Ps. LXXIII.-LXXXIX.

PSALM LXXIV.

LONGING FOR THE HOUSE OF GOD, AND FOR THE HAPPINESS OF DWELLING THERE.

- 2 HOW lovely are Thy dwelling-places, Jahve of Hosts!
3 My soul longeth, yea fainteth, for the courts of Jahve,
My heart and my flesh sing for joy towards the living God.
- 4 Yea, the sparrow hath found a house,
And the swallow a nest for herself,
Where she hath sheltered her young—
Thine altars, Jahve of Hosts,
My King and my God.
- 5 Blessed are they who dwell in Thy house,
They shall still praise Thee. (Sela.)
- 6 Blessed is the man whose strength is in Thee—
The pilgrims' ways are in their heart.
- 7 Passing through the valley of Baca,
They make it a place of springs,
The rain also enshroudeth it in blessings.
- 8 They go from strength to strength,
There stand they before Elohim in Zion :

- 9 "Jahve Elohim of Hosts,
Oh hear my prayer,
Give ear, O God of Jacob!" (Sela.)
- 10 Thou our Shield, look into it, Elohim,
And look upon the face of Thine anointed!
- 11 For better is a day in Thy courts than a thousand;
I had rather lie upon the threshold in the house of my God,
Than dwell in the tents of wickedness.
- 12 For a sun and shield is Jahve Elohim.
Grace and glory doth Jahve dispense,
He doth not withhold any good thing from those who walk in uprightness.
- 13 Jahve of Hosts,
Blessed is the man who trusteth in Thee.

With Ps. lxxxiii. the circle of the Asaphic songs is closed (twelve Psalms, viz. one in the Second Book and eleven in the Third), and with Ps. lxxxiv. begins the other half of the Korahitic circle of songs, opened by the last of the Korahitic Elohim-Psalms. True, Hengstenberg (transl. vol. iii. Appendix, p. xlv) says that no one would, with my Symbolæ, p. 22, regard this Ps. lxxxiv. as an Elohimic Psalm; but the marks of the Elohimic style are obvious. Not only that the poet uses Elohim twice, and that in ver. 8, where a non-Elohimic Psalm ought to have said Jahve; it also delights in compound names of God, which are so heaped up that Jahve Tsebaoth occurs three times, and the specifically Elohimic Jahve Elohim Tsebaoth once.

The origin of this Psalm has been treated of already in connection with its counterpart, Ps. xlii.—xliii. It is a thoroughly heartfelt and intelligent expression of the love to the sanctuary of Jahve which yearns towards it out of the distance, and calls all those happy who have the like good fortune to have their home there. The prayer takes the form of an intercession for God's anointed; for the poet is among the followers of David, the banished one.* He does not pray, as it were, out of his soul (Hengstenberg, Tholuck, von Gerlach), but for him; for loving Jahve of Hosts, the heavenly King, he also loves His inviolably chosen one. And wherefore should he not do so, since with him a new era for the neglected sanctuary had dawned, and the delightful services of the Lord had taken a new start, and one so rich in song? With him he shares both joy and grief. With his future he indissolubly unites his own.

To the Precentor upon the Gittith, the inscription runs, by Benê-Korah, a Psalm. Concerning עֲלֵה־בָּתֵּיחַ, vid. on viii. 1. The structure of the Psalm is artistic. It consists of two halves with a distichic ashrê-conclusion. The schema is 3. 5. 2 | 5. 5. 3. 2.

Vers. 2-5. How loved and lovely (יִרְדוּת) is the sacred dwelling-place (plur. as in xl. 3) of the all-commanding, redemptive God, viz. His dwelling-place here below upon Zion! Thither the poet is drawn by the deeply inward yearning of love, which makes him pale (נִכְסַף from כָּסַף, to grow pale, xvii. 12) and consumes him (בָּלָה as in Job xix. 27). His heart and flesh joyfully salute the living God dwelling there, who, as a never-failing spring, quenches the thirst of the soul (xlii. 3); the joy that he feels when he throws himself back in spirit into the long-denied delight takes possession even of his bodily nature, the bitter-sweet pain of longing completely fills him (lxiii. 2). The mention of the "courts" (with the exception of the Davidic Psalm lxv. 5, occurring only in the anonymous Psalms) does not preclude the reference of the Psalm to the tent-temple on Zion. The Tabernacle certainly had only one הֶצֶי; the arrangement of the Davidic tent-temple, however, is indeed unknown to us, and, according to reliable traces,\* it may be well assumed that it was more gorgeous and more spacious than the old Tabernacle which remained in Gibeon. In ver. 4 the preference must be given to that explanation which makes אֶת־כִּיבְהוֹתֶיךָ dependent upon כְּמַצָּחָה, without being obliged to supply an intermediate thought like בַּיִת (with hardening Dagesh like  $\text{בָּ}$ , Gen. xix. 38, vid. the rule at lii. 5) and  $\text{בֵּן}$  as a more definite statement of the object which the poet has in view. The altars, therefore, or (what this is meant to say without any need for taking  $\text{עַל$  as a preposition) the realm, province of the altars of Jahve—this is the house, this the nest which sparrow and swallow have found for themselves and their young. The poet thereby only indirectly says, that birds have built themselves nests on the Temple-house, without giving any occasion for the discussion whether this has taken place in reality. By the bird that has found a comfortable snug home on the place of the altars of Jahve in the Temple-court and in the Temple-house, he means himself.  $\text{צִפּוֹר}$  (from  $\text{צִפַּר}$ ) is a general name for whistling, twittering birds, like the finch\* and the sparrow, just as the LXX. here renders it.  $\text{דְּרוֹר}$  is not the turtle-dove (LXX., Targum, and Syriac), but the swallow, which is frequently called even in the Talmud  $\text{צִפּוֹר דְּרוֹר}$  (=  $\text{סְנִינִית}$ ), and appears to take its name from its straightforward darting, as it were, radiating flight (cf. Arabic jadurru of the horse: it darts straight forward). Saadia renders dūrje, which is the name of the sparrow in Palestine and Syria (vid. Wetzstein's Excursus I. at the end of this volume). After the poet has said that his whole longing goes forth towards the sanctuary, he adds that it could not possibly be otherwise ( $\text{בְּנִי}$  standing at the head of the clause and belonging to the whole sentence, as e.g. in Isa. xxx. 33; Ewald, § 352, b): he, the sparrow, the swallow, has found a house, a nest, viz. the altars of Jahve of Hosts, his King and his God (xliv. 5, xlv. 7), who gloriously and inaccessibly protects him, and to whom he unites himself with most heartfelt and believing love. The addition "where ( $\text{אֵינֶר}$ ) as in xcv. 9, Num. xx. 13) she layeth her young," is not without its significance. One is here reminded of the fact, that at the time of the second Temple the sons of the priests were called  $\text{בְּרֵחֵי כֹהֲנֵי}$ , and the Levite poet means himself together with his family; God's altars secure to them shelter and sustenance. How happy, blessed, therefore, are those who enjoy this good fortune, which he now longs for again with pain in a strange country, viz. to be able to make his home in the house of such an adorable and gracious God!  $\text{עוֹר}$  here signifies, not “constantly” (Gen. xlvi. 29), for which תָּמִיד would have been used, but “yet,” as in xlii. 6. The relation of ver. 5*b* to 5*a* is therefore like xli. 2. The present is dark, but it will come to pass even yet that the inmates of God’s house (οἰκεῖοι τοῦ Θεοῦ, Eph. ii. 10) will praise Him as their Helper. The music here strikes in, anticipating this praise.

Vers. 6-13. This second half takes up the “blessed” of the distichic epode (ἐπιφθόδος) of the first, and consequently joins member to member chain-like on to it. Many hindrances must be cleared away if the poet is to get back to Zion, his true home; but his longing carries the surety within itself of its fulfilment: blessed, yea in himself blessed, is the man, who has his strength (נִיץ only here plene) in God, so that, consequently, the strength of Him to whom all things are possible is mighty in his weakness. What is said in ver. 6*b* is less adapted to be the object of the being called blessed than the result of that blessed relationship to God. What follows shows that the “high-roads” are not to be understood according to Isa. xl. 3 sq., or any other passage, as an ethical, notional figure (Venema, Hengstenberg, Hitzig, and others), but according to Isa. xxxiii. 8 (cf. Jer. xxxi. 21), with Aben-Ezra, Vatablus, and the majority of expositors, of the roads leading towards Zion; not, however, as referring to the return from the Exile, but to the going up to a festival: the pilgrim-high-roads with their separate halting-places (stations) were constantly present to the mind of such persons. And though they may be driven never so far away from them, they will nevertheless reach the goal of their longing. The most gloomy present becomes bright to them: passing through even a terrible wilderness, they turn it (שִׁיתְהוּ) into a place of springs, their joyous hope and the infinite beauty of the goal, which is worth any amount of toil and trouble, afford them enlivening comfort, refreshing strengthening in the midst of the arid steppe. עֵמֶק הַבְּבֵת does not signify the “Valley of weeping,” as Hupfeld at last renders it (LXX. κοιλάδα τοῦ κλαυθμῶνος), although Burckhardt found a وادی (Valley of weeping) in the neighbourhood of Sinai. In Hebrew “weeping” is בָּכָה, בָּכָה, בָּכָה, not בָּכָה. Rénan, in the fourth chapter of his Vie de Jésus, understands the expression to mean the last station of those who journey from northern

Palestine on this side of the Jordan towards Jerusalem, viz. Ain el-Haramîje, in a narrow and gloomy valley where a black stream of water flows out of the rocks in which graves are dug, so that consequently עמק הבכא signifies Valley of tears or of trickling waters. But such trickling out of the rock is also called בְּבֵי, Job xxviii. 11, and not בְּבָא. This latter is the singular to בְּבָאִים in 2 Sam. v. 24 (cf. יְבָאִים, יְבָאִים, ciii. 21), the name of a tree, and, according to the old Jewish lexicographers, of the mulberry-tree (Talmudic תות, תות); but according to the designation, of a tree from which some kind of fluid flows, and such a tree is the بَلْبَلْ, resembling the balsam-tree, which is very common in the arid valley of Mecca, and therefore might also have given its name to some arid valley of the Holy Land (vid. Winer's Realwörterbuch, s.v. Bacha), and, according to 2 Sam. v. 22-25, to one belonging, as it would appear, to the line of valley which leads from the coasts of the Philistines to Jerusalem. What is spoken of in passages like Isa. xxxv. 7, xli. 18, as being wrought by the omnipotence of God, who brings His people home to Zion, appears here as the result of the power of faith in those who, keeping the same end of their journeyings in view, pass through the unfruitful sterile valley. That other side, however, also does not remain unexpressed. Not only does their faith bring forth water out of the sand and rock of the desert, but God also on His part lovingly anticipates their love, and rewardingly anticipates their faithfulness: a gentle rain, like that which refreshes the sown fields in the autumn, descends from above and enwraps it (viz. the Valley of Baca) in a fulness of blessing (יְעֲטֶה, Hiphil with two accusatives, of which one is to be supplied: cf. on the figure, lxv. 14). The arid steppe becomes resplendent with a flowery festive garment (Isa. xxxv. 1 sq.), not to outward appearance, but to them spiritually, in a manner none the less true and real. And whereas under ordinary circumstances the strength of the traveller diminishes in proportion as he has traversed more and more of his toilsome road, with them it is the very reverse; they go from strength to strength (cf. on the expression, Jer. ix. 2, xii. 2), i.e. they receive strength for strength (cf. on the subject-matter, Isa. xl. 31, John i. 16), and that an ever increasing strength, the nearer they come to the desired goal, which also they cannot fail to reach. The pilgrim-band (this is the subject to  $\text{לְרִצְיָה}$ ), going on from strength to ( $\text{לֵאלֹהִים}$ ) strength, at last reaches, attains to ( $\text{לֵאלֹהִים}$  instead of the  $\text{לְאֱלֹהִים}$  used in other instances) Elohim in Zion. Having reached this final goal, the pilgrim-band pours forth its heart in the language of prayer such as we have in ver. 9, and the music here strikes up and blends its sympathetic tones with this converse of the church with its God.

The poet, however, who in spirit accompanies them on their pilgrimage, is now all the more painfully conscious of being at the present time far removed from this goal, and in the next strophe prays for relief. He calls God  $\text{קִנְיֵנוּ}$  (as in lix. 12), for without His protection David's cause is lost. May He then behold ( $\text{רִצְיָה}$ , used just as absolutely as in 2 Chron. xxiv. 22, cf. Lam. iii. 50), and look upon the face of His anointed, which looks up to Him out of the depth of its reproach. The position of the words shows that  $\text{קִנְיֵנוּ}$  is not to be regarded as the object to  $\text{רִצְיָה}$ , according to lxxxix. 19 (cf. xlvi. 10) and in opposition to the accentuation, for why should it not then have been  $\text{אֱלֹהִים קִנְיֵנוּ רִצְיָה}$ ? The confirmation (ver. 11) puts the fact that we have before us a Psalm belonging to the time of David's persecution by Absalom beyond all doubt. Manifestly, when his king prevails, the poet will at the same time (cf. David's language, 2 Sam. xv. 25) be restored to the sanctuary. A single day of his life in the courts of God is accounted by him as better than a thousand other days ( $\text{מֵאַלְפֵי יָמִים}$  with Olewejored and preceded by Rebia parvum). He would rather lie down on the threshold (concerning the significance of this  $\text{הַמִּתְנַפֵּף}$  in the mouth of a Korahite, vid. supra, vol. ii. p. 53) in the house of his God than dwell within in the tents of ungodliness (not "palaces," as one might have expected, if the house of God had at that time been a palace). For how worthless is the pleasure and concealment to be had there, when compared with the salvation and protection which Jahve Elohim affords to His saints! This is the only instance in which God is directly called a sun ( $\text{שֶׁשׁ}$ ) in the sacred writings (cf. Sir. xlii. 16). He is called a shield as protecting those who flee to Him and rendering them inaccessible to their foes, and a sun as the Being who dwells in an unapproachable light, which, going forth from Him in love towards men, is particularized as  $\text{הוֹרֵא}$  and כבוד, as the gentle and overpowering light of the grace and glory (χάρις and δόξα) of the Father of Lights. The highest good is self-communicative (communicativum sui). The God of salvation does not refuse any good thing to those who walk בְּתַמִּים (בְּיִרְרָה תַמִּים, ci. 6; cf. on xv. 2). Upon all receptive ones, i.e. all those who are desirous and capable of receiving His blessings, He freely bestows them out of the abundance of His good things. Strophe and anti-strophe are doubled in this second half of the song. The epode closely resembles that which follows the first half. And this closing ashrê is not followed by any Sela. The music is hushed. The song dies away with an iambic cadence into a waiting expectant stillness.

PSALM LXXXV.

PETITION OF THE HITHERTO FAVOURED PEOPLE FOR A RESTORATION OF FAVOUR.

- 2 THOU hast been favourable, Jahve, unto Thy land,
Thou hast turned the captivity of Jacob;
- 3 Thou hast taken away the iniquity of Thy people,
Thou hast covered all their sin— (Sela.)
- 4 Thou hast drawn in all Thy wrath,
Thou hast turned from the heat of Thine anger.
- 5 Turn unto us again, O God of our salvation,
And cause Thine indignation against us to cease.
- 6 Wilt Thou for ever be angry with us,
Wilt Thou draw out Thine anger to all generations?
- 7 Wilt Thou not quicken us again,
That Thy people may rejoice in Thee?
- 8 Cause us to see, Jahve, Thy loving-kindness,
And grant us Thy salvation.
- 9 I will hear what God Jahve will speak — —
Yea, He speaketh peace to His people and to His saints;
Only let them not again fall into folly!
- 10 Yea, nigh unto those who fear Him is His salvation,
That glory may again dwell in our land.

- 11 Loving-kindness and truth shall meet together,
Righteousness and peace shall kiss each other.
- 12 Truth shall spring out of the earth,
And righteousness shall look down from heaven.
- 13 Jahve shall give every good thing,
And our land shall again yield its increase.
- 14 Righteousness shall go before Him
And attend unto the way of His steps.

The second part of the Book of Isaiah is written for the Israel of the Exile. It was the incidents of the Exile that first unsealed this great and indivisible prophecy, which in its compass is without any parallel. And after it had been unsealed there sprang up out of it those numerous songs of the Psalm-collection which remind us of their common model, partly by their allegorizing figurative language, partly by their lofty prophetic thoughts of consolation. This first Korahitic Jahve-Psalm (in ver. 13 coming into contact with Ps. lxxxiv., cf. lxxxiv. 12), which more particularly by its allegorizing figurative language points to Isa. ch. xl.—lxvi., belongs to the number of these so-called deutero-Isaianic Psalms.

The reference of Ps. lxxxv. to the period after the Exile and to the restoration of the state, says Dursch, is clearly expressed in the Psalm. On the other hand, Hengstenberg maintains that "the Psalm does not admit of any historical interpretation," and is sure only of this one fact, that vers. 2-4 do not relate to the deliverance out of the Exile. Even this Psalm, however, is not a formulary belonging to no express period, but has a special historical basis; and vers. 2-4 certainly sound as though they came from the lips of a people restored to their fatherland.

Vers. 2-4. The poet first of all looks back into the past, so rich in tokens of favour. The six perfects are a remembrance of former events, since nothing precedes to modify them. Certainly that which has just been experienced might also be intended; but then, as Hitzig supposes, vers. 5-8 would be the petition that preceded it, and ver. 9 would go back to the turning-point of the answering of the request—a retrograde movement which is less probable than that in שִׁבְנוּ, ver. 5, we have a transition to the petition for a renewal of previously manifested favour. שָׁב נְשׁוּבוֹת (שְׁבוּתָה) here said of a cessation of a national judgment, seems to be meant literally, not figuratively (vid. xiv. 7). רָצָה, with the accusative, to have and to show pleasure in any one, as in the likewise Korahitic lamentation-Psalm xliv. 4, cf. cxlvii. 11. In ver. 3*a* sin is conceived of as a burden of the conscience; in ver. 3*b* as a blood-stain. The music strikes up in the middle of the strophe in the sense of the "blessed" in xxxii. 1. In ver. 4*a* God's עֲבָרָה (i.e. unrestrained wrath) appears as an emanation; He draws it back to Himself (אָסַף as in Joel iv. [iii.] 15, Ps. civ. 29, 1 Sam. xiv. 19) when He ceases to be angry; in ver. 4*b*, on the other hand, the fierce anger is conceived of as an active manifestation on the part of God which ceases when He turns round (הִשִּׁיב, Hiph. as inwardly transitive as in Ezek. xiv. 6, xxi. 35; cf. the Kal in Ex. xxxii. 12), i.e. gives the opposite turn to His manifestation.

Vers. 5-8. The poet now prays God to manifest anew the loving-kindness He has shown formerly. In the sense of "restore us again," שִׁבְנוּ does not form any bond of connection between this and the preceding strophe; but it does if, according to Ges. § 121, 4, it is intended in the sense of שׁוּב לָנוּ (אֵלֵינוּ), turn again to us. The poet prays that God would manifest Himself anew to His people as He has done in former days. Thus the transition from the retrospective perfects to the petition is, in the presence of the existing extremity, adequately brought about. Assuming the post-exilic origin of the Psalm, we see from this strophe that it was composed at a period in which the distance between the temporal and spiritual condition of Israel and the national restoration, promised together with the termination of the Exile, made itself distinctly felt. On עָפְנוּ (in relation to and bearing towards us) beside בָּעָפָה, cf. Job x. 17, and also on הִפָּר, lxxxix. 34. In the question in ver. 6 reminding God of His love and of His promise, מִיָּמֶיךָ has the signification of constant endless continuing or pursuing, as in xxxvi. 11. The expression in ver. 7*a* is like lxxi. 20, cf. lxxx. 19; שׁוּב is here the representative of rursus, Ges. § 142. יִשְׁעֶךָ from יָשַׁע, like קִנְיֶךָ in xxxviii. 2, has שׁ (cf. the inflexion of פָּרַי and חָק) instead of the ח in יִשְׁעֶנִּי. Here at the close of the strophe the prayer turns back inferentially to this attribute of God.

Vers. 9-11. The prayer is followed by attention to the divine answer, and by the answer itself. The poet stirs himself up to give ear to the words of God, like Habakkuk, ch. ii. 1. Beside אשמעה we find the reading אשמעה, vid. on xxxix. 13. The construction of ה'אלה is appositional, like המלך ה'ה, Ges. § 113. ו neither introduces the divine answer in express words, nor states the ground on which he hearkens, but rather supports the fact that God speaks from that which He has to speak. Peace is the substance of that which He speaks to His people, and that (the particularizing Waw) to His saints; but with the addition of an admonition. אל is dehortative. It is not to be assumed in connection with this ethical notion that the ah of לְכַסְלָה is the locative ah as in לְשֹׁאֵלָה, ix. 18. כַּסְלָה is related to כָּסַל like foolery to folly. The present misfortune, as is indicated here, is the merited consequence of foolish behaviour (playing the fool). In vers. 10 sqq. the poet unfolds the promise of peace which he has heard, just as he has heard it. What is meant by יִשְׁעוּ is particularized first by the infinitive, and then in perfects of actual fact. The possessions that make a people truly happy and prosperous are mentioned under a charming allegory exactly after Isaiah's manner, ch. xxxii. 16 sq., xlv. 8, lix. 14 sq. The glory that has been far removed again takes up its abode in the land. Mercy or loving-kindness walks along the streets of Jerusalem, and there meets fidelity, like one guardian angel meeting the other. Righteousness and peace or prosperity, these two inseparable brothers, kiss each other there, and fall lovingly into each other's arms.*

Vers. 12-14. The poet pursues this charming picture of the future further. After God's אֱמֶת, i.e. faithfulness to the promises, has descended like dew, אֱמֶת, i.e. faithfulness to the covenant, springs up out of the land, the fruit of that fertilizing influence. And צְדָקָה, gracious justice, looks down from heaven, * Concerning St. Bernard's beautiful parable of the reconciliation of the inviolability of divine threatening and of justice with mercy and peace in the work of redemption, which has grown out of this passage of the Psalms, Misericordia et veritas obviaverunt sibi, justitia et pax osculatæ sunt, and has been transferred to the painting, poetry, and drama of the middle ages, vid. Piper's Evangelischer Kalender, 1859, S. 24-34, and the beautiful miniature representing the ἀσπασμός of δικαιοσύνη and εἰρήνη of a Greek Psalter, 1867, S. 63.

smiling favour and dispensing blessing. נ in ver. 13 places these two prospects in reciprocal relation to one another (cf. lxxxiv. 7); it is found once instead of twice. Jahve gives הטוב, everything that is only and always good and that imparts true happiness, and the land, corresponding to it, yields יבולה, the increase which might be expected from a land so richly blessed (cf. lxvii. 7 and the promise in Lev. xxvi. 4). Jahve Himself is present in the land: righteousness walks before Him majestically as His herald, and righteousness ישם לדרך פִּעְמֵי, sets (viz. its footsteps) upon the way of His footsteps, that is to say, follows Him inseparably. פִּעְמֵי stands once instead of twice; the construct is to a certain extent attractional, as in lxv. 12, Gen. ix. 6. Since the expression is neither דָּרָךְ (1. 23, Isa. li. 10) nor לְדָרָךְ (Isa. xlix. 11), it is natural to interpret the expression thus, and it gives moreover (cf. Isa. lviii. 8, lii. 12) an excellent sense. But if, which we prefer, שׁוֹמֵר is taken in the sense of שׁוֹמֵר לְבָב (as e.g. in Job iv. 20) with the following לְ, to give special heed to anything (Deut. xxxii. 46, Ezek. xl. 4, xliv. 5), to be anxiously concerned about it (1 Sam. ix. 20), then we avoid the supplying in thought of a second פִּעְמֵי, which is always objectionable, and the thought obtained by the other interpretation is brought clearly before the mind: righteousness goes before Jahve, who dwells and walks abroad in Israel, and gives heed to the way of His steps, that is to say, follows carefully in His footsteps.

PSALM LXXXVI.

PRAYER OF A PERSECUTED SAINT.

- 1 BOW down, Jahve, Thine ear, answer me,
For I am needy and poor.
- 2 Preserve my soul, for I am pious;
Help Thy servant, O Thou my God,
Who cleaveth confidingly to Thee.
- 3 Be merciful unto me, Lord,
For unto Thee do I cry all the day.
- 4 Rejoice the soul of Thy servant,
For unto Thee, Lord, do I lift up my soul.

- 5 For Thou, Lord, art good and ready to forgive,
And plenteous in mercy unto all who call upon Thee.
- 6 Give ear, Jahve, to my prayer,
And hearken to the cry of my importunate supplications.
- 7 In the day of my distress do I call unto Thee,
For Thou wilt answer me.
- 8 There is none like unto Thee among the gods, O Lord,
And Thy works have not their equal.
- 9 All nations which Thou hast made shall come and worship
before Thee, Lord,
And give glory to Thy name.
- 10 For Thou art great and doest wondrous things,
Thou, Thou art God alone.
- 11 Teach me, Jahve, Thy way,
I desire to walk in Thy truth;
Unite my heart to fear Thy Name.
- 12 I will give thanks to Thee, O Lord my God, with all my heart,
And will glorify Thy Name for ever,
- 13 That Thy mercy has been great over me,
And Thou hast rescued my soul out of the deep hell.
- 14 Elohim, the proud are risen against me,
And an assembly of violent men seek my soul,
And have not set Thee before their eyes.
- 15 But Thou, Lord, art a God compassionate and gracious, Long-suffering and plenteous in mercy and truth.
- 16 Turn unto me and be gracious to me,
O give strength unto Thy servant
And save the son of Thy handmaid.
- 17 Show me a token for good,
That those who hate me may see it and be ashamed,
That Thou, Jahve, hast helped me and comforted me.

A Psalm "by David" which has points of contact with Ps. lxxxv. (cf. lxxxvi. 2, קָסִיד, with lxxxv. 9; lxxxvi. 15, חָסֵד וְאֵמֶת, with lxxxv. 11) is here inserted between Korahitic Psalms: it can only be called a Psalm by David as having grown out of Davidic and other model passages. The writer cannot be compared for poetical capability either with David or with the authors of such Psalms as Ps. cxvi. and cxxx. His Psalm is more liturgic than purely poetic, and it is also only entitled תְּפִלָּה, without bearing in itself any sign of musical designation. It possesses this characteristic, that the divine name אֲדֹנָי occurs seven times,* just as it occurs three times in Ps. cxxx., forming the start for a later, Adonajic style in imitation of the Elohimic.

Vers. 1-5. The prayer to be heard runs like lv. 3; and the statement of the ground on which it is based, ver. 1*b*, word for word like xl. 18. It is then particularly expressed as a prayer for preservation (שְׁמֵרָה), as in cxix. 167, although imperative, to be read shām'rah; cf. xxx. 4 מִיִּרְדֵי, xxxviii. 21 רָדְפֵי or רָדְפֵי, and what we have already observed on xvi. 1 שְׁמֵרָנִי); for he is not only in need of God's help, but also because חֶסֶד (iv. 4, xvi. 10), i.e. united to Him in the bond of affection (חֶסֶד, Hos. vi. 4, Jer. ii. 2), not unworthy of it. In ver. 2 we hear the strains of xxv. 20, xxxi. 7; in ver. 3, of lvii. 2 sq.: the confirmation in ver. 4*b* is taken verbally from xxv. 1, cf. also cxxx. 6. Here, what is said in ver. 4 of this shorter Adonajic Psalm, cxxx., is abbreviated in the ἀπαξ γεγραμ. סָלַח (root סל, של, to allow to hang loose, χαλᾶν, to give up, remittere). The Lord is good (טוֹב), i.e. altogether love, and for this very reason also ready to forgive, and great and rich in mercy for all who call upon Him as such. The beginning of the following group also accords with Ps. cxxx. in ver. 2.

Vers. 6-13. Here, too, almost everything is an echo of earlier language of the Psalms and of the Law; viz., ver. 7 follows xvii. 6 and other passages; ver. 8*a* is taken from Ex. xv. 11, cf. lxxxix. 9, where, however, אֱלֹהִים, gods, is avoided; ver. 8*b* follows Deut. iii. 24; ver. 9 follows xxii. 28; ver. 11*a* is taken from xxvii. 11; ver. 11*b* from xxvi. 3; ver. 13, שְׁאוֹל תְּתַחֲיֶיהָ from Deut. xxxii. 22, where instead of this it is תְּתַחֲיֶיהָ, just as in cxxx. 2 תְּתַנַּנִּי (supplicatory prayer) instead of תְּתַנַּנִּי

* For the genuine reading in ver. 4 (where Heidenheim reads יהוה) and in ver. 5 (where Nissel reads יהוה) is also אֲדֹנָי (Bomberg, Hutter, etc.). Both the divine names in vers. 4 and 5 belong to the 134 וְדָאֵן. The divine name אֲדֹנָי, which is written and is not merely substituted for יהוה, is called in the language of the Masora וְדָאֵי (the true and real one).

(importunate supplications); and also ver. 10 (cf. lxxii. 18) is a doxological formula that was already in existence. The construction  $\text{הַקְשִׁיב} \text{בְּ}$  is the same as in lxvi. 19. But although for the most part flowing on only in the language of prayer borrowed from earlier periods, this Psalm is, moreover, not without remarkable significance and beauty. With the confession of the incomparableness of the Lord is combined the prospect of the recognition of the incomparable One throughout the nations of the earth. This clear unallegorical prediction of the conversion of the heathen is the principal parallel to Apoc. xv. 4. "All nations, which Thou hast made"—they have their being from Thee; and although they have forgotten it (vid. ix. 18), they will nevertheless at last come to recognise it.  $\text{בְּלִגְוִים}$ , since the article is wanting, are nations of all tribes (countries and nationalities); cf. Jer. xvi. 16 with Ps. xxii. 18; Tobit xiii. 11, ἔθνη πολλά, with ibid. xiv. 6, πάντα τὰ ἔθνη. And how weightily brief and charming is the petition in ver. 11: unicor meum, ut timeat nomen tuum! Luther has rightly departed from the renderings of the LXX., Syriac, and Vulgate: laetetur ( $\text{הִרְדָּה}$  from  $\text{הִרְדָּה}$ ). The meaning, however, is not so much "keep my heart near to the only One," as "direct all its powers and concentrate them on the one thing." The following group shows us what is the meaning of the deliverance out of the hell beneath ( $\text{שְׁאוֹל תַּחְתִּית}$ , like  $\text{אֶרֶץ תַּחְתִּית}$ , the earth beneath, the inner parts of the earth, Ezek. xxxi. 14 sqq.), for which the poet promises beforehand to manifest his thankfulness ( $\text{בְּ}$ , ver. 13, as in lvi. 14).

Vers. 14-17. The situation is like that in the Psalms of the time of Saul. The writer is a persecuted one, and in constant peril of his life. He has taken ver. 14*ab* out of the Elohimic Ps. liv. ver. 5, and retained the Elohim as a proper name of God (cf. on the other hand vers. 8, 10); he has, however, altered  $\text{זָרִים}$  to  $\text{זָרִים}$ , which here, as in Isa. xiii. 11 (cf., however, ibid. xxv. 5), is the alternating word to  $\text{עַרְצִים}$ . In ver. 15 he supports his petition that follows by Jahve's testimony concerning Himself in Ex. xxxiv. 6. The appellation given to himself by the poet in ver. 16 recurs in cxvi. 16 (cf. Wisd. ix. 5). The poet calls himself "the son of Thy handmaid" as having been born into the relation to Him of servant; it is a relationship that has come to him by birth. How beautifully does the Adonaj come in here for the seventh time! He is even from his mother's womb the servant of the sovereign Lord, from whose omnipotence he can therefore also look for a miraculous interposition on his behalf. A "token for good" is a special dispensation, from which it becomes evident to him that God is kindly disposed towards him. לְטוֹבָה as in the mouth of Nehemiah, ch. v. 19, xiii. 31; of Ezra, ch. viii. 22; and also even in Jeremiah and earlier. יְיָ־בְשֵׁנִי is just as parenthetical as in Isa. xxvi. 11.

PSALM LXXXVII.

THE CITY OF THE NEW BIRTH OF THE NATIONS.

- 1 HIS founded [city] upon the holy mountains—
- 2 Jahve loveth the gates of Zion
More than all the dwellings of Jacob.
- 3 Glorious things are spoken of thee, thou city of God!
(Sela.)
- 4 "I will proclaim Rahab and Babylon as My intimates;
Behold Philistia and Tyre, together with Æthiopia—
That one is born there."
- 5 And to Zion it shall one day be said:
Each and every one is born in her,
And He, the Highest, doth establish her.
- 6 Jahve shall reckon in the list of the nations:
That one is born there. (Sela.)
- 7 And singing as well as dancing (they say):
All my fountains are in thee!

The mission thought in lxxxvi. 9 becomes the ruling thought in this Korahitic Psalm. It is a prophetic Psalm in the style, boldly and expressively concise even to obscurity (Eusebins, σφόδρα αἰνιγματώδης καὶ σκοτεινῶς εἰρημένος), in which the first three oracles of the tetralogy Isa. xxi.—xxii. 14, and the passage Isa. xxx. 6, 7—a passage designed to be as it were a memorial exhibition—are also written. It also resembles these oracles in this respect, that ver. 1*b* opens the whole arsis-like by a solemn statement of its subject, like the emblematical inscriptions there. As to the rest, Isa. xliv. 5 is the key to its meaning. The threefold יְלֵךְ here corresponds to the threefold הָיָה in that passage.

Since Rahab and Babylon as the foremost worldly powers are mentioned first among the peoples who come into the congregation of Jahve, and since the prospect of the poet has moulded itself according to a present rich in promise and carrying such a future in its bosom, it is natural (with Tholuck, Hengstenberg, Vaihinger, Keil, and others) to suppose that the Psalm was composed when, in consequence of the destruction of the Assyrian army before Jerusalem, offerings and presents were brought from many quarters for Jahve and the king of Judah (2 Chron. xxxii. 23), and the admiration of Hezekiah, the favoured one of God, had spread as far as Babylon. Just as Micah (ch. iv. 10) mentions Babylon as the place of the chastisement and of the redemption of his nation, and as Isaiah, about the fourteenth year of Hezekiah's reign, predicts to the king a carrying away of his treasures and his posterity to Babylon, so here Egypt and Babylon, the inheritress of Assyria, stand most prominent among the worldly powers that shall be obliged one day to bow themselves to the God of Israel. In a similar connection Isaiah (ch. xix.) does not as yet mention Babylon side by side with Egypt, but Assyria.

Vers. 1-4. The poet is absorbed in the contemplation of the glory of a matter which he begins to celebrate, without naming it. Whether we render it: His founded, or (since מִיָּסַד and מוֹסֵד are both used elsewhere as part. pass.): His foundation (after the form מְלִיכָה, poetically for יְסוּד, a founding, then that which is set fast = a foundation), the meaning remains the same; but the more definite statement of the object with צִיּוֹן שְׁעָרָי is more easily connected with what precedes by regarding it as a participle. The suffix refers to Jahve, and it is Zion, whose praise is a favourite theme of the Korahitic songs, that is intended. We cannot tell by looking to the accents whether the clause is to be taken as a substantival clause (His founded [city] is upon the holy mountains) or not. Since, however, the expression is not יְסוּדוֹתוֹ הֵיא בְּהַרְרֵי־קֹדֶשׁ, יְסוּדוֹתוֹ הֵיא בְּהַרְרֵי־קֹדֶשׁ, is an object placed first in advance (which the antithesis to the other dwellings of Jacob would admit of), and in ver. 2a a new synonymous object is subordinated to צִיּוֹן by a similar turn of the discourse to Jer. xiii. 27, vi. 2 (Hitzig). By altering the division of the verses as Hupfeld and Hofmann do (His foundation or founded [city] upon the holy mountains doth Jahve love), ver. 2 is decapitated. Even now the God-founded city (surrounded on three sides by deep valleys), whose firm and visible foundation is the outward manifestation of its imperishable inner nature, rises aloft above all the other dwelling-places of Israel. Jahve stands in a lasting, faithful, loving relationship (צִיּוֹן, not 3 præt. צִיּוֹן) to the gates of Zion. These gates are named as a periphrasis for Zion, because they bound the circuit of the city, and any one who loves a city delights to go frequently through its gates; and they are perhaps mentioned in prospect of the fulness of the heathen that shall enter into them. In ver. 3 the LXX. correctly, and at the same time in harmony with the syntax, renders: Δεδοξασμένα ἐλάλιθῃ περὶ σοῦ. The construction of a plural subject with a singular predicate is a syntax common in other instances also, whether the subject is conceived of as a unity in the form of the plural (e.g. lxvi. 3, cxix. 137, Isa. xvi. 8), or is individualized in the pursuance of the thought (as is the case most likely in Gen. xxvii. 29, cf. xii. 3); here the glorious things are conceived of as the sum-total of such. The operation of the construction of the active (Ew. § 295, b) is not probable here in connection with the participle. אַ beside צִיּוֹן may signify the place or the instrument, substance and object of the speech (e.g. cxix. 46), but also the person against whom the words are spoken (e.g. l. 20), or 'concerning whom they are uttered (as the words of the suitor to the father or the relatives of the maiden, 1 Sam. xxv. 39, Cant. viii. 8; cf. on the construction, 1 Sam. xix. 3). The poet, without doubt, here refers to the words of promise concerning the eternal continuance and future glory of Jerusalem: Glorious things are spoken, i.e. exist as spoken, in reference to thee, O thou city of God, city of His choice and of His love.

The glorious contents of the promise are now unfolded, and that with the most vivid directness: Jahve Himself takes up the discourse, and declares the gracious, glorious, world-wide mission of His chosen and beloved city: it shall become the birth-place of all nations. Rahab is Egypt, as in lxxxix. 11, Isa. xxx. 7, li. 9, the southern worldly power, and Babylon the northern. הַזְּבִיר, as frequently, of loud (Jer. iv. 16) and honourable public mention or commemoration, xlv. 18. It does not signify "to record or register in writing;" for the official name מְזַבֵּיר, which is cited in support of this meaning, designates the historian of the empire as one who keeps in remembrance the memorable events of the history of his time. It is therefore impossible, with Hofmann, to render: I will add Rahab and Babylon to those who know me. In general לְ is not used to point out to whom the addition is made as belonging to them, but for what purpose, or as what (cf. 2 Sam. v. 3, Isa. iv. 3), these kingdoms, hitherto hostile towards God and His people, shall be declared: Jahve completes what He Himself has brought about, inasmuch as He publicly and solemnly declares them to be those who know Him, i.e. those who experimentally (vid. xxxvi. 11) know Him as their God. Accordingly, it is clear that הָיָה יְלֹדֵי שָׂם is also meant to refer to the conversion of the other three nations to whom the finger of God points with הַנִּיחַ, viz. the war-loving Philistia, the rich and proud Tyre, and the adventurous and powerful Ethiopia (Isa. ch. xviii.). הָיָה does not refer to the individuals, nor to the sum-total of these nations, but to nation after nation (cf. הָיָה עַל־הָרֶגֶל, Isa. xxiii. 13), by fixing the eye upon each one separately. And שָׂם refers to Zion. The words of Jahve, which come in without any intermediary preparation, stand in the closest connection with the language of the poet and seer. Zion appears elsewhere as the mother who brings forth Israel again as a numerous people (Isa. lxvi. 7, liv. 1-3): it is the children of the dispersion (diaspora) which Zion regains in Isa. lx. 4 sq.; here, however, it is the nations which are born in Zion. The poet does not combine with it the idea of being born again in the depth of its New Testament meaning; he means, however, that the nations will attain a right of citizenship in Zion (πολιτεία τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ, Eph. ii. 12) as in their second mother-city, that they will therefore at any rate experience a spiritual change which, regarded from the New Testament point of view, is the new birth out of water and the Spirit.

Vers. 5-7. Inasmuch now as the nations come thus into the church (or congregation) of the children of God and of the children of Abraham, Zion becomes by degrees a church immeasurably great. To Zion, however, or of Zion (לְ of reference to), shall it be said אִישׁ וְאִישׁ יְלֶד־בָּהּ. Zion, the one city, stands in contrast to all the countries, the one city of God in contrast to the kingdoms of the world, and אִישׁ וְאִישׁ in contrast to הָ. This contrast, upon the correct apprehension of which depends the understanding of the whole Psalm, is missed when it is said, "whilst in relation to other countries it is always only the whole nation that comes under consideration, Zion is not reckoned up as a nation, but by persons" (Hofmann). With this rendering the יְלֶד retires into the background; in that case this giving of prominence to the value of the individual exceeds the ancient range of conception, and it is also an inadmissible appraisalment that in Zion each individual is as important as a nation as a whole. Elsewhere אִישׁ וְאִישׁ, Lev. xvii. 10, 13, or אִישׁ וְאִישׁ, Esth. i. 8, signifies each and every one; accordingly here אִישׁ וְאִישׁ (individual and, or after, individual) affirms a progressus in infinitum, where one is ever added to another. Of an immeasurable multitude, and of each individual in this multitude in particular, it is said that he was born in Zion. Now, too, וְהוּא יְבוֹנְנָה עֲלֵיהֶן has a significant connection with what precedes. Whilst from among foreign peoples more and more are continually acquiring the right of natives in Zion, and thus are entering into a new national alliance, so that a breach of their original national friendships is taking place, He Himself (cf. 1 Sam. xx. 9), the Most High, will uphold Zion (xlviii. 9), so that under His protection and blessing it shall become ever greater and more glorious. Ver. 6 tells us what will be the result of such a progressive incorporation in the church of Zion of those who have hitherto been far removed, viz. Jahve will reckon when He writeth down (כְּתוֹב as in Josh. xviii. 8) the nations; or better,—since this would more readily be expressed by בְּכִתְבוֹ, and the book of the living (Isa. iv. 3) is one already existing from time immemorial,—He will reckon in the list (כְּתוֹב after the form חֲלוֹם, חֲלוֹף, חֲלוֹף = פְּקוֹד, פְּקוֹד, Ezek. xiii. 9) of the nations, i.e. when He goes over the nations that are written down there and chosen for the coming salvation, "this one was born there;" He will therefore acknowledge them one after another as those born in Zion. The end of all history is that Zion shall become the metropolis of all nations. When the fulness of the Gentiles is thus come in, then shall all and each one as well singing as dancing say (supply יִמְרְרוּ): All my fountains are in thee. Among the old translators the rendering of Aquila is the best: καὶ ἄδοντες ὡς χοροὶ πάσαι πηγαὶ ἐν σοί, which Jerome follows, et cantores quasi in choris: omnes fontes mei in te. One would rather render הַלְלִים, "flute-players" (LXX. ὡς ἐν αὐλοῖς); but to pipe or play the flute is הִלֵּל (a denominative from הִלֵּל), 1 Kings i. 40, whereas to dance is הִלֵּל (Pilel of הוּל); it is therefore = מְהוֹלְלִים, like לְצַעֲצְעִים, Hos. vii. 5. But it must not moreover be rendered, "And singers as well as dancers (will say);" for "singers" is מְשַׁרְרִים, not שָׁרִים, which signifies cantantes, not cantores. Singing as dancing, i.e. making known their festive joy as well by the one as by the other, shall the men of all nations incorporated in Zion say: All my fountains, i.e. fountains of salvation (after Isa. xii. 3), are in thee (O city of God). It has also been interpreted: my looks (i.e. the object on which my eye is fixed, or the delight of my eyes), or: my thoughts (after the modern Hebrew עֵינִי of spiritual meditation); but both are incongruous. The conjecture, too, of Böttcher, and even before him of Schnurrer (Dissertationes, p. 150), בְּלִמְעֵינִי, all who take up their abode (instead of which Hupfeld conjectures מְעֵינִי, all my near-dwellers, i.e. those who dwell with me under the same roof*), is not Hebrew, and deprives us of the thought which corresponds to the aim of the whole, that Jerusalem shall be universally regarded as the place where the water of life springs for the whole of mankind, and shall be universally praised as this place of fountains.

PSALM LXXXVIII.

PLAINTIVE PRAYER OF A PATIENT SUFFERER LIKE JOB.

2 JAHVE, God of my salvation,
In the time when I cry in the night before Thee, * Hupfeld cites Rashi as having thus explained it; but his gloss is to be rendered: my whole inmost part (after the Aramaic = מְעֵינִי) is with thee, i.e. thy salvation.

- 3 Let my prayer come before Thy face,
 Incline Thine ear to my crying.
 4 For satiated with sufferings is my soul,
 And my life is come nigh unto Hades.
 5 I am accounted as those who go down to the pit,
 I am become as a man that hath no strength—

- 6 A freed one among the dead,
 Like the slain, those buried in the grave,
 Whom Thou rememberest no more,
 And they are cut off from Thy hand.
 7 Thou hast laid me in the pit of the abysses,
 In darknesses, in the depths of the sea.
 8 Upon me Thy fierce anger lieth hard,
 And all Thy waves dost Thou bend down. (Sela.)

- 9 Thou hast removed my familiar friends from me,
 Thou hast made me an abomination to them,
 Who am shut up and cannot come forth.
 10 Mine eye languisheth by reason of affliction,
 I call upon Thee, Jahve, every day,
 I stretch out my hands unto Thee.

- 11 Wilt Thou do wonders unto the dead,
 Or shall the shades arise to give thanks unto Thee? (Sela.)
 12 Shall Thy loving-kindness be declared in the grave,
 Thy faithfulness in the place of destruction?
 13 Shall Thy wonder-working power be made known in the darkness,
 And Thy righteousness in the land of forgetfulness?

- 14 And as for me—to Thee, Jahve, do I cry,
 Even in the morning my prayer cometh to meet Thee.
 15 Wherefore, Jahve, dost Thou cast off my soul,
 Dost Thou hide Thy face from me?
 16 Needy am I and ready to die from my youth up,
 I bear Thy terrors, I am utterly helpless.

- 17 Over me Thy fierce anger hath passed,
 Thy terrors have destroyed me.

- 18 They have surrounded me like waters all the day,
They compassed me about altogether.
19 Thou hast removed far from me lover and friend,
My familiar friends are darkness.

Ps. lxxxviii. is as gloomy as Ps. lxxxvii. is cheerful; they stand near one another as contrasts. Not Ps. lxxxvii., as the old expositors answer to the question quænam ode omnium tristissima, but this Ps. lxxxviii. is the darkest, gloomiest, of all the plaintive Psalms; for it is true the name "God of my salvation," with which the praying one calls upon God, and his praying itself, show that the spark of faith within him is not utterly extinguished; but as to the rest, it is all one pouring forth of deep lament in the midst of the severest conflict of temptation in the presence of death, the gloom of melancholy does not brighten up to become a hope, the Psalm dies away in Job-like lamentation. Herein we discern echoes of the Korahitic Ps. xlii. and of Davidic Psalms: compare ver. 3 with xviii. 7; ver. 5 with xxviii. 1; ver. 6 with xxxi. 23; ver. 18 with xxii. 17; ver. 19 (although differently applied) with xxxi. 12; and more particularly the questions in vers. 11-13 with vi. 6, of which they are as it were only the amplification. But these Psalm-echoes are outweighed by the still more striking points of contact with the Book of Job, both as regards linguistic usage (כַּבֵּן, ver. 10, Job xli. 44; רַפְּאִים, ver. 11, Job xxvi. 5; אֲנִי־יָדָע, ver. 12, Job xxvi. 6, xxviii. 22; נָעַר, ver. 16a, Job xxxiii. 25, xxxvi. 14; אֲמִים, ver. 16b, Job xx. 25; בְּעֵתֵי, ver. 17, Job vi. 4) and single thoughts (cf. ver. 5 with Job xiv. 10; ver. 9 with Job xxx. 10; ver. 19 with Job xvii. 9, xix. 14), and also the suffering condition of the poet and the whole manner in which this finds expression. For the poet finds himself in the midst of the same temptation as Job not merely so far as his mind and spirit are concerned; but his outward affliction is, according to the tenor of his complaints, the same, viz. the leprosy (ver. 9), which, the disposition to which being born with him, has been his inheritance from his youth up (ver. 16). Now, since the Book of Job is a Chokma-work of the Salomonic age, and the two Ezrahites belonged to the wise men of the first rank at the court of Solomon (1 Kings v. 11 [iv. 31]), it is natural to suppose that the Book of Job has sprung out of this very Chokma-company, and that perhaps this very Heman the Ezrahite who is the author of Ps. lxxxviii. has made a passage of his own life, suffering, and conflict of soul, a subject of dramatic treatment.

The inscription of the Psalm runs: A Psalm-song by the Korahites; to the Precentor, to be recited (lit. to be pressed down, not after Isa. xxvii. 2: to be sung, which expresses nothing, nor: to be sung alternately, which is contrary to the character of the Psalm) after a sad manner (cf. liii. 1) with muffled voice, a meditation by Heman the Ezrahite. This is a double inscription, the two halves of which are contradictory. The bare להימן side by side with לבני־קרה would be perfectly in order, since the precentor Heman is a Korahite according to 1 Chron. vi. 18-23 [33-38]; but הימן האזרחי is the name of one of the four great Israelitish sages in 1 Kings v. 11 [iv. 31], who, according to 1 Chron. ii. 6, is a direct descendant of Zerah, and therefore is not of the tribe of Levi, but of Judah. The suppositions that Heman the Korahite had been adopted into the family of Zerah, or that Heman the Ezrahite had been admitted among the Levites, are miserable attempts to get over the difficulty. At the head of the Psalm there stand two different statements respecting its origin side by side, which are irreconcilable. The assumption that the title of the Psalm originally was either merely שִׁיר מִזְמוֹר לְבְנֵי־קֵרָה, or merely לְמִנְצָח וְנֹחַ, is warranted by the fact that only in this one Psalm לְמִנְצָח does not occupy the first place in the inscription. But which of the two statements is the more reliable one? Most assuredly the latter; for שִׁיר מִזְמוֹר לְבְנֵי־קֵרָה is only a recurrent repetition of the inscription of Ps. lxxxvii. The second statement, on the other hand, by its precise designation of the melody, and by the designation of the author, which corresponds to the Psalm that follows, gives evidence of its antiquity and its historical character.

