy portion in life, and in thy labour wherewith thou weariest thyself under the sun. All that thy hand may find to do with thy might, that do; for there is not work, and calculation, and knowledge, and wisdom, in the under world, whither thou shalt go.” Hengstenberg perceives here the counterpart of the spirit; on the contrary, Oetinger, Mendelssohn, and others, discover also here, and here for the first time rightly, the utterance of an epicurean thought. But, in fact, this  $\text{וְאָמַרְתָּ}$  down to  $\text{וְשָׂמַחְתָּ}$  is the most distinct personal utterance of the author, his ceterum censeo which pervades the whole book, and here forms a particularly copious conclusion of a long series of thoughts. We recapitulate this series of thoughts: One fate, at last the same final event, happens to all men, without making any distinction according to their moral condition,—an evil matter, so much the more evil, as it encourages to wickedness and light-mindedness; the way of man, without exception, leads to the dead, and all further prospect is cut off; for only he who belongs to the class of living beings has a joyful spirit, has a spirit of enterprise: even the lowest being, if it live, stands higher in worth, and is better, than the highest if it be dead; for death is the end of all knowledge and feeling, the being cut off from the living under the sun. From this, that there is only one life, one life on this side of eternity, he deduces the exhortation to enjoy the one as much as possible; God Himself, to whom we owe it, will have it so that we enjoy it, within the moral limits prescribed by Himself indeed, for this limitation is certainly given with His approbation. Incorrectly, the Targ., Rashi, Hengst., Ginsb., and Zöckl. explain: For thy moral conduct and effort have pleased Him long ago—the person addressed is some one, not a definite person, who could be thus set forth as such a witness to be commended. Rather with Grotius and others: Quia Deus favet laboribus tuis h. e. eos ita prosperavit, ut cuncta quae vitam delectant abunde tibi suppetant. The thought is wholly in the spirit of the Book of Koheleth; for the fruit of labour and the enjoyment of this fruit of labour, as at ii. 24, iii. 13, etc., is a gift from above; and besides, this may be said to the person addressed, since 7*a* presupposes that he has at his disposal heart-strengthening bread and heart-refreshing wine. But in these two explanations the meaning of בָּכַר is not comprehended. It was left untranslated by the old translators, from their not understanding it. Rightly, Aben Ezra: For God wills that thou shouldst thus do [indulge in these enjoyments]; more correctly, Hitzig: Long ago God has beforehand permitted this thy conduct, so that thou hast no room for scruples about it. How significant בָּכַר is for the thought, is indicated by the accentuation which gives to it Zakef: from afore-time God has impressed the seal of His approbation on this thy eating with joy, this thy drinking with a merry heart.—The assigning of the reason gives courage to the enjoyment, but at the same time gives to it a consecration; for it is the will of God that we should enjoy life, thus it is self-evident that we have to enjoy it as He wills it to be enjoyed.

Ver. 8. The white garments, לְבָנִים, are in contrast to the black robes of mourning, and thus are an expression of festal joy, of a happy mood; black and white are, according to the ancients, colour-symbols, the colours respectively of sorrow and joy, to which light and darkness correspond.<sup>1</sup> Fragrant oil is also, according to Prov. xxvii. 9, one of the heart-refreshing things. Sorrow and anointing exclude one another, 2 Sam. xiv. 2; joy and oil stand in closest mutual relation, Ps. xlv. 8, Isa. lxi. 3; oil which smooths the hair and makes the face shine (vid. under Ps. civ. 15). This oil ought not to be wanting to the head, and thus the perpetuity of a happy life should suffer no interruption.

In 9*a* most translators render: Enjoy life with the wife whom thou lovest; but the author purposely does not use the word הָאִשָּׁה, but אִשָּׁה; and also that he uses חַיִּים, and not חַיִּים, is not without significance. He means: Bring into experience what life, what happiness, is (cf. the indetermin. ideas, Ps. xxxiv. 13) with a wife whom thou hast loved (Jerome: quaecunq̄ue tibi placuerit feminarum), in which there lies indirectly the call to choose such an one; whereby the pessimistic criticism of the female sex, vii. 26–28, so far as the author is concerned, falls into the background, since eudaemonism, the other side of his view of the world, predominates. The accus. designation of time, “through all the days of the life of thy vanity (i.e. of thy transient vain life),” is like vi. 12, cf. vii. 15. It is repeated in “all the days of thy vanity;” the repetition is heavy and unnecessary (therefore omitted by the LXX., Targ., and Syr.); probably like והררך, Ps. xlv. 5, a ditto; Hitzig, however, finds also here great emphasis. The relative clause standing after the first designation of time refers to “the days which He (האלהים, 7b) has granted under the sun.” Hu in 9b refers attractively to חֵלְקֶךָ (Jerome: haec est enim pars), as at iii. 22, v. 17, cf. vii. 2; הַיָּמִים of the Babyl. is therefore to be rejected; this enjoyment, particularly of marriage joys, is thy part in life, and in thy work which thou accomplishest under the sun, i.e. the real portion of gain allotted to thee which thou mayest and oughtest to enjoy here below.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Shabbath 114*a*: "Bury me neither in white nor in black garments: not in white, because perhaps I may not be one of the blessed, and am like a bridegroom among mourners; not in black, because perhaps I may be one of the blessed, and am like a mourner among bridegrooms." Semachoth ii. 10: Him who is outside the congregation, they do not bury with solemnity; the brothers and relatives of such must clothe and veil themselves in white; cf. Joma 39*b*. Elsewhere white is the colour of innocence, Shabbath 153*a*, Midrash under Prov. xvi. 11; and black the colour of guilt, Kiddushin 40*a*, etc.

Ver. 10. The author, however, recommends no continual dolce far niente, no idle, useless sluggard-life devoted to pleasure, but he gives to his exhortation to joy the converse side: “All that thy hand may reach (i.e. what thou canst accomplish and is possible to thee, 1 Sam. x. 7; Lev. xii. 8) to accomplish it with thy might, that do.” The accentuation is ingenious. If the author meant: That do with all might (Jerome: instantanter operare), then he would have said b'chol-kohhacha (Gen. xxxi. 6). As the words lie before us, they call on him who is addressed to come not short in his work of any possibility according to the measure of his strength, thus to a work straining his capacity to the uttermost. The reason for the call, 10b, turns back to the clause from which it was inferred: in Hades, whither thou must go (iturus es), there is no work, and reckoning (vid. vii. 25), and knowledge (וְדַעַת<sup>1</sup>), and no wisdom. Practice and theory have then an end. Thus: Enjoy, but not without working, ere the night cometh when no man can work. Thus spake Jesus (John ix. 4), but in a different sense indeed from Koheleth. The night which He meant is the termination of this present life, which for Him, as for every man, has its particular work, which is either accomplished within the limits of this life, or is not accomplished at all.

<sup>1</sup> Not וְדַעַת, because the word has the conjunctive, not the disjunctive accent, vid. under Ps. lv. 10. The punctuation, as we have already several times remarked, is not consistent in this; cf. וְדַעַת, ii. 26, and וְעָרַב, Ps. xxv. 9, both of which are contrary to the rule (vid. Baer in Abulwalid's Rikma p. 119, note 2).

The Incalculableness of the Issues and of the Duration of Life,
ix. 11, 12.

Another reflection, so far not without connection in the foregoing, as the fact of experience, that ability is yet no security for the issue aimed at and merited, is chiefly referred to wisdom :

Ver. 11. "Further, I came to see under the sun, that the race belongs not to the swift, and the war not to the heroes, and also not bread to the wise man, and not riches to the prudent, and not favour to men of knowledge ; for time and chance happeneth to them all." The nearest preceding 'רָא, to which this 'שָׁבָּ 'וְרָא' suitably connects itself, is at viii. 17. Instead of redii et videndo quidem = rursus vidi (cf. viii. 9 and under ix. 1), we had at iv. 1 the simpler expression, redii et vidi. The five times repeated ל is that of property, of that, viz., by virtue of which one is master of that which is named, has power over it, disposes of it freely. The race belongs not to the swift (מְרִיץ, masc. to מְרִיצָה, only here), i.e. their fleetness is yet no guarantee that on account of it they will reach the goal. Luther freely: "To be fleet does not help in running," i.e. running to an object or goal. "The war belongs not to the heroes," means that much rather it belongs to the Lord, 1 Sam. xvii. 47.—God alone gives the victory (Ps. xxxiii. 16). Even so the gaining of bread, riches, favour (i.e. influence, reputation), does not lie in wisdom, prudence, knowledge of themselves, as an indispensable means thereto; but the obtaining of them, or the not obtaining of them, depends on times and circumstances which lie beyond the control of man, and is thus, in the final result, conditioned by God (cf. Rom. ix. 16<sup>1</sup>); time and fate happen to all whose ability appears to warrant the issue, they both [time and fate] encounter them and bar to them the way; they are in an inexplicable manner dependent on both, and helplessly subject to them. As the idea of spiritual superiority is here expressed in a threefold manner by 'הָרָה (whence 'הָרָה of the plur., also with the art. ix. 1; Ex. xxxvi. 4; Esth. i. 13), 'הָרָה, and 'הָרָה, so at Isa. xi. 2, the gifts of "wisdom," "counsel," and "knowledge" follow each other. 'Eth is here "time" with its special circumstances (conjunctures), and 'pega', "accident," particularly as an adversity, disappointment, for the word is used also without any addition (1 Kings v. 18) of misfortune (cf. שִׁיר פְּנֵיעִים, Ps. iii. xci.). The masc. 'ק' is regulated after 'וּם; 'eth can, however, be used in the masc., Song ii. 12; Böttch. § 648, viz. "with the misapprehension of its origin" (v. Orelli).

This limitation of man in his efforts, in spite of all his capacity, has its reason in this, that he is on the whole not master of his own life :

Ver. 12. "For man also knoweth not his time: like the fishes which are caught in an evil net, and like the birds which are caught in the snare—like them are the sons of men snared in an evil time, when it suddenly breaks in upon them." The particles  $\text{כִּי} \text{וְ}$  are here not so clearly connected as at viii. 12, iv. 14, where, more correctly, the pointing should be  $\text{כִּי} \text{וְ}$  (ki with the conjunct. accent); ki rules the sentence; and gam, as to its meaning, belongs to eth-'itto. The particular has its reason from the general: man is not master of his own time, his own person, and his own life, and thus not of the fruits of his capabilities and his actions, in spite of the previously favourable conditions which appear to place the result beyond a doubt; for ere the result is reached of which he appears to be able to entertain a certainty, suddenly his time may expire, and his term of life be exhausted. Jerome translates 'itto (cf. vii. 17) rightly by finem suum;  $\text{עַד}$ , with the gen. following, frequently (vid. under Job xxiv. 1) means the point of time when the fate of any one is decided,—the terminus where a reckoning is made; here, directly, the terminus ad quem. The suddenness with which men are frequently overtaken with the catastrophe which puts an end to their life, is seen by comparison with the fishes which are suddenly caught in the net, and the birds which are suddenly caught in the snare. With  $\text{עֲצָנִים}$  (that are caught) there is interchanged, in two variations of expression,  $\text{הַמְּאֻחָזוֹת}$ , which is incorrectly written, by v. d. Hooght, Norzi, and others,  $\text{הַמְּאֻחָזִים}$ .<sup>1</sup>  $\text{מְצוֹן}$ , a net,—of which the plur. form vii. 26 is used,—goes back, as does the similar designation of a bulwark (14*b*), to the root-conception of searching (hunting), and receives here the epithet "evil." Birds,  $\text{צִפְרִיִּים}$  (from a ground-form with a short terminal vowel; cf. Assy. iššur, from išpur), are, on account of their weakness, as at Isa. xxxi. 5, as a figure of tender love, represented in the fem.

The second half of the verse, in conformity with its structure, begins with  $\text{כִּהֵם}$  (which more frequently occurs as  $\text{כִּמְוָהֵם}$ ).  $\text{יִקַּח}$  is part. Pu. for  $\text{מִקְשָׁשִׁים}$  (Ewald, § 170*d*); the particip.  $\text{כִּ}$  is rejected, and  $\text{פ}$  is treated altogether as a guttural, the impracticable doubling of which is compensated for by the lengthening of the vowel. The use of the part. is here stranger than e.g. at Prov. xi. 13, xv. 32; the fact repeating itself is here treated as a property. Like the fish and the birds are they, such as are caught, etc. Otherwise Hitz. :

Like these are they caught, during the continuance of their life in the evil time . . . ; but the being snared does not, however, according to the double figure, precede the catastrophe, but is its consequence. Rightly, Ginsb.: "Like these are the sons of men ensnared in the time of misfortune." אֲשֶׁר might be adj., as at Amos v. 13, Mic. ii. 3; but since it lies nearer to refer אֲשֶׁר to ra'ah than to 'eth, thus ra'ah, like the frequently occurring yom ra'ah (vii. 14; cf. Jer. xvii. 17 with xv. 11), may be thought of as genit. An example of that which is here said is found in the fatal wounding of Ahab by means of an arrow which was not aimed at him, so that he died "at the time of the going down of the sun," 2 Chron. xviii. 33, 34.

THE FURTHER SETTING FORTH OF EXPERIENCES, WITH PROVERBS
INTERMIXED.—IX. 13—X. 15.

Experiences and Proverbs touching Wisdom and the Contrasts to it,
ix. 13—x. 3.

With the words, "further, I saw," 11*a*, the author introduced the fact he had observed, that there is not always a sure and honoured position in life connected with wisdom as its consequence; here he narrates an experience which, by way of example, shows how little wisdom profits, notwithstanding the extraordinary result it produces.

Ver. 13. "Also this have I come to see as wisdom under the sun, and it appeared great to me." The Venet. construes falsely: "This also have I seen: wisdom under the sun;" as also Hitzig, who reads אִי (neut. as at vii. 27). There is no reason thus to break up the sentence which introduces the following experience. Zoh is connected with hhochmah, but not as Luther renders it: "I have also seen this wisdom," which would have required the words אִי חָכְמָה, but, as Jerome does: Hanc quoque sub sole vidi sapientiam; this, however, since gam-zoh, as at v. 15, cf. 18, is attractively related to hhochmah as its pred., is = "also in this I saw wisdom," as the LXX. translates, or as Zöckl: "also this have I seen—come to find out as wisdom,"—also this, viz., the following incident narrated, in which wisdom of exceeding greatness presented itself to me. As Mordecai is called "great among the Jews," Esth. x. 3, so here Koheleth says that the wisdom which came to light therein appeared to him great (אִי, as elsewhere אִי or אִי).

Now follows an experience, which, however, has not merely a light side, but also a dark side; for wisdom, which accomplished so great a matter, reaped only ingratitude:

Vers. 14, 15. "A little city, and men therein only a few,—to which a great king came near, and he besieged it, and erected against it high bulwarks. And he met therein a poor wise man, and who saved the city by his wisdom; and no man thought of that poor man." What may be said as to the hist. reference of these words has already been noticed; vid. above, p. 215. The "great king" is probably an Asiatic monarch, and that the Persian; Jerome translates verbally: Civitas parva et pauci in ea viri, venit contra eam—the former is the subj., and the latter its pred.; the object stands first, plastically rigid, and there then follows what happened to it; the structure of the sentence is fundamentally the same as Ps. civ. 25. The expression בּוֹא אֵל, which may be used of any kind of coming to anything, is here, as at Gen. xxxii. 9, meant of a hostile approach. The object of a siege and a hostile attack is usually denoted by עָל, 2 Kings xvi. 5; Isa. vii. 1. Two Codd. of de Rossi's have the word מְצוּרִים, but that is an error of transcription; the plur. of מְצוּר is fem., Isa. xxix. 4. מְצוּרִים is, as at vii. 26, plur. of מְצוּר (from צוּר, to lie in wait); here, as elsewhere, בֵּית and יֵיטָן is the siege-tower erected on the ground or on the rampart, from which to spy out the weak points of the beleaguered place so as to assail it.

The words following וּמָצָא בָּהּ are rendered by the Targ., Syr., Jerome, Arab., and Luther: "and there was found in it;" most interpreters explain accordingly, as they point to i. 10, אִמַּר, dicat aliquis. But that מָצָא in this sequence of thought is = וּמָצָא (Job xlii. 15), is only to be supposed if it were impossible to regard the king as the subject, which Ewald with the LXX. and the Venet. does in spite of § 294*b*. It is true it would not be possible if, as Vaih. remarks, the finding presupposed a searching; but cf. on the contrary, e.g. Deut. xxiv. 1, Ps. cxvi. 3. We also say of one whom, contrary to expectation, a superior meets with, that he has found his match, that he has found his man. Thus it is here said of the great king, he found in the city a poor wise man—met therein with such an one, against whom his plan was shattered. הָקָם is the adjective of the person of the poor man designated by ish miskin (cf. 2 Chron. ii. 13); the accents correctly indicate this relation. Instead of וּמָצָא הוּא, the older language would use וּמָצָא; it does not, like the author here, use pure perfects, but makes the chief factum prominent by the fut. consec. The ē of millat is, as at xiii. 9, that of limmed before Makkeph, referred back to the original a. The making prominent of the subject contained in millat by means of hu is favourable to the supposition that umatsa' has the king as its subject; while even where no opposition (as e.g. at Jer. xvii. 18) lies before us this pleonasm belongs to the stylistic peculiarities of the book (vid. above, p. 198, No. 3). Instead of adam lo, the older form is ish lo; perhaps the author here wishes to avoid the repetition of ish, but at vii. 20 he also uses adam instead of ish, where no such reason existed.

Threatened by a powerful assailant, with whom it could not enter into battle, the little city, deserted by its men to a small remainder capable of bearing arms (this idea one appears to be under the necessity of connecting with כעט . . . 'ואנ'), found itself in the greatest straits; but when all had been given up as lost, it was saved by the wisdom of the poor man (perhaps in the same way as Abel-beth-maacha, 2 Sam. xx., by the wisdom of a woman). But after this was done, the wise poor man quickly again fell into the background; no man thought of him, as he deserved to have been thought of, as the saviour of the city; he was still poor, and remained so, and pauper homo raro vivit cum nomine claro. The poor man with his wisdom, Hengst. remarks, is Israel. And Wangemann (1856), generalizing the parable: "The beleaguered city is the life of the individual; the great king who lays siege to it is death and the judgment of the Lord." But sounder and more appropriate is the remark of Luther: Est exemplum generale, cujus in multis historiis simile reperitur; and: Sic Themistocles multo bona fecit suis civibus, sed expertus summam ingratitude. The author narrates an actual history, in which, on the one hand, he had seen what great things wisdom can do; and from which, on the other hand, he has drawn the following lesson:

Ver. 16. "And I said: Better is wisdom than strength; but the wisdom of the poor is despised, and his words are not heard." With the words, "I saw," the author introduces his observations, and with "I said" his reflections (vid. above, No. 3, p. 198). Wisdom is better than strength, since it does more for the wise man, and through him for others, than physical force,—more, as expressed in vii. 19, than ten mighty men. But the respect which wisdom otherwise secures for a man, if it is the wisdom of a poor man, sinks into despect, to which his poverty exposes him,—if necessity arises, his service, as the above history shows, is valued; but as a rule his words are unheeded, for the crowd estimate the worth of him whom they willingly hear according to the outward respect in which he is held.

To the lessons gathered from experience, are now added instructive proverbs of kindred contents.

Ver. 17. "The words of the wise, heard in quiet, have the superiority above the cry of a ruler among fools." Instead of tovim min, there stands here the simple min, prae, as at iv. 17, to express the superiority of the one to the other. Hitzig finds in this proverb the meaning that, as that history has shown, the words of the wise, heard with tranquillity, gain the victory over the cry of a ruler over fools. But (1) the contrast of נִחַת and עָקַת require us to attribute the tranquillity to the wise man himself, and not to his hearers; (2) 'מִן' בְּ is not a ruler over fools, by which it would remain questionable whether he himself was not a fool (cf. Job xli. 26), but a ruler among fools (cf. 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, 'מִן' בְּ, "a ruler among men;" and Prov. xxxvi. 30, 'גֹּב' בְּ, "the hero among beasts"), i.e. one who among fools takes the place of chief. The words of the poor wise man pass by unheeded, they are not listened to, because he does not possess an imposing splendid outward appearance, in accordance with which the crowd estimate the value of a man's words; the wise man does not seek to gain esteem by means of a pompous violent deportment; his words 'שִׁשׁ' בְּ are heard, let themselves be heard, are to be heard (cf. e.g. Song ii. 12) in quiet (Isa. xxx. 15); for, trusting to their own inward power of conviction, and committing the result to God, he despises vociferous pomp, and the external force of earthly expedients (cf. Isa. xlii. 2; Matt. xii. 19); but the words of the wise, which are to be heard in unassuming, passionless quietness, are of more value than the vociferation with which a king among fools, an arch-fool, a non plus ultra among fools, trumpets forth his pretended wisdom and constrains his hearers.

Ver. 18. The following proverb also leans on the history above narrated: "Better is wisdom than weapons of war; and one sinner destroyeth much good." The above history has shown by way of example that wisdom accomplishes more than implements of war, 'קָלִי' כָּלִי = 'כָּלִי' כָּלִי (Assyr. unut tahazi<sup>1</sup>), i.e. than all the apparatus belonging to preparation for war. But the much good which a wise man is accomplishing or has accomplished, one sinner (חַיִּיתָא<sup>2</sup>, cf. above, p. 254, note) by treachery or calumny may render vain, or may even destroy, through mere malicious pleasure in evil. This is a synthetic distich whose two parts may be interpreted independently. As wisdom accomplishes something great, so a single villain may have a far-reaching influence, viz. such as destroys much good.

x. 1. The second half of the foregoing double proverb introduces what now follows: "Poisonous flies make to stink, make to ferment the oil of the preparer of ointment; heavier than wisdom, than honour, weighs a little folly." We do not need to change זבובי מות, on account of the foll. sing. of the pred., either into זבובי מ' (as possible by Hitz.) or זב' ימית (Luzz.); both are inadmissible, for the style of Koheleth is not adorned with archaisms such as Chirek compaginis; and also such an attrib. clause as זבובי ימות, "a fly which dies," is for him too refined; but both are also unnecessary, for a plur. of the subj., in which the plurality of the individuals comes less into view than the oneness of their character, is frequently enough followed by the sing. of the pred., e.g. Gen. xlix. 22; Joel i. 20; Isa. lix. 12, etc. It is a question, however, whether by זבובי מות, death-bringing, i.e. poisonous flies (LXX., Targ.,<sup>1</sup> Luther) or dead flies (Symm., Syr., Jerome) is meant. We decide in favour of the former; for (1) זבובי מות for זבובים מתים (ix. 4; Isa. xxxvii. 36), "death-flies" for "dead flies," would be an affected poetic expression without analogy; while, on the contrary, "death-flies" for "deadly flies" is a genit. connection, such as כלי מות [instruments of death, i.e. deadly instruments] and the like; Böttcher understands dung-flies; but the expression can scarcely extend to the designation of flies which are found on dead bodies. Meanwhile, it is very possible that by the expression זב' מ', such flies are thought of as carry death from dead bodies to those that are living; the Assyr. syllabare show how closely the Semites distinguished manifold kinds of זבובים (Assyr. zumbi = zubbû). (2) In favour of "dead flies," it has been remarked that that influence on the contents of a pot of ointment is effected not merely by poison-flies, but, generally, by flies that have fallen into it.

But since the oil mixed with perfumes may also be of the kind which, instead of being changed by a dead body, much rather embalms it; so it does not surprise us that the exciter of fermentation is thus drastically described by μῦλαι θανατοῦσαι (LXX.); it happens, besides, also on this account, because "a little folly" corresponds as a contrasted figure to the little destructive carcase,—wisdom נת' בע' ("giveth life," vii. 12), a little folly is thus like little deadly flies. The sequence of ideas זב' יב' (maketh the ointment stink) is natural. The corrupting body communicates its foul savour to the ointment, makes it boil up, i.e. puts it into a state of fermentation, in consequence of which it foams and raises up small blisters, אבקותות (Rashi). To the asyndeton זב' יב', there corresponds, in 1b, the asyndeton זב' יב' ספ' סח'; the Targ., Syr., and Jerome,<sup>2</sup> who translate by

“and,” are therefore not witnesses for the phrase וְיָכַל, but the Venet. (καὶ τῆς δόξης) had this certainly before it; it is, in relation to the other, inferior in point of evidence.<sup>1</sup> In general, it is evident that the point of comparison is the hurtfulness, widely extending itself, of a matter which in appearance is insignificant. Therefore the meaning of 1b cannot be that a little folly is more weighty than wisdom, than honour, viz. in the eyes of the blinded crowd (Zöckl., Dächsel). This limitation the author ought to have expressed, for without it the sentence is an untruth. Jerome, following the Targ. and Midrash, explains: Pretiosa est super sapientiam et gloriam stultitia parva, understanding by wisdom and honour the self-elation therewith connected; besides, this thought, which Luther limits by the introduction of zuweilen [“folly is sometimes better than wisdom, etc.”], is in harmony neither with that which goes before nor with that which follows. Luzz., as already Aben Ezra, Grotius, Geiger, Hengst., and the more recent English expositors, transfer the verbs of 1a zeugmatically to 1b: similiter pretiosum nomine sapientiae et gloriae virum foetidum facit stoliditas parva. But יָכַל forbids this transference, and, besides, יָכַר מִן, “honoured on account of,” is an improbable expression; also יָכַר מִכּ presents a tautology, which Luzz. seeks to remove by glossing מִכּ, as the Targ. does, by מְרוּב עוֹשֵׂר וְנַחֲסִים. Already Rashi has rightly explained by taking יָכַר (Syr. jak̄ir, Arab. wak̄ur, wak̄úr), in its primary meaning, as synon. of כָּבֵד: more weighty, i.e. heavier and weighing more than wisdom, than honour, is a little folly; and he reminds us that a single foolish act can at once change into their contrary the wisdom and the honour of a man, destroying both, making it as if they had never been, cf. 1 Cor. v. 6. The sentence is true both in an intellectual and in a moral reference. Wisdom and honour are honour than the great glory of folly”), i.e. יָכַר מִנְט חֲכָמָה מְכַבֵּד סִבְלוֹת רַב (יָכַר in the sense of “great multitude”). Van der Palm (1784) regards this as the original form of the text.

<sup>1</sup> מְכַבֵּד; thus in the Biblia rabb. 1525, 1615, Genoa 1618, Plantin 1582, J.ublonski 1699, and also v. d. Hooght and Norzi. In the Ven. 1515, 1521, 1615, וְיָכַבֵּד is found with the copulat. vav, a form which is adopted by Michaelis. Thus also the Concord. cites, and thus, originally, it stood in J., but has been corrected to מְכַבֵּד. F., however, has מְכַבֵּד, with the marginal remark: מְכַבֵּד (Simson ha-Nakdam, to whom the writer of the Frankf. Cod. 1294 here refers for the reading מִכּ, without the copul. vav, is often called by him his voucher). This is also the correct Masoretic reading; for if וְיָכַב were to be read, then the word would be in the catalogue of words of which three begin with their initial letter, and a fourth has introduced a vav before it (Mas. fín. f. 26, Uchla veuchla, Nr. 15).

swept away by a little quantum of folly; it places both in the shade, it outweighs them in the scale; it stamps the man, notwithstanding the wisdom and dignity which otherwise belong to him, as a fool. The expressive  $\text{שָׁמַן רִיחָן}$  is purposely used here; the dealer in ointments (pigmentarius) can now do nothing with the corrupted perfume,—thus the wisdom which a man possesses, the honour which he has hitherto enjoyed, avail him no longer; the proportionally small portion of folly which has become an ingredient in his personality gives him the character of a fool, and operates to his dishonour. Knobel construes rightly; but his explanation (also of Heiligst., Elst., Ginsb.): “a little folly frequently shows itself more efficacious and fruitful than the wisdom of an honoured wise man,” helps itself with a “frequently” inserted, and weakens  $\text{כִּי}$  to a subordinated idea, and is opposed to the figure, which requires a personality.

Vers. 2, 3. A double proverb regarding wisdom and folly in their difference: “The heart of a wise man is directed to his right hand, and the heart of the fool to his left. And also on the way where a fool goeth, there his heart faileth him, and he saith to all that he is a fool.” Most interpreters translate: The heart of the wise man is at his right hand, i.e. it is in the right place. But this designation, meant figuratively and yet sounding anatomically, would be in bad taste<sup>1</sup> in this distinguishing double form (vid. on the contrary, ii. 14). The  $\text{ל}$  is that of direction;<sup>2</sup> and that which is situated to the right of a man is figuratively a designation of the right; and that to the left, a designation of the wrong. The designation proceeds from a different idea from that at Deut. v. 32, etc.; that which lies to the right, as that lying at a man’s right hand, is that to which his calling and duty point him;  $\text{שָׁמַן}$  denotes, in the later Hebrew, “to turn oneself to the wrong side.”

Ver. 3. This proverb forms, along with the preceding, a tetrastich, for it is divided into two parts by vav. The Kert has removed the art. in  $\text{כִּשׁ}$  and  $\text{שָׁה}$ , vi. 10, as incompatible with the  $\text{ש}$ . The order of the words v'gam-baderek k'shehsachal holek is inverted for v'gam k'shehsachal baderek holek, cf. iii. 13, and also rav sh'eyihym, vi. 3; so far as this signifies, "supposing that they are many." Plainly the author intends to give prominence to "on the way;" and why, but because the fool, the inclination of whose heart, according to 2*b*, always goes to the left, is now placed in view as he presents himself in his public manner of life. Instead of לִבְהִיָּא we have here the verbal clause לְבוֹ הָסֵר, which is not, after vi. 2, to be translated: corde suo caret (Herzf., Ginsb.), contrary to the suff. and also the order of the words, but, after ix. 8: cor ejus deficit, i.e. his understanding is at fault; for לָב, here and at ver. 2, is thus used in a double sense, as the Greek νοῦς and the Lat. mens can also be used: there it means pure, formal, intellectual soul-life; here, pregnantly (Psychol. p. 249), as at vii. 7, cf. Hos. iv. 11, the understanding or the knowledge and will of what is right. The fool takes no step without showing that his understanding is not there,—that, so to speak, he does not take it along with him, but has left it at home. He even carries his folly about publicly, and prides himself in it as if it were wisdom: he says to all that he is a fool, se esse stultum (thus, correctly, most Jewish and Christian interpreters, e.g. Rashi and Rambach). The expression follows the scheme of Ps. ix. 21: May the heathen know mortales se esse (vid. l.c.). Otherwise Luther, with Symm. and Jerome: "he takes every man as a fool;" but this thought has no support in the connection, and would undoubtedly be expressed by סְבִלִים הָמָה. Still differently Knobel and Ewald: he says to all, "it is foolish;" Hitzig, on the contrary, justly remarks that סְבִלִים is not used of actions and things; this also is true of סְבִילִי, against himself, v. 2, where he translates qol k'sil by "foolish discourses."

<sup>1</sup> Christ. Fried. Bauer (1732) explains as we do, and remarks, “If we translate: the heart of the wise is at his right hand, but the heart of the fool at his left, it appears as if the heart of the prudent and of the foolish must have a different position in the human body, thus affording to the profane ground for mockery.”

<sup>2</sup> Accordingly, ver. 2 has become a Jewish saying with reference to the study of a book (this thought of as Heb.): The wise always turn over the leaves backwards, repeating that which has been read; the fool forwards, superficially anticipating that which has not yet been read, and scarcely able to wait for the end.

The Caprice of Rulers and the Perverted World, x. 4–7.

Wisdom is a strong protection. To this thought, from which the foregoing group proceeded, there is here subordinated the following admonition.

Ver. 4. This verse shows what is the wise conduct of a subject, and particularly of a servant, when the anger of the ruler breaks forth: "If the ill-humour of the ruler rise up against thee, do not leave thy post; for patience leaves out great sins." Luther connects ver. 4 and ver. 3 by "therefore;" for by the potentate he understands such an one as, himself a fool, holds all who contradict him to be fools: then it is best to let his folly rage on. But the מוֹשֵׁל is a different person from the סְבִלִים; and מִן אֵל-תַּנְהָה does not mean, "let not yourself get into a passion," or, as he more accurately explains in the Annotations: "remain self-possessed" (similarly Hitzig: lose not thy mental state or composure), but, in conformity with תִּלַּךְ . . . לֹא, viii. 3, "forsake not the post (synon. מָצַב and מַעֲמָד, Isa. xxii. 19, cf. 23) which thou hast received." The person addressed is thus represented not merely as a subject, but officially as a subordinate officer: if the ruler's displeasure (רַחַם, as at Judg. viii. 3; Prov. xxix. 11) rises up against him (הִלָּצָה, as elsewhere; cf. הָא, Ps. lxxiii. 21; or חָמָה, 2 Sam. xi. 20), he ought not, in the consciousness that he does not merit his displeasure, hastily give up his situation which has been entrusted to him and renounce submission; for patience, gentleness (regarding מַרְפָּא, vid. Prov. xii. 18) 'פָּ . . . נָ'.

This concluding clause of the verse is usually translated: "It appeaseth (pacifieth) great sins" (LXX. καταπαύσει, Symm. παύσει) The phrase (חַמָּה) הָאֵלֹהִים is not to be compared, for it signifies quieting by an exhausting outbreak; on the contrary, חַמָּה in the passage before us must signify quieting, as the preventing of an outbreak (cf. Prov. xv. 1). It appears more correct to render חַמָּה in both cases in the sense of ἐάν, missum facere: to leave great sins is = not to commit them, to give up the lust thereto; for hinnialah signifies to let go, to leave off, e.g. Jer. xiv. 9; and to indulge, Esth. iii. 8, here as at vii. 18, xi. 6, "to keep the hands from something." The great sins cannot certainly be thought of as those of the ruler; for on his part only one comes into view, if indeed, according to the old legal conception, it could be called such, viz. cruel proceeding with reference to him who wilfully withdraws from him, and thus proves his opposition; much rather we are to think of the great sins into which he who is the object of the ruler's displeasure might fall, viz. treason (viii. 2), insubordination, self-destruction, and at the same time, since he does not stand alone, or make common cause with others who are discontented, the drawing of others into inevitable ruin (viii. 3b). All these sins, into which he falls who answers wrath with wrath, patience avoids, and puts a check to them. The king's anger is perhaps justified; the admonition, however, would be otherwise expressed than by מַלְחָמָה 'קָ, if it were not presupposed that it was not justified; and thus without μετάβασις εἰς ἄλλο γένος an I-section follows the reflection regarding wise deportment as over against the king's displeasure, a section which describes from experience and from personal observation the world turned upside down in the state.

Ver. 5. "There is an evil which I have seen under the sun, like an error which proceedeth from the ruler." The introduction by the virtual relative vaiihi is as at v. 12, cf. vi. 1. Knobel, Hengst, and others give to the כ of 'ע"ז the meaning of "according to," or "in consequence of which," which harmonizes neither with ra'ah nor with räithi. Also Kleinert's translation: "There is a misery—I have seen it under the sun—in respect of an error which proceedeth from the ruler," is untenable; for by this translation ra'ah is made the pred. while it is the subj. to ע"ז, and kishgagah the unfolding of this subject. Hitzig also remarks: "as [wie ein] an error, instead of which we have: in respect to [um einen] an error;" for he confounds things incongruous. Hitz., however, rightly recognises, as also Kleinert, the כ as Caph veritatis, which measures the concrete with the ideal, Isa. xiii. 6, compares the individual with the general which therein comes to view, Ezek. xxvi. 10; Neh. vii. 2; cf. 2 Sam. ix. 8. Koheleth saw an evil under the sun; something which was like an error, appeared to him altogether like an error which proceedeth from the ruler. If we could translate 'ע"ז by quod exiit, then כ would be the usual Caph similitudinis; but since it must be translated by quod exiit, 'ע"ז כ'ש' places the observed fact under a comprehensive generality: it had the nature of an error proceeding from the ruler. If this is correct, it is so much the less to be assumed that by השליט God is to be understood (Dan. v. 21), as Jerome was taught by his Hebraeus: quod putent homines in hac inaequalitate rerum illum non juste et ut aequum est judicare. It is a governor in a state that is meant, by whom an error might easily be committed, and only too frequently is committed, in the promotion or degradation of persons. But since the world, with its wonderful division of high and low, appears like as it were an error proceeding from the Most High, there certainly falls a shadow on the providence of God Himself, the Governor of the world; but yet not so immediately that the subject of discourse is an "error" of God, which would be a saying more than irreverent. יצא = יציה is the metaplastic form for יצאה or יצאת (for which at Deut. xxviii. 57 incorrectly יצית), not an error of transcription, as Olsh. supposes; vid. to the contrary, above, No. 1, p. 197. סלפני (Symm. εἰς ἔμπροσθεν) with יצא is the old usus loq. There now follows a sketch of the perverted world.

Vers. 6, 7. "Folly is set on great heights, and the rich must sit in lowliness. I have seen servants upon horses, and princes like servants walking on foot." The word הַפָּל (with double seghol, Aram. סַבְלִי) is used here instead of those in whom it is personified. Elsewhere a multiplicity of things great, such as עַמִּים, מַמְלָכִים, and the like, is heightened by רַבִּים (cf. e.g. Ps. xviii. 17); here "great heights" are such as are of a high, or the highest degree; rabbim, instead of harabbim, is more appos. than adjunct. (cf. Gen. xliii.

14; Ps. lxxviii. 28, cxliii. 10; Jer. ii. 21), in the sense of "many" (e.g. Ginsburg: "in many high positions") it mixes with the poetry of the description dull prose.<sup>1</sup> 'Ashirim also is peculiarly used: divites = nobiles (cf. פִּיִּשׁ, Isa. xxxii. 5), those to whom their family inheritance gives a claim to a high station, who possess the means of training themselves for high offices, which they regard as places of honour, not as sources of gain. Regibus multis, Grotius here remarks, quoting from Sallust and Tacitus, suspecti qui excellunt sive sapientia sive nobilitate aut opibus. Hence it appears that the relation of slaves and princes to each other is suggested; hoc discrimen, says Justin, xli. 3, of the Parthians, inter servos liberosque est quod servi pedibus, liberi non nisi equis incedunt; this distinction is set aside, princes must walk 'al-haarëts, i.e. v'regel (v'raglêhem), and in their stead (Jer. xvii. 25) slaves sit high on horseback, and rule over them (the princes),—an offensive spectacle, Prov. xix. 10. The eunuch Bagoas (vid. above, p. 214), long all-powerful at the Persian Court, is an example of the evil consequences of this reversal of the natural relations of men.

That which is Difficult exposes to Danger; that which is Improper brings Trouble; that which comes Too Late is not of use, x. 8-11.

How much time, thought, and paper have been expended in seeking to find out a close connection between this group of verses and that going before! Some read in them warnings against rising in rebellion against despots (Ginsb.); others (e.g. Zöckl.) place these proverbs in relation to the by no means enviable lot of those upstarts (Zöckl.); more simply and more appropriately, Luther here finds exemplified the thought that to govern (regere homines et gerere res humanas) is a difficult matter; on the other hand, Luzz. finds in 8-11 the thought that all depends on fate, and not on the wisdom of man. In reality, this section forms a member in the carrying forward of the theme which the author has been discussing from ix. 13: wisdom and folly in their mutual relations, particularly in difficult situations of life. The catchword of the foregoing section is נְחִימָה, patience, resignation, which guards against rendering evil for evil; and the catchword of the following section is הַקְּשִׁיף, considerate and provisory straining of the means toward the accomplishment of that which one purposes to do. The author presents a prelude in four sentences, which denote by way of example, that whoever undertakes any severe labour, at the same time faces the dangers connected therewith.

Vers. 8, 9. "He that diggeth a pit may fall into it; who breaketh down walls, a serpent may sting him. Whoso pulleth out stones may do himself hurt therewith; he who cleaveth wood may endanger himself thereby." The futures are not the expression of that which will necessarily take place, for, thus rendered, these four statements would be contrary to experience; they are the expression of a possibility. The fut. יִפֹּל is not here meant as predicting an event, as where the clause 8a is a figure of self-punishment arising from the destruction prepared for others, Prov. xxvi. 27; Sir. xxvii. 26. יִפְּצֵן is, Prov. xxvi. 27, the Targum word for שְׂחַת, ditch, from נִפְּצֵן = שָׂחַ, depressum esse. יִגְרֵר (R. גָּר, to cut), something cutting off, something dividing, is a wall as a boundary and means of protection drawn round a garden, vineyard, or farm-court; פְּרִיץ יִגְרֵר is the reverse of יִגְרֵר פְּרִיץ, Isa. lviii. 12. Serpents are accustomed to nestle in the crevices and holes of walls, as well as in the earth (for a city-wall is called חוֹמָה and חֵל); thus he who breaks into such a wall may expect that the serpent which is there will bite him (cf. Amos v. 19). To tear down stones, hissi'a, is synon. of hhatsav, to break stones, Isa. li. 1; yet hhotsev does not usually mean the stone-breaker, but the stone-cutter (stone-mason); hissi'a, from nasa', to tear out, does not also signify, 1 Kings v. 31, "to transport," and here, along with wood-splitting, is certainly to be thought of as a breaking loose or separating in the quarry or shaft. Ne'etsav signifies elsewhere to be afflicted; here, where the reference is not to the internal but the external feeling: to suffer pain, or reflex.: to injure oneself painfully; the derivat. 'etsev signifies also severe labour; but to find this signification in the Niph. ("he who has painful labour") is contrary to the usus loq., and contrary to the meaning intended here, where generally actual injuries are in view. Accordingly יִפְּצֵן בָּם, for which the Mishn. יִפְּצֵן בְּעַצְמוֹ,<sup>1</sup> "he brings himself into danger," would denote, to be placed in danger of life and limb, cf. Gittin 65b, Chullin 37a; and it is therefore not necessary, with Hitzig and others, to translate after the vulnerabitur of Jerome: "He may wound himself thereby;" there is not a denom. פָּצַן, to cut, to wound, derived from פָּצַן (שֶׁפַץ), an instrument for cutting, a knife.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>2</sup> The Midrash understands the whole ethically, and illustrates it by the example of Rabsake [we know now that the half-Assyr., half-Accad. word rabsak

The sum of these four clauses is certainly not merely that he who undertakes a dangerous matter exposes himself to danger; the author means to say, in this series of proverbs which treat of the distinction between wisdom and folly, that the wise man is everywhere conscious of his danger, and guards against it. These two verses (8, 9) come under this definite point of view by the following proverb; wisdom has just this value in providing against the manifold dangers and difficulties which every undertaking brings along with it.<sup>1</sup> This is illustrated by a fifth example, and then it is declared with reference to all together.

Ver. 10. "If the iron has become blunt, and he has not whetted the face, then he must give more strength to the effort; but wisdom has the superiority in setting right." This proverb of iron, i.e. iron instruments (בַּרְזֵל, from בָּרַז, to pierce, like the Arab. name for iron, hadid, means essentially something pointed), is one of the most difficult in the Book of Koheleth,—linguistically the most difficult, because scarcely anywhere else are so many peculiar and unexampled forms of words to be found. The old translators afford no help for the understanding of it. The advocates of the hypothesis of a Dialogue have here a support in אִם, which may be rendered interrogatively; but where would we find, syntactically as well as actually, the answer? Also, the explanations which understand אִם־לְיָמֵינוּ in the sense of war-troops, armies, which is certainly its nearest-lying meaning, bring out no appropriate thought; for the thought that even blunt iron, as far as it is not externally altogether spoiled (lo-phanim qilqal), or: although it has not a sharpened edge (Rashi, Rashbam), might be an equipment for an army, or gain the victory, would, although it were true, not fit the context; Ginsburg explains: If the axe be blunt, and he (who goes out against the tyrant) do not sharpen it beforehand (phanim, after Jerome, for l'phanim, which is impossible, and besides leads to nothing, since l'phanim means ehedem [formerly], but not zuvor [prius], Ewald, § 220a), he (the tyrant) only increases his army; on the contrary, wisdom hath the advantage by repairing the mischief (without the war being unequal);—but the "ruler" of the foregoing group has here long ago disappeared, and it is only a bold imagination which discovers in the hu of 10a the person addressed in ver. 4, and represents him as a rebel, and augments means a military chief], whom report makes a brother of Manasseh, and a renegade in the Assyrian service.

<sup>1</sup> Thus rightly Carl Lang in his Salom. Kunst im Psalter (Marburg 1874). He sees in vers. 8–10 a beautiful heptastich. But as to its contents, ver. 11 also belongs to this group.

him into a warlike force, but recklessly going forth with unwhetted swords. The correct meaning for the whole, in general at least, is found if, after the example of Abulwalid and Kimchi, we interpret גַּבַּר הַחַיִּים of the increasing of strength, the augmenting of the effort of strength, not, as Aben-Ezra, of conquering, outstripping, surpassing; גַּבַּר means to make strong, to strengthen, Zech. x. 6, 12; and חַיִּים, as plur. of חַיִל, strength, is supported by גְּבוּרֵי הַחַיִּים, 1 Chron. vii. 5, 7, 11, 40, the plur. of חַיִל; the LXX. renders by δυνάμεις δυνάμωσει [and he shall strengthen the forces], and the Peshito has חַיִל for δυνάμεις, Acts viii. 13, xix. 11 (cf. Chald. Syr. אָחַחַיִל, to strengthen oneself, to become strengthened). Thus understanding the words יָחַ' יָג' of intentio virium, and that not with reference to sharpening (Luth., Grotius), but to the splitting of wood, etc. (Geier, Desvieux, Mendelss.), all modern interpreters, with the exception of a few who lose themselves on their own path, gain the thought, that in all undertakings wisdom hath the advantage in the devising of means subservient to an end. The diversities in the interpretation of details leave the essence of this thought untouched. Hitz., Böttch., Zöckl., Lange, and others make the wood-splitter, or, in general, the labourer, the subject to קָהָה, referring וְהוּא to the iron, and, contrary to the accents, beginning the apodosis with qilqal: "If he (one) has made the iron blunt, and it is without an edge, he swings it, and applies his strength." לֹא-פָנִים, "without an edge" (lo for blo), would be linguistically as correct as לֹא בָנִים, "without children," 1 Chron. ii. 30, 32; Ewald, § 286g; and qilqal would have a meaning in some measure supported by Ezek. xxi. 26. But granting that qilqal, which there signifies "to shake," may be used of the swinging of an axe (for which we may refer to the Aethiop. kualkuala, kalkala, of the swinging of a sword), yet קָלְקָלוּ (קָלְקָלוּ אֹתוֹ) could have been used, and, besides, פָּנִים means, not like פִּי, the edge, but, as a somewhat wider idea, the front, face (Ezek. xxi. 21; cf. Assyr. pan ilippi, the forepart of a ship); "it has no edge" would have been expressed by וְהוּא לֹא פָה (פִּיפִיּוֹת), or by וְהוּא אֵינֶנּוּ מְלֻפָּשׁ (מִזָּרֵם, מִחֶדֶד). We therefore translate: if the iron has become blunt, hebes factum sit (for the Pih. of intransitives has frequently the meaning of an inchoative or desiderative stem, like מָעַט, to become little, decrescere, xii. 3; בָּהָה, hebescere, caligare, Ezek. xxi. 12; Ewald, § 120d), and he (who uses it) has not polished (whetted) the face of it, he will (must) increase the force. וְהוּא does not refer to the iron, but, since there was no reason to emphasize the sameness of the subject (as e.g. 2 Chron. xxxii. 30), to the labourer, and thus makes, as with the other explanation, the change of subject noticeable (as e.g. 2 Chron. xxvi. 1). The order of the words קָל . . . הוּ, et ille non faciem (ferri) exacuit, is as at Isa. liii. 9; cf. also the position of lo in 2 Sam. iii. 34; Num. xvi. 29.

קָל, or pointed with Pattach instead of Tsere (cf. garqar, Num. xxiv. 17) in bibl. usage, from the root-meaning levem esse, signifies to move with ease, i.e. quickness (as also in the Arab. and Aethiop.), to shake (according to which the LXX. and Syr. render it by ταράσσειν, הָלַף, to shake, and thereby to trouble, make muddy); in the Mishn. usage, to make light, little, to bring down, to destroy; here it means to make light = even and smooth (the contrast of rugged and notched), a meaning the possibility of which is warranted by הוּ קָל, Ezek. i. 7, Dan. x. 6 (which is compared by Jewish lexicographers and interpreters), which is translated by all the old translators "glittering brass," and which, more probably than Ewald's "to steel" (temper), is derived from the root qal, to burn, glow.<sup>1</sup> With vahhaylim the apodosis begins; the style of Koheleth recognises this vuv apod. in conditional clauses, iv. 11, cf. Gen. xliii. 9, Ruth iii. 13, Job vii. 4, Mic. v. 7, and is fond of the inverted order of the words for the sake of emphasis, xi. 8, cf. Jer. xxxvii. 10, and above, under vii. 22.

In 10*b* there follows the common clause containing the application. Hitzig, Elster, and Zöckl. incorrectly translate: "and it is a profit wisely to handle wisdom;" for instead of the inf. absol. הִכִּי, they unnecessarily read the inf. constr. הִכִּישִׁי, and connect הִכִּישִׁי הִכְבִּיחָהּ, which is a phrase altogether unparalleled. Hichsir means to set in the right position (vid. above, p. 193, kaser), and the sentence will thus mean: the advantage which the placing rightly of the means serviceable to an end affords, is wisdom—i.e. wisdom bears this advantage in itself, brings it with it, concretely: a wise man is he who reflects upon this advantage. It is certainly also possible that הִכִּשׁ, after the manner of the Hiph. הִצִּילָה and הִשְׁכִּיל, directly means "to succeed," or causatively: "to make to succeed." We might explain, as e.g. Knobel: the advantage of success, or of the causing of prosperity, is wisdom, i.e. it is that which secures this gain. But the meaning prevalent in post-bibl. Heb. of making fit, equipping,—a predisposition corresponding to a definite aim or result,—is much more conformable to the example from which the porisma is deduced. Buxtorf translates the Hiph. as a Mishnic word by aptare, rectificare. Tyler suggests along with "right guidance" the meaning "pre-arrangement," which we prefer.<sup>2</sup>

Ver. 11. The last proverb of this series presents for consideration the uselessness of him who comes too late. "If a serpent bite without enchantment, the charmer is of no use." The Talm. interprets this  $\text{נֹסֵף}$ , like that of ver. 10, also as interrog.: Does the serpent bite without its being whispered to, i.e. without a providential determination impelling it thereto? Jer. Peah, i. 1. But  $\text{שִׁחַל}$ , except at Isa. xxvi. 16, where whispering prayers are meant, signifies the whispering of formulas of charming; "serpents are not to be charmed (tamed),"  $\text{שִׁחַל}$ , Jer. viii. 17. Rather for  $\text{לְהַחֲלִיבֵנּוּ}$  the meaning of slander is possible, which is given to it in the Haggada, Taanith 8a: All the beasts will one day all at once say to the serpent: the lion walks on the earth and eats, the wolf tears asunder and eats; but what enjoyment hast thou by thy bite? and it answers them: "Also the slanderer ( $\text{לְהַחֲלִיבֵנּוּ}$ ) has certainly no profit." Accordingly the Targ., Jerome, and Luther translate; but if  $\text{נֹסֵף}$  is conditional, and the vav of v'en connects the protasis and the apodosis, then ba'al hallashon must denote a man of tongue, viz. of an enchanting tongue, and thus a charmer (LXX., Syr.). This name for the charmer, one of many, is not unintentional; the tongue is an instrument, as iron is, ver. 10: the latter must be sharp, if it would not make greater effort necessary; the former, if it is to gain its object, must be used at the right time. The serpent bites  $\text{לְהַחֲלִיבֵנּוּ}$ , when it bites before it has been charmed (cf. b'lo yomo, Job xv. 32); there are also serpents which bite without letting themselves be charmed; but here this is the point, that it anticipates the enchantment, and thus that the charmer comes too late, and can make no use of his tongue for the intended purpose, and therefore has no advantage from his act. There appropriately follow here proverbs of the use of the tongue on the part of a wise man, and its misuse on the part of a fool.

The Worthless Prating and the Aimless Labour of the Fool, x. 12–15.

It is wisdom, as the preceding series of proverbs has shown, to be on one's guard to provide oneself with the right means, and to observe the right time. These characteristics of the wise man ver. 11 has brought to view, by an example from the sphere of action in which the tongue serves as the instrument. There now follows, not unexpectedly, a proverb with reference to that which the words of a wise man and the words of a fool respectively bring about.

meaning of "to set, à priori, in the right place." Luther translated qūqal twice correctly, but further follows the impossible rendering of Jerome: nullo labore exacuetur, et post industriam sequetur sapiētia.

Ver. 12. "The words of a wise man's mouth are grace; but the lips of a fool swallow him up." The words from a wise man's mouth are חַן; graciousness, i.e. gracious in their contents, their form and manner of utterance, and thus also they gain favour, affection, approbation, for culture (education) produces favour, Prov. xiii. 15, and its lips grace (pleasantness), which has so wide an influence that he can call a king his friend, Prov. xxii. 11, although, according to ix. 11, that does not always so happen as is to be expected. The lips of a fool, on the contrary, swallow him, i.e. lead him to destruction. The Pih. פִּיחַ, which at Prov. xix. 28 means to swallow down, and at Prov. xxi. 20 to swallow = to consume in luxury, to spend dissolutely, has here the metaphorical meaning of to destroy, to take out of the way (for that which is swallowed up disappears). פִּיחַ is parallel form to פִּיחַ, like the Aram. פִּיחַ. The construction is, as at Prov. xiv. 3, "the lips of the wise חַן preserve them;" the idea of unity, in the conception of the lips as an instrument of speech, prevails over the idea of plurality. The words of the wise are heart-winning, and those of the fool self-destructive. This is verified in the following verse.

Ver. 13. "The beginning of the words of his mouth is foolishness; and the end of his mouth is mischievous madness." From folly (absurdity) the words which are heard from a fool's mouth rise to madness, which is compounded of presumption, wantonness, and frenzy, and which, in itself a symptom of mental and moral depravity, brings as its consequence destruction on himself (Prov. xviii. 17). The adjective רָעָה is as in רָעָה חֵן, which interchanges with רָעָה חֵן vi. 2, v. 12, etc. The end of his mouth, viz. of his speaking, is = the end of the words of his mouth, viz. the end which they at last reach. Instead of holeloth, there is here, with the adj. following, holeluth, with the usual ending of abstracta. The following proverb says how the words of the fool move between these two poles of folly and wicked madness: he speaks much, and as if he knew all things.

Ver. 14. "And the fool maketh many words: while a man yet doth not know that which shall be; and what shall be when he is no more, who can show him that?" The vav at the beginning of this verse corresponds to the Lat. accedit quod. That he who in 12b was named k'sil is now named hassachal, arises from this, that meanwhile sichluth has been predicated of him. The relation of 14b to 14a, Geier has rightly defined: Probatnr absurditas multiloqui a communi ignorantia ac imbecillitate humana, quae tamen praecipue dominatur apud ignaros stultos. We miss before lo-yeda' an "although" (gam, Neh. vi. 1, or li gam, viii. 12); the clause is, after the manner of a clause denoting state or condition, subordinated to the principal clause, as at Ps. v. 10: "an open grave is their throat 'שִׁשְׁיָהּ', although they smooth their tongue, i.e. speak flatteringly." The I.XX., Syr., Symm., and Jerome seek to rectify the tautology id quod futurum est et quod futurum est (cf. on the other hand, viii. 7), for they read 'יה . . . מה שיהיה. But the second quod futurum certainly preserves by 'מֵאָחָר its distinguishing nearer definition. Hitzig explains: "What is done, and what after this (that is done) is done." Scarcely correctly: aharav of the parallel passage, vi. 12, cf. vii. 14, ix. 3, requires for the suffix a personal reference, so that thus meaharav, as at Deut. xxix. 21, means "from his death and onwards." Thus, first, the knowledge of the future is denied to man; then the knowledge of what will be done after his death; and generally, of what will then be done. The fool, without any consciousness of human ignorance, acts as if he knew all, and utters about all and everything a multitude of words; for he uselessly fatigues himself with his ignorance, which remains far behind the knowledge that is possible for man.