Vers. 2-8. The poet finds himself in the midst of circumstances gloomy in the extreme, but he does not despair; he still turns towards Jahve with his complaints, and calls Him the God of his salvation. This actus directus of fleeing in prayer to the God of salvation, which urges its way through all that is dark and gloomy, is the fundamental characteristic of all true faith. Ver. 2a is not to be rendered, as a clause of itself: "by day I cry unto Thee, in the night before Thee" (LXX. and Targum), which ought to have been יוֹמָם, but (as it is also pointed, especially in Baer's text): by day, i.e. in the time (lvi. 4, lxxviii. 42, cf. xviii. 1), when I cry before Thee in the night, let my prayer come . . . (Hitzig). In ver. 3b he calls his piercing lamentation, his wailing supplication, רִנְתִּי, as in xvii. 1, lxi. 2. הַפֶּה as in lxxxvi. 1, for which we find הַט in xvii. 6. The Beth of בְּרִעוֹת, as in lxxv. 5, Lam. iii. 15, 30, denotes that of which his soul has already had abundantly sufficient. On ver. 4b, cf. as to the syntax xxxi. 11. לִי (ἀπαξ λεγομ. like לִי, xxii. 20) signifies succinctness, compactness, vigorousness (ἀδρότης): he is like a man from whom all vital freshness and vigour is gone, therefore now only like the shadow of a man, in fact like one already dead. הַפֶּשֶׁי, in ver. 6a, the LXX. renders ἐν νεκροῖς ἐλεύθερος (Symmachus, ἀφείδς ἐλεύθερος); and in like manner the Targum, and the Talmud which follows it in formulating the proposition that a deceased person is הַפֶּשֶׁי מִן הַמִּצְוֹת, free from the fulfilling of the precepts of the Law (cf. Rom. vi. 7). Hitzig, Ewald, Köster, and Böttcher, on the contrary, explain it according to Ezek. xxvii. 20 (where הַפֶּשֶׁי signifies stragulum): among the dead is my couch (הַפֶּשֶׁי = יְעוּעִי, Job xvii. 13). But in respect of Job iii. 19 the adjectival rendering is the more probable; "one set free among the dead" (LXX.) is equivalent to one released from the bond of life (Job xxxix. 5), somewhat as in Latin a dead person is called defunctus. God does not remember the dead, i.e. practically, inasmuch as, devoid of any progressive history, their condition remains always the same; they are in fact cut away (נִגְזַר as in xxxi. 23, Lam. iii. 54, Isa. liii. 8) from the hand, viz. from the guiding and helping hand, of God. Their dwelling-place is the pit of the places lying deep beneath (cf. on תְּהַתִּיּוֹת, lxiii. 10, lxxxvi. 13, Ezek. xxvi. 20, and more particularly Lam. iii. 55), the dark regions (מַחְשְׁבִים as in cxliii. 3, Lam. iii. 6), the submarine depths (בְּמַעְלֹת; LXX., Symmachus, the Syriac, etc.: ἐν σκιᾷ θανάτου = בְּצִלְמוֹת, according to Job x. 21 and frequently, but contrary to Lam. iii. 54), whose open abyss is the grave for each one. On ver. 8b cf. xlii. 8. The Mugrash by כִּלְמִשְׁבְּרִיךְ stamps it as an adverbial accusative (Targum), or more correctly, since the expression is not עֲנִיתִי, as the object placed in advance. Only those who are not conversant with the subject (as Hupfeld in this instance) imagine that the accentuation marks הַיָּמָה as a relative clause (cf. on the contrary viii. 7*b*, xxi. 3*b*, etc.). הַיָּמָה, to bow down, press down; here used of the turning or directing downwards (LXX. ἐπιήγαγες) of the waves, which burst like a cataract over the afflicted one.

Vers. 9-13. The octastichs are now followed by hexastichs which belong together in pairs. The complaint concerning the alienation of his nearest relations sounds like Job xix. 13 sqq., but the same strain is also frequently heard in the earlier Psalms written in times of suffering, e.g. xxxi. 9. He is forsaken by all his familiar friends (not: acquaintances, for עֲרֵבָה signifies more than that), he is alone in the dungeon of wretchedness, where no one comes near him, and whence he cannot make his escape. This sounds, according to Lev. ch. xiii., very much like the complaint of a leper. The Book of Leviticus there passes over from the uncleanness attending the beginning of human life to the uncleanness of the most terrible disease. Disease is the middle stage between birth and death, and, according to the Eastern notion, leprosy is the worst of all diseases, it is death itself clinging to the still living man (Num. xii. 12), and more than all other evils a stroke of the chastening hand of God (נָגַף), a scourge of God (צָרַעַת). The man suspected of having leprosy was to be subjected to a seven days' quarantine until the determination of the priest's diagnosis; and if the leprosy was confirmed, he was to dwell apart outside the camp (Lev. xiii. 46), where, though not imprisoned, he was nevertheless separated from his dwelling and his family (cf. Job, i. 347), and if a man of position, would feel himself condemned to a state of involuntary retirement. It is natural to refer the בָּלָה, which is closely connected with שָׁתַי, to this separation. עֵינִי, ver. 10, instead of עֵינִי, as in vi. 8, xxxi. 10: his eye has languished, vanished away (בָּלָה of the same root as tābescere, cognate with the root of הִינֵנִי, lxviii. 3), in consequence of (his) affliction. He calls and calls upon Jahve, stretches out (שָׁטַח, expandere, according to the Arabic, more especially after the manner of a roof) his hands (palmas) towards Him, in order to shield himself from His wrath and to lead Him compassionately to give ear to him. In vers. 11-13 he bases his cry for help upon a twofold wish, viz. to become an object of the miraculous help of God, and to be able to praise Him for it. Neither of these wishes would be realized if he were to die; for that which lies beyond this life is uniform darkness, devoid of any progressive history. With מְהִיִּים alternates רַפְּאִים (sing. רַפָּא), the relaxed ones, i.e. shades (σκιαί) of the nether world. With reference to יוֹרֵי instead of לְהוֹרֹת, vid. Ewald, § 337, b. Beside הַשֵּׁשׁ (Job x. 21 sq.) stands נְשִׁיחַ נְשִׁיחַ, the land of forgetfulness (λήθη), where there is an end of all thinking, feeling, and acting (Eccles. ix. 5, 6, 10), and where the monotony of death, devoid of thought and recollection, reigns. Such is the representation given in the Old Testament of the state beyond the present, even in Ecclesiastes, and in the Apocrypha (Sir. xvii. 27 sq. after Isa. xxxviii. 18 sq.; Baruch ii. 17 sq.); and it was obliged to be thus represented, for in the New Testament not merely the conception of the state after death, but this state itself, is become a different one.

Vers. 14-19. He who complains thus without knowing any comfort, and yet without despairing, gathers himself up afresh for prayer. With נִסְיָי he contrasts himself with the dead who are separated from God's manifestation of love. Being still in life, although under wrath that apparently has no end, he strains every nerve to struggle through in prayer until he shall reach God's love. His complaints are petitions, for they are complaints that are poured forth before God. The destiny under which for a long time he has been more like one dying than living, reaches back even into his youth. מִנְעָר (since נֶעַר is everywhere undeclined) is equivalent to מִנְעָרִי. The ἐξηπορήθην of the LXX. is the right indicator for the understanding of the ἀπαξ λεγ. אֶפְיָה. Aben-Ezra and Kimchi derive it from פָּן, like עָלָה from עָל,* and assign to it the signification of dubitare. But it may be more safely explained after the Arabic words مَأْنُونٌ, أَمْنٌ, أَمْنٌ (root ا ف ن, to urge forwards, push), in which the fundamental notion of driving back, narrowing and exhausting, is transferred to a weakening or weakness of the intellect. We might also compare פָּנָי, “to disappear, vanish, pass away;” but the ἐξηπορήθη of the LXX. favours the kinship with that <sup>أَفْنَى</sup>, infirma mente et consilii inops fuit,* which has been already compared by Castell. The acrist of the LXX., however, is just as erroneous in this instance as in xlii. 5, lv. 3, lvii. 5. In all these instances the cohortative denotes the inward result following from an outward compulsion, as they say in Hebrew: I lay hold of trembling (Isa. xiii. 8, Job xviii. 20, xxi. 6) or joy (Isa. xxxv. 10, li. 11), when the force of circumstances drives one into such states of mind. Labouring under the burden of divine dispensations of a terrifying character, he finds himself in a state of mental weakness and exhaustion, or of insensible (senseless) fright; over him as their destined goal before many others go God’s burnings of wrath (plur. only in this instance), His terrible decrees (vid. concerning בעַת on xviii. 15) have almost annihilated him. צַמְתָּתִי is not an impossible form (Olshausen, § 251, a), but an intensive form of צַמְתִּי, the last part of the already inflected verb being repeated, as in אָהָבִי הָבִי, Hos. iv. 18 (cf. in the department of the noun, בְּפִיּוֹת, edge-edges = many edges, cxlix. 6), perhaps under the influence of the derivative.† The corrections צַמְתָּתִי (from צַמְתִּי) or צַמְתָּתִי (from צַמְתִּי) are simple enough; but it is more prudent to let tradition judge of that which is possible in the usage of the language. In ver. 18 the burnings become floods; the wrath of God can be compared to every destroying and overthrowing element. The billows threaten to swallow him up, without any helping hand being stretched out to him on the part of any of his lovers and friends. Is ver. 19a to be now explained according to Job xvii. 14, viz. My familiar friends are gloomy darkness;

* Abulwalid also explains אָפְנָה after the Arabic, but in a way that cannot be accepted, viz. “for a long time onwards,” from the Arabic iffân (ibbân, iff, afaf, ifâf, taiffah), time, period—time conceived of in the onward rush, the constant succession of its moments.

† Heidenheim interprets: Thy terrors are become to me as צַמְתָּתִי (Lev. xxv. 23), i.e. inalienably my own.

i.e. instead of those who were hitherto my familiars (Job xix. 14), darkness is become my familiar friend? One would have thought that it ought then to have been מִיִּדְעִי (Schnurrer), or, according to Prov. vii. 4, מוֹדְעִי, and that, in connection with this sense of the noun, מוֹדְעִי ought as subject to have the precedence, that consequently מִיִּדְעִי is subject and מוֹדְעִי predicate: my familiar friends have lost themselves in darkness, are become absolutely invisible (Hitzig at last). But the regular position of the words is kept to if it is interpreted: my familiar friends are reduced to gloomy darkness as my familiar friend, and the plural is justified by Job xix. 14: Mother and sister (do I call) the worm. With this complaint the harp falls from the poet's hands. He is silent, and waits on God, that He may solve this riddle of affliction. From the Book of Job we might infer that He also actually appeared to him. He is more faithful than men. No soul that in the midst of wrath lays hold upon His love, whether with a firm or with a trembling hand, is suffered to be lost.

PSALM LXXXIX.

PRAYER FOR A RENEWAL OF THE MERCIES OF DAVID.

- 2 OF the loving-kindnesses of Jahve for ever will I sing,
To remote generations will I make known Thy faithfulness with my mouth.
- 3 For I say: For ever is mercy being built up,
In the heavens—there dost Thou establish Thy faithfulness.
- 4 “I have made a covenant with My chosen,
I have sworn unto David My servant:
- 5 For ever will I establish thy seed,
And build up thy throne to remote generations.” (Sela.)
- 6 And the heavens praise Thy wondrousness, Jahve,
Thy faithfulness also in the assembly of the holy ones.
- 7 For who in the sky can be compared to Jahve,
Who among the sons of the gods is like unto Jahve?
- 8 A God terrible in the great council of the holy ones,
And fearful above all those who are round about Him.

- 9 Jahve, God of hosts, who is as Thou ? !
A mighty One, Jāh, and Thy faithfulness is round about Thee.
- 10 Thou art He who restraineth the pride of the sea ;
When its waves arise, Thou stillest them.
- 11 THOU hast crushed Rahab as one that is slain,
By the arm of Thy might hast Thou scattered Thy foes.
- 12 Thine are the heavens, Thine also is the earth ;
The earth and that which filleth it hast THOU founded.
- 13 North and south, THOU hast created them ;
Tabor and Hermon shout for joy at Thy name.
- 14 Thine is an arm with heroic strength,
Strong is Thy hand, exalted is Thy right hand.
- 15 Righteousness and right is the foundation of Thy throne, Mercy and truth stand waiting before Thee.
- 16 Blessed are the people who know the joyful sound,
Who walk, O Jahve, in the light of Thy countenance !
- 17 In Thy name do they rejoice continually,
And through Thy righteousness are they exalted.
- 18 For the glory of their mightiness art Thou,
And through Thy favour is our horn exalted.
- 19 For to Jahve belongeth our shield,
And to the Holy One of Israel our king.
- 20 Once Thou spakest in vision to Thy familiar one, and saidst :
“ I have granted help to a mighty one,
I have raised a stripling out of the people.
- 21 I have found David My servant,
With My holy oil have I anointed him ;
- 22 With whom My hand shall be stedfast,
My arm also shall strengthen him.
- 23 An enemy shall not ensnare him,
And the son of wantonness shall not oppress him.

- 24 I will break in pieces his oppressors before him,
And I will smite those who hate him.
- 25 And My faithfulness and My mercy are with him,
And in My Name shall his horn be exalted.
- 26 I will set his hand upon the sea,
And his right hand upon the rivers.
- 27 He shall cry unto Me : My Father art Thou,
My God, and the Rock of my salvation !
- 28 In return I will make him My first-born,
The highest with respect to the kings of the earth.
- 29 For ever will I preserve to him My mercy,
And My covenant shall be inviolable with him.
- 30 I will make his seed to endure for ever,
And his throne like the days of heaven.
- 31 If his children shall forsake My law
And walk not in My judgments ;
- 32 If they profane My statutes
And keep not My commandments :
- 33 Then will I visit their transgression with the rod,
And their iniquity with stripes ;
- 34 Nevertheless My loving-kindness will I not break off from him,
And will not belie My faithfulness—
- 35 I will not profane My covenant
Nor alter the vow of My lips.
- 36 One thing have I sworn by My holiness ;
Verily I will not deceive David :
- 37 His seed shall endure to eternity,
And his throne as the sun before Me.
- 38 As the moon shall it continue for ever—
And the witness in the sky is faithful !” (Sela.)
- 39 And Thou Thyself hast rejected and despised,
Thou hast been wroth with Thine anointed ;

- 40 Thou hast shaken off from Thee the covenant of Thy servant,
Thou hast profaned his diadem to the earth.
- 41 Thou hast broken down all his hedges,
Thou hast laid his strongholds in ruins.
- 42 All who pass by the way spoil him,
He is become a reproach to his neighbours.
- 43 Thou hast exalted the right hand of his oppressors,
Thou hast made all his enemies to rejoice.
- 44 Thou didst also turn back the edge of his sword,
And didst not hold him erect in the battle.
- 45 Thou hast caused him to lose his splendour,
And hast cast his throne down to the ground.
- 46 Thou hast shortened the days of his youth,
Thou hast covered him round with shame. (Sela.)
- 47 How long, Jahve, wilt Thou hide Thyself for ever, Shall Thy wrath burn like fire?
- 48 Remember : I— how utterly perishable !
For what vanity hast Thou created all the children of men !
- 49 Who is the man that should live and not see death,
That should be able to secure his soul against the nether world ? (Sela.)
- 50 Where are Thy former loving-kindnesses, Lord,
Which Thou hast sworn to David in Thy faithfulness ?
- 51 Remember, Lord, the reproach of Thy servants,
That I carry in my bosom the reproach of many peoples,
- 52 Which reproach—Thine enemies, Jahve !—
Which reproach the footsteps of Thine anointed.
- 53           BLESSED BE JAHVE FOR EVERMORE !
              AMEN, AND AMEN.

After having recognised the fact that the double inscription of Ps. lxxxviii. places two irreconcilable statements concerning the origin of that Psalm side by side, we renounce the artifices by which Ethan (אֶתָּן*) the Ezrahite, of the tribe of Judah (1 Kings v. 11 [iv. 31], 1 Chron. ii. 6), is made to be one and the same person with Ethan (Jeduthun) the son of Kushaiah the Merarite, of the tribe of Levi (1 Chron. xv. 17, vi. 29–32 [44–47]), the master of the music together with Asaph and Heman, and the chief of the six classes of musicians over whom his six sons were placed as sub-directors (1 Chron. ch. xxv.).

The collector has placed the Psalms of the two Ezrahites together. Without this relationship of the authors the juxtaposition would also be justified by the reciprocal relation in which the two Psalms stand to one another by their common, striking coincidences with the Book of Job. As to the rest, however, Ps. lxxxviii. is a purely individual, and Ps. lxxxix. a thoroughly national Psalm. Both the poetical character and the situation of the two Psalms are distinct.

The circumstances in which the writer of Ps. lxxxix. finds himself are in most striking contradiction to the promises given to the house of David. He revels in the contents of these promises, and in the majesty and faithfulness of God, and then he pours forth his intense feeling of the great distance between these and the present circumstances in complaints over the afflicted lot of the anointed of God, and prays God to be mindful of His promises, and on the other hand, of the reproach by which at this time His anointed and His people are overwhelmed. The anointed one is not the nation itself (Hitzig), but he who at that time wears the crown. The crown of the king is defiled to the ground; his throne is cast down to the earth; he is become grey-headed before his time, for all the fences of his land are broken through, his fortresses faller and his enemies have driven him out of the field, so that reproach and scorn follow him at every step.

There was no occasion for such complaints in the reign of Solomon; but surely in the time of Rehoboam, into the first decade of whose reign Ethan the Ezrahite may have survived king Solomon, who died at the age of sixty. In the fifth year of Rehoboam, Shishak (שִׁשַׁק = Σέσραχης = Sheshonk I.), the first Pharaoh of the twenty-second (Bubastic) dynasty, marched against Jerusalem with a large army gathered together out of many nations, conquered the fortified cities of Judah, and spoiled the Temple and Palace, even carrying away with him the golden shields of Solomon—a circumstance which the history bewails in a very especial manner. At that time Shemaiah preached repentance, in the time of the greatest calamity of war; king and princes humbled themselves; and in the midst of judgment Jerusalem accordingly experienced the gracious forbearance of God, and was spared. God did not complete his destruction, and there also again went forth דְּבָרִים טוֹבִים, i.e. (cf. Josh. xxiii. 14, Zech. i. 13) kindly comforting words from God, in Judah. Such is the narrative in the Book of Kings (1 Kings xiv. 25-28) and as supplemented by the chronicler (2 Chron. xii. 1-12).

During this very period Ps. lxxxix. took its rise. The young Davidic king, whom loss and disgrace make prematurely old, is Rehoboam, that man of Jewish appearance whom Pharaoh Sheshonk is bringing among other captives before the god Amun in the monumental picture of Karnak, and who bears before him in his embattled ring the words Judhmelek (King of Judah)—one of the finest and most reliable discoveries of Champollion, and one of the greatest triumphs of his system of hieroglyphics.*

Ps. lxxxix. stands in kindred relationship not only to Ps. lxxiv., but besides Ps. lxxix., also to Ps. lxxvii., lxxviii., all of which glance back to the earliest times in the history of Israel. They are all Asaphic Psalms, partly old Asaphic (lxxvii., lxxviii.), partly later ones (lxxiv., lxxix.). From this fact we see that the Psalms of Asaph were the favourite models in that school of the four wise men to which the two Ezrahites belong.

Vers. 2-5. The poet, who, as one soon observes, is a חַכָּם (for the very beginning of the Psalm is remarkable and ingenious), begins with the confession of the inviolability of the mercies promised to the house of David, i.e. of the חַסְדֵי יְהוָה

הַנְּאֻמָּיִם, Isa. lv. 3.* God's faithful love towards the house of David, a love faithful to His promises, will he sing without ceasing, and make it known with his mouth, i.e. audibly and publicly (cf. Job xix. 16), to the distant posterity. Instead of הַפְּהִי, we find here, and also in Lam. iii. 22, הַסְּהִי with a not merely slightly closed syllable. The Lamed of לָרַר וְרַר is, according to ciii. 7, cxlv. 12, the datival Lamed. With כִּי־אֶמְרָתִי (LXX., Jerome, contrary to ver. 3*b*, ὅτι εἶπας) the poet bases his resolve upon his conviction. נִבְנָה means not so much to be upheld in building, as to be in the course of continuous building (e.g. Job xxii. 23, Mal. iii. 15, of an increasingly prosperous condition). Loving-kindness is for ever (accusative of duration) in the course of continuous building, viz. upon the unshakeable foundation of the promise of grace, inasmuch as it is fulfilled in accordance therewith. It is a building with a most solid foundation, which will not only not fall into ruins, but, adding one stone of fulfilment upon another, will rise ever higher and higher. שָׁמַיִם then stands first as casus absol., and הָהֵם is, as in xix. 5, a pronoun having a backward reference to it. In the heavens, which are exalted above the rise and fall of things here below, God establishes His faithfulness, so that it stands fast as the sun above the earth, although the condition of things here below seems sometimes to contradict it (cf. cxix. 89). Now follow in vers. 4, 5 the direct words of God, the sum of the promises given to David and to his seed in 2 Sam. ch. vii., at which the poet arrives more naturally in vers. 20 sqq. Here they are strikingly devoid of connection. It is the special substance of the promises that is associated in thought with the "loving-kindness" and "truth" of ver. 3, which is expanded as it were appositionally therein. Hence also אֶבְנֶה and יִבְנֶה, תִּכְנֶן and יִכְנֶן correspond to one another. David's seed, by virtue of divine faithfulness, has an eternally sure existence; Jahve builds up David's throne "into generation and generation," inasmuch as He causes it to rise ever fresh and vigorous, never as that which is growing old and feeble.

Vers. 6-9. At the close of the promises in vers. 4, 5 the music is to become forte. And יודי attaches itself to this jubilant Sela. In vers. 6-19 there follows a hymnic description of the exalted majesty of God, more especially of His omnipotence and faithfulness, because the value of the promise is measured by the character of the person who promises. The God of the promise is He who is praised by the heavens and the holy ones above. His way of acting is בְּלֵא, of a transcendent, paradoxical, wondrous order, and as such the heavens praise it; it is praised (יודי, according to Ges. § 137, 3) in the assembly of the holy ones, i.e. of the spirits in the other world, the angels (as in Job v. 1, xv. 15, cf. Deut. xxxiii. 2), for He is peerlessly exalted above the heavens and the angels. יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה, poetic singular instead of יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶיִם (vid. supra on lxxvii. 18), which is in itself already poetical; and עָרַץ, not, as e.g. in Isa. xl. 18, in the signification to co-ordinate, but in the medial sense: to rank with, be equal to. Concerning בְּנֵי אֱלֹהִים vid. on xxix. 1. In the great council (concerning סוּד, of both genders, perhaps like כּוֹס, vid. on xxv. 14) of the holy ones also, Jahve is terrible; He towers above all who are about Him (1 Kings xxii. 19, cf. Dan. vii. 10) in terrible majesty. רָבָה might, according to lxii. 3, lxxviii. 15, be an adverb, but according to the order of the words it may more appropriately be regarded as an adjective; cf. Job xxxi. 34, כִּי אֶעְרֹץ הַמֶּלֶךְ רָבָה, "when I feared the great multitude." In ver. 9 He is apostrophized with אֱלֹהֵי עֲבֹתָו as being the One exalted above the heavens and the angels. The question "Who is as Thou?" takes its origin from Ex. xv. 11. הַיְיָ is not the construct form, but the principal form, like יְיָדִי, יְיָרִי, and is a Syriasm; for the verbal stem יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה is native to the Aramaic, in which יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה = יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה. In יִהְיֶה, what God is is reduced to the briefest possible expression (vid. lxviii. 19). In the words, "Thy faithfulness compasseth Thee round about," the primary thought of the poet again breaks through. Such a God it is who has the faithfulness with which He fulfils all His promises, and the promises given to the house of David also, as His constant surrounding. His glory would only strike one with terror; but the faithfulness which encompasses Him softens the sunlike brilliancy of His glory, and awakens trust in so majestic a Ruler.

Vers. 10-15. At the time of the poet the nation of the house of David was threatened with assault from violent foes ; and this fact gives occasion for this picture of God's power in the kingdom of nature. He who rules the raging of the sea, also rules the raging of the sea of the peoples, lxxv. 8. תִּשְׁבַּח, a proud rising, here of the sea, like תִּשְׁבַּח in xlvi. 4. Instead of תִּשְׁבַּח, Hitzig pleasantly enough reads תִּשְׁבַּח = תִּשְׁבַּח from תִּשְׁבַּח ; but תִּשְׁבַּח is also possible so far as language is concerned, either as an infinitive = תִּשְׁבַּח, xxviii. 2, Isa. i. 14 (instead of תִּשְׁבַּח), or as an infinitival noun, like תִּשְׁבַּח, loftiness, Job xx. 6, with a likewise rejected Nun. The formation of the clause favours our taking it as a verb : when its waves rise, Thou stillest them. From the natural sea the poet comes to the sea of the peoples ; and in the doings of God at the Red Sea a miraculous subjugation of both seas took place at one and the same time. It is clear from lxxiv. 13-17, Isa. li. 9, that Egypt is to be understood by Rahab in this passage as in lxxxvii. 4. The word signifies first of all impetuosity, violence, then a monster, like "the wild beast of the reed," lxxviii. 31, i.e. the leviathan or the dragon. תִּשְׁבַּח is conjugated after the manner of the Lamed He verbs, as in xliv. 20. תִּשְׁבַּח is to be understood as describing the event or issue (vid. xviii. 43) : so that in its fall the proudly defiant kingdom is like one fatally smitten. Thereupon in vers. 12-15 again follows in the same co-ordination first the praise of God drawn from nature, then from history. Jahve's are the heavens and the earth. He is the Creator, and for that very reason the absolute owner, of both. The north and the right hand, i.e. the south, represent the earth in its entire compass from one region of the heavens to the other. Tabor on this side of the Jordan represents the west (cf. Hos. v. 1), and Hermon opposite the east of the Holy Land. Both exult by reason of the name of God ; by their fresh, cheerful look they give the impression of joy at the glorious revelation of the divine creative might manifest in themselves. In ver. 14 the praise again enters upon the province of history. "An arm with (זֶרֶעַ) heroic strength," says the poet, inasmuch as he distinguishes between the attribute inherent in God and the medium of its manifestation in history. His throne has as its זֶרֶעַ, i.e. its immovable foundation (Prov. xvi. 12, xxv. 5), righteousness of action and right, by which all action is regulated, and which is unceasingly realized by means of the action.

And mercy and truth wait upon Him. קָרַם פָּנָי is not: to go before any one (הִלֵּךְ לְפָנָי, lxxxv. 14), but anticipatorily to present one's self to any one, lxxxviii. 14, xc. 2, Mic. vi. 6. Mercy and truth, these two genii of sacred history (xliii. 3), stand before His face like waiting servants watching upon His nod.

Vers. 16-19. The poet has now described what kind of God He is upon whose promise the royal house in Israel depends. Blessed, then, is the people that walks in the light of His countenance. הִלֵּךְ of a self-assured, stately walk. The words יְרַעֲי תְרוּעָה are the statement of the ground of the blessing interwoven into the blessing itself: such a people has abundant cause and matter for exultation (cf. lxxxiv. 5). תְרוּעָה is the festive sound of joy of the mouth (Num. xxiii. 21), and of trumpets or sackbuts (xxvii. 6). This confirmation of the blessing is expanded in vers. 17-19. Jahve's שֵׁם, i.e. revelation or manifestation, becomes to them a ground and object of unceasing joy; by His צִדְקָה, i.e. the rigour with which He binds Himself to the relationship He has entered upon with His people and maintains it, they are exalted above abjectness and insecurity. He is תְּפִאֲרַת עֻזָּם, the ornament of their strength, i.e. their strength which really becomes an ornament to them. In ver. 18<sup>b</sup> the poet declares Israel to be this happy people. Pinsker's conjecture, קָרַם (following the Targum), destroys the transition to ver. 19, which is formed by ver. 18<sup>b</sup>. The plural reading of Kimchi and of older editions (e.g. Bomberg's), קָרַמִּי, is incompatible with the figure; but it is immaterial whether we read תְּרִים with the Chethâb (Targum, Jerome), or with the Kerî (LXX., Syriac) תְּרִים. * מְלִכְנוּ and מְנִינְנוּ in ver. 19 are parallel designations of the human king of Israel; מֶלֶךְ as in xlvi. 10, but not in lxxxiv. 10. For we are not compelled, with a total disregard of the limits to the possibilities of style (Ew. § 310, a), to render ver. 19<sup>b</sup>: and the Holy One of Israel, (as to Him, He) is our King (Hitzig), since we do not bring down the Psalm beyond the time of the kings. Israel's shield, Israel's king, the poet says in the holy defiant confidence of faith, is Jahve's, belongs to the Holy One of Israel, i.e. he stands as His own possession under the protection of Jahve, the Holy One, who has taken Israel to Himself for a possession; it is therefore impossible that the Davidic throne should become a prey to any worldly power.

Vers. 20-23. Having thus again come to refer to the king of Israel, the poet now still further unfolds the promise given to the house of David. The present circumstances are a contradiction to it. The prayer to Jahve, for which the way is thus prepared, is for the removal of this contradiction. A long line, extending beyond the measure of the preceding lines, introduces the promises given to David. With  $\text{אִן}$  the respective period of the past is distinctly defined. The intimate friend of Jahve ( $\text{הַסֵּדֵר}$ ) is Nathan (1 Chron. xvii. 15) or David, according as we translate  $\text{בְּחִזּוֹן}$  "in a vision" or "by means of a vision." But side by side with the  $\text{לְהַסִּדֵּר}$  we also find the preferable reading  $\text{לְהַסִּדֵּר}$ , which is followed in the renderings of the LXX., Syriac, Vulgate, Targum, Aquila, Symmachus, and the Quarta, and is adopted by Rashi, Aben-Ezra, and others, and taken up by Heidenheim and Baer. The plural refers to Samuel and Nathan, for the statement brings together what was revealed to these two prophets concerning David.  $\text{עֲזָרָה}$  is assistance as a gift, and that, as the designation of the person succoured by it ( $\text{עֲזָרָה עָלַי}$  as in xxi. 6) with  $\text{זְבוּר}$  shows, aid in battle.  $\text{בְּחַיִּיר}$  (from  $\text{בָּתָר} = \text{בָּגֵר}$  in the Mishna: to ripen, to be manly or of marriageable age, distinct from  $\text{בְּחַיִּיר}$  in ver. 4) is a young man, adolescens: while yet a young man David was raised out of his humble lowly condition (lxxviii. 71) high above the people. When he received the promise (2 Sam. ch. vii.) he had been anointed and had attained to the lordship over all Israel. Hence the preterites in vers. 20, 21, which are followed by promissory futures from ver. 22 onwards.  $\text{תִּבְנוֹן}$  is fut. Niph., to be established, to prove one's self to be firm, unchangeable (lxxviii. 37), a stronger expression than  $\text{תִּהְיֶינָה$ , 1 Sam. xviii. 12, 14, 2 Sam. iii. 10. The Hiph.  $\text{תִּשְׂפֵא}$ , derived from  $\text{שָׂפָה} = \text{נִשְׂפָה}$ , to credit (vid. on Isa. xxiv. 2; Gesenius, Hengstenberg), does not give any suitable sense; it therefore signifies here as elsewhere, "to impose upon, surprise," with קָ, as in lv. 16 with עָל. Ver. 23b is the echo of 2 Sam. vii. 10.

Vers. 24-30. What is promised in ver. 26 is world-wide dominion, not merely dominion within the compass promised in the primeval times (Gen. xv. 18, 2 Chron. ix. 26), in which case it ought to have been said וּבְנְהַר (of the Euphrates). Nor does the promise, however, sound so definite and boundless here as in lxxii. 8, but it is indefinite and universal, without any need for our asking what rivers are intended by נְהַרֹתָיִךְ, like שָׁלַח in Isa. xi. 14, of a giving and taking possession. With אָרְרָאֲנִי (with retreated tone, as in cxix. 63, 125) God tells with what He will answer David's filial love. Him who is the latest-born among the sons of Jesse, God makes the first-born (בְּכוֹר from בָּכַר, to be early, opp. לְאַחֵר, to be late, vid. Job, ii. 21), and therefore the most favoured of the "sons of the Most High," lxxxii. 6. And as, according to Deut. xxviii. 1, Israel is to be high (עָלִיּוֹן) above all nations of the earth, so David, Israel's king, in whom Israel's national glory realizes itself, is made as the high one (עָלִיּוֹן) with respect to the kings, i.e. above the kings, of the earth. In the person of David his seed is included; and it is that position of honour which, after having been only prelusively realized in David and Solomon, must go on being fulfilled in his seed exactly as the promise runs. The covenant with David is, according to ver. 29, one that shall stand for ever. David is therefore, as ver. 30 affirms, eternal in his seed; God will make David's seed and throne לְעַד, into eternal, i.e. into such as will abide for ever, like the days of heaven, everlasting. This description of eternal duration is, as also in Sir. xlv. 15, Bar. i. 11, taken from Deut. xi. 21; the whole of ver. 30 is a poetic reproduction of 2 Sam. vii. 16.

Vers. 31-38. Now follows the paraphrase of 2 Sam. vii. 14, that the faithlessness of David's line in relation to the covenant shall not interfere with (annul) the faithfulness of God—a thought with which one might very naturally console one's self in the reign of Rehoboam. Because God has placed the house of David in a filial relationship to Himself, He will chastise the apostate members as a father chastises his son; cf. Prov. xxiii. 13 sq. In 1 Chron. xvii. 13 the chronicler omits the words of 2 Sam. vii. 14 which there provide against perverted action (הִצְוֹת) on the part of the seed of David; our

Psalm proves their originality. But even if, as history shows, this means of chastisement should be ineffectual in the case of individuals, the house of David as such will nevertheless remain ever in a state of favour with Him. In ver. 34 וְחִסְדֵי לֵאמֹר וְחִסְדֵי לֵאמֹר in 2 Sam. vii. 15 (LXX., Targum): the fut. Hiph. of פָּרַר is otherwise always פָּרַר; the conjecture פָּרַר is therefore natural, yet even the LXX. translators (οὐ μὴ διασκεδάσω) had פָּרַר before them. שֶׁנֶּרְךָ as in xliv. 18. The covenant with David is sacred with God: He will not profane it (לֹא יִלְלֶנּוּ, to loose the bonds of sanctity). He will fulfil what has gone forth from His lips, i.e. His vow, according to Deut. xxiii. 24 [23], cf. Num. xxx. 3 [2]. One thing hath He sworn to David; not: once = once for all (LXX.), for what is introduced by ver. 36 (cf. xxvii. 4) and follows in vers. 37, 38, is in reality one thing (as in lxii. 12, two). He hath sworn it per sanctitatem suam. Thus, and not in sanctuario meo, בְּקִרְיָשִׁי in this passage and Amos iv. 2 (cf. on lx. 8) is to be rendered, for elsewhere the expression is בֵּית, Gen. xxii. 16, Isa. xlv. 23, or בְּנִפְשִׁי, Amos vi. 8, Jer. li. 14, or בְּשִׁמְיִי, Jer. xlv. 26, or בְּיָמֵי, Isa. lxii. 8. It is true we do not read any set form of oath in 2 Sam. ch. vii., 1 Chron. ch. xvii., but just as Isaiah, ch. liv. 9, takes the divine promise in Gen. viii. 21 as an oath, so the promise so earnestly and most solemnly pledged to David may be accounted by Psalm-poesy (here and in cxxxii. 11), which reproduces the historical matter of fact, as a promise attested with an oath. With אִם in ver. 36b God asserts that He will not disappoint David in reference to this one thing, viz. the perpetuity of his throne. This shall stand for ever as the sun and moon; for these, though they may one day undergo a change (cii. 27), shall nevertheless never be destroyed. In the presence of 2 Sam. vii. 16 it looks as if ver. 36b ought to be rendered: and as the witness in the clouds shall it (David's throne) be faithful (perpetual). By the witness in the clouds one would then have to understand the rainbow as the celestial memorial and sign of an everlasting covenant. Thus Luther, Geier, Schmid, and others. But neither this rendering, nor the more natural one, "and as the perpetual, faithful witness in the clouds," is admissible in connection with the absence of the כִּי of comparison. Accordingly Hengstenberg, following the example of Jewish expositors tors, renders: "and the witness in the clouds is perpetual," viz. the moon, so that the continuance of the Davidic line would be associated with the moon, just as the continuance of the condemned earth is with the rainbow. But in what sense would the moon have the name, without example elsewhere, of witness? Just as the Book of Job was the key to the conclusion of Ps. lxxxviii., so it is the key to this ambiguous verse of the Psalm before us. It has to be explained according to Job xvi. 19, where Job says: "Behold in heaven is my witness, and my surety in the heights." Jahve, the אֱלֹהִים נֹאמָר (Deut. vii. 9), seals His sworn promise with the words, "and the witness in the sky (ethereal heights) is faithful" (cf. concerning this Waw in connection with asseverations, Ew. § 340, c). Hengstenberg's objection, that Jahve cannot be called His own witness, is disposed of by the fact that עֵד frequently signifies the person who testifies anything concerning himself; in this sense, in fact, the whole Tōra is called עֵדוּת ה' (the testimony of Jahve).

Vers. 39-46. Now after the poet has turned his thoughts towards the beginnings of the house of David which were so rich in promise, in order that he might find comfort under the sorrowful present, the contrast of the two periods is become all the more sensible to him. With וְאַתָּה in ver. 39 (And Thou—the same who hast promised and affirmed this with an oath) his Psalm takes a new turn, for which reason it might even have been וְעַתָּה. וְנָח is used just as absolutely here as in xliv. 24, lxxiv. 1, lxxvii. 8, so that it does not require any object to be supplied out of ver. 39b. וְנִאֲרָתָה in ver. 40 the LXX. renders κατέστρεψας; it is better rendered in Lam. ii. 7 ἀπερίναξαι; for נִאֲרָ is synonymous with נִעַר, to shake off, push away, cf. Arabic el-menā'ir, the thrusters (with the lance). עֵבְרִי is a vocational name of the king as such. His crown is sacred as being the insignia of a God-bestowed office. God has therefore made the sacred thing vile by casting it to the ground (הִלֵּל לְאֲרֶץ, as in lxxiv. 17, to cast profaningly to the ground). The primary passage to vers. 41, 42 is lxxx. 13. "His hedges" are all the boundary and protecting fences which the land of the king has; and מְבֻצְרָיו "the fortresses" of his land (in both instances without כֹּל, because matters have not yet come to such a pass).\* In שְׁשָׁחוּ the notions of the king and of the land blend together. עֲבַרְיָדָרָה are the hordes of the peoples passing through the land. שְׁבִנְיָו are the neighbouring peoples that are otherwise liable to pay tribute to the house of David, who sought to take every possible advantage of that weakening of the Davidic kingdom. In ver. 44 we are neither to translate "rock of his sword" (Hengstenberg), nor "O rock" (Olshausen). צוּר does not merely signify rupes, but also from another root (צוּר, صار, originally of the grating or shrill noise produced by pressing and squeezing, then more particularly to cut or cut off with pressure, with a sharply set knife or the like) a knife or a blade (cf. English knife, and German kneifen, to nip): God has decreed it that the edge or blade of the sword of the king has been turned back by the enemy, that he has not been able to maintain his ground in battle (הִקְמַתּוֹ with  $\bar{e}$  instead of  $\dot{i}$ , as also when the tone is not moved forward, Mic. v. 4). In ver. 45 the Mem of מִטְהָר, after the analogy of Ezek. xvi. 41, xxxiv. 10, and other passages, is a preposition: cessare fecisti eum a splendore suo. A noun מִטְהָר = מְטָהֵר with Dag. dirimens,† like מְקַדֵּשׁ Ex. xv. 17, מְנַזֵּר Nah. iii. 17 (Abulwalid, Aben-Ezra, Parchon, Kimchi, and others), in itself improbable in the signification required here, is not found either in post-biblical or in biblical Hebrew. טָהַר, like צִהַר, signifies first of all not purity, but brilliancy. Still the form טָהַר does not lie at the basis of it in this instance; for the reading found here just happens not to be טָהָרוּ, but מְטָהָרוּ; and the reading adopted by Norzi, Heidenheim, and Baer, as also by Nissel and others, so far as form is concerned is not distinct from it, viz. מִטְהָרוּ (mīt-tōharo), the character of the Shebâ being determined by the analogy of the א following (cf. בַּסְעָרָה, 2 Kings ii. 1), which presupposes the principal form מָהַר (Böttcher, § 386, cf. supra, ii. 31, note). The personal tenor of ver. 46*a* requires that it should be referred to the then reigning Davidic king, but not as dying before his time (Olshausen), but as becoming prematurely old by reason of the sorrowful experiences of his reign. The larger half of the kingdom has been wrested from him; Egypt and the neighbouring nations also threaten the half that remains to him; and instead of the kingly robe, shame completely covers him.

† The view of Pinsker (Einleitung, S. 69), that this Dag. is not a sign of the doubling of the letter, but a diacritic point (that preceded the invention of the system of vowel-points), which indicated that the respective letter was to be pronounced with a Chateph vowel (e.g. mītōhar), is incorrect. The doubling Dag. renders the Shebâ audible, and having once become audible it readily receives this or that colouring according to the nature of its consonant and of the neighbouring vowel.

Vers. 47-52. After this statement of the present condition of things the psalmist begins to pray for the removal of all that is thus contradictory to the promise. The plaintive question, ver. 47, with the exception of one word, is verbatim the same as lxxix. 5. The wrath to which quousque refers, makes itself to be felt, as the intensifying (vid. xiii. 2) לִנְצַח implies, in the intensity and duration of everlasting wrath. הָלַךְ is this temporal life which glides past secretly and unnoticed (xvii. 14); and זְכַרְתִּי אֲנִי is not equivalent to זְכַרְתִּי (instead of which by way of emphasis only זְכַרְתִּי אֲנִי can be said), but אֲנִי מִהֲחֻלָּה stands for אֲנִי מִהֲחֻלָּה—according to the sense equivalent to אֲנִי מִהֲחֻלָּה, xxxix. 5, cf. 6. The conjecture of Houbigant and modern expositors, זְכַרְתִּי אֲנִי (cf. ver. 51), is not needed, since the inverted position of the words is just the same as in xxxix. 5. In ver. 48*b* it is not pointed עַל-מָה שָׂוִי, “wherefore (Job x. 2, xiii. 14) hast Thou in vain (cxxxvii. 1) created?” (Hengstenberg), but עַל-מָה שָׂוִי, on account of or for what a nothing (מִה-שׁוּיָא) belonging together as adjective and substantive, as in xxx. 10, Job xxvi. 14) hast Thou created all the children of men? (De Wette, Hupfeld, and Hitzig.) עַל, of the ground of a matter and direct motive, which is better suited to the question in ver. 49 than the other way of taking it: the life of all men passes on into death and Hades; why then might not God, within this brief space of time, this handbreadth, manifest Himself to His creatures as the merciful and kind, and not as the always angry God? The music strikes in here, and how can it do so otherwise than in elegiac mesto? If God’s justice tarries and fails in this present world, then the Old Testament faith becomes sorely tempted and tried, because it is not able to find consolation in the life beyond. Thus it is with the faith of the poet in the present juncture of affairs, the outward appearance of which is in such perplexing contradiction to the loving-kindness sworn to David and also hitherto vouchsafed. הַחֲסִדִים has not the sense in this passage of promises of favour, as in 2 Chron. vi. 42, but proofs of favour; הַרְאִישָׁנִים glances back at the long period of the reigns of David and of Solomon.* The Asaph Psalm lxxvii. and the Tephilla Isa. ch. lxiii. contain similar complaints, just as in connection with ver. 51a one is reminded of the Asaph Psalm lxxix. 2, 10, and in connection with ver. 52 of lxxix. 12. The phrase נָשָׂא בְחֵיקוֹ is used in other instances of loving nurture, Num. xi. 12, Isa. xl. 11. In this passage it must have a sense akin to חֲרַפְתָּ עֲבָרֶיךָ. It is impossible on syntactic grounds to regard פְּלִרְבִים עַמִּים as still dependent upon חֲרַפְתָּ (Ewald) or, as Hupfeld is fond of calling it, as a "referential" genitive. Can it be that the כל is perhaps a mutilation of בְּלִמָּת, after Ezek. xxxvi. 15, as Böttcher suggests? We do not need this conjecture. For (1) to carry any one in one's bosom, if he is an enemy, may signify: to be obliged to cherish him with the vexation proceeding from him (Jer. xv. 15), without being able to get rid of him; (2) there is no doubt that רְבִים can, after the manner of numerals, be placed before the substantive to which it belongs, xxxii. 10, Prov. xxxi. 29, 1 Chron. xxviii. 5, Neh. ix. 28; cf. the other position, e.g., in Jer. xvi. 16; (3) consequently פְּלִרְבִים עַמִּים may signify the "totality of many peoples" just as well as בְּלִ גּוֹיִם רְבִים in Ezek. xxxi. 6. The poet complains as a member of the nation, as a citizen of the empire, that he is obliged to foster many nations in his bosom, inasmuch as the land of Israel was overwhelmed by the Egyptians and their allies, the Libyans, Troglodytes, and Ethiopians. The אֲשֶׁר which follows in ver. 52 cannot now be referred back over ver. 51b to חֲרַפְתָּ (quâ calumniâ), and yet the relative sense, not the confirmatory (because, quoniam), is at issue. We therefore refer it to עַמִּים, and take אֲוִיבֶיךָ as an apposition, as in cxxxix. 20: who reproach Thee, (as) Thine enemies, Jahve, who reproach the footsteps (עֲקֵבוֹת) as in lxxvii. 20 with Dag. dirimens, which gives it an emotional turn) of Thine anointed, i.e. they follow him everywhere, wheresoever he may go, and whatsoever he may do. With these significant words, עֲקֵבוֹת מִשִׁיתָךְ, the Third Book of the Psalms dies away.

* The Pasek between הַרְאִישָׁנִים and אֲדֹנָי is not designed merely to remove the limited predicate from the Lord, who is indeed the First and the Last, but also to secure its pronunciation to the guttural Aleph, which might be easily passed over after Mem; cf. Gen. i. 27, xxi. 17, xxx. 20, xlii. 21, and frequently.

Ver. 53. The closing doxology of the Third Book.

TAKING REFUGE IN THE LOVING-KINDNESS OF THE ETERNAL
ONE UNDER THE WRATHFUL JUDGMENT OF DEATH.

- 1 O LORD, THOU hast been a place of refuge for us in all generations!
- 2 Before the mountains were brought forth,
And Thou gavest birth to the earth and the world,
And from æon to æon Thou art God!
- 3 Thou turnest mortal man to dust,
And sayest: Return, ye children of men.
- 4 For a thousand years in Thine eyes
Are as yesterday when it passeth,
And a watch in the night.
- 5 Thou carriest them away as with a flood, they become a sleep,
In the morning they are as grass springing up again.
- 6 In the morning it flourisheth and springeth up again,
In the evening it is cut down and it drieth up.
- 7 For we are consumed by Thine anger,
And by Thy fierce anger are we scared away.
- 8 Thou hast set our iniquities before Thee,
Our most secret matter in the light of Thy countenance.
- 9 For all our days are passed away in Thy wrath;
We have spent our years as a whisper.

- 10 The days of our years—their sum is seventy years,
 And, if very many, eighty years ;
 And their pride is labour and vanity,
 For it passed swiftly and we fled away.
- 11 Who knoweth the power of Thine anger
 And the fear of Thee according to Thy wrath ?
- 12 Teach us rightly to number our days,
 That we may gain a wise heart !
- 13 Turn, Jahve—how long ? !—
 And have compassion upon Thy servants.
- 14 Satisfy us at morning-dawn with Thy mercy,
 Then will we joy and rejoice all our days.
- 15 Make us glad according to the days in which Thou hast humbled us,
 The years wherein we have seen evil.
- 16 Let Thy work appear unto Thy servants,
 And Thy glory upon their children.
- 17 And let the graciousness of the Lord our God be upon us,
 And the work of our hands do Thou establish upon us,
 Yea, the work of our hands establish Thou it !

The Fourth Book of the Psalms, corresponding to the ספר במדבר of the Pentateuch, begins with a Prayer of Moses the man of God, which comes out of the midst of the dying off of the older generation during the march through the wilderness. To the name, which could not be allowed to remain so bald, because next to Abraham he is the greatest man known to the Old Testament history of redemption, is added the title of honour אִישׁ הָאֱלֹהִים (as in Deut. xxxiii. 1, Josh. xiv. 6), an ancient name of the prophets which expresses the close relationship of fellowship with God, just as “servant of Jahve” expresses the relationship of service, in accordance with the special office and in relation to the history of redemption, into which Jahve has taken the man and into which he himself has entered. There is scarcely any written memorial of antiquity which so brilliantly justifies the testimony of tradition concerning its origin as does this Psalm, which may have been preserved in some one or other of the older works, perhaps the “Book of Jashar” (Josh. x. 13, 2 Sam. i. 18), until the time of the final redaction of the Psalter. Not alone with respect to its contents, but also with reference to the form of its language, it is perfectly suitable to Moses. Even Hitzig can bring nothing of importance against this view, for the objection that the author in ver. 1 glances back upon past generations, whilst Israel was only born in the time of Moses, is removed by the consideration that the existence of Israel reaches back into the patriarchal times; and there is as little truth in the assertion that the Piel שָׁפַעְנִי in ver. 14 instead of the Hiphil brings the Psalm down into very late times, as in the idea that the Hiph. וְהִאֲבִירָהּ in cxliii. 12 instead of the Piel carries this Ps. cxliii. back into very early times. These trifling points dwindle down to nothing in comparison with the fact that Ps. xc. bears within itself distinct traces of the same origin as the song הַזֵּינִי (Deut. ch. xxxii.), the blessing of Moses (Deut. ch. xxxiii.), the discourses in Deuteronomy, and in general the directly Mosaic portions of the Pentateuch. The Book of the Covenant, together with the Decalogue (Ex. ch. xix.-xxiv.) and Deuteronomy (with the exception of its supplement), are regarded by us, on very good grounds, as the largest originally Mosaic constituent parts of the Pentateuch. The Book of Deuteronomy is תּוֹרַת מֹשֶׁה in a pre-eminent sense.

Vers. 1-4. The poet begins with the confession that the Lord has proved Himself to His own, in all periods of human history, as that which He was before the world was and will be for evermore. God is designedly appealed to by the name אֲרִי, which frequently occurs in the mouth of Moses in the middle books of the Pentateuch, and also in the Song at the Sea, Ex. xv. 17 and in Deut. iii. 24. He is so named here as the Lord ruling over human history with an exaltation ever the same. Human history runs on in לֵרִ יָרִי, so that one period (περίοδος) with the men living cotemporaneous with it goes and another comes; the expression is Deuteronomic (Deut. xxxii. 7). Such a course of generations lies behind the poet; and in them all the Lord has been מָעוֹן to His church, out of the heart of which the poet discourses. This expression too is Deuteronomic (Deut. xxxiii. 27). מָעוֹן signifies a habitation, dwelling-place (vid. on xxvi. 8), more especially God's heavenly and earthly dwelling-place, then the dwelling-place which God

Himself is to His saints, inasmuch as He takes up to Himself, conceals and protects, those who flee to Him from the wicked one and from evil, and turn in to Him (lxxi. 3, xci. 9). In order to express fuisti  $\text{הָיִיתָ}$  was indispensable; but just as fuisti comes from fuo,  $\phi\acute{\upsilon}\omega$ ,  $\text{הָיָה}$  ( $\text{הָיָה}$ ) signifies not a closed, shut up being, but a being that discloses itself, consequently it is fuisti in the sense of te exhibuisti. This historical self-manifestation of God is based upon the fact that He is  $\text{אֵל}$ , i.e. might absolutely, or the absolutely Mighty One; and He was this, as ver. 2 says, even before the beginning of the history of the present world, and will be in the distant ages of the future as of the past. The foundation of this world's history is the creation. The combination  $\text{אֶרֶץ וְתַבָּל}$  shows that this is intended to be taken as the object.  $\text{וְתַחֲוִילֵי}$  (with Metheg beside the  $\bar{e}$  of the final syllable, which is deprived of its accent, vid. on xviii. 20) is the language of address (Rashi): that which is created is in a certain sense born from God ( $\text{יָלַד}$ ), and He brings it forth out of Himself; and this is here expressed by  $\text{הוֹלִיל}$  (as in Deut. xxxii. 18, cf. Isa. li. 2), creation being compared to travail which takes place amidst pains (Psychology, S. 114; tr. p. 137). If, after the example of the LXX. and Targum, one reads as passive  $\text{וְתַחֲוִילֵי}$  (Böttcher, Olshausen, Hitzig) from the Pulal  $\text{הוֹלִיל}$ , Prov. viii. 24,—and this commends itself, since the pre-existence of God can be better dated back beyond facts than beyond the acts of God Himself,—then the conception remains essentially the same, since the Eternal and Absolute One is still to be thought of as  $\text{מְהוֹלֵל}$ . The fact that the mountains are mentioned first of all, harmonizes with Deut. xxxiii. 15. The modus consecutivus is intended to say: before the mountains were brought forth and Thou wast in labour therewith . . . The forming of the mountains consequently coincides with the creation of the earth, which is here as a body or mass called  $\text{אֶרֶץ}$ , and as a continent with the relief of mountains and lowlands is called  $\text{תַּבָּל}$  (cf.  $\text{תַּבָּל אֶרֶץ}$ , Prov. viii. 31, Job xxxvii. 12). To the double clause with  $\text{בְּרָם}$  seq. præ. (cf. on the other hand seq. fut. Deut. xxxi. 21) is appended  $\text{וַיַּעֲוֹלֶם}$  as a second definition of time: before the creation of the world, and from eternity to eternity. The Lord was God before the world was—that is the first assertion of ver. 2; His divine existence reaches out of the unlimited past into the unlimited future—this is the second. לֹא is not vocative, which it sometimes, though rarely, is in the Psalms; it is a predicate, as e.g. in Deut. iii. 24.