Ver. 15. "The labour of the foolish wearieth him who knoweth not how to go to the city." If we do not seek to explain: labour such as fools have wearies him (the fool), then we have here such a synallage numeri as at Isa. ii. 8, Hos. iv. 8, for from the plur. a transition is made to the distributive or individualizing sing. A greater anomaly is the treatment of the noun עָמַל as fem. (greater even than the same of the noun pithgam, viii. 11, which admitted of attractional explanation, and, besides, in a foreign word was not strange). Kimchi, Michlol 10a, supposes that עָמַל is thought of in the sense of עֲמַלָּה; impossible, for one does not use such an expression. Hitzig, and with him Hengst., sees the occasion for the synallage in the discordance of the masc. עֲמַלָּה; but without hesitation we use the expressions עָמַל, Mic. v. 6, 'עָמַל, Josh. vi. 26, and the like. 'Amal also cannot be here fem. unitatis (Böttch. § 657. 4), for it denotes the wearisome striving of fools as a whole and individually. We have thus to suppose that the author has taken the liberty of using 'amal once as fem. (vid. on the contrary, ii. 18, 20), as the poet, Prov. iv. 13, in the introduction of the Book of Proverbs uses musar once as fem., and as the similarly formed עָמַל is used in two genders. The fool kindles himself up and perplexes himself, as if he could enlighten the world and make it happy,—he who does not even know how to go to the city. Ewald remarks: "Apparently proverbial, viz. to bribe the great lords in the city." For us who, notwithstanding ver. 16, do not trouble ourselves any more with the tyrants of ver. 4, such thoughts, which do violence to the connection, are unnecessary. Hitzig also, and with him Elst. and Zöckl, thinks of the city as the residence of the rulers from whom oppression proceeds, but from whom also help against oppression is to be sought. All this is to be rejected. Not to know how to go to the city, is = not to be able to find the open public street, and, like the Syrians, 2 Kings vi. 18 f., to be smitten with blindness. The way to the city is via notissima et tritissima. Rightly Grotius, like Aben Ezra: Multi quaestionibus arduis se fatigant, cum ne obvia quidem norint, quale est iter ad urbem. אֶל־עִיר is vulgar for עִיר־אֶל. In the Greek language also the word πόλις has a definite signification, and Athens is called ἄστυ, mostly without the art. But Stamboul, the name of which may seem as an illustration of the proverbial phrase, "not to know how to go to the city," is = εἰς τὴν πόλιν. Grätz finds here an allusion to the Essenes, who avoided the city—habeat sibi!

THIRD CONCLUDING SECTION, WITH THE FINALE AND EPILOGUE

- (4.) WARNINGS AGAINST IDLE REVELRY AND IMPROVIDENCE, AND A CALL TO A FRESH EFFORT AFTER A HAPPY IMPROVEMENT OF LIFE.—
X. 16—XI. 7.

The Prosperity of a Country, its Misfortune, and Thoughtful Foresight, x. 16—20.

Interpreters have sought in every way to discover a close connection between the following proverbs of the bad and good princes, and those that precede. Hitzig, rightly dissatisfied with this forced attempt, cuts the knot by putting vers. 16—19 into the mouth of the fool, ver. 15: Koheleth, ver. 20, refers to him this rash freedom of speech, and warns him against such language; for, supposing that vers. 16—19 were the words of Koheleth, in ver. 20 he would contradict himself. This unworthy perversion of the contents of the section rectifies itself. The supposed words of the fool belong to the most peculiar, most impressive, and most beautiful utterances of the חכמה which the Book of Koheleth contains, and the warning, ver. 20, against cursing the king, stands in no contradiction to the "woe," ver. 16; Isaiah under Ahaz, Jeremiah under Zedekiah, actually show how the two are in harmony; and the apostles even in the times of Nero acted on their "honour the king." Rather it may be said that the author in ver. 16, from fools in general (ver. 15) comes to speak of folly in the position occupied by a king and princes. But "folly" is not the characteristic name for that which is unseemly and indecorous which is blamed in these high lords. From x. 16, the Book of Koheleth turns toward the conclusion; since it represents itself as a discourse of Solomon's on the subject of the wisdom of life, and all through has a sharp eye on rulers and their surroundings, it is not strange that it treated of it in x. 4-7, and again now returns to the theme it had scarcely left.

Vers. 16, 17. "Woe to thee, O land, whose king is a child, and whose princes sit at table in the early morning! Happy art thou, O land, whose king is a noble, and whose princes sit at table at the right time, in manly strength, and not in drunkenness!" Regarding נָא, vid. above, p. 191. Instead of נֶשֶׁן, the older language would rather use the phrase אִשָּׁר יַעַר סִלְכּוֹ; and instead of na'ar, we might correctly use, after Prov. xxx. 22, 'ēved; but not as Grätz thinks, who from this verse deduces the reference of the book to Herod (the "slave of the Hasmonean house," as the Talm. names him), in the same meaning. For na'ar, it is true, sometimes means—e.g. as Ziba's by-name (2 Sam. xix. 18 [17])—a servant, but never a slave as such, so that here, in the latter sense, it might be the contrast of בְּדַחְוִיָּם; it is to be understood after Isa. iii. 12; and Solomon, Bishop of Constance, understood this woe rightly, for he found it fulfilled at the time of the last German Karolingian Ludwig III.<sup>1</sup> Na'ar is a very extensively applicable word in regard to the age of a person. King Solomon and the prophets Jeremiah and Zechariah show that na'ar may be used with reference to one in a high office; but here it is one of few years of age who is meant, who is incapable of ruling, and shows himself as childish in this, that he lets himself be led by bad guides in accordance with their pleasure. In 16*b*, the author perhaps thinks of the heads of the aristocracy who have the phantom-king in their power: intending to fatten themselves, they begin their feasting with the break of day. If we translate yochēlu by "they eat," 16*b* sounds as if to breakfast were a sin,—with us such an abbreviation of the thought so open to misconception would be a fault in style, but not so with a Hebrew.<sup>2</sup> אָכַל (for אָכַל, Ps. xiv. 4) is here eating for eating's sake, eating as its own object, eating which, in the morning, comes in the place of fresh activity in one's calling, consecrated by prayer. Instead of אָשָׁר, 17*a*, there ought properly to have been אִשָּׁרְיָ; but (1) אִשָּׁרְיָ has this peculiarity, to be explained from its interjectional usage, that with the suff.

added it remains in the form of the st. constr., for we say e.g. אִשְׁרֵי for אִשְׁרָיִךְ; (2) the sing. form אִשְׁרֵי, inflected אִשְׁרֵי, so substitutes itself that אִשְׁרֵי, or, more correctly, אִשְׁרֵךְ, and אִשְׁרֵי, Prov. xxix. 19, the latter for אִשְׁרֵי, are used (vid. under Song ii. 14). Regarding bên-hhorim, vid. above, p. 191; the root-word signifies to be white (vid. under Gen. xl. 16). A noble is called hhor, Isa. xxxiv. 12; and one noble by birth, more closely, or also merely descriptively (Gesen. Lehrgeb. p. 649), bên-hhorim, from his purer complexion, by which persons of rank were distinguished from the common people (Lam. iv. 7). In the passage before us, bên-hhorim is an ethical conception, as e.g. also generosus becomes such, for it connects with the idea of noble by birth that of noble in disposition, and the latter predominates (cf. Song vii. 2, nadiv): it is well with a land whose king is of noble mind, is a man of noble character, or, if we give to bên-hhorim the Mishnic meaning, is truly a free man (cf. John viii. 36). Of princes after the pattern of such a king, the contrary of what is said 16b is true: they do not eat early in the morning, but ba'et, "at the right time;" everywhere else this is expressed by b'atto (iii. 11); here the expression—corresponding to the Greek ἐν καιρῷ, the Lat. in tempore—is perhaps occasioned by the contrast babogër, "in the morning." Eating at the right time is more closely characterized by bighvurah v'lo vashsh'thi. Jerome, whom Luther follows, translates: ad reficiendum et non ad luxuriam. Hitz., Ginsb., and Zöckl., "for strengthening" (obtaining strength), not: "for feasting;" but that beth might introduce the object aimed at (after Hitz., proceeding from the beth of exchange), we have already considered under ii. 4. The author, wishing to say this, ought to have written לִנְבוּרָה וְלֹא לְשָׁתִי. Better, Hahn: "in strength, but not in drunkenness,"—as heroes, but not as drunkards (Isa. v. 22). Ewald's "in virtue, and not in debauchery," is also thus meant. But what is that: to eat in virtue, i.e. the dignity of a man? The author much rather represents them as eating in manly strength, i.e. as this requires it (cf. the plur. Ps. lxxi. 16 and Ps. xc. 10), only not bashti ("in drunkenness—excess"), so that eating and drinking become objects in themselves. Kleinert, well: as men, and not as gluttons. The Masora makes, under bashti, the note לִיָּה, i.e. שָׁתִי has here a meaning which it has not elsewhere, it signifies drunkenness; elsewhere it means the web of a web. The Targ. gives the word the meaning of weakness (הַלְשִׁי), after the Midrash, which explains it by בְּתִשְׁשִׁי (in weakness); Menahem b. Saruk takes along with it in this sense נִשְׁתָּה, Jer. li. 30. The Talm. Shabbath 10a, however, explains it rightly by שְׁתִּיָּה שְׁלֵיָּה.

Ver. 18. Since, now, ver. 19 has only to do with princes, the following proverb of the consequences of sloth receives a particular reference in the frame of this mirror for princes: "Through being idle the roof falleth; and through laziness of the hands the house leaketh." Ewald, Redslob, Olsh., Hitz., and Fürst, as already Aben Ezra, understand the dual <sup>לְיָדָי</sup> of the two idle hands, but a similar attribut. adject.-dual is not found in Heb.; on the contrary, ephraim, m'rathaim Jer. l. 21, rish'athaim, and, in a certain measure, also riqmathaim, speak in favour of the intensification of the dual; 'atsaltaim is related to 'atslah, as Faulenzen [being idle, living in idleness] to Faulheit [laziness], it means doubled, i.e. great, constant laziness (Ges. H. Wört., and Böttch. in the N. Aehrenl., under this passage). If 'atsaltaim were an attribut. designation of the hands, then shiph-luth yadaim would be lowness, i.e. the hanging down of the hands languidly by the side; the former would agree better with the second than with the first passage. Regarding the difference between hamm'qareh (the beams and joists of a house) and hamqareh (contignans), vid. note below.<sup>1</sup> Since exceeding laziness leaves alone everything that could support the house, the beams fall (<sup>נִפְּלוּ</sup>, Niph. <sup>נִפְּלוּ</sup>), and the house drops, i.e. lets the rain through (<sup>רָלָה</sup>, with o, in spite of the intrans. signification); cf. the Arab. proverb of the three things which make a house insufferable, under Prov. xix. 13. Also the community, whom the king and the nobles represent, is a <sup>בַּיִת</sup>, as e.g. Israel is called the house of Jacob. If the rulers neglect their duty, abusing their high position in obeying their own lusts, then the kingdom (state) becomes as a dilapidated house, affording no longer any protection, and at last a machshelah, a ruined building, Isa. iii. 6. It becomes so by slothfulness, and the prodigal love of pleasure associated therewith.

Ver. 19. "Meals they make into a pleasure, and wine cheereth the life, and money maketh everything serviceable." By <sup>עֲשִׂים</sup>, wicked princes are without doubt thought of,—but not immediately, since 16*b* is too remote to give the subject to ver. 19. The subject which 'osim bears in itself (= 'osim hēm) might be syntactically definite, as e.g. Ps. xxxiii. 5, <sup>אֱהֵב</sup>, He, Jahve, loves, thus: those princes, or, from ver. 18: such slothful men; but 'osim is better rendered, like e.g. omrim, Ex. v. 16 (Ewald, § 200*a*), and as in the Mishna we read <sup>קִירִין</sup> and the like with gramm. indef. subj.: they make, but so that by it the slothful just designated, and those of a princely rank are meant (cf. a similar use of the inf. abs., as here of the part. in the historical style, Isa. xxii. 13). Ginsburg's rendering is altogether at fault: "They turn bread and wine which cheereth life into revelry." If עֵשֶׂה and מְשַׂבֵּחַ as its object stand together, the meaning is, "to prepare a feast," Ezek. iv. 15; cf. 'avad l'hēm, Dan. v. 1. Here, as there, 'osim l'hēm signifies coenam faciunt (parant). The ל of עֵשֶׂה is not the sign of the factitive obj. (as ל'el, Isa. xlv. 17), and thus not, as Hitz. supposes, the conditioning ל with which adv. conceptions are formed,—e.g. Lam. iv. 5, 'עֲמֵץ לְמַעַן לְמַעַן לְמַעַן, where Jerome rightly translates, voluptuose (vid. E. Gerlach, l.c.),—but, which is most natural and is very appropriate, it is the ל of the aim or purpose: non ad debitam corporis refectioem, sed ad mera ludicra et stulta gaudia (Geier). מְשַׂבֵּחַ is laughter, as that to which he utters the sentence (ii. 2): Thou art mad. It is incorrect, moreover, to take l'hēm v'yaim together, and to render y'sammahh hayaim as an attribut. clause to yain: this epitheton ornans of wine would here be a most unsuitable weakening of the figure intended. It is only an apparent reason for this, that what Ps. civ. 15 says in praise of wine the author cannot here turn into a denunciatory reproach. Wine is certainly fitted to make glad the heart of a man; but here the subject of discourse is duty-forgetting idlers, to whom chiefly wine must be brought (Isa. v. 12) to cheer their life (this sluggard-life spent in feasting and revelry). The fut. מְשַׂבֵּחַ is meant in the same modal sense as יִבְרַח, 10a: wine must accomplish that for them. And they can feast and drink, for they have money, and money יִבְרַח . . . יִבְרַח. Luther hits the meaning: "Money must procure everything for them;" but the clause is too general; and better thus, after Jerome, the Zürich Bible: "unto money are all things obedient." The old Jewish interpreters compare Hos. ii. 23 f., where עָנָה, with accus. petentis, signifies, "to answer a request, to gratify a desire." But in the passage before us מְשַׂבֵּחַ is not the obj. accus. of petentis, but petiti; for 'amah is connected with the accus. of that to which one answers as well as of that which one answers, e.g. Job xl. 2, cf. ix. 3. It is unnecessary, with Hitzig, to interpret מְשַׂבֵּחַ as Hiph.: Money makes all to hear (him who has the money),—makes it that nothing is refused to his wish. It is the Kal: Money answers to every demand, hears every wish, grants whatever one longs for, helps to all; as Menander says: "Silver and gold,—these are, according to my opinion, the most useful gods; if these have a place in the house, wish what thou wilt (εὐξαι τί βούλει), all will be thine;" and Horace, Epod. i. 6. 36 s.:

"Scilicet uxorem cum dote fidemque et amicos Et genus et formam regina pecunia donat."

The author has now described the king who is a misfortune and him who is a blessing to the land, and princes as they ought to be and as they ought not to be, but particularly luxurious idle courtiers; there is now a warning given which has for its motive not only prudence, but also, according to viii. 2, religiousness.

Ver. 20. "Curse not the king even in thy thought; and in thy bed-chamber curse not the rich; for the birds of the air carry away the sound, and the winged creature telleth the matter." In the Books of Daniel and Chronicles, עֲרֵב, in the sense of γνώσις, is a synon. of שֵׁשֶׁל and חֲכָה; here it is rightly translated by the LXX. by συνειδήσις; it does not correspond with the moral-religious idea of conscience, but yet it touches it, for it designates the quiet, inner consciousness (Psychol. p. 134) which judges according to moral criteria: even (gam, as e.g. Deut. xxiii. 3) in the inner region of his thoughts<sup>1</sup> one must not curse the king (cf. vii. 4 f.) nor the rich (which here, as at 6b, without distinction of the aristocracy of wealth and of birth, signifies those who are placed in a high princely position, and have wealth, the nervus rerum, at their disposal) in his bed-chamber, the innermost room of the house, where one thinks himself free from treachery, and thus may utter whatever he thinks without concealment (2 Kings vi. 12): for the birds of the air may carry forth or bring out (Lat. deferrent, whence delator) that which is rumoured, and the possessor of a pair of wings (cf. Prov. i. 17), after the Chethib (whose ה of the art. is unnecessarily erased by the Keri,<sup>2</sup> as at iii. 6, 10): the possessor of wings (double-winged), shall further tell the matter. As to its meaning, it is the same as the proverb quoted by the Midrash: "walls have ears."<sup>3</sup> Geier thinks of the swallows which helped to the discovery of Bessus the murderer of his father, and the cranes which betrayed the murderer of Ibycus, as comparisons approaching that which is here said. There would certainly be no hyperbole if the author thought of carrier-pigeons (Paxton, Kitto) in the service of espionage. But the reason for the warning is hyperbolic, like an hundred others in all languages:

"Aures fert paries, oculos nemus: ergo cavere Debet qui loquitur, ne possint verba nocere."

<sup>2</sup> חֲכָה with unpointed He, because it is not read in the Keri; similarly הַחֲכָה (1 Sam. xxvi. 22). Cf. Mas. fin. f. 22, and Ochla veochla, No. 166.

*Act Prudently, but not too Prudently—the Future is God's ;
Enjoy Life—the World to come is Dark, xi. 1–8.*

There are interpreters (as e.g. Zöckl.) who regard the concluding part of the book as commencing with xi. 1, and do not acknowledge any connection with that which immediately precedes; but from x. 16 the book draws to its conclusion. מַלְאֵךְ, x. 19, affords an external connection for the proverb here following; but, since the proverb x. 20 lies between, the sequence after the same catchword is uncertain. Whether there is here a more inward connection, and what it is, is determined by the interpretation of xi. 1, which proceeds in two fundamentally different directions, the one finding therein recommended unscrupulous beneficence, the other an unscrupulous spirit of enterprise. We decide in favour of the latter: it is a call, derived from commercial pursuits, to engage in fresh enterprise.

xi. 1. "Let thy bread go forth over the watery mirror: for in the course of many days shalt thou find it." Most interpreters, chiefly the Talm., Midrash, and Targ.,<sup>1</sup> regard this as an exhortation to charity, which although practised without expectation of reward, does not yet remain unrewarded at last. An Aram. proverb of Ben Sira's (vid. Buxtorf's Florilegium, p. 171) proceeds on this interpretation: "Scatter thy bread on the water and on the dry land; in the end of the days thou findest it again." Knobel quotes a similar Arab. proverb from Diez' Denkwürdigkeiten von Asien (Souvenirs of Asia), II. 106: "Do good; cast thy bread into the water: thou shalt be repaid some day." See also the proverb in Goethe's Westöst. Divan, compared by Herzfeld. Voltaire, in his Précis de l'Ecclésiaste en vers, also adopts this rendering:

*Repandez vos bienfaits avec magnificence,
Même aux moins vertueux ne les refusez pas.
Ne vous informez pas de leur reconnaissance—
Il est grand, il est beau de faire des ingrats.*

That instead of "into the water (the sea)" of these or similar proverbs, Koheleth uses here the expression, "on the face of (עַל־פְּנֵי) the waters," makes no difference; Eastern bread has for the most part <sup>1</sup> The Midrash tells the following story: Rabbi Akiba sees a ship wrecked which carried in it one learned in the law. He finds him again actively engaged in Cappadocia. What whale, he asked him, has vomited thee out upon dry land? How hast thou merited this? The scribe learned in the law thereupon related that when he went on board the ship, he gave a loaf of bread to a poor man, who thanked him for it, saying: As thou hast saved my life, may thy life be saved. Thereupon Akiba thought of the proverb in Eccles. xi. 1. Similarly the Targ.: Extend to the poor the bread for thy support; they sail in ships over the water.

the form of cakes, and is thin (especially such as is prepared hastily for guests, 'ughoth or matstsoth, Gen. xviii. 6, xix. 3); so that when thrown into the water, it remains on the surface (like a chip of wood, Hos. x. 7), and is carried away by the stream. But לֶשֶׁת, with this reference of the proverb to beneficence, is strange; instead of it, the word לֶשֶׁת was rather to be expected; the LXX. renders by ἀπόστειλον; the Syr., shadar; Jerome, mitte; Venet. πέμπε; thus by none is the pure idea of casting forth connected with לֶשֶׁת. And the reason given does not harmonize with this reference: "for in the course of many days (b'rov yamin, cf. m'rov yamim, Isa. xxiv. 22) wilt thou find it" (not "find it again," which would be expressed by לֶשֶׁת). This indefinite designation of time, which yet definitely points to the remote future, does not thus indicate that the subject is the recompense of noble self-renunciation which is sooner or later rewarded, and often immediately, but exactly accords with the idea of commerce carried on with foreign countries, which expects to attain its object only after a long period of waiting. In the proper sense, they send their bread over the surface of the water who, as Ps. cvii. 33 expresses, "do business in great waters." It is a figure taken from the corn trade of a seaport (vid. p. 216), an illustration of the thought: seek thy support in the way of bold, confident adventure.<sup>1</sup> Bread in לֶשֶׁת is the designation of the means of making a living or gain, and bread in לֶשֶׁת the designation of the gain (cf. ix. 11). Hitzig's explanation: Throw thy bread into the water = venture thy hope, is forced; and of the same character are all the attempts to understand the word of agricultural pursuits; e.g. by van der Palm: sementem fac juxta aquas (or: in loca irrigua); Grätz even translates: "Throw thy corn on the surface of the water," and understands this, with the fancy of a Martial, of begetting children. Mendelssohn is right in remarking that the exhortation shows itself to be that of Koheleth-Solomon, whose ships traded to Tarshish and Ophir. Only the reference to self-sacrificing beneficence stands on a level with it as worthy of consideration. With Ginsburg, we may in this way say that a proverb as to our dealings with those who are above us, is followed by a proverb regarding those who are below us; with those others a proverb regarding judicious courageous venturing, ranks itself with a proverb regarding a rashness which is to be discountenanced; and the following proverb does not say: Give a portion, distribute of that which is thine, to seven and also to eight: for it is well done that thou gainest for thee friends with the unrighteous mammon for a time when thou thyself mayest unexpectedly be in want; but it is a prudent rule which is here placed by the side of counsel to bold adventure:

Ver. 2. "Divide the portion into seven, yea, eight (parts); for thou knowest not what evil shall happen on the earth." With that other interpretation,  $\text{לְעֵלְוֵי}$  was to be expected instead of 'al-haarets; for an evil spreading abroad over the earth, a calamity to the land, does not yet fall on every one without exception; and why was not the  $\text{רָעָה}$  designated directly as personal? The impression of the words  $\text{מִשְׁפָּטָא} \dots \text{לְעֵלְוֵי}$ , established in this general manner, is certainly this, that on the supposition of the possibility of a universal catastrophe breaking in, they advise a division of our property, so that if we are involved in it, our all may not at once be lost, but only this or that part of it, as Jacob, Gen. xxxii. 9, says. With reference to 1a, it is most natural to suppose that one is counselled not to venture his all in one expedition, so that if this is lost in a storm, all might not at once be lost (Mendelss., Preston, Hitz., Stuart); with the same right, since 1a is only an example, the counsel may be regarded as denoting that one must not commit all to one caravan; or, since in ver. 2  $\text{לְחַמְרָא}$  is to be represented not merely as a means of obtaining gain, that one ought not to lay up all he has gathered in one place, Judg. vi. 11, Jer. xli. 8 (Nachtigal); in short, that one ought not to put all into one business, or, as we say literally, venture all on one card.  $\text{לְחֵלְקָא}$  is either the portion which one possesses, i.e. the measure of the possession that has fallen to him (Ps. xvi. 5), or  $\text{לְחֵלְקָא} \text{נִתְּנָא}$  means to make portions, to undertake a division. In the first case, the expression  $\text{לְחֵלְקָא} \dots \text{נִתְּנָא}$  follows the scheme of Gen. xvii. 20: make the part into seven, yea, into eight (parts); in the second case, the scheme of Josh. xviii. 5: make division into seven, etc. We prefer the former, because otherwise that which is to be divided remains unknown;  $\text{לְחֵלְקָא}$  is the part now in possession: make the much or the little that thou hast into seven or yet more parts. The rising from seven to eight is as at Job v. 19, and like the expression ter quaterque, etc. The same inverted order of words as in 2b is found in Esth. vi. 3; 2 Kings viii. 12.

Ver. 3. With this verse there is not now a transition, εἰς ἄλλο γένος (as when one understands ver. 1 f. of beneficence); the thoughts down to ver. 6 move in the same track. "When the clouds are full of rain, they empty themselves on the earth: and if a tree fall in the south, or in the north—the place where the tree falleth, there it lieth." Man knows not—this is the reference of the verse backwards—what misfortune, as e.g. hurricane, flood, scarcity, will come upon the earth; for all that is done follows fixed laws, and the binding together of cause and effect is removed beyond the influence of the will of man, and also in individual cases beyond his knowledge.

The interpunction of 3a a: אִם-יִמְלֵאוּ הָעֲבִים גֶּשֶׁם (not as by v. d. Hooght, Mendelss., and elsewhere וְהָעֲבִים, but as the Venet. 1515, 21, Michael. הָעֲבִים, for immediately before the tone syllable Mahpach is changed into Mercha) appears on the first glance to be erroneous, and much rather it appears that the accentuation ought to be but on closer inspection גֶּשֶׁם is rightly referred to the conditional antecedent, for "the clouds could be filled also with hail, and thus not pour down rain" (Hitz.). As in iv. 10, the fut. stands in the protasis as well as in the apodosis. If A is done, then as a consequence B will be done; the old language would prefer the words גֶּשֶׁם נִמְלֵאוּ . . . וְהָרִיוּ Ewald, § 355b: as often as A happens, so always happens B. יִרְיוּ carries (without needing an external object to be supplied), as internally transitive, its object in itself: if the clouds above fill themselves with rain, they make an emptying, i.e. they empty themselves downwards. Man cannot, if the previous condition is fixed, change the necessary consequences of it.

אִם-יִמְלֵאוּ הָעֲבִים גֶּשֶׁם עַל-הָאָרֶץ יִרְיוּ

The second conditioning clause: si ceciderit lignum ad austrum aut ad aquilonem, in quocunque loco ceciderit ibi erit. Thus rightly Jerome (vid. above, p. 152). It might also be said: אִם-יִפֹּל עֵץ אִם בְּרִוּוֹ וְאִם בְּצִפֶּן, and if a tree falls, whether it be in the south or in the north; this sive . . . sive would thus be a parenthetic parallel definition. Thus regarded, the protasis as it lies before us consists in itself, as the two v'im in Amos ix 3, of two correlated halves: "And if a tree falls on the south side, and (or) if it fall on the north side," i.e. whether it fall on the one or on the other. The Athnach, which more correctly belongs to יִרְיוּ, sets off in an expressive way the protasis over against the apodosis; that a new clause begins with v'im yippol is unmistakable; for the contrary, there was need for a chief disjunctive to 'בַּצֵּ. M'qom is accus. loci for bimqom, as at Esth. iv. 3, viii. 17. Sham is rightly not connected with the relat. clause (cf. Ezek. vi. 13); the relation is the same as at i. 7. The fut. יִהְיֶה is formed from הָיָה, whence ii. 22, as at Neh. vi. 6, and in the Mishna (Aboth, vi. 1; <sup>1</sup> Aboda zara, iii. 8) the part. הָיָה. As the jussive form יִהְיֶה is formed from יִהְיֶה, so יִהְיֶה (יִהְיֶה) passes into יִהְיֶה, which is here written יִהְיֶה. Hitzig supposes that, according to the passage before us and Job xxxvii. 6, the word appears to have been written with א, in the sense of "to fall." Certainly הוה has the root-signification of delabi, cadere, and derives from thence the meaning of accidere, existere, esse (vid. under Job xxxvii. 6); in the Book of Job, however, הוה may have this meaning as an Arabism; in the usus loq. of the author of the Book of Koheleth it certainly was no longer so used. Rather it may be said that הוה had to be written with an א added to distinguish it from the abbreviated tetragramm, if the א, as in אבוא, Isa. xxviii. 12, and הוה, Josh. x. 24, does not merely represent the long terminal vowel (cf. the German-Jewish הוה = thou, הוה = the, etc.).<sup>1</sup> Moreover, הוה, as written, approaches the Mishnic inflection of the fut. of the verb הוה הוה; the sing. there is הוה, הוה, הוה, and the plur. הוה, according to which Rashi, Aben Ezra, and Kimchi interpret הוה here also as plur; Luzzatto, § 670, hesitates, but in his Commentary he takes it as sing., as the context requires: there will it (the tree) be, or in accordance with the more lively meaning of the verb הוה: there will it find itself, there it continues to lie. As it is an invariable law of nature according to which the clouds discharge the masses of water that have become too heavy for them, so it is an unchangeable law of nature that the tree that has fallen before the axe or the tempest follows the direction in which it is impelled. Thus the future forms itself according to laws beyond the control of the human will, and man also has no certain knowledge of the future; wherefore he does well to be composed as to the worst, and to adopt prudent preventive measures regarding it. This is the reference of ver. 3 looking backwards. But, on the other hand, from this incalculableness of the future—this is the reference of ver. 3 looking forwards—he ought not to give up fresh venturesome activity, much rather he ought to abstain from useless and impeding calculations and scruples.

Ver. 4. "He who observeth the wind shall not sow; and he that regardeth the clouds shall not reap." The proverb is not to be understood literally, but in the spirit of the whole paraenesis: it is not directed against the provident observation, guided by experience, of the monitions and warnings lying in the present condition of the weather, but against that useless, because impossible, calculation of the coming state of the weather, which waits on from day to day, from week to week, till the right time for sowing and reaping has passed away. The seed-time requires rain so as to open up and moisten the ground; he who has too much hesitation observes (שמר, as at Job xxxix. 1) the wind whether it will bring rain (Prov.

xxv. 23), and on that account puts off the sowing of the seed till it is too late. The time of harvest requires warmth without rain (Prov. xxvi. 1); but the scrupulous and timid man, who can never be sure enough, looks at the clouds (cf. Isa. xlvi. 13), scents rainy weather, and finds now and never any security for the right weather for the gathering in of the fruits of the field. He who would accomplish and gain anything, must have confidence and courage to venture something; the conditions of success cannot be wholly reckoned upon, the future is in the hand of God, the All-Conditioning.

Ver. 5. "As thou hast no knowledge what is the way of the wind, like as the bones in the womb of her who is with child; so thou knowest not the work of God who accomplisheth all." Luther, after Jerome, renders rightly: "As thou knowest not the way of the wind, and how the bones in the mother's womb do grow; so," etc. The clause, instar ossium in ventre praegnantis, is the so-called comparatio decurtata for instar ignorantiae tuae ossium, etc., like thy ignorance regarding the bones, i.e. the growth of the bones. בְּעֵצִי,<sup>1</sup> because more closely defined by בְּבִבְיָ הַפִּי, has not the art. used elsewhere after כּ of comparison; an example for the regular syntax (vid. Riehm, under Ps. xvii. 12) is found at Deut. xxxii. 2. That man has no power over the wind, we read at viii. 8; the way of the wind he knows not (John iii. 8), because he has not the wind under his control: man knows fundamentally only that which he rules. Regarding the origin and development of the embryo as a secret which remained a mystery to the Israel. Chokma, vid. Psychol. p. 209 ff. For עֵצִי, cf. Ps. cxxxix. 15 and Job x. 11. Regarding m'leah, pregnant (like the Lat. plena), vid. above, p. 193. With fine discrimination, the fut. לֹא יִדְעֶנּוּ in the apodosis interchanges with the particip. יִדְעֶנּוּ in the protasis, as when we say: If thou knowest not that, as a consequence thou shalt also not know this. As a man must confess his ignorance in respect to the way of the wind, and the formation of the child in the mother's womb; so in general the work of God the All-Working lies beyond his knowledge: he can neither penetrate it in the entireness of its connection, nor in the details of its accomplishment. The idea 'oseh kol, Isa. xliv. 24, is intentionally unfolded in a fut. relat. clause, because here the fut. in the natural world, as well as in human history, comes principally into view. For that very reason the words אֶת־הַכֹּל are also used, not: (as in passages where there is a reference to the world of creation in its present condition) eth-kol-elleh, Isa. lxvi. 2. Also the growth of the child in the mother's womb is compared to the growth of the future in the womb of the present, out of which it is born (Prov. xxvii. 1; cf. Zeph. ii. 2). What is established by this proof that man is not lord of the future,—viz. that in the activity of his calling he should shake off anxious concern about the future,—is once again inferred with the combination of what is said in vers. 4 and 2 (according to our interpretation, here confirmed).

Ver. 6. "In the morning sow thy seed, and towards evening withdraw not thine hand; for thou knowest not which shall prosper, whether this or that, or whether both together shall well succeed." The cultivation of the land is the prototype of all labour (Gen. ii. 15*b*), and sowing is therefore an emblem of all activity in one's pursuit; this general meaning for  $\text{לֹא} . . . \text{יָדָע}$  (like vii. 18; synon. with  $\text{יָדָע} . . . \text{לֹא}$ , Josh. x. 6, of the older language) is to be accepted. The parallel word to babokër is not ba'erëv; for the cessation from work (Judg. xix. 16; Ps. civ. 23) must not be excluded, but incessant labour (cf. Luke ix. 62) must be continued until the evening. And as ver. 2 counsels that one should not make his success depend exclusively on one enterprise, but should divide that which he has to dispose of, and at the same time make manifold trials; so here also we have the reason for restless activity of manifold labour from morning till evening: success or failure (v. 5*b*) is in the hand of God,—man knows not which (quid, here, according to the sense, utrum) will prosper (vid. regarding kasher, above, p. 193), whether ( $\text{הֲ}$ ) this or ( $\text{אִם}$ ) that, and whether ( $\text{וְאִם}$ ), etc.; vid. regarding the three-membered disjunctive question, Ewald, § 361; and regarding k'èhhad, above, p. 192; it is in common use in the more modern language, as e.g. also in the last benediction of the Shemone-Esra:  $\text{בְּרַכּוּ . . . כְּאֶחָד}$  "bless us, our Father, us all together."  $\text{שְׁנֵיהֶם}$  goes back to the two  $\text{הֲ}$ , understood neut. (as at vii. 18; cf. on the contrary, vi. 5). The LXX. rightly:  $\text{καὶ ἐὰν}$  (better:  $\text{εἴτε}$ )  $\text{τὰ δύο ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ ἀγαθόν}$ . Luther, who translates: "and if both together it shall be better," has been misled by Jerome.

The proverb now following shows its connection with the preceding by the copula van. "The tendency of the advice in vers. 1, 2, 6, to secure guarantees for life, is justified in ver. 7: life is beautiful, and worthy of being cared for." Thus Hitzig; but the connection is simpler. It is in the spirit of the whole book that, along with the call to earnest activity, there should be the call to the pleasant enjoyment of life: he who faithfully labours has a right to enjoy his life; and this joy of life, based on fidelity to one's calling, and consecrated by the fear of God, is the most real and the highest enjoyment here below. In this sense the fruere vita here connects itself with the labora :

Vers. 7, 8. "And sweet is the light, and pleasant it is for the eyes to see the sun : for if a man live through many years, he ought to rejoice in them all, and remember the days of darkness ; that there will be many of them. All that cometh is vain." Dale translates the copula vav introducing ver. 7 by "yes," and Bullock by "truly," both thus giving to it a false colouring. "Light," Zöckler remarks, stands here for "life." But it means only what the word denotes, viz. the light of life in this world (Ps. lvi. 14 ; Job xxxiii. 30), to which the sun, as the source of it, is related, as  $\text{רִישׁ}$  is to  $\text{רִישׁ}$ . Cf. Eurip. Hippol.,  $\omega\lambda\mu\pi\rho\delta\varsigma\ \alpha\iota\theta\eta\rho\ \kappa.\tau.\lambda.$ , and Iphigen. in Aulis, 1218–19,  $\mu\eta\ \mu'\ \alpha\pi\omicron\lambda\epsilon\sigma\eta\varsigma\ \kappa.\tau.\lambda.$  : "Destroy not my youth ; to see the light is sweet," etc. The  $\text{ב}$  in  $\text{ב}$  has the short vowel Pattach, here and at 1 Sam. xvi. 7, after the Masora.<sup>1</sup>

The ki beginning ver. 8 is translated by Knobel, Hitz., Ewald, and others by "ja" (yes) ; by Heiligstedt, as if a negative preceded by immo ; but as the vav of 7a is copulative "and," so here the ki is causal "for." If it had been said : man must enjoy himself as long as he lives, for the light is sweet, etc., then the joy would have its reason in the opportunity given for it. Instead of this, the occasion given for joy has its reason in this, that a man ought to rejoice, viz. according to God's arrangement and ordinance : the light is sweet, and it is pleasant for the eyes to see the sun ; for it ought thus to be, that a man, however long he may live, should continue to enjoy his fair life, especially in view of the night which awaits him. Ki im are not here, as at iii. 12, viii. 15, where a negative precedes, to be taken together ; but ki assigns the reason, and im begins a hypothetical protasis, as at Ex. viii. 17, and frequently. Im, with the conclusion following, presents something impossible, as e.g. Ps. l. 12, si esurirem, or also the extreme of that which is possible as actual, e.g. Isa. vii. 18, si peccata vestra sint instar coccini. In the latter case, the clause with the concessive particle may be changed into a sentence with a concessive conjunctive, as at Isa. x. 22 : "for though thy people, O Israel, be as numerous as the sand of the sea," and here : "though a man may live ever so many years." The second ki after  $\text{רִישׁ}$  is the explicat. quod, as at ii. 24, iv. 4, viii. 17, etc. : he must remember the days of darkness, that there shall be many of them, and, at all events, not fewer than the many years available for the happy enjoyment of life. In this connection kol-shebbā'

denotes all that will come after this life. If Hitz. remarks that the sentence: "All that is future is vanity," is a false thought, this may now also be said of his own sentence extracted from the words: "All that is, is transitory." For all that is done, in time may pass away; but it is not actually transitory (הִבְלִי). But the sentence also respects not all that is future, but all that comes after this life, which must appear as vain (hēvel) to him for whom, as for Koheleth, the future is not less veiled in the dark night of Hades, as it was for Horace, i. 4. 16 s.:

"Jam te premet nox fabulaeque Manes Et domus exitis Plutonia."

Also, for Koheleth as for Horace, iv. 7. 16, man at last becomes pulvis et umbra, and that which thus awaits him is hēvel. Tyler is right, that "the shadowy and unsubstantial condition of the dead and the darkness of Sheol" is thus referred to. מִבְּהַיְוָה signifies not that which is nascens, but futurum, e.g. Sanhedrin 27a, "from the present לְהַיְוָה and for the future" (for which, elsewhere, the expression לְעֵתִי לְבָא is used). The Venet. construes falsely: All (the days) in which vanity will overtake (him); and Luther, referring מִבְּהַיְוָה as the 3d pers. to the past, follows the misleading of Jerome. Rightly the LXX. and Theod.: πᾶν τὸ ἐρχόμενον.

(B.) FINALE, WITH AN EPIPHONEMA.—XI. 9—XII. 7, 8.

In xi. 7, 8, having again reached the fundamental saying of his earthly eudaemonism, the author now discontinues this his ceterum censeo, and artistically rounds off his book; for having begun it with an ouverture, i. 2–11, he concludes it with a finale, xi. 9–xii. 7. Man, in view of the long night of death into which he goes forth, ought to enjoy the life granted to him. This fundamental thought of the book, to which the author has given a poetic colouring, xi. 7, 8, now amplifies itself into an animated highly poetical call to a young man to enjoy life, but not without the consciousness that he must render unto God an account for it. That the call is addressed not to a man as such, but to the young man,—including, however, after the rule a potiori fit denominatio, young women,—is explained from this, that the terminus a quo of an intelligent, responsible enjoyment of life stands over against the terminus ad quem, the night of death, with its pre-intimation in hoary old age. Without any connecting word, and thus as a new point of departure, the finale begins:

Ver. 9. "Rejoice, young man, in thy youth; and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes: but know, that for all this God will bring thee to judgment." The parallel  $\text{בְּיָמַי}$  shows that the beth in  $\text{בְּיָמַי}$  (with  $\text{ב}$  aspirated) does not introduce the reason of the joy, but the time suitable for it. Instead of v'yithav libb'cha, "let thy heart be of good cheer," as the expression might also be, the words are vithiv'cha libb'cha, "make thy heart of good cheer to thee,"—so, viz., that from this centre brightness may irradiate thy countenance (Prov. xv. 13) and thy whole personality, vid. Psychologie, p. 249. V'hkuroth, the period of youth, is here and at xii. 1 = Num. xi. 28, v'hhurim, as the only once occurring n'uroth, Jer. xxxii. 30, is = the elsewhere generally used n'urim; the form in ôth is the more modern (cf. k'luloth, Jer. ii. 2). "Ways of the heart" are thus ways into which the impulse of the heart leads, and which satisfy the heart.  $\text{עֵינַי}$ , at vi. 9, designates the pleasure felt in the presence of the object before one; here, a sight which draws and fastens the eyes upon it. The Cheth'eb has the plur.  $\text{עֵינַיִם}$ , which is known to the language (Dan. i. 15; Song ii. 14), and which would here designate the multitude of the objects which delight the eyes, which is not unsuitable; the Pih.  $\text{עֵינַיִם}$  denotes also elsewhere, frequently, e.g. Ps. cxxxi. 1, walking, in an ethical sense; Hitz., Zöckl., and others interpret the first  $\text{ב}$  as specifying the sphere, and the second as specifying the norm ("according to the sight of thine eyes"); but they both introduce that wherein he ought to act freely and joyfully: in the ways of thy heart, into which it draws thee; and in the sight of thine eyes, towards which they direct themselves with interest. The LXX. B. renders, "and not after the sight of thine eyes." This "not" ( $\mu\eta$ ), which is wanting in A. C., is an interpolation, in view of the warning, Num. xv. 39, against following the impulse of the heart and of the eyes; the Targ. also therefore has: "be prudent with reference to the sight of thine eyes." But this moralizing of the text is superfluous, since the call to the youthful enjoyment of life is accompanied with the nota bene: but know that God will bring thee to an account for all this; and thus it excludes sinful sensual desire. In the midst of an address, where a yet closer definition follows,  $\text{בְּמַשׁ}$  is thus punctuated, xii. 14, Job xiv. 3, Ps. cxliii. 3; here, in the conclusion of the sentence, it is  $\text{בְּמַשׁ}$ . Hitzig supposes that there is denoted by it, that the sins of youth are punished by chronic disease and abandonment in old age; Knobel and others understand by the judgment, the self-punishment of sins by all manner of evil consequences, which the O. T. looks upon as divinely inflicted penalties. But in view of the facts of experience, that God's righteous requital is in this life too frequently escaped, viii. 14, the author, here and at iii. 17, xii. 14, postulates a final judgment, which removes the contradiction of this present time, and which must thus be in the future; he has no clear idea of the time and manner of this final judgment, but his faith in God places the certainty of it beyond all doubt. The call to rejoice is now completed by the call to avoid all that occasions inward and outward sorrow.

Ver. 10. "And remove sorrow from thy heart, and banish evil from thy flesh: for youth and age, not yet grown to grey hairs, are vain." Jerome translates: aufer iram a corde tuo, and remarks in his Comm.: in ira omnes perturbationes animi comprehendit; but כַּעַס (R. כּוּם, contundere, confringere) does not signify anger, but includes both anger and sorrow, and thus corresponds to the specific ideas, "sadness, moroseness, fretfulness." The clause following, Jerome translates: et amove malitiam a carne tua, with the remark: in carnis malitia universas significat corporis voluptates; but רָעָה is not taken in an ethical, but in a physical sense: כּוּעַם is that which brings sorrow to the heart; and רָעָה, that which brings evil to the flesh (בְּשׂוּר, opp. לֵב, ii. 3, Prov. xiv. 30). More correctly than the Vulgate, Luther renders: "banish sorrow from thy heart, and put evil from thy body." He ought to free himself from that which is injurious to the inner and the outer man, and hurtfully affects it; for youth, destined for and disposed to joy, is hævel, i.e. transitory, and only too soon passes away. Almost all modern interpreters (excepting the Jewish), in view of Ps. cx. 3, give to שְׁחֵרִית the meaning of "the dawn of the morning;" but the connection with יְלֻדִית would then be tautological; the Mishn.-Midrash usus loq., in conformity with which the Targ. translates, "days of black hair," proves that the word does not go back to שְׁחֵר, morning dawn, morning-red, but immediately to שְׁחֹר, black (vid. above, p. 196), and as the contrast of עֵינֵיבָה (non-bibl. עֵינֵיבַת, 'סֵיב', 'סֵב'), canities, denotes the time of black hair, and thus, in the compass of its conception, goes beyond יְלֻדִית, since it comprehends both the period of youth and of manhood, and thus the whole period during which the strength of life remains unbroken.<sup>1</sup>

With xii. 1 (where, inappropriately, a new chapter begins, instead of beginning with xi. 9) the call takes a new course, resting its argument on the transitoriness of youth: "And remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth, ere the days of evil come, and the years draw nigh, of which thou shalt say: I have no pleasure in them." The plur. majest. בּוֹרְאֵי is = עֲשִׂים as a designation of the Creator, Job xxxv. 10, Isa. liv. 5, Ps. cxlix. 2; in so recent a book it cannot surprise us (cf. above, p. 292), since it is also not altogether foreign to the post-bibl. language. The expression is warranted, and the Midrash ingeniously interprets the combination of its letters.<sup>1</sup> Regarding the words 'ad asher lo, commonly used in the Mishna (e.g. Horajoth iii. 3; Nedarim x. 4), or 'ad shello (Targ. 'ad d'lo), antiquam, vid. above, p. 195. The days of evil (viz. at least, first, of bodily evil, cf. κακία, Matt. vi. 34) are those of feeble, helpless old age, perceptibly marking the failure of bodily and mental strength; parallel to these are the years of which (asher, as at i. 10) one has to say: I have no pleasure in them (bahēm for bahēn, as at ii. 6, mehēm for mehēn). These evil days, adverse years, are now described symptomatically, and that in an allegorical manner, for the "ere" of 1b is brought to a grand unfolding.

<sup>1</sup> The Mishna, Nedarim iii. 8, jurist. determines that שְׁחֹרֵי הָרֵאשִׁי denotes men, with the exclusion of women (whose hair is covered) and children. It is disputed (vid. Baer's Abodath Jisrael, p. 279) whether תִּשְׁחֹרֶת, Aboth iii. 16, Derech erez c. II., Midrash under Lam. ii. 11, is = שְׁחֵרִית, but without right; ben-tishlorêth is used for a grown-up son in full manly strength.

Ver. 2. "Ere the sun becomes dark, and the light, and the moon, and the stars, and the clouds return after the rain." Umbreit, Elster, and Ginsburg find here the thought: ere death overtakes thee; the figure under which the approach of death is described being that of a gathering storm. But apart from other objections (vid. Gurlitt, "zur Erkl. d. B. Koheleth," in Stud. u. Krit. 1865), this idea is opposed by the consideration that the author seeks to describe how man, having become old, goes forth (הֵלֵךְ, 5b) to death, and that not till ver. 7 does he reach it. Also Taylor's view, that what precedes 5b is as a dirge expressing the feelings experienced on the day of a person's death, is untenable; it is discredited already by this, that it confuses together the days of evil, 1b, and the many days of darkness, i.e. the long night of Hades, xi. 8; and besides, it leaves unanswered the question, what is the meaning of the clouds returning after the rain. Hahn replies: The rain is death, and the return is the entrance again into the nothingness which went before the entrance into this life. Knobel, as already Luther and also Winzer (who had made the exposition of the Book of Koheleth one of the labours of his life), sees in the darkening of the sun, etc., a figure of the decay of hitherto joyful prosperity; and in the clouds after the rain a figure of the cloudy days of sorrow which always anew visit those who are worn out by old age. Hitz., Ewald, Vaih., Zöckl., and Tyler, proceeding from thence, find the unity of the separate features of the figure in the comparison of advanced old age, as the winter of life to the rainy winter of the (Palestinian) year. That is right. But since in the sequel obviously the marasmus senilis of the separate parts of the body is set forth in allegorical enigmatic figures, it is asked whether this allegorical figurative discourse does not probably commence in ver. 2. Certainly the sun, moon, and stars occur also in such pictures of the night of judgment, obscuring all the lights of the heavens, as at Isa. xiii. 10; but that here, where the author thus ranks together in immediate sequence 'הַשֶּׁשׁ . . . יְהִיב', and as he joins the stars with the moon, so the light with the sun, he has not connected the idea of certain corresponding things in the nature and life of man with these four emblems of light, is yet very improbable. Even though it might be impossible to find out that which is represented, yet this would be no decisive argument against the significance of the figures; the canzones in Dante's Convito, which he there himself interprets, are an example that the allegorical meaning which a poet attaches to his poetry may be present even where it cannot be easily understood or can only be conjectured.

The attempts at interpreting these figures have certainly been wholly or for the most part unfortunate. We satisfy ourselves by registering only the oldest: their glosses are in matter tasteless, but they are at least of linguistic interest. A Barajtha, Shabbath 151-152a, seeking to interpret this closing picture of the Book of Koheleth, says of the sun and the light: "this is the brow and the nose;" of the moon: "this is the soul;" of the stars: "this the cheeks." Similarly, but varying a little, the Midrash to Lev. c. 18 and to Koheleth: the sun = the brightness of the countenance; light = the brow; the moon = the nose; the stars = the upper part of the cheeks (which in an old man fall in). Otherwise, but following the Midrash more than the Talmud, the Targum: the sun = the stately brightness of thy countenance; light = the light of thine eyes; the moon = the ornament of thy cheeks; the stars = the apple of thine eye. All the three understand the rain of wine (Talm. בכי), and the clouds of the veil of the eyes (Targ.: "thy eye-lashes"), but without doing justice to שׁוּב אַחֵר; only one repulsive interpretation in the Midrash takes these words into account. In all these interpretations there is only one grain of truth, this, viz., that the moon in the Talm. is interpreted of the נִשְׁכָּה, anima, for which the more correct word would have been נִשְׁשָׁה;

but it has been shown, Psychol. p. 154, that the Jewish, like the Arab. psychology, reverses terminologically the relation between רוח (רוח), spirit, and נפש, soul.

The older Christian interpretations are also on the right track. Glassius (as also v. Meyer and Smith in "The portraiture of old age") sees in the sun, light, etc., emblems of the interna microcosmi lumina mentis; and yet better, Chr. Friedr. Bauer (1732) sees in 2a a representation of the thought: "ere understanding and sense fail thee." We have elsewhere shown that רוח חיים (רוח) and נפש חיה (נפש) are related to each other as the principium principians and principium principatum of life (Psychol. p. 79), and as the root distinctions of the male and female, of the predominantly active and the receptive (Psychol. p. 103). Thus the figurative language of ver. 3 is interpreted in the following manner. The sun is the male spirit רוח (which, like שמש, is used in both genders) or רושמה, after Prov. xx. 27, a light of Jahve which penetrates with its light of self-examination and self-knowledge the innermost being of man, called by the Lord, Matt. vi. 23 (cf. 1 Cor. ii. 11), "the light that is in thee." The light, viz. the clear light of day proceeding from the sun, is the activity of the spirit in its unweakened intensity: sharp apprehension, clear thought, faithful and serviceable memory. The moon is the soul; for, according to the Heb. idea, the moon, whether it is called ירח or לבנה, is also in relation to the sun a figure of the female (cf. Gen. xxxvii. 9 f., where the sun in Joseph's dream = Jacob-Israel, the moon = Rachel); and that the soul, viz. the animal soul, by means of which the spirit becomes the principle of the life of the body (Gen. ii. 7), is related to the spirit as female σκευος ἀσθενέστερον, is evident from passages such as Ps. xlii. 6, where the spirit supports the soul (animus animam) with its consolation. And the stars? We are permitted to suppose in the author of the Book of Koheleth a knowledge, as Schrader<sup>1</sup> has shown, of the old Babyl.-Assyr. seven astral gods, which consisted of the sun, moon, and the five planets; and thus it will not be too much to understand the stars, as representing the five planets, of the five senses (Mishn. הַרְגָּשׁוֹת,<sup>2</sup> later הַיָּשִׁים, cf. the verb, ii. 25) which mediate the receptive relation of the soul to the outer world (Psychol. p. 233). But we cannot see our way further to explain 2b pathol.-anatom., as Geier is disposed to do: Nonnulli haec accommodant ad crassos illos ac pituosos senum vapores ex debili ventriculo in cerebrum adscendentes continuo, ubi itidem imbres (רושם) h. e. destillationes creber- rimae per oculos lippientes, per nares guttatim fluentes, per os subinde excreans cet., quae sane defluxiones, tussis ac catharri in juvenibus non ita sunt frequentia, quippe ubi calor multo adhuc fortior, consumens dissipansque humores. It is enough to understand מַצְפֵּי of cases of sickness and attacks of weakness which disturb the power of thought, obscure the consciousness, darken the mind, and which ahhar haggēshēm, after they have once overtaken him and then have ceased, quickly again return without permitting him long to experience health. A cloudy day is = a day of misfortune, Joel ii. 2, Zeph. i. 15; an overflowing rain is a scourge of God, Ezek. xiii. 13, xxxviii. 22; and one visited by misfortune after misfortune complains, Ps. xlii. 8 [7]: "Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of thy waterspouts: all thy waves and thy billows are gone over me."

Ver. 3. To the thought: Ere the mind and the senses begin to be darkened, and the winter of life with its clouds and storms approaches, the further details here following stand in a subordinate relation: "That day when the watchers of the house tremble, and the strong men bow themselves, and the grinders rest, because they have become few, and the women looking out of the windows are darkened." Regarding מַצְפֵּי with art.: eo (illo) tempore, vid. under Song viii. 8. What follows is regarded by Winzer, with Mich., Spohr, and partly Nachtigal, as a further description of the night to which old age, ver. 2, is compared: Watchers then guard the house; labourers are wearied with the labours and cares of the day; the maids who have to grind at the mill have gone to rest; and almost all have already fallen asleep; the women who look out from the windows are unrecognisable, because it has become dark. But what kind of cowardly watchers are those who "tremble," and what kind of (per antiphrasin) strong men who "bow themselves" at evening like children when they have belly-ache! Ginsburg regards vers. 2-5 as a continuation of the description of the consequences of the storm under which human life comes to an end: the last consequence is this, that they who experience it lose the taste for almonds and the appetite for locusts. But what is the meaning of this quaint figure? it would certainly be a meaningless and aimless digression. Taylor hears in this verse the mourning for the dead from ver. 2, where death is described: the watchers of the house tremble; the strong men bow themselves, viz. from sorrow, because of the blank death has made in the house, etc.; but even supposing that this picture had a connection in ver. 2, how strange would it be!—the lookers out at the windows must be the "ladies," who are fond of amusing themselves at windows, and who now—are darkened. Is there anything more comical than such little ladies having become darkened (whether externally or internally remains undetermined)? However one may judge of the figurative language of ver. 2, ver. 3 begins the allegorical description of hoary old age after its individual bodily symptoms; interpreters also, such as Knobel, Hitz., and Ewald, do not shrink from seeking out the significance of the individual figures after the old Haggadic manner. The Talm. says of shomrē habbayith: these are the loins and ribs; of the anshē hehhayil: these are the bones; of harooth baar'ubboth: these, the eyes. The Midrash understands the watchers of the house, of the knees of the aged man; the men of strength, of his ribs or arms; the women at the mill, of the digestive organs (סדקיה,<sup>1</sup> the stomach, from omasum); those who have become few, of the teeth; the women looking out at the window, of the eyes; another interpretation, which by harooth thinks of the lungs, is not worth notice.