This is also to be seen from vers. 3, 4, when ver. 3 now more definitely affirms the omnipotence of God, and ver. 4 the supra-temporality of God or the omnipresence of God in time. The LXX. misses the meaning when it brings over לֹא from ver. 2, and reads לֹא-תֵשֵׁב. The shorter future form תֵּשֵׁב for תֵּשֵׁב stands poetically instead of the longer, as e.g. in xi. 6, xxv. 9; cf. the same thing in the inf. constr. in Deut. xxvi. 12, and both instances together in Deut. xxxii. 8. The poet intentionally calls the generation that is dying away אֲנָשִׁים, which denotes man from the side of his frailty or perishableness; and the new generation בְּנֵי-חַיִּים, with which is combined the idea of entrance upon life. It is clear that עֲדֵי-יָשִׁיב is intended to be understood according to Gen. iii. 19; but it is a question whether אֲפָרָה is conceived of as an adjective (with mutable a), as in xxxiv. 19, Isa. lvii. 15: Thou puttest men back into the condition of crushed ones (cf. on the construction Num. xxiv. 24), or whether as a neutral feminine from פָּרָה (= רָפָה): Thou changest them into that which is crushed = dust, or whether as an abstract substantive like רָפָה, or according to another reading (cf. cxxvii. 2) אֲפָרָה, in Deut. xxiii. 2: to crushing. This last is the simplest way of taking it, but it comes to one and the same thing with the second, since אֲפָרָה signifies crushing in the neuter sense. A fut. consec. follows. The fact that God causes one generation to die off has as its consequence that He calls another into being (cf. the Arabic epithet of God el-mu'id = הַמְּשִׁיב, the Resuscitator). Hofmann and Hitzig take תֵּשֵׁב as imperfect on account of the following וְהִתְאַמַּר: Thou didst decree mortality for men; but the fut. consec. frequently only expresses the sequence of the thoughts or the connection of the matter, e.g. after a future that refers to that which is constantly taking place, Job xiv. 10. God causes men to die without letting them die out; for—so it continues in ver. 4—a thousand years is to Him a very short period, not to be at all taken into account. What now is the connection between that which confirms and that which is confirmed here? It is not so much ver. 3 that is confirmed as ver. 2, to which the former serves for explanation, viz. this, that God as the Almighty (אֵל), in the midst of this change of generations, which is His work, remains Himself eternally the same. This ever the same, absolute existence has its ground herein, that time, although God fills it up with His working, is no limitation to Him. A thousand years, which would make any man who might live through them weary of life, are to Him like a vanishing point. The proposition, as 2 Pet. iii. 8 shows, is also true when reversed: "One day is with the Lord as a thousand years." He is however exalted above all time, inasmuch as the longest period appears to Him very short, and in the shortest period the greatest work can be executed by Him. The standpoint of the first comparison, "as yesterday," is taken towards the end of the thousand of years. A whole millennium appears to God, when He glances over it, just as the yesterday does to us when (פִּי) it is passing by (יַעֲבֹר), and we, standing on the border of the opening day, look back upon the day that is gone. The second comparison is an advance upon the first, and an advance also in form, from the fact that the Caph similitudinis is wanting: a thousand years are to God a watch in the night. אֶשְׁמֹרָה is a night-watch, of which the Israelites reckoned three, viz. the first, the middle, and the morning watch (vid. Winer's Realwörterbuch s. v. Nachtwache). It is certainly not without design that the poet says אֶשְׁמֹרָה בַּלַּיְלָה instead of אֶשְׁמֹרָת הַלַּיְלָה. The night-time is the time for sleep; a watch in the night is one that is slept away, or at any rate passed in a sort of half-sleep. A day that is past, as we stand on the end of it, still produces upon us the impression of a course of time by reason of the events which we can recall; but a night passed in sleep, and now even a fragment of the night, is devoid of all trace to us, and is therefore as it were timeless. Thus is it to God with a thousand years: they do not last long to Him; they do not affect Him; at the close of them, as at the beginning, He is the Absolute One (אֵל). Time is as nothing to Him, the Eternal One. The changes of time are to Him no barrier restraining the realization of His counsel—a truth which has a terrible and a consolatory side. The poet dwells upon the fear which it produces.

Vers. 5-8. Vers. 5, 6 tell us how great is the distance between men and this eternal selfsameness of God. The suffix of וְרִמָּתָם, referred to the thousand years, produces a synallage (since שנה is feminine), which is to be avoided whenever it is possible to do so; the reference to בני־אדם, as being the principal object pointed to in what has gone before, is the more natural, to say the very least. In connection with both ways of applying it, זָרַם does not signify: to cause to rattle down like sudden heavy showers of rain; for the figure that God makes years, or that He makes men (Hitzig: the germs of their coming into being), to rain down from above, is fanciful and strange. זָרַם may also mean to sweep or wash away as with heavy rains, abripere instar nimbi, as the old expositors take it. So too Luther at one time: Du reyssest sie dahyn (Thou carriest them away), for which he substituted later: Du lessest sie dahin faren wie einen Strom (Thou causest them to pass away as a river); but זָרַם always signifies rain pouring down from above. As a sudden and heavy shower of rain, becoming a flood, washes everything away, so God's omnipotence sweeps men away. There is now no transition to another alien figure when the poet continues: שָׁנָה יִהְיֶה. What is meant is the sleep of death, lxxvi. 6, שָׁנָה עוֹלָם, Jer. li. 39, 57, cf. יָשָׁן xiii. 4. He whom a flood carries away is actually brought into a state of unconsciousness, he goes entirely to sleep, i.e. he dies.

From this point the poet certainly does pass on to another figure. The one generation is carried away as by a flood in the night season, and in the morning another grows up. Men are the subject of יִחַלֶּה, as of יִהְיֶה. The collective singular alternates with the plural, just as in ver. 3 the collective אנוש alternates with בני־אדם. The two members of ver. 5 stand in contrast. The poet describes the succession of the generations. One generation perishes as it were in a flood, and another grows up, and this also passes on to the same fate. The meaning in both verses of the חָלַהּ, which has been for the most part, after the LXX., Vulgate, and Luther, erroneously taken to be præterire = interire, is determined in accordance with this idea. The general signification of this verb, which corresponds to the Arabic خلف, is "to follow or move after, to go into the place of another, and in general, of passing over from one place or state into another." Accordingly the Hiphil signifies to put into a new condition, cii. 27, to set a new thing on the place of an old one, Isa. ix. 9 [10], to gain new strength, to take fresh courage, Isa. xl. 31, xli. 1; and of plants: to send forth new shoots, Job xiv. 7; consequently the Kal, which frequently furnishes the perfect for the future Hiphil (Ew. § 127, b, and Hitzig on this passage), of plants signifies: to gain new shoots, not: to sprout (Targum, Syriac), but to sprout again or afresh, regerminare; cf. خَلَفَ, an after-growth, new wood. Perishing humanity renews its youth in ever new generations. Ver. 6a again takes up this thought: in the morning it grows up and shoots afresh, viz. the grass to which men are likened (a figure appropriated by Isa. ch. xl.), in the evening it is cut down and it dries up. Others translate מוֹלֵל to wither (root מל, properly to be long and lax, to allow to hang down long, cf. אָמַלְלָהּ, אָמַלְלָהּ with אָמַל, to hope, i.e. to look forth into the distance); but (1) this Pilel of מוֹלֵל or Poël of מִלֵּל is not favourable to this intransitive way of taking it; (2) the reflexive in lviii. 8 proves that מוֹלֵל signifies to cut off in the front or above, after which perhaps even xxxvii. 2, Job xiv. 2, xviii. 16, by comparison with Job xxiv. 24, are to be explained. In the last passage it runs: as the top of the stalk they are cut off (fut. Niph. of מִלֵּל). Such a cut or plucked ear of corn is called in Deut. xxiii. 26 מִלֵּיָהּ, a Deuteronomic hapaxlegomenon which favours our way of taking the מוֹלֵל (with a most general subject = מוֹלֵל). Thus, too, וַיִּבֶשׂ is better attached to what precedes: the cut grass becomes parched hay. Just such an alternation of morning springing forth and evening drying up is the alternation of the generations of men.

The poet substantiates this in vers. 7 sq. from the experience of those amongst whom he comprehended himself in the אֲנִי of ver. 1. Hengstenberg takes ver. 7 to be a statement of the cause of the transitoriness set forth: its cause is the wrath of God; but the poet does not begin כִּי בְּאַפְּךָ but כִּי כָלִינוּ. The chief emphasis therefore lies upon the perishing, and כִּי is not argumentative but explicative. If the subject of כָּלִינוּ were men in general (Olshausen), then it would be elucidating idem per idem. But, according to ver. 1, those who speak here are those whose refuge the Eternal One is. The poet therefore speaks in the name of the church, and confirms the lot of men from that which his people have experienced even down to the present time. Israel is able out of its own experience to corroborate what all men pass through; it has to pass through the very same experience as a special decree of God's wrath on account of its sins. Therefore in vers. 7, 8 we stand altogether upon historical ground. The testimony of the inscription is here verified in the contents of the Psalm. The older generation that came out of Egypt fell a prey to the sentence of punishment, that they should gradually die off during the forty years' journey through the desert; and even Moses and Aaron, Joshua and Caleb only excepted, were included in this punishment on special grounds, Num. xiv. 26 sqq., Deut. i. 34-39. This it is over which Moses here laments. God's wrath is here called אַף and קִיָּה; just as the Book of Deuteronomy (in distinction from the other books of the Pentateuch) is fond of combining these two synonyms (Deut. ix. 19, xxix. 22, 27, cf. Gen. xxvii. 44 sq.). The breaking forth of the infinitely great opposition of the holy nature of God against sin has swept away the church in the person of its members, even down to the present moment; נִבְהַל as in civ. 29, cf. בְּהִלָּה, Lev. xxvi. 16. It is the consequence of their sins. עוֹן signifies sin as the perversion of the right standing and conduct; עֲלֵיִם, that which is veiled in distinction from manifest sins, is the sum-total of hidden moral, and that sinful, conduct. There is no necessity to regard עֲלֵיִמִי as a defective plural; עֲלֵיִמִים signifies youth (from a radically distinct word, עֵלִים); secret sins would therefore be called עֲלֵיִמוֹת according to xix. 13. God sets transgressions before Him when, because the measure is full and forgiveness is inadmissible, He makes them an object of punishment. שֶׁפָּת (Kerî, as in viii. 7 : שֶׁפֶתָּה, cf. vi. 4 וְאִפָּת, lxxiv. 6 וְעִפָּת) has the accent upon the ultima before an initial guttural. The parallel to לְנִינְהָרָה is לְמֵאוֹר פְּנֵיָהּ. אוֹר is light, and מֵאוֹר is either a body of light, as the sun and moon, or, as in this passage, the circle of light which the light forms. The countenance of God (פְּנֵי ה') is God's nature in its inclination towards the world, and מֵאוֹר ה' פְּנֵי ה' is the doxa of His nature that is turned towards the world, which penetrates everything that is conformed to God as a gracious light (Num. vi. 25), and makes manifest to the bottom everything that is opposed to God and consumes it as a wrathful fire.

Vers. 9-12. After the transitoriness of men has now been confirmed in vers. 6 sq. out of the special experience of Israel, the fact that this particular experience has its ground in a divine decree of wrath is more definitely confirmed from the facts of this experience, which, as vers. 11 sq. complain, unfortunately have done so little to urge them on to the fear of God, which is the condition and the beginning of wisdom. In ver. 9 we distinctly hear the Israel of the desert speaking. That was a generation that fell a prey to the wrath of God (דִּיּוֹר עֲבָרָתוֹ, Jer. vii. 29). עֲבָרָה is wrath that passes over, breaks through the bounds of subjectivity. All their days (cf. ciii. 15) are passed away (פָּנָה, to turn one's self, to turn, e.g. Deut. i. 24) in such wrath, i.e. thoroughly pervaded by it. They have spent their years like a sound (כְּמִוְהָנָה), which has hardly gone forth before it has passed away, leaving no trace behind it; the noun signifies a gentle dull sound, whether a murmur (Job xxxvii. 2) or a groan (Ezek. ii. 10). With זֶהָם in ver. 10 the sum is stated: there are comprehended therein seventy years; they include, run up to so many. Hitzig renders: the days wherein (בָּהֶם) our years consist are seventy years; but שְׁנֹתָיו side by side with יָמֵי must be regarded as its more minute genitival definition, and the accentuation cannot be objected to. Beside the plural שָׁנִים the poetic plural שְׁנֹת appears here, and it also occurs in Deut. xxxii. 7 (and nowhere else in the Pentateuch). That of which the sum is to be stated stands first of all as a casus absol. Luther's rendering: Siebenzig Jar, wens hoch kompt so sindt achtzig (seventy years, or at the furthest eighty years), as Symmachus also meant by his ἐν παραδόξῳ (in Chrysostom), is confirmed by the Talmudic לְגִבוּרָתָא, "to attain to extreme old age" (B. Moëd katan 28a), and rightly approved of by Hitzig and Olshausen. נְבוּרָה signifies in lxxi. 16 full strength, here full measure. Seventy, or at most eighty years, were the average sum of the extreme term of life to which the generation dying out in the wilderness attained. לְרַבָּם the LXX. renders τὸ πλείον αὐτῶν, but לְרַבָּם is not equivalent to רַבָּם. The verb רָחַב signifies to behave violently, e.g. of importunate entreaty, Prov. vi. 3, of insolent treatment, Isa. iii. 5, whence רָחַב (here רָחַב), violence, impetuosity, and more especially a boastful vaunting appearance or coming forward, Job ix. 13, Isa. xxx. 7. The poet means to say that everything of which our life is proud (riches, outward appearance, luxury, beauty, etc.), when regarded in the right light, is after all only עָמַל, inasmuch as it causes us trouble and toil, and נִסָּי, because without any true intrinsic merit and worth. To this second predicate is appended the confirmatory clause. שִׁי is infin. adverb. from שָׁי, חָיִשׁ, Deut. xxxii. 35 : speedily, swiftly (Symmachus, the Quinta, and Jerome). The verb נָּ signified transire in all the Semitic dialects; and following this signification, which is applied transitively in Num. xi. 31, the Jewish expositors and Schultens correctly render : nam transit velocissime. Following upon the perfect נָּ, the modus consecutivus וְנִעְפָּר maintains its retrospective signification. The strengthening of this mood by means of the intentional ah is more usual with the 1st pers. sing., e.g. Gen. xxxii. 6, than with the 1st pers. plur., as here and in Gen. xli. 11; Ew. § 232, g. The poet glances back from the end of life to the course of life. And life, with all of which it had been proud, appears as an empty burden; for it passed swiftly by and we fled away, we were borne away with rapid flight upon the wings of the past.

Such experience as this ought to urge one on to the fear of God; but how rarely does this happen! and yet the fear of God is the condition (stipulation) and the beginning of wisdom. The verb יָרַע in ver. 11a, just as it in general denotes not merely notional but practically living and efficient knowledge, is here used of a knowledge which makes that which is known conduce to salvation. The meaning of וַיִּירָאָהֶךָ is determined in accordance with this. The suffix is here either gen. subj. : according to Thy fearfulness (יָרַאָהֶךָ as in Ezek. i. 18), or gen. obj. : according to the fear that is due to Thee, which in itself is at once (cf. v. 8, Ex. xx. 20, Dent. ii. 25) more natural, and here designates the knowledge which is so rarely found, as that which is determined by the fear of God, as a truly religious knowledge. Such knowledge Moses supplicates for himself and for Israel: to number our days teach us rightly to understand. 1 Sam. xxiii. 17, where יָרַע בֶּן signifies "he does not know it to be otherwise, he is well aware of it," shows how יָרַע is meant. Hitzig, contrary to the accentuation, draws it to לִמְנוּת יָמֵינוּ; but "to number our days" is in itself equivalent to "hourly to contemplate the fleeting character and brevity of our lifetime;” and הִרְעָה בְּיָדָאֵל prays for a true qualification for this, and one that accords with experience. The future that follows is well adapted to the call, as frequently aim and result. But הִבִּיאַת is not to be taken, with Ewald and Hitzig, in the signification of bringing as an offering, a meaning this verb cannot have of itself alone (why should it not have been וְהִבִּיאַת?). Böttcher also erroneously renders it after the analogy of Prov. ii. 10: “that we may bring wisdom into the heart,” which ought to be הִבִּיאַת. הִבִּיאַת, deriving its meaning from agriculture, signifies “to carry off, obtain, gain, prop. to bring in,” viz. into the barn, 2 Sam. ix. 10, Hagg. i. 6; the produce of the field, and in a general way gain or profit, is hence called הַבְּוֹאָה. A wise heart is the fruit which one reaps or garners in from such numbering of the days, the gain which one carries off from so constantly reminding one’s self of the end. לִבְבִּי הַבְּוֹאָה is a poetically intensified expression for לֵב הָרֵחַב, just as לֵב מְרֻפָּא in Prov. xiv. 30 signifies a calm easy heart.

Vers. 13-17. The prayer for a salutary knowledge, or discernment, of the appointment of divine wrath is now followed by the prayer for the return of favour, and the wish that God would carry out His work of salvation and bless Israel’s undertakings to that end. We here recognise the well-known language of prayer of Moses in Ex. xxxii. 12, according to which שׁוּבָה is not intended as a prayer for God’s return to Israel, but for the turning away of His anger; and the sigh עֲרִמְתִּי that is blended with it asks how long this being angry, which threatens to blot Israel out, is still to last. וְהִנָּחֵם is explained according to this same parallel passage: May God feel remorse or sorrow (which in this case coincide) concerning His servants, i.e. concerning the affliction appointed to them. The naming of the church by עֲבָדָי (as in Deut. ix. 27, cf. Ex. xxxii. 13 of the patriarchs) reminds one of Deut. xxxii. 36: concerning His servants He shall feel compassion (Hithpa. instead of the Niphal). The prayer for the turning of wrath is followed in ver. 14 by the prayer for the turning towards them of favour. In בִּבְקִרִי there lies the thought that it has been night hitherto in Israel. “Morning” is therefore the beginning of a new season of favour. In אֲבַעֵנִי (to which חֲסֵדְךָ is a second accusative of the object) is implied the thought that Israel whilst under wrath has been hungering after favour;

cf. the adjective  $\text{שָׂשׂוּ}$  in the same tropical signification in Deut. xxxiii. 23. The supplicatory imperatives are followed by two moods expressive of intention: then will we, or: in order that we may rejoice and be glad; for futures like these set forth the intention of attaining something as a result or aim of what has been expressed just before: Ew. § 325, a.  $\text{בְּכָל־יְמֵינוּ}$  is not governed by the verbs of rejoicing (cxviii. 24), in which case it would have been  $\text{בְּתֵינָנוּ}$ , but is an adverbial definition of time (cxlv. 2, Jer. xxxv. 8): within the term of life allotted to us. We see from ver. 15 that the season of affliction has already lasted for a long time. The duration of the forty years of wrath, which in the midst of their course seemed to them as an eternity, is made the measure of the reviving again that is earnestly sought. The plural  $\text{יָמֹת}$  instead of  $\text{יָמֵי}$  is common only to our Psalm and Deut. xxxii. 7; it is not known elsewhere to Biblical Hebrew. And the poetical  $\text{שְׁנוֹת}$  instead of  $\text{שָׁנֵי}$ , which also occurs elsewhere, appears for the first time in Deut. xxxii. 7. The meaning of  $\text{עֲנִיָּהוּ}$ , in which  $\text{יָמֹת}$  is specialized after the manner of a genitive, is explained from Deut. viii. 2 sqq., according to which the forty years' wandering in the wilderness was designed to humble ( $\text{עֲנִוֹת}$ ) and to prove Israel through suffering. At the close of these forty years Israel stands on the threshold of the Promised Land. To Israel all final hopes were closely united with the taking possession of this land. We learn from Gen. ch. xlix. that it is the horizon of Jacob's prophetic benediction. This Psalm too, in vers. 16, 17, terminates in the prayer for the attainment of this goal. The psalmist has begun in ver. 1 his adoration with the majestic divine name  $\text{אֲדֹנָי}$ ; in ver. 13 he began his prayer with the gracious divine name  $\text{יְהוָה}$ ; and now, where he mentions God for the third time, he gives to Him the twofold name, so full of faith,  $\text{אֲדֹנָי אֱלֹהֵינוּ}$ .  $\text{אֱל}$  used once alternates with the thrice repeated  $\text{עַל}$ : salvation is not Israel's own work, but the work of Jahve; it therefore comes from above, it comes and meets Israel. It is worthy of remark that the noun  $\text{פֶּעַל}$  occurs only in Deuteronomy in the whole Tôra, and that here also of the gracious rule of Jahve, ch. xxxii. 4, cf. xxxiii. 11. The church calls the work of the Lord  $\text{מַעֲשֵׂה יְדֵינּוּ}$  in so far as He executes it through them. This expression  $\text{מַעֲשֵׂה יְדֵינּוּ}$  as a designation of human undertakings runs through the whole of the Book of Deuteronomy: ch. ii. 7, iv. 28, xi. 7, xiv. 29, xvi. 15, xxiv. 19, xxvii. 15, xxviii. 12, xxx. 9. In the work of the Lord the bright side of His glory unveils itself, hence it is called הָרָר; this too is a word not alien at least to the language of Deuteronomy, ch. xxxiii. 17. Therein is made manifest ה' נָעַם, His graciousness and condescension—an expression which David has borrowed from Moses in Ps. xxvii. 4. יִרְאָה and יְהִי are optatives. כְּוִנָּה is an urgent request, imperat. obsecrantis as the old expositors say. With Waw the same thought is expressed over again (cf. Isa. lv. 1, וְיָלֵכוּ, yea come)—a simple, childlike anadiplosis which vividly reminds us of the Book of Deuteronomy, which revolves in thoughts that are ever the same, and by that very means speaks deeply to the heart. Thus the Deuteronomic impression of this Psalm accompanies us from beginning to end, from כָּעֵן to מַעֲשֵׂה יָדַיִם. Nor will it now be merely accidental that the fondness for comparisons, which is a peculiarity of the Book of Deuteronomy (ch. i. 31, 44, viii. 5, xxviii. 29, 49, cf. xxviii. 13, 44, xxix. 17, 18), is found again in this Psalm.

PSALM XCI.

TALISMANIC SONG IN TIME OF WAR AND PESTILENCE.

First Voice:

- 1 HE who sitteth in the protection of the Most High,
Who abideth in the shadow of the Almighty—

Second Voice:

- 2 I say to Jahve: My refuge and my fortress,
My God in whom I trust.

First Voice:

- 3 For HE shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, from the destroying pestilence.
4 With His feathers shall He defend thee,
And under His wings art thou hidden;
A shield and buckler is His truth.
5 Thou shalt not be afraid for any nightly terror,
For the arrow that flieth by day,

- 6 For the pestilence that walketh in the darkness,
For the sickness that wasteth at noon-day.
- 7 A thousand may fall at thy side and ten thousand at thy right hand,
It shall not come nigh thee—
- 8 Nay, with thine own eyes shalt thou look on
And see the recompense of the wicked.

Second Voice :

- 9 For Thou, O Jahve, art my refuge !

First Voice :

- The Most High hast thou made thy habitation.
- 10 The range of misfortune toucheth thee not,
And the plague doth not come nigh thy tent.
- 11 For His angels hath He given charge over thee,
To keep thee in all thy ways.
- 12 On their hands shall they bear thee up,
That thou dost not dash thy foot against a stone.
- 13 Over lions and adders shalt thou walk,
Thou shalt trample lions and dragons under thy feet.

Third (divine) Voice :

- 14 For he loveth Me, therefore will I deliver him,
I will set him on high, for he knoweth My Name.
- 15 If he shall call upon Me, I will answer him,
I will be with him in trouble ;
I will rescue him and bring him to honour.
- 16 With length of life will I satisfy him,
And cause him to delight himself in My salvation.

The primeval song is followed by an anonymous song (inscribed by the LXX. without any warrant  $\tau\hat{\omega}$  Δαυιδ), the time of whose composition cannot be determined ; and it is only placed in this order because the last verse accords with the last verse but one of Ps. xc. There the revelation of Jahve's work is prayed for, and here Jahve promises: I will grant him to see My salvation ; the "work of Jahve" is His realized "salvation." The two Psalms also have other points of contact, e.g. in the  $\text{יְהוָה}$  referred to God (vid. Symbolæ, p. 60).

In this Psalm, the Invocavit Psalm of the church, which praises the protecting and rescuing grace which he who believingly takes refuge in God experiences in all times of danger and distress,* the relation of ver. 2 to ver. 1 meets us at the very beginning as a perplexing riddle. If we take ver. 1 as a clause complete in itself, then it is tautological. If we take אָמַר in ver. 2 as a participle (Jerome, dicens) instead of אָמַר, ending with Pathach because a construct form (cf. xciv. 9, cxxxvi. 6), then the participial subject would have a participial predicate: "He who sitteth is saying," which is inelegant and also improbable, since אָמַר in other instances is always the 1st pers. fut. If we take אָמַר as 1st pers. fut. and ver. 1 as an apposition of the subject expressed in advance: as such an one who sitteth . . . I say, then we stumble against יִתְלוֹן; this transition of the participle to the finite verb, especially without the copula (וַיִּבְצֵל), is confusing. If, however, we go on and read further into the Psalm, we find that the same difficulty as to the change of person recurs several times later on, just as in the opening. Olshausen, Hupfeld, and Hitzig get rid of this difficulty by all sorts of conjectures. But a reason for this abrupt change of the person is that dramatic arrangement recognised even in the Targum, although awkwardly indicated, which, however, was first of all clearly discerned by J. D. Michaelis and Maurer. There are, to wit, two voices that speak (as in Ps. cxxi.), and at last the voice of Jahve comes in as a third. His closing utterance, rich in promise, forms, perhaps not unaccidentally, a seven-line strophe. Whether the Psalm came also to be executed in liturgical use thus with several voices, perhaps by three choirs, we cannot tell; but the poet certainly laid it out dramatically, as the translation represents it. In spite of the many echoes of earlier models, it is one of the freshest and most beautiful Psalms, resembling the second part of Isaiah in its light-winged, richly coloured, and transparent diction.

* Hence in J. Sabbath 8, col. 2, and Midrash Shocher tob on xci. 1 and elsewhere, it is called, together with Ps. iii., שִׁיר פְּגוּעִין (פְּגוּעִים), a song of occurrences, i.e. a protective (or talismanic) song in times of dangers that may befall one, just as Sebald Heyden's Psalm-song, "He who is in the protection of the Most High and resigns himself to God," is inscribed "Preservative against the pestilence."

Vers. 1, 2. As the concealing One, God is called עֲלִיּוֹן, the inaccessible high One; and as the shadowing One יְשֻׁרִי, the invincibly almighty One. Faith, however, calls Him by His covenant name (Heilsname) יהוה and, with the suffix of appropriation, אֱלֹהֵי (my God). In connection with ver. 1 we are reminded of the expressions of the Book of Job, ch. xxxix. 28, concerning the eagle's building its nest in its eyrie. According to the accentuation, ver. 2a ought to be rendered with Geier, "Dicit: in Domino meo (or Domini) latibulum, etc." But the combination אֶמְרָ לֵהּ is more natural, since the language of address follows in both halves of the verse.

Vers. 3-9a. יִקְוֶה, as in Prov. vi. 5, Jer. v. 26, is the dullest toned form for יִקְוֶשׁ or יִקְוֶשׁ, cxxiv. 7. What is meant is death, or "he who has the power of death," Heb. ii. 14, cf. 2 Tim. ii. 26. "The snare of the fowler" is a figure for the peril of one's life, Eccles. ix. 12. In connection with ver. 4 we have to call to mind Deut. xxxii. 11: God protects His own as an eagle with its large strong wing. אֶבְרָה is nom. unitatis, a pinion, to אָבַר, Isa. xl. 31; and the Hiph. הִבְרַה, from סָבַה, with the dative of the object, like the Kal in cxi. 8, signifies to afford covering, protection. The ἀπαξ λεγ. סָבַה, according to its stem-word, is that which encompasses anything round about, and here beside צָנָה, a weapon of defence surrounding the body on all sides; therefore not corresponding to the Syriac (ܣܘܒܪܐ), a stronghold (סִבְרָה, מְסִבְרָה), but to סָבַן, a shield. The Targum translates צָנָה with תְּרִיפָא, θυρεός, and סָבַה with עֲנִילָא, which points to the round parma. אֱמִתּוֹ is the truth of the divine promises. This is an impregnable defence (a) in war-times, ver. 5, against nightly surprises, and in the battle by day; (b) in times of pestilence, ver. 6, when the destroying angel, who passes through and destroys the people (Ex. xi. 4), can do no harm to him who has taken refuge in God, either in the midnight or the noontide hours. The future יִהְיֶה is a more rhythmical and, in the signification to rage (as of disease) and to vanish away, a more usual form instead of יִלָּה. The LXX., Aquila, and Symnachus erroneously associate the demon name יִשָׁר with יִשׁוּר. It is a metaplastic (as if formed from יִשׁוּר) future for יִשָׁר, cf. Prov. xxix. 6, יִרֶן, and Isa. xlii. 4, יִרְרַן, frangetur. Ver. 7a a hypothetical protasis: si cadant; the preterite would signify ceciderint, Ew. § 357, b. With פֶּלַח that which will solely and exclusively take place is introduced. Burk correctly renders: nullam cum peste rem habebis, nisi ut videas. Only a spectator shalt thou be, and that with thine own eyes, being thyself inaccessible and left to survive, conscious that thou thyself art a living one in contrast with those who are dying. And thou shalt behold, like Israel on the night of the Passover, the just retribution to which the evil-doers fall a prey. תְּשַׁלְּמֵנִי, recompense, retribution, is a hapaxlegomenon, cf. תְּשַׁלְּמֵנִי, Isa. xxxiv. 8. Ascribing the glory to God, the second voice confirms or ratifies these promises.

Vers. 9b-16. The first voice continues this ratification, and goes on weaving these promises still further: thou hast made the Most High thy dwelling-place (יָעֲרֶה); there shall not touch thee . . . The promises rise ever higher and higher, and sound more glorious. The Pual תִּפְּלֵךְ, prop. to be turned towards, is equivalent to "to befall one," as in Prov. xii. 21; Aquila well renders: οὐ μεταχθήσεται πρὸς σὲ κακία. תִּפְּלֵךְ reminds one of Isa. liv. 14, where פִּלֵּךְ follows; here it is פֶּלַח, as in Judg. xix. 13. The angel guardianship which is apportioned to him who trusts in God appears in vers. 11, 12 as a universal fact, not as a solitary fact and occurring only in extraordinary instances. Hæc est vera miraculorum ratio, observes Brentius on this passage, quod semel aut iterum manifeste revelent ea quæ Deus semper abscondite operatur. In תִּפְּלֵךְ the suffix has been combined with the full form of the future. The LXX. correctly renders ver. 12b: μήποτε προσκόψῃς πρὸς λίθον τὸν πόδα σου, for פֶּלַח everywhere else, and therefore surely here too and in Prov. iii. 23, has a transitive signification, not an intransitive (Aquila, Jerome, Symmachus), cf. Jer. xiii. 16. Ver. 13 tells what he who trusts in God has power to do by virtue of this divine succour through the medium of angels. The promise calls to mind Mark xvi. 18, ὄφεις ἀροῦσι, they shall take up serpents, but still more Luke x. 19: Behold, I give you power to tread ἐπάνω ὄφεων καὶ σκορπίων καὶ ἐπὶ πᾶσαν τὴν δύναμιν τοῦ ἐχθροῦ. They are all kinds of destructive powers belonging to nature, and particularly to the spirit-world, that are meant. They are called lions and fierce lions from the side of their open power, which threatens destruction, and adders and dragons from the side of their venomous secret malice. In ver. 13*a* it is promised th t the man who trusts in God shall walk on over these monsters, these malignant foes, proud in God and unharmed ; in ver. 13*b*, that he shall tread them to the ground (cf. Rom. xvi. 20). That which the divine voice of promise now says at the close of the Psalm is, so far as the form is concerned, an echo taken from Ps. l. Vers. 15 and 23 of that Psalm sound almost word for word the same. Gen. xlv. 4, and more especially Isa. lxiii. 9, are to be compared on ver. 15*b*. In B. Taanith 16*a* it is inferred from this passage that God compassionates the suffering ones whom He is compelled by reason of His holiness to chasten and prove. The "salvation of Jahve," as in l. 23, is the full reality of the divine purpose (or counsel) of mercy. To live to see the final glory was the rapturous thought of the Old Testament hope, and in the apostolic age, of the New Testament hope also.

PSALM XCII.

SABBATH THOUGHTS.

- 2 IT is good to give thanks unto Jahve,
And to harp unto Thy Name, O Most High—
- 3 To show forth in the morning Thy loving-kindness,
And Thy faithfulness in the nights,
- 4 Upon a ten-stringed instrument and upon the naba,
In skilful playing with the cithern.
- 5 For Thou makest me glad, Jahve, through Thy rule,
Because of the works of Thy hands can I exult.
- 6 How great are Thy works, Jahve !
Very deep are Thy thoughts.
- 7 A brutish man remains unconscious,
And a fool doth not discern this.
- 8 When the ungodly sprang up as the green herb
And all the workers of evil flourished,
It came to pass that they were absolutely destroyed.
- 9 And Thou art exaltation for ever, Jahve !

- 10 For lo Thine enemies, Jahve—
 For lo Thine enemies shall perish,
 All the workers of evil shall melt away.
- 11 And Thou exaltest, as an antelope, my horn,
 I am anointed with refreshing oil.
- 12 And mine eye feasteth upon those that lie in wait for me, Mine ears see their desire upon those who maliciously rose up against me.
- 13 The righteous shall sprout forth as the palm,
 As a cedar on Lebanon shall he grow up.
- 14 Planted in the house of Jahve,
 They shall blossom in the courts of our God.
- 15 They shall be still vigorous in old age,
 Full of sap and green shall they remain,
- 16 To make known that Jahve is upright,
 My rock, and there is no unrighteousness in Him.

This Song-Psalm for the Sabbath-day was the Sabbath-Psalm among the week's Psalms of the post-exilic service (cf. vol. i. pp. 32, 334); and was sung in the morning at the drink-offering of the first Tamîd lamb, just as at the accompanying Sabbath-musaph-offering (Num. xxviii. 9 sq.) a part of the song Deut. ch. xxxii. (divided into six parts) was sung, and at the service connected with the Mincha or evening sacrifice one of the three pieces, Ex. xv. 1-10, 11-19, Num. xxi. 17-20 (B. Rosh ha-Shana 31a). 1 Macc. ix. 23 is a reminiscence from Ps. xcii. deviating but little from the LXX. version, just as 1 Macc. vii. 17 is a quotation taken from Ps. lxxix. With respect to the sabbatical character of the Psalm, it is a disputed question even in the Talmud whether it relates to the Sabbath of the Creation (R. Nebemiah, as it is taken by the Targum) or to the final Sabbath of the world's history (R. Akiba: the day that is altogether Sabbath; cf. Athanasius: αἰνεῖ ἐκεῖνην τὴν γενησομένην ἀνάπαυσιν). The latter is relatively more correct. It praises God, the Creator of the world, as the Ruler of the world, whose rule is pure loving-kindness and faithfulness, and calms itself, in the face of the flourishing condition of the evil-doers, with the prospect of the final issue, which will brilliantly vindicate the righteousness of God, that was at that time imperceptible to superficial observation, and will change the congregation of the righteous into a flourishing grove of palms and cedars upon holy ground. In this prospect Ps. xcii. 12 and Ps. xci. 8 coincide, just as God is also called "the Most High" at the beginning of these two Psalms. But that the tetragrammaton occurs seven times in both Psalms, as Hengstenberg says, does not turn out to be correct. Only the Sabbath-Psalm (and not Ps. xci.) repeats the most sacred Name seven times. And certainly the unmis-takeable strophe-schema too, 6. 6. 7. 6. 6, is not without significance. The middle of the Psalm bears the stamp of the sabbatic number. It is also worthy of remark that the poet gains the number seven by means of an anadiplosis in ver. 10. Such an emphatic climax by means of repetition is common to our Psalm with xciii. 3, xciv. 3, xcvi. 13.

Vers. 2-4. The Sabbath is the day that God has hallowed, and that is to be consecrated to God by our turning away from the business pursuits of the working days (Isa. lviii. 13 sq.) and applying ourselves to the praise and adoration of God, which is the most proper, blessed Sabbath employment. It is good, i.e. not merely good in the eyes of God, but also good for man, beneficial to the heart, pleasant and blessed. Loving-kindness is designedly connected with the dawn of the morning, for it is morning light itself, which breaks through the night (xxx. 6, lix. 17), and faithfulness with the nights, for in the perils of the loneliness of the night it is the best companion, and nights of affliction are the "foil of its verification." עֲשׂוּר beside נָבֵל (נֶבֶל) is equivalent to נָבֵל עֲשׂוּר in xxxiii. 2, cxliv. 9: the ten-stringed harp or lyre. הַיָּיִן is the music of stringed instruments (vid. on ix. 17), and that, since הנה in itself is not a suitable word for the rustling (strepitus) of the strings, the impromptu or phantasia playing (in Amos vi. 5, scornfully, פָּרָה), which suits both ix. 17 (where it is appended to the forte of the interlude) and the construction with Beth instrumenti.

Vers. 5-7. Statement of the ground of this commendation of the praise of God. Whilst פָּעַל is the usual word for God's historical rule (xliv. 2, lxiv. 10, xc. 16, etc.), כְּעֵשֶׂי יְדִדֶּה denotes the works of the Creator of the world, although not to the exclusion of those of the Ruler of the world (cxliii. 5). To be able to rejoice over the revelation of God in creation and the revelation of God in general is a gift from above, which the poet thankfully confesses that he has received. The Vulgate begins ver. 5 Quia delectasti me, and Dante in his Purgatorio, xxviii. 80, accordingly calls the Psalm il Salmo Delectasti; a smiling female form, which represents the life of Paradise, says, as she gathers flowers, she is so happy because, with the Psalm Delectasti, she takes a delight in the glory of God's works. The works of God are transcendently great; very deep are His thoughts, which mould human history and themselves gain form in it (cf. xl. 6, cxxxix. 17 sq., where infinite fulness is ascribed to them, and Isa. lv. 8 sq., where infinite height is ascribed to them). Man can neither measure the greatness of the divine works nor fathom the depth of the divine thoughts; he who is enlightened, however, perceives the immeasurableness of the one and the unfathomableness of the other, whilst a אִישׁ-בַּעַר, a man of animal nature, homo brutus (vid. lxxiii. 22), does not come to the knowledge (לֹא יָרַע, used absolutely as in xiv. 4), and בְּסִיל, a blockhead, or one dull in mind, whose carnal nature outweighs his intellectual and spiritual nature, does not discern אֶת-זֹאת (cf. 2 Sam. xiii. 17), id ipsum, viz. how unsearchable are God's judgments and untrackable His ways (Rom. xi. 33).

Vers. 8-10. Upon closer examination the prosperity of the ungodly is only a semblance that lasts for a time. The infinitive construction in ver. 8 is continued in the historic tense, and it may also be rendered as historical. זֹאת הַיְהִיָּה (Saadia: לְהִשְׁמַד) is to be supplied in thought before לְהִשְׁמַד, as in Job xxvii. 14. What is spoken of is an historical occurrence which, in its beginning, course, and end, has been frequently repeated even down to the present day, and ever confirmed afresh. And thus, too, in time to come and once finally shall the ungodly succumb to a peremptory, decisive (עֲרִיעֵר) judgment of destruction. Jahve is מְרוֹם לְעֵלָם, by His nature and by His rule He is "a height for ever;" i.e. in relation to the creature and all that goes on here below He has a nature beyond and above all this (Jenseitigkeit), ever the same and absolute; He is absolutely inaccessible to the God-opposed one here below who vaunts himself in stupid pride and rebelliously exalts himself as a titan, and only suffers it to last until the term of his barren blossoming is run out. Thus the present course of history will and must in fact end in a final victory of good over evil: for lo Thine enemies, Jahve—for lo Thine enemies . . . יִהְיֶה points as it were with the finger to the inevitable end; and the emotional anadiplosis breathes forth a zealous love for the cause of God as if it were his own. God's enemies shall perish, all the workers of evil shall be disjointed, scattered, יִתְפָּרְדוּ (cf. Job iv. 11). Now they form a compact mass, which shall however fall to pieces, when one day the intermingling of good and evil has an end.

Vers. 11-13. The hitherto oppressed church then stands forth vindicated and glorious. The futt. consec., as preterites of the ideal past, pass over further on into the pure expression of future time. The LXX. renders: καὶ ὑψωθήσεται (וַיִּתְרַם) ὡς μονοκέρατος τὸ κέρας μου. By ראַים (incorrect for ראַם, primary form ראַם), μονόκερατος, is surely to be understood the oryx, one-horned according to Aristotle and the Talmud (vid. on xxix. 6, Job xxxix. 9-12). This animal is called in Talmudic קרש (perhaps abbreviated from μονόκερατος); the Talmud also makes use of ארזילא (the gazelle) as synonymous with ראַם (Aramaic definitive or emphatic state ראַימא).* The primary passages for figures taken from animal life are Num. xxiii. 22, Deut. xxxiii. 17. The horn is an emblem of defensive power and at the same time of stately grace; and the fresh, green oil an emblem of the pleasant feeling and enthusiasm, joyous in the prospect of victory, by which the church is then pervaded (Acts iii. 19). The LXX. erroneously takes בְּלוֹתִי as infin. Piel, τὸ γῆρας μου, my being grown old, a signification which the Piel cannot have. It is 1st præt. Kal from בָּלָה, perfusus sum (cf. Arabic balla, to be moist, ballah and bullah, moistness, good health, the freshness of youth), and the ultima-accentuation, which also occurs in this form of double Ajin verbs without Waw convers. (vid. on Job xix. 17), ought not to mislead. In the expression יִשְׁכַּח רֵעֵנִי, the adjective used in other instances only of the olive-tree itself is transferred to the oil, which contains the strength of its succulent verdure as an essence. The ecclesia pressa is then triumphans. The eye, which was wont to look timidly and tearfully upon the persecutors, the ears, upon which even their name and the tidings of their approach were wont to produce terror, now see their desire upon them as they are blotted out. שָׁמַע בָּ (found only here) follows the sense of רָאָה בָּ, cf. نظر في, to lose one's self in the contemplation of anything. שָׁרִי is either a substantive after the form בָּנָה, נָגַד, or a participle in the signification "those who regarded me with hostility, those who lay in wait for me," like נָס, fled, Num. xxxv. 32, סָר, having removed themselves to a distance, Jer. xvii. 13, שָׁב, turned back, Mic. ii. 8; for this participial form has not only a passive signification (like מוּל, circumcised), but sometimes, too, a deponent perfect signification; and חָזַשׁ in Num. xxxii. 17, if it belongs here, may signify hurried = in haste. In שָׁרִי, however, no such passive colouring of the meaning is conceivable; it is therefore: insidiati (Luzatto, Grammatica, § 518: coloro che mi guatavano). There is no need for regarding the word, with Böttcher and Olshausen, as distorted from שָׁרִי (the apocopated participle Pilel of the same verb); one might more readily regard it as a softening of that word as to the sound (Ewald, Hitzig). In ver. 12b it is not to be rendered: upon the wicked doers (villains) who rise up against me. The placing of the adjective thus before its substantive must (with the exception of רַב when used after the manner of a numeral) be accounted impossible in Hebrew, even in the face of the passages brought forward by Hitzig, viz. 1 Chron. xxvii. 5, 1 Sam. xxxi. 3;* it is therefore: upon those who as villains rise up against. The circumstance that the poet now in ver. 13 passes from himself to speak of the righteous, is brought about by the fact that it is the congregation of the righteous in general, i.e. of those who regulate their life according to the divine order of salvation, into whose future he here takes a glance. When the prosperity [lit. the blossoming] of the un-godly comes to an end, the springing up and growth of the righteous only then rightly has its beginning. The richness of the inflorescence of the date-palm (תְּמָרָה) is clear from the fact, that when it has attained its full size, it bears from three to four, and in some instances even as many as six, hundred pounds of fruit. And there is no more charming and majestic sight than the palm of the oasis, this prince among the trees of the plain, with its proudly raised diadem of leaves, its attitude peering forth into the distance and gazing full into the face of the sun, its perennial verdure, and its vital force, which constantly renews itself from the root—a picture of life in the midst of the world of death. The likening of the righteous to the palm, to the “blessed tree,” to this “sister of man,” as the Arabs call it, offers points of comparison in abundance. Side by side with the palm is the cedar, the prince of the trees of the mountain, and in particular of Mount Lebanon. The most natural point of comparison, as תְּמָרָה (cf. Job viii. 11) states, is its graceful lofty growth, then in general τὸ δασὺ καὶ θερμὸν καὶ θρέψιμον (Theodoret), i.e. the intensity of its vegetative strength, but also the perpetual verdure of its foliage and the perfume (Hos. xiv. 7) which it exhales.

Vers. 14-16. The soil in which the righteous are planted or (if it is not rendered with the LXX. πεφυτευμένοι, but with the other Greek versions μεταφυτευθέντες) into which they are transplanted, and where they take root, a planting of the Lord, for His praise, is His holy Temple, the centre of a family fellowship with God that is brought about from that point as its starting-point and is unlimited by time and space. There they stand as in sacred ground and air, which impart to them ever new powers of life; they put forth buds (תְּפִילִים as in Job xiv. 9) and preserve a verdant freshness and marrowy vitality (like the olive, lii. 10, Judg. ix. 9) even into their old age (נוֹב) of a productive force for putting out shoots; vid. with reference to the root נב, Genesis, S. 635 sq.), cf. Isa. lxxv. 22: like the duration of the trees is the duration of my people; they live long in unbroken strength, in order, in looking back upon a life rich in experiences of divine acts of righteousness and loving-kindness, to confirm the confession which Moses, in Deut. xxxii. 4, places at the head of his great song. There the expression is אֵין עֵלָּה, here it is אֵין עֵלְתָּהּ בּוֹ. This ‘dlatha, softened from 'awlātha—so the Kerî—with a transition from the aw, au into ô, is also found in Job v. 16 (cf. עֹלָהּ = עֹלָהּ Ps. lviii. 3, lxiv. 7, Isa. lxi. 8), and is certainly original in this Psalm, which also has many other points of coincidence with the Book of Job (like Ps. cvii., which, however, in ver. 42 transposes עֹלָהּ into עֹלָהּ).

PSALM XCIII.

THE ROYAL THRONE ABOVE THE SEA OF THE PEOPLES.

- 1 JAHVE now is King, He hath clothed Himself with majesty;
Jahve hath clothed Himself, He hath girded Himself with might:
Therefore the world standeth fast without tottering.
- 2 Thy throne standeth fast from of old,
From everlasting art THOU.
- 3 The floods have lifted up, Jahve,
The floods have lifted up their roaring,
The floods lift up their noise.
- 4 More than the rumblings of great waters,
Of the glorious, of the breakers of the sea,
Is Jahve glorious in the height.
- 5 Thy testimonies are inviolable,
Holiness becometh Thy house,
Jahve, unto length of days.

Side by side with those Psalms which behold in anticipation the Messianic future, whether it be prophetically or only typically, or typically and prophetically at the same time, as the kingship of Jahve's Anointed which overcomes and blesses the world, there are others in which the perfected theocracy as such is beheld beforehand, not, however, as an appearing (parusia) of a human king, but as the appearing of Jahve

Himself, as the kingdom of God manifest in all its glory. These theocratic Psalms form, together with the christocratic, two series of prophecy referring to the last time which run parallel with one another. The one has for its goal the Anointed of Jahve, who rules out of Zion over all peoples; the other, Jahve sitting above the cherubim, to whom the whole world does homage. The two series, it is true, converge in the Old Testament, but do not meet; it is the history that fulfils these types and prophecies which first of all makes clear that which flashes forth in the Old Testament only in certain climaxes of prophecy and of lyric too (vid. on xlv. 1), viz. that the parusia of the Anointed One and the parusia of Jahve is one and the same.

Theocracy is an expression coined by Josephus. In contrast with the monarchical, oligarchical, and democratic form of government of other nations, he calls the Mosaic form θεοκρατία, but he does so somewhat timidly, ὡς ἂν τις εἴποι βιασάμενος τὸν λόγον [c. Apion. ii. 17]. The coining of the expression is thankworthy; only one has to free one's self from the false conception that the theocracy is a particular constitution. The alternating forms of government were only various modes of its adjustment. The theocracy itself is a reciprocal relationship between God and men, exalted above these intermediary forms, which had its first manifest beginning when Jahve became Israel's King (Deut. xxxiii. 5, cf. Ex. xv. 18), and which will be finally perfected by its breaking through this national self-limitation when the King of Israel becomes King of the whole world, that is overcome both outwardly and spiritually. Hence the theocracy is an object of prediction and of hope. And the word יְהוָה is used with reference to Jahve not merely of the first beginning of His imperial dominion, and of the manifestation of the same in facts in the most prominent points of the redemptive history, but also of the commencement of the imperial dominion in its perfected glory. We find the word used in this lofty sense, and in relation to the last time, e.g. in Isa. xxiv. 23, lii. 7, and most unmistakably in Apoc. xi. 17, xix. 6. And in this sense יְהוָה is the watchword of the theocratic Psalms. Thus it is used even in Ps. xlvi. 9; but the first of the Psalms beginning with this watchword is Ps. xciii. They are all post-exilic. The prominent point from which this eschatological perspective opens out is the time of the new-born freedom and of the newly restored state.