Here also the Targ. principally follows the Midrash: it translates the watchers of the house by "thy knees;" strong men by "thine arms;" the women at the mill by "the teeth of thy mouth;" the women who look out at the window by "thine eyes." These interpretations for the most part are correct, only those referable to the internal organs are in bad taste; references to these must be excluded from the interpretation, for weakness of the stomach, emphysema of the lungs, etc., are not appropriate as poetical figures. The most common biblical figures of the relation of the spirit or the soul to the body is, as we have shown, Psychol. p. 227, that of the body as of the house of the inner man. This house, as that of an old man, is on all sides in a ruinous condition. The shomrē habbayith are the arms terminating in the hands, which bring to the house whatever is suitable for it, and keep away from it whatever threatens to do it injury; these protectors of the house have lost their vigour and elasticity (Gen. xlix. 24), they tremble, are palsied (נַרְסָה, from נָרַס, Palp. נַרְסָה, bibl. and Mishn.: to move violently hither and thither, to tremble, to shake<sup>2</sup>), so that they are able neither to grasp securely, to hold fast and use, nor actively to keep back and forcibly avert evil. Anshē hehhayil designates the legs, for the shoqē hāish are the seat of his strength, Ps. cxlvii. 10; the legs of a man in the fulness of youthful strength are like marble pillars, Song x. 15; but those of the old man hith'authu (Hithpa. only here) have bowed themselves, they have lost their tight form, they are shrunken (תִּנְעָזָב, Job iv. 4, etc.) and loose; 4 Macc. iv. 5 calls this τὴν ἐκ τοῦ γήρωτος νοθρότητα ποδῶν ἐπικύφωσιν. To maidens who grind (cf. כָּרָה כְּסֵי, Num. xi. 8 and Isa. xlvi. 2) the corn by means of a hand-mill are compared the teeth, the name of which in the old language is masc., but in the modern (cf. Prov. xxix. 19), as also in the Syr. and Arab., is fem.; the reference of the figure to these instruments for grinding is not to be missed; the Arab. tahinat and the Syr. tahonto signify dens molaris, and we now call 6 of the 32 teeth Mahlzähne (molar teeth, or grinders); the Greeks used for them the word μίλαι (Ps. lvii. 7, LXX.). Regarding מְסֵי, LXX. ἤργησαν (= ἀεργοὶ ἐγενήθησαν), vid. above, p. 191.<sup>1</sup> The clause מְסֵי כִּי (LXX. ὅτι ὠλιγόθησαν) assigns the reason that the grinders rest, i.e. are not at work, that they have become few: they stand no longer in a row; they are isolated, and (as is to be supposed) are also in themselves defective. Taylor interprets mi'etu transitively: the women grinding rest when they have wrought a little, i.e. they interrupt their labour, because on account of the occurrence of death, guests are now no longer entertained; but the beautiful appropriate allegory maintains its place against this supposed lamentation for the dead; also מְסֵי does not signify to accomplish a little (Targ.), but to take away, to become few (LXX., Syr., Jerome, Venet., Luther), as such a Pih. as x. 10, קָהָה, to become blunt. And by מְסֵי אֵינֵנוּ we are not to think, with Taylor, of women such as Sisera's mother or Michal, who look out of the window, but of the eyes, more exactly the apples of the eyes, to which the orbita (LXX. ἐν ταῖς ὀπαῖς; Symm. διὰ τῶν ὀπῶν) and the eyelids with the eye-lashes are related as a window is to those who look out; מְסֵי (from מְסֵי, R. מְסֵי, to entwine firmly and closely) is the window, consisting of a lattice of wood; the eyes are, as Cicero (Tusc. i. 20) calls them, quasi fenestrae animi; the soul-eyes, so to speak, without which it could not experience what sight is, look by means of the external eyes; and these soul-bodily eyes have become darkened in the old man, the power of seeing is weakened, and the experiences of sight are indistinct, the light of the eyes is extinguished (although not without exception, Deut. xxxiv. 7).

<sup>1</sup> We find a similar allegory in Shabbath 152a. The emperor asked the Rabbi Joshua b. Chananja why he did not visit בֵּי אַבְיָדָן (a place where learned conversation, particularly on religious subjects, was carried on). He answered: "The mount is snow (= the hair of the head is white), ice surrounds me (= whiskers and beard on the chin white), its (of my body) dogs bark not (the voice fails), and its grinders (the teeth) grind not." The proper meaning of בֵּי אַבְיָדָן, Levy has not been able clearly to bring to light in his Neuhebr. u. Chald. W. B.

Ver. 4. From the eyes the allegory proceeds to the mouth, and the repugnance of the old man to every noise disturbing his rest : " And the doors to the street are closed, when the mill sounds low ; and he rises up at the voice of a bird ; and all the daughters of song must lower themselves." By the door toward the street the Talm. and Midrash understand the pores or the emptying members of the body,—a meaning so far from being ignoble, that even in the Jewish morning prayer a Beracha is found in these words : " Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God, King of the world, who hast wisely formed man, and made for him manifold apertures and cavities. It is manifest and well known before the throne of Thy Majesty, that if one of these cavities is opened, or one of these apertures closed, it is impossible for him to exist and to stand before Thee ; blessed art Thou, O Lord, the Physician of the body, and who doest wondrous works !" The words which follow  $\text{הַיָּסֵד} \dots \text{בְּיָסֵד}$  are accordingly to be regarded as assigning a reason for this closing : the non-appearance of excretion has its reason in defective digestion in this, that the stomach does not grind (Talm. :  $\text{קורקבן וּנְי}$  <sup>1</sup>  $\text{בשביל}$ ). But the dual  $\text{דְּלָתַיִם}$  suggests a pair of similar and related members, and  $\text{בְּשַׁיִן}$  a pair of members open before the eyes, and not such as modesty requires to be veiled. The Targum therefore understands the shutting of the doors properly ; but the mills, after the indication lying in  $\text{הַיָּסֵד}$  [grinding maids], it understands of the organs of eating and tasting, for it translates : " thy feet will be fettered, so that thou canst not go out into the street ; and appetite will fail thee." But that is an awkward amalgamation of the literal with the allegorical, which condemns itself by this, that it separates the close connection of the two expressions required by  $\text{בְּשַׁפְּלֵי}$ , which also may be said of the reference of  $\text{וְלֵהָרַי}$  to the ears, into which no sound, even from the noisy market, penetrates (Gurlitt, Grätz). We have for  $\text{דְּלָתַיִם}$  a key, already found by Aben Ezra, in Job xli. 6 [2], where the jaws of the leviathan are called  $\text{דְּלָתַי פְּנֵי}$  ; and as Herzf. and Hitz. explain, so Samuel Aripol in his Commentary, which appeared in Constantinople, 1855, rightly : " He calls the jaws  $\text{דְּלָתַיִם}$ , to denote that not two  $\text{דְּלָתוֹת}$  in two places, but in one place, are meant, after the manner of a door opening out to the street, which is large, and consists of two folds or wings,  $\text{דְּלָתוֹת}$ , which, like the lips ( $\text{הַשִּׁפְתַּיִם}$ , better : the jaws), form a whole in two parts ; and the meaning is, that at the time of old age the lips are closed and drawn in, because the teeth have disappeared, or, as the text says, because the noise of the mill is low, just because he has no teeth to grind with." The connection of  $\text{קָרַן}$  and  $\text{לְשׁוֹן}$  is, however, closer still: the jaws of an old man are closed externally, for the sound of the mill is low; i.e. since, when one masticates his food with the jaws of a toothless mouth, there is heard only a dull sound of this chewing (Mumpfelns, vid. Weigand's Deut. W. B.), i.e. laborious masticating. He cannot any more crack or crunch and break his food, one hears only a dull munching and sucking.—The voice of the mouth (Bauer, Hitz., Gurlitt, Zöckl.) cannot be the meaning of  $\text{קָרַן}$ ; the set of teeth (Gurlitt indeed substitutes, 3*b*, the cavity of the mouth) is not the organ of voice, although it contributes to the formation of certain sounds of words, and is of importance for the full sound of the voice.

$\text{בְּשׂוֹרֵי}$ , "to the street," is here = on the street side;  $\text{לְפָנָיִם}$  is, as at Prov. xvi. 19, infin. (Symmachus: ἀχειρωθείσης τῆς φωνῆς; the Venet.: ἐν τῷ ταπεινώσθαι τὴν φωνήν), and is to be understood after Isa. xxix. 4;  $\text{בְּמִנְחָה}$  stands for  $\text{מִנְחָה}$ , as the vulgar Arab. tahûn and mathana instead of the antiquated rahâ. Winzer now supposes that the picture of the night is continued in 4*b*: et subsistit (vox molae) ad cantum galli, et submissius canunt cantatrices (viz. molitrices). Elster, with Umbreit, supposes the description of a storm continued: the sparrow rises up to cry, and all the singing birds sink down (flutter restlessly on the ground). And Taylor supposes the lament for the dead continued, paraphrasing: But the bird of evil omen [owl, or raven] raises his dirge, and the merry voice of the singing girls is silent.

These three pictures, however, are mere fancies, and are also evidently here forced upon the text; for  $\text{קָרַן}$  cannot mean subsistit vox, but, on the contrary (cf. Hos. x. 14), surgit (tollitur) vox; and  $\text{קָרַן לְקוֹל}$  cannot mean: it (the bird) raises itself to cry, which would have required  $\text{קָרַן לְתוֹרֵף קוֹלוֹ}$ , or at least  $\text{לְקוֹל}$ , after  $\text{קוֹם לְמַלְחָמָה}$ , etc.; besides, it is to be presumed that  $\text{קָרַן}$  is genit., like  $\text{קוֹל עוֹנֵב}$  and the like, not nom. of the subj. It is natural, with Hitz., Ewald, Heiligst., Zöckl., to refer qol tsippor to the peeping, whispering voice ("childish treble" of Shakespeare) of the old man (cf. tsiphtseph, Isa. xxix. 4, xxxviii. 14, x. 14, viii. 19). But the translation: "And it (the voice) approaches a sparrow's voice," is inadmissible, since for  $\text{לְקוֹל}$  the meaning, "to pass from one state to another," cannot be proved from 1 Sam. xxii. 13, Mic. ii. 8;  $\text{קוֹם}$  signifies there always "to rise up," and besides, qol tahhanah is not the voice of the mouth supplied with teeth, but the sound of the chewing of a toothless mouth. If l'qol is connected with a verb of external movement, or of that of the soul, it always denotes the occasion of this movement, Num. xvi. 34; Ezek. xxvii. 28; Job xxi. 12; Hab. iii. 16. Influenced by this inalienable sense of the language, the Talm. explains 'צפ . . . ויקום by "even a bird awakes him." Thus also literally the Midrash, and accordingly the Targ. paraphrasing: "thou shalt awaken out of thy sleep for a bird, as for thieves breaking in at night." That is correct, only it is unnecessary to limit ויקום (or rather ויקום<sup>1</sup>) which accords with the still continued subordination of ver. 4 to the eo die quo of ver. 3a) to rising up from sleep, as if it were synonymous with ויעור: the old man is weak (nervously weak) and easily frightened, and on account of the deadening of his senses (after the figure of ver. 2, the darkening of the five stars) is so liable to mistake, that if even a bird chirps, he is frightened by it out of his rest (cf. hēkim, Isa. xiv. 9).

Also in the interpretation of the clause וישחוי . . . השיר, the ancients are in the right track. The Talm. explains: even all music and song appear to him like common chattering (שוחרה) or, according to other readings, שיחה; the proper meaning of ישחוי is thus Haggad. twisted. Less correctly the Midrash: בנות השיר are his lips, or they are the reins which think, and the heart decides (on this curious psychol. conception, cf. Chullin 11a, and particularly Berachoth 61a, together with my Psychol. p. 269). The reference to the internal organs is à priori improbable throughout; the Targ. with the right tact decides in favour of the lips: "And thy lips are untuned, so that they can no more say (sing) songs." In this translation of the Talm. there are compounded, as frequently, two different interpretations, viz. that interpretation of בנ' הש' which is proved by the בל going before to be incorrect, because impossible; and the interpretation of these "daughters of song" of "songs," as if these were synonymous designations, as when in Arab. misfortunes are called banatu binasan, and the like (vid. Lane's Lex. I. p. 263); בַּת קוֹל, which in Mish. denotes a separate voice (the voice of heaven), but in Syr. the separate word, may be compared. But ישחוי (fut. Niph. of שחח) will not accord with this interpretation. For that בנ' הש' denotes songs (Hitz., Heiligst.), or the sound of singing (Böttch.), or the words (Ewald) of the old man himself, which are now softened down so as to be scarcely audible, is yet too improbable ; it is an insipid idea that the old man gives forth these feeble "daughters of song" from his mouth. We explain  $\text{שָׁחוּ}$  of a being bowed down, which is external to the old man, and accordingly understand b'noth hashshir not of pieces of music (Aq.  $\pi\acute{\alpha}\nu\tau\alpha \tau\grave{\alpha} \tau\eta\varsigma \phi\acute{\omicron}\delta\eta\varsigma$ ) which must be lowered to pianissimo, but according to the parallel already rightly acknowledged by Desvieux, 2 Sam. xix. 36, where the aged Barzillai says that he has now no longer an ear for the voice of singing men and singing women, of singing birds (cf.  $\text{זְמִירָה}$  of a singing bird in the Syrian fables of Sophos, and banoth of the branches of a fruit tree, Gen. xlix. 22), and, indeed, so that these are a figure of all creatures skilled in singing, and taking pleasure in it : all beings that are fond of singing, and to which it has become as a second nature, must lower themselves, viz. the voice of their song (Isa. xxix. 4) (cf. the Kal, Ps. xxxv. 14, and to the modal sense of the fut. x. 10,  $\text{יִצְרָח}$ , and x. 19,  $\text{יִשְׁפַח}$ ), i.e. must timidly retire, they dare not make themselves heard, because the old man, who is terrified by the twittering of a little bird, cannot bear it.

Ver. 5a. From this his repugnance to singing, and music, and all loud noises, progress in the description is made to the difficulty such aged men have in motion: "Also they are afraid of that which is high ; and there are all kinds of fearful things in the way . . ." The description moves forward in a series of independent sentences ; that  $\text{שׁוֹמַיִם}$  to which it was subordinate in ver. 3, and still also in ver. 4, is now lost sight of. In the main it is rightly explained by the Talm., and with it the Midrash : "Even a little hillock appears to him like a high mountain ; and if he has to go on a journey, he meets something that terrifies him ;" the Targ. has adopted the second part of this explanation.  $\text{נִבְרָה}$  (falsely referred by the Targ. to the time lying far back in the past) is understood neut. ; cf. 1 Sam. xvi. 7. Such decrepid old men are afraid of ( $\text{יִרְאוּ}$ ), not videbunt, as the LXX., Symm., Ar., and the Venet. translate, who seem to have had before them the defective ( $\text{יָרַא}$ ) a height, —it alarms them as something insurmountable, because their breath and their limbs fail them when they attempt it ; and hathhhattim (plur. of the intensifying form of  $\text{חָת}$ , consternatio, Job xli. 25), i.e. all kinds of formidines (not formido, Ewald, § 179a, Böttch. § 762, for the plur. is as in salsilloth, 'aph'appim, etc., thought of as such), meet them in the way. As the sluggard says : there is a lion in the way, and under this pretence remains slothfully at home, Prov. xxiv. 13, xxii. 13, so old men do not venture out ; for to them a damp road appears like a very morass ; a gravelly path, as full of neck-breaking hillocks ; an undulating path, as fearfully steep and precipitous; that which is not shaded, as oppressively hot and exhausting—they want strength and courage to overcome difficulties, and their anxiety pictures out dangers before them where there are none.

5b. The allegory is now continued in individual independent figures: "And the almond tree is in blossom." The Talm. explains 'וי' ה'ש' of the haunch-bone projecting (from leanness); the Midrash, of the bones of the vertebral column, conceived of as incorruptible and as that round which will take place the future restoration of the human body,—probably the cross bone, os sacrum,<sup>1</sup> inserted between the two thigh bones of the pelvis as a pointed wedge; cf. Jerome in his Comm.: quidam sacram spinam interpretantur quod decrescentibus natium cornibus spina accrescat et floreat; אֶל is an Old Heb., Aram., and Arab. name of the almond tree and the almond nut (vid. under Gen. xxx. 37), and this, perhaps, is the reason of this identification of the emblematic אֶלֶּשׁ with אֶל (the os sacrum, or vertebra magna) of the spine. The Targ. follows the Midrash in translating: the 'וי' ה'ש' (the top of the spine) will protrude from leanness like an almond tree (viz. from which the leaves have been stripped). In these purely arbitrary interpretations nothing is correct but (1) that אֶלֶּשׁ is understood not of the almond fruit, but of the almond tree, as also at Jer. i. 11 (the rod of an almond tree); (2) that יִאֵן (notwithstanding that these interpreters had it before them unpointed) is interpreted, as also by the LXX., Syr., Jerome, and the Venet., in the sense of blossoming, or the bursting out of blossoms by means of the opening up of the buds. Many interpreters understand אֶלֶּשׁ of almond fruit (Winzer, Ewald, Ginsb., Rödiger, etc.), for they derive יִאֵן from יִאֵן, as Aben Ezra had already done, and explain by: fastidit amygdalam (nucem), or fastidium creat amygdala. But (1) יִאֵן for יִאֵן (Hiph. of יִאֵן, to disdain, to treat scornfully) is a change of vowels unexampled; we must, with such an explanation, read either יִאֵן, fastiditur (Gaab), or יִאֵן; (2) almond nuts, indeed, belong to the more noble productions of the land and the delicacies, Gen. xliii. 11, but dainties, κατ' ἐξ., at the same time they are not, so that it would be appropriate to exemplify the blunted sensation of taste in the old man, by saying that he no more cracks and eats almonds. The explanation of Hitzig, who reads יִאֵן, and interprets the almond tree as at Song vii. 9 the palm, to denote a woman, for he translates: the almond tree refuses (viz. the old man), we set aside as too ingenious; and we leave to those interpreters who derive יִאֵן from

נִאֵן, and understand הַשֶּׁקֶר<sup>1</sup> of the glans penis (Böttch., Fürst, and several older interpreters), to follow their own foul and repulsive criticism. נִאֵן is an incorrect reading for נִיָּן, as at Hos. x. 14, אָם for אֵם, and, in Prov., אֶשֶׁר for אֶשֶׁר (Ges. § 73. 4); and besides, as at Song vi. 11, הִינֵנִי, regular Hiph. of נִצַּן (נִצַּן, Lam. iv. 15), to move tremblingly (vibrate), to glisten, blossom (cf. נוֹם, to flee, and נִיָּן, Assyr. nisannu, the flower-month). Thus deriving this verbal form, Ewald, and with him Heiligst., interprets the blossoming almond tree as a figure of the winter of life: "it is as if the almond tree blossomed, which in the midst of winter has already blossoms on its dry, leafless stem." But the blossoms of the almond tree are rather, after Num. xvii. 23, a figure of special life-strength, and we must thus, thrown back to נִאֵן from נִיָּן (to flourish), rather explain, with Furrer (in Schenkel's B. L.), as similarly Herzf.: the almond tree refuses, i.e. ceases, to blossom; the winter of old age is followed by no spring; or also, as Dale and Taylor: the almond tree repels, i.e. the old man has no longer a joyful welcome for this messenger of spring. But his general thought has already found expression in ver. 2; the blossoming almond tree must be here an emblem of a more special relation. Hengst. supposes that "the juniper tree (for this is the proper meaning of שֶׁקֶר) is in bloom" is = sleeplessness in full blossom stands by the old man; but that would be a meaningless expression. Nothing is more natural than that the blossoming almond tree is intended to denote the same as is indicated by the phrase of the Latin poet: Intempestivi funduntur vertice cani (Luther, Geiger, Grot., Vaih., Luzz., Gurlitt, Tyler, Bullock, etc.). It has been objected that the almond blossoms are not pure white, but according to the variety, they are pale-red, or also white; so that Thomson, in his beautiful Land and the Book, can with right say: "The almond tree is the type of old age whose hair is white;" and why? "The white blossoms completely cover the whole tree." Besides, Bauer (1732) has already remarked that the almond blossoms, at first tinged with red, when they are ready to fall off become white as snow; with which may be compared a clause cited by Ewald from Bodenedt's A Thousand and One Days in the Orient: "The white blossoms fall from the almond trees like snow-flakes." Accordingly, Dächsel is right when he explains, after the example of Zöckler: "the almond tree with its reddish flower in late winter, which strews the ground with its blossoms, which have gradually become white like snow-flakes, is an emblem of the winter of old age with its falling silvery hair."

Ver. 5c. From the change in the colour of the hair, the allegory now proceeds to the impairing of the elasticity of the thighs and of their power of bearing a load, the malum coxae senile (in a wider than the usual pathological sense): "And the grasshopper (i.e. locust, חֲרָבָה, Samar. חרובה = חֲרָבָה, Lev. xi. 22) becomes a burden." Many interpreters (Merc., Döderl., Gaab, Winz., Gesen., Winer, Dale) find in these words חֲרָבָה the meaning that locust-food, or that the chirping of grasshoppers, is burdensome to him (the old man); but even supposing that it may at once be assumed that he was a keen aeridophagus (locusts, steeped in butter, are like crabs (shrimps) spread on slices of butter and bread), or that he had formerly a particular delight in the chirping of the τέττιξ, which the ancients number among singing birds (cf. Taylor, l.c.), and that he has now no longer any joy in the song of the tettix, although it is regarded as soothing and tending to lull to rest, and an Anacreon could in his old days even sing his μακαρίζομέν σε, τέττιξ,—yet these two interpretations are impossible, because חֲרָבָה may mean to burden and to move with difficulty, but not "to become burdensome." For the same reason, nothing is more absurd than the explanation of Kimchi and Gurlitt: Even a grasshopper, this small insect, burdens him; for which Zöckl, more naturally: the hopping and chirping of the grasshopper is burdensome to him; as we say, The fly on the wall annoys him. Also Ewald and Heiligstedt's interpretation: "it is as if the locust raised itself to fly, breaking and stripping off its old husk," is inadmissible; for הסתבל can mean se portare laboriose, but not ad evolandum eniti; the comparison (Arab.) tahmmal gains the meaning to hurry onwards, to proceed on an even way, like the Hebr. השכימ, to take upon the shoulder; it properly means, to burden oneself, i.e. to take on one's back in order to get away; but the grasshopper coming out of its case carries away with it nothing but itself. For us, such interpretations—to which, particularly, the advocates of the several hypotheses of a storm, night, and mourning, are constrained—are already set aside by this, that according to the allegory ויניח'הו, 'הו' must also signify something characteristic of the body of an old man. The LXX., Jerome, and Ar. translate: the locust becomes fat; the Syr.: it grows. It is true, indeed, that great corpulence, or also a morbid dropsical swelling of the belly (ascites), is one of the symptoms of advanced old age; but supposing that the (voracious) locust might be an emblem of a corpulent man, yet הסתבל means neither to become fat nor to grow. But because the locust in reality suggests the idea of a corpulent man, the figure cannot at the same time be intended to mean that the old man is like a skeleton, consisting as it were of nothing but skin and bone (Lyra, Luther, Bauer, Dathe); the resemblance of a locust to the back-bone and its joints (Glassius, Köhler, Vaih.) is not in view; only the position of the locust's feet for leaping admits the comparison of the prominent scapulae (shoulder-blades); but shoulder-blades (scapulae alatae), angular and standing out from the chest, are characteristics of a consumptive, not of a senile habit. Also we must cease, with Hitz, Böttch., Luzz., and Gratz, to understand the figure as denoting the φάλλος to be now impotent; for relaxation and shrinking do not agree with הסתכל, which suggests something burdensome by being weighty. The Midrash interprets ההנב by "ankles," and the Targ. translates accordingly: the ankles (אֲפִתְנִי, from the Pers. ustwadr, firm) of thy feet will swell—unsuitably, for "ankles" affords no point of comparison with locusts, and they have no resemblance to their springing feet. The Talm., glossing ההנב by "these are the buttocks" (nates) (cf. Arab. 'ajab, the os coccygis, Syn. 'ajuz, as the Talm. ענבות interchanges with ענח), is on the right track. There is nothing, indeed, more probable than that הנב is a figure of the coxa, the hinder region of the pelvis, where the lower part of the body balances itself in the hip-joint, and the motion of standing up and going receives its impulse and direction by the muscular strength there concentrated. This part of the body may be called the locust, because it includes in itself the mechanism which the two-membered foot for springing, placed at an acute angle, presents in the locust. Referred to this coxa, the loins, יסתכל has its most appropriate meaning: the marrow disappears from the bones, elasticity from the muscles, the cartilage and oily substance from the joints, and, as a consequence, the middle of the body drags itself along with difficulty; or: it is with difficulty moved along (Hithpa. as pass., like viii. 10); it is stiff, particularly in the morning, and the old man is accustomed to swing his arms backwards, and to push himself on as it were from behind. In favour of this interpretation (but not deciding it) is the accord of הנב with ענב = κόκκυξ (by which the os coccygis is designated as the cuckoo's bone). Also the verbal stem (Arab.) jahab supplies an analogous name: not jahab, which denotes the air passage (but not, as Knobel supposes, the breath itself; for the verb signifies to separate, to form a partition, Mishn. פתיחה), but (Arab.) jahabat, already compared by Bochart, which denotes the point (dual), the two points or projections of the two hip-bones (vid. Lane's Lex.), which, together with the os sacrum lying between, form the ring of the pelvis.

Ver. 5*d.* From the weakening of the power of motion, the allegory passes on to the decay of sensual desires, and of the organs appertaining thereto: "And the caper-berry fails" . . . The meaning "caper" for הַאֵבִי is evidenced by the LXX. (ἡ κάππαρις, Arab. alkabar), the Syr., and Jerome (capparis), and this rendering is confirmed by the Mishnic אֲבִינֹת, which in contradistinction to חֲמָרָה, i.e. the tender branches, and קַפְרִיסִין, i.e. the rind of fruit, signifies the berry-like flower-buds of the caper bush,<sup>1</sup> according to Buxtorf (vid. above, p. 190). This Talm. word, it is true, is pointed אֲבִינֹת; but that makes no difference, for אֲבִינֹת is related to אֲבִינֹת merely as making the word emphatic, probably to distinguish the name of the caper from the fem. of the adj. אֲבִינֹת, which signifies avida, egena. But in the main they are both one; for that אֲבִינֹת may designate "desire" (Abulwalid:<sup>2</sup> aliradat; Parchon: הַתְּאוּהָ; Venet.: ἡ ὄρεξις; Luther: alle Lust), or "neediness," "poverty" (the Syr. in its second translation of this clause), is impossible, because the form would be unexampled and incomprehensible; only the desiring soul, or the desiring, craving member (vid. Kimchi), could be so named. But now the caper is so named, which even to this day is used to give to food a more piquant taste (cf. Plutarch's Sympos. vi. qu. 2). It is also said that the caper is a means of exciting sexual desire (aphrodisiacum); and there are examples of its use for this purpose from the Middle Ages, indeed, but none from the records of antiquity; Pliny, Hist. Nat. xx. 14 (59), knew nothing of it, although he speaks at length of the uses and effects of the capparis. The Talm. explains הַתְּאוּהָ by חֲמָרָה, the Midrash by תְּאוּהָ, the Targ. by מִשְׁכָּבָה, interpreting the word directly without reference to the caper in this sense. If haaviyonah thus denotes the caper, we have not thence to conclude that it incites to sexual love, and still less are we, with the Jewish interpreters, whom Böttch. follows, to understand the word of the membrum virile itself; the Arab. name for the caper, 'itar, which is compared by Grätz, which has an obscene meaning, designates also other aromatic plants. We shall proceed so much the more securely if we turn away from the idea of sexual impulse and hold by the idea of the impulse of self-preservation, namely, appetite for food, since אֲבִינֹת (from אָבִי, the root-meaning of which, "to desire," is undoubted<sup>1</sup>) denotes a poor man, as one who desires that which is indispensable to the support of life; the caper is accordingly called aviyonah, as being appetitiva, i.e. exciting to appetite for food, and the meaning will not be that the old man is like a caper-berry which, when fully ripe, bursts its husks and scatters its seed (Rosenm., Winer in his R. W., Ewald, Taylor, etc.), as also the LXX., Symm. (καὶ διαλυθῆ ἡ ἐπίπνοος, i.e. as Jerome translates it, et dissolvetur spiritus fortitudo, perhaps ἐπίπνοος, the strength or elasticity of the spirit), and Jerome understand the figure; but since it is to be presupposed that the name of the caper, in itself significant, will also be significant for the figure: capparis est irrita sive vim suam non exerit (תִּפְרַר) as inwardly trans. Hiph. of פָּרַר, to break in pieces, frustrate), i.e. even such means of excitement as capers, these appetite-berries, are unable to stimulate the dormant and phlegmatic stomach of the old man (thus e.g. Bullock). Hitzig, indeed, maintains that the cessation of the enjoyment of love in old age is not to be overlooked; but (1) the use of artificial means for stimulating this natural impulse in an old man, who is here described simply as such, without reference to his previous life and its moral state, would make him a sensualist; and (2) moral statistics show that with the decay of the body lust does not always (although this would be in accordance with nature, Gen. xvii. 17; Rom. iv. 19) expire; moreover, the author of the Book of Koheleth is no Juvenal or Martial, to take pleasure, like many of his interpreters, in exhibiting the res venereae.