Hitzig pertinently says: "This Psalm is already contained in nuce in ver. 9 of the preceding Psalm, which surely comes from the same author. This is at once manifest from the jerking start of the discourse in ver. 3 (cf. xcii. 10), which resolves the thought into two members, of which the first subsides into the vocative יהוה." The LXX. (Codd. Vat. and Sin.) inscribes it: Εἰς τὴν ἡμέρην τοῦ προσαββάτου, ὅτε κατώκισται ἡ γῆ, αἶνος ᾠδῆς τῷ Δαυίδ. The third part of this inscription is worthless. The first part (for which Cod. Alex. erroneously has: τοῦ σαββάτου) is corroborated by the Talmudic tradition. Ps. xciii. was really the Friday Psalm, and that, as is said in Rosh ha-shana 31a, ומלך עליהן (בישי) שנמר מלאכתו (בישי), because God then (on the sixth day) had completed His creative work and began to reign over them (His creatures); and that ὅτε κατώκισται (al. κατώκιστο) is to be explained in accordance therewith: when the earth had been peopled (with creatures, and more especially with men).

Vers. 1, 2. The sense of מְלִיךָ (with ā beside Zinnor or Sarka as in xcvii. 1, xcix. 1 beside *Dechî**) is historical, and it stands in the middle between the present מְלִיךָ ה' and the future יִמְלֶךְ ה': Jahve has entered upon the kingship and now reigns. Jahve's rule heretofore, since He has given up the use of His omnipotence, has been self-abasement and self-renunciation: now, however, He shows Himself in all His majesty, which rises aloft above everything; He has put this on like a garment; He is King, and now too shows Himself to the world in the royal robe. The first לְבַשׁ has Olewejored; then the accentuation takes לְבַשׁ ה' together by means of Dechi, and עוֹ הַתְּהוֹרָה together by means of Athnach. עוֹ, as in Ps. xxix., points to the enemies; what is so named is God's invincibly triumphant omnipotence. This He has put on (Isa. li. 9), with this He has girded Himself—a military word (Isa. viii. 9): Jahve makes war against everything in antagonism to Himself, and casts it to the ground with the weapons of His wrathful judgments. We find a further and fuller description of this עוֹ הַתְּהוֹרָה in Isa. lix. 17, lxiii. 1 sq., cf. Dan. vii. 9.* That which cannot fail to take place in connection with the coming of this accession of Jahve to the kingdom is introduced with אָרָה. The world, as being the place of the kingdom of Jahve, shall stand without tottering in opposition to all hostile powers (xcvi. 10). Hitherto hostility towards God and its principal bulwark, the kingdom of the world, have disturbed the equilibrium and threatened all God-appointed relationships with dissolution; Jahve's interposition, however, when He finally brings into effect all the abundant might of His royal government, will secure immoveableness to the shaken earth (cf. lxxv. 4). His throne stands, exalted above all commotion, מִיָּסוֹד; it reaches back into the most distant past. Jahve is מְעוֹלָם; His being loses itself in the immemorial and the immeasurable. The throne and nature of Jahve are not incipient in time, and therefore too are not perishable; but as without beginning, so also they are endless, infinite in duration.

Vers. 3-5. All the raging of the world, therefore, will not be able to hinder the progress of the kingdom of God and its final breaking through to the glory of victory. The sea with its mighty mass of waters, with the constant unrest of its waves, with its ceaseless pressing against the solid land and foaming against the rocks, is an emblem of the Gentile world alienated from and at enmity with God; and the rivers (floods) are emblems of worldly kingdoms, as the Nile of the Egyptian (Jer. xlv. 7 sq.), the Euphrates of the Assyrian (Isa. viii. 7 sq.), or more exactly, the Tigris, swift as an arrow, of the Assyrian, and the * These passages, together with Ps. xciii. 1, civ. 1, are cited in Cant. Rabba 26b (cf. Debarim Rabba 291d), where it is said that the Holy One calls Israel כְּלָה (bride) ten times in the Scriptures, and that Israel on the other hand ten times assigns kingly judicial robes to Him.

tortuous Euphrates of the Babylonian empire (Isa. xxvii. 1). These rivers, as the poet says whilst he raises a plaintive but comforted look upwards to Jahve, have lifted up, have lifted up their murmur, the rivers lift up their roaring. The thought is unfolded in a so-called "parallelism with reservation." The perfects affirm what has taken place, the future that which even now as yet is taking place. The ἀπαξ λεγ. דָּבַיִ signifies a striking against (collisio), and a noise, a din. One now in ver. 4 looks for the thought that Jahve is exalted above this roaring of the waves. מִן will therefore be the min of comparison, not of the cause: "by reason of the roar of great waters are the breakers of the sea glorious" (Starck, Geier),—which, to say nothing more, is a tautological sentence. But if מִן is comparative, then it is impossible to get on with the accentuation of אֲרִירִים, whether it be with Mercha (Ben-Asher) or Dechâ (Ben-Naphtali). For to render: More than the roar of great waters are the breakers of the sea glorious (Mendelssohn), is impracticable, since מִים רַבִּים are nothing less than יָם (Isa. xvii. 12 sq.), and we are prohibited from taking מִשְׁבְּרִים אֲרִירִים as a parenthesis (Köster) by the fact that it is just this clause that is exceeded by אֲרִירִים בְּמָרוֹם ה'. Consequently אֲרִירִים has to be looked upon as a second attributive to מִים brought in afterwards, and מִשְׁבְּרֵי יָם (the waves of the sea breaking upon the rocks, or even only breaking upon one another) as a more minute designation of these great and magnificent waters (אֲרִירִים, according to Ex. xv. 10*), and it should have been accented: מִקְלֹתַי מִים רַבִּים אֲרִירִים מִשְׁבְּרֵי יָם. Jahve's celestial majesty towers far above all the noisy majesties here below, whose waves, though lashed never so high, can still never reach His throne. He is King of His people, Lord of His church, which preserves His revelation and worships in His temple. This revelation, by virtue of His unapproachable, all-overpowering kingship, is inviolable; His testimonies, which minister to the establishment of His kingdom and promise its future manifestation in glory, are λόγοι πιστοὶ καὶ ἀληθινοί, Apoc. xix. 9, xxii. 6. And holiness becometh His temple (נְאֻה־קִדְשׁ, 3*d* præc. Pilel, or according to the better attested reading of Heidenheim and Baer, נְאֻה; * therefore the feminine of the adjective with a more loosened syllable next to the tone, like יְהִשָּׁב־לִי in xl. 18), that is to say, it is inviolable (sacrosanct), and when it is profaned, shall ever be vindicated again in its holiness. This clause, formulated after the manner of a prayer, is at the same time a petition that Jahve in all time to come would be pleased to thoroughly secure the place where His honour dwells here below against profanation.

THE CONSOLATION OF PRAYER UNDER THE OPPRESSION OF TYRANTS.

- 1 O GOD of vengeance, Jahve,
O God of vengeance, shine forth!
- 2 Lift up Thyself, Judge of earth,
Render recompense unto the haughty!
- 3 How long shall evil-doers, Jahve,
How long shall evil-doers triumph?
- 4 They gush over, they speak arrogant things,
They boast themselves, all the workers of evil.
- 5 Thy people, Jahve, they break in pieces,
And they oppress Thine inheritance.
- 6 The widow and stranger they slay,
And they murder the fatherless;

And the God of Jacob hath no knowledge."

Frensdorf's Ochla we-Ochla, p. 123), i.e. one of the seventeen words whose Aleph is audible, whilst it is otherwise always quiescent; e.g. מְצֻצָת, otherwise מְצֻצָת.

He who teacheth men knowledge?

And teachest out of Thy Law;

And He doth not forsake His inheritance.

This Psalm, akin to Ps. xcii. and xciii. by the community of the anadiplosis, bears the inscription Ψαλμὸς ᾠδῆς τῷ Δαβὶδ, τετράδι σαββάρου in the LXX. It is also a Talmudic tradition * that it was the Wednesday song in the Temple liturgy (τετράδι σαββάτου = ברביעי בשבת). Athanasius explains it by a reference to the fourth month (Jer. xxxix. 2). The τῷ Δαυίδ, however, is worthless. It is a post-Davidic Psalm; for, although it comes out of one mould, we still meet throughout with reminiscences of older Davidic and Asaphic models. The enemies against whom it supplicates the appearing of the God of righteous retribution are, as follows from a comparison of vers. 5, 8, 10, 12, non-Israelites, who despise the God of Israel and fear not His vengeance, ver. 7; whose barbarous doings, however, call forth, even among the oppressed people themselves, foolish doubts concerning Jahve's omniscient beholding and judicial interposition. Accordingly the Psalm is one of the latest, but not necessarily a Maccabæan Psalm. The later Persian age, in which the Book of Ecclesiastes was written, could also exhibit circumstances and moods such as these.

Vers. 1-3. The first strophe prays that God would at length put a judicial restraint upon the arrogance of ungodliness. Instead of הוֹפִיעַ (a less frequent form of the imperative for הוֹפֵעַ, Ges. § 53, rem. 3) it was perhaps originally written הוֹפִיעָה (lxxx. 2), the He of which has been lost owing to the He that follows. The plural נִקְמֹת signifies not merely single instances of taking vengeance (Ezek. xxv. 17, cf. supra xviii. 48), but also intensively complete revenge or recompense (Judg. xi. 36, 2 Sam. iv. 8). The designation of God is similar to אֵל גְּמֻלוֹת in Jer. li. 56, and the anadiplosis is like vers. 3, 23, xciii. 1, 3. הִנְשֵׂא, lift Thyself up, arise, viz. in judicial majesty, calls to mind vii. 7. הִשְׁיב גְּמֹל is construed with עַל (cf. ל, xxviii. 4, Isa. lix. 18) as in Joel iv. 4. With אֵיִם accidentally accord ἀγανός and κῦδεϊ γαίωυ in the epic poets.

* According to B. Erachin 11a, at the time of the Chaldæan destruction of Jerusalem the Levites on their pulpits were singing this 94th Psalm, and as they came to the words "and He turneth back upon them their iniquity" (ver. 23), the enemies pressed into the Temple, so that they were not able to sing the closing words, "Jahve, our God, will destroy them." To the scruple that Ps. xciv. is a Wednesday, not a Sunday, Psalm (that fatal day, however, was a Sunday, מוצאי שבת), it is replied, it may have been a lamentation song that had just been put into their mouths by the circumstances of that time (אלליה בעלמא דנפל להו בפומיהו).

Vers. 4-7. The second strophe describes those over whom the first prays that the judgment of God may come. הָבֵיעַ (cf. הַטְּוִי) is a tropical phrase used of that kind of speech that results from strong inward impulse and flows forth in rich abundance. The poet himself explains how it is here (cf. lix. 8) intended: they speak עָתָק, that which is unrestrained, unbridled, insolent (vid. xxxi. 19). The Hithpa. הִתְאָמַר Schultens interprets ut Emiri (أَمِيرٍ, a commander) se gerunt; but אָמַר signifies in Hebrew the top of a tree (vid. on Isa. xvii. 9); and from the primary signification to tower aloft, whence too אָמַר, to speak, prop. efferre = effuri, הִתְאָמַר, like הִתְיָמַר in Isa. lxi. 6, directly signifies to exalt one's self, to carry one's self high, to strut. On יִרְבֵּא cf. Prov. xxii. 22, Isa. iii. 15; and on their atheistical principle which וַיִּאֲמָרוּ places in closest connection with their mode of action, cf. x. 11, lix. 8 extrem. The Dagesh in הָ, distinct from the Dag. in the same word in ver. 12, cxviii. 5, 18, is the Dag. forte conjunct. according to the rule of the so-called רִחִיק (vol. ii. p. 354, note).

Vers. 8-11. The third strophe now turns from those bloodthirsty, blasphemous oppressors of the people of God whose conduct calls forth the vengeance of Jahve, to those among the people themselves, who have been puzzled about the omniscience and indirectly about the righteousness of God by the fact that this vengeance is delayed. They are called בְּעֵרִים and כְּסִילִים in the sense of lxxiii. 21 sq. Those hitherto described against whom God's vengeance is supplicated are this also; but this appellation would be too one-sided for them, and עָצָר refers the address expressly to a class of men among the people whom those oppress and slay. It is absurd that God, the planter of the ear (הַנִּטְעַע, like שִׁטְעַע in Lev. xi. 7, with an accented ultima, because the præt. Kal does not follow the rule for the drawing back of the accent called נִסְחָה אַחֲרָה) and the former of the eye (cf. xl. 7, Ex. iv. 11), should not be able to hear and to see; everything that is excellent in the creature, God must indeed possess in original, absolute perfection.\* The poet then points to the extra-Israelitish world and calls God  $\text{יִסֵּר נִיִּים}$ , which cannot be made to refer to a warning by means of the voice of conscience;  $\text{יִסֵּר}$  used thus without any closer definition does not signify "warning," but "chastening" (Prov. ix. 7). Taking his stand upon facts like those in Job xii. 23, the poet assumes the punitive judicial rule of God among the heathen to be an undeniable fact, and presents for consideration the question, whether He who chasteneth nations cannot and will not also punish the oppressors of His church (cf. Gen. xviii. 25), He who teacheth men knowledge, i.e. He who nevertheless must be the omnipotent One, since all knowledge comes originally from Him? Jahve,—thus does the course of argument close in ver. 11,—sees through ( $\text{יָדַע}$  of penetrative perceiving or knowing that goes to the very root of a matter) the thoughts of men that they are vanity. Thus it is to be interpreted, and not: for they (men) are vanity; for this ought to have been  $\text{כִּי הִבֵּל הַיְּמָה}$ , whereas in the dependent clause, when the predicate is not intended to be rendered especially prominent, as in ix. 21, the pronominal subject may precede, Isa. lxi. 9, Jer. xlvi. 5 (Hitzig). The rendering of the LXX. (1 Cor. iii. 20),  $\text{\delta\tau\iota \epsilon\iota\sigma\iota \mu\acute{\alpha}\tau\alpha\iota\omicron\iota}$  (Jerome, quoniam vanæ sunt), is therefore correct;  $\text{הַיְּמָה}$ , with the customary want of exactness, stands for  $\text{הַיְּמָה}$ . It is true men themselves are  $\text{הַבֵּל}$ ; it is not, however, on this account that He who sees through all things sees through their thoughts, but He sees through them in their sinful vanity.

Vers. 12-15. The fourth strophe praises the pious sufferer, whose good cause God will at length aid in obtaining its right. The "blessed" reminds one of xxxiv. 9, xl. 5, and more especially of Job v. 17, cf. Prov. iii. 11 sq. Here what are meant are sufferings like those bewailed in vers. 5 sq., which are however, after all, the well-meant dispensations of God. Concerning the aim and fruit of purifying and testing afflictions God teaches the sufferer out of His Law (cf. e.g. Deut. viii. 5 sq.), in order to procure him rest, viz. inward rest (cf. Jer. xlix. 23 with Isa. xxx. 15), i.e. not to suffer him to be disheartened and tempted by days of wickedness, i.e. wicked, calamitous days (Ew. § 287, b), until (and it will inevitably come to pass) the pit is finished being dug into which the ungodly falls headlong (cf. cxii. 7 sq.).  $\text{יָהּ}$  has the emphatic Dagesh, which properly does not double, and still less unite, but requires an emphatic pronunciation of the letter, which might easily become inaudible. The initial Jod of the divine name might easily lose its consonantal value here in connection with the preceding toneless ú,\* and the Dag. guards against this: cf. cxviii. 5, 18. The certainty of the issue that is set in prospect by עַר is then confirmed with קִי. It is impossible that God can desert His church—He cannot do this, because in general right must finally come to His right, or, as it is here expressed, מִיִּשְׁפָּט must turn to צֶדֶק, i.e. the right that is now subdued must at length be again strictly maintained and justly administered, and “after it then all who are upright in heart,” i.e. all such will side with it, joyously greeting that which has been long missed and yearned after. מִיִּשְׁפָּט is fundamental right, which is at all times consistent with itself and raised above the casual circumstances of the time, and צֶדֶק, like צְדָקָה in Isa. xlii. 3, is righteousness (justice), which converts this right into a practical truth and reality.

Vers. 16-19. In the fifth strophe the poet celebrates the praise of the Lord as his sole, but also trusty and most consolatory help. The meaning of the question in ver. 16 is, that there is no man who would rise and succour him in the conflict with the evil-doers; לֵ as in Ex. xiv. 25, Judg. vi. 31, and עַם (without נִלְחָם or the like) in the sense of contra, as in lv. 19, cf. 2 Chron. xx. 6. God alone is his help. He alone has rescued him from death. הֲיִה is to be supplied to לִי: if He had not been, or: if He were not; and the apodosis is: then very little would have been wanting, then it would soon have come to this, that his soul would have taken up its abode, etc.; cf. on the construction cxix. 92, cxxiv. 1-5, Isa. i. 9, and on פְּמָעִים with the præt. lxxiii. 2, cxix. 87, Gen. xxvi. 10 (on the other hand with the fut. lxxxii. 15). הַיְוָמָה is, as in cxv. 17, the silence of the grave and of Hades; here it is the object to שָׁכְנָה, as in xxxvii. 3, Prov. viii. 12, and frequently. When he appears to himself already as one that has fallen, God's mercy holds him up. And when thoughts, viz. sad and fearful thoughts, are multiplied within him, God's comforts delight him, viz. the encouragement of His word and the inward utterances of His Spirit. שִׁרְעִים, as in cxxxix. 23, is equivalent to שְׁעָפִים, from שָׁעַר, שָׁעַר, שָׁעַר, شعب, to split, branch off (Psychology, S. 181; tr. p. 214). The plural form יִשְׁעֵשְׁעוּ, like the plural of the imperative in Isa. xxix. 9, has two Pathachs, the second of which is the "independentification" of the Chateph of יִשְׁעֵשְׁעוּ.

* If it is correct that, as Aben-Ezra and Parchon testify, the י, as being compounded of o (u) + i, was pronounced ú [like the u in the French word pur] by the inhabitants of Palestine, then this Dagesh, in accordance with its orthophonic function, is the more intelligible in cases like יָה תִסְרַנּוּ and יָה קִרְאֵתִי, cf. Pinsker, Einleitung, S. 153, and Geiger, Urschrift, S. 277. In קוּמוּ צְאוּ, Gen. xix. 14, Ex. xii. 31, Deut. ii. 24, Tsade and Samech have this Dagesh for the same reason as the Sin in תְּשִׁבִיתוּ שְׂאוֹר, Ex. xii. 15 (vid. Heidenheim on that passage), viz. because there is a danger in all these cases of slurring over the sharp sibilant. Even Chajug' (vid. Ewald and Dukes' Beiträge, iii. 23) confuses this Dag. orthophonicum with the Dag. forte conjunctivum.

Vers. 20-23. In the sixth strophe the poet confidently expects the inevitable divine retribution for which he has earnestly prayed in the introduction. יְהַבְרֶךְ is erroneously accounted for many (and by Gesenius too) as fut. Pual = יְהַבְרֶךְ = יְהַבְרֶךְ, a vocal contraction together with a giving up of the reduplication in favour of which no example can be advanced. It is fut. Kal = יְהַבְרֶךְ, from יְהַבְרֶךְ = יְהַבְרֶךְ, with the same regression of the modification of the vowel* as in יְהַנֶּךְ = יְהַנֶּךְ in Gen. xliii. 29, Isa. xxx. 19 (Hupfeld), but as in verbs primæ gutturalis, so also in פָּתַחְכֶּם, פָּתַחְכֶּם, inflected from פָּתַח, Ew. § 251, d. It might be more readily regarded as Poel than as Pual (like הִיאָבְלָהוּ, Job xx. 26), but the Kal too already signifies to enter into fellowship (Gen. xiv. 3, Hos. iv. 17), therefore (similarly to יִנְרֶךְ, v. 5) it is: num consociabitur tecum. פָּסָא is here the judgment-seat, just as the Arabic cursi directly denotes the tribunal of God (in distinction from العرش, the throne of His majesty). With reference to הַיְוָמָה vid. on v. 10. Assuming that חָק is a divine statute, we obtain this meaning for עֲלֵי-חָק: which frameth (i.e. plots and executes) trouble, by making

* By means of a similar transposition of the vowel as is to be assumed in הִיאָבְלָהוּ, Prov. i. 22, it also appears that מֹסֵבִין = מֹסֵבִין (lying upon the table, ἀνακείμενοι) of the Pesach-Haggada has to be explained, which Joseph Kimchi finds so inexplicable that he regards it as a clerical error that has become traditional.

the written divine right into a rightful title for unrighteous conduct, by means of which the innocent are plunged into misfortune. Hitzig renders: contrary to order, after Prov. xvii. 26, where, however, על-יִשְׁרָאֵל is intended like ἐνεκεν δικαιοσύνης, Matt. v. 10. Olshausen proposes to read יְגוּרָה (lvi. 7, lix. 4) instead of יְגוּרָה, just as conversely Aben-Ezra in lvi. 7 reads יְגוּרָה. But נִגְרָה, נִגְרָה, has the secured signification of scindere, incidere (cf. جَدَّ, but also خَدَّ, supra, i. 399), from which the signification invadere can be easily derived (whence נִגְרָה, a breaking in, invasion, an invading host). With reference to נְקִיָּה vid. Psychology, S. 243 (tr. p. 286): because the blood is the soul, that is said of the blood which applies properly to the person. The subject to יְגוּרָה are the seat of corruption (by which a high council consisting of many may be meant, just as much as a princely throne) and its accomplices. Prophetic certainty is expressed in וַיְהִי and וַיִּשָּׁב. The figure of God as מְשֻׁבָּב is Davidic and Korahitic. צוֹר מִחַסֵּי is explained from xviii. 2. Since הַיָּשִׁיב designates the retribution as a return of guilt incurred in the form of actual punishment, it might be rendered "requite" just as well as "cause to return;" עֲלֵיהֶם, however, instead of לָהֶם (liv. 7) makes the idea expressed in vii. 17 more natural. On בְּרַעְתֶּם Hitzig correctly compares 2 Sam. xiv. 7, iii. 27. The Psalm closes with an anadiplosis, just as it began with one; and אֲלֵהֵינִי affirms that the destruction of the persecutor will follow as surely as the church is able to call Jahve its God.

PSALM XCV.

CALL TO THE WORSHIP OF GOD AND TO OBEDIENCE TO HIS WORD.

- 1 COME, let us exult unto Jahve,
Let us make a joyful noise to the Rock of our salvation!
- 2 Let us come before His face with thanksgiving,
Let us make a joyful noise unto Him in songs!
- 3 For a great God is Jahve,
And a great King above all gods;

- 4 He, in whose hand are the deep places of the earth,
And to whom belong the tops of the mountains ;
5 To whom belongeth the sea, and HE hath made it,
And His hands have formed the dry land.
6 Come, let us worship and bow down,
Let us kneel before Jahve our Maker !
7 For He is our God,
And we are the people of His pasture and the flock of His hand.

To-day if ye will but hearken to His voice !

- 8 Harden not your hearts as at Meribah,
As on the day of Massah in the wilderness,
9 When your fathers tempted Me,
Proved me, although they saw My work.
10 Forty years was I vexed with a generation,
And said : " They are a people that do err in their heart."
But they knew not My ways,
11 So that I swear in My wrath :
" Verily they shall not enter into My rest ! "

This Psalm is related to the preceding by the celebration of Jahve as a " Rock." If it has any definite occasion, it is at any rate not manifest what that occasion is. It consists of a four-line introduction and two groups of ten lines.

Vers. 1, 2. Jahve is called the Rock of our salvation (as in lxxxix. 27, cf. xciv. 22) as being its firm and sure ground. Visiting the house of God, one comes before God's face; קָרַם פְּנֵי, præoccupare faciem, is equivalent to visere (visitare). תּוֹרָה is not confessio peccati, but laudis. The Beth before תּוֹרָה is the Beth of accompaniment, as in Mic. vi. 6; that before וְמִרְוֵת (according to 2 Sam. xxiii. 1 a name for psalms, whilst מְזַמֵּר can only be used as a technical expression) is the Beth of the medium.

Vers. 3-7b. The adorableness of God receives a threefold confirmation: He is exalted above all gods as King, above all things as Creator, and above His people as Shepherd and Leader. אֱלֹהִים (gods) here, as in xcvi. 4 sq., xcvii. 7, 9, and frequently, are the powers of the natural world and of the world of men, which the Gentiles deify and call kings (as Moloch (Molech), the deified fire), which, however, all stand under the lordship of Jahve, who is infinitely exalted above everything that is otherwise called god (xcvi. 4, xcvi. 9). The supposition that תועפות הרים denotes the pit-works (μέταλλα) of the mountains (Böttcher), is at once improbable, because to all appearance it is intended to be the antithesis to שְׁחָקְרֵי־אָרֶץ, the shafts of the earth. The derivation from וָעָרַ (יער), κάμνειν, κοπιᾶν, also does not suit תועפות in Num. xxiii. 22, xxiv. 8, for “fatigues” and “indefatigableness” are notions that lie very wide apart. The כֶּסֶף תועפות of Job xxii. 25 might more readily be explained according to this “silver of fatigues,” i.e. silver that the fatiguing labour of mining brings to light, and תועפות הרים in the passage before us, with Gussetius, Geier, and Hengstenberg: cacumina montium quia defatigantur qui eo ascendunt, prop. ascendings = summits of the mountains, after which כֶּסֶף תועפות, Job xxii. 25, might also signify “silver of the mountain-heights.” But the LXX., which renders δόξα in the passages in Numbers and τὰ ὑψη τῶν ὀρέων in the passage before us, leads one to a more correct track. The verb וָעָרַ (יער), transposed from יפע (ופע), goes back to the root וף, וף, to stand forth, tower above, to be high, according to which תועפות = תופעות signifies eminentia, i.e. towerings = summits, or prominences = high (the highest) perfection (vid. on Job xxii. 25). In the passage before us it is a synonym of the Arabic مِيفَاةٌ, مِيفَاةٌ, pars terræ eminens (from ونى = يפע, prop. instrumentally: a means of rising above, viz. by climbing), and of the names of eminences derived from يفع (after which Hitzig renders: the teeth of the mountains). By reason of the fact that Jahve is the Owner (cf. 1 Sam. ii. 8), because the Creator of all things, the call to worship, which concerns no one so nearly as it does Israel, the people, which before other peoples is Jahve's creation, viz. the creation of His miraculously mighty grace, is repeated. In the call or invitation, הִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה signifies to stretch one's self out full length upon the ground, the proper attitude of adoration; פָּרַע, to curtsy, to totter; and פָּרַה, Arabic baraka, starting from the radical signification flectere, to kneel down, in genua (πρόχυσ, pronom = procnom) procumbere, 2 Chron. vi. 13 (cf. Hölemann, Bibelstudien, i.

135 f.). Beside עַם כְּרֵעִיתוֹ, people of His pasture, יְרֵאָהּ is not the flock formed by His creating hand (Augustine: ipse gratiâ suâ nos oves fecit), but, after Gen. xxx. 35, the flock under His protection, the flock led and defended by His skilful, powerful hand. Böttcher renders: flock of His charge; but יְרֵאָהּ in this sense (Jer. vi. 3) signifies only a place, and "flock of His place" would be poetry and prose in one figure.

Vers. 7c-11. The second decastich begins in the midst of the Masoretic ver. 7. Up to this point the church stirs itself up to a worshipping appearing before its God; now the voice of God (Heb. iv. 7), earnestly admonishing, meets it, resounding from out of the sanctuary. Since שָׁמַעַן signifies not merely to hear, but to hear obediently, ver. 7c cannot be a conditioning protasis to what follows. Hengstenberg wishes to supply the apodosis: "then will He bless you, His people;" but בָּרַךְ in other instances too (lxxxix. 9, cxxxix. 19, Prov. xxiv. 11), like לָמַד, has an optative signification, which it certainly has gained by a suppression of a promissory apodosis, but yet without the genius of the language having any such in mind in every instance. The word הַיּוֹם placed first gives prominence to the present, in which this call to obedience goes forth, as a decisive turning-point. The divine voice warningly calls to mind the self-hardening of Israel, which came to light at Meribah, on the day of Massah. What is referred to, as also in lxxxix. 8, is the tempting of God in the second year of the Exodus on account of the failing of water in the neighbourhood of Horeb, at the place which is for this reason called Massah u-Meribah (Ex. xvii. 1-7); from which is to be distinguished the tempting of God in the fortieth year of the Exodus at Meribah, viz. at the waters of contention near Kadesh (written fully Mé-Meribath Kadesh, or more briefly Mé-Meribah), Num. xx. 2-13 (cf. on lxxviii. 20). Strictly כַּמְרִיבָה signifies nothing but instar Meribæ, as in lxxxiii. 10 instar Midianitarum; but according to the sense, כִּי is equivalent to כִּי־עַל, cvi. 32, just as כִּי־יּוֹם is equivalent to כִּי־בַיּוֹם. On אֲשֶׁר־נָשָׂא, cf. Deut. xi. 6. The meaning of נִשְׂאָהּ פְעָלִי is not they also (נָשָׂא as in lii. 7) saw His work; for the reference to the giving of water out of the rock would give a thought that is devoid of purpose here, and the assertion is too indefinite for it to be understood of the judgment upon those who tempted

God (Hupfeld and Hitzig). It is therefore rather to be rendered: notwithstanding (ὅμως, Ew. § 354, a) they had (= although they had, cf. נָס in Isa. xlix. 15) seen His work (His wondrous guiding and governing), and might therefore be sure that He would not suffer them to be destroyed. The verb נָס coincides with κοτέω, κότος. בְּדוֹר, for which the LXX. has τῆ γενεᾷ ἐκείνῃ, is anarthrous in order that the notion may be conceived of more qualitatively than relatively: with a (whole) generation. With אָמַר Jahve calls to mind the repeated declarations of His vexation concerning their heart, which was always inclined towards error which leads to destruction—declarations, however, which bore no fruit. Just this ineffectiveness of His indignation had as its result that (אָמַר, not ὅτι but ὥστε, as in Gen. xiii. 16, Deut. xxviii. 27, 51, 2 Kings ix. 37, and frequently) He swore, etc. (אָמַר = verily not, Ges. § 155, 2, f, with the emphatic future form in ûn which follows). It is the oath in Num. xiv. 27 sqq. that is meant. The older generation died in the desert, and therefore lost the entering into the rest of God, by reason of their disobedience. If now, many centuries after Moses, they are invited in the Davidic Psalter to submissive adoration of Jahve, with the significant call: "To-day if ye will hearken to His voice!" and with a reference to the warning example of the fathers, the obedience of faith, now as formerly, has therefore to look forward to the gracious reward of entering into God's rest, which the disobedient at that time lost; and the taking possession of Canaan was, therefore, not as yet the final קְבוּרָה (Deut. xii. 9). This is the connection of the wider train of thought which to the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, ch. iii., iv., follows from this text of the Psalm.

PSALM XCVI.

A GREETING OF THE COMING KINGDOM OF GOD.

- 1 SING unto Jahve a new song,
Sing unto Jahve, all lands.
- 2 Sing unto Jahve, bless His Name,
Cheerfully proclaim His salvation from day to day.

- 3 Declare His glory among the heathen,
His wonders among all peoples.
- 4 For great is Jahve and worthy to be praised exceedingly,
Terrible is He above all gods.
- 5 For all the gods of the peoples are idols,
But Jahve hath made the heavens.
- 6 Brightness and splendour are before Him,
Might and beauty are in His sanctuary.
- 7 Give unto Jahve, O ye races of the peoples, Give unto Jahve glory and might.
- 8 Give unto Jahve the honour of His Name,
Take offerings and come into His courts.
- 9 Worship Jahve in holy attire,
Tremble before Him, all lands.
- 10 Say among the heathen: "Jahve is now King,
Therefore the world will stand without tottering,
He will govern the peoples in uprightness."
- 11 The heavens shall rejoice
And the earth be glad,
The sea shall roar and its fulness.
- 12 The field shall exult and all that is therein,
Then shall all the trees of the wood shout for joy—
- 13 Before Jahve, for He cometh,
For He cometh to judge the earth—
He shall judge the world in righteousness
And the peoples in His faithfulness.

What Ps. xcv. 3 says: "A great God is Jahve, and a great King above all gods," is repeated in Ps. xcvi. The LXX. inscribes it (1)  $\epsilon\delta\eta\ \tau\hat{\omega}\ \Delta\alpha\upsilon\iota\delta,$  and the chronicler has really taken it up almost entire in the song which was sung on the day when the Ark was brought in (1 Chron. xvi. 23-33); but, as the coarse seams between vers. 22 and 23, 33 and 34 show, he there strings together familiar reminiscences of the Psalms (vid. on Ps. cv.) as a sort of mosaic, in order approximately to express the festive mood and festive strains of that day. And

(2) ὅτε ὁ οἶκος ᾠκοδομεῖτο (Cod. Vat. ᾠκοδόμηται) μετὰ τὴν αἰχμαλωσίαν. By this the LXX. correctly interprets the Psalm as a post-exilic song: and the Psalm corresponds throughout to the advance which the mind of Israel has experienced in the Exile concerning its mission in the world. The fact that the religion of Jahve is destined for mankind at large, here receives the most triumphantly joyous, lyrical expression. And so far as this is concerned, the key-note of the Psalm is even deutero-Isaianic. For it is one chief aim of Isa. ch. xl.—lxvi. to declare the pinnacle of glory of the Messianic apostolic mission on to which Israel is being raised through the depth of affliction of the Exile. All these post-exilic songs come much nearer to the spirit of the New Testament than the pre-exilic; for the New Testament, which is the intrinsic character of the Old Testament freed from its barriers and limitations, is in process of coming into being (im Werden begriffen) throughout the Old Testament, and the Exile was one of the most important crises in this progressive process.

Ps. xcvi.—xcviii. are more Messianic than many in the strict sense of the word Messianic; for the central (gravitating) point of the Old Testament gospel (Heilsverkündigung) lies not in the Messiah, but in the appearing (parusia) of Jahve—a fact which is explained by the circumstance that the mystery of the incarnation still lies beyond the Old Testament knowledge or perception of salvation. All human intervention in the matter of salvation accordingly appears as purely human, and still more, it preserves a national and therefore outward and natural impress by virtue of the national limit within which the revelation of salvation has entered. If the ideal Davidic king who is expected even does anything superhuman, he is nevertheless only a man—a man of God, it is true, without his equal, but not the God-man. The mystery of the incarnation does, it is true, the nearer it comes to actual revelation, cast rays of its dawning upon prophecy, but the sun itself remains below the horizon: redemption is looked for as Jahve's own act, and "Jahve cometh" is also still the watchword of the last prophet (Mal. iii. 1).

The five six-line strophes of the Psalm before us are not to be mistaken. The chronicler has done away with five lines, and thereby disorganized the strophic structure; and one line

(ver. 10a) he has removed from its position. The originality of the Psalm in the Psalter, too, is revealed thereby, and the non-independence of the chronicler, who treats the Psalm as an historian.

Vers. 1-3. Call to the nation of Jahve to sing praise to its God and to evangelize the heathen. שִׁיר is repeated three times. The new song assumes a new form of things, and the call thereto, a present which appeared to be a beginning that furnished a guarantee of this new state of things, a beginning viz. of the recognition of Jahve throughout the whole world of nations, and of His accession to the lordship over the whole earth. The new song is an echo of the approaching revelation of salvation and of glory, and this is also the inexhaustible material of the joyful tidings that go forth from day to day (מִיּוֹם לְיוֹם as in Esth. iii. 7, whereas in the Chronicles it is מִיּוֹם אֶל־יוֹם as in Num. xxx. 15). We read ver. 1a verbally the same in Isa. xlii. 10; ver. 2 calls to mind Isa. lii. 7, lx. 6; and ver. 3a, Isa. lxvi. 19.

Vers. 4-6. Confirmation of the call from the glory of Jahve that is now become manifest. The clause ver. 4a, as also cxlv. 3, is taken out of xlviii. 2. כָּל־אֱלֹהִים is the plural of כָּל־אֱלֹהִים, every god, 2 Chron. xxxii. 15; the article may stand here or be omitted (xcv. 3, cf. cxiii. 4). All the elohim, i.e. gods, of the peoples are אֱלִילִים (from the negative אַל), nothings and good-for-nothings, unreal and useless. The LXX. renders δαιμόνια, as though the expression were שְׁרִים (cf. 1 Cor. x. 20), more correctly εἰδωλα in Apoc. ix. 20. What ver. 5 says is wrought out in Isa. ch. xl., xliv., and elsewhere; אֱלִילִים is a name of idols that occurs nowhere more frequently than in Isaiah. The sanctuary (ver. 6) is here the earthly sanctuary. From Jerusalem, over which the light arises first of all (Isa. ch. lx.), Jahve's superterrestrial doxa now reveals itself in the world. הוֹד־וְהוֹדָר is the usual pair of words for royal glory. The chronicler reads ver. 6b עוֹ וְהוֹדָרָה בְּמִקְמוֹ ב, might and joy are in His place (הוֹדָרָה a late word, like אֶחָוָה, brotherhood, brotherly affection, from an old root, Ex. xviii. 9). With the place of God one might associate the thought of the celestial place of God transcending space; the chronicler may, however, have altered במקדשו into במקמו because when the Ark was brought in, the Temple (בית המקדש) was not yet built.

Vers. 7-9. Call to the families of the peoples to worship God, the One, living, and glorious God. יהוה is repeated three times here as Ps. xxix., of which the whole strophe is an echo. Isaiah (ch. lx.) sees them coming in with the gifts which they are admonished to bring with them into the courts of Jahve (in Chron. only: לְפָנָיו). Instead of בְּהִרְדֵּת קֹדֶשׁ here and in the chronicler, the LXX. brings the courts (הַצִּדְוֹת) in once more; but the dependence of the strophe upon Ps. xxix. furnishes a guarantee for the "holy attire," similar to the wedding garment in the New Testament parable. Instead of מִפְּנֵי, ver. 9b, the chronicler has מִלְּפָנָיו, just as he also alternates with both forms, 2 Chron. xxxii. 7, cf. 1 Chron. xix. 18.

Vers. 10, 11. That which is to be said among the peoples is the joyous evangel of the kingdom of heaven which is now come and realized. The watchword is "Jahve is King," as in Isa. lii. 7. The LXX. correctly renders: ὁ κύριος ἐβασίλευσε,* for מֶלֶךְ is intended historically (Apoc. xi. 17). אֱלֹהֵי, as in xciii. 1, introduces that which results from this fact, and therefore to a certain extent goes beyond it. The world below, hitherto shaken by war and anarchy, now stands upon foundations that cannot be shaken in time to come, under Jahve's righteous and gentle sway. This is the joyful tidings of the new era which the poet predicts from out of his own times, when he depicts the joy that will then pervade the whole creation; in connection with which it is hardly intentional that ver. 11a and 11b acrostically contain the divine names יהוה and יהו. This joining of all creatures in the joy at Jahve's appearing is a characteristic feature of Isa. ch. xl.-lxii. These cords are already struck in Isa. xxxv. 1 sq. "The sea and its fulness" as in Isa. xlii. 10. In the chronicler ver. 10a (וַיֵּאמְרוּ) instead of (אָמְרוּ) stands between ver. 11b and 11c,—according to Hitzig, who uses all his ingenuity here in favour of that other recension of the text, by an oversight of the copyist.

* In the Psalterium Veronense with the addition apo xylu, Cod. 156, Latinizing ἀπὸ τῶ ξύλου; in the Latin Psalters (the Vulgate excepted) a ligno, undoubtedly an addition by an early Christian hand, upon which, however, great value is set by Justin and all the early Latin Fathers.

Vers. 12, 13. The chronicler changes עָרַי into the prosaic הַשָּׂדֶה, and בְּלִעְצֵי-יָעַר with the omission of the בַּל into הָיָעַר. The psalmist on his part follows the model of Isaiah, who makes the trees of the wood exult and clap their hands, ch. lv. 12, xlv. 23. The אָ, which points into this festive time of all creatures which begins with Jahve's coming, is as in Isa. xxxv. 5 sq. Instead of לְפָנַי, "before," the chronicler has the מִלְפָּנַי so familiar to him, by which the joy is denoted as being occasioned by Jahve's appearing. The lines ver. 13<sup>bc</sup> sound very much like ix. 9. The chronicler has abridged ver. 13, by hurrying on to the mosaic-work portion taken from Ps. cv. The poet at the close glances from the ideal past into the future. The two-fold כָּ is a participle, Ew. § 200. Being come to judgment, after He has judged and sifted, executing punishment, Jahve will govern in the righteousness of mercy and in faithfulness to the promises.

PSALM XCVII.

THE BREAKING THROUGH OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD, THE JUDGE AND SAVIOUR.

- 1 JAHVE is now King, the earth shouteth for joy,
Many islands rejoice.
- 2 Clouds and darkness are round about Him,
Righteousness and judgment are the pillars of His throne.
- 3 Fire goeth before Him
And burneth up His enemies round about.
- 4 His lightnings lighten the world ;
The earth seeth it, and trembleth because of it.
- 5 Mountains melt like wax before Jahve,
Before the Lord of the whole earth.
- 6 The heavens declare His righteousness,
And all the peoples see His glory.
- 7 Confounded are all those who serve graven images,
Who boast themselves of idols ;
All the gods cast themselves down to Him.
- 8 Zion heareth it and rejoiceth thereat,

And the daughters of Judah shout for joy—
Because of Thy judgments, Jahve !

- 9 For Thou, Jahve, art the Most High over all the earth,
Thou art highly exalted above all gods.
- 10 Ye who love Jahve, hate evil :
He who guardeth the souls of His saints,
Out of the hand of the evil-doer will He rescue them.
- 11 Light is sown for the righteous,
And for the upright-minded joy.
- 12 Rejoice, ye righteous, in Jahve,
And sing praise unto His holy Name.

This Psalm, too, has the coming of Jahve, who enters upon His kingdom through judgment, as its theme, and the watchword "Jahve is King" as its key-note. The LXX. inscribes it:  $\tau\hat{\omega}$  Δαυίδ, ὅτε ἡ γῆ αὐτοῦ καθίσταται (καθίστατο); Jerome: quando terra ejus restituta est. The  $\tau\hat{\omega}$  Δαυίδ is worthless; the time of restoration, from which it takes its rise, is the post-exilic, for it is composed, as mosaic-work, out of the earlier original passages of Davidic and Asaphic Psalms and of the prophets, more especially of Isaiah, and is entirely an expression of the religious consciousness which resulted from the Exile.

Vers. 1-3. We have here nothing but echoes of the older literature: ver. 1, cf. Isa. xlii. 10-12, li. 5; ver. 2a, cf. xviii. 10, 12; ver. 2b = lxxxix. 15; ver. 3a, cf. l. 3, xviii. 9; ver. 3b, cf. Isa. xlii. 25. Beginning with the visible coming of the kingdom of God in the present, with  $\text{הָיָא הַיּוֹם}$  the poet takes his stand upon the standpoint of the kingdom which is come. With it also comes rich material for universal joy.  $\text{הָיָא}$  is indicative, as in xcvi. 11 and frequently.  $\text{רַבִּים}$  are all, for all of them are in fact many (cf. Isa. lii. 15). The description of the theophany, for which the way is preparing in ver. 2, also reminds one of Hab. ch. iii. God's enshrouding Himself in darkness bears witness to His judicial earnestness. Because He comes as Judge, the basis of His royal throne and of His judgment-seat is also called to mind. His harbinger is fire, which consumes His adversaries on every side, as that which broke forth out of the pillar of cloud once consumed the Egyptians.

Vers. 4-6. Again we have nothing but echoes of the older literature: ver. 4a = lxxvii. 19; ver. 4b, cf. lxxvii. 17; ver. 5a, cf. Mic. i. 4; ver. 5b, cf. Mic. iv. 13; ver. 6a = l. 6; ver. 6b, cf. Isa. xxxv. 2, xl. 5, lii. 10, lxvi. 18. The poet goes on to describe that which is future with historical certainty. That which lxxvii. 19 says of the manifestation of God in the earlier times he transfers to the revelation of God in the last time. The earth sees it, and begins to tremble in consequence of it. The reading  $\text{וַתִּחַל}$ , according to Hitzig (cf. Ew. § 232, b) traditional, is, however, only an error of pointing that has been propagated; the correct reading is the reading of Heidenheim and Baer, restored according to mss.,  $\text{וַתִּחַל}$  (cf. 1 Sam. xxxi. 3), like  $\text{וַתִּבֶן}$ ,  $\text{וַתִּקֶם}$ ,  $\text{וַתִּרֶם}$ , and  $\text{וַתִּשֶׂם}$ . The figure of the wax is found even in lxviii. 3; and Jahve is also called "Lord of the whole earth" in Zech. iv. 14, vi. 5. The proclamation of the heavens is an expression of joy, xcvi. 11. They proclaim the judicial strictness with which Jahve, in accordance with His promises, carries out His plan of salvation, the realization of which has reached its goal in the fact that all men see the glory of God.

Vers. 7, 8. When the glory of Jahve becomes manifest, everything that is opposed to it will be punished and consumed by its light. Those who serve idols will become conscious of their delusion with shame and terror, Isa. xlii. 17, Jer. x. 14. The superhuman powers (LXX. ἄγγελοι), deified by the heathen, then bow down to Him who alone is Elohim in absolute personality.  $\text{וַיִּשְׁתַּחֲוּ$  is not imperative (LXX., Syriac), for as a command this clause would be abrupt and inconsequential, but the perfect of that which actually takes place. The quotation in Heb. i. 6 is taken from Deut. xxxii. 43, LXX. In ver. 8 (after xlviii. 12) the survey of the poet again comes back to his own nation. When Zion hears that Jahve has appeared, and all the world and all the powers bow down to Him, she rejoices; for it is in fact her God whose kingship has come to be acknowledged. And all the daughter-churches of the Jewish land exult together with the mother-church over the salvation which dawns through judgments.

Ver. 9. This distichic epiphonema (ver. 9a = lxxxiii. 19;

ver. 9*b*, cf. xlvi. 3, 10) might close the Psalm; there follows still, however, a hortatory strophe (which was perhaps not added till later on).

Vers. 10–12. It is true ver. 12*a* is = xxxii. 11, ver. 12*b* = xxx. 5, and the promise in ver. 10 is the same as in xxxvii. 28, xxxiv. 21; but as to the rest, particularly ver. 11, this strophe is original. It is an encouraging admonition to fidelity in an age in which an effeminate spirit of looking longingly towards [lit. ogling] heathenism was rife, and steadfast adherence to Jahve was threatened with loss of life. Those who are faithful in their confession, as in the Maccabæan age (Ἀσιδαῖοι), are called הַסִּידִי. The beautiful figure in ver. 11 is misapprehended by the ancient versions, inasmuch as they read זרע (cxii. 4) instead of זרע. זרע does not here signify sown = strewn into the earth, but strewn along his life's way, so that he, the righteous one, advances step by step in the light. Hitzig rightly compares κιδναται, σκιδναται, used of the dawn and of the sun. Of the former Virgil also says, Et jam prima novo spargebat lumine terras.

PSALM XCVIII.

GREETING TO HIM WHO IS BECOME KNOWN IN RIGHTEOUSNESS AND SALVATION.

- 1 SING unto Jahve a new song,
For He hath done marvellous things,
His right hand and His holy arm helped Him.
- 2 Jahve hath made known His salvation,
He hath revealed His righteousness before the eyes of the nations.
- 3 He remembered His loving-kindness and His faithfulness to the house of Israel,
All the ends of the earth saw the salvation of our God.
- 4 Make a joyful noise unto Jahve, all ye lands,
Break forth into rejoicing and play—
- 5 Play unto Jahve with the cithern,
With the cithern and the voice of song.

- 6 With trumpets and the sound of the horn,
Make a joyful noise before the King Jahve!
- 7 Let the sea roar, and that which filleth it,
The world, and those who dwell therein.
- 8 Let the rivers clap their hands,
Together let the mountains rejoice
- 9 Before Jahve, for He cometh to judge the earth—
He shall judge the world with righteousness,
And the peoples with uprightness.

This is the only Psalm which is inscribed מְנוּחָה without further addition, whence it is called in B. Aboda Zara, 24*b*, מְנוּחָה יתומה (the orphan Psalm). The Peshîto Syriac inscribes it De redemptione populi ex Ægypto; the "new song," however, is not the song of Moses, but the counterpart of this, cf. Apoc. xv. 3. There "the Lord reigneth" resounded for the first time, at the sea; here the completion of the beginning there commenced is sung, viz. the final glory of the divine kingdom, which through judgment breaks through to its full reality. The beginning and end are taken from Ps. xcvi. Almost all that lies between is taken from the second part of Isaiah. This book of consolation for the exiles is become as it were a Castalian spring for the religious lyric.

Vers. 1-3. Ver. 1*ab* we have already read in xcvi. 1. What follows in ver. 1*c*-3 is taken from Isa. lii. 10, lxiii. 5, cf. 7, lix. 16, cf. xl. 10. The primary passage, Isa. lii. 10, shows that the Athnach of ver. 2 is correctly placed. לְעֵינַי is the opposite of hearsay (cf. לلعين, from one's own observation, opp. للخبير, from the narrative of another person). The dative לְיִשְׂרָאֵל depends upon וַיִּזְכֹּר, according to cvi. 45, cf. Luke i. 54 sq.

Vers. 4-6. The call in ver. 4 demands some joyful manifestation of the mouth, which can be done in many ways; in ver. 5 the union of song and the music of stringed instruments, as of the Levites; and in ver. 6 the sound of wind instruments, as of the priests. On ver. 4 cf. Isa. xlv. 23, xlix.

13, lii. 9, together with xiv. 7 (inasmuch as פָּצְחוּ וַרְנְנוּ is equivalent to פָּצְחוּ רִנָּה). פָּצְחוּ וַרְנְנוּ is found also in Isa. li. 3.

Vers. 7-9. Here, too, it is all an echo of the earlier language of Psalms and prophets: ver. 7a = xcvi. 11; ver. 7b like xxiv. 1; ver. 8 after Isa. lv. 12 (where we find מָחָא בָּהּ instead of the otherwise customary תָּקַע בָּהּ, xlvi. 2; or הִפָּה בָּהּ, 2 Kings xi. 12, is said of the trees of the field); ver. 9 = xcvi. 13, cf. 10. In the bringing in of nature to participate in the joy of mankind, the clapping rivers (נְהַרְוֹת) are original to this Psalm: the rivers cast up high waves, which flow into one another like clapping hands;* cf. Hab. iii. 10, where the abyss of the sea lifts up its hands on high, i.e. causes its waves to run mountain-high.

PSALM XCIX.

SONG OF PRAISE IN HONOUR OF THE THRICE HOLY ONE.

- 1 JAHVE reigneth, the peoples tremble;
He sitteth upon the cherubim, the earth tottereth.
- 2 Jahve in Zion is great,
And HE is exalted above all the peoples.
- 3 They shall praise Thy great and fearful name—
Holy is HE.
- 4 And the might of a king who loveth the right
Hast THOU established in righteousness;
Right and righteousness hast THOU executed in Jacob.
- 5 Exalt ye Jahve our God,
And prostrate yourselves at His footstool—
Holy is HE.
- 6 Moses and Aaron among His priests,
And Samuel among those who call upon His name—
They called unto Jahve and HE answered them;

* Luther renders: "the water-floods exult" (frohlocken); and Eychman's Vocabularius predicantium explains plaudere by "to exult (frohlocken) for joy, to smite the hands together præ gaudio;" cf. Luther's version of Ezek. xxi. 17.