<sup>1</sup> The caper-bush is called in the Mish. צִיָּה, and is celebrated, Beza 25a, cf. Shabbath 30b (where, according to J. S. Bloch's supposition, the disciple who meets Gamaliel is the Apostle Paul), on account of its unconquerable life-power, its quick development of fruit, and manifold products. The caper-tree is planted, says Berachoth 36a, "with a view to its branches;" the eatable branches or twigs here meant are called שִׁתִּי (שִׁתִּי). Another name for the caper-tree is נֶצְפָה, Demai i. 1, Berachoth 36a, 40b; and another name for the bud of the caper-blossom is פְּרֹתָה רְבוּמִיָּה, Berachoth 36b (cf. Aruch, under the words aviyonoth and ts'apah).

Ver. 5e. And in view of the clause following, the ceasing from nourishment as the last symptom of the certain approach of death is more appropriate than the cessation from sexual desire: "For," thus the author continues after this description of the enfeebled condition of the hoary old man, "man goeth to his everlasting habitation, and the mourners go about the streets." One has to observe that the antequam of the memento Creatoris tui in diebus juventutis tuae is continued in vers. 6 and 7. The words 'ad asher lo are thrice repeated. The chief group in the description is subordinated to the second 'ad asher lo; this relation is syntactically indicated also in ver. 4 by the subjective form וַיִּקֹּם, and continues logically in ver. 5, although without any grammatical sign, for וַיִּנְאֹץ and תִּפְרַר are indicative. Accordingly the clause with בִּי, 5b, will not be definitive; considerably the accentuation does not begin a new verse with בִּי: the symptoms of marasmus already spoken of are here explained by this, that man is on his way to the grave, and, as we say, has already one foot in it.

The part. הַלֵּךְ is also here not so much the expression of the fut. instans (iturus est), like ix. 10, as of the present (Venet. : ἀπεισι); cf. Gen. xv. 2, where also these two possible renderings stand in question. "Everlasting house" is the name for the grave of the dead, according to Diodorus Sic. i. 51, also among the Egyptians, and on old Lat. monuments also the expression domus aeterna is found (vid. Knobel); the comfortless designation, which corresponds<sup>1</sup> to the as yet darkened idea of Hades, remained with the Jews in spite of the hope of the resurrection they had meanwhile received; cf. Tob. iii. 6; Sanhedrin 19a, "the churchyard of Husal;" "to a churchyard" (beth 'olam); "at the door of the churchyard" (beth 'olam), Vajikra rabba, c. 12. Cf. also above, p. 191, and Assyr. bit 'idii = ביה ער of the under-world (Bab.-Assyr. Epic, "Höllenfahrt der Istar," i. 4).

The clause following means that mourners already go about the streets (cf. סָבַב, Song iii. 3, and Pil. Song iii. 2; Ps. lix. 7) expecting the death of the dying. We would say: the undertaker tarries in the neighbourhood of the house to be at hand, and to offer his services. For hassophdim are here, as Knobel, Winz., and others rightly explain, the mourners, saphdanin (sophdanin), hired for the purpose of playing the mourning music (with the horn שִׁפּוּרָא, Moëd katan 27b, or flute, הַלִּילִים, at the least with two, Kethuboth 46b; cf. Lat. siticines) and of singing the lament for the dead, qui conducti plorant in funere (Horace, Poet. 433), along with whom were mourning women, מְקוֹנוֹתָא (Lat. praeficae) (cf. Buxtorf's Lex. Talm. col. 1524 s.),—a custom which existed from remote antiquity, according to 2 Sam. iii. 31; Jer. xxxiv. 5. The Talm. contains several such lamentations for the dead, as e.g. that of a "mourner" (הַהוּא סַפְרָנָא) for R. Abina: "The palms wave their heads for the palm-like just man," etc.; and of the famed "mourner" Bar-Kippuk on the same occasion: "If the fire falls upon the cedar, what shall the hyssop of the walls do?" etc. (Moëd katan 25b<sup>2</sup>)—many of the סַפְרָנִים were accordingly elegiac poets. This section of ver. 5 does not refer to the funeral itself, for the procession of the mourners about the bier ought in that case to have been more distinctly expressed; and that they walked about in the streets before the funeral (Isa. xv. 3) was not a custom, so far as we know. They formed a component part of the procession following the bier to the grave in Judea, as Shabbath 153a remarks with reference to this passage, and in Galilee going before it ; to mourn over the death, to reverse it, if possible, was not the business of these mourners, but of the relatives (Hitz.), who were thus not merely called הסופרים. The Targ. translates : “ and the angels will go about, who demand an account of thee, like the mourning singers who go about the streets, to record what account of thee is to be given.” It is unnecessary to change בְּסוֹפְרֵי into בְּסוֹפְרֵי (instar scribarum). According to the idea of the Targumist, the sophdim go about to collect materials for the lament for the dead. The dirge was not always very scrupulously formed ; wherefore it is said in Berachoth 62a, “ as is the estimate of the dead that is given, so is the estimate of the mourners (singers and orators at the funeral), and of those who respond to their words.” It is most natural to see the object of the mourners going about in their desire to be on the spot when death takes place.<sup>1</sup>

Vers. 6, 7. A third ad asher lo now follows (cf. v. 1, 2) ; the first placed the old man in view, with his désagrément in general ; the second described in detail his bodily weaknesses, presenting themselves as forerunners of death ; the third brings to view the dissolution of the life of the body, by which the separation of the soul and the body, and the return of both to their original condition is completed. “ Ere the silver cord is loosed, and the golden bowl is shattered, and the pitcher is broken at the fountain, and the wheel is shattered in the well, and the dust returns to the earth as that which it was, and the spirit returns to God who gave it.” Before entering into the contents of these verses, we shall consider the form in which some of the words are presented. The Chethhb ירחק we readily let drop, for in any case it must be said that the silver cord is put out of action ; and this word, whether we read it יִרְחַק or יִרְחַק (Venet. μακροσθη), is too indefinite, and, supposing that by the silver cord a component part of the body is meant, even inappropriate, since the organs which cease to perform their functions are not removed away from the dead body, but remain in it when dead. But the Keri יִרְחַק (“ is unbound") has also its difficulty. The verb  $\text{נָתַק}$  signifies to bind together, to chain; the bibl. Heb. uses it of the binding of prisoners, Nah. iii. 18, cf. Isa. xl. 19; the post-bibl. Heb. of binding = shutting up (contrast of  $\text{פָּתַח}$ , Pesikta, ed. Buber, 176a, whence Mezia 107b,  $\text{שׂוּרָא וּרְיָחָא}$ , a wall and enclosure); the Arab. of shutting up and closing a hole, rent, split (e.g. murtatik, a plant with its flower-buds as yet shut up; rutûk, inaccessibleness). The Targumist<sup>1</sup> accordingly understands  $\text{נָתַק}$  of binding = lameness (palsy); Rashi and Aben Ezra, of shrivelling; this may be possible, however, for  $\text{נָתַק}$ , used of a "cord," the meaning that first presents itself, is "to be firmly bound;" but this affords no appropriate sense, and we have therefore to give to the Niph. the contrasted meaning of setting free, discatenare (Parchon, Kimchi); this, however, is not justified by examples, for a privat. Niph. is unexampled, Ewald, § 121e;  $\text{נָתַק}$ , Job xi. 12, does not mean to be deprived of heart (understanding), but to gain heart (understanding). Since, however, we still need here the idea of setting loose or tearing asunder (LXX. ἀνατραπεῖν; Symm. κοπήσαι; Syr. נַחֲפַסַּק, from  $\text{פָּסַק}$ , abscindere; Jerome, rumpatur), we have only the choice of interpreting yērathēq either, in spite of the appearance to the contrary, in the meaning of constringitur, of a violent drawing together of the cord stretched out lengthwise; or, with Pfannkuche, Gesen., Ewald, to read  $\text{נָתַק}$  ("is torn asunder"), which one expects, after Isa. xxxiii. 20; cf. Judg. xvi. 9, Jer. x. 20. Hitzig reaches the same, for he explains  $\text{נָתַק}$  =  $\text{נָתַק}$ , from (Arab.) kharak, to tear asunder (of the sound of the tearing<sup>2</sup>); and Böttcher, by adopting the reading  $\text{נָתַק}$ ; but without any support in Heb. and Chald. usus loq.  $\text{נָתַק}$ , which is applied to the second figure, is certainly<sup>3</sup> a vessel of a round form (from  $\text{נָתַק}$ , to roll, revolve round), like the  $\text{נָתַק}$  which received the oil and conducted it to the seven lamps of the candlestick in Zech. iv.; but to understand  $\text{נָתַק}$  of the running out of the oil not expressly named (Luther: "and the golden fountain runs out") would be contrary to the usus loq.; it is the metapl. form for  $\text{נָתַק}$ , et confringitur, as  $\text{נָתַק}$ , Isa. xlii. 4, for  $\text{נָתַק}$ , cogn.  $\text{נָתַק}$ , Ps. ii. 9, whence  $\text{נָתַק}$ , 6b, the regularly formed Niph. (the fut. of which,  $\text{נָתַק}$ , Ezek. xxix. 7). We said that oil is not expressly named. But perhaps it is meant by קֶרֶבֶת. The gullah above the candlestick which Zechariah saw was, according to ver. 12, provided with two golden pipes, in which were two olive trees standing on either side, which sunk therein the tuft-like end of their branches, of which it is said that they emptied out of themselves hazzahav into the oil vessels. Here it is manifest that hazzahav means, in the one instance, the precious metal of which the pipes are formed; and in the other, the fluid gold of the oil contained in the olive branches. Accordingly, Hitzig understands gullath hazzahav here also; for he takes gullah as a figure of the body, the golden oil as a figure of the soul, and the silver cord as a figure of vital energy.

<sup>1</sup> The Arab. funeral dirge furnishes at once an illustration of “ and the mourners go about the streets.” What Wetzstein wrote to me ought not, I believe, to be kept from the reader : “ In Damascus the men certainly take part in the dirge ; they go about the reservoir in the court of the house along with the mourning women, and behave themselves like women ; but this does not take place in the villages. But whether the ‘ going about the streets ’ might seem as an evidence that in old times in the towns, as now in the villages, the menaṣṣa (bed of state) was placed with the mourning tent in the open street without, is a question. If this were the case, the sôphdim might appear publicly ; only I would then understand by the word not hired mourners, but the relatives of the dead.” But then מְפָה, as at Ps. xxvi. 6 מִזְבַּח, ought to have been joined to סִבָּב as the object of the going about.

<sup>3</sup> The LXX., unsuitably,  $\text{τὸ ἀνθίμιον}$ , which, per synecdochen partis pro toto, signifies the capital (of a pillar). Thus, perhaps, also are meant Symm.  $\text{τὸ περιφείεις}$ , Jerome vitta, Venet.  $\text{τὸ στίφος}$ , and the Syr. "apple." Among the Arabs, this ornament on the capital is called tabaryz ("prominence").

Thus, with Hitz., understanding gullath hazzahav after the passage in Zechariah, I have correctly represented the meaning of the figures in my Psychol. p. 228, as follows:—"The silver cord = the soul directing and bearing the body as living; the lamp hanging by this silver cord = the body animated by the soul, and dependent on it; the golden oil = the spirit, of which it is said, Prov. xx. 27, that it is a lamp of God." I think that this interpretation of the golden oil commends itself in preference to Zöckler's interpretation, which is adopted by Dächsel, of the precious fluidum of the blood; for if hazzahav is a metaphorical designation of oil, we have to think of it as the material for burning and light; but the principle of bright life in man is the spirit (ruahh khayim or nishmath khayim); and in the passage in Zechariah also, oil, which makes the candlestick give light, is a figure of the spirit (ver. 6, ki im-b'ruhh). But, as one may also suppose, it is not probable that here, with the same genit. connection, הַהַזָּהָב is to be understood of the material and the quality; and hazzahav, on the contrary, of the contents. A golden vessel is, according to its most natural meaning, a vessel which is made of gold, thus a vessel of a precious kind. A golden vessel cannot certainly be broken in pieces, but we need not therefore understand an earthenware vessel only gilded, as by a silver cord is to be understood only that which has a silver line running through it (Gesen. in the Thes.); שָׁרֵף may also denote that which is violently crushed or broken, Isa. xlii. 3; cf. Judg. ix. 53. If gullath hazzahav, however, designates a golden vessel, the reference of the figure to the body, and at the same time of the silver cord to the vital energy or the soul, is then excluded,—for that which animates stands yet above that which is animated,—the two metallic figures in this their distribution cannot be comprehended in this reference. We have thus to ask since gullath hazzahav is not the body itself: What in the human body is compared to a silver cord and to a golden vessel? What, moreover, to a pitcher at the fountain, and to a wheel or a windlass? Winzer settles this question by finding in the two double figures only in general the thoughts represented: antequam vita ex tenui quasi filo suspensa pereat, and (which is essentially the same) antequam machina corporis destruat. Gurlitt also protests against the allegorical explanation of the details, but he cannot refrain from interpreting more specially than Winzer. Two momenta, he says, there are which, when a man dies, in the most impressive way present themselves to view: the extinction of consciousness, and the perfect cessation, complete ruin, of the bodily organism. The extinction of consciousness is figuratively represented by the golden lamp, which is hung up by a silver cord in the midst of a house or tent, and now, since the cord which holds it is broken, it falls down and is shattered to pieces, so that there is at once deep darkness; the destruction of the bodily organism, by a fountain, at which the essential parts of its machinery, the pitcher and windlass, are broken and rendered for ever useless. This interpretation of Gurlitt's affords sufficient support to the expectation of the allegorical meaning with which we approached ver. 6; and we would be satisfied therewith, if one of the figures did not oppose us, without seeking long for a more special allegorical meaning: the pitcher at the fountain or well (בַּיַּר, not הַיַּר, because determined by 'al-hammabu'a) is without doubt the heart which beats to the last breath of the dying man, which is likened to a pitcher which, without intermission, receives and again sends forth the blood. That the blood flows through the body like living water is a fact cognizable and perceptible without the knowledge of its course; fountain (בְּמִקְוֵה) and blood appear also elsewhere as associated ideas, Lev. xii. 7; and nishbar, as here v'tishshaber, used of a pitcher, is a usual scriptural word for the heart brought into a state of death, or near to death, Jer. xxiii. 9; Ps. lxxix. 21. From this gullath hazzahav must also have a special allegorical sense; and if, as Gurlitt supposes, the golden vessel that is about to be destroyed is a figure of the perishing self-consciousness (whereby it is always doubtful that, with this interpretation, the characteristic feature of light in the figure is wanting), then it is natural to go further, and to understand the golden vessel directly of the head of a man, and to compare the breaking of the skull, Judg. ix. 53, expressed by vataritz eth-gulgotto, with the words here before us, vatharutz gullath hazzahav; perhaps by gullath the author thought of the cogn.—both as to root and meaning—גִּלְגֹּלֶת; but, besides, the comparison of the head, the bones of which form an oval bowl, with gullath is of itself also natural. It is true that, according to the ancient view, not the head, but the heart, is the seat of the life of the spirit; "in the heart, Ephrem said (Opp. Syr. ii. 316), the thinking spirit (chuschobo) acts as in its palace;" and the understanding, the Arabians<sup>1</sup> also say, sits in the heart, and thus between the ribs. Everything by which בשר and נפש is affected—thus, briefly formulated, the older bibl. idea—comes in the ל into the light of consciousness. But the Book of Koheleth belongs to a time in which spiritual-psychical actions began to be placed in mediate causal relation with the head; the Book of Daniel represents this newer mode of conception, ii. 28, iv. 2, vii. 10, vii. 15. The image of the monarchies seen in Nebuchadnezzar's dream, ii. 32, 38, had a golden head; the head is described as golden, as it is the membrum praecipuum of the human body; it is compared to gold as to that which is most precious, as, on the other hand, רצף is used as a metaphorical designation of that which is most precious. The breaking to pieces of the head, the death-blow which it receives, shows itself in this, that he who is sick unto death is unable to hold his head erect, that it sinks down against his will according to the law of gravity; as also in this, that the countenance assumes the aspect which we designate the facies hippocratica, and that feeling is gradually destroyed; but, above all, that is thought of which Ovid says of one who was dying: et resupinus humum moribundo vertice pulsat.

If we now further inquire regarding the meaning of the silver cord, nothing can obviously be meant by it which is locally above the golden bowl which would be hanging under it; also גלה הכסף itself certainly admits no such literal antitype,—the concavity of the גולתה is below, and that of a גלה, on the other hand, is above. The silver cord will be found if a component part of the structure of the body is pointed to, which stands in a mutually related connection with the head and the brain, the rending asunder of which brings death with it. Now, as is well known, dying finally always depends on the brain and the upper spinal marrow; and the ancients already interpreted the silver cord of the spinal marrow, which is called by a figure terminologically related to the silver cord, חוט השדרה (the spinal cord), and as a cord-like lengthening of the brain into the spinal channel could not be more appropriately named; the centre is grey, but the external coating is white. We do not, however, maintain that hakkessēph points to the white colour; but the spinal marrow is related, in the matter of its value for the life of man, to the brain as silver is to gold. Since not a violent but a natural death is the subject, the fatal stroke that falls on the spinal marrow is not some kind of mechanical injury, but, according as יִרְחֵק [is unbound] is explained or is changed into יִרְחֵק [is torn asunder], is to be thought of either as constriction = shrinking together, consuming away, exhaustion; or as unchaining = paralysis or disabling; or as tearing asunder = destruction of the connection of the individual parts. The emendation יִרְחֵק most commends itself; it remains, however, possible that יִרְחֵק is meant in the sense of morbid contraction (vid. Rashi); at any rate, the fate of the גֵּלָה is the consequence of the fate of the תִּבְלָה, which carries and holds the gullah, and does not break without at the same time bringing destruction on it; as also the brain and the spinal marrow stand in a relation of solidarity to each other, and the head receives<sup>1</sup> from the spinal marrow (as distinguished from the so-called prolonged marrow) the death-stroke. As the silver cord and the bowl, so the pitcher and the well and the wheel stand in interchangeable relation to each other. We do not say: the wheel at the fountain, as is translated by Hitz., Ewald, and others; for (1) the fountain is called בְּיָאֵר, not בּוֹר (בְּאֵר), which, according to the usage (vid. Hitz. under Jer. vii. 9), signifies a pit, and particularly a hole, for holding water, a cistern, reservoir; but for this there was no need for a wheel, and it is also excluded by that which had to be represented; (2) the expression galgal el-habor is purposely not used, but hagalgal el-habor, that we may not take el-habor as virtual adj. to galgal (the wheel being at the בּוֹר), but as the designation of the place into which the wheel falls when it is shattered. Rightly, the LXX. renders al-hammabu'a by ἐπὶ τῆς πηγῆς, and el-habor by ἐπὶ τὸν λάκκον. The figure of a well (mabbu'a) formed by means of digging, and thus deep, is artistically conceived; out of this the water is drawn by means of a pitcher (כַּד, Gen. xxiv. 14, a word as curiously according with the Greek κάδος as those mentioned in pp. 12 and 74, whence (Arab.) kadd, to exhaust, to pitcher-out, as it were; syn. כַּדָּי, a vessel for drawing out water; Assyr. di-lu, the zodiacal sign of the water-carrier), and to facilitate this there is a wheel or windlass placed above (Syr. gilgla d'vira), by which a rope is wound up and down (vid. Smith's Bibl. Dict. under "well").<sup>2</sup> The Midrash refers to the deep draw-well of the hill town of Sepporis, which was supplied with such rollers serving as a pulley (polyspast). Wheel and pitcher stand in as close mutual relation as air and blood, which come into contact in the lungs. The wheel is the figure of the breathing organ, which expands and contracts (winds and unwinds) itself like a draw-rope by its inhaling and exhaling breath. The throat, as the organ of respiration and speech, is called גִּרְוֹן (Ps. cxv. 7) and גִּרְוֹתוֹ (vid. under Prov. i. 9), from גָּרַר or גִּרַר, to draw, σπᾶν (τὸν ἀέρα, Wisd. vii. 3). When this wheel makes its last laborious revolution, there is heard the death-rattle. There is a peculiar rattling sound, which they who once hear it never forget, when the wheel swings to an end—the so-called choking rheum, which consists in this, that the secretion which the dying cannot cough up moves up and down in the air-passage, and finally chokes him. When thus the breathings become always weaker, and sometimes are interrupted for a minute, and at last cease altogether, there takes place what is here designated as the breaking to pieces of the wheel in the pit within—the life is extinguished, he who has breathed his last will be laid as a corpse in the grave (בּוֹר, Ps. xxviii. 1, and frequently), the σῶμα has become a πτῶμα (Mark vi. 29; cf. Num. xiv. 32). The dust, i.e. the dust of which the body was formed, goes back to the earth again like as it was (originally dust), and the spirit returns to God who gave it. וַיֵּשֶׁב subordinates itself to the 'ad asher lo, also in the form as subjunct.; the interchange of the full and the abbreviated forms occurs, however, elsewhere in the indic. sense, e.g. Job xiii. 27; Ewald, § 343*b*. Shuv 'al occurs also at 2 Chron. xxx. 9; and אָל and עַל interchange without distinction in the more modern language; but here, as also at 6*b*, not without intention, the way downwards is to be distinguished from the way upwards (cf. iii. 21). בָּאֲשֶׁר הָיָה is = כִּשְׁהָיָה, instar ejus quod fuit. The body returns to the dust from which it was taken, Gen. iii. 19, to the dust of its original material, Ps. civ. 29; and the spirit goes back to the God of its origin, to whom it belongs.

We have purposely not interrupted our interpretation of the enigmatical figures of ver. 6 by the citation and criticism of diverging views, and content ourselves here with a specification of the oldest expositions. The interpretation of Shabbath 152*a* does not extend to ver. 6. The Midrash says of the silver cord: זו חוט השדרה: (as later, Rashi, Aben Ezra, and many others), of the golden vessel: זו נלגלה: (as we), and it now adds only more in jest: "the throat which swallows up the gold and lets the silver run through." The pitcher becoming leaky must be ברס, the belly, which three days after death is wont to burst. And as for hagalgal, reference is made to the draw-wells of Sepporis; so for el havor, after Job xxi. 33, to the clods of Tiberias: he lies deep below, "like those clods of the deep-lying Tiberias." The Targ. takes its own way, without following the Midrash, and translates: "before thy tongue [this of הכל] is bound and thou art unable to speak any more, and the brain of thy head [this the גלה] is shattered, and thy gall [= כר] is broken with thy liver [= המכו], and thy body [= הגולל] hastens away [נרץ of נרץ] into the grave." These interpretations have at least historical and linguistic value; they also contain separate correct renderings. A quodlibet of other interpretations<sup>1</sup> is found in my Psychol. p. 229, and in Zöckler, ad loc. A principal error in these consists in this, that they read Koheleth as if he had been a disciple of Boerhaave, and Harvey, and other masters. Wunderbar in his Bibl.-Talm. medicin (1850) takes all in earnest, that the author knew already of the nervous system and the circulation of the blood; for, as he himself says, there is nothing new under the sun. As far as concerns my opinion, says Oetinger in his exposition (Sämmt. Schrift. herausg. von Ehmann, IV. p. 254), I dare not affirm that Solomon had a knowledge systematis nervolympomatici, as also circuli sanguinis, such as learned physicians now possess; yet I believe that the Holy Spirit spake thus through Solomon, that what in subsequent times was discovered as to these matters might be found under these words. This judgment also goes too far; the figure of death which Koheleth presents contains no anticipation of modern discoveries; yet it is not without its value for the historical development of anthropology, for science and poetry combine in it; it is as true to fact as it is poetically beautiful.

The author has now reached the close. His Koheleth-Solomon has made all earthly things small, and at last remains seated on this dust-heap of vanitas vanitatum. The motto-like saying, i. 2, is here repeated as a quod erat demonstrandum, like a summary conclusion. The book, artistically constructed in whole and in its parts, comes to a close, rounding itself off as in a circle in the epiphonema:

Ver. 8. "O vanity of vanities, saith Koheleth, all is vain." If we here look back to ver. 7, that which is there said of the spirit can be no consolation. With right, Hofmann in his Schriftbeweis, I. 490, says: "That it is the personal spirit of a man which returns to God; and that it returns to God without losing its consciousness, is an idea foreign to this proverb." Also, Psychol. p. 410, it is willingly conceded that the author wished here to express, first, only the fact, in itself comfortless, that the component parts of the human body return whence they came. But the comfortless aversive of the proverb is yet not without a consoling reverse. For what the author, iii. 21, represents as an unsettled possibility, that the spirit of a dying man goes not downwards like that of a beast, but upwards, he here affirms as an actual truth.<sup>1</sup> From this, that he thus finally decides the question as an advantage to a man above a beast, it follows of necessity that the return of the spirit to God cannot be thought of as a resumption of the spirit into the essence of God (resorption or remanation), as the cessation of his independent existence, although, as also at Job xxxiv. 14, Ps. civ. 29, the nearest object of the expression is directed to the ruin of the soul-corporeal life of man which directly follows the return of the spirit to God. The same conclusion arises from this, that the idea of the return of the spirit to God, in which the author at last finds rest, cannot yet stand in a subordinate place with reference to the idea of Hades, above which it raises itself; with the latter the spirit remains indestructible, although it has sunk into a silent, inactive life. And in the third place, that conclusion flows from the fact that the author is forced by the present contradiction between human experience and the righteousness of God to the postulate of a judgment finally settling these contradictions, iii. 17, xi. 9, cf. xii. 14, whence it immediately follows that the continued existence of the spirit is thought of as a well-known truth (Psychol. p. 127). The Targ. translates, not against the spirit of the book: "the spirit will return to stand in judgment before God, who gave it to thee." In this connection of thoughts Koheleth says more than what Lucretius says (ii. 998 ss.):

*Cedit item retro, de terra quod fuit ante,
In terras, et quod missum est ex aetheris oris
Id rursus caeli rellatum templa recipient.*

A comforting thought lies in the words אֲשֶׁר נָתַתָּה. The gifts of God are on His side ἀμεταμέλητα (Rom. xi. 29). When He receives back that which was given, He receives it back to restore it again in another manner. Such thoughts connect themselves with the reference to God the Giver. Meanwhile the author next aims at showing the vanity of man, viz. of man as living here. Body and spirit are separated, and depart each in its own direction. Not only the world and the labours by which man is encompassed are "vain," and not only is that which man has and does and experiences "vain," but also man himself as such is vain, and thus—this is the facit—all is רבֵּל, “vain.”

(C.) THE EPILOGUE.—XII. 9–14.