- 7 In a pillar of cloud He spoke to them ;
They kept His testimonies,
And the law which He gave them.
- 8 Jahve our God, THOU hast answered them ;
A forgiving God wast Thou unto them,
And one taking vengeance of their deeds.
- 9 Exalt ye Jahve our God,
And prostrate yourselves at His holy mountain,
For holy is Jahve our God.

This is the third of the Psalms (xciii., xcvi., xcix.) which begin with the watchword ה' מְלֶכֶךְ. It falls into three parts, of which the first (vers. 1-3) closes with קְרוֹשׁ הוּא, the second (vers. 4, 5) with קְרוֹשׁ הוּא, and the third, more full-toned, with קְרוֹשׁ ה' אֱלֹהֵינוּ—an earthly echo of the trisagion of the seraphim. The first two Sanctuses are two hexastichs; and two hexastichs form the third, according to the very same law by which the third and the sixth days of creation each consists of two creative works. This artistic form bears witness against Olshausen in favour of the integrity of the text; but the clare-obscure of the language and expression makes no small demands upon the reader.

Bengel has seen deepest into the internal character of this Psalm. He says, "The 99th Psalm has three parts, in which the Lord is celebrated as He who is to come, as He who is, and as He who was, and each part is closed with the ascription of praise: He is holy." The Psalm is laid out accordingly by Oettinger, Burk, and C. H. Rieger.

Vers. 1-3. The three futures express facts of the time to come, which are the inevitable result of Jahve's kingly dominion bearing sway from heaven, and here below from Zion, over the world; they therefore declare what must and will happen. The participle insidens cherubis (lxxx. 2, cf. xviii. 11) is a definition of the manner (Olshausen): He reigns, sitting enthroned above the cherubim. נוֹד, like نود, is a further formation of the root נא, נו, to bend, nod. What is meant is not a trembling that is the absolute opposite of joy, but a trembling that leads on to salvation. The Breviarium in Psal- terium, which bears the name of Jerome, observes: Terra quamdiu immota fuerit, sanari non potest; quando vero mota fuerit et intremuerit, tunc recipiet sanitatem. In ver. 3a declaration passes over into invocation. One can feel how the hope that the "great and fearful Name" (Deut. x. 17) will be universally acknowledged, and therefore that the religion of Israel will become the religion of the world, moves and elates the poet. The fact that the expression notwithstanding is not קָדוֹשׁ אֱתָהּ, but קָדוֹשׁ הוּא, is explained from the close connection with the seraphic trisagion in Isa. vi. 3. הוּא refers to Jahve; He and His Name are notions that easily glide over into one another.

Vers. 4, 5. The second Sanctus celebrates Jahve with respect to His continuous righteous rule in Israel. The majority of expositors construe it: "And (they shall praise) the might of the king, who loves right;" but this joining of the clause on to יָרִי over the refrain that stands in the way is hazardous. Neither can מִיִּשְׁפָּט אֱהֵב, however, be an independent clause, since אֱהֵב cannot be said of עַן, but only of its possessor. And the dividing of the verse at אֱהֵב, adopted by the LXX., will therefore not hold good. מִיִּשְׁפָּט אֱהֵב is an attributive clause to מֶלֶךְ in the same position as in xi. 7; and עַן, with what appertains to it, is the object to בּוֹנֵינֶתָ placed first, which has the king's throne as its object elsewhere (ix. 8, 2 Sam. vii. 13, 1 Chron. xvii. 12), just as it here has the might of the king, which, however, here at the same time in מִיִּשְׁפָּט takes another and permutative object (cf. the permutative subject in lxxii. 17), as Hitzig observes; or rather, since מִיִּשְׁפָּט is most generally used as an adverbial notion, this מִיִּשְׁפָּט (lviii. 2, lxxv. 3, ix. 9, and frequently), usually as a definition of the mode of the judging and reigning, is subordinated: and the might of a king who loves the right, i.e. of one who governs not according to dynastic caprice but moral precepts, hast Thou established in spirit and aim (directed to righteousness and equity). What is meant is the theocratic kingship, and ver. 4c says what Jahve has constantly accomplished by means of this kingship: He has thus maintained right and righteousness (cf. e.g. 2 Sam. viii. 15, 1 Chron. xviii. 14, 1 Kings x. 9, Isa. xvi. 5) among His people. Out of this manifestation of God's righteousness, which is more conspicuous, and can be better estimated, within the nation of the history of redemption than elsewhere, grows the call to highly exalt Jahve the God of Israel, and to bow one's self very low at His footstool. לַיהוָה יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה, as in cxxxii. 7, is not a statement of the object (for Isa. xlv. 14 is of another kind), but (like לְאֵל in other instances) of the place in which, or of the direction (cf. vii. 14) in which the προσκύνησις is to take place. The temple is called Jahve's footstool (1 Chron. xxviii. 2, cf. Lam. ii. 1, Isa. lx. 13) with reference to the ark, the capporeth of which corresponds to the transparent sapphire (Ex. xxiv. 10) and to the crystal-like firmament of the mercaba (Ezek. i. 22, cf. 1 Chron. xxviii. 18).

Vers. 6-9. The vision of the third Sanctus looks into the history of the olden time prior to the kings. In support of the statement that Jahve is a living God, and a God who proves Himself in mercy and in judgment, the poet appeals to three heroes of the olden time, and the events recorded of them. The expression certainly sounds as though it had reference to something belonging to the present time; and Hitzig therefore believes that it must be explained of the three as heavenly intercessors, after the manner of Onias and Jeremiah in the vision 2 Macc. xv. 12-14. But apart from this presupposing an active manifestation of life on the part of those who have fallen happily asleep, which is at variance with the ideas of the latest as well as of the earliest Psalms concerning the other world, this interpretation founders upon ver. 7a, according to which a celestial discourse of God with the three "in the pillar of cloud" ought also to be supposed. The substantival clauses ver. 6ab bear sufficient evidence in themselves of being a retrospect, by which the futures that follow are stamped as being the expression of the cotemporaneous past. The distribution of the predicates to the three is well conceived. Moses was also a mighty man in prayer, for with his hands uplifted for prayer he obtained the victory for his people over Amalek (Ex. xvii. 11 sq.), and on another occasion placed himself in the breach, and rescued them from the wrath of God and from destruction (cvi. 23, Ex. xxxii. 30-32; cf. also Num. xii. 13); and Samuel, it is true, is only a Levite by descent, but by office in a time of urgent need a priest (cohen), for he sacrifices independently in places where, by reason of the absence of the holy tabernacle with the ark of the covenant, it was not lawful, according to the letter of the law, to offer sacrifices, he builds an altar in Ramah, his residence as judge, and has, in connection with the divine services on the high place (Bama) there, a more than high-priestly position, inasmuch as the people do not begin the sacrificial repasts before he has blessed the sacrifice (1 Sam. ix. 13). But the character of a mighty man in prayer is outweighed in the case of Moses by the character of the priest; for he is, so to speak, the proto-priest of Israel, inasmuch as he twice performed priestly acts which laid as it were a foundation for all times to come, viz. the sprinkling of the blood at the ratification of the covenant under Sinai (Ex. ch. xxiv.), and the whole ritual which was a model for the consecrated priesthood, at the consecration of the priests (Lev. ch. viii.). It was he, too, who performed the service in the sanctuary prior to the consecration of the priests: he set the shew-bread in order, prepared the candlestick, and burnt incense upon the golden altar (Ex. xl. 22-27). In the case of Samuel, on the other hand, the character of the mediator in the religious services is outweighed by that of the man mighty in prayer: by prayer he obtained Israel the victory of Ebenezer over the Philistines (1 Sam. vii. 8 sq.), and confirmed his words of warning with the miraculous sign, that at his calling upon God it would thunder and rain in the midst of a cloudless season (1 Sam. xii. 16, cf. Sir. xlvi. 16 sq.).

The poet designedly says: Moses and Aaron were among His priests, and Samuel among His praying ones. This third twelve-line strophe holds good, not only of the three in particular, but of the twelve-tribe nation of priests and praying ones to which they belong. For ver. 7*a* cannot be meant of the three, since, with the exception of a single instance (Num. xii. 5), it is always Moses only, not Aaron, much less Samuel, with whom God negotiates in such a manner. אֱלֹהִים refers to the whole people, which is proved by their interest in the divine revelation given by the hand of Moses out of the cloudy pillar (Ex. xxxiii. 7 sq.). Nor can ver. 6*c* therefore be understood of the three exclusively, since there is nothing to indicate the transition from them to the people: crying (קָרָאִים, syncopated like חָטְאִים, 1 Sam. xiv. 33) to Jahve, i.e. as often as they (these priests and praying ones, to whom a Moses, Aaron, and Samuel belong) cried unto Jahve, He answered them—He revealed Himself to this people who had such leaders (choragi), in the cloudy pillar, to those who kept His testimonies and the law which He gave them. A glance at ver. 8 shows that in Israel itself the good and the bad, good and evil, are distinguished. God answered those who could pray to Him with a claim to be answered. Ver. 7bc is, virtually at least, a relative clause, declaring the prerequisite of a prayer that may be granted. In ver. 8 is added the thought that the history of Israel, in the time of its redemption out of Egypt, is not less a mirror of the righteousness of God than of the pardoning grace of God. If vers. 7, 8 are referred entirely to the three, then עֲלֵי לִוּי and נִקְנָה, referred to their sins of infirmity, appear to be too strong expressions. But to take the suffix of עֲלֵי לִוּי objectively (ea quæ in eos sunt moliti Core et socii ejus), with Symmachus (καὶ ἔκδικος ἐπὶ ταῖς ἐπιηρείαις αὐτῶν) and Kimchi, as the ulciscens in omnes adinventiones eorum of the Vulgate is interpreted,* is to do violence to it. The reference to the people explains it all without any constraint, and even the flight of prayer that comes in here (cf. Mic. vii. 18). The calling to mind of the generation of the desert, which fell short of the promise, is an earnest admonition for the generation of the present time. The God of Israel is holy in love and in wrath, as He Himself unfolds His Name in Ex. xxxiv. 6, 7. Hence the poet calls upon his fellow-countrymen to exalt this God, whom they may with pride call their own, i.e. to acknowledge and confess His majesty, and to fall down and worship at (cf. לְאֵל, v. 8) the mountain of His holiness, the place of His choice and of His presence.

PSALM C.

CALL OF ALL THE WORLD TO THE SERVICE OF THE TRUE GOD.

- 1 MAKE a joyful noise unto Jahve, all ye lands !
- 2 Serve Jahve with gladness,
Come before Him with rejoicing.

* Vid. Raemdonck in his David propheta cet. 1800 : in omnes injurias ipsis illatas, uti patuit in Core cet

- 3 Know ye that Jahve is God :
 HE hath made us, and His we are,
 His people, and the flock of His pasture.
- 4 Come into His gates with thanksgiving,
 Into His courts with praise.
 Give thanks unto Him, bless His name.
- 5 For Jahve is good,
 His mercy is everlasting,
 And to generation and generation His faithfulness.

This Psalm closes the series of deutero-Isaianic Psalms, which began with Ps. xci. There is common to all of them that mild sublimity, sunny cheerfulness, unsorrowful spiritual character, and New Testament expandedness, which we wonder at in the second part of the Book of Isaiah ; and besides all this, they are also linked together by the figure anadiplosis, and manifold consonances and accords.

The arrangement, too, at least from Ps. xciii. onwards, is Isaianic : it is parallel with the relation of Isa. ch. xxiv.—xxvii. to ch. xiii.—xxiii. Just as the former cycle of prophecies closes that concerning the nations, after the manner of a musical finale, so the Psalms celebrating the dominion of God, from Ps. xciii. onwards, which vividly portray the unfolded glory of the kingship of Jahve, have Jubilate and Cantate Psalms in succession.

From the fact that this last Jubilate is entirely the echo of the first, viz. of the first half of Ps. xcv., we see how ingenious the arrangement is. There we find all the thoughts which recur here. There it is said in ver. 7, He is our God, and we are the people of His pasture and the flock of His hand. And in ver. 2, Let us come before His face with thanksgiving (בְּתוֹרָה), let us make a joyful noise unto Him in songs !

This תורה is found here in the title of the Psalm, מְזוֹמֵר לְתוֹרָה. Taken in the sense of a "Psalm for thanksgiving," it would say but little. We may take לְתוֹרָה in a liturgical sense (with the Targum, Mendelssohn, Ewald, and Hitzig), like לַיּוֹם הַשְּׁבִיעִי, xcii. 1, in this series, and like לְהוֹדוֹת in xxxviii. 1, lxx. 1. What is intended is not merely the tôda of the heart, but the shelamim-tôda, וְבַח תוֹרָה, cvii. 22, cxvi. 17, which is also called absolutely תודה in lvi. 13, 2 Chron. xxix. 31. That kind of shelamim is thus called which is presented על-תודה, i.e. as thankful praise for divine benefits received, more particularly marvellous protection and deliverance (vid. Ps. cvii.).

Vers. 1-3. The call in ver. 1 sounds like xcvi. 4, lxvi. 1. כָּל-הָאָרֶץ are all lands, or rather all men belonging to the earth's population. The first verse, without any parallelism and in so far monostichic, is like the signal for a blowing of the trumpets. Instead of "serve Jahve with gladness (בְּשִׂמְחָה)," it is expressed in ii. 11, "serve Jahve with fear (בְּיִרְאָה)." Fear and joy do not exclude one another. Fear becomes the exalted Lord, and the holy gravity of His requirements; joy becomes the gracious Lord, and His blessed service. The summons to manifest this joy in a religious, festive manner springs up out of an all-hopeful, world-embracing love, and this love is the spontaneous result of living faith in the promise that all tribes of the earth shall be blessed in the seed of Abraham, and in the prophecies in which this promise is unfolded. יָדָע (as in iv. 4) Theodoret well interprets δι' αὐτῶν μάθετε τῶν πραγμάτων. They are to know from facts of outward and inward experience that Jahve is God: He hath made us, and not we ourselves. Thus runs the Chethûb, which the LXX. follows, αὐτὸς ἐποίησεν ἡμᾶς καὶ οὐχ ἡμεῖς (as also the Syriac and Vulgate); but Symmachus (like Rashi), contrary to all possibilities of language, renders αὐτὸς ἐποίησεν ἡμᾶς οὐκ ὄντας. Even the Midrash (Bere-shith Rabba, ch. c. init.) finds in this confession the reverse of the arrogant words in the mouth of Pharaoh: "I myself have made myself" (Ezek. xxix. 3). The Kerî, on the other hand, reads יָלַ*, which the Targum, Jerome, and Saadia follow and render: et ipsius nos sumus. Hengstenberg calls this Kerî quite unsuitable and bad; and Hupfeld, on the other hand, calls the Chethûb an "unspeakable insipidity." But in reality both readings accord with the context, and it is clear that they are both in harmony with Scripture. Many a one has drawn balsamic consolation from the words ipse fecit nos et non ipsi nos; e.g. Melancthon when disconsolately sorrowful over the body of his son in Dresden on the 12th July 1559. But in ipse fecit nos et ipsius nos sumus there is also a rich mine of comfort and of admonition, for the Creator is also the Owner, His heart clings to His creature, and the creature owes itself entirely to Him, without whom it would not have had a being, and would not continue in being. Since, however, the parallel passage, xcv. 7, favours לְיָ rather than לְאֵלֵינוּ; since, further, אֵלֵינוּ is the easier reading, inasmuch as אֵלֵינוּ leads one to expect that an antithesis will follow (Hitzig); and since the "His people and the sheep of His pasture" that follows is a more natural continuation of a preceding לְיָ אֱנַחֲנוּ than that it should be attached as a predicative object to אֵלֵינוּ אֱנַחֲנוּ over a parenthetical לְיָ אֱנַחֲנוּ; the Kerî decidedly maintains the preference. In connection with both readings, אֵלֵינוּ has a sense related to the history of redemption, as in 1 Sam. xii. 6. Israel is Jahve's work (מַעֲשֵׂה), Isa. xxix. 23, lx. 21, cf. Deut. xxxii. 6, 15, not merely as a people, but as the people of God, who were kept in view even in the calling of Abram.

* According to the reckoning of the Masora, there are fifteen passages in the Old Testament in which יָלַ is written and יָלַ is read, viz. Ex. xxi. 8, Lev. xi. 21, xxv. 30, 1 Sam. ii. 3, 2 Sam. xvi. 18, 2 Kings viii. 10, Isa. ix. 2, lxiii. 9, Ps. c. 3, cxxxix. 16, Job xiii. 15 [cf. the note there], xli. 4, Prov. xix. 7, xxvi. 2, Ezra iv. 2. Because doubtful, Isa. xlix. 5, 1 Chron. xi. 20 are not reckoned with these.

Vers. 4, 5. Therefore shall the men of all nations enter with thanksgiving into the gates of His Temple and into the courts of His Temple with praise (xcvi. 8), in order to join themselves in worship to His church, which—a creation of Jahve for the good of the whole earth—is congregated about this Temple and has it as the place of its worship. The pilgrimage of all peoples to the holy mountain is an Old Testament dress of the hope for the conversion of all peoples to the God of revelation, and the close union of all with the people of this God. His Temple is open to them all. They may enter, and when they enter they have to look for great things. For the God of revelation (lii. 11, liv. 8) is "good" (xxv. 8, xxxiv. 9), and His loving-kindness and faithfulness endure for ever—the thought that recurs frequently in the later Hallelujah and Hodu Psalms and is become a liturgical formula (Jer. xxxiii. 11). The mercy or loving-kindness of God is the generosity, and His faithfulness the constancy, of His love.

PSALM CI.

THE VOWS OF A KING.

- 1 OF mercy and right will I sing,
     To Thee, Jahve, will I harp ,
- 2 I will give heed to the way of uprightness—
     When wilt Thou come unto me ?!
- I will walk in the innocence of my heart within my house,
- 3 I will not set before mine eyes
     a worthless action ;
     The commission of excesses I hate,
     nothing shall cleave to me.
- 4 A false heart shall keep far from me,
     I will not cherish an evil thing.
- 5 Whoso secretly slandereth his neighbour,
     him will I destroy ;
     Whoso hath a high look and puffed-up heart,
     him will I not suffer.
- 6 Mine eyes are upon the faithful of the land,
     that they may be round about me ;
     Whoso walketh in the way of uprightness,
     he shall serve me.
- 7 He shall not sit within my house
     who practiseth deceit ;
     He who speaketh lies shall not continue before mine eyes.
- 8 Every morning will I destroy all the wicked of the earth,
     That I may root out of Jahve's city
     all workers of iniquity.

This is the "prince's Psalm,"* or as it is inscribed in

* Eyring, in his Vita of Ernest the Pious [Duke of Saxe-Gotha, b. 1601, d. 1675], relates that he sent an unfaithful minister a copy of the 101st Psalm, and that it became a proverb in the country, when an official had done anything wrong : He will certainly soon receive the prince's Psalm to read.

Luther's version, "David's mirror of a monarch." Can there be any more appropriate motto for it than what is said of Jahve's government in xcix. 4? In respect of this passage of Ps. xcix., to which Ps. c. is the finale, Ps. ci. seems to be appended as an echo out of the heart of David. The appropriateness of the words לְרֵךְ מִיְמֹוֹ (the position of the words is as in Ps. xxiv., xl., cix., cx., cxxxix.) is corroborated by the form and contents. Probably the great historical work from which the chronicler has taken excerpts furnished the post-exilic collector with a further gleaning of Davidic songs, or at least songs that were ascribed to David. The Psalm before us belongs to the time during which the Ark was in the house of Obed-Edom, where David had left it behind through terror at the misfortune of Uzzah. David said at that time: "How shall the Ark of Jahve come to me (the unholy one)?" 2 Sam. vi. 8. He did not venture to bring the Ark of the Fearful and Holy One within the range of his own house. In our Psalm, however, he gives utterance to his determination as king to give earnest heed to the sanctity of his walk, of his rule, and of his house; and this resolve he brings before Jahve as a vow, to whom, in regard to the rich blessing which the Ark of God diffuses around it (2 Sam. vi. 11 sq.), he longingly sighs: "When wilt Thou come to me?!" This cotemporaneous reference has been recognised by Hammond and Venema. From the fact that Jahve comes to David, Jerusalem becomes "the city of Jahve," ver. 8; and to defend the holiness of this the city of His habitation in all faithfulness, and with all his might, is the thing to which David here pledges himself.

The contents of the first verse refer not merely to the Psalm that follows as an announcement of its theme, but to David's whole life: graciousness and right, the self-manifestations united ideally and, for the king who governs His people, typically in Jahve, shall be the subject of his song. Jahve, the primal source of graciousness and of right, it shall be, to whom he consecrates his poetic talent, as also his playing upon the harp. רַחֲמֵי is condescension which flows from the principle of free love, and מִשְׁפָּטֵי legality which binds itself impartially and uncapriciously to the rule (norm) of that which is right and good. They are two modes of conduct, mutually tempering each other, which God requires of every man (Mic. vi. 8, cf. Matt. xxiii. 23: τὴν κρίσιν καὶ τὸν ἔλεον), and more especially of a king. Further, he has resolved to give heed, thoughtfully and with an endeavour to pursue it (בְּהִשְׁבִּילָא as in Dan. ix. 13), unto the way of that which is perfect, i.e. blameless. What is further said might now be rendered as a relative clause: when Thou comest to me. But not until then?! Hitzig renders it differently: I will take up the lot of the just when it comes to me, i.e. as often as it is brought to my knowledge. But if this had been the meaning, בְּבִרְבֵּי would have been said instead of בְּרִבְבֵּי (Ex. xviii. 16, 19, 2 Sam. xix. 12 [11]); for, according to both its parts, the expression רִבְבֵי is an ethical notion, and is therefore not used in a different sense from that in ver. 6. Moreover, the relative use of the interrogative הֲיָ in Hebrew cannot be supported, with the exception, perhaps, of Prov. xxiii. 35. Athanasius correctly interprets: ποθῶ σου τὴν παρουσίαν, ὧ δέσποτα, ἰμείρομαι σου τῆς ἐπιφανείας, ἀλλὰ δὸς τὸ ποθοῦμενον. It is a question of strong yearning: when wilt Thou come to me? is the time near at hand when Thou wilt erect Thy throne near to me? If his longing should be fulfilled, David is resolved to, and will then, behave himself as he further sets forth in the vows he makes. He pledges himself to walk within his house, i.e. his palace, in the innocence or simplicity of his heart (lxxviii. 72, Prov. xx. 7), without allowing himself to be led away from this frame of mind which has become his through grace. He will not set before his eyes, viz. as a proposition or purpose (Deut. xv. 9, Ex. x. 10, 1 Sam. xxix. 10, LXX.), any morally worthless or vile matter whatsoever (xli. 9, cf. concerning בְּלִיעַל, xviii. 5). The commission of excesses he hates: עֲשָׂה is infin. constr. instead of עָשׂוֹת as in Gen. xxxi. 28, l. 20, Prov. xxi. 3, cf. רָאָה Gen. xlvi. 11, שָׂתוּ Prov. xxxi. 4. כְּסָיִם (like שְׂפָיִם in Hos. v. 2), as the object of עֲשָׂה, has not a personal (Kimchi, Ewald) signification (cf. on the other hand xl. 5), but material signification: (facta) declinantia (like וְיָיִם, xix. 14, inso- lentia; וְהִבְלִיָּם, Zech. xi. 7, vincientia); all temptations and incitements of this sort he shakes off from himself, so that nothing of the kind cleaves to him. The confessions in ver. 4 refer to his own inward nature: לֵב עֲקָשׁ (not עֲקָשׁ לֵב, Prov. xvii. 20), a false heart that is not faithful in its intentions either to God or to men, shall remain far from him; wickedness (עָרָא, as in xxxiv. 15) he does not wish to know, i.e. does not wish to foster and nurture within him. Whoso secretly slanders his neighbour, him will he destroy; it will therefore be so little possible for any to curry favour with him by uncharitable perfidious tale-bearing, of the wiliness of which David himself had had abundant experience in his relation to Saul, that it will rather call forth his anger upon him (Prov. xxx. 10). Instead of the regularly pointed מִלִּשְׁנֵי the Keri reads מִלְּשֵׁנִי, m'lišhni, a Poel (לִשְׁנָא linguâ petere, like עָוַן oculo petere, elsewhere הִלְשִׁין, Prov. xxx. 10) with o instead of o (vid. on cix. 10, lxii. 4) and with Chirek compaginis (vid. on Ps. cxiii.). The "lofty of eyes," i.e. supercilious, haughty, and the "broad of heart," i.e. boastful, puffed up, self-conceited (Prov. xxviii. 25, cf. xxi. 4), him he cannot endure (אֵינִי, properly fut. Hoph., I am incapable of, viz. לִישְׁנָא, which is to be supplied as in Isa. i. 13, after Prov. xxx. 21, Jer. xlv. 22).* On the other hand, his eyes rest upon the faithful of the land, with the view, viz., of drawing them into his vicinity. Whoso walks in the way of uprightness, he shall serve him (שִׁרְתָּ, θεραπεύειν, akin to עָבַד, δουλεύειν). He who practises deceit shall not stay within his house; he who speaks lies shall have no continuance (יָבוֹן is more than equivalent to יָבִין) before (under) his eyes. Every morning (לְבֹקֶרִים as in lxxiii. 14, Isa. xxxiii. 2, Lam. iii. 23, and לְבֹקֶרִים, Job vii. 18), when Jahve shall have taken up His abode in Jerusalem, will he destroy all evil-doers (רָשָׁעִים as in cxix. 119), i.e. incorrigibly wicked ones, wherever he may meet them upon the earth, in order that all workers of evil may be rooted out of the royal city, which is now become the city of Jahve.

* In both instances the Masora writes אֵינִי (plene), but the Talmud, B. Erachin 15*b*, had אֵינִי before it when it says: "Of the slanderer God says: I and he cannot dwell together in the world, I cannot bear it any longer with him (אֵינִי)."'

PSALM CII.

PRAYER OF A PATIENT SUFFERER FOR HIMSELF AND FOR THE JERUSALEM THAT LIES IN RUINS.

- 2 O JAHVE, hear my prayer,
And let my cry come unto Thee.
- 3 Hide not Thy face from me in the day that I am in trouble,
Incline Thine ear unto me,
In the day that I call answer me speedily.
- 4 For my days are vanished in smoke,
And my bones are heated through as a hearth.
- 5 Smitten like a green herb and dried up is my heart,
For I have forgotten to eat my bread,
- 6 Because of my loud crying my bones cleave to my flesh.
- 7 I am like a pelican of the wilderness,
I am become as an owl of the ruins.
- 8 Keeping watch I am as a lonely bird on the house-top.
- 9 All the day mine enemies reproach me ;
Those who are mad against me swear by me.
- 10 For I have eaten ashes like bread,
And mingled my drink with weeping,
- 11 Because of Thine indignation and Thy raging,
That Thou hast lifted me up and cast me down.
- 12 My days are like a lengthened shadow,
And I myself am dried up like the green herb.
- 13 But THOU, Jahve, sittest enthroned for ever,
And Thy remembrance endureth into all generations.
- 14 THOU wilt arise, have mercy upon Zion,
For it is time to favour her, yea the time is come—
- 15 For Thy servants cling lovingly to her stones,
And they cry sore over her dust.
- 16 And the heathen shall fear the Name of Jahve,
And all the kings of the earth Thy glory,

- 17 Because Jahve hath rebuilt Zion,
He hath appeared in His glory,
18 He hath turned to the prayer of the destitute,
And not despised their prayer.
- 19 It shall be written for the generation to come,
And a people yet to be created shall praise Jāh, <sup>1</sup>
20 That He hath looked down from His holy height,
From heaven unto earth hath Jahve looked,
21 To hear the sighing of the prisoner,
To set at liberty those who are appointed to death,
22 That they may declare in Zion the Name of Jahve,
And His praise in Jerusalem,
23 When the peoples are gathered together,
And the kingdoms, to serve Jahve.
- 24 He hath bowed down my strength in the way,
He hath shortened my days.
25 I said, My God, take me not away in the midst of my days—
Into all generations Thy years endure.
- 26 Of old hast Thou founded the earth,
And the heavens are the work of Thy hands.
27 Those shall perish, but Thou remainest,
They all shall wax old like a garment,
As a vesture dost Thou change them and they change—
28 But THOU art the same and Thy years have no end!
29 The children of Thy servants shall dwell,
And their seed shall continue before Thee.

Ps. ci. utters the sigh: When wilt Thou come to me? and Ps. cii. with the inscription: Prayer for an afflicted one when he pineth away and poureth forth his complaint before Jahve, prays, Let my prayer come unto Thee. It is to be taken, too, just as personally as it sounds, and the person is not to be construed into a nation. The song of the יָצַח is, however, certainly a national song; the poet is a servant of Jahve, who shares the calamity that has befallen Jerusalem and its homeless people, both in outward circumstances and in the very depth of his soul. יָצַח signifies to pine away, languish, as in lxi. 3, Isa. lvii. 16; and שָׁפַךְ שִׁיחוֹ to pour out one's thoughts and complaints, one's anxious care, as in cxlii. 3, cf. 1 Sam. i. 15 sq.

As is the case already with many of the preceding Psalms, the deutero-Isaianic impression accompanies us in connection with this Psalm also, even to the end; and the further we get in it the more marked does the echo of its prophetic prototype become. The poet also allies himself with earlier Psalms, such as xxii., lxix., and lxxix., although himself capable of lofty poetic flight, in return for which he makes us feel the absence of any safely progressive unfolding of the thoughts.

Vers. 2, 3. The Psalm opens with familiar expressions of prayer, such as rise in the heart and mouth of the praying one without his feeling that they are of foreign origin; cf. more especially xxxix. 13, xviii. 7, lxxxviii. 3; and on ver. 3: xxvii. 9 (Hide not Thy face from me); lix. 17 (ביום צר לי); xxxi. 3 and frequently (Incline Thine ear unto me); lvi. 10 (ביום אקרא); lxix. 18, cxliii. 7 (פִּהֵר עֲנִי).

Vers. 4-6. From this point onward the Psalm becomes original. Concerning the Beth in בַּעֲשֵׂן, vid. on xxxvii. 20. The reading קָר (in the Karaite Ben-Jerucham) enriches the lexicon in the same sense with a word which has scarcely had any existence. מוֹקֵר (Arabic maukid) signifies here, as in other instances, a hearth. נִהְרִי is, as in lxix. 4, Niphal: my bones are heated through with a fever-heat, as a hearth with the smouldering fire that is on it. הוֹבֵקָה (cf. יגורו, xciv. 21) is used exactly as in Hos. ix. 16, cf. Ps. cxxi. 6. The heart is said to dry up when the life's blood, of which it is the reservoir, fails. The verb שָׁבַת is followed by מִן of dislike. On the cleaving of the bones to the flesh from being baked, i.e. to the skin (Arabic بشُر, in accordance with the radical signification, the surface of the body = the skin, from בשר, to brush along, rub, scrape, scratch on the surface), cf. Job xix. 20, Lam. iv. 8. לְ (אֶל) with רִבַּק is used just like בְּ. It is unnecessary, with Böttcher, to draw אֲנַחֲתִי to ver. 5. Continuous straining of the voice, especially in connection with persevering prayer arising from inward conflict, does really make the body waste away.

Vers. 7-9. קָאֵת (construct of קָאֵת or קָאֵת from קָאֵה, vid.

Isaiah, ii. 73), according to the LXX., is the pelican, and כּוֹס is the night-raven or the little horned-owl.* כּוֹס obtains the signification to be like, equal (æqualem esse), from the radical signification to be flat, even, and to spread out flat (as the Dutch have already recognised). They are both unclean creatures, which are fond of the loneliness of the desert and ruined places. To such a wilderness, that of the exile, is the poet unwillingly transported. He passes the nights without sleep (שָׁרָה, to watch during the time for sleep), and is therefore like a bird sitting lonesome (בּוֹרֵר, Syriac erroneously נוֹרֵר) upon the roof whilst all in the house beneath are sleeping. The Athnach in ver. 8 separates that which is come to be from the ground of the “becoming” and the “becoming” itself. His grief is that his enemies reproach him as one forsaken of God. מְהוֹלֵל, part. Poal, is one made or become mad, Eccles. ii. 2: my mad ones = those who are mad against me. These swear by him, inasmuch as they say when they want to curse: “God do unto thee as unto this man,” which is to be explained according to Isa. lxxv. 15, Jer. xxix. 22.

Vers. 10-12. Ashes are his bread (cf. Lam. iii. 16), inasmuch as he, a mourner, sits in ashes, and has thrown ashes all over himself, Job ii. 8, Ezek. xxvii. 30. The inflected שָׁרָה

* The LXX. renders it: I am like a pelican of the desert, I am become as a night-raven upon a ruined place (οἰκοπέδον). In harmony with the LXX., Saadia (as also the Arabic version edited by Erpenius, the Samaritan Arabic, and Abulwalid) renders קוֹס by قوق (here and in Lev. xi. 18, Deut. xiv. 17, Isa. xxxiv. 17), and כּוֹס by بوم; the latter (bum) is an onomatopoeic name of the owl, and the former (kuḳ) does not even signify the owl or horned-owl (although the small horned-owl is called um kuéik in Egypt, and in Africa abu kuéik; vid. the dictionaries of Boethor and Marcel s.v. chouette), but the pelican, the “long-necked water-bird” (Damiri after the lexicon el-‘Obâb of Hasan ben-Mohammed el-Saghani). The Græco-Veneta also renders קוֹס with πελεκάν, — the Peshito, however, with <sup>ו</sup>כּוֹס. What Ephrem on Deut. xiv. 17 and the Physiologus Syrus (ed. Tychsen, p. 13, cf. pp. 110 sq.) say of <sup>ו</sup>כּוֹס, viz. that it is a marsh-bird, is very fond of its young ones, dwells in desolate places, and is incessantly noisy, likewise points to the pelican, although the Syrian lexicographers vary. Cf. also Oedmann, Vermischte Sammlungen, Heft 3, Cap. 6. (Fleischer after a communication from Rödiger.)

has  $\text{שָׁקַי} = \text{שָׁקוּי}$  for its principal form, instead of which it is  $\text{שָׁקַי}$  in Hos. ii. 7. "That Thou hast lifted me up and cast me down" is to be understood according to Job xxx. 22. First of all God has taken away the firm ground from under his feet, then from aloft He has cast him to the ground—an emblem of the lot of Israel, which is removed from its fatherland and cast into exile, i.e. into a strange land. In that passage the days of his life are  $\text{לְצֵלַל נְטוּי}$ , like a lengthened shadow, which grows longer and longer until it is entirely lost in darkness, cix. 23. Another figure follows: he there becomes like an (uprooted) plant which dries up.

Vers. 13-15. When the church in its individual members dies off on a foreign soil, still its God, the unchangeable One, remains, and therein the promise has the guarantee of its fulfilment. Faith lays hold upon this guarantee as in Ps. xc. It becomes clear from ix. 8 and Lam. v. 19 how  $\text{הַיֵּשֶׁב}$  is to be understood. The Name which Jahve makes Himself by self-attestation never falls a prey to the dead past, it is His ever-living memorial ( $\text{זִכָּרוֹ}$ , Ex. iii. 15). Thus, too, will He restore Jerusalem; the limit, or appointed time, to which the promise points is, as his longing tells the poet, now come.  $\text{בְּיוֹשֶׁב}$ , according to lxxv. 3, Hab. ii. 3, is the juncture, when the redemption by means of the judgment on the enemies of Israel shall dawn.  $\text{לְהַחֲנִיף}$ , from the infinitive  $\text{חָנַף}$ , has  $\text{ח}$ , flattened from  $\text{ח}$ , in an entirely closed syllable.  $\text{רָצָה}$  seq. acc. signifies to have pleasure in anything, to cling to it with delight; and  $\text{חָנַף}$ , according to Prov. xiv. 21, affirms a compassionate, tender love of the object. The servants of God do not feel at home in Babylon, but their loving yearning lingers over the ruins, the stones and the heaps of the rubbish (Neh. iii. 34 [iv. 2]), of Jerusalem.

Vers. 16-18. With  $\text{וַיִּרְאוּ}$  we are told what will take place when that which is expected in ver. 14 comes to pass, and at the same time the fulfilment of that which is longed for is thereby urged home upon God: Jahve's own honour depends upon it, since the restoration of Jerusalem will become the means of the conversion of the world—a fundamental thought of Isa. ch. xl.-lxvi. (cf. more particularly ch. lix. 19, lx. 2), which is also called to mind in the expression of this strophe. This prophetic prospect (Isa. xl. 1-5) that the restoration of Jerusalem will take place simultaneously with the glorious parusia of Jahve re-echoes here in a lyric form. בִּי, ver. 17, states the ground of the reverence, just as ver. 20 the ground of the praise. The people of the Exile are called in ver. 18 הָעֵרְוָה, from עָרַר, to be naked: homeless, powerless, honourless, and in the eyes of men, prospectless. The LXX. renders this word in Jer. xvii. 6 ἀγροσυμμερικη, and its plural, formed by an internal change of vowel, עֵרְוֹת, in Jer. xlvi. 6 ὄνος ἄγριος, which are only particularizations of the primary notion of that which is stark naked, neglected, wild. Ver. 18*b* is an echo of Ps. xxii. 25. In the mirror of this and of other Psalms written in times of affliction the Israel of the Exile saw itself reflected.

Vers. 19-23. The poet goes on advancing motives to Jahve for the fulfilment of his desire, by holding up to Him what will take place when He shall have restored Zion. The evangel of God's redemptive deed will be written down for succeeding generations, and a new, created people, i.e. a people coming into existence, the church of the future, shall praise God the Redeemer for it. דִּיר אֶחָדָן as in xlvi. 14, lxxviii. 4. נְבָרָא like עַם נוֹלָר xxii. 32, perhaps with reference to deuterop-Isaianic passages like Isa. xliii. 7. On ver. 20, cf. Isa. lxiii. 15; in ver. 21 (cf. Isa. xlii. 7, lxi. 1) the deuterop-Isaianic colouring is very evident. And ver. 21 rests still more verbally upon lxxix. 11. The people of the Exile are as it were in prison and chains (אֶסְרִי), and are advancing towards their destruction (בְּגִי תְמוֹתָהּ), if God does not interpose. Those who have returned home are the subject to לְסִפּוּר. בְּ in ver. 23 introduces that which takes place simultaneously: with the release of Israel from servitude is united the conversion of the world. נִקְבְּזָן occurs in the same connection as in Isa. lx. 4. After having thus revelled in the glory of the time of redemption the poet comes back to himself and gives form to his prayer on his own behalf.

Vers. 24-29. On the way (בַּ as in cx. 7)—not “by means of the way” (בַּ as in cv. 18), in connection with which one would expect to find some attributive minuter definition of the way—God hath bowed down his strength (cf. Deut. viii. 2); it was therefore a troublous, toilsome way which he has been led, together with his people. He has shortened his days, so that he only drags on wearily, and has only a short distance still before him before he is entirely overcome. The Chethib כְּהוּ

(LXX. ισχύος αὐτοῦ) may be understood of God's irresistible might, as in Job xxiii. 6, xxx. 18, but in connection with it the designation of the object is felt to be wanting. The introductory וַיִּבֶן (cf. Job x. 2), which announces a definite moulding of the utterance, serves to give prominence to the petition that follows. In the expression וַיִּבֶן אֱלֹהִים life is conceived of as a line the length of which accords with nature; to die before one's time is a being taken up out of this course, so that the second half of the line is not lived through (lv. 24, Isa. xxxviii. 10). The prayer not to sweep him away before his time, the poet supports not by the eternity of God in itself, but by the work of the rejuvenation of the world and of the restoration of Israel that is to be looked for, which He can and will bring to an accomplishment, because He is the ever-living One. The longing to see this new time is the final ground of the poet's prayer for the prolonging of his life. The confession of God the Creator in ver. 26 reminds one in its form of Isa. xlviii. 13, cf. xlv. 24. וַיִּבֶן in ver. 27 refers to the two great divisions of the universe. The fact that God will create heaven and earth anew is a revelation that is indicated even in Isa. xxxiv. 4, but is first of all expressed more fully and in many ways in the second part of the Book of Isaiah, viz. li. 6, 16, lxv. 17, lxvi. 22. It is clear from the agreement in the figure of the garment (Isa. li. 6, cf. l. 9) and in the expression (וַיִּבֶן, perstare, as in Isa. lxvi. 22) that the poet has gained this knowledge from the prophet. The expressive הוּא הוּא, Thou art He, i.e. unalterably the same One, is also taken from the mouth of the prophet, Isa. xli. 4, xliii. 10, xlvi. 4, xlviii. 12; הוּא is a predicate, and denotes the identity (sameness) of Jalive (Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, i. 63). In ver. 29 also, in which the prayer for a lengthening of life tapers off to a point, we hear Isa. lxv. 9, lxvi. 22 re-echoed. And from the fact that in the mind of the poet as of the prophet the post-exilic Jerusalem and the final new Jerusalem upon the new earth under a new heaven blend together, it is evident that not merely in the time of Hezekiah or of Manasseh (assuming that Isa. ch. xl.-lxvi. are by the old Isaiah), but also even in the second half of the Exile, such a perspectively foreshortened view was possible. When, moreover, the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews at once refers vers. 26-28 to Christ, this is justified by the fact that the God whom the poet confesses as the unchangeable One is Jahve who is to come.

PSALM CIII.

HYMN IN HONOUR OF GOD THE ALL-COMPASSIONATE ONE.

- 1 BLESS, O my soul, Jahve,
And all that is within me, His holy Name.
- 2 Bless, O my soul, Jahve,
And forget not all His benefits—
- 3 Who forgiveth all thine iniquity,
Who healeth all thine infirmities,
- 4 Who redeemeth thy life from the pit,
Who crowneth thee with loving-kindness and tender
- 5 Who satisfieth thy mouth with good, [mercies,
So that thy youth renews itself like the eagle.

- 6 Deeds of righteousness doth Jahve perform,
And judgments on behalf of all that are oppressed.
- 7 He made known His ways unto Moses,
To the children of Israel His mighty acts.
- 8 Merciful and gracious is Jahve,
Slow to anger and plenteous in mercy.
- 9 Not always doth He contend,
And not for ever doth He keep anger.
- 10 He doth not deal with us after our sins,
Nor recompense us after our iniquities.

- 11 For as the heaven is high above the earth,
So mighty is His mercy upon those who fear Him.
- 12 As far as the east is from the west,
So far doth He remove our transgressions from us.
- 13 Like as a father pitieth his children,
So Jahve pitieth those who fear Him.
- 14 For He knoweth our nature,
He is mindful, that we are dust.

- 15 A mortal man—his days are as grass,
As a flower of the field, so he flourisheth.

- 16 If the wind passeth over him, he is not,
And his place knoweth him no more.
- 17 But the mercy of Jahve is from everlasting to everlasting upon those who fear Him,
And His righteousness is manifested to children's children,
- 18 To those who keep His covenant
And are mindful of His statutes to do them.
- 19 Jahve hath established His throne in the heavens,
And His kingdom ruleth over all.
- 20 Bless Jahve, ye His angels,
Ye strong heroes doing His word,
Harkening to the call of His word.
- 21 Bless Jahve, all ye His hosts,
His servants doing His pleasure.
- 22 Bless Jahve, all ye His works,
In all places of His dominion.
Bless, O my soul, Jahve!

To the "Thou wilt have compassion upon Zion" of cii. 14 is appended Ps. ciii., which has this as its substance throughout; but in other respects the two Psalms stand in contrast to one another. The inscription לָרִיר is also found thus by itself without any further addition even before Psalms of the First Book (xxvi.—xxviii., xxxv., xxxvii.). It undoubtedly does not rest merely on conjecture, but upon tradition. For no internal grounds which might have given rise to the annotation לָרִיר can be traced. The form of the language does not favour it. This pensive song, so powerful in its tone, has an Aramaic colouring like Ps. cxvi., cxxiv., cxxix. In the heaping up of Aramaizing suffix-forms it has its equal only in the story of Elisha, 2 Kings iv. 1-7, where, moreover, the Kerî throughout substitutes the usual forms, whilst here, where these suffix-forms are intentional ornaments of the expression, the Chethâb rightly remains unaltered. The forms are 2*d sing. fem.* ēchi for ēch, and 2*d sing. plur.* ājchi for ajich. The i without the tone which is added here is just the one with which originally the pronunciation was אֲחִי instead of אָחִי and לְאֵי for לָאֵי. Out of the Psalter (here and cxvi. 7, 19) these suffix-forms echi and ajchi occur only in

Jer. xi. 15, and in the North-Palestinian history of the prophet in the Book of Kings.

The groups or strophes into which the Psalm falls are vers. 1-5, 6-10, 11-14, 15-18, 19-22. If we count their lines we obtain the schema 10. 10. 8. 8. 10. The Coptic version accordingly reckons 46 CTYXOC, i.e. στίχοι.

Vers. 1-5. In the strophe vers. 1-5 the poet calls upon his soul to arise to praiseful gratitude for God's justifying, redeeming, and renewing grace. In such soliloquies it is the Ego that speaks, gathering itself up with the spirit, the stronger, more manly part of man (Psychology, S. 104 sq.; tr. p. 126), or even, because the soul as the spiritual medium of the spirit and of the body represents the whole person of man (Psychology, S. 203; tr. p. 240), the Ego rendering objective in the soul the whole of its own personality. So here in vers. 3-5 the soul, which is addressed, represents the whole man. The קַרְבִּים which occurs here is a more choice expression for מַעֲיִם (מַעֲיָם): the heart, which is called קַרְבִּי κατ' ἐξοχήν, the reins, the liver, etc.; for according to the scriptural conception (Psychology, S. 266; tr. p. 313) these organs of the cavities of the breast and abdomen serve not merely for the bodily life, but also the psycho-spiritual life. The summoning קַרְבִּי is repeated per anaphoram. There is nothing the soul of man is so prone to forget as to render thanks that are due, and more especially thanks that are due to God. It therefore needs to be expressly aroused in order that it may not leave the blessing with which God blesses it unacknowledged, and may not forget all His acts performed (נָמַר = נָמַל) on it (נְמִילָה, ῥῆμα μέσον, e.g. in cxxxvii. 8), which are purely deeds of loving-kindness (benefits). Now follow attributive participles, which attach themselves to אֲתֵהָ. Most prominent stands mercy (loving-kindness), which is the primal condition and the foundation of all the others, viz. sin-pardoning mercy. The verbs פָּלַח and רָפָא with a dative of the object denote the bestowment of that which is expressed by the verbal notion. תַּחֲלִיאוֹתַי (taken from Deut. xxix. 21, cf. 1 Chron. xxi. 19, from חָלַהּ = חָלָהּ, root חָל, solutum, laxum esse) are not merely bodily diseases, but all kinds of inward and outward sufferings. מִשְׁחַחַת the LXX. renders ἐκ φθορᾶς (from חָחַח, as in Job xvii. 14); but in this antithesis to life it is more natural to render the "pit" (from שׁוֹמֵר) as a name of Hades, as in xvi. 10. Just as the soul owes its deliverance from guilt and distress and death to God, so also does it owe to God that with which it is endowed out of the riches of divine love. The verb עָטַר, without any such addition as in v. 13, is "to crown," cf. viii. 6. As is usually the case, it is construed with a double accusative; the crown is as it were woven out of loving-kindness and compassion. The Beth of בְּטוֹב in ver. 5 instead of the accusative (civ. 28) denotes the means of satisfaction, which is at the same time that which satisfies. עָרַיְתָה the Targum renders: dies senectutis tuæ, whereas in xxxii. 9 it has ornatus ejus; the Peshîto renders: corpus tuum, and in xxxii. 9 inversely, juventus eorum. These significations, "old age" or "youth," are pure inventions. And since the words are addressed to the soul, עָרַי cannot also, like בְּבוֹר in other instances, be a name of the soul itself (Aben-Ezra, Mendelssohn, Philippsohn, Hengstenberg, and others). We, therefore, with Hitzig, fall back upon the sense of the word in xxxii. 9, where the LXX. renders τὰς σιαγόνας αὐτῶν, but here more freely, apparently starting from the primary notion of עָרַי = Arabic chadd, the cheek: τὸν ἐμπιπλῶντα ἐν ἀγαθοῖς τὴν ἐπιθυμίαν σου (whereas Saadia's victum tuum is based upon a comparison of the Arabic اُدغ, to nourish). The poet tells the soul (i.e. his own person, himself) that God satisfies it with good, so that it as it were gets its cheeks full of it (cf. lxxxi. 11). The comparison בְּנִשְׁפָּר is, as in Mic. i. 16 (cf. Isa. xl. 31), to be referred to the annual moulting of the eagle. Its renewing of its plumage is an emblem of the renovation of his youth by grace. The predicate to נִעְרַיְתָי (plural of extension in relation to time) stands first regularly in the sing. fem.

Vers. 6-10. His range of vision being widened from himself, the poet now in vers. 6-18 describes God's gracious and fatherly conduct towards sinful and perishing men, and that as it shines forth from the history of Israel and is known and recognised in the light of revelation. What ver. 6 says is a common-place drawn from the history of Israel. מִשְׁפָּטִים is an accusative governed by the עָשָׂה that is to be borrowed out of עָשָׂה (so Baer after the Masora). And because ver. 6 is the result of an historical retrospect and survey, עָרַי in ver. 7 can affirm that which happened in the past (cf. xcix. 6 sq.); for the supposition of Hengstenberg and Hitzig, that Moses here represents Israel like Jacob, Isaac, and Joseph in other instances, is without example in the whole Israelitish literature. It becomes clear from ver. 8 in what sense the making of His ways known is meant. The poet has in his mind Moses' prayer: "make known to me now Thy way" (Ex. xxxiii. 13), which Jahve fulfilled by passing by him as he stood in the cleft of the rock and making Himself visible to him as he looked after Him, amidst the proclamation of His attributes. The ways of Jahve are therefore in this passage not those in which men are to walk in accordance with His precepts (xxv. 4), but those which He Himself follows in the course of His redemptive history (lxvii. 3). The confession drawn from Ex. xxxiv. 6 sq. is become a formula of the Israelitish faith (lxxxvi. 15, cxlv. 8, Joel ii. 13, Neh. ix. 17, and frequently). In vers. 9 sqq. the fourth attribute (וְרַב־הַחֶסֶד) is made the object of further praise. He is not only long (אַרְרֵה from אָרַרְה, like פָּבַר from פָּבַר) in anger, i.e. waiting a long time before He lets His anger loose, but when He contends, i.e. interposes judicially, this too is not carried to the full extent (lxxviii. 38), He is not angry for ever (נָטַר, to keep, viz. anger, Amos i. 11; cf. the parallels both as to matter and words, Jer. iii. 5, Isa. lvii. 16). The procedure of His righteousness is regulated not according to our sins, but according to His purpose of mercy. The perfects in ver. 10 state that which God has constantly not done, and the futures in ver. 9 what He continually will not do.

Vers. 11-14. The ingenious figures in vers. 11 sq. (cf. xxxvi. 6, lvii. 11) illustrate the infinite power and complete unreservedness of mercy (loving-kindness). הַרְחִיק has Gaja (as have also הִשְׁחִיתוּ and הִתְעִיבוּ, xiv. 1, liii. 2, in exact texts), in order to render possible the distinct pronunciation of the guttural in the combination רה. Ver. 13 sounds just as much like the spirit of the New Testament as vers. 11, 12. The relationship to Jahve in which those stand who fear Him is a filial relationship based upon free reciprocity (Mal. iii. 11). His Fatherly compassion is (ver. 14) based upon the frailty and perishableness of man, which are known to God, much the same as God's promise after the Flood not to decree a like judgment again (Gen. viii. 21). According to this passage and Deut. xxxi. 21, יִצְרָתִי appears to be intended of the moral nature ; but according to ver. 14*b*, one is obliged to think rather of the natural form which man possesses from God the Creator (וַיִּצְרָה, Gen. ii. 7) than of the form of heart which he has by his own choice and, so far as its groundwork is concerned, by inheritance (li. 7). In זָכִיר, mindful, the passive, according to Böttcher's correct apprehension of it, expresses a passive state after an action that is completed by the person himself, as in יָרַע, בָּטַח, and the like. In its form ver. 14*a* reminds one of the Book of Job ch. xi. 11, xxviii. 23, and ver. 14*b* as to subject-matter recalls Job vii. 7, and other passages (cf. Ps. lxxviii. 39, lxxxix. 48) ; but the following figurative representation of human frailty, with which the poet contrasts the eternal nature of the divine mercy as the sure stay of all God-fearing ones in the midst of the rise and decay of things here below, still more strongly recalls that book.

Vers. 15-18. The figure of the grass recalls xc. 5 sq., cf. Isa. xl. 6-8, li. 12 ; that of the flower, Job xiv. 2. אִנּוּשׁ is man as a mortal being ; his life's duration is likened to that of a blade of grass, and his beauty and glory to a flower of the field, whose fullest bloom is also the beginning of its fading. In ver. 16 בּוֹ (the same as in Isa. xl. 7 sq.) refers to man, who is compared to grass and flowers. פִּי is éav with a hypothetical perfect ; and the wind that scorches up the plants, referred to man, is an emblem of every form of peril that threatens life : often enough it is really a breath of wind which snaps off a man's life. The bold designation of vanishing away without leaving any trace, "and his place knoweth him no more," is taken from Job vii. 10, cf. ibid. viii. 18, xx. 9. In the midst of this plant-like, frail destiny, there is, however, one strong ground of comfort. There is an everlasting power, which raises all those who link themselves with it above the transitoriness involved in nature's laws, and makes them eternal like itself. This power is the mercy of God, which spans itself above (עַל) all those who fear Him like an eternal heaven. This is God's righteousness, which rewards faithful adherence to His covenant and conscientious fulfilment of His precepts in accordance with the order of redemption, and shows itself even to (בְּ) children's children, according to Ex. xx. 6, xxxiv. 7, Deut. vii. 9 : on into a thousand generations, i.e. into infinity.

Vers. 19-22. He is able to show Himself thus gracious to His own, for He is the supra-mundane, all-ruling King. With this thought the poet draws on to the close of his song of praise. The heavens in opposition to the earth, as in cv. 7, Eccles. v. 1 [2], is the unchangeable realm above the rise and fall of things here below. On ver. 19*b* cf. 1 Chron. xxix. 12. בְּכֹל refers to everything created without exception, the universe of created things. In connection with the heavens of glory the poet cannot but call to mind the angels. His call to these to join in the praise of Jahve has its parallel only in Ps. xxix. and cxlviii. It arises from the consciousness of the church on earth that it stands in living like-minded fellowship with the angels of God, and that it possesses a dignity which rises above all created things, even the angels which are appointed to serve it (xci. 11). They are called גְּבִרִים as in Joel iv. [iii.] 11, and in fact גְּבִירֵי כֹחַ, as the strong to whom belongs strength unequalled. Their life endowed with heroic strength is spent entirely—an example for mortals—in an obedient execution of the word of God. לְשִׁמְעָה is a definition not of the purpose, but of the manner: obediendo (as in Gen. ii. 3 perficiendo). Hearing the call of His word, they also forthwith put it into execution. The hosts (צְבָאוֹת), as קִשְׁרֹתָיו shows, are the celestial spirits gathered around the angels of a higher rank (cf. Luke ii. 13), the innumerable λειτουργικὰ πνεύματα (civ. 4, Dan. vii. 10, Heb. i. 14), for there is a hierarchia cælestis. From the archangels the poet comes to the myriads of the heavenly hosts, and from these to all creatures, that they, wheresoever they may be throughout Jahve's wide domain, may join in the song of praise that is to be struck up; and from this point he comes back to his own soul, which he modestly includes among the creatures mentioned in the third passage. A threefold גְּבִירֵי כֹחַ now corresponds to the threefold גְּבִירֵי כֹחַ; and inasmuch as the poet thus comes back to his own soul, his Psalm also turns back into itself and assumes the form of a converging circle.

PSALM CIV.

HYMN IN HONOUR OF THE GOD OF THE SEVEN DAYS.

- 1 BLESS, O my soul, Jahve !
Jahve, my God, Thou art very great,
In splendour and glory hast Thou clothed Thyself ;
- 2 Enwrapping Thyself in light as a garment,
Spreading out the heavens like a tent-cloth,
- 3 Who layeth the beams of His chambers in the waters,
Who maketh the clouds His chariot,
Who walketh upon the wings of the wind,
- 4 Making His messengers out of the winds,
His servants out of flaming fire.

- 5 He hath founded the earth upon its pillars,
That it may not totter for ever and ever.
- 6 The deep as a garment didst Thou cover over it,
Upon the mountains stood the waters.
- 7 At Thy rebuke they fled,
At the voice of Thy thunder they hasted away—
- 8 The mountains rose, the valleys sank—
To the place which Thou hast founded for them.
- 9 A bound hast Thou set, they may not pass over,
They may not turn back to cover the earth.

- 10 Who sendeth forth springs in the bottoms of the valleys,
Between the mountains they take their course.
- 11 They give drink to all the beasts of the field,
The wild asses quench their thirst.
- 12 Upon them the birds of the heaven have their habitation,
From among the branches they raise their voice.
- 13 He watereth the mountains out of His chambers—
With the fruit of Thy works is the earth satisfied.
- 14 He causeth grass to grow for the cattle,
And herb for the service of man—

- To bring forth bread out of the earth,
15 And that wine may make glad the heart of mortal man,
To make his face shining from oil,
And that bread may support the heart of mortal man.
16 The trees of Jahve are satisfied,
The cedars of Lebanon, which He hath planted ;
17 Where the birds make their nests,
The stork which hath its house upon the cypresses.
18 Mountains, the high ones, are for the wild goats,
The rocks are a refuge for the rock-badgers.
- 19 He hath made the moon for a measuring of the times,
The sun knoweth its going down.
20 Thou makest darkness, and it is night,
Wherein all the beasts of the forest do move.
21 The young lions roar after their prey,
And seek from God their food.
22 The sun ariseth, they retreat
And lay themselves down in their dens.
23 Man goeth forth to his work,
And to his labour, until the evening.
- 24 How manifold are Thy works, Jahve,
With wisdom hast Thou executed them altogether,
The earth is full of Thy creatures !
25 Yonder sea, great and far extended—
There it teems with life, innumerable,
Small beasts together with great.
26 There the ships move along,
The leviathan which Thou hast formed to sport therein.
27 They all wait upon Thee,
That Thou mayest give them their food in its season.
28 Thou givest it to them, they gather it up ;
Thou openest Thy hand, they are satisfied with good.
29 Thou hidest Thy face, they are troubled ;
Thou takest back their breath, they expire,
And return to their dust.
30 Thou sendest forth Thy breath, they are created,
And Thou renewest the face of the ground.

- 31 Let the glory of Jahve endure for ever,
 Let Jahve rejoice in His works ;
- 32 He, who looketh on the earth and it trembleth,
 He toucheth the mountains and they smoke.
- 33 I will sing unto Jahve as long as I live,
 I will harp unto my God as long as I have my being.
- 34 May my meditation be acceptable to Him,
 I, even I will rejoice in Jahve.
- 35 Let the sinful disappear from the earth,
 And evil-doers be no more—
 Bless, O my soul, Jahve,
 Hallelujah.

With Bless, O my soul, Jahve, as Ps. ciii., begins this anonymous Ps. civ. also, in which God's rule in the kingdom of nature, as there in the kingdom of grace, is the theme of praise, and as there the angels are associated with it. The poet sings the God-ordained present condition of the world with respect to the creative beginnings recorded in Gen. i. 1-ii. 3 ; and closes with the wish that evil may be expelled from this good creation, which so thoroughly and fully reveals God's power, and wisdom, and goodness. It is a Psalm of nature, but such as no poet among the Gentiles could have written. The Israelitish poet stands free and unfettered in the presence of nature as his object, and all things appear to him as brought forth and sustained by the creative might of the one God, brought into being and preserved in existence on purpose that He, the self-sufficient One, may impart Himself in free condescending love—as the creatures and orders of the Holy One, in themselves good and pure, but spotted and disorganized only by the self-corruption of man in sin and wickedness, which self-corruption must be turned out in order that the joy of God in His works and the joy of these works in their Creator may be perfected. The Psalm is altogether an echo of the heptahemeron (or history of the seven days of creation) in Gen. i. 1-ii. 3. Corresponding to the seven days it falls into seven groups, in which the הנה-טוב מאד of Gen. i. 31 is expanded. It is not, however, so worked out that each single group celebrates the work of a day of creation ; the Psalm has the commingling whole of the finished creation as its standpoint, and is therefore not so conformed to any plan. Nevertheless it begins with the light and closes with an allusion to the divine Sabbath. When it is considered that ver. 8a is only with violence accommodated to the context, that ver. 18 is forced in without any connection and contrary to any plan, and that ver. 32 can only be made intelligible in that position by means of an artificial combination of the thoughts, then the supposition of Hitzig, ingeniously wrought out by him in his own way, is forced upon one, viz. that this glorious hymn has decoyed some later poet-hand into enlarging upon it.

Vers. 1-4. The first decastich begins the celebration with work of the first and second days. הוֹר וְהָרַר here is not the doxa belonging to God πρὸ παντὸς τοῦ αἰῶνος (Jude, ver. 25), but the doxa which He has put on (Job xl. 10) since He created the world, over against which He stands in kingly glory, or rather in which He is immanent, and which reflects this kingly glory in various gradations, yea, to a certain extent is this glory itself. For inasmuch as God began the work of creation with the creation of light, He has covered Himself with this created light itself as with a garment. That which once happened in connection with the creation may, as in Amos iv. 13, Isa. xlv. 24, xlv. 7, Jer. x. 12, and frequently, be expressed by participles of the present, because the original setting is continued in the preservation of the world; and determinate participles alternate with participles without the article, as in Isa. xlv. 24-28, with no other difference than that the former are more predicative and the latter more attributive. With ver. 2b the poet comes upon the work of the second day: the creation of the expanse (רָקִיעַ) which divides between the waters. God has spread this out (cf. Isa. xl. 22) like a tent-cloth (Isa. liv. 2), of such light and of such fine transparent work; נוֹטָה here rhymes with עָטָה. In those waters which the "expanse" holds aloft over the earth God lays the beams of His upper chambers (עֲלִיּוֹתָיו), instead of which we find כְּעֲלֹתָיו in Amos ix. 6, from עָלָה, ascent, elevation, then an upper story, an upper chamber, which would be more accurately עֲלִיָּה after the Aramaic and Arabic; but not as though the waters were the material for them, they are only the place for them, that is exalted above the earth, and are able to be this because to the Immaterial One even that which is fluid is solid, and that which is dense is transparent. The reservoirs of the upper waters, the clouds, God makes, as the lightning, thunder, and rain indicate, into His chariot (רכיב), upon which He rides along in order to make His power felt below upon the earth judicially (Isa. xix. 1), or in rescuing and blessing men. רכיב (only here) accords in sound with פְּרִיב, xviii. 11. For ver. 3c also recalls this primary passage, where the wings of the wind take the place of the cloud-chariot. In ver. 4 the LXX. (Heb. i. 7) makes the first substantive into an accusative of the object, and the second into an accusative of the predicate: Ὁ ποιῶν τοὺς ἀγγέλους αὐτοῦ πνεύματα καὶ τοὺς λειτουργοὺς αὐτοῦ πυρὸς φλόγα. It is usually translated the reverse way: making the winds into His angels, etc. This rendering is possible so far as the language is concerned (cf. c. 3 Chethûb, and on the position of the words, Amos iv. 13 with v. 8), and the plural מְשִׁרְתָּי is explicable in connection with this rendering from the force of the parallelism, and the singular שֵׁשׁ from the fact that this word has no plural. Since, however, הַשֵּׁשׁ with two accusatives usually signifies to produce something out of something, so that the second accusative (viz. the accusative of the predicate, which is logically the second, but according to the position of the words may just as well be the first, Ex. xxv. 39, xxx. 25, as the second, Ex. xxxvii. 23, xxxviii. 3, Gen. ii. 7, 2 Chron. iv. 18-22) denotes the materia ex qua, it may with equal right at least be interpreted: Who makes His messengers out of the winds, His servants out of flaming or consuming (vid. on lvii. 5) fire (שֵׁשׁ, as in Jer. xlvi. 45, masc.). And this may affirm either that God makes use of wind and fire for special missions (cf. cxlviii. 8), or (cf. Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, i. 325 f.) that He gives wind and fire to His angels for the purpose of His operations in the world which are effected through their agency, as the materials of their outward manifestation, and as it were of their self-embodiment,* as then in xviii. 11 wind and cherub are both to be associated together in thought as the vehicle of the divine activity in the world, and in xxxv. 5 the angel of Jahve represents the energy of the wind.

* It is a Talmudic view that God really makes the angels out of fire, B. Chagiga, 14a (cf. Koran, xxxviii. 77): Day by day are the angels of the service created out of the stream of fire (נְהַר דִּינִיר), and sing their song of praise and perish.

Vers. 5-9. In a second decastich the poet speaks of the restraining of the lower waters and the establishing of the land standing out of the water. The suffix, referring back to ארץ, is intended to say that the earth hanging free in space (Job xxvi. 7) has its internal supports. Its eternal stability is preserved even amidst the judgment predicted in Isa. xxiv. 16 sq., since it comes forth out of it, unremoved from its former station, as a transformed, glorified earth. The deep (תְּהוֹם) with which God covers it is that primordial mass of water in which it lay first of all as it were in embryo, for it came into being ἐξ ὕδατος καὶ δι' ὕδατος (2 Pet. iii. 5). כְּפִיתוֹ does not refer to תְּהוֹם (masc. as in Job xxviii. 14), because then עָלֶיהָ would be required, but to ארץ, and the masculine is to be explained either by attraction (according to the model of 1 Sam. ii. 4a), or by a reversion to the masculine ground-form as the discourse proceeds (cf. the same thing with עִיר 2 Sam. xvii. 13, צִעֲקָה Ex. xi. 6, יָר Ezek. ii. 9). According to ver. 6b, the earth thus overflowed with water was already mountainous; the primal formation of the mountains is therefore just as old as the תְּהוֹם mentioned in direct succession to the וּבְהוֹ. After this, vers. 7-9 describe the subduing of the primordial waters by raising up the dry land and the confining of these waters in basins surrounded by banks. Terrified by the despotic command of God, they started asunder, and mountains rose aloft, the dry land with its heights and its low grounds appeared. The rendering that the waters, thrown into wild excitement, rose up the mountains and descended again (Hengstenberg), does not harmonize with the fact that they are represented in ver. 6 as standing above the mountains. Accordingly, too, it is not to be interpreted after cvii. 26: they (the waters) rose mountain-high, they sunk down like valleys. The reference of the description to the coming forth of the dry land on the third day of creation requires that הַרִים should be taken as subject to יַעֲלֶה. But then, too, the בְּקַעֲוֹת are the subject to יִרְדּוּ, as Hilary of Poitiers renders it in his Genesis, v. 97, etc.: subsidunt valles, and not the waters as subsiding into the valleys. Hupfeld is correct; ver. 8a is a parenthesis which affirms that, inasmuch as the waters retreating laid the solid land bare, mountains and valleys as such came forth visibly ; cf. Ovid, Metam. i. 344 :

Ver. 8 continues with the words אֶל-מְקוֹם (cf. Gen. i. 9, אֶל-מְקוֹם אֲרָר) : the waters retreat to the place which (וְהָ, cf. ver. 26, for אֲרָר, Gen. xxxix. 20) God has assigned to them as that which should contain them. He hath set a bound (גְּבוּל, synon. הֶקֶץ, Prov. viii. 29, Jer. v. 22) for them beyond which they may not flow forth again to cover the earth, as the primordial waters of chaos have done.

Vers. 10-14*b*. The third decastich, passing on to the third day of creation, sings the benefit which the shore-surrounded waters are to the animal creation and the growth of the plants out of the earth, which is irrigated from below and moistened from above. God, the blessed One, being the principal subject of the Psalm, the poet (in ver. 10 and further on) is able to go on in attributive and predicative participles : Who sendeth springs בְּנַחֲלִים, into the wadîs (not : בְּנַחֲלִים, as brooks). נַחַל, as ver. 10*b* shows, is here a synonym of בְּקָעָה, and there is no need for saying that, flowing on in the plains, they grow into rivers. The LXX. has ἐν φάραγγιν. הִיְהוּ שְׂרִי is doubly poetic for הִיְהוּ הַשְּׂרָה. God has also provided for all the beasts that roam far from men ; and the wild ass, swift as an arrow, difficult to be hunted, and living in troops (פָּרָא, Arabic ferâ, root פָּר, fer, to move quickly, to whiz, to flee ; the wild ass, the onager, Arabic himâr el-wahs, whose home is on the steppes), is made prominent by way of example. The phrase "to break the thirst" occurs only here. עֲלֵיהֶם, ver. 12*a*, refers to the מַעְיִינִים, which are also still the subject in ver. 11*a*. The pointing עֲפָאִים needlessly creates a hybrid form in addition to עֲפָאִים (like לִבָּאִים) and עֲפָיִים. From the tangled branches by the springs the poet insensibly reaches the second half of the third day. The vegetable kingdom at the same time reminds him of the rain which, descending out of the upper chambers of the heavens, waters the waterless mountain-tops. Like the Talmud (B. Ta'anith, 10*a*), by the "fruit of Thy work" (מַעֲשֵׂיךָ as singular) Hitzig understands the rain ; but rain is rather that which fertilizes ; and why might not the fruit be meant which God's works (מַעֲשֵׂיךָ, plural) here below (ver. 24), viz. the vegetable creations, bear, and from which the earth, i.e. its population, is satisfied, inasmuch as vegetable food springs up as much for the beasts as for man? In connection with עֵשֶׂב the poet is thinking of cultivated plants, more especially wheat; לְעֵבְרָה, however, does not signify: for cultivation by man, since, according to Hitzig's correct remonstrance, they do not say עֵבֶר הָעֵשֶׂב, and לְהוֹצִיא has not man, but rather God, as its subject, but as in 1 Chron. xxvi. 30, for the service (use) of man.

Vers. 14c-18. In the fourth decastich the poet goes further among the creatures of the field and of the forest. The subject to לְהוֹצִיא is מַצְמִיחַ. The clause expressing the purpose, which twice begins with an infinitive, is continued in both instances, as in Isa. xiii. 9, but with a change of subject (cf. e.g. Amos i. 11, ii. 4), in the finite verb. On what is said of wine we may compare Eccles. x. 19, Sir. xl. 20, and more especially Isaiah, who frequently mentions wine as a representative of all the natural sources of joy. The assertion that מִשְׁמֵן signifies "before oil = brighter than oil," is an error that is rightly combated by Böttcher in his Proben and two of his "Gleanings,"* which imputes to the poet a mention of oil that is contrary to his purpose in this connection and inappropriate. Corn, wine, and oil are mentioned as the three chief products of the vegetable kingdom (Luther, Calvin, Grotius, Dathe, and Hupfeld), and are assumed under עֵשֶׂב in ver. 14b, as is also the case in other instances where distinction would be superfluous, e.g. in Ex. ix. 22. With oil God makes the countenance shining, or bright and cheerful, not by means of anointing,—since it was not the face but the head that was anointed (Matt. vi. 17),—but by the fact of its increasing the savouriness and nutritiveness of the food. לְהַצְהִיל is chosen with reference to יִצְהָר. In ver. 15c לִבְב־אֲנוּשׁ does not stand after, as in ver. 15a (where it is לִבְב־ with Gaja on account of the distinctive), but before the verb, because לִבְב as that which is inward stands in antithesis to פָּנִים as that which is outside. Since the fertilization of the earth by the rain is the chief subject of the predication in vers. 13-15, ver. 16 is naturally attached to what precedes without arousing critical suspicion. That which satisfies is here the rain itself, and not, as in ver. 13*b*, that which the rain matures. The "trees of Jahve" are those which before all others proclaim the greatness of their Creator. אֲשֶׁר-עֲשָׂה refers to these trees, of which the cedars and then the cypresses (בְּרוֹשִׁים, root בר, to cut) are mentioned. They are places where small and large birds build their nests and lodge, more particularly the stork, which is called the חֲסִידָה as being πτηνῶν εὐσεβέστατον ζῶων (Babrius, Fab. xiii.), as avis pia (pietaticultrix in Petronius, lv. 6), i.e. on account of its love of family life, on account of which it is also regarded as bringing good fortune to a house.* The care of God for the lodging of His creatures leads the poet from the trees to the heights of the mountains and the hiding-places of the rocks, in a manner that is certainly abrupt and that disturbs the sketch taken from the account of the creation. יַעַל is an apposition. יַעַל (Arabic wa'il) is the steinboc, wild-goat, as being an inhabitant of יַעַל (wa'l, wa'la), i.e. the high places of the rocks, as יַעַל, Lam. iv. 3, according to Wetzstein, is the ostrich as being an inhabitant of the wa'na, i.e. the sterile desert; and שֶׁפָּן is the rock-badger, which dwells in the clefts of the rocks (Prov. xxx. 26), and resembles the marmot—South Arabic تَفْنَن, Hyrax Syriacus (distinct from the African). By שֶׁפָּן the Jewish tradition understands the coney, after which the Peshito here renders it לְחִנְיָם (חִנְיָם, cuniculus). Both animals, the coney and the rock-badger, may be meant in Lev. xi. 5, Deut. xiv. 7; for the sign of the cloven hoof (פְּרָסָה שְׁסוּנָעָה) is wanting in both. The coney has four toes, and the hyrax has a peculiar formation of hoof, not cloven, but divided into several parts.

Vers. 19-23. The fifth decastich, in which the poet passes over from the third to the fourth day, shows that he has the order of the days of creation before his mind. The moon is mentioned first of all, because the poet wishes to make the picture of the day follow that of the night. He describes it in ver. 19 as the calendrical principal star.  $\text{מִנּוֹעֵי יָמִים}$  are points and divisions of time (epochs), and the principal measurer of these for civil and ecclesiastical life is the moon (cf. Sir. xliii. 7, ἀπὸ σελήνης σημεῖον ἑορτῆς), just as the sun, knowing when he is to set, is the infallible measurer of the day. In ver. 20 the description, which throughout is drawn in the presence of God in His honour, passes over into direct address: jussives ( $\text{וַיְהִי, וַיִּשְׁתָּר}$ ) stand in the hypothetical protasis and in its apodosis (Ew. § 357, b). It depends upon God's willing only, and it is night, and the wakeful life of the wild beasts begins to be astir. The young lions then roar after their prey, and flagitaturi sunt a Deo cibum suum. The infinitive with Lamed is an elliptical expression of a conjugatio periphrastica (vid. on Hab. i. 17), and becomes a varying expression of the future in general in the later language in approximation to the Aramaic. The roar of the lions and their going forth in quest of prey is an asking of God which He Himself has implanted in their nature. With the rising of the sun the aspect of things becomes very different.  $\text{שָׁמַשׁ}$  is feminine here, where the poet drops the personification (cf. Ps. xix.). The day which dawns with sunrise is the time for man. Both as to matter and style, vers. 21-23 call to mind Job xxiv. 5, xxxvii. 8, xxxviii. 40.

Vers. 24-30. Fixing his eye upon the sea with its small and great creatures, and the care of God for all self-living beings, the poet passes over to the fifth and sixth days of creation. The rich contents of this sixth group flow over and exceed the decastich. With  $\text{מַה־רַּבּוֹ מְהַגְדִּילוֹ}$  (not  $\text{מַה־גְּדִילוֹ}$ , xcii. 6) the poet expresses his wonder at the great number of God's works, each one at the same time having its adjustment in accordance with its design, and all, mutually serving one another, cooperating one with another.  $\text{קָנִין}$ , which signifies both bringing forth and acquiring, has the former meaning here according to the predicate: full of creatures, which bear in themselves the traces of the Name of their Creator ( $\text{קָנִיה}$ ). Beside  $\text{קָנִינִיךָ}$ , however, we also find the reading  $\text{קָנִינֶיךָ}$ , which is adopted by Norzi, Heidenheim, and Baer, represented by the versions (LXX., Vulgate, and Jerome), by expositors (Rashi:  $\text{קָנִין שְׁלֶיךָ}$ ), by the majority of the MSS. (according to Norzi) and old printed copies, which would signify τῆς κτίσεώς σου, or according to the Latin versions κτήσεώς σου (possessione tua, Luther "thy possessions"), but is inferior to the plural κτισμάτων σου, as an accusative of the object to הַיָּם. The sea more particularly is a world of moving creatures innumerable (lxix. 35). הַיָּם הַהוּא does not properly signify this sea, but that sea, yonder sea (cf. lxxviii. 9, Isa. xxiii. 13, Josh. ix. 13). The attributes follow in an appositional relation, the looseness of which admits of the non-determination (cf. lxxviii. 28, Jer. ii. 21, Gen. xliii. 14, and the reverse case above in ver. 18a). הַיָּם in relation to הַיָּם is a nomen unitatis (the single ship). It is an old word, which is also Egyptian in the form hani and ana.\* Leviathan, in the Book of Job, the crocodile, is in this passage the name of the whale (vid. Lewysohn, Zoologie des Talmuds, §§ 178-180, 505). Ewald and Hitzig, with the Jewish tradition, understand הוּא in ver. 26 according to Job xl. 29 [xli. 5]: in order to play with him, which, however, gives no idea that is worthy of God. It may be taken as an alternative word for הוּא (cf. הוּא in ver. 20, Job xl. 20): to play therein, viz. in the sea (Saadia). In הַיָּם, ver. 27, the range of vision is widened from the creatures of the sea to all the living things of the earth; cf. the borrowed passages cxlv. 15 sq., cxlvii. 9. הַיָּם, by an obliteration of the suffix, signifies directly "altogether," and הַיָּם (cf. Job xxxviii. 32): when it is time for it. With reference to the change of the subject in the principal and in the infinitival clause, vid. Ew. § 338, a. The existence, passing away; and origin of all beings is conditioned by God. His hand provides everything; the turning of His countenance towards them upholds everything; and His breath, the creative breath, animates and renews all things. The spirit of life of every creature is the disposing of the divine Spirit, which hovered over the primordial waters and transformed the chaos into the cosmos. הַיָּם in ver. 29 is equivalent to הַיָּם, as in 1 Sam. xv. 6, and frequently. The full future forms accented on the ultima, from ver. 27 onwards, give emphasis to the statements. Job xxxiv. 14 sq. may be compared with ver. 29.

Vers. 31-35. The poet has now come to an end with the review of the wonders of the creation, and closes in this seventh group, which is again substantially decastichic, with a sabbatic meditation, inasmuch as he wishes that the glory of God, which He has put upon His creatures, and which is reflected and echoed back by them to Him, may continue for ever, and that His works may ever be so constituted that He who was satisfied at the completion of His six days' work may be able to rejoice in them. For if they cease to give Him pleasure, He can indeed blot them out as He did at the time of the Flood, since He is always able by a look to put the earth in a tremble, and by a touch to set the mountains on fire (וַתִּרְעַר) of the result of the looking, as in Amos v. 8, ix. 6, and וַיַּעֲשֵׂנוּ of that which takes place simultaneously with the touching, as in cxliv. 5, Zech. ix. 5, cf. on Hab. iii. 10). The poet, however, on his part, will not suffer there to be any lack of the glorifying of Jahve, inasmuch as he makes it his life's work to praise his God with music and song (בְּחַיִּי as in lxiii. 5, cf. Bar. iv. 20, ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις μου). Oh that this his quiet and his audible meditation upon the honour of God may be pleasing to Him (עָרַב עִלְּיָם synonymous with טוֹב עִלְּיָם, but also נִשְׂפָּר עִלְּיָם, xvi. 6)! Oh that Jahve may be able to rejoice in him, as he himself will rejoice in his God! Between "I will rejoice," ver. 34, and "He shall rejoice," ver. 31, there exists a reciprocal relation, as between the Sabbath of the creature in God and the Sabbath of God in the creature. When the Psalmist wishes that God may have joy in His works of creation, and seeks on his part to please God and to have his joy in God, he is also warranted in wishing that those who take pleasure in wickedness, and instead of giving God joy excite His wrath, may be removed from the earth (יִתְמוּ, cf. Num. xiv. 35); for they are contrary to the purpose of the good creation of God, they imperil its continuance, and mar the joy of His creatures. The expression is not: may sins (מִטְּאִיִּים, as it is meant to be read in B. Berachoth, 10a, and as some editions, e.g. Bomberg's of 1521, actually have it), but: may sinners, be no more, for there is no other existence of sin than the personal one.

With the words Bless, O my soul, Jahve, the Psalm recurs to its introduction, and to this call upon himself is appended the Hallelujah which summons all creatures to the praise of God—a call of devotion which occurs nowhere out of the Psalter, and within the Psalter is found here for the first time, and consequently was only coined in the later age. In modern printed copies it is sometimes written הַלְלוּ־יְהוָה, sometimes הַלְלוּ יְהוָה, but in the earlier copies (e.g. Venice 1521, Wittenberg 1566) mostly as one word הַלְלוֹיָהּ.* In the majority of MSS. it is also found thus as one word,† and that always with ה, except the first הַלְלוֹיָהּ which occurs here at the end of Ps. civ., which has ה raphe in good MSS. and old printed copies. This mode of writing is that attested by the Masora (vid. Baer's Psalterium, p. 132). The Talmud and Midrash observe this first Hallelujah is connected in a significant manner with the prospect of the final overthrow of the wicked. Ben-Pazzi (B. Berachoth 10a) counts 103 פְּרָשִׁיּוֹת up to this Hallelujah, reckoning Ps. i. and ii. as one פְּרָשָׁה.

* More accurately הַלְלוֹיָהּ with Chateph, as Jekuthiël ha-Nakdan expressly demands. Moreover the mode of writing it as one word is the rule, since the Masora notes the הַלְלוֹיָהּ, occurring only once, in cxxxv. 3, with לִית בְּמַעַם as being the only instance of the kind.

† Yet even in the Talmud (J. Megilla i. 9, Sofrim v. 10) it is a matter of controversy concerning the mode of writing this word, whether it is to be separate or combined; and in B. Pesachim 117a Rab appeals to a Psalter of the school of Chabibi (תִּילִי רַבִּי חַבִּיבִי) that he has seen, in which הַלְלוּ stood in one line and יְהוָה in the other. In the same place Rab Chasda appeals to a תִּילִי רַבִּי רַב הַנִּין that he has seen, in which the Hallelujah standing between two Psalms, which might be regarded as the close of the Psalm preceding it or as the beginning of the Psalm following it, was written in the middle between the two (בְּאִמְצַע פְּרָקִיא). In the הַלְלוֹיָהּ written as one word, יְהוָה is not regarded as strictly the divine name, only as an addition strengthening the notion of the הַלְלוּ, as in בְּמַרְחֵבֶיהָ cxviii. 5; with reference to this, vide Geiger, Urschrift, S. 275.

PSALM CV.

THANKSGIVING HYMN IN HONOUR OF GOD WHO IS ATTESTED IN THE EARLIEST HISTORY OF ISRAEL.

- 1 GIVE thanks unto Jahve, publish His Name,
 Make known among the peoples His deeds.
- 2 Sing unto Him, harp unto Him,
 Speak of all His wondrous works.
- 3 Glory ye in His holy Name,
 Let the heart of those rejoice who seek Jahve.
- 4 Follow after Jahve and His strength,
 Seek ye His face evermore.
- 5 Remember His wondrous works which He hath done,
 His rare deeds and the decisions of His mouth,
- 6 O seed of Abraham His servant,
 Ye sons of Jacob, His chosen ones.

- 7 He, Jahve, is our God,
 His judgments go forth over all lands.
- 8 He remembereth for ever His covenant,
 The word which He hath established to a thousand generations,
- 9 Which He made with Abraham,
 And His oath unto Isaac.
- 10 And He hath established it for Jacob as a statute,
 For Israel as an everlasting covenant,
- 11 Saying: "Unto thee do I give the land of Canaan
 As the line of your inheritance."

- 12 When they were a countable people,
 Very small, and sojourning therein,
- 13 And went to and fro from nation to nation,
 From one kingdom to another people:
- 14 He suffered no man to oppress them,
 And He reprov'd kings for their sakes:
- 15 "Touch not Mine anointed ones,
 And to My prophets do no harm!"

- 16 Then He called up a famine over the land,
Every staff of bread He brake.
17 He sent before them a man,
As a slave was Joseph sold.
18 They hurt his feet with fetters,
Iron came upon his soul,
19 Until the time that his word came,
The word of Jahve had proved him.
20 The king sent and loosed him,
The ruler of the peoples, and let him go free ;
21 He made him lord of his house,
And ruler over all his possession,
22 To bind his princes at his will,
And to make his elders wiser.
23 Thus Israel came to Egypt,
And Jacob sojourned in the land of Ham.
24 And He made His people fruitful exceedingly,
And made them more powerful than their enemies.

- 25 He turned their heart to hate His people,
To practise cunning on His servants ;
26 He sent Moses His servant,
Aaron, whom He had chosen.
27 They performed upon them facts of His signs,
And strange things in the land of Ham.
28 He sent darkness and made it dark,
And they rebelled not against His words ;
29 He turned their waters into blood,
And thus killed their fish.
30 Their land swarmed forth frogs
In the chambers of their kings.
31 He spake, and the gad-fly came,
Gnats in all their border.
32 He gave them as rain hail,
Flaming fire in their land,
33 And He smote down their vines and fig-trees,
And brake the trees of their border.
34 He spake, and the locusts came,
And the grasshopper without number,

- 35 And devoured all the green herb in their land,
 And devoured the fruit of their ground.
- 36 Then He smote all the first-born in their land,
 The firstlings of all their strength,
- 37 And led them forth with silver and gold,
 And there was no stumbling one among His tribes.
- 38 Egypt rejoiced at their departure,
 For dread of them had fallen upon them.
- 39 He spread a cloud for a covering,
 And fire to lighten the night ;
- 40 They desired, and He brought quails,
 And satisfied them with the bread of heaven ;
- 41 He opened a rock, and waters gushed out,
 They flowed through the steppes as a river.
- 42 For He remembered His holy word,
 Abraham His servant ;
- 43 And He led forth His people with gladness,
 And with exulting His chosen ones ;
- 44 And He gave them the lands of the heathen,
 And that gained by the labour of the nations they inherited ;
- 45 That they might observe His laws
 And keep His instructions.
 Hallelujah !

We have here another Psalm closing with Hallelujah, which opens the series of the Hodu-Psalms. Such is the name we give only to Psalms which begin with הודו (cv., cvii., cxviii., cxxxvi.), just as we call those which begin with הללויה (cvi., cxi.—cxiii., cxvii., cxxxv., cxlvi.—cl.) Hallelujah-Psalms (alleluia-tici.) The expression לְהַלֵּל וּלְהוֹדוֹת, which frequently occurs in the books of Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah, points to these two kinds of Psalms, or at least to their key-notes.

The festival song which David, according to 1 Chron. xvi. 7, handed over to Asaph and his brethren for musical execution at the setting down of the Ark and the opening of divine service on Zion, is, so far as its first part is concerned (1 Chron. xvi. 8–22), taken from our Psalm (vers. 1–15), which is then followed by Ps. xvi. as a second part, and is closed with Ps.

cvi. 1, 47, 48. Hitzig regards the festival song in the chronicler as the original, and the respective parallels in the Psalms as "layers or shoots." "The chronicler," says he, "there produces with labour, and therefore himself seeking foreign aid, a song for a past that is dead." But the transition from ver. 22 to ver. 23 and from ver. 33 to ver. 34, so devoid of connection, the taking over of the verse out of Ps. cvi. referring to the Babylonian exile into ver. 35, and even of the doxology of the Fourth Book, regarded as an integral part of the Psalm, into ver. 36, refute that perversion of the right relation, which has been attempted in the interest of the Maccabæan Psalms. That festival song in the chronicler, as has been shown again very recently by Riehm and Köhler, is a compilation of parts of songs already at hand, arranged for a definite purpose. Starting on the assumption that the Psalms as a whole are Davidic (just as all the Proverbs are Salomonic), because David called the poetry of the Psalms used in religious worship into existence, the attempt is made in that festival song to represent the opening of the worship on Zion at that time in strains belonging to the Davidic Psalms.

So far as the subject-matter is concerned, Ps. cv. attaches itself to the Asaph Psalm lxxviii., which recapitulates the history of Israel. The recapitulation here, however, is made not with any didactic purpose, but with the purpose of forming a hymn, and does not come down beyond the time of Moses and Joshua. Its source is likewise the Tôra as it now lies before us. The poet epitomizes what the Tôra narrates, and clothes it in a poetic garb.

Vers. 1-6. Invitation to the praise—praise that resounds far and wide among the peoples—of the God who has become manifest wondrously in the deeds and words connected with the history of the founding of Israel. הוֹדָה לַיהוָה, as in xxxiii. 2, lxxv. 2, of a praising and thankful confession offered to God; קרא בְּשֵׁם ה', to call with the name of Jahve, i.e. to call upon it, of an audible, solemn attestation of God in prayer and in discourse (Symmachus, κηρύσσετε). The joy of heart* that is desired is the condition of a joyous opening of the mouth and Israel's own stedfast turning towards Jahve, the condition of all salutary result; for it is only His "strength" that breaks through all dangers, and His "face" that lightens up all darkness. מִשְׁפָּטֵי־פִיו, as ver. 7 teaches, are God's judicial utterances, which have been executed without any hindrance, more particularly in the case of the Egyptians, their Pharaoh, and their gods. The chronicler has פִּיהוּ and יִשְׂרָאֵל, which is so far unsuitable as one does not know whether עֲבָדוֹ is to be referred to "Israel" the patriarch, or to the "seed of Israel," the nation; the latter reference would be deutero-Isaianic. In both texts the LXX. reads עֲבָדָיו (ye His servants).

Vers. 7-11. The poet now begins himself to do that to which he encourages Israel. Jahve is Israel's God: His righteous rule extends over the whole earth, whilst His people experience His inviolable faithfulness to His covenant. יהוה in ver. 7a is in apposition to הוּא, for the God who bears this name is as a matter of course the object of the song of praise. זָכַר is the perfect of practically pledged certainty (cf. cxi. 5, where we find instead the future of confident prospect). The chronicler has זָכְרוּ instead (LXX. again something different: μνημονεύσωμεν); but the object is not the demanding but the promissory side of the covenant, so that consequently it is not Israel's remembering but God's that is spoken of. He remembers His covenant in all time to come, so that exile and want of independence as a state are only temporary, exceptional conditions. צִוְיָה has its radical signification here, to establish, institute, cxi. 9. לְאֵלֶיךָ הוּר (in which expression הוּר is a specifying accusative) is taken from Deut. vii. 9. And since דְּבָר is the covenant word of promise, it can be continued אִשֶׁר בְּרַת; and Hagg. ii. 5 (vid. Köhler thereon) shows that אִשֶׁר is not joined to בְּרִיתוֹ over ver. 8b. הַיִּשְׁבּוּעֹתוֹ, however, is a second object to זָכַר (since דְּבָר with what belongs to it as an apposition is out of the question). It is the oath on Moriah (Gen. xxii. 16) that is meant, which applied to Abraham and his seed. לְיִשְׁחָק (chronicler לְיִצְחָק), as in Ainos vii. 9, Jer. xxxiii. 26. To זָכַר is appended וַיַּעֲמִידָהּ; the suffix, intended as neuter, points to what follows, viz. this, that Canaan shall be Israel's hereditary land. From Abraham and Isaac we come to Jacob-Israel, who as being the father of the twelve is the twelve-tribe nation itself that is coming into existence; hence the plural can alternate with the singular in ver. 11. אֶת־אֶרֶץ כְּנָעַן (chronicler, without the אֶת) is an accusative of the object, and חֶבְלֵי מִדְּבַר אֶרֶץ כְּנָעַן accusative of the predicate: the land of Canaan as the province of your own hereditary possession measured out with a measuring line (lxxviii. 55).

Vers. 12-15. The poet now celebrates the divine preservation which had sway over the small beginnings of Israel, when it made the patriarchs proof against harm on their wanderings. "Men of number" are such as can be easily counted, vid. the confessions in Gen. xxxiv. 30, Deut. xxvi. 5; וַיִּתְּחַלְּבוּ places the claim upon the hospitality at one time of this people and at another time of that people in the connection with it of cause and effect. בְּמִעוֹט, as a small number, only such a small number, signifies, as being virtually an adjective: inconsiderable, insignificant, worthless (Prov. x. 20). אֶרֶץ כְּנָעַן refers to Canaan. In ver. 13 the way in which the words גּוֹי and עַם alternate is instructive: the former signifies the nation, bound together by a common origin, language, country, and descent; the latter the people, bound together by unity of government.* The apodosis does not begin until ver. 14. It is different in connection with בְּהַיְחַלְּבָם in the text of the chronicler, and in this passage in the Psalter of the Syriac version, according to which ver. 12 ought to be joined to the preceding group. The variation וּמִמְלִיכָה instead of מִמְלִיכָה is of no consequence; but לְאִישׁ (to any one whomsoever) instead of אֶדָם, in connection with הִנִּיחָה, restores the current mode of expression (Eccles. v. 11, 2 Sam. xvi. 11, Hos. iv. 17) instead of one which is without support elsewhere, but which follows the model of נִתַּן, נָטַשׁ, Gen. xxxi. 28 (cf. supra i. 274); whilst on the other hand וּבְנִבְיָא instead of וּלְנִבְיָא substitutes an expression that cannot be supported for the current one (Gen. xix. 9, Ruth i. 21). In ver. 14 the poet has the three histories of the preservation of the wives of the patriarchs in his mind, viz. of Sarai in Egypt (Gen. ch. xii.), and of Sarah and of Rebekah both in Philistia (ch. xx., xxvi., cf. especially xxvi. 11). In the second instance God declares the patriarch to be a "prophet" (ch. xx. 7). The one mention has reference to this and the other to Gen. ch. xvii., where Abram is set apart to be the father of peoples and kings, and Sarai to be a princess. They are called מְשִׁיחִים (a passive form) as being God-chosen princes, and נְבִיאִים (an intensive active form, from נָבֵא, root נב, to divulge), not as being inspired ones (Hupfeld), but as being God's spokesmen (cf. Ex. vii. 1 sq. with iv. 15 sq.), therefore as being the recipients and mediators of a divine revelation.

Vers. 16-24. "To call up a famine" is also a prose expression in 2 Kings viii. 1. To break the staff of bread (i.e. the staff which bread is to man) is a very old metaphor, Lev. xxvi. 26. That the selling of Joseph was, providentially regarded, a "sending before," he himself says in Gen. xlv. 5. Ps. cii. 24 throws light upon the meaning of עָנָה בְּ. The Keri רָגַל is just as much without any occasion to justify it as עֵינִי in Eccles. iv. 8 (for עֵינָיו). The statement that iron came upon his soul is intended to say that he had to endure in iron fetters sufferings that threatened his life. Most expositors take בְּרִזְלֵךְ as equivalent to בְּבִרְזֵל, but Hitzig rightly takes נִפְשׁוֹ as an object, following the Targum; for ברזל as a name of an iron fetter* can change its gender, as do, e.g., צָפוֹן as a name of the north wind, and כְּבוֹד as a name of the soul. The imprisonment (so harsh at the commencement) lasted over ten years, until at last Joseph's word came to pass, viz. the word concerning his exaltation which had been revealed to him in dreams (Gen. xlii. 9). According to cvii. 20, רָבְרוּ appears to be the word of Jahve, but then one would expect from ver. 19b a more parallel turn of expression. What is meant is Joseph's open-hearted word concerning his visions, and אִמְרַת ה' is the revelation of God conveying His promises, which came to him in the same form, which had to try, to prove, and to purify him (צָרָה as in xvii. 3, and frequently), inasmuch as he was not to be raised to honour without having in a state of deep abasement proved a faithfulness that wavered not, and a confidence that knew no despair. The divine "word" is conceived of as a living effectual power, as in cxix. 50. The representation of the exaltation begins, according to Gen. xli. 14, with שָׁלַח-מַלְאָךְ,* and follows Gen. xli. 39-41, 44, very closely as to the rest, according to which לְאֶפְרַיִם is a collateral definition to בְּרַצוֹנוֹ (with an orthophonic Dag.) in the sense of בְּרַצוֹנוֹ: by his soul, i.e. by virtue of his will (vid. Psychology, S. 202; tr. p. 239). In consequence of this exaltation of Joseph, Jacob-Israel came then into Egypt, and sojourned there as in a protecting house of shelter (concerning גֹּוֹר, vid. supra, ii. 203). Egypt is called (vers. 23, 27) the land of Chām, as in lxxviii. 51; according to Plutarch, in the vernacular the black land, from the dark ashy grey colouring which the deposited mud of the Nile gives to the ground. There Israel became a powerful, numerous people (Ex. i. 7, Dent. xxvi. 5), greater than their oppressors.

Vers. 25-38. Narration of the exodus out of Egypt after the plagues that went forth over that land. Ver. 25 tells how the Egyptians became their "oppressors." It was indirectly God's work, inasmuch as He gave increasing might to His people, which excited their jealousy. The craft reached its highest pitch in the weakening of the Israelites that was aimed at by killing all the male children that were born. יִבְרִי signifies facts, instances, as in lxxv. 4, cxlv. 5. Here, too, as in Ps. lxxviii., the miraculous judgments of the ten plagues do not stand in exactly historical order. The poet begins with the ninth, which was the most distinct self-representation of divine wrath, viz. the darkness (Ex. x. 21-29): shā'lach chō'shech. The former word (שָׁלַח) has an orthophonic Gaja by * Here שָׁלַח is united by Makkeph with the following word, to which it hurries on, whereas in ver. 28 it has its own accent, a circumstance to which the Masora has directed attention in the apophthegm: שְׁלוּחֵי דְמַלְכָּא זְרִיזִין שְׁלוּחֵי דְחָשׁוּבָא מְתִינִין (the emissaries of the king are in haste, those of darkness are tardy); vid. Baer, Thorath Emeth, p. 22.

the final syllable, which warns the reader audibly to utter the guttural of the toneless final syllable, which might here be easily slurred over. The Hiph. הִחֲשִׁיבָהּ has its causative signification here, as also in Jer. xiii. 16; the contracted mode of writing with i instead of î may be occasioned by the Waw convers. Ver. 28*b* cannot be referred to the Egyptians; for the expression would be a mistaken one for the final compliance, which was wrung from them, and the interrogative way of taking it: nonne rebellarunt, is forced: the cancelling of the לֹא, however (LXX. and Syriac), makes the thought halting. Hitzig proposes וְלֹא שָׁמְרוּ: they observed not His words; but this, too, sounds flat and awkward when said of the Egyptians. The subject will therefore be the same as the subject of שָׁמַר; and of Moses and Aaron, in contrast to the behaviour at Mé-Meribah (Num. xx. 24, xxvii. 14; cf. 1 Kings xiii. 21, 26), it is said that this time they rebelled not against the words (Kerî, without any ground: the word) of God, but executed the terrible commands accurately and willingly. From the ninth plague the poet in ver. 29 passes over to the first (Ex. vii. 14-25), viz. the red blood is appended to the black darkness. The second plague follows, viz. the frogs (Ex. vii. 26 [viii. 1] -viii. 11 [15]); ver. 30*b* looks as though it were stunted, but neither has the LXX. read any וַיִּבְאוּ (וַיַּעֲלוּ), Ex. vii. 28. In ver. 31 he next briefly touches upon the fourth plague, viz. the gad-fly, עֲרֵב, LXX. κυνόμυια (Ex. viii. 16-28 [20-32], vid. on lxxviii. 45), and the third (Ex. viii. 12-15 [16-19]), viz. the gnats, which are passed over in Ps. lxxviii. From the third plague the poet in vers. 32, 33 takes a leap over to the seventh, viz. the hail (Ex. ix. 13-35). In ver. 32 he has Ex. ix. 24 before his mind, according to which masses of fire descended with the hail; and in ver. 33 (as in lxxviii. 47) he fills in the details of Ex. ix. 25. The seventh plague is followed by the eighth in vers. 34, 35, viz. the locust (Ex. x. 1-20), to which יֵלֶק (the grasshopper) is the parallel word here, just as קָסִיל (the cricket) is in lxxviii. 46. The expression of innumerableness is the same as in civ. 25. The fifth plague, viz. the pestilence, murrain (Ex. ix. 1-7), and the sixth, viz. שַׁחֲן, boils (Ex. ix. 8-12), are left unmentioned; and the tenth plague closes, viz. the smiting of the first-born (Ex. xi. 1 sqq.), which ver. 36 expresses in the Asaphic language of lxxviii. 51. Without any mention of the institution of the Passover, the tenth plague is followed by the departure with the vessels of silver and gold asked for from the Egyptians (Ex. xii. 35, xi. 2, iii. 22). The Egyptians were glad to get rid of the people whose detention threatened them with total destruction (Ex. xii. 33). The poet here draws from Isa. v. 27, xiv. 31, lxiii. 13, and Ex. xv. 16. The suffix of שְׂבַטָי refers to the chief subject of the assertion, viz. to God, according to cxxii. 4, although manifestly enough the reference to Israel is also possible (Num. xxiv. 2).