In an unexpected manner there now follows a postscript. Since the book closes with the epiphonema xii. 8 as having reached the intended goal, the supposition that what follows xii. 8 is from another hand is more natural than the contrary. Of the question of genuineness there cannot be here properly anything said, for only that which is not what it professes to be and ought to be, is spurious; the postscript is certainly according to tradition an integral part of the Book of Koheleth (Bullock), but not as an original organic formal part of it, and still less does it expressly bear self-evidence of this. At the least, those who regard Solomon as the author of the book ought to contend against the recognition in xii. 9 ff. of an appendix by a later hand. Hahn, however, regards the same Solomon who speaks in ver. 8 as continuing to speak in ver. 9, for he interprets אָמַר, which, however, only means inquit, as perf., looking back to the completed book, and regards this retrospect as continued in ver. 9 ff., without being hindered by the interchange of the I and of the following historical he, which is contained in “saith Koheleth.” Dale even ventures the assertion, that the Book of Koheleth could have closed with the unsatisfying pure negative, ver. 8, as little as the Gospel of Mark with “and they were afraid” (xvi. 8). As if ver. 13 f. expressed postulates not already contained in the book itself! The epilogue has certainly manifestly the object of recommending the author of the book, Koheleth-Solomon, and of sealing the contents of the book. If Solomon himself were the author, the epilogue would stand in the same relation to the book as John xxi. 24 f. to the fourth Gospel, of the Johannean origin of which a voice from the apostolic church there bears witness.<sup>1</sup>

It is a serious anachronism when modern interpreters of Scripture occupy the standpoint of the old, who take the name of the man after whom the book is entitled, without more ado, as the name of its author from first to last.<sup>2</sup> To what childish puerilities a bigotry so uncritical descends is seen in the case of Christ.

<sup>1</sup> Hoelemann, in Abth. II. of his Bibel-Studien (1860), draws a parallel between these two epilogues; he regards them as original formal parts of the Solomonian Koheleth and of the Johannean Gospel, and seeks to prove that they stand in more than external and accidental relation to the two works respectively.

<sup>2</sup> Thus John Miller, in his Commentary on the Proverbs (New York, 1872), regards Solomon as the author of the entire Book of Proverbs and also of Ecclesi-

Fried. Bauer (1732). In this section, vers. 9-12, he says Solomon turns especially to his son Rehoboam, and delivers to him this Solemn-discourse or sermon as an instruction for his future life. He recommends it [the sermon] at once on account of the author, ver. 9, and of its contents, ver. 10, which accord, ver. 11, with his other writings, and from which altogether Rehoboam could find sufficient information, so that to write to him several books would be unnecessary. After this apostrophe to his son the preacher turns round to the entire auditorio, and addresses them in הִלַּל יְשׁוּעָה. But we are all permitted to hear what is the final aim and intention of this sermon: Fear thou God, and keep His commandments; for such ought every man to be, etc.

A rationalism not less fruitful in wonderful conceits appeared over against this dreamy irrationalism. Döderlein (1784) says of Koheleth: "As it appears, so the author feigned, that this was a lecture or treatise which Solomon delivered before his literary academy; for this academy I am inclined to understand under the name 'Koheleth.'" The epilogue appears to him as an appendage by another hand. Such is the opinion also of J. E. Ch. Schmidt (1794), Bertholdt (in his Einleit. 1812·ff.), Umbreit (1818, 20), and Knobel (1836), who maintain that this appendage is aimless, in form as in doctrine, out of harmony with the book, revealing by the "endless book-making" a more recent time, and thus is an addition by a later author. This negative critical result Grätz (1871) has sought, following Krochmal (in his More nebuche hazeman, 1851, 54), to raise to a positive result. Vers. 9-11 are to him as an apology of the Book of Koheleth, and vers. 12-14 as a clause defining the collection of the Hagiographa, which is completed by the reception into it of the Book of Koheleth; and this bipartite epilogue as an addition belonging to the period of the Synod of Jabneh, about A.D. 90 (vid. above, p. 189).

If, nevertheless, we regard this epilogue as a postscript by the author of the book himself, we have not only Herzfeld on our side, who has given his verdict against all Knobel's arguments, but also Hitzig, who (Hilgenfeld's Zeitsch. 1872, p. 566) has rejected Grätz' Herod-hypothesis, as well as also his introduction of the epilogue into the history of the canon, or, as Geiger (Jüd. Zeitsch. 1872, p. 123) has expressed himself, has dealt with it according to its astes. His interpretation of Scripture proceeds on the fundamental principle, in itself commendable, that the Scripture never expresses trivialities ("each text must be a brilliant"); but it is not to be forgotten that the O. T., in relation to the high school of the New, is in reality a trivium, and that the depth of the words of Scripture is not everywhere the same, but varies according to the author and the times.

merit. Also in Bloch's monograph on the Book of Koheleth (1872) there are many striking arguments against placing the authorship of the book in the Herod-Mishn. period, although the view of this critic, that the book contains notes of Solomon's with interpolations, and an epilogue by the collector, who sought to soften the impression of the gloomy pessimism of these notes, is neither cold nor hot.

We have already (p. 206) shown that the epilogue is written quite in the same style as the book itself; its language is like that of the chronicler; it approaches the idiom of the Mishna, but, with reference to it, is yet somewhat older. That the first part of the epilogue, vers. 9-11, serves an important end, is also proved (p. 206),—it establishes the book as a production of the Chokma, which had Solomon as its pattern; and the second part, vers. 12-14, bears on it the stamp of this Chokma, for it places all the teaching of the book under the double watchword: "Fear God," and "There is a judgment" (Job xxviii. 28, xix. 29; cf. Ecces. v. 6, xi. 9). In the book, Koheleth-Solomon speaks, whose mask the author puts on; here, he speaks, letting the mask fall off, of Koheleth. That in his time (the Persian) too much was done in the way of making books, we may well believe. In addition to authors by profession, there have always been amateurs; the habit of much writing is old, although in the course of time it has always assumed greater dimensions. A complaint in reference to this sounds strange, at least from the mouth of an author who has contented himself with leaving to posterity a work so small, though important. We nowhere encounter any necessity for regarding the author of the book and of the epilogue as different persons. The spirit and tone of the book and of the epilogue are one. The epilogue seals only the distinction between the pessimism of the book and the modern pessimism, which is without God and without a future.

Ver. 9. In connection with ver. 8, where Koheleth has spoken his last word, the author, who has introduced him as speaking hitherto, continues: "And, moreover, because Koheleth was wise, he taught the people knowledge; he applied and searched out and formed many proverbs." The postscript begins with "and" because it is connected with the concluding words of the book—only externally, however; nothing is more unwarrantable than to make ver. 8 the beginning of the postscript on account of the vav. The LXX. translate καὶ περισσὸν (Venet. περιττὸν) ὅτι; as Hitz.: "it remains (to be said) that Koheleth was a wise man," etc.; and Dale may be right, that ויתר is in this sense as subj., pointed with Zakeph gadhol (cf. Gen. xvi. 16, xx. 4, and the obj. thus pointed, Ex. xxiii. 3). But that Koheleth was "a wise man" is nothing remaining to be said, for as such he certainly speaks in the whole book from beginning to end; the עוֹר, unconnected, following, shows that this his property is presupposed as needing no further testimony. But untenable also is the translation: So much the greater Koheleth was as a wise man, so much the more, etc. (Heinem., Südfeld); עוֹר does not signify eo magis; the Heb. language has a different way of expressing such an intensification: כל הגדול מחברו יצרו גדול ממנו, i.e. the higher the position is which one assumes, so much the greater are the temptations to which he is exposed. Rightly, Luther: "This same preacher was not only wise, but," etc. וַיֵּרָא signifies, vii. 11, "and an advance (benefit, gain);" here וַיֵּרָא, "and something going beyond this, that," etc.—thought of as accus.-adv.: "going beyond this, that = moreover, because" (Gesens., Knobel, Vaih., Ginsb., Grätz); vid. above, p. 192. Thus 'od is in order, which introduces that which goes beyond the property and position of a "wise man" as such. That which goes beyond does not consist in this, that he taught the people knowledge, for that is just the meaning of the name Koheleth; the statement which 'od introduces is contained in the concluding member of the compound sentence; the after-word begins with this, that it designates the Koheleth who appears in the more esoteric book before us as חכם, as the very same person who also composed the comprehensive people's book, the Mishle. He has taught the people knowledge; for he has placed, i.e. formed ("stellen," to place, as "Schriftsteller" = author; modern Heb. מְחַבֵּר; Arab. musannif),<sup>1</sup> many proverbs, as the fruit of mature reflection and diligent research. The obj. m'shalim harbeh belongs only to tiggen, which ἀσυνδέτως (according to the style of the epilogue and of the book, as is shown above, p. 207) follows the two preparative mental efforts, whose resultat it was. Rightly, as to the syntax, Zöckler, and, as to the matter, Hitzig: "Apparently the author has here not 1 Kings v. 12, but the canonical Book of Proverbs in his eye." The language is peculiar. Not only is חָקַק exclusively peculiar (vid. above, p. 196) to the Book of Koheleth, but also אָזַן, perpendere (cf. Assy. uzunu, reflection), to consider, and the Pih. חָקַק. Regarding the position of harbeh, vid. above, p. 230.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Harbeh bëchëh, Ezra x. 1, which signifies "making much weeping," makes no exception in favour of the scribe. Cf. hatsne'a lecheth, Mic. vi. 8; haphlë vaphëlë, Isa. xxix. 14.

Ver. 10. It is further said of Koheleth, that he put forth efforts not only to find words of a pleasant form, but, above all, of exact truth: "Koheleth strove to find words of pleasantness, and, written in sincerity, words of truth." The unconnected beginning bigqesh Koheleth is like dibbarti ani, i. 16, etc., in the book itself. Three objects follow limtso. But Hitz. reads the inf. absol. וְכָתוּב instead of וְכָתוּב, and translates: to find pleasing words, and correctly to write words of truth. Such a continuance of the inf. const. by the inf. absol. is possible; 1 Sam. xxv. 26, cf. 31. But why should וְכָתוּב not be the continuance of the finite (Aq., Syr.), as e.g. at viii. 9, and that in the nearest adverbial sense: et scribendo quidem sincere verba veritatis, i.e. he strove, according to his best knowledge and conscience, to write true words, at the same time also to find out pleasing words; thus sought to connect truth as to the matter with beauty as to the manner? V'chathuv needs no modification in its form. But it is not to be translated: and that which was right was written by him; for the ellipsis is inadmissible, and כָּתוּב כֵּן is not correct Heb. Rightly the LXX., καὶ γεγραμμένον εὐθύτητος. כָּתוּב signifies "written," and may also, as the name of the Hagiographa כְּתוּבִים shows, signify "a writing;" kakathuvah, 2 Chron. xxx. 5, is = "in accordance with the writing;" and b'lo kakathuv, 2 Chron. xxx. 18, "contrary to the writing;" in the post-bibl. the phrase הַכָּתוּב אִמַּר = ἡ γραφή λέγει, is used. The objection made by Ginsburg, that kathuv never means, as k'thav does, "a writing," is thus nugatory. However, we do not at all here need this subst. meaning, וְכָתוּב is neut. particip., and וְכָתוּב certainly not the genit., as the LXX. renders (reading וְכָתוּב), but also not the nom. of the subj. (Hoelem.), but, since וְכָתוּב is the designation of a mode of thought and of a relation, the accus. of manner, like v'yashar, Ps. cxix. 18; emeth, Ps. cxxxii. 11; emunah, Ps. cxix. 75. Regarding the common use of such an accus. of the nearer definition in the passive part., vid. Ewald, § 284c. The asyndeton v'chathuv yosher divre emeth is like that at x. 1, mehhochmah michvod. That which follows limtso we interpret as its threefold object. Thus it is said that Koheleth directed his effort towards an attractive form (cf. avne-hephets, Isa. liv. 12); but, before all, towards the truth, both subjectively (וְכָתוּב) and objectively (אִמַּר), of that which was formulated and expressed in writing.

Ver. 11. From the words of Koheleth the author comes to the words of the wise man in general; so that what he says of the latter finds its application to himself and his book: "Words of the wise are as like goads, and like fastened nails which are put together in collections—they are given by one shepherd.” The LXX., Aq., and Theod. translate darvonoth by βούκεντρα, the Venet. by βουπληγες; and that is also correct. The word is one of three found in the Jerus. Gemara, Sanhedrin x. 1, to designate a rod for driving (oxen)—רִבֵּן (from רָבַב, to sharpen, to point), מְלִיךָ (from לָמַד, to adjust, teach, exercise), and פְּרִיעַ (from רָעַע, to hold back, repellere); we read ka-dār'vonoth; Gesen., Ewald, Hitz., and others are in error in reading dorvonoth; for the so-called light Metheg, which under certain circumstances can be changed into an accent, and the Kametz chatuph exclude one another.<sup>1</sup> If רִבֵּן is the goad, the point of comparison is that which is to be excited intellectually and morally. Incorrectly, Gesen., Hitz., and others: like goads, because easily and deeply impressing themselves on the heart as well as on the memory. For goads, aculei, the Hebrews use the word קוֹצִים; dar'vonoth also are goads, but designed for driving on, thus stimuli (Jerome); and is there a more natural commendation for the proverbs of the wise men than that they incite to self-reflection, and urge to all kinds of noble effort? Divre and dar'vonoth have the same three commencing consonants, and, both for the ear and the eye, form a paronomasia. In the following comparison, it is a question whether ba'ale asuppoth (plur. of ba'al asuppoth, or of the double plur. ba'al asuppah, like e.g. sare missim, Ex. i. 11, of sar mas) is meant of persons, like ba'al hallashon, x. 11, cf. ba'al k'naphayim, x. 20, or of things, as ba'al piphiyoth, Isa. xli. 15; and thus, whether it is a designation parallel to הַכְּמִים or to דְּבָרֵי. The Talm. Jer. Sanhedrin x. 1, wavers, for there it is referred first to the members of assemblies (viz. of the Sanedrion), and then is explained by “words which are spoken in the assembly.” If we understand it of persons, as it was actually used in the Talm. (vid. above, p. 191), then by asuppoth we must understand the societies of wise men, and by ba'ale asuppoth, of the academicians (Venet.: δεσπόται ξυναγαμάτων; Luther: “masters of assemblies”) belonging to such academies. But an appropriate meaning of this second comparison is not to be reached in this way. For if we translate: and as nails driven in are the members of the society, it is not easy to see what this wonderful comparison means; and what is then further said: they are given from one shepherd, reminds us indeed of Eph. iv. 11, but, as said of this perfectly unknown great one, is for us incomprehensible. Or if we translate, after Isa. xxviii. 1: and (the words of the wise are) like the fastened nails of the members of the society, it is as tautological as if I should say: words of wise men are like fastened nails of wise men bound together in a society (as a confederacy, union). Quite impossible are the translations: like nails driven in by the masters of assemblies (thus e.g. Lightfoot, and recently Bullock), for the accus. with the pass. particip. may express some nearer definition, but not (as of the genit.) the effective cause; and: like a nail driven in are the (words) of the masters of assemblies (Tyler: "those of editors of collections"), for ellipt. genit., dependent on a governing word carrying forward its influence, are indeed possible, e.g. Isa. lxi. 7, but that a governing word itself, as ba'ale, may be the governed genit. of one omitted, as here divre, is without example.<sup>1</sup> It is also inconsistent to understand ba'ale asuppoth after the analogy of ba'ale masoreth (the Masoretes) and the like. It will not be meant of the persons of the wise, but of the proverbs of the wise. So far we agree with Lang and Hoelem. Lang (1874) thinks to come to a right understanding of the "much abused" expression by translating, "lords of troops,"—a designation of proverbs which, being by many acknowledged and kept in remembrance, possess a kind of lordship over men's minds; but that is already inadmissible, because asuppoth designates not any multitude of men, but associations with a definite end and aim. Hoelem. is content with this idea; for he connects together "planted as leaders of assemblies," and finds therein the thought, that the words of the wise serve as seeds and as guiding lights for the expositions in the congregation; but ba'ale denotes masters, not in the sense of leaders, but of possessors; and as ba'ale b'rith, Gen. xiv. 13, signifies "the confederated," ba'ale sh'vu'ah, Neh. vi. 18, "the sworn," and the frequently occurring ba'ale ha'ir, "the citizens;" so ba'ale asuppoth means, the possessors of assemblies and of the assembled themselves, or the possessors of collections and of the things collected. Thus ba'ale asuppoth will be a designation of the "words of the wise" (as in shalishim, choice men = choice proverbs, Prov. xxii. 20, in a certain measure personified), as of those which form or constitute collections, and which stand together in order and rank (Hitz., Ewald, Elst., Zöckl., and others). Of such it may properly be said, that they are like nails driven in, for they are secured against separation,—they are, so to speak, made nail-fast, they stand on one common ground; and their being fixed in such connection not only is a help to the memory, but also to the understanding of them. The Book of Koheleth itself is such an asuppah; for it contains a multitude of separate proverbs, which are thoughtfully ranged together, and are introduced into the severe, critical sermon on the nothingness of all earthly things as oases affording rest and refreshment; as similarly, in the later Talmudic literature, Haggadic parts follow long stretches of hair-splitting dialectics, and afford to the reader an agreeable repose.

<sup>1</sup> The Kametz is the Kametz gadhol (opp. Kametz chatuph), and may for this reason have the accent Munach instead of Metheg. Vid. Michlol 153b, 182b. The case is the same as at Gen. xxxix. 34, where mimmachōrāth is to be read. Cf. Baer's Metheg-Setz. § 27 and § 18.

And when he says of the "proverbs of the wise," individually and as formed into collections: נְתַתֵּנוּ מִרְעֵה אֶחָד, i.e. they are the gift of one shepherd, he gives it to be understood that his "words of Koheleth," if not immediately written by Solomon himself, have yet one fountain with the Solomonic Book of Proverbs,—God, the one God, who guides and cares as a shepherd for all who fear Him, and suffers them to want nothing which is necessary to their spiritual support and advancement (Ps. xxiii. 1, xxviii. 9). "Mero'eh ehad," says Grätz, "is yet obscure, since it seldom, and that only poetically, designates the Shepherd of Israel. It cannot certainly refer to Moses." Not to Moses, it is true (Targ.), nor to Solomon, as the father, the pattern, and, as it were, the patron of "the wise," but to God, who is here named the ἀρχαιοφυτν as spiritual preserver (provider), not without reference to the figure of a shepherd from the goad, and the figure of household economy from the nails; for רעה, in the language of the Chokma (Prov. v. 21), is in meaning cogn. to the N. T. conception of edification.<sup>1</sup> Regarding masm<sup>e</sup>roth (iron nails), vid. above, p. 193; the word is not used of tent spikes (Spohn, Ginsb.),—it is masc., the sing. is מִסְמָר (מִסְמָר), Arab. mismār. מְרֵעִים is = מְרֵעִים (cf. Dan. xi. 45 with Gen. xxxi. 25), post-bibl. (vid. Jer. Sanhedrin) קְבִיעִים (Jerome, in altum defixi). Min with the pass., as at Job xxi. 1, xxviii. 4, Ps. xxxvii. 23 (Ewald, § 295*b*), is not synonymous with the Greek ἰπό (vid. above, p. 67). The LXX. well: "given by those of the counsel from one shepherd." Hitzig reads מִרְעֵה, and accordingly translates: "which are given united as a pasture," but in mēro'eh ehad there lies a significant apologetic hint in favour of the collection of proverbs by the younger Solomon (Koheleth) in relation to that of the old. This is the point of the verse, and it is broken off by Hitzig's conjecture.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>2</sup> J. F. Reimann, in the preface to his Introduction to the Historia Litterarum antediluviana, translates, ver. 11: "The words of the wise are like hewn-out marble, and the beautiful collectanea like set diamonds, which are presented by a good friend." A Disputatio philologica by Abr. Wolf, Königsberg 1728, contends against this καρσιμυρία.

Ver. 12. With v'yother mehemmah the postscript takes a new departure, warning against too much reading, and finally pointing once more to the one thing needful: "And besides, my son, be warned: for there is no end of much book-making; and much study is a weariness of the body." With "my son," the teacher of wisdom here, as in the Book of Proverbs, addresses the disciple who places himself under his instruction. Hitzig translates, construing mehemmah with hizzaher: "And for the rest: by these (the 'words of Koheleth,' ver. 10) be informed." But (1)  $\text{נִיְהִי}$ , according to usage, does not signify in general to be taught, but to be made wiser, warned; particularly the imper.  $\text{הִיְהִי}$  is cogn. with  $\text{הִשְׁמַר}$  (cf. Targ. Jer. Ex. x. 28,  $\text{אֲזַיְהִר לְךָ} = \text{הִשְׁמַר לְךָ}$ ), and in fact an object of the warning follows; (2) min after yother is naturally to be regarded as connected with it, and not with hizzaher (cf. Esth. vi. 6, Sota vii. 7; cf. Ps. xix. 12). The punctuation of v'yother and mehemmah is thus not to be interfered with. Either hemmah points back to divre (ver. 11): And as to what goes beyond these (in relation thereto) be warned (Schelling: quidquid ultra haec est, ab iis cave tibi, and thus e.g. Oehler in Herzog's R. E. vii. 248); or, which is more probable, since the divre are without a fixed beginning, and the difference between true and false "wise men" is not here expressed, hemmah refers back to all that has hitherto been said, and v'yother mehemmah signifies not the result thereof (Ewald, § 285e), but that which remains thereafter: and what is more than that (which has hitherto been said), i.e. what remains to be said after that hitherto said; Lat. et quod superest, quod reliquum est.

In 12b, Hitzig also proposes a different interpunction from that which lies before us; but at the same time, in the place of the significant double sentence, he proposes a simple sentence: "to make many books, without end, and much exertion of mind (in making these), is a weariness of the body." The author thus gives the reason for his writing no more. But with xii. 8 he has certainly brought his theme to a close, and he writes no further; because he does not write for hire and without an aim, but for a high end, according to a fixed plan; and whether he will leave off with this his book or not is a matter of perfect indifference to the readers of this one book; and that the writing of many books without end will exhaust a man's mind and bring down his body, is not that a flat truism? We rather prefer Herzfeld's translation, which harmonizes with Rashbam's: "But more than these (the wise men) can teach thee, my son, teach thyself: to make many books there would be no end; and much preaching is fatiguing to the body." But  $\text{נִוְהַר}$  cannot mean to “teach oneself,” and en qetz does not mean non esset finis, but non est finis; and for lahach the meaning “to preach” (which Luther also gives to it) is not at all shown from the Arab. lahjat, which signifies the tongue as that which is eager (to learn, etc.), and then also occurs as a choice name for tongues in general. Thus the idea of a double sentence, which is the most natural, is maintained, as the LXX. has already rendered it. The n. actionis  $\text{נִיזְוֶי}$  with its object is the subject of the sentence, of which it is said en qets, it is without end; Hitzig’s opinion, that en lach qetz must mean non est ei finis, is not justified; for en qets is a virtual adj., as en ’avel, Deut. xxxiii. 4, and the like, and as such the pred. of the substantival sentence. Regarding  $\text{נִיזְוֶי}$ , avidum discendi legendique studium, vid. above, p. 193. C. A. Bode (1777) renders well: polygraphiae nullus est finis et polymathia corpus delessat. Against this endless making of books and much study the postscript warns, for it says that this exhausts the bodily strength without (for this is the reverse side of the judgment) truly furthering the mind, which rather becomes decentralized by this  $\text{πολυπραγμοσύνη}$ . The meaning of the warning accords with the phrase coined by Pliny (Ep. vii. 9), multum non multa. One ought to hold by the “words of the wise,” to which also the “words of Koheleth,” comprehended in the asuppah of the book before us, belong; for all that one can learn by hearing or by reading amounts at last, if we deduct all that is unessential and unenduring, to a unum necessarium:

Ver. 13. “The final result, after all is learned, (is this): Fear God and keep His commandments; for this is the end of every man.” Many expositors, as Jerome, the Venet., and Luther, render  $\text{נִיזְוֶי}$  as fut.: The conclusion of the discourse we would all hear (Salomon); or: The conclusion of the whole discourse or matter let us hear (Panzer, 1773, de Wette-Augusti); Hitzig also takes together soph davar hakol = soph davar kol-haddavar: The end of the whole discourse let us hear. But  $\text{לְהִשְׁמָע}$  for  $\text{נִיזְוֶי}$  is contrary to the style of the book; and as a general rule, the author uses  $\text{לְהִשְׁמָע}$  for the most part of things, seldom of persons. And also soph davar hakol, which it would be better to explain (“the final word of the whole”), with Ewald, § 291a, after y<sup>m</sup>mē-olam mosheh, Isa. lxiii. 11 (cf. Proverbs, vol. II. p. 267, note), than it is explained by Hitzig, although, in spite of Philippi’s (Stat. const. p. 17) doubt, possible in point of style, and also exemplified in the later period of the language (1 Chron. ix. 13), is yet a stylistic crudeness which the author could have avoided either by writing soph davar hakol, or better, soph kol-haddavar.  $\text{נִיזְוֶי}$ , Ewald, § 168b, renders as a particip. by audiendum; but that also does not commend itself, for  $\text{שְׂמַע}$  signifies nothing else than auditum, and acquires the meaning of audiendum when from the empirical matter of fact that which is inwardly necessary is concluded; the translation: The final word of the whole is to be heard, audiendum est, would only be admissible if also the translation auditum est were possible, which is not the case. Is  $\text{שְׂמַע}$  thus possibly the pausal form of the finite  $\text{שָׁמַע}$ ? We might explain: The end of the matter (summa summarum), all is heard, when, viz., that which follows is heard, which comprehends all that is to be known. Or as Hoem. : Enough, all is heard, since, viz., that which is given in the book to be learned contains the essence of all true knowledge, viz., the following two fundamental doctrines. This retrospective reference of hakol nishm'a is more natural than the prospective reference; but, on the other hand, it is also more probable that soph davar denotes the final resultat than that it denotes the conclusion of the discourse. The right explanation will be that which combines the retrospective reference of hakol nishm'a and the resultative reference of soph davar. Accordingly, Mendelss. appears to us to be correct when he explains: After thou hast heard all the words of the wise . . . this is the final result, etc. Finis (summa) rei, omnia audita is = omnibus auditis, for the sentence denoting the conditions remains externally undesignated, in the same way as at x. 14; Deut. xxi. 1; Ezra x. 6 (Ewald, § 341b). After the clause, soph . . . nishm'a, Athnach stands where we put a colon: the mediating hocce est is omitted just as at vii. 12b (where translate: yet the preference of knowledge is this, that, etc.).

The sentence, eth-haelohim y'ra ("fear God"), repeating itself from v. 6, is the kernel and the star of the whole book, the highest moral demand which mitigates its pessimism and hallows its eudaemonism. The admonition proceeding therefrom, "and keep His commandments," is included in bishm'o'a, iv. 17 [v. 1], which places the hearing of the divine word, viz. a hearing for the purpose of observing, as the very soul of the worship of God above all the opus operatum of ceremonial services.

The connection of the clause, ki-zeh kol-haadam, Hitzig mediates in an unnecessary, roundabout way: "but not thou alone, but this ought every man." But why this negative here introduced to stamp  $\text{כִּי}$  as an immo establishing it? It is also certainly suitable as the immediate confirmation of the rectitude of the double admonition finally expressing all. The clause has the form of a simple judgment, it is a substantival clause, the briefest expression for the thought which is intended. What is that thought? The LXX.

renders: ὅτι τοῦτο πᾶς ὁ ἄνθρωπος; also Symm. and the Venet. render kol haadam by πᾶς ὁ ἄνθρ., and an unnamed translator has δλος ὁ ἄνθρ., according to which also the translation of Jerome is to be understood, hoc est enim omnis homo. Thus among the moderns, Herzf., Ewald, Elst., and Heiligst.: for that is the whole man, viz. as to his destiny, the end of his existence (cf. as to the subject-matter, Job xxviii. 28); and v. Hofmann (Schriftbew. II. 2, p. 456): this is the whole of man, viz. as Grotius explains: totum hominis bonum; or as Dale and Bullock: "the whole duty of man;" or as Tyler: "the universal law (ל, like the Mishnic לך) of man;" or as Hoelem.: that which gives to man for the first time his true and full worth. Knobel also suggests for consideration this rendering: this is the all of man, i.e. on this all with man rests. But against this there is the one fact, that kol-haadam never signifies the whole man, and as little anywhere the whole (the all) of a man. It signifies either "all men" (πάντες οἱ ἄνθρωποι, οἱ πᾶ. ἄνθρ. οἱ ἄνθρ. πᾶ.), as at vii. 2, hu soph kol-haadam, or, of the same meaning as kol-haadam, "every man" (πᾶς ἄνθρωπος), as at iii. 13, v. 18 (LXX., also vii. 2: τοῦτο τέλος παντὸς ἀνθρώπου); and it is yet more than improbable that the common expression, instead of which haadam kullo was available, should here have been used in a sense elsewhere unexampled. Continuing in the track of the usus loq., and particularly of the style of the author, we shall thus have to translate: "for this is every man." If we use for it: "for this is every man's," the clause becomes at once distinct; Zirkel renders kol-haadam as genit., and reckons the expression among the Græcisms of the book: παντὸς ἀνθρώπου, viz. πρᾶγμα. Or if, with Knobel, Hitz., Böttch., and Ginsburg, we might borrow a verb to supplement the preceding imperat.: "for this ought every man to do," we should also in this way gain the meaning to be expected; but the clause lying before us is certainly a substantival clause, like meh haadam, ii. 12, not an elliptical verbal clause, like Isa. xxiii. 5, xxvi. 9, where the verb to be supplied easily unfolds itself from the ל of the end of the movement.