Vers. 39-45. Now follows the miraculous guidance through the desert to the taking possession of Canaan. The fact that the cloud (עָנָן, root נ, to meet, to present itself to view, whence the Arabic 'ānān, the visible outward side of the vault of heaven) by day, and becoming like fire by night, was their guide (Ex. xiii. 21), is left out of consideration in ver. 39a. With מִסְכָּה we are not to associate the idea of a covering against foes, Ex. xiv. 19 sq., but of a covering from the smiting sun, for שֶׁמֶשׁ (Ex. xl. 19), as in Isa. iv. 5 sq., points to the idea of a canopy. In connection with the sending of the quails the tempting character of the desire is only momentarily dwelt upon, the greater emphasis is laid on the omnipotence of the divine goodness which responded to it. שְׂאֵל is to be read instead of שָׂאֵל, the ו before ו having been overlooked; and the Keri writes and points שְׂאֵלִי (like שְׂחָיו, עֲנִי) in order to secure the correct pronunciation, after the analogy of the plural termination יִ. The bread of heaven (lxxviii. 24 sq.) is the manna. In ver. 41 the giving of water out of the rock at Rephidim and at Kadesh are brought together; the expression corresponds better to the former instance (Ex. xvii. 6, cf. Num. xx. 11). הַלְבֵי refers to the waters, and נָהַר for בְּנֵהָרֹת, lxxviii. 16, is, as in xxii. 14, an equation instead of a comparison. In this miraculous escort the patriarchal promise moves on towards its fulfilment; the holy word of promise, and the steadfast, proved faith of Abraham—these were the two motives. The second הֵא is, like the first, a sign of the object, not a preposition (LXX., Targum), in connection with which ver. 42b would be a continuation of ver. 42a, dragging on without any parallelism. Joy and exulting are mentioned as the mood of the redeemed ones with reference to the festive joy displayed at the Red Sea and at Sinai. By ver. 43 one is reminded of the same descriptions of the antitype in Isaiah, ch. xxxv. 10, li. 11, lv. 12, just as ver. 41 recalls Isa. xlvi. 21. "The lands of the heathen" are the territories of the tribes of Canaan.  $\text{למִצְרַיִם}$  is equivalent to  $\text{עַרְבֵי}$  in Isa. xlv. 14: the cultivated ground, the habitable cities, and the accumulated treasures. Israel entered upon the inheritance of these peoples in every direction. As an independent people upon ground that is theirs by inheritance, keeping the revealed law of their God, was Israel to exhibit the pattern of a holy nation moulded after the divine will; and, as the beginning of the Psalm shows, to unite the peoples to themselves and their God, the God of redemption, by the proclamation of the redemption which has fallen to their own lot.

PSALM CVI.

ISRAEL'S UNFAITHFULNESS FROM EGYPT ONWARDS, AND GOD'S FAITHFULNESS DOWN TO THE PRESENT TIME.

HALLELUJAH!

- 1 GIVE thanks unto Jahve, for He is good,
For His graciousness endureth for ever.
- 2 Who can utter the mighty acts of Jahve,
[Who] make all His praise to be heard?
- 3 Blessed are they who keep the right,
He who doeth righteousness at all times.
- 4 Remember me, Jahve, at the favouring of Thy people,
Visit me with Thy help,
- 5 That I too may see the prosperity of Thy chosen ones,
That I too may be glad at the gladness of Thy people,
That I too may glory with Thine inheritance.
- 6 We have sinned like unto our fathers,
We have committed iniquity, we have done wickedly.
- 7 Our fathers in Egypt heeded not Thy wonders,
They remembered not the abundance of Thy loving-kindnesses,
And were rebellious at the sea, at the Red Sea.

- 8 Yet He saved them for His Name's sake,
To make His strength known.
- 9 He rebuked the Red Sea, and it dried up,
And led them through the floods as upon a plain ;
- 10 And He saved them out of the hand of the hater,
And redeemed them out of the hand of the enemy.
- 11 The waters covered their oppressors,
Not one of them was left—
- 12 Then they believed His words,
They sang His praise.
- 13 They quickly forgot His works,
They waited not for His counsel.
- 14 They lusted greedily in the desert,
And tempted God in the wilderness.
- 15 Then He gave them their desire,
And sent consumption into their soul.
- 16 They manifested envy against Moses in the camp, Against Aaron, the holy one of Jahve—
- 17 The earth opened and swallowed up Dathan,
And covered the band of Abiram ;
- 18 And fire seized upon their band,
A flame consumed the evil-doers.
- 19 They made a calf in Horeb,
Then they worshipped the molten image,
- 20 And they bartered their glory
For the likeness of an ox that eateth grass.
- 21 They had forgotten God their Saviour,
Who did great deeds in Egypt,
- 22 Wondrous works in the land of Ham,
Terrible deeds at the Red Sea.
- 23 Then He thought to exterminate them,
Had not Moses His chosen one
Stepped into the breach before Him
To calm His wrath, that He should not destroy.
- 24 They despised the pleasant land,
They believed not His word.
- 25 They murmured in their tents,
They hearkened not to the voice of Jahve.

- 26 Then He lifted up His hand against them
To cast them down in the desert,
27 And to disperse their seed among the heathen,
And to scatter them in the lands.
28 They joined themselves unto Baal-Peôr,
And ate the sacrifices for the dead,
29 And excited provocation by their doings ;
And the plague brake in among them.
30 Then stood up Phinehas and arranged,
And the plague was stayed.
31 And it was counted unto him for righteousness
Unto all generations for ever.
32 Then they excited displeasure at the waters of strife,
And it went ill with Moses for their sakes.
33 For they rebelled against God's Spirit,
And he erred with his lips.
- 34 They did not exterminate the peoples
Which Jahve had said to them ;
35 But mixed themselves among the heathen,
And learned their works.
36 They served their idols,
And they became to them a snare.
37 They sacrificed their sons and their daughters to demons,
38 And shed innocent blood,
The blood of their sons and their daughters,
Whom they sacrificed to the idols of Canaan,
So that the land was polluted by blood-guiltiness.
39 They became impure by their works,
And became fornicators by their doings.
40 Then was the wrath of Jahve kindled against His people,
And He abhorred His own inheritance.
41 He gave them over into the hand of the heathen,
And their haters became their oppressors.
42 Their enemies oppressed them,
And they were obliged to bow down under their hand.
43 Many times did He rescue them,
Yet they rebelled in their self-will—
Then they perished in their iniquity.

- 44 But He saw how hard it went with them,
When He heard their cry of grief.
- 45 He remembered for them His covenant,
And had compassion according to the abundance of His mercies.
- 46 And He caused them to be compassionated
In the presence of all who carried them into captivity.
- 47 Save us, Jahve our God,
And bring us together out of the heathen,
To give thanks unto Thy holy Name,
And to glory in Thy praise.
- 48 BLESSED BE JAHVE THE GOD OF ISRAEL FROM EVER-LASTING TO EVERLASTING, AND LET ALL PEOPLE SAY AMEN!
HALLELUJAH!!

With this anonymous Psalm begins the series of the strictly Hallelujah-Psalms, i.e. of those Psalms which have הלל־יה for their arsis-like beginning and for their inscription (cvi., cxi.-cxiii., cxvii., cxxxv., cxlvi.-cl.). The chronicler in his cento, 1 Chron. xvi. 8 sqq., and in fact in ch. xvi. 34-36, puts the first and last verses of this Psalm (vers. 1, 47), together with the Beracha (ver. 48) which closes the Fourth Book of the Psalms, into the mouth of David, from which it is to be inferred that this Psalm is no more Maccabæan than Ps. xcvi. and cv. (which see), and that the Psalter was divided into five books which were marked off by the doxologies even in the time of the chronicler. The Beracha, ver. 48, appears even at that period to have been read as an integral part of the Psalm, according to liturgical usage. The Hallelujah Ps. cvi., like the Hodu Ps. cv. and the Asaph Ps. lxxviii., recapitulates the history of the olden times of the Israelitish nation. But the purpose and mode of the recapitulation differ in each of these three Psalms. In Ps. lxxviii. it is didactic; in Ps. cv. hymnic; and here in Ps. cvi. penitential. It is a penitential Psalm, or Psalm of confession, a וְדָוִי (from הִתְוַדָּה to confess, Lev. xvi. 21). The oldest types of such liturgical prayers are the two formularies at the offering of the first-fruits, Deut. ch. xxvi., and Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the Temple, 1 Kings ch. viii. And to this kind of tephilla, the Vidduj, belong, beyond the range of the Psalter, the prayer of Daniel, ch. ix. (vid. the way in which it is introduced in ver. 4), and the prayer (Neh. ix. 5-x. 1 [ix. 38]) which eight Levites uttered in the name of the people at the celebration of the fast-day on the twenty-fourth of Tishri. It is true Ps. cvi. is distinguished from these prayers of confession in the prose style as being a Psalm; but it has three points in common with them and with the liturgical tephilla in general, viz. (1) the fondness for inflexional rhyming, i.e. for rhyming terminations of the same suffixes; (2) the heaping up of synonyms; and (3) the unfolding of the thoughts in a continuous line. These three peculiarities are found not only in the liturgical border, vers. 1-6, 47, but also in the middle historical portion, which forms the bulk of the Psalm. The law of parallelism is, it is true, still observed; but apart from these distichic wave-like ridges of the thoughts, it is all one direct, straight-line flow without technical division.

Vers. 1-5. The Psalm begins with the liturgical call, which was not coined for the first time in the Maccabæan age (1 Macc. iv. 24), but was already in use in Jeremiah's time (ch. xxxiii. 11). The LXX. appropriately renders טוב by χρηστός, for God is called "good" not so much in respect of His nature as of the revelation of His nature. The fulness of this revelation, says ver. 2 (like xl. 6), is inexhaustible. נְבוֹרוֹת are the manifestations of His all-conquering power which makes everything subservient to His redemptive purposes (xx. 7); and תְּהִלָּה is the glory (praise or celebration) of His self-attestation in history. The proclaiming of these on the part of man can never be an exhaustive echo of them. In ver. 3 the poet tells what is the character of those who experience such manifestations of God; and to the assertion of the blessedness of these men he appends the petition in ver. 4, that God would grant him a share in the experiences of the whole nation which is the object of these manifestations. עִמָּךְ beside בְּרִצּוֹן is a genitive of the object: with the pleasure which Thou turnest towards Thy people, i.e. when Thou again (cf. ver. 47) showest Thyself gracious unto them. On בְּקִרְבְּךָ cf. viii. 5, lxxx. 15, and on בְּרִצּוֹן, Jer. xxix. 32; a similar Beth is that beside לְבַיְתִי (at, on account of, not: in connection with), xxi. 2, cxxii.

1. God's "inheritance" is His people; the name for them is varied four times, and thereby יְהוָה is also exceptionally brought into use, as in Zeph. ii. 9.

Vers. 6-12. The key-note of the vidduj, which is a settled expression since 1 Kings viii. 47 (Dan. ix. 5, cf. Bar. ii. 12), makes itself heard here in ver. 6; Israel is bearing at this time the punishment of its sins, by which it has made itself like its forefathers. In this needy and helpless condition the poet, who all along speaks as a member of the assembly, takes the way of the confession of sin, which leads to the forgiveness of sin and to the removal of the punishment of sin. עָשָׂה, 1 Kings viii. 47, signifies to be, and the Hiph. to prove one's self to be, a עָשָׂה. עָשָׂה in ver. 6 is equivalent to æque ac, as in Eccles. ii. 16, Job ix. 26. With ver. 7 the retrospect begins. The fathers contended with Moses and Aaron in Egypt (Ex. v. 21), and gave no heed to the prospect of redemption (Ex. vi. 9). The miraculous judgments which Moses executed (Ex. iii. 20) had no more effect in bringing them to a right state of mind, and the abundant tokens of loving-kindness (Isa. lxiii. 7) amidst which God redeemed them made so little impression on their memories that they began to despair and to murmur even at the Red Sea (Ex. xiv. 11 sq.). With עָשָׂה, ver. 7b, alternates הָיָה (as in Ezek. x. 15, בְּהִיָּה); cf. the alternation of prepositions in Joel iv. 8b. When they behaved thus, Jahve might have left their redemption unaccomplished, but out of unmerited mercy He nevertheless redeemed them. Vers. 8-11 are closely dependent upon Ex. ch. xiv. Ver. 11b is a transposition (cf. xxxiv. 21, Isa. xxxiv. 16) from Ex. xiv. 28. On the other hand, ver. 9b is taken out of Isa. lxiii. 13 (cf. Wisd. xix. 9); Isa. lxiii. 7-lxiv. is a prayer for redemption which has a similar ground-colouring. The sea through which they passed is called, as in the Tôra, יַם־סוּף, which seems, according to Ex. ii. 3, Isa. xix. 3, to signify the sea of reed or sedge, although the sedge does not grow in the Red Sea itself, but only on the marshy places of the coast; but it can also signify the sea of sea-weed, mare algosum, after the Egyptian sippe, wool and sea-weed (just as סוּף also signifies both these). The word is certainly after the manner of a proper name; so that the inference drawn by Knobel on Ex. xiii. 18 from the absence of the article, that  $\text{קִנְדָּן}$  is the name of a town on the northern point of the gulf, is groundless. The miracle at the sea of sedge or sea-weed—as ver. 12 says—also was not without effect. Ex. xiv. 31 tells us that they believed on Jahve and Moses His servant, and the song which they sang follows in Ex. ch. xv. But they then only too quickly added sins of ingratitude.

Egyptian, whether it is to be referred back to the Egyptian word sippe (sea-weed) or sêbe (sedge), and is therefore used

Vers. 13-23. The first of the principal sins on the other side of the Red Sea was the unthankful, impatient, unbelieving murmuring about their meat and drink, vers. 13-15. For what ver. 13 places foremost was the root of the whole evil, that, falling away from faith in God's promise, they forgot the works of God which had been wrought in confirmation of it, and did not wait for the carrying out of His counsel. The poet has before his eye the murmuring for water on the third day after the miraculous deliverance (Ex. xv. 22-24) and in Rephidim (Ex. xvii. 2). Then the murmuring for flesh in the first and second years of the exodus which was followed by the sending of the quails (Ex. ch. xvi. and Num. ch. xi.), together with the wrathful judgment by which the murmuring for the second time was punished (Kibróth ha-Ta'avah, Num. xi. 33-35). This dispensation of wrath the poet calls  $\text{לֶחֱמָה}$  (LXX., Vulgate, and Syriac erroneously πλησμονήν, perhaps  $\text{לֶחֱמָה}$ , nourishment), inasmuch as he interprets Num. xi. 33-35 of a wasting disease, which swept away the people in consequence of eating inordinately of the flesh, and in the expression (cf. lxxviii. 31) he closely follows Isa. x. 16. The "counsel" of God for which they would not wait, is His plan with respect to the time and manner of the help.  $\text{חֶקֶק}$ , root  $\text{חָק}$ , a weaker power of  $\text{חָק}$ , whence also  $\text{חָקַל}$ , i. 180,  $\text{חָקַם}$ , i. 84 note, signifies prop. to make firm, e.g. a knot (cf. on xxxiii. 20), and starting from this (without the intervention of the metaphor moras nectere, as Schultens thinks) is transferred to a firm bent of mind, and the tension of long expectation. The epigrammatic expression  $\text{יִתְאָזְרוּ יִתְאָזְרוּ}$  (plural of  $\text{יִתְאָזַר}$ , xlv. 12, for which codices, as also in Prov. xxiii. 3, 6, xxiv. 1, the Complutensian, Venetian 1521, Elias Levita, and Baer have  $\text{יִתְאָזַר}$  without the tonic lengthening) is taken from Num. xi. 4.

The second principal sin was the insurrection against their superiors, vers. 16-18. The poet has Num. ch. xvi. xvii. in his eye. The rebellious ones were swallowed up by the earth, and their two hundred and fifty noble, non-Levite partisans consumed by fire. The fact that the poet does not mention Korah among those who were swallowed up is in perfect harmony with Num. xvi. 25 sqq., Deut. xi. 6; cf. however Num. xxvi. 10. The elliptical תִּפְתָּהּ in ver. 17 is explained from Num. xvi. 32, xxvi. 10.

The third principal sin was the worship of the calf, vers. 19-23. The poet here glances back at Ex. ch. xxxii., but not without at the same time having Deut. ix. 8-12 in his mind; for the expression "in Horeb" is Deuteronomic, e.g. Deut. iv. 15, v. 2, and frequently. Ver. 20 is also based upon the Book of Deuteronomy: they exchanged their glory, i.e. the God who was their distinction before all peoples according to Deut. iv. 6-8, x. 21 (cf. also Jer. ii. 11), for the likeness (תְּבִיטָה) of a plough-ox (for this is pre-eminently called שׁוֹר, in the dialects תִּוִּר), contrary to the prohibition in Deut. iv. 17. On ver. 21a cf. the warning in Deut. vi. 12. "Land of Cham" = Egypt, as in lxxviii. 51, cv. 23, 27. With וַיֵּאמֶר in ver. 23 the expression becomes again Deuteronomic: Deut. ix. 25, cf. Ex. xxxii. 10. God made and also expressed the resolve to destroy Israel. Then Moses stepped into the gap (before the gap), i.e. as it were covered the breach, inasmuch as he placed himself in it and exposed his own life; cf. on the fact, besides Ex. ch. xxxii., also Deut. ix. 18 sqq., x. 10, and on the expression, Ezek. xxii. 30 and also Jer. xviii. 20.

Vers. 24-33. The fact to which the poet refers in ver. 24, viz. the rebellion in consequence of the report of the spies, which he brings forward as the fourth principal sin, is narrated in Num. ch. xiii., xiv. The appellation אֲרָץ הַמִּדְבָּר is also found in Jer. iii. 19, Zech. vii. 14. As to the rest, the expression is altogether Pentateuchal. "They despised the land," after Num. xiv. 31; "they murmured in their tents," after Deut. i. 27; "to lift up the hand" = to swear, after Ex. vi. 8, Deut. xxxii. 40; the threat לְהַפִּיל, to make them fall down, fall away, after Num. xiv. 29, 32. The threat of exile is founded upon the two great threatening chapters, Lev. xxvi., Deut. xxviii.; cf. more particularly Lev. xxvi. 33 (together with the echoes in Ezek. v. 12, xii. 14, etc.), Deut. xxviii. 64 (together with the echoes in Jer. ix. 15, Ezek. xxii. 15, etc.). Ezek. xx. 23 stands in a not accidental relationship to ver. 26 sq.; and according to that passage,  $\text{לְהַפְּיִל}$  is an error of the copyist for  $\text{לְהַפְּיִל}$  (Hitzig).

Now follows in ver. 28-31 the fifth of the principal sins, viz. the taking part in the Moabitish worship of Baal. The verb  $\text{רָבַץ}$  (to be bound or chained), taken from Num. xxv. 3, 5, points to the prostitution with which Baal Peôr, this Moabitish Priapus, was worshipped. The sacrificial feastings in which, according to Num. xxv. 2, they took part, are called eating the sacrifices of the dead, because the idols are dead beings (νεκροί, Wisd. xiii. 10-18) as opposed to God, the living One. The catena on Apoc. ii. 14 correctly interprets: τὰ τοῖς εἰδώλοις τελεσθέντα κρέα.\* The object of "they made angry" is omitted; the author is fond of this, cf. vers. 7 and 32. The expression in ver. 29b is like Ex. xix. 24. The verb  $\text{רָבַץ}$  is chosen with reference to Num. xvii. 13 [xvi. 48]. The result is expressed in ver. 30b after Num. xxv. 8, 18 sq., xvii. 13 [xvi. 48]. With  $\text{לְהַפְּיִל}$ , to adjust, to judge adjustingly (LXX., Vulgate, correctly according to the sense, ἐξιλιάσατο), the poet associates the thought of the satisfaction due to divine right, which Phinehas executed with the javelin. This act of zeal for Jahve, which compensated for Israel's unfaithfulness, was accounted unto him for righteousness, by his being rewarded for it with the priesthood unto everlasting ages, Num. xxv. 10-13. This accounting of a work for righteousness is only apparently contradictory to Gen. xv. 5 sq.: it was indeed an act which sprang from a constancy in faith, and one which obtained for him the acceptance of a righteous man for the sake of this upon which it was based, by proving him to be such.

* In the second section of Aboda zara, on the words of the Mishna: "The flesh which is intended to be offered first of all to idols is allowed, but that which comes out of the temple is forbidden, because it is like sacrifices of the dead," it is observed, fol. 32b: "Whence, said R. Jehuda ben Bethêra, do I know that that which is offered to idols (תקרובת לעבודה זרה) pollutes like a dead body? From Ps. cvi. 28. As the dead body pollutes everything that is under the same roof with it, so also does everything that is offered to idols." The Apostle Paul declares the objectivity of this pollution to be vain, cf. more particularly 1 Cor. x. 28 sq.

In vers. 32, 33 follows the sixth of the principal sins, viz. the insurrection against Moses and Aaron at the waters of strife in the fortieth year, in connection with which Moses forfeited the entrance with them into the Land of Promise (Num. xx. 11 sq., Deut. i. 37, xxxii. 51), since he suffered himself to be carried away by the persevering obstinacy of the people against the Spirit of God (הַמְּרָה mostly providing the future for מְרָה, as in vers. 7, 43, lxxviii. 17, 40, 56, of obstinacy against God; on אַת־רוּחוֹ cf. Isa. lxiii. 10) into uttering the words addressed to the people, Num. xx. 10, in which, as the smiting of the rock which was twice repeated shows, is expressed impatience together with a tinge of unbelief. The poet distinguishes, as does the narrative in Num. ch. xx., between the obstinacy of the people and the transgression of Moses, which is there designated, according to that which lay at the root of it, as unbelief. The retrospective reference to Num. xxvii. 14 needs adjustment accordingly.

Vers. 34-43. The sins in Canaan: the failing to exterminate the idolatrous peoples and sharing in their idolatry. In ver. 34 the poet appeals to the command, frequently enjoined upon them from Ex. xxiii. 32 sq. onwards, to extirpate the inhabitants of Canaan. Since they did not execute this command (vid. Judg. ch. i.-iii. 6), that which it was intended to prevent came to pass: the heathen became to them a snare (מוֹקֵשׁ), Ex. xxiii. 33, xxxiv. 12, Deut. vii. 16. They intermarried with them, and fell into the Canaanitish custom in which the abominations of heathenism culminate, viz. the human sacrifice, which Jahve abhorreth (Deut. xii. 31), and only the demons (שְׁרִיִם, Deut. xxxii. 17) delight in. Thus then the land was defiled by blood-guiltiness (הַקִּי, Num. xxv. 33, cf. Isa. xxiv. 5, xxvi. 21), and they themselves became unclean (Ezek. xx. 43) by the whoredom of idolatry. In vers. 40-43 the poet (as in Neh. ix. 26 sqq.) sketches the alternation of apostasy, captivity, redemption, and relapse which followed upon the possession of Canaan, and more especially that which characterized the period of the judges. God's "counsel" was to make Israel free and glorious, but they leaned upon themselves, following their own intentions (בְּעֵצָתָם); wherefore they perished in their sins. The poet uses מָכָה (to sink down, fall away) instead of the נָמַק (to moulder, rot) of the primary passage, Lev. xxvi. 39, retained in Ezek. xxiv. 23, xxxiii. 10, which is no blunder (Hitzig), but a deliberate change.

Vers. 44-46. The poet's range of vision here widens from the time of the judges to the history of the whole of the succeeding age down to the present; for the whole history of Israel has essentially the same fundamental character, viz. that Israel's unfaithfulness does not annul God's faithfulness. That verifies itself even now. That which Solomon in 1 Kings viii. 50 prays for on behalf of his people when they may be betrayed into the hands of the enemy, has been fulfilled in the case of the dispersion of Israel in all countries (cvii. 3), Babylonia, Egypt, etc.: God has turned the hearts of their oppressors towards them. On רָאָה בְּ, to regard compassionately, cf. Gen. xxix. 32, 1 Sam. i. 11. בְּצִר לָהֶם belong together, as in cvii. 6, and frequently. רִנָּה is a cry of lamentation, as in 1 Kings viii. 28 in Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the Temple. From this source comes ver. 6, and also from this source ver. 46, cf. 1 Kings viii. 50 together with Neh. i. 11. In וַיִּנְחֶם the drawing back of the tone does not take place, as in Gen. xxiv. 67. חֲסִדוֹ beside כְּרִב is not pointed by the Keri חֲסִדוֹ, as in v. 8, lxix. 14, but as in Lam. iii. 32, according to ver. 7, Isa. lxiii. 7, חֲסִדוֹ: in accordance with the fulness (riches) of His manifold mercy or loving-kindness. The expression in ver. 46 is like Gen. xliii. 14. Although the condition of the poet's fellow-countrymen in the dispersion may have been tolerable in itself, yet this involuntary scattering of the members of the nation is always a state of punishment. The poet prays in ver. 47 that God may be pleased to put an end to this.

Ver. 47. He has now reached the goal, to which his whole Psalm struggles forth, by the way of self-accusation and the praise of the faithfulness of God. הִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה (found only here) is the reflexive of the Piel, to account happy, Eccles. iv. 2, therefore: in order that we may esteem ourselves happy to be able to praise Thee. In this reflexive (and also passive) sense הִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה is customary in Aramaic and post-biblical Hebrew.

Ver. 48. The closing doxology of the Fourth Book. The chronicler has וַיִּאמְרוּ before ver. 47 (which with him differs only very slightly), an indispensable rivet, so to speak, in the fitting together of cvi. 1 (cvii. 1) and cvi. 47. The means this historian, who joins passages together like mosaic-work, calls to his aid are palpable enough. He has also taken over ver. 48 by transforming and let all the people say Amen, Hallelujah! in accordance with his style (cf. 1 Chron. xxv. 3, 2 Chron. v. 13, and frequently, Ezra iii. 11), into an historical clause: וַיִּאמְרוּ לַיהוָה בְּלִהְעֵם אָמֵן וְהָלֵל לַיהוָה. Hitzig, by regarding the echoes of the Psalms in the chronicler as the originals of the corresponding Psalms in the Psalter, and consequently 1 Chron. xvi. 36 as the original of the Beracha placed after our Psalm, reverses the true relation; vid. with reference to this point, Riehm in the Theolog. Literat. Blatt, 1866, No. 30, and Köhler in the Luther. Zeitschrift, 1867, S. 297 ff. The priority of Ps. cvi. is clear from the fact that ver. 1 gives a liturgical key-note that was in use even in Jeremiah's time (ch. xxxiii. 11), and that ver. 47 reverts to the tephilla-style of the introit, vers. 4 sq. And the priority of ver. 48 as a concluding formula of the Fourth Book is clear from the fact that it has been fashioned, like that of the Second Book (lxxii. 18 sq.), under the influence of the foregoing Psalm. The Hallelujah is an echo of the Hallelujah-Psalm, just as there the Jahve Elohim is an echo of the Elohim-Psalm. And "let all the people say Amen" is the same closing thought as in ver. 6 of Ps. cl., which is made into the closing doxology of the whole Psalter. Ἀμὴν ἀλληλοῦῖα together (Apoc. xix. 4) is a laudatory confirmation.

FIFTH BOOK OF THE PSALTER.

Ps. CVII.—CL.

PSALM CVII.

AN ADMONITION TO FELLOW-COUNTRYMEN TO RENDER THANKS ON ACCOUNT OF HAVING GOT THE BETTER OF CALAMITIES.

- 1 "GIVE thanks unto Jahve, for He is good,
For His loving-kindness endureth for ever,"
- 2 Let the redeemed of Jahve say,
Whom He hath redeemed out of the hand of oppression
- 3 And gathered out of the lands,
From the east and from the west, from the north and from the sea.

- 4 They wandered in the desert in a waste of a way,
They found not a city of habitation.
- 5 Under hunger and thirst
Their soul fainted in them.
- 6 *Then they cried unto Jahve in their trouble—
Out of their distresses He delivered them,*
- 7 And led them by a right way
To arrive at a city of habitation.—
- 8 *Let them praise to Jahve His loving-kindness,
And His wonders to the children of men,*
- 9 That He hath satisfied the thirsty soul,
And filled the hungry soul with good.

- 10 Those who dwelt in darkness and the shadow of death,
Being bound in torture and iron,
- 11 Because they rebelled against the words of God
And derided the counsel of the Most High,

- 12 And He humbled their heart by labour,
They fell down, and there was none to help.
- 13 *Then they cried unto Jahve in their trouble—
Out of their distresses He saved them ;*
- 14 He led them forth out of darkness and the shadow of death,
And burst their bonds asunder.
- 15 *Let them praise to Jahve His goodness,
And His wonders to the children of men,*
- 16 That He hath broken in pieces the brazen doors
And smitten down the iron bars.
- 17 The foolish, on account of the way of their transgression,
And on account of their iniquity, had to suffer.
- 18 All food their soul abhorred,
And they drew near to the gates of death.
- 19 *Then they cried unto Jahve in their trouble—
Out of their distresses He saved them.*
- 20 He sent His word and healed them,
And caused them to escape out of their pit-falls.
- 21 *Let them praise to Jahve His goodness,
And His wonders to the children of men,*
- 22 And let them sacrifice sacrifices of thanksgiving
And declare His works with a shout of joy.
- 23 Those who go down to the sea in ships,
Who do business in great waters—
- 24 These have seen the works of Jahve,
And His wonders in the deep.
- 25 He spake and raised a stormy wind,
Which forced up its waves on high.
- 26 They went up towards heaven, they went down into the
Their soul was melted in trouble. [depths,
- 27 They whirled and staggered like a drunken man,
And all their wisdom came of itself to nought.
- 28 *Then they cried unto Jahve in their trouble,
And out of their distresses He brought them forth.*
- 29 He changed the storm into a gentle breeze,
And their waves were still.
- 30 Then were they glad that they were abated,
And He led them to the haven of their desire.

- 31 *Let them praise to Jahve His goodness,
And His wonders to the children of men,*
- 32 *And let them exalt Him in the congregation of the people,
And praise Him in the council of the elders.*
- 33 *He changed rivers into a desert
And water-springs into drought,*
- 34 *A fruitful land into a salt-plain,
Because of the wickedness of those who dwelt therein.*
- 35 *He changed the desert into a pool of water,
And the dry land into water-springs ;*
- 36 *And made the hungry to dwell there,
And they built a city of habitation.*
- 37 *They sowed fields and planted vineyards,
And obtained profitable fruit.*
- 38 *He blessed them and they multiplied greatly,
And their cattle He made into not a few.*
- 39 *Then they became few and were reduced
By the pressure of misfortune and sorrow—*
- 40 *He who poureth contempt on princes
And causeth them to wander in the pathless waste :*
- 41 *He removed the needy out of the way of affliction,
And made the families like a flock.*
- 42 *The upright see it and rejoice,
And all knavery stoppeth its month.*
- * * *
- 43 *Whoso is wise let him observe these things,
And let them consider the loving-kindnesses of Jahve !*

With this Psalm begins the Fifth Book, the Book אלה הרברים of the Psalter. With Ps. cvi. closed the Fourth Book, or the Book במרבר, the first Psalm of which, Ps. xc., bewailed the manifestation of God's wrath in the case of the generation of the desert, and in the presence of the prevailing death took refuge in God the eternal and unchangeable One. Ps. cvi., which closes the book, has בַּמִּדְבָּר (vers. 14, 26) as its favourite word, and makes confession of the sins of Israel on the way to Canaan. Now, just as at the beginning of the Book of Deuteronomy Israel stands on the threshold of the Land of Promise, after the two tribes and a half have already established themselves on the other side of the Jordan, so at the beginning of this Fifth Book of the Psalter we see Israel restored to the soil of its fatherland. There it is the Israel redeemed out of Egypt, here it is the Israel redeemed out of the lands of the Exile. There the lawgiver once more admonishes Israel to yield the obedience of love to the Law of Jahve, here the psalmist calls upon Israel to show gratitude towards Him, who has redeemed it from exile and distress and death.

We must not therefore be surprised if Ps. cvi. and cvii. are closely connected, in spite of the fact that the boundary of the two Books lies between them. "Ps. cvii. stands in close relationship to Ps. cvi. The similarity of the beginning at once points back to this Psalm. Thanks are here given in ver. 3 for what was there desired in ver. 47. The praise of the Lord which was promised in Ps. cvi. 47 in the case of redemption being vouchsafed, is here presented to Him after redemption vouchsafed." This observation of Hengstenberg is fully confirmed. The Psalms civ.—cvii. really to a certain extent form a tetralogy. Ps. civ. derives its material from the history of the creation, Ps. cv. from the preparatory and early history of Israel, Ps. cvi. from the history of Israel in Egypt, in the desert, and in the Land of Promise down to the Exile, and Ps. cvii. from the time of the restoration.

Nevertheless the connection of Ps. civ. with cv.—cvii. is by far not so close as that of these three Psalms among themselves. These three anonymous Psalms form a trilogy in the strictest sense; they are a tripartite whole from the hand of one author. The observation is an old one. The Harpffe Davids mit Teutschen Saiten bespannet (Harp of David strung with German Strings), a translation of the Psalms which appeared in Augsburg in the year 1659, begins Ps. cvi. with the words: "For the third time already am I now come, and I make bold to spread abroad, with grateful acknowledgment, Thy great kindnesses." God's wondrous deeds of loving-kindness and compassion towards Israel from the time of their forefathers down to the redemption out of Egypt according to the promise, and giving them possession of Canaan, are the theme of Ps. cv. The theme of Ps. cvi. is the sinful conduct of Israel from Egypt onwards during the journey through the desert, and then in the Land of Promise, by which they brought about the fulfilment of the threat of exile (ver. 27) ; but even there God's mercy was not suffered to go unattested (ver. 46). The theme of Ps. cvii., finally, is the sacrifice of praise that is due to Him who redeemed them out of exile and all kinds of destruction. We may compare cv. 44, He gave them the lands (אֲרָצוֹת) of the heathen ; cvi. 27, (He threatened) to cast forth their seed among the heathen and to scatter them in the lands (בְּאֲרָצוֹת) ; and cvii. 3, out of the lands (מֵאֲרָצוֹת) hath He brought them together, out of east and west, out of north and south. The designed similarity of the expression, the internal connection, and the progression in accordance with a definite plan, are not to be mistaken here. In other respects, too, these three Psalms are intimately interwoven. In them Egypt is called "the land of Ham" (cv. 23, 27, cvi. 22), and Israel "the chosen ones of Jahve" (cv. 6, 43, cvi. 5, cf. 23). They are fond of the interrogative form of exclamation (cvi. 2, cvii. 43). There is an approach in them to the hypostatic conception of the Word (רִבְרָה, cv. 19, cvi. 20). Compare also יִשְׁמֹן cvi. 14, cvii. 4 ; and the Hithpa. הִתְהַלֵּל cv. 3, cvi. 5, הִשְׁתַּבַּח cvi. 47, הִתְבַּלַּע cvii. 27. In all three the poet shows himself to be especially familiar with Isa. ch. xl.-lxvi., and also with the Book of Job. Ps. cvii. is the fullest in reminiscences taken from both these Books, and in this Psalm the movement of the poet is more free without recapitulating history that has been committed to writing. Everything therefore favours the assertion that Ps. cv., cvi., and cvii. are a "trefoil" (trifolium),—two Hodu-Psalms, and a Hallelujah-Psalm in the middle.

Ps. cvii. consists of six groups with an introit, vers. 1-3, and an epiphonem, ver. 43. The poet unrolls before the dispersion of Israel that has again attained to the possession of its native land the pictures of divine deliverances in which human history, and more especially the history of the exiles, is so rich. The epiphonem at the same time stamps the hymn as a consolatory Psalm ; for those who were gathered again out of the lands of the heathen nevertheless still looked for the final redemption under the now milder, now more despotic sceptre of the secular power.

Vers. 1-3. The introit, with the call upon them to grateful praise, is addressed to the returned exiles. The Psalm carries the marks of its deutero-Isaianic character on the very front of it, viz. : "the redeemed of Jahve," taken from Isa. lxii. 12, cf. lxiii. 4, xxxv. 9 sq. ; קָדְמָי as in Isa. lvi. 8, and frequently ; "from the north and from the sea," as in Isa. xlix. 12 : "the sea" (ים) here (as perhaps there also), side by side with east, west, and north, is the south, or rather (since ים is an established usus loquendi for the west) the south-west, viz. the southern portion of the Mediterranean washing the shores of Egypt. With this the poet associates the thought of the exiles of Egypt, as with יַמֵּי עֵרֶב the exiles of the islands, i.e. of Asia Minor and Europe ; he is therefore writing at a period in which the Jewish state newly founded by the release of the Babylonian exiles had induced the scattered fellow-countrymen in all countries to return home. Calling upon the redeemed ones to give thanks to God the Redeemer in order that the work of the restoration of Israel may be gloriously perfected amidst the thanksgiving of the redeemed ones, he forthwith formulates the thanksgiving by putting the language of thanksgiving of the ancient liturgy (Jer. xxxiii. 11) into their mouth. The nation, now again established upon the soil of the fatherland, has, until it had acquired this again, seen destruction in every form in a strange land, and can tell of the most manifold divine deliverances. The call to sacrifice the sacrifices of thanksgiving is expanded accordingly into several pictures portraying the dangers of the strange land, which are not so much allegorical, personifying the Exile, as rather exemplificative.

Vers. 4-9. It has actually come to pass, the first strophe tells us, that they wandered in a strange land through deserts and wastes, and seemed likely to have to succumb to death from hunger. According to ver. 40 and Isa. xliii. 19, it appears that ver. 4a ought to be read לֹא־יִרְדּוּ (Olshausen, Baur, and Thenius) ; but the line is thereby lengthened inelegantly. The two words, joined by Munach, stand in the construct state, like פָּרַח אֶרֶם, Gen. xvi. 12 : a waste of a way = ἔρημος ὁδός, Acts viii. 26 (Ewald, Hitzig), which is better suited to the poetical style than that יִרְדּוּ, as in מִשְׁנֵה־בְּקָהּ, and the like, should be an accusative of nearer definition (Hengstenberg). In connection with עִיר מֵוֹשֵׁב the poet, who is fond of this combination (vers. 7, 36, cf. בְּיַת־מוֹשֵׁב, Lev. xxv. 29), means any city whatever which might afford the homeless ones a habitable, hospitable reception. With the perfects, which describe what has been experienced, alternates in ver. 5*b* the imperfect, which shifts to the way in which anything comes about: their soul in them enveloped itself (vid. lxi. 3), i.e. was nigh upon extinction. With the fut. consec. then follows in ver. 6 the fact which gave the turn to the change in their misfortune. Their cry for help, as the imperfect יִצִּילֵם implies, was accompanied by their deliverance, the fact of which is expressed by the following fut. consec. וַיְדַרְבֵּם. Those who have experienced such things are to confess to the Lord, with thanksgiving, His loving-kindness and His wonderful works to the children of men. It is not to be rendered: His wonders (supply אֲשֶׁר עָשָׂה) towards the children of men (Luther, Olshausen, and others). The two לֵב coincide: their thankful confession of the divine loving-kindness and wondrous acts is not to be addressed alone to Jahve Himself, but also to men, in order that out of what they have experienced a wholesome fruit may spring forth for the multitude. נֶפֶשׁ שׁוֹקֵקָה (part. Polel, the e of which is retained as a pre-tonic vowel in pause, cf. lxxviii. 26 and on Job xx. 27, Ew. § 188, b) is, as in Isa. xxix. 9, the thirsting soul (from שָׁק, to urge forward, of the impulse and drawing of the emotions, in Hebrew to desire ardently). The preterites are here an expression of that which has been experienced, and therefore of that which has become a fact of experience. In superabundant measure does God uphold the languishing soul that is in imminent danger of languishing away.

Vers. 10-16. Others suffered imprisonment and bonds; but through Him who had decreed this as punishment for them, they also again reached the light of freedom. Just as in the first strophe, here too, as far as יָרָו in ver. 15, is all a compound subject; and in view of this the poet begins with participles. "Darkness and the shadow of death" (vid. xxiii. 4) is an Isaianic expression, Isa. ix. 1 (where יְשֵׁבֵי is construed with דָּ), xlii. 7 (where יְשֵׁבֵי is construed as here, cf. Gen. iv. 20, Zech. ii. 11), just as "bound in torture and iron" takes its rise from Job xxxvi. 8. The old expositors call it a hendiadys for "torturing iron" (after cv. 18); but it is more correct to take the one as the general term and the other as the particular:

bound in all sorts of affliction from which they could not break away, and more particularly in iron bonds (בְּרִזָּל, like the Arabic firzil, an iron fetter, vid. on cv. 18). In ver. 11, which calls to mind Isa. v. 19, and with respect to ver. 12, Isa. iii. 8, the double play upon the sound of the words is unmistakable. By עֲצָה is meant the plan in accordance with which God governs, more particularly His final purpose, which lies at the basis of His leadings of Israel. Not only had they nullified this purpose of mercy by defiant resistance (הִקְרָה) against God's commandments (אִמְרֵי, Arabic awāmīr, āmīreh) on their part, but they had even blasphemed it; נִאָּץ, Deut. xxxii. 19, and frequently, or נָּאָץ (prop. to pierce, then to treat roughly), is an old Mosaic designation of blasphemy, Deut. xxxi. 20, Num. xiv. 11, 23, xvi. 30. Therefore God thoroughly humbled them by afflictive labour, and caused them to stumble (כָּשַׁל). But when they were driven to it, and prayed importunately to Him, He helped them out of their straits. The refrain varies according to recognised custom. Twice the expression is וַיַּעֲקוּ, twice וַיַּעֲקוּ; once וַיַּעֲלִים, then twice וַיַּשִּׁיעֵם, and last of all וַיַּצִּיאֵם, which follows here in ver. 14 as an alliteration. The summary condensation of the deliverance experienced (ver. 16) is moulded after Isa. xlv. 2. The Exile, too, may be regarded as such like a large jail (vid. e.g. Isa. xlii. 7, 22); but the descriptions of the poet are not pictures, but examples.

Vers. 17-22. Others were brought to the brink of the grave by severe sickness; but when they draw nigh in earnest prayer to Him who appointed that they should suffer thus on account of their sins, He became their Saviour. אָוִיל (cf. e.g. Job v. 3), like נֶבֶל (vid. xiv. 1), is also an ethical notion, and not confined to the idea of defective intellect merely. It is one who insanely lives only for the passing hour, and ruins health, calling, family, and in short himself and everything belonging to him. Those who were thus minded, the poet begins by saying, were obliged to suffer by reason of (in consequence of) their wicked course of life. The cause of their days of pain and sorrow is placed first by way of emphasis; and because it has a meaning that is related to the past יְהִעֲנֵי thereby comes all the more easily to express that which took place simultaneously in the past. The Hithpa. in 1 Kings ii. 26 signifies to suffer willingly or intentionally; here: to be obliged to submit to suffering against one's will. Hengstenberg, for example, construes it differently: "Fools because of their walk in transgression (more than 'because of their transgression'), and those who because of their iniquities were afflicted—all food," etc. But  $\text{וְ} \text{בְּ} \text{צַדִּיק}$  beside  $\text{וְ} \text{בְּ} \text{צַדִּיק}$  has the assumption in its favour of being an affirmation of the cause of the affliction. In ver. 18 the poet has the Book of Job (ch. xxxiii. 20, 22) before his eye. And in connection with ver. 20, ἀπέστειλεν τὸν λόγον αὐτοῦ καὶ ἴασατο αὐτούς (LXX.), no passage of the Old Testament is more vividly recalled to one's mind than cv. 19, even more than cxlvii. 18; because here, as in cv. 19, it treats of the intervention of divine acts within the sphere of human history, and not of the intervention of divine operations within the sphere of the natural world. In the natural world and in history the word ( $\text{רַב־בַּר}$ ) is God's messenger (cv. 19, cf. Isa. lv. 10 sq.), and appears here as a mediator of the divine healing. Here, as in Job xxxiii. 23 sq., the fundamental fact of the New Testament is announced, which Theodoret on this passage expresses in the words: Ὁ Θεὸς Λόγος ἐνανθρωπήσας καὶ ἀποσταλεὶς ὡς ἄνθρωπος τὰ παντοδαπὰ τῶν ψυχῶν ἴασατο τραύματα καὶ τοὺς διαφθαρέντας ἀνέββωσε λογισμούς. The LXX. goes on to render it: καὶ ἐββύσατο αὐτούς ἐκ τῶν διαφθορῶν αὐτῶν, inasmuch as the translators derive  $\text{בְּ} \text{צַדִּיק}$  from  $\text{בְּ} \text{צַדִּיק}$  (Dan. vi. 5), and this, as  $\text{בְּ} \text{צַדִּיק}$  elsewhere (vid. xvi. 10), from  $\text{בְּ} \text{צַדִּיק}$ , διαφθείρειν, which is approved by Hitzig. But Lam. iv. 20 is against this. From  $\text{בְּ} \text{צַדִּיק}$  is formed a noun  $\text{בְּ} \text{צַדִּיק}$  ( $\text{בְּ} \text{צַדִּיק}$ ) in the signification a hollow place (Prov. xxviii. 10), the collateral form of which,  $\text{בְּ} \text{צַדִּיק}$  ( $\text{בְּ} \text{צַדִּיק}$ ), is inflected like  $\text{בְּ} \text{צַדִּיק}$ , plur.  $\text{בְּ} \text{צַדִּיק}$  with a retention of the substantival termination. The "pits" are the deep afflictions into which they were plunged, and out of which God caused them to escape. The suffix of  $\text{בְּ} \text{צַדִּיק}$  avails also for  $\text{בְּ} \text{צַדִּיק}$ , as in Gen. xxvii. 5, xxx. 31, Ps. cxxxix. 1, Isa. xlvi. 5.

Vers. 23-32. Others have returned to tell of the perils of the sea. Without any allegory (Hengstenberg) it speaks of those who by reason of their calling traverse (which is expressed by  $\text{בְּ} \text{צַדִּיק}$  because the surface of the sea lies below the dry land which slopes off towards the coast) the sea in ships (read boonijoth without the article), and that not as fishermen, but (as Luther has correctly understood the choice of the word) in commercial enterprises. These have seen the works and wonders of God in the eddying deep, i.e. they have seen with their own eyes what God can do when in His anger He calls up the powers of nature, and on the other hand when He compassionately orders them back into their bounds. God's mandate (וַיֹּאמֶר as in cv. 31, 34) brought it to pass that a stormy wind arose (cf. עָמַר, xxxiii. 9), and it drove its (the sea's) waves on high, so that the seafarers at one time were tossed up to the sky and then hurled down again into deep abysses, and their soul melted בָּרָעָה, in an evil, anxious mood, i.e. lost all its firmness. They turned about in a circle (הִגְגּוּ from הִגָּה = הִגִּיג) and reeled after the manner of a drunken man; all their wisdom swallowed itself up, i.e. consumed itself within itself, came of itself to nought, just as Ovid, Trist. i. 2, says in connection with a similar description of a storm at sea: ambiguus ars stupet ipsa malis. The poet here writes under the influence of Isa. xix. 3, cf. 14. But at their importunate supplication God led them forth out of their distresses (xxv. 17). He turned the raging storm into a gentle blowing (= רָקַחַהּ רָקַחַהּ, 1 Kings xix. 12). הִקְיִם construed with לְ here has the sense of transporting (carrying over) into another condition or state, as Apollinaris renders: ἀντίκα δ' εἰς αὐρήν προτέρην μετέθηκε θύελλαν. The suffix of הִקְיִם cannot refer to the יָמִים רָקַחַהּ in ver. 23, which is so far removed; "their waves" are those with which they had to battle. These to their joy became calm (הִשְׁקַחַהּ) and were still (שָׁקַחַהּ as in Jonah i. 11), and God guided them εἰς λιμένα θελήματος αὐτῶν (LXX.). הִקְיִם, a hapax-legomenon, from حَا (حوز), to shut in on all sides and to draw to one's self (root حو, gyravit, in gyrum egit), signifies a place enclosed round, therefore a haven, and first of all perhaps a creek, to use a northern word, a fiord. The verb שָׁקַחַהּ in relation to הִשְׁקַחַהּ is the stronger word, like יָבִישׁ in relation to הִקְיִם in the history of the Flood. Those who have been thus marvellously rescued are then called upon thankfully to praise God their Deliverer in the place where the national church assembles, and where the chiefs of the nation sit in council; therefore, as it seems, in the Temple and in the Forum.\*

Now follow two more groups without the two beautiful and impressive refrains with which the four preceding groups are interspersed. The structure is less artistic, and the transitions here and there abrupt and awkward. One might say that these two groups are inferior to the rest, much as the speeches of Elihu are inferior to the rest of the Book of Job. That they are, however, nevertheless from the hand of the very same poet is at once seen from the continued dependence upon the Book of Job and Isaiah. Hengstenberg sees in vers. 33-42 "the song with which they exalt the Lord in the assembly of the people and upon the seat of the elders." But the materia laudis is altogether different from that which is to be expected according to the preceding calls to praise. Nor is it any the more clear to us that vers. 33 sq. refer to the overthrow of Babylon, and vers. 35 sqq. to the happy turn of affairs that took place simultaneously for Israel; ver. 35 does not suit Canaan, and the expressions in vers. 36 sq. would be understood in too low a sense. No, the poet goes on further to illustrate the helpful government of God the just and gracious One, inasmuch as he has experiences in his mind in connection therewith, of which the dispersion of Israel in all places can sing and speak.

Vers. 33-38. Since in ver. 36 the historical narration is still continued, a meaning relating to the cotemporaneous past is also retrospectively given to the two correlative יָשָׁם. It now goes on to tell what those who have now returned have observed and experienced in their own case. Ver. 33a sounds like Isa. l. 2b; ver. 33b like Isa. xxxv. 7a; and ver. 35 takes its rise from Isa. xli. 18b. The juxtaposition of מִצְרַיִם and מִצְרָאֵן, since Deut. viii. 15, belongs to the favourite antithetical alliterations, e.g. Isa. lxi. 3. מִלְחָה, that which is salty (LXX. cf. Sir. xxxix. 23: ἄλμη), is, as in Job xxxix. 6, the name for the uncultivated, barren steppe. A land that has been laid waste for the punishment of its inhabitants has very often been changed into flourishing fruitful fields under the hands of a poor and grateful generation; and very often a land that has hitherto lain uncultivated and to all appearance absolutely unprofitable has developed an unexpected fertility. The exiles to whom Jeremiah writes, ch. xxix. 5: Build ye houses and settle down, and plant gardens and eat their fruit, may frequently have experienced this divine blessing. Their industry and their knowledge also did their part, but looked at in a right light, it was not their own work but God's work that their settlement prospered, and that they continually spread themselves wider and possessed a not small, i.e. (cf. 2 Kings iv. 3) a very large, stock of cattle.