We have here a case which is frequent in the Semitic languages, in which subj. and pred. are connected in the form of a simple judgment, and it is left for the hearer to find out the relation sustained by the pred. to the subj.—e.g. Ps. cx. 3, cix. 4, "I am prayer;" and in the Book of Koheleth, iii. 19, "the children of men are a chance."<sup>1</sup> In the same way we have here to explain: for that is every man, viz. according to his destiny and duty; excellently, Luther: for that belongs to all men. With right, Hahn, like Bauer (1732), regards the pronoun as pred. (not subj. as at vii. 2): "this, i.e. thus constituted, that they must do this, are all men," or rather: this = under obligation thereto, is every man.<sup>1</sup> It is a great thought that is thereby expressed, viz. the reduction of the Israelitish law to its common human essence. This has not escaped the old Jewish teachers. What can this mean: zeh kol-haadam? it is asked, Berachoth 6b; and R. Elazar answers: "The whole world is comprehended therein;" and R. Abba bar-Cahana: "This fundamental law is of the same importance to the universe;" and R. Simeon b. Azzai: "The universe has been created only for the purpose of being commanded this."<sup>2</sup>

Ver. 14. As we render zeh kol-haadam as expressive of the same obligation lying on all men without exception, this verse appropriately follows: "For God shall bring every work into the judgment upon all that is concealed, whether it be good or bad." To bring into judgment is, as at xi. 9 = to bring to an account. There the punctuation is בְּמִשְׁפָּט, here בְּמִשְׁפָּט, as, according to rule, the art. is omitted where the idea is determined by a relative clause or an added description; for b'mishpat 'al kol-ne'llam are taken together: in the judgment upon all that is concealed (cf. Rom. ii. 16; 1 Cor. iv. 5, τὰ κρυπτά). Hitzig, however, punctuates here בְּמִשְׁפָּט, and explains עַל as of the same meaning as the distributive ל, e.g. Gen. ix. 5, 10; but in this sense עַל never interchanges with ל. And wherefore this subtlety? The judgment upon all that is concealed is a judgment from the cognition of which nothing, not even the most secret, can escape; and that עַל מִשְׁפָּט is not a Germanism, is shown from xi. 9; to execute judgment on (Germ. an) any one is expressed by ב, Ps. cxix. 84, Wisd. vi. 6; judgment upon (über) any one may be expressed by the genit. of him whom it concerns, Jer. li. 9; but judgment upon anything (Symm. περὶ παντὸς παροπαθέντος) cannot otherwise be expressed than by עַל. Rather עַל may be rendered as a connecting particle: "together with all that is concealed" (Vaih., Hahn); but כָּל-מַעֲשֵׂה certainly comprehends all, and with כָּל-יְשׁוּלָם

<sup>2</sup> Cf. Jer. Nedarim ix. 3: "Thou oughtest to love thy neighbour as thyself," says R. Akiba, is a principal sentence in the Law. Ben-Azzai says: "The words zeh . . . adam (Gen. v. 1) are it in a yet higher degree," because therein the oneness of the origin and the destiny of all men is contained. Aben Ezra alludes to the same thing, when at the close of his Comm. he remarks: "The secret of the non-use of the divine name יהוה in Gen. i.-ii. 3 is the secret of the Book of Koheleth."

this comprehensive idea is only deepened. The accent dividing the verse stands rightly under  $\text{בְּיָמָיו}$ ; <sup>1</sup> for sive bonum sive malum (as at v. 11) is not related to ne'llam as disjoining, but to kol-ma'aseh.

This certainty of a final judgment of personal character is the Ariadne-thread by which Koheleth at last brings himself safely out of the labyrinth of his scepticism. The prospect of a general judgment upon the nations prevailing in the O. T., cannot sufficiently set at rest the faith (vid. e.g. Ps. lxxiii., Jer. xii. 1–3) which is tried by the unequal distributions of present destiny. Certainly the natural, and particularly the national connection in which men stand to one another, is not without an influence on their moral condition; but this influence does not remove accountability,—the individuum is at the same time a person; the object of the final judgment will not be societies as such, but only persons, although not without regard to their circle of life. This personal view of the final judgment does not yet in the O. T. receive a preponderance over the national view; such figures of an universal and individualizing personal judgment as Matt. vii. 21–23, Rev. xx. 12, are nowhere found in it; the object of the final judgment are nations, kingdoms, cities, and conditions of men. But here, with Koheleth, a beginning is made in the direction of regarding the final judgment as the final judgment of men, and as lying in the future, beyond the present time. What Job xix. 25–27 postulates in the absence of a present judgment of his cause, and the Apocalyptic Dan. xii. 2 saw as a dualistic issue of the history of his people, comes out here for the first time in the form of doctrine into that universally-human expression which is continued in the announcements of Jesus and the apostles. Kleinert sees here the morning-dawn of a new revelation breaking forth; and Himpel says, in view of this conclusion, that Koheleth is a precious link in the chain of the preparation for the gospel; and rightly. In the Book of Koheleth the O. T. religion sings its funeral song, but not without finally breaking the ban of nationality and of bondage to this present life, which made it unable to solve the mysteries of life, and thus not without prophesying its resurrection in an expanded glorified form as the religion of humanity.

<sup>1</sup> Thus rightly pointed in F. with Dagesh in lamed, to make distinct the y as quiescent (cf. 1 Kings x. 3; and, on the other hand, Neh. iii. 11, Ps. xxvi. 4). Cf.  $\text{וְהָיָה}$  with Dagesh in shin, on account of the preceding quiescent guttural, like  $\text{וְהָיָה}$ , ix. 8;  $\text{וְהָיָה}$ , I. ev. xi. 16;  $\text{וְהָיָה}$  Num. i. 7, etc.; cf. Luth. Zeitsch. 1863, p. 413.

The synagogal lesson repeats the 13th verse after the 14th, to gain thereby a conclusion of a pleasing sound. The Masoretic Siman (vox memorialis) of those four books, in which, after the last verse, on account of its severe contents, the verse going before is repeated in reading, is ית"קק. The י refers to ישעיה (Isaiah), ת to תריסר (the Book of the Twelve Prophets), the first ק to קהלה, the second ק to קינות (Lamentations). The Lamentations and Koheleth always stand together. But there are two different arrangements of the five Megilloth, viz. that of the calendar of festivals which has passed into our printed editions: the Song, Ruth, Lamentations, Koheleth, and Esther (vid. above, p. 3); and the Masoretic arrangement, according to the history of their origin: Ruth, the Song, Koheleth, Lamentations, and Esther.

THE END.

Grimm's Wilke's Clavis Novi Testamenti.

TRANSLATED, REVISED, AND ENLARGED

By JOSEPH HENRY THAYER, D.D.,

BUSSEY PROFESSOR OF NEW TESTAMENT CRITICISM AND INTERPRETATION IN THE DIVINITY SCHOOL OF HARVARD UNIVERSITY.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

TOWARDS the close of the year 1862, the "Arnoldische Buchhandlung" in Leipzig published the First Part of a Greek-Latin Lexicon of the New Testament, prepared, upon the basis of the "Clavis Novi Testamenti Philologica" of C. G. Wilke (second edition, 2 vols. 1851), by Professor C. L. WILIBALD GRIMM of Jena. In his Prospectus, Professor Grimm announced it as his purpose not only (in accordance with the improvements in classical lexicography embodied in the Paris edition of Stephen's Thesaurus and in the fifth edition of Passow's Dictionary edited by Rost and his coadjutors) to exhibit the historical growth of a word's significations, and accordingly in selecting his vouchers for New Testament usage to show at what time and in what class of writers a given word became current, but also duly to notice the usage of the Septuagint and of the Old Testament Apocrypha, and especially to produce a Lexicon which should correspond to the present condition of textual criticism, of exegesis, and of biblical theology. He devoted more than seven years to his task. The successive Parts of his work received, as they appeared, the outspoken commendation of scholars diverging as widely in their views as Hupfeld and Hengstenberg; and since its completion in 1868 it has been generally acknowledged to be by far the best Lexicon of the New Testament extant.

'I regard it as a work of the greatest importance. . . . It seems to me a work showing the most patient diligence, and the most carefully arranged collection of useful and helpful references.'—THE BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL.

'The best New Testament Greek Lexicon. . . . It is a treasury of the results of exact scholarship.'—BISHOP WESTCOTT.

'An excellent book, the value of which for English students will, I feel sure, be best appreciated by those who use it most carefully.'—Professor F. J. A. HORT, D.D.

'This work has been eagerly looked for. . . . The result is an excellent book, which I do not doubt will be the best in the field for many years to come.'—Professor W. SANDAY, D.D., in The Academy.

'This is indeed a noble volume, and satisfies in these days of advancing scholarship a very great want. It is certainly unequalled in its lexicography, and invaluable in its literary perfectness. . . . It should, will, must make for itself a place in the library of all those students who want to be thoroughly furnished for the work of understanding, expounding, and applying the Word of God.'—Evangelical Magazine.

'Undoubtedly the best of its kind. Beautifully printed and well translated, with some corrections and improvements of the original, it will be prized by students of the Christian Scriptures.'—Athenæum.

'It should be obtained even at the sacrifice of many volumes of sermons and homiletical aids. There is nothing so intellectually remunerative in ministerial life as foundation work of this kind. Without it no ministry can be solid and strong, nor can its results be profound and abiding. Rarely have Messrs. Clark laid our British Churches under deeper obligations than they have done by the issue of this noble and scholarly work.'—Baptist Magazine.

THE REDEMPTION OF MAN. DISCUSSIONS BEARING ON THE ATONEMENT.

By D. W. SIMON, D.D.,

PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY, CONGREGATIONAL THEOLOGICAL HALL, EDINBURGH; AUTHOR OF 'THE BIBLE, AN OUTGROWTH OF THEOCRATIC LIFE.'

CONTENTS:—Introduction. CHAP. I. The Atonement and the Kingdom of God. II. The Constitution of Humanity. III. Relations of Man to God. IV. Hebrew Sin-Offerings, with Ethnic Parallels. V. The Anger of God. VI. Forgiveness of Sin. VII. Passio Christi. VIII. The Passion of Christ and the Passion of Man. IX. The Atonement and Prayer: an 'Argumentum ad Hominem.' X. The Historical Influence of the Death of Christ.

PRINCIPAL FAIRBAIRN, Mansfield College, writes—'I wish to say how stimulating and helpful I have found your book. Its criticism is constructive as well as incisive, while its point of view is elevated and commanding. It made me feel quite vividly how superficial most of the recent discussions on the Atonement have been.'

'A thoughtful, able, and learned discussion. . . . The author is full of his subject, and handles the literature of it with the facility which comes of sound and laborious application of his mind to it. There is no student of theology who would not be benefited by a careful and respectful study of this volume.'—Literary Churchman.

'A book of interest and importance. . . . Dr. Simon throws his heart into his work, and his book is warmed throughout by deep feeling. . . . It is elaborated by Dr. Simon with singular power. Oxford undergraduates, reading for the theological school, will find themselves unable to neglect this work.'—Saturday Review.

'Dr. Simon has produced a series of discussions of great value, vigorous, comprehensive in their grasp, philosophical in tone, and rich in theological scholarship. It is lucidly written, and is full of suggestive force.'—Baptist Magazine.

THE HEREAFTER :

SHEOL, HADES, AND HELL, THE WORLD TO COME, AND THE SCRIPTURE DOCTRINE OF RETRIBUTION ACCORDING TO LAW.

By JAMES FYFE.

'Mr. Fyfe's book seems to us quite a model of analytical study of Scripture teaching, alike in its thoroughness and in the calm temperate way in which the results are given. . . . Once more we emphatically commend the work to all who wish to know what Scripture teaches on this most momentous subject.'—Methodist Times.

'A valuable contribution to the literature of the subject, and one that should be read by all who wish to form just and valid views of it.'—Baptist Magazine.

'His careful, judicious examination of his material is much to be commended. . . . Much interesting light is thrown upon the whole subject in this volume.'—Ecclesiastical Gazette.

A HISTORY OF GERMAN THEOLOGY IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

By F. LICHTENBERGER, D.D.,

DEAN OF THE FACULTY OF PROTESTANT THEOLOGY OF PARIS.

Revised and brought up to date, with important additions specially prepared for the English Edition by the Author.

TRANSLATED BY W. HASTIE, B.D.,

EXAMINER IN THEOLOGY, UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH.

'The theological student, as well as the general reader who is confined to the knowledge of German theology as it is exhibited in the English language, unquestionably requires at the present moment skilled historical guidance, with careful literary and critical orientation, through the dense and tangled growths of the German theology of the century. The present work is offered as specially adapted to meet this want. It may be confidently claimed for it that it is reliable and intelligible throughout, and a safe and easy guide to the theological student as well as to the general reader through the subject. It is the work of a singularly gifted and qualified scholar, who has brought the fullest knowledge and the most patient industry to his task. Grounded not only upon a conscientious study of the sources of the subject, but upon faithful reference to all that has been lately written worth reading upon it, it is pervaded at the same time by a living sympathy for all that is highest and most enduring in modern theological thought, and its representations and judgments are restrained and guided by an independent critical faculty and an earnest regard for practical Christian truth. It is written not only with the full mastery of a matured and vigorous mind, but with the easy grace, the penetrating insight, the keen discrimination, the luminous characterizations, and the clear style of the accomplished French writer.'—Extract from the Translator's Preface.

'As to the importance of an accurate and comprehensive history of German theology, diversity of opinion is impossible. . . . We welcome this work as an indispensable aid to the theological student, as a valuable repertory of historical information, and a series of luminous and effective criticisms. Its learning, its calm judicial tone, its fine insight, and its lucidity and candour impart to it quite exceptional worth.'—Baptist Magazine.

'Messrs. Clark have seldom or never done a more reasonable, useful, or welcome thing than to publish a translation of Lichtenberger's critical survey of the grand movement of German thought in the province of theology during the last hundred years.'—Christian World.

'Such a work speaks for itself. Packed full of information, interesting in style, it will long remain a guide to the complexities of German theology.'—Methodist Times.

'The best and most complete work as yet published on the divines of the present century.'—Church Bells.

THE KINGDOM OF GOD;

OR,

CHRIST'S TEACHING ACCORDING TO THE SYNOPTICAL GOSPELS.

By A. B. BRUCE, D.D.,

PROFESSOR OF NEW TESTAMENT EXEGESIS IN THE FREE CHURCH COLLEGE, GLASGOW.

CONTENTS:—Critical Introduction.—CHAP. I. Christ's Idea of the Kingdom.—II. Christ's Attitude towards the Mosaic Law.—III. The Conditions of Entrance.—IV. Christ's Doctrine of God.—V. Christ's Doctrine of Man.—VI. The Relation of Jesus to Messianic Hopes and Functions.—VII. The Son of Man and the Son of God.—VIII. The Righteousness of the Kingdom—Negative Aspect.—IX. The Righteousness of the Kingdom—Positive Aspect.—X. The Death of Jesus and its Significance.—XI. The Kingdom and the Church.—XII. The Parousia and the Christian Era.—XIII. The History of the Kingdom in Outline.—XIV. The End.—XV. The Christianity of Christ.—Index.

'To Dr. Bruce belongs the honour of giving to English-speaking Christians the first really scientific treatment of this transcendent theme . . . his book is the best monograph on the subject in existence. . . . He is evidently in love with his subject, and every page exhibits the intense enthusiasm of a strong nature for the Divine Teacher.'—Rev. JAMES STALKER, D.D., in The British Weekly.

'The astonishing vigour and the unflinching insight which characterize the book mark a new era in biblical theology. In fact, as in all Dr. Bruce's writings, so here we find ourselves in the company of one whose earnest faith in the matter of the Gospel narratives prevents him from treating the doctrine of Christ merely in a scholastic style, or as an interesting subject for theory and speculation.'—Professor MARCUS DODS, D.D., in The Theological Review.

'A remarkable book.'—Saturday Review.

THE TRAINING OF THE TWELVE;

OR, EXPOSITION OF PASSAGES IN THE GOSPELS EXHIBITING THE TWELVE DISCIPLES OF JESUS UNDER DISCIPLINE FOR THE APOSTLESHIP.

'A volume which can never lose its charm either for the preacher or for the ordinary Christian reader.'—London Quarterly Review.

'A great book, full of suggestion and savour. It should be the companion of the minister, for the theme is peculiarly related to himself, and he would find it a very pleasant and profitable companion, for its author has filled it with good matter.'—Mr. SPURGEON in Sword and Trowel.

THE HUMILIATION OF CHRIST IN ITS PHYSICAL, ETHICAL, AND OFFICIAL ASPECTS.

'These lectures are able and deep-reaching to a degree not often found in the religious literature of the day; withal, they are fresh and suggestive. . . . The learning and the deep and sweet spirituality of this discussion will commend it to many faithful students of the truth as it is in Jesus.'—Congregationalist.

'We have not for a long time met with a work so fresh and suggestive as this of Professor Bruce. . . . We do not know where to look at our English Universities for a treatise so calm, logical, and scholarly.'—English Independent.

'The title of the book gives but a faint conception of the value and wealth of its contents. . . . Dr. Bruce's work is really one of exceptional value; and no one can read it without perceptible gain in theological knowledge.'—English Churchman.

MICROCOSMUS:

BY HERMANN LOTZE.

Translated from the German

BY ELIZABETH HAMILTON AND E. E. CONSTANCE JONES.

'The English public have now before them the greatest philosophic work produced in Germany by the generation just past. The translation comes at an opportune time, for the circumstances of English thought, just at the present moment, are peculiarly those with which Lotze attempted to deal when he wrote his "Microcosmus," a quarter of a century ago. . . . Few philosophic books of the century are so attractive both in style and matter.'—Athenæum.

'These are indeed two masterly volumes, vigorous in intellectual power, and translated with rare ability. . . . This work will doubtless find a place on the shelves of all the foremost thinkers and students of modern times.'—Evangelical Magazine.

'Lotze is the ablest, the most brilliant, and most renowned of the German philosophers of to-day. . . . He has rendered invaluable and splendid service to Christian thinkers, and has given them a work which cannot fail to equip them for the sturdiest intellectual conflicts and to ensure their victory.'—Baptist Magazine.

'We must congratulate Girton College upon the forward movement of which the publication of this work is one of the first steps. . . . What strikes us at once about the work is the refreshing boldness and independence of the writer. In spite of the long-drawn previous history of the science, and of its voluminous records, Miss Jones finds plenty to say that is freshly worked out by independent thought. There is a spring of vitality and vigour pervading and vitalizing the aridity of even these abstract discussions.'—Cambridge Review.

'Its devotional element is robust and practical. The thought is not thin, and the style is clear. Thoroughly readable; enriched by quotations and telling illustrations.'
—The Churchman.

Dr. THEODORE CUYLER, of Brooklyn, writes:—'His keen and discriminating spiritual insight insures great accuracy, and imparts a priceless value to the work. . . . It is the very book to assist ministers of the gospel in the study of the Model Prayer; it is equally stimulating and quickening to private Christians in their quiet hours of meditation and devotion.'

Mr. C. H. SPURGEON writes:—'Evangelical and practical through and through. . . . Many sparkling images and impressive passages adorn the pages; but everywhere practical usefulness has been pursued.'

Dr. REYNOLDS, President of Cheshunt College, writes:—'Not only range but also depth of research. Some of the deepest questions of philosophical theology are discussed with keen insight and admirable temper. # A SYSTEM OF BIBLICAL THEOLOGY.

BY THE LATE

W. LINDSAY ALEXANDER, D.D., LL.D.,

PRINCIPAL OF THE THEOLOGICAL HALL OF THE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCHES IN SCOTLAND.

'A work like this is of priceless advantage. It is the testimony of a powerful and accomplished mind to the supreme authority of the Scriptures, a lucid and orderly exhibition of their contents, and a vindication, at once logical, scholarly, and conclusive, of their absolute sufficiency and abiding truthfulness. It is a pleasure to read lectures so vigorous and comprehensive in their grasp, so subtle in their dialect, so reverent in spirit, and so severely chaste in their style. There are scores of men who would suffer no loss if for the next couple of years they read no other book than this. To master it thoroughly would be an incalculable gain.'—Baptist Magazine.

'This is probably the most interesting and scholarly system of theology on the lines of orthodoxy which has seen the light.'—Literary World.

'This has been characterised as probably the most valuable contribution which our country has made to theology during the present century, and we do not think this an exaggerated estimate.'—Scottish Congregationalist.

'Oh, that Scotland and Congregationalism had many worthies like Dr. Lindsay Alexander! . . . The ripe man, full of rich experience and heavenly knowledge, will prize each leaf, and give himself a glorious drilling as he masters chapter by chapter.'—Mr. SPURGEON in The Sword and Trowel.

SYSTEM OF CHRISTIAN ETHICS.

BY DR. I. A. DORNER,
PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY, BERLIN.

EDITED BY DR. A. DORNER.

TRANSLATED BY

PROFESSOR C. M. MEAD, D.D., AND REV. R. T. CUNNINGHAM, M.A.

'This noble book is the crown of the Systematic Theology of the author. . . . It is a masterpiece. It is the fruit of a lifetime of profound investigation in the philosophical, biblical, and historical sources of theology. The system of Dörner is comprehensive, profound, evangelical, and catholic. It rises into the clear heaven of Christian thought above the strifes of Scholasticism, Rationalism, and Mysticism. It is, indeed, comprehensive of all that is valuable in these three types of human thought.'—Professor C. A. BRIGGS, D.D.

'There rested on his whole being a consecration such as is lent only by the nobility of a thorough sanctification of the inmost nature, and by the dignity of a matured wisdom.'—Professor WEISS.

'This is the last work we shall obtain from the able pen of the late Dr. Dörner, and it may be said that it fitly crowns the edifice of his manifold labours.'—Spectator.

'For students desirous of learning the general attitude of the highest European scholarship and speculation with respect to morals we could scarcely conceive a more satisfactory treatise.'—Homiletic Magazine.

'An able and impressive work which will be found highly useful by students of theology.'—Athenæum.

'We must regard this work as pre-eminent amongst those of its class for the sound judgment, piety, and uniform orthodoxy shown in its composition.'—Literary Churchman.

A SYSTEM OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE.

'In all investigations the author is fair, clear, and moderate; . . . he has shown that his work is one to be valued, for its real ability, as an important contribution to the literature of theology.'—Scotsman.

'Had it been the work of an entire lifetime, it would have been a monument of marvellous industry and rare scholarship. It is a tribute alike to the genius, the learning, and the untiring perseverance of its author.'—Baptist Magazine.

'The work has many and great excellences, and is really indispensable to all who would obtain a thorough acquaintance with the great problems of theology. It is a great benefit to English students that it should be made accessible to them in their own language, and in a form so elegant and convenient.'—Literary Churchman.

HISTORY OF THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE DOCTRINE OF THE PERSON OF CHRIST.

'So great a mass of learning and thought so ably set forth has never before been presented to English readers, at least on this subject.'—Journal of Sacred Literature.

WORKS BY PATON J. GLOAG, D.D.

In demy 8vo, price 10s. 6d.,

INTRODUCTION TO THE CATHOLIC
EPISTLES.

'Dr. Gloag, whilst courteous to men of erudition who differ from him, is firm and fearless in his criticism, and meets the erudition of others with an equal erudition of his own. He has displayed all the attributes of a singularly accomplished divine in this volume, which ought to be eagerly welcomed as a solid contribution to theological literature; it is a work of masterly strength and uncommon merit.'—Evangelical Magazine.

'We have here a great mass of facts and arguments relevant in the strictest sense to the subject, presented with skill and sound judgment, and calculated to be of very great service to the student.'—Literary Churchman.

In crown 8vo, price 5s.,

EXEGETICAL STUDIES.

'Careful and valuable pieces of work.'—Spectator.

'A very interesting volume.'—Literary Churchman.

'Dr. Gloag handles his subjects very ably, displaying everywhere accurate and extensive scholarship, and a fine appreciation of the lines of thought in those passages with which he deals.'—Baptist.

'Candid, truth-loving, devout-minded men will be both instructed and pleased by studies so scholarly, frank, and practical.'—Baptist Magazine.

In crown 8vo, price 7s. 6d.,

THE MESSIANIC PROPHECIES, BEING THE BAIRD LECTURE FOR 1879.

'It has seldom fallen to our lot to read a book which we think is entitled to such unqualified praise as the one now before us. Dr. Gloag has displayed consummate ability.'—London Quarterly Review.

'We regard Dr. Gloag's work as a valuable contribution to theological literature. We have not space to give the extended notice which its intrinsic excellence demands, and must content ourselves with cordially recommending it to our readers.'—Spectator.

In demy 8vo, price 12s.,

INTRODUCTION TO THE PAULINE
EPISTLES.

'A work of uncommon merit. He must be a singularly accomplished divine to whose library this book is not a welcome and valuable addition.'—Watchman.

In Two Volumes, 8vo, price 21s.,

A CRITICAL AND EXEGETICAL COMMENTARY ON THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

'This commentary of Dr. Gloag's I have examined with special care. For my purposes I have found it unsurpassed by any similar work in the English language. It shows a thorough mastery of the material, philology, history, and literature pertaining to this range of study, and a skill in the use of this knowledge which places it in the first class of modern expositions.'—H. B. Hackett, D.D.

A COMMENTARY ON
ST. PAUL'S FIRST EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

By F. GODET, D.D.,

PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY, NEUCHÂTEL.

'We do not know any better commentary to put into the hands of theological students.'—Guardian.

'We heartily commend this work to our readers as a valuable and substantial addition to the literature of this noble Epistle.'—Homiletic Magazine.

'A perfect masterpiece of theological toil and thought. . . . Scholarly, evangelical, exhaustive, and able.'—Evangelical Review.

In Three Volumes, 8vo, price 31s. 6d.

(A New Edition, revised throughout by the Author.)

A COMMENTARY ON
THE GOSPEL OF ST. JOHN.

'This work forms one of the battle-fields of modern inquiry, and is itself so rich in spiritual truth that it is impossible to examine it too closely; and we welcome this treatise from the pen of Dr. Godet. We have no more competent exegete, and this new volume shows all the learning and vivacity for which the author is distinguished.'—Freeman.

In Two Volumes, 8vo, price 21s.,

A COMMENTARY ON
THE GOSPEL OF ST. LUKE.

'Marked by clearness and good sense, it will be found to possess value and interest as one of the most recent and copious works specially designed to illustrate this Gospel.'—Guardian.

In Two Volumes, 8vo, price 21s.,

A COMMENTARY ON
ST. PAUL'S EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.

'We prefer this commentary to any other we have seen on the subject. . . . We have great pleasure in recommending it as not only rendering invaluable aid in the critical study of the text, but affording practical and deeply suggestive assistance in the exposition of the doctrine.'—British and Foreign Evangelical Review.

In crown 8vo, Second Edition, price 6s.,

DEFENCE OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITH.

TRANSLATED BY THE

HON. AND REV. CANON LYTTTELTON, M.A.,

RECTOR OF HAGLEY.

'There is trenchant argument and resistless logic in these lectures; but withal, there is cultured imagination and felicitous eloquence, which carry home the appeals to the heart as well as the head.'—Sword and Trowel.