Vers. 39-43. But it also came to pass that it went ill with them, inasmuch as their flourishing prosperous condition drew down upon them the envy of the powerful and tyrannical; nevertheless God put an end to tyranny, and always brought His people again to honour and strength. Hitzig is of opinion that ver. 39 goes back into the time when things were different with those who, according to vers. 36-38, had thriven. The modus consecutivus is sometimes used thus retrospectively (vid. Isa. xxxvii. 5); here, however, the symmetry of the continuation from vers. 36-38, and the change which is expressed in ver. 39a in comparison with ver. 38b, require an actual consecution in that which is narrated. They became few and came down, were reduced (חָשַׁח, cf. Prov. xiv. 19: to come to ruin, or to be overthrown), a coarctatione malitiæ et mæroris. עָצַר is the restraint of despotic rule, רָעָה the evil they had to suffer under such restraint, and גָּנַן sorrow, which consumed their life. מַעְצָר has Tarcha and רַעָה Munach (instead of Mercha and Mugrash, vid. Accentuationssystem, xviii. 2). There is no reason for departing from this interpunction and rendering: "through tyranny, evil, and sorrow." What is stiff and awkward in the progress of the description arises from the fact that ver. 40 is borrowed from Job xii. 21, 24, and that the poet is not willing to make any change in these sublime words. The version shows how we think the relation of the clauses is to be apprehended. Whilst He pours out His wrath upon tyrants in the contempt of men that comes upon them, and makes them fugitives who lose themselves in the terrible waste, He raises the needy and those hitherto despised and ill-treated on high out of the depth of their affliction, and makes families like a flock, i.e. makes their families so increase, that they come to have the appearance of a merrily gamboling and numerous flock. Just as this figure points back to Job xxi. 11, so ver. 42 is made up out of Job xxii. 19, v. 16. The sight of this act of recognition on the part of God of those who have been wrongfully oppressed gives joy to the upright, and all roguery (עֲלִיָּהּ, vid. xcii. 16) has its mouth closed, i.e. its boastful insolence is once for all put to silence. In ver. 43 the poet makes the strains of his Psalm die away after the example of Hosea, ch. xiv. 10 [9], in the nota bene expressed after the manner of a question: Who is wise—he will or let him keep this, i.e. bear it well in mind. The transition to the jussive together with a change of number is rendered natural by the fact that מִי הַכֵּם, as in Hos. loc. cit. (cf. Jer. ix. 11, Esth. v. 6, and without Waw apod. Judg. vii. 3, Prov. ix. 4, 16), is equivalent to quisquis sapiens est. 'הַסְּרִי הַסְּרִי ה' are the manifestations of mercy or loving-kindness in which God's ever-enduring mercy unfolds itself in history. He who is wise has a good memory for and a clear understanding of this.

PSALM CVIII.

TWO ELOHIMIC FRAGMENTS BROUGHT TOGETHER.

- 2 CONFIDENT is my heart, Elohim,
I will sing and play upon the harp,
Yea, this shall my glory do.
- 3 Awake up, O harp and cithern,
I will awake the morning dawn!
- 4 I will praise Thee among the peoples, Jahve,
And praise Thee upon the harp among the nations.
- 5 For great beyond the heavens is Thy mercy, Elohim,
And unto the clouds Thy truth.
- 6 Oh show Thyself exalted above the heavens, Elohim,
And above the whole earth Thy glory!
- 7 In order that Thy beloved may be delivered—
Save now with Thy right hand and answer me!
- 8 Elohim hath promised in His holiness:

- I shall rejoice, I shall portion out Shechem,
 And measure out the valley of Succoth.
- 9 Mine is Gilead, mine Manasseh,
 And Ephraim is the helm of my head,
 Judah is my sceptre,
- 10 Moab is my wash-pot,
 Upon Edom I cast my shoe,
 Over Philistia I shout for joy.
- 11 Who will conduct me to the fortified city,
 Who will bring me to Edom?!
- 12 Hast not Thou, Elohim, cast us off,
 And goest not forth, Elohim, with our armies?—
- 13 Grant us deliverance from the oppressor,
 Yea, vain is the help of man.
- 14 In Elohim shall we obtain the victory,
 And HE will tread down our oppressors.

The זִרְזָרָה in ver. 4 and the whole contents of this Psalm is the echo to the הוֹדֵי of the preceding Psalm. It is inscribed a Psalm-song by David, but only because it is compiled out of ancient Davidic materials. The fact of the absence of the לְמִנְצָה makes it natural to suppose that it is of later origin. Two Davidic Psalm-pieces in the Elohimic style are here, with trifling variations, just put together, not soldered together, and taken out of their original historical connection. That a poet like David would thus compile a third out of two of his own songs (Hengstenberg) is not conceivable.

Vers. 2-6. This first half is taken from Ps. lvii. 8-12. The repetition of confident is my heart in Ps. lvii. is here omitted; and in place of it the "my glory" of the exclamation, awake my glory, is taken up to "I will sing and will harp" as a more minute definition of the subject (vid. on iii. 5): He will do it, yea, his soul with all its godlike powers shall do it. Jahve in ver. 4 is transformed out of the Adonaj; and Waw copul. is inserted both before ver. 4*b* and ver. 6*b*, contrary to Ps. lvii. לְמַעַן, ver. 5*a* (as in Esth. iii. 1), would be a pleasing change for עַד if ver. 5*a* followed 5*b* and the definition of magnitude did not retrograde instead of heightening. Moreover xxxvi. 6, Jer. li. 9 (cf. על in cxiii. 4, cxlviii. 13) favour  $\psi$  in opposition to מעל.

Vers. 7-14. Ps. lx. 7-14 forms this second half. The clause expressing the purpose with לְמַעַן, as in its original, has the following הוֹשִׁיעָהּ for its principal clause upon which it depends. Instead of וְעֲנִינִי, which one might have expected, the expression used here is וְעֲנִינִי without any interchange of the mode of writing and of reading it; many printed copies have וְעֲנִינִי here also; Baer, following Norzi, correctly has וְעֲנִינִי. Instead of וְלִי . . . וְלִי, lx. 9, we here read לִי . . . לִי, which is less soaring. And instead of Cry aloud concerning me, O Philistia (the plaintive cry of the vanquished), it here is, Over Philistia do I shout for joy (the triumphant cry of the victor); in accordance with which Hupfeld wishes to take הִתְרוֹעֵעִי in the former as infinitive: "over (עָלִי instead of עָלִי) Philistia is my shouting for joy" (הִתְרוֹעֵעִי instead of הִתְרוֹעֵעִי, since the infinitive does not admit of this pausal form of the imperative). For עֵיר מְצוֹר we have here the more usual form of expression עֵיר מְבַצֵּר. Ver. 12a is weakened by the omission of the אֶתָּה (הֵלֵא).

PSALM CIX.

IMPRECATION UPON THE CURSER WHO PREFERS THE CURSE TO THE BLESSING.

- 1 GOD of my praise, be not silent!
- 2 For a wicked mouth and a deceitful mouth have they opened against me,
They have spoken against me with a lying tongue,
- 3 And with animosities have they surrounded me
And fought against me without cause.
- 4 For my love they make themselves hostile to me,
Whilst I am all prayer;
- 5 And have requited me with evil for good,
And with hatred for my love.
- 6 Set Thou a wicked man over him,
And let Satan stand at his right hand:

- 7 If he is judged, let him come off as a wicked man,
And let his prayer become sin.
- 8 Let his days be few,
His office let another take.
- 9 Let his children become orphans,
And his wife a widow,
- 10 And let his children wander to and fro begging,
And let them entreat far from their ruins.
- 11 Let the creditor surround with snares all that he hath,
And let strangers spoil what his labour hath gained.
- 12 Let there be no one to continue kindness to him,
And let no one bestow [anything] upon his orphans.
- 13 Let his posterity be rooted out,
In the next generation let their name be blotted out.
- 14 Let the guilt of his fathers be remembered with Jahve,
And let the sin of his mother not be blotted out,
- 15 Let them be always before Jahve,
And may He cut off their memory from the earth.
- 16 Because he hath not remembered to show kindness,
And hath persecuted a man wretched and poor,
And terrified of heart, to put him to death.
- 17 He hath loved the curse, and it hath come upon him ;
And he delighted not in blessing, and it remained far from him.
- 18 He clothed himself in cursing as his garment,
And it pressed like water into his bowels,
And like oil into his bones.
- 19 So let it become unto him as a coat in which he covereth himself,
And as a girdle which he continually putteth on.
- 20 This is the reward of mine adversaries from Jahve,
And of those who speak evil concerning my soul.
- 21 But do THOU, Jahve Lord, act for me for Thy Name's sake ;
Because Thy loving-kindness is good, deliver Thou me !
- 22 For I am wretched and poor,
And my heart is pierced within me.

- 23 As a shadow, when it lengtheneth, am I gone,
I am scared away as a locust.
- 24 My knees knock together through fasting,
And my flesh is fallen away from fatness.
- 25 And I am become a reproach to them,
They see me, they shake their head.
- 26 Succour me, Jahve my God,
Help me according to Thy loving-kindness,
- 27 That they may know that this is Thy hand,
Thou, Jahve, hast done it.
- 28 They curse, but THOU blessest ;
They arise and are ashamed, and Thy servant is glad.
- 29 Mine adversaries shall clothe themselves with reproach,
And envelope themselves as with a mantle with their own shame.
- 30 I will give thanks greatly unto Jahve with my mouth,
And in the midst of many will I praise Him,
- 31 That He placeth Himself at the right hand of the poor,
To help him against the judges of his soul.

The אִוְרָה, corresponding like an echo to the הוֹרֵר of Ps. cvii., is also found here in ver. 30. But Ps. cix. is most closely related to Ps. lxix. Anger concerning the ungodly who requite love with ingratitude, who persecute innocence and desire the curse instead of the blessing, has here reached its utmost bound. The imprecations are not, however, directed against a multitude as in Ps. lxix., but their whole current is turned against one person. Is this Doeg the Edomite, or Cush the Benjamite? We do not know. The marks of Jeremiah's hand, which raised a doubt about the לָרֹר of Ps. lxix., are wanting here; and if the development of the thoughts appears too diffuse and overloaded to be suited to David, and also many expressions (as the inflected מַעֲט in ver. 8, the נִכְאָה, which is explained by the Syriac, in ver. 16, and the half-passive חָלַל in ver. 22) look as though they belong to the later period of the language, yet we feel on the other hand the absence of any certain echoes of older models. For in the parallels ver. 6, cf. Zech. iii. 1, and vers. 18, 29*b*, cf. Isa. lix. 17, it is surely not the mutual relationship but the priority that is doubtful; ver. 22, however, in relation to lv. 5 (cf. ver. 4 with lv. 5) is a variation such as is also allowable in one and the same poet (e.g. in the refrains). The anathemas that are here poured forth more extensively than anywhere else speak in favour of David, or at least of his situation. They are explained by the depth of David's consciousness that he is the anointed of Jahve, and by his contemplation of himself in Christ. The persecution of David was a sin not only against David himself, but also against the Christ in him; and because Christ is in David, the outbursts of the Old Testament wrathful spirit take the prophetic form, so that this Psalm also, like Ps. xxii. and lxix., is a typically prophetic Psalm, inasmuch as the utterance of the type concerning himself is carried by the Spirit of prophecy beyond himself, and thus the ἀρὰ is raised to the προφητεία ἐν εἶδει ἀρᾶς (Chrysostom). These imprecations are not, however, appropriate in the mouth of the suffering Saviour. It is not the spirit of Zion but of Sinai which here speaks out of the mouth of David; the spirit of Elias, which, according to Luke ix. 55, is not the spirit of the New Testament. This wrathful spirit is overpowered in the New Testament by the spirit of love. But these anathemas are still not on this account so many beatings of the air. There is in them a divine energy, as in the blessing and cursing of every man who is united to God, and more especially of a man whose temper of mind is such as David's. They possess the same power as the prophetic threatenings, and in this sense they are regarded in the New Testament as fulfilled in the son of perdition (John xvii. 12). To the generation of the time of Jesus they were a deterrent warning not to offend against the Holy One of God, and this Psalmus Ischarioticus (Acts i. 20) will ever be such a mirror of warning to the enemies and persecutors of Christ and His Church.

Vers. 1-5. A sigh for help and complaints of ungrateful persecutors form the beginning of the Psalm. "God of my praise" is equivalent to God, who art my praise, Jer. xvii. 14, cf. Deut. x. 21. The God whom the Psalmist has hitherto had reason to praise will also now show Himself to him as worthy to be praised. Upon this faith he bases the prayer: be not silent (xxviii. 1, xxxv. 22)! A mouth such as belongs to the "wicked," a mouth out of which comes "deceit," have they opened against him; they have spoken with him a tongue (accusative, vid. on lxiv. 6), i.e. a language, of falsehood. דְּבַרֵי of things and utterances as in xxxv. 20. It would be capricious to take the suffix of אֶהְבֶּנְתִּי in ver. 4 as genit. object. (love which they owe me), and in ver. 5 as genit. subject.; from xxxviii. 21 it may be seen that the love which he has shown to them is also meant in ver. 4. The assertion that he is "prayer" is intended to say that he, repudiating all revenge of himself, takes refuge in God in prayer and commits his cause into His hands. They have loaded him with evil for good, and hatred for the love he has shown to them. Twice he lays emphasis on the fact that it is love which they have requited to him with its opposite. Perfects alternate with aorists: it is no enmity of yesterday; the imprecations that follow presuppose an inflexible obduracy on the side of the enemies.

Vers. 6-10. The writer now turns to one among the many, and in the angry zealous fervour of despised love calls down God's judgment upon him. To call down a higher power, more particularly for punishment, upon any one is expressed by עַל פְּקֹד (הַפְּקִיד) Jer. xv. 3, Lev. xxvi. 16. The tormentor of innocence shall find a superior executor who will bring him before the tribunal (which is expressed in Latin by legis actio per manus injectionem). The judgment scene in vers. 6*b*, 7*a* shows that this is what is intended in ver. 6*a*: At the right hand is the place of the accuser, who in this instance will not rest before the dannatus es has been pronounced. He is called אֲשֶׁר, which is not to be understood here after 1 Sam. xxix. 4, 2 Sam. xix. 23 [22], but after Zech. iii. 1, 1 Chron. xxi. 1, if not directly of Satan, still of a superhuman (cf. Num. xxii. 22) being which opposes him, by appearing before God as his κατήγορος; for according to ver. 7*a* the אֲשֶׁר is to be thought of as accuser, and according to 7*b* God as Judge. אֲשֶׁר has the sense of reus, and אֲשֶׁר refers to the publication of the sentence. Ver. 7*b* wishes that his prayer, viz. that by which he would wish to avert the divine sentence of condemnation, may become אֶחָדָה, not: a missing of the mark, i.e. ineffectual ('Thenius), but, according to the usual signification of the word: a sin, viz. because it proceeds from despair, not from true penitence. In ver. 8 the incorrigible one is wished an untimely death (מַעֲטִים) as in one other instance only, Eccles. v. 1) and the loss of his office. The LXX. renders: τὴν ἐπισκοπὴν αὐτοῦ λάβοι ἕτερος. פקידה really signifies the office of overseer, oversight, office, and the one individual must have held a prominent position among the enemies of the psalmist. Having died off from this position before his time, he shall leave behind him a family deeply reduced in circumstances, whose former dwelling-place—he was therefore wealthy—becomes “ruins.” His children wander up and down far from these ruins (בן as e.g. in Judg. v. 11, Job xxviii. 4) and beg (דַּרְשׁוּ, like προσαιτεῖν, ἐπαιτεῖν, Sir. xl. 28 = בַּקֵּשׁ לָחֶם, xxxvii. 25). Instead of דַּרְשׁוּ the reading דַּרְשׁוּ is also found. A Poel is now and then formed from the strong verbs also,* in the inflexion of which the Cholem is sometimes shortened to Kametz chatuph; vid. the forms of לָשׁוֹן, to slander, in ci. 5, תִּיאַר, to sketch, mark out in outline, Isa. xliv. 13, cf. also Job xx. 26 (תִּיאַרְלָהוּ) and Isa. lxii. 9 (according to the reading מִאֲסַפֵּי). To read the Kametz in these instances as ā, and to regard these forms as resolved Piels, is, in connection with the absence of the Metheg, contrary to the meaning of the pointing; on purpose to guard against this way of reading it, correct codices have דַּרְשׁוּ (cf. lxix. 19), which Baer has adopted.

Vers. 11-15. The Piel נִקַּשׁ properly signifies to catch in snares; here, like the Arabic نَقَشَ, II., IV., corresponding to the Latin obligare (as referring to the creditor's right of claim); נִשֶּׂה is the name for the creditor as he who gives time for payment, gives credit (vid. Isa. xxiv. 2). In ver. 12 מְשֹׁךְ הַסֵּךְ, to draw out mercy, is equivalent to causing it to continue and last, xxxvi. 11, cf. Jer. xxxi. 3. אֲחֻרֵיתוֹ, ver. 13a, does not signify his future, but as ver. 13b (cf. xxxvii. 38) shows: his posterity. יְהִי לְהַכְרִית is not merely excindatur, but excindenda sit (Ezek. xxx. 16, cf. Josh. ii. 6), just as in other instances לְהִיב corresponds to the active fut. periphrasticum, e.g. Gen. xv. 12, Isa. xxxvii. 26. With reference to יִפַּח instead of יִפְחָ (contracted from יִפְחָה), vid. Ges. § 75, rem. 8. A Jewish acrostic interpretation of the name ישׁוּ runs: יִמַּח שְׁמוֹ וְזָכְרוֹ. This curse shall overtake the family of the υἱὸς τῆς ἀπωλείας. All the sins of his parents and ancestors shall remain indelible above before God the Judge, and here below the race, equally guilty, shall be rooted out even to its memory, i.e. to the last trace of it.

* In connection with the strong verb it frequently represents the Piel which does not occur, as with דַּרְשׁוּ, לָשׁוֹן, שִׁפַּט, or even represents the Piel which, as in the case of שָׁרַשׁ, is already made use of in another signification (Piel, to root out; Poel, to take root).

Vers. 16-20. He whom he persecuted with a thirst for blood, was, apart from this, a great sufferer, bowed down and poor and נִכְאָה לֵבָב, of terrified, confounded heart. LXX. κατανευγμένον (Jerome, compunctum); but the stem-word is not נכא (נכה), root נך (vol. i. 425), but נָאָה, Syriac ܢܐܘܗ, cogn. נָאָה, to cause to come near, to meet. The verb, and more especially in Niph., is proved to be Hebrew by Dan. xi. 30. Such an one who without anything else is of a terrified heart, inasmuch as he has been made to feel the wrath of God most keenly, this man has persecuted with a deadly hatred. He had experienced kindness (הִקָּר) in a high degree, but he blotted out of his memory that which he had experienced, not for an instant imagining that he too on his part had to exercise הִקָּר. The Poel מוֹתָה instead of הִמִּיתָ points to the agonizing death (Isa. liii. 9, cf. Ezek. xxviii. 10 מוֹתֵי) to which he exposes God's anointed. The fate of the shedder of blood is not expressed after the manner of a wish in vers. 16-18, but in the historical form, as being the result that followed of inward necessity from the matter of fact of the course which he had himself determined upon. The verb בּוֹא seq. acc. signifies to surprise, suddenly attack any one, as in Isa. xli. 25. The three figures in ver. 18 are climactic: he has clothed himself in cursing, he has drunk it in like water (Job xv. 16, xxxiv. 7), it has penetrated even to the marrow of his bones, like the oily preparations which are rubbed in and penetrate to the bones. In ver. 19 the emphasis rests upon יַעֲפִיָה and upon הִמִּיר. The summarizing ver. 20 is the close of a strophe. פְּעֻלָּה, an earned reward, here punishment incurred, is especially frequent in Isa. ch. xl.-lxvi., e.g. xlix. 4, xl. 10; it also occurs once even in the Tōra, Lev. xix. 13. Those who answer the loving acts of the righteous with such malevolence in word and in deed commit a satanic sin for which there is no forgiveness. The curse is the fruit of their own choice and deed. Arnobius: Nota ex arbitrio evenisse ut nollet, propter hæresim, quæ dicit Deum alios prædestinasse ad benedictionem, alios ad maledictionem.

Vers. 21-25. The thunder and lightning are now as it were followed by a shower of tears of deep sorrowful complaint. Ps. cix. here just as strikingly accords with Ps. lxi., as Ps. lxi. does with Ps. xxii. in the last strophe but one. The twofold name Jahve Adonaj (vid. Symbolæ, p. 16) corresponds to the deep-breathed complaint. עֲשֵׂה לִּי אֲזִי, deal with me, i.e. succouring me, does not greatly differ from לִי in 1 Sam. xiv. 6. The confirmation, ver. 21*b*, runs like lxi. 17: Thy loving-kindness is טוֹב, absolutely good, the ground of everything that is good and the end of all evil. Hitzig conjectures, as in lxi. 17, בְּטוֹב חֶסֶדְךָ, "according to the goodness of Thy loving-kindness;" but this formula is without example: "for Thy loving-kindness is good" is a statement of the motive placed first and corresponding to the "for Thy Name's sake." In ver. 22 (a variation of lv. 5) חָלַל, not חָלַח, is traditional; this חָלַל, as being verb. denom. from חָלַח, signifies to be pierced, and is therefore equivalent to חוּלַל (cf. Luke ii. 35). The metaphor of the shadow in ver. 23 is as in cii. 12. When the day declines, the shadow lengthens, it becomes longer and longer (Virgil, majoresque cadunt altis de montibus umbræ), till it vanishes in the universal darkness. Thus does the life of the sufferer pass away. The poet intentionally uses the Niph. נִהַלְכֵתִי (another reading is נִהַלְכֵתִי); it is a power rushing upon him from without that drives him away thus after the manner of a shadow into the night. The locust or grasshopper (apart from the plague of the locusts) is proverbial as being a defenceless, inoffensive little creature that is soon driven away, Job xxxix. 20. נִנְעַר, to be shaken out or off (cf. Arabic na'ûra, a water-wheel that fills its clay-vessels in the river and empties them out above, and הִנְעַר, Zech. xi. 16, where Hitzig wishes to read הִנְעַר, dispulsio = dispulsi). The fasting in ver. 24 is the result of the loathing of all food which sets in with deep grief. כָּחַשׁ מִשֶּׁבֶן signifies to waste away so that there is no more fat left.* In ver. 25 אֲנִי is designedly rendered prominent: in this the form of his affliction he is the butt of their reproaching, and they shake their heads doubtfully, looking upon him as one who is punished of God beyond all hope, and giving him up for lost. It is to be interpreted thus after lxix. 11 sq.

* The verbal group כָּחַשׁ, כָּחַד, כָּחַד, כָּחַד, etc. has the primary signification of withdrawal and taking away or decrease; to deny is the same as to withdraw from agreement, and he becomes thin from whom the fat

Vers. 26-31. The cry for help is renewed in the closing strophe, and the Psalm draws to a close very similarly to Ps. lxix. and xxii., with a joyful prospect of the end of the affliction. In ver. 27 the hand of God stands in contrast to accident, the work of men, and his own efforts. All and each one will undeniably perceive, when God at length interposes, that it is His hand which here does that which was impossible in the eyes of men, and that it is His work which has been accomplished in this affliction and in the issue of it. He blesses him whom men curse: they arise without attaining their object, whereas His servant can rejoice in the end of his affliction. The futures in ver. 29 are not now again imprecations, but an expression of believably confident hope. In correct texts בְּמַעַל has Mem raphatum. The "many" are the "congregation" (vid. xxii. 23). In the case of the marvellous deliverance of this sufferer the congregation or church has the pledge of its own deliverance, and a bright mirror of the loving-kindness of its God. The sum of the praise and thanksgiving follows in ver. 31, where וְ signifies quod, and is therefore allied to the ὄτι recitativum (cf. xxii. 25). The three Good Friday Psalms all sum up the comfort that springs from David's affliction for all suffering ones in just such a pithy sentence (xxii. 25, lxix. 34). Jalive comes forward at the right hand of the poor, contending for him (cf. cx. 5), to save (him) from those who judge (xxxvii. 33), i.e. condemn, his soul. The contrast between this closing thought and vers. 6 sq. is unmistakable. At the right hand of the tormentor stands Satan as an accuser, at the right hand of the tormented one stands God as his vindicator; he who delivered him over to human judges is condemned, and he who was delivered up is "taken away out of distress and from judgment" (Isa. liii. 8) by the Judge of the judges, in order that, as we now hear in the following withdraws, goes away. Saadia compares on this passage בְּהֵמָה (פָּרָה) כְּחֹשֶׁת, a lean cow, Berachoth 32a. In like manner Targum II. renders Gen. xli. 27 תֹּרְתָא כְּחֵישְׁתָּא, the lean kine.

PSALM CX.

TO THE PRIEST-KING AT THE RIGHT HAND OF GOD.

1 THE oracle of Jahve unto my Lord :

“ Sit thou at My right hand,
 Until I make thine enemies
 The stool of thy feet.”

2 The sceptre of thy might

Will Jahve stretch forth out of Zion :

“ Rule thou in the midst of thine enemies !”

3 Thy people are most willing on thy field-day ;

In holy festive garments,

Out of the womb of the morning's dawn

Cometh the dew of thy young men.

4 Jahve hath sworn and will not repent :

“ Thou shalt be a priest for ever

After the manner of Melchizedek.”

*

5 The Lord at thy right hand

Dasheth kings in pieces in the day of His wrath,

6 He shall judge among the nations,

It becometh full of corpses.

He dasheth in pieces a head upon a broad country ;

7 Of the brook in the way shall he drink,

Therefore shall he lift up the head on high.

While the Pharisees were gathered together, Jesus asked them : What think ye of Christ ? Whose Son is He ? They say unto Him : David's. He saith unto them : How then doth David in the spirit call Him Lord, saying : “ The LORD hath said unto my Lord : Sit Thou on My right hand until I make Thine enemies the stool of Thy feet ? ” If David then calls Him Lord, how is He his Son ? And no man was able to answer Him a word, neither durst any one from that day forth question Him further.

So we read in Matt. xxii. 41–46, Mark xii. 35–37, Luke xx. 41–44. The inference which it is left for the Pharisees to draw rests upon the two premises, which are granted, that Ps. cx. is Davidic, and that it is prophetic-Messianic, i.e. that in it the future Messiah stands objectively before the mind of David. For if those who were interrogated had been able to reply that David does not there speak of the future Messiah, but puts into the mouth of the people words concerning himself, or, as Hofmann has now modified the view he formerly held (Schriftbeweis, ii. 1, 496–500), concerning the Davidic king in a general way,* then the question would lack the background of cogency as an argument. Since, however, the pro-

Supplementary Note.—Von Hofmann now interprets Ps. cx. as prophetic-Messianic. We are glad to be able to give it in his own words. “As the utterance of a prophet who speaks the word of God to the person addressed, the Psalm begins, and this it is then all through, even where it does not, as in ver. 4, expressly make known to the person addressed what God swears to him. God intends to finally subdue his foes to him. Until then, until his day of victory is come, he shall have a dominion in the midst of them, the sceptre of which shall be mighty through the succour of God. His final triumph is, however, pledged to him by the word of God, which appoints him, as another Melchizedek, to an eternal priesthood, that excludes the priesthood of Aaron, and by the victory which God has already given him in the day of His wrath.

phetic-Messianic character of the Psalm was acknowledged at that time (even as the later synagogue, in spite of the dilemma into which this Psalm brought it in opposition to the church, has never been able entirely to avoid this confession), the conclusion to be drawn from this Psalm must have been felt by the Pharisees themselves, that the Messiah, because the Son of David and Lord at the same time, was of human and at the same time of superhuman nature; that it was therefore in accordance with Scripture if this Jesus, who represented Himself to be the predicted Christ, should as such profess to be the Son of God and of divine nature.

The New Testament also assumes elsewhere that David in this Psalm speaks not of himself, but directly of Him, in whom the Davidic kingship should finally and for ever fulfil that of which the promise speaks. For ver. 1 is regarded elsewhere too as a prophecy of the exaltation of Christ at the right hand of the Father, and of His final victory over all His enemies: Acts ii. 34 sq., 1 Cor. xv. 25, Heb. i. 13, x. 13; and the Epistle to the Hebrews (ch. v. 6, vii. 17, 21) bases its demonstration of the abrogation of the Levitical priesthood by the Melchizedek priesthood of Jesus Christ upon ver. 4. But if even David, who raised the Levitical priesthood to the pinnacle of splendour that had never existed before, was a priest after the manner of Melchizedek, it is not intelligible how the priesthood of Jesus Christ after the manner of Melchizedek is meant to be a proof in favour of the termination of the Levitical priesthood, and to absolutely preclude its continuance.

We will not therefore deceive ourselves concerning the apprehension of the Psalm which is presented to us in the New Testament Scriptures. According to the New Testament Scriptures, David speaks in Ps. cx. not merely of Christ in so far as the Spirit of God has directed him to speak of the Anointed of Jahve in a typical form, but directly and objectively in a prophetic representation of the Future One. And would this be impossible? Certainly there is no other Psalm in which David distinguishes between himself and the Messiah, and has the latter before him: the other Messianic Psalms of David are reflections of his radical, ideal contemplation of himself, reflected images of his own typical history; they contain prophetic elements, because David there too speaks év πνεύματι, but elements that are not solved by the person of David. Nevertheless the last words of David in 2 Sam. xxiii. 1-7 prove to us that we need not be surprised to find even a directly Messianic Psalm coming from his lips. After the splendour of all that pertained to David individually had almost entirely expired in his own eyes and in the eyes of those about him, he must have been still more strongly conscious of the distance between what had been realized in himself and the idea of the Anointed of God, as he lay on his death-bed, as his sun was going down. Since, however, all the glory with which God has favoured him comes up once more before his soul, he feels himself, to the glory of God, to be "the man raised up on high, the anointed of the God of Jacob, the sweet singer of Israel," and the instrument of the Spirit of Jahve. This he has been, and he, who as such contemplated himself as the immortal one, must now die: then in dying he seizes the pillars of the divine promise, he lets go the ground of his own present, and looks as a prophet into the future of his seed: The God of Israel hath said, to me hath the Rock of Israel spoken: "A ruler of men, a just one, a ruler in the fear of God; and as the light of the morning, when the sun riseth, a cloudless morning, when after sunshine, after rain it becomes green out of the earth." For not little (צֶדֶק to be explained according to Job ix. 35, cf. Num. xiii. 33, Isa. li. 6) is my house with God, but an everlasting covenant hath He made with me, one ordered in all things and sure, for all my salvation and all my favour—ought He not to cause it to sprout? The idea of the Messiah shall notwithstanding be realized, in accordance with the promise, within his own house. The vision of the future which passes before his soul is none other than the picture of the Messiah detached from its subjectivity. And if so there, why may it not also have been so even in Ps. cx.?

The fact that Ps. cx. has points of connection with cotemporary history is notwithstanding the less to be denied, as its position in the Fifth Book leads one to suppose that it is taken out of its cotemporary annalistic connection. The first of these connecting links is the bringing of the Ark home to Zion. Girded with the linen ephod of the priest, David had accompanied the Ark up to Zion with signs of rejoicing. There upon Zion Jahve, whose earthly throne is the Ark, now took

His place at the side of David; but, spiritually considered, the matter stood properly thus, that Jahve, when He established Himself upon Zion, granted to David to sit henceforth enthroned at His side. The second connecting link is the victorious termination of the Syro-Ammonitish war, and also of the Edomitish war that came in between. The war with the Ammonites and their allies, the greatest, longest, and most glorious of David's wars, ended in the second year, when David himself joined the army, with the conquest of Rabbah. These two cotemporary connecting links are to be recognised, but they only furnish the Psalm with the typical ground-colour for its prophetic contents.

In this Psalm David looks forth from the height upon which Jahve has raised him by the victory over Ammon into the future of his seed, and there He who carries forward the work begun by him to the highest pitch is his Lord. 'Over against this King of the future, David is not king, but subject. He calls him, as one out of the people, "my Lord." This is the situation of the prophetic-kingly poet. He has received new revelations concerning the future of his seed. He has come down from his throne and the height of his power, and looks up to the Future One. He too sits enthroned on Zion. He too is victorious from thence. But His fellowship with God is the most intimate imaginable, and the last enemy is also laid at His feet. And He is not merely king, who as a priest provides for the salvation of His people, He is an eternal Priest by virtue of a sworn promise. The Psalm therefore relates to the history of the future upon a typical ground-work. It is also explicable why the triumph in the case of Ammon and the Messianic image have been thus to David's mind disconnected from himself. In the midst of that war comes the sin of David, which cast a shadow of sorrow over the whole of his future life and reduced its typical glory to ashes. Out of these ashes the phoenix of Messianic prophecy here arises. The type, come back to the conscious of himself, here lays down his crown at the feet of the Antitype.

Ps. cx. consists of three sevens, a tetrastich together with a tristich following three times upon one another. The Rebia magnum in ver. 2 is a security for this stichic division, and in like manner the Olewjored by  $\text{וְיִלְכָּד}$  in ver. 3, and in general the interpunction required by the sense. And vers. 1 and 2 show decisively that it is to be thus divided into 4 + 3 lines; for ver. 1 with its rhyming inflexions makes itself known as a tetrastich, and to take it together with ver. 2 as a heptastich is opposed by the new turn which the Psalm takes in ver. 2. It is also just the same with ver. 4 in relation to ver. 3: these seven stichs stand in just the same organic relation to the second divine utterance as the preceding seven to the first utterance. And since vers. 1-4 give twice 4 + 3 lines, vers. 5-7 also will be organized accordingly. There are really seven lines, of which the fifth, contrary to the Masoretic division of the verse, forms with ver. 7 the final tristich.

The Psalm therefore bears the threefold impress of the number seven, which is the number of an oath and of a covenant. Its impress, then, is thoroughly prophetic. Two divine utterances are introduced, and that not such as are familiar to us from the history of David and only reproduced here in a poetic form, as with Ps. lxxxix. and cxxxii., but utterances of which nothing is known from the history of David, and such as we hear for the first time here. The divine name Jahve occurs three times. God is designedly called Adonaj the fourth time. The Psalm is consequently prophetic; and in order to bring the inviolable and mysterious nature even of its contents into comparison with the contemplation of its outward character, it has been organized as a threefold septiad, which is sealed with the thrice recurring tetragramma.

Vers. 1, 2. In Ps. xx. and xxi. we see at once in the openings that what we have before us is the language of the people concerning their king. Here לַאֲדֹנָי in ver. 1 does not favour this, and אֲדֹנָי is decidedly against it. The former does not favour it, for it is indeed correct that the subject calls his king "my lord," e.g. 1 Sam. xxii. 12, although the more exact form of address is "my lord the king," e.g. 1 Sam. xxiv. 9 [8]; but if the people are speaking here, what is the object of the title of honour being expressed as if coming from the mouth of an individual, and why not rather, as in Ps. xx., xxi., לַאֲדֹנָי or לַאֲדֹנָיו? אֲדֹנָי is, however, decisive against the supposition that it is an Israelite who here expresses himself concerning the relation of his king to Jahve. For it is absurd to suppose that an Israelite speaking in the name of the people would begin in the manner of the prophets with אֲנִי, more particularly since this 'ה אֲנִי placed thus at the head of the discourse is without any perfectly analogous example (1 Sam. ii. 30, Isa. i. 24 are only similar) elsewhere, and is therefore extremely important. In general this opening position of אֲנִי, even in cases where other genitives than יהוה follow, is very rare; אֲנִי is found besides, so placed, only in the mouth of Balaam in Num. xxiv. 3 sq., 15 sq., of David in 2 Sam. xxiii. 1, of Agur in Prov. xxx. 1, and always (even in Ps. xxxvi. 2) in an oracular signification. Moreover, if one from among the people were speaking, the declaration ought to be a retrospective glance at a past utterance of God. But, first, the history knows nothing of any such divine utterance; and secondly, 'ה אֲנִי always introduces God as actually speaking, to which even the passage cited by Hofmann to the contrary, Num. xiv. 28, forms no exception. Thus it will consequently not be a past utterance of God to which the poet glances back here, but one which David has just now heard ἐν πνεύματι (Matt. xxii. 43), and is therefore not a declaration of the people concerning David, but of David concerning Christ. The unique character of the declaration confirms this. Of the king of Israel it is said that he sits on the throne of Jahve (1 Chron. xxix. 23), viz. as visible representative of the invisible King (1 Chron. xxviii. 5); Jahve, however, commands the person here addressed to take his place at His right hand. The right hand of a king is the highest place of honour, 1 Kings ii. 19.* Here the sitting at the right hand signifies not merely an idle honour, but reception into the fellowship of God as regards dignity and dominion, exaltation to a participation in God's reigning (βασιλεύειν, 1 Cor. xv. 25). Just as Jahve sits enthroned in the heavens and laughs at the rebels here below, so shall he who is exalted henceforth share this blessed calm with Him, until He subdues all enemies to him, and therefore makes him the unlimited, universally acknowledged ruler. עַר as in Hos. x. 12, for עַרְבֵי or עַרְבֵי אֲשֶׁר, does not exclude the time that lies beyond, but as in cxii. 8, Gen. xlix. 10, includes it, and in fact so that it at any rate marks the final subjugation of the enemies as a turning-point with which something else comes about (vid. Acts iii. 21, 1 Cor. xv. 28). יְרֵם is an accusative of the predicate. The enemies shall come to lie under his feet (1 Kings v. 17 [3]), his feet tread upon the necks of the vanquished (Josh. x. 24), so that the resistance that is overcome becomes as it were the dark ground upon which the glory of his victorious rule arises. For the history of time ends with the triumph of good over evil,—not, however, with the annihilation of evil, but with its subjugation. This is the issue, inasmuch as absolute omnipotence is effectual on behalf of and through the exalted Christ. In ver. 2, springing from the utterance of Jahve, follow words expressing a prophetic prospect. Zion is the imperial abode of the great future King (ii. 6). מַטֵּה עֲזָרָה (cf. Jer. xlvi. 17, Ezek. xix. 11–14) signifies “the sceptre (as insignia and the medium of exercise) of the authority delegated to thee” (1 Sam. ii. 10, Mic. v. 3 [4]). Jahve will stretch this sceptre far forth from Zion: no goal is mentioned up to which it shall extend, but passages like Zech. ix. 10 show how the prophets understand such Psalms. In ver. 2*b* follow the words with which Jahve accompanies this extension of the dominion of the exalted One. Jahve will lay all his enemies at his feet, but not in such a manner that he himself remains idle in the matter. Thus, then, having come into the midst of the sphere (בְּקִרְבֵּי) of his enemies, shall he reign, forcing them to submission and holding them down. We read this יְרֵם in a Messianic connection in lxxii. 8. So even in the prophecy of Balaam (Num. xxiv. 19), where the sceptre (ch. xxiv. 17) is an emblem of the Messiah Himself.

Vers. 3, 4. In order that he may rule thus victoriously, it is necessary that there should be a people and an army. In accordance with this union of the thoughts which ver. 3*a* anticipates, הִילָךְ בַּיּוֹם חִילָךְ signifies in the day of thy arriere ban, i.e. when thou callest up thy “power of an army” (2 Chron. xxvi. 13) to muster and go forth to battle. In this day are the people of the king willingneses (תְּרַבְּתוּ), i.e. entirely cheerful readiness; ready for any sacrifices, they bring themselves with all that they are and have to meet him. There is no need of any compulsory, lengthy proclamation calling them out: it is no army of mercenaries, but willingly and quickly they present themselves from inward impulse (מְהֵרָב, Judg. v. 2; 9). The punctuation, which makes the principal cæsura at חֵילֶךָ with Olewejored, makes the parallelism of חֵילֶךָ and יְלֻדֹתֶיךָ distinctly prominent. Just as the former does not signify roboris tui, so now too the latter does not, according to Eccles. xi. 9, signify παιδιότητός σου (Aquila), and not, as Hofmann interprets, the dew-like freshness of youthful vigour, which the morning of the great day sheds over the king. Just as נְלוּת signifies both exile and the exiled ones, so יְלֻדוֹת, like νεότης, juventus, juventa, signifies both the time and age of youth, youthfulness, and youthful, young men (the youth). Moreover one does not, after ver. 3a, look for any further declaration concerning the nature of the king, but of his people who place themselves at his service. The young men are likened to dew which gently descends upon the king out of the womb (uterus) of the morning-red.* מִשְׁחָר is related to שָׁחַר just as מִחֲשֶׁה is to חֲשָׁה; the notion of שָׁחַר and חֲשָׁה appears to be more sharply defined, and as it were apprehended more massively, in מִשְׁחָר and מִחֲשָׁה. The host of young men is likened to the dew both on account of its vigorousness and its multitude, which are like the freshness of the mountain dew and the immense number of its drops, 2 Sam. xvii. 12 (cf. Num. xxiii. 10), and on account of the silent concealment out of which it wondrously and suddenly comes to light, Mic. v. 6 [7]. After not having understood “thy youth” of the youthfulness of the king, we shall now also not, with Hofmann, refer בְּהַרְרֵי קִרְשׁ to the king, the holy attire of his armour. הַרְרַת קִרְשׁ is the vestment of the priest for performing divine service: the Levite singers went forth before the army in "holy attire" in 2 Chron. xx. 21; here, however, the people without distinction wear holy festive garments. Thus they surround the divine king as dew that is born out of the womb of the morning-red. It is a priestly people which he leads forth to holy battle, just as in Apoc. xix. 14 heavenly armies follow the Logos of God upon white horses, ἐνδεδυμένοι βύσσινον λευκὸν καθαρὸν—a new generation, wonderful as if born out of heavenly light, numerous, fresh, and vigorous like the dew-drops, the offspring of the dawn. The thought that it is a priestly people leads over to ver. 4. The king who leads this priestly people is, as we hear in ver. 4, himself a priest (cohen). As has been shown by Hupfeld and Fleischer, the priest is so called as one who stands (from פָּהַן = פָּן in an intransitive signification), viz. before God (Deut. x. 8, cf. Ps. cxxxiv. 1, Heb. x. 11), like נְבִיאִי the spokesman, viz. of God.* To stand before God is the same as to serve Him, viz. as priest. The ruler whom the Psalm celebrates is a priest who intervenes in the reciprocal dealings between God and His people within the province of divine worship; the priestly character of the people who suffer themselves to be led forth to battle and victory by him, stands in causal connection with the priestly character of this their king. He is a priest by virtue of the promise of God confirmed by an oath. The oath is not merely a pledge of the fulfilment of the promise, but also a seal of the high significance of its purport. God the absolutely truthful One (Num. xiii. 19) swears—this is the highest enhancement of the נְאֻם ה' of which prophecy is capable (Amos vi. 8).

He appoints the person addressed as a priest for ever "after the manner of Melchizedek" in this most solemn manner. The i of דְּבַרְתִּי is the same ancient connecting vowel as in the מְלֻכִי of the name Melchizedek; and it has the tone, which it loses when, as in Lam. i. 1, a tone-syllable follows. The wide-

* The Arabic lexicographers explain من يقوم بأمر الرجل by كَاهِن, "he who stands and does any one's business and manages his affair." That قام, قَوْم, and مِثْل, side by side with עָמַד are synonyms of כָּהֵן in this sense of standing ready for service and in an official capacity.

meaning עַל־דְּבָרָהּ, “in respect to, on account of,” Eccles. iii. 18, vii. 14, viii. 2, is here specialized to the signification “after the manner, measure of,” LXX. κατὰ τὴν τάξιν. The priesthood is to be united with the kingship in him who rules out of Zion, just as it was in Melchizedek, king of Salem, and that for ever. According to De Wette, Ewald, and Hofmann, it is not any special priesthood that is meant here, but that which was bestowed directly with the kingship, consisting in the fact that the king of Israel, by reason of his office, commended his people in prayer to God and blessed them in the name of God, and also had the ordering of Jahve’s sanctuary and service. Now it is true all Israel is a “kingdom of priests” (Ex. xix. 6, cf. Num. xvi. 3, Isa. lxi. 6), and the kingly vocation in Israel must therefore also be regarded as in its way a priestly vocation. But this spiritual priesthood, and, if one will, this princely oversight of sacred things, needed not to come to David first of all by solemn promise; and that of Melchizedek, after which the relationship is here defined, is incongruous to him; for the king of Salem was, according to Canaanitish custom, which admitted of the union of the kingship and priesthood, really a high priest, and therefore, regarded from an Israelitish point of view, united in his own person the offices of David and of Aaron. How could David be called a priest after the manner of Melchizedek, he who had no claim upon the tithes of the priests like Melchizedek, and to whom was denied the authority to offer sacrifice * inseparable from the idea of the priesthood in the Old Testament? (cf. 2 Chron. xxvi. 20.) If David were the person addressed, the declaration would stand in antagonism with the right of Melchizedek as priest recorded in Gen. ch. xiv., which, according to the indisputable representation of the Epistle to the Hebrews, was equal in compass to the Levitico-Aaronic right, and, since “after the manner of” requires a coincident reciprocal relation, in antagonism to itself also.†

One might get on more easily with ver. 4 by referring the * G. Enjedin the Socinian (died 1597) accordingly, in referring this Psalm to David, started from the assumption that priestly functions have been granted exceptionally by God to this king as to no other; vid. the literature of the controversy to which this gave rise in Serpilius, Personalia Davidis, S. 268–274.

Psalm to one of the Maccabæan priest-princes (Hitzig, von Lengerke, and Olshausen); and we should then prefer to the reference to Jonathan who put on the holy stola, 1 Macc. x. 21 (so Hitzig formerly), or Alexander Jannæus who actually bore the title of king (so Hitzig now), the reference to Simon, whom the people appointed to "be their governor and high priest for ever, until there should arise a faithful prophet" (1 Macc. xiv. 41), after the death of Jonathan his brother—a union of the two offices which, although an irregularity, was not one, however, that was absolutely illegal. But the priesthood, which the Maccabæans, however, possessed originally as being priests born, is promised to the person addressed here in ver. 4; and even supposing that in ver. 4 the emphasis lay not on a union of the priesthood with the kingship, but of the kingship with the priesthood, then the retrospective reference to it in Zechariah forbids our removing the Psalm to a so much later period. Why should we not rather be guided in our understanding of this divine utterance, which is unique in the Old Testament, by this prophet, whose prophecy in ch. vi. 12 sq. is the key to it? Zechariah removes the fulfilment of the Psalm out of the Old Testament present, with its blunt separation between the monarchical and hierarchical dignity, into the domain of the future, and refers it to Jahve's Branch (נְצִיץ) that is to come. He, who will build the true temple of God, satisfactorily unites in his one person the priestly with the kingly office, which were at that time assigned to Joshua the high priest and Zerubbabel the prince. Thus this Psalm was understood by the later prophecy; and in what other sense could the post-Davidic church have appropriated it as a prayer and hymn, than in the eschatological Messianic sense? But this sense is also verified as the original. David here hears that the king of the future exalted at the right hand of God, and whom he calls his Lord, is at the same time an eternal priest. And because he is both these his battle itself is a priestly royal work, and just on this account his people fighting with him also wear priestly garments.

Vers. 5-7. Just as in ver. 2 after ver. 1, so now here too after the divine utterance, the poet continues in a reflective strain. The Lord, says ver. 5, dashes in pieces kings at the right hand of this priest-king, in the day when His wrath is kindled (ii. 12, cf. xxi. 10). יְהוָה is rightly accented as subject. The fact that the victorious work of the person addressed is not his own work, but the work of Jahve on his behalf and through him, harmonizes with ver. 1b. The sitting of the exalted one at the right hand of Jahve denotes his uniform participation in His high dignity and dominion. But in the fact that the Lord, standing at his right hand (cf. the counterpart in cix. 6), helps him to victory, that unchangeable relationship is shown in its historical working. The right hand of the exalted one is at the same time not inactive (see Num. xxiv. 17, cf. ver. 8), and the Lord does not fail him when he is obliged to use his arm against his foes. The subject to יָרִין and to the two מְהִין is the Lord as acting through him. "He shall judge among the peoples" is an eschatological hope, vii. 9, ix. 9, xcvi. 10, cf. 1 Sam. ii. 10. What the result of this judgment of the peoples is, is stated by the neutrally used verb מָלֵא with its accusative גֵּיזוֹת (cf. on the construction lxxv. 10, Dent. xxxiv. 9): it there becomes full of corpses, there is there a multitude of corpses covering everything. This is the same thought as in Isa. lxvi. 24, and wrought out in closely related connection in Apoc. xix. 17, xviii. 21. Like the first מְהִין, the second (ver. 6c) is also a perfect of the ideal past. Accordingly אָרֶץ רַבָּה seems to signify the earth or a country (cf. אָרֶץ רַבָּה, Ex. iii. 8, Neh. ix. 35) broad and wide, like רַבְּהוּם רַבָּה the great far-stretching deep. But it might also be understood the "land of Rabbah," as they say the "land of Jazer" (Num. xxxii. 1), the "country of Goshen" (Josh. x. 41), and the like; therefore the land of the Ammonites, whose chief city is Rabbah. It is also questionable whether ראש על-אֶרֶץ רַבָּה is to be taken like κεφαλὴν ὑπὲρ πάντα, Eph. i. 22 (Hofmann), or whether על-אֶרֶץ רַבָּה belongs to מְהִין as a designation of the battle-field. The parallels as to the word and the thing itself, lxxviii. 22, Hab. iii. 13 sq., speak for ראש signifying not the chief, but the head; not, however, in a collective sense (LXX., Targum), but the head of the רֹשֶׁתַּי κατ' ἐξοχήν (vid. Isa. xi. 4). If this is the case, and the construction על ראש is accordingly to be given up, neither is it now to be rendered: He breaks in pieces a head upon the land of Rabbah, but upon a great (broad) land; in connection with which, however, this designation of the place of battle takes its rise from the fact that the head of the ruler over this great territory is intended, and the choice of the word may have been determined by an allusion to David's Ammonitish war. The subject of ver. 7 is now not that arch-fiend, as he who in the course of history renews his youth, that shall rise up again (as we explained it formerly), but he whom the Psalm, which is thus rounded off with unity of plan, celebrates. Ver. 7*a* expresses the toil of his battle, and ver. 7*b* the reward of undertaking the toil. עֲלֵבֵן is therefore equivalent to ἀντί τούτου. בְּרָרָה, however, although it might belong to מַנְחַל (of the brook by the wayside, lxxxiii. 10, cvi. 7), is correctly drawn to יִשְׁתָּה by the accentuation: he shall on his arduous way, the way of his mission (cf. cii. 24), be satisfied with a drink from the brook. He will stand still only for a short time to refresh himself, and in order then to fight afresh; he will unceasingly pursue his work of victory without giving himself any time for rest and sojourn, and therefore (as the reward for it) it shall come to pass that he may lift his head on high as victor; and this, understood in a christological sense, harmonizes essentially with Phil. ii. 8 sq., Heb. xii. 2, Apoc. v. 9 sq.

With Ps. cxl. begins a trilogy of Hallelujah-Psalms. It may be appended to Ps. cx., because it places the “for ever” of cx. 4 in broader light in relation to the history of redemption, by stringing praise upon praise of the deeds of Jahve and of His appointments. It stands in the closest relationship to Ps. cxii. Whilst Ps. cxl., as Hitzig correctly says, celebrates the glory, might, and loving-kindness of Jahve in the circle of the “upright,” Ps. cxii. celebrates the glory flowing therefrom and the happiness of the “upright” themselves, of those who fear Jahve. The two Psalms are twin in form as in contents. They are a mixture of materials taken from older Psalms and gnomic utterances; both are sententious, and both alphabetical. Each consists of twenty-two lines with the twenty-two letters of the alphabet at the beginning,* and every line for the most part consists of three words. Both songs are only chains of acrostic lines without any strophic grouping, and therefore cannot be divided out. The analogous accentuation shows how strong is the impression of the close relationship of this twin pair; and both Psalms also close, in vers. 9 and 10, with two verses of three members, being up to this point divided into verses of two members.

That which the poet purposes doing in ver. 1, he puts into execution from ver. 2 onwards. וְעֵרָה, according to lxiv. 7, cxviii. 14, is equivalent to וְעֵרְתֶם. According to ver. 10b, הַמְפַצִּיָּהֶם in ver. 2b apparently signifies those who find pleasure in them (the works of God); but הַמְפַצִּי (like שְׂמַחִי, Isa. xxiv. 7 = שִׂמְחֵי) is less natural than that it should be the construct form of the plural of הַפִּץ, that occurs in three instances, and there was no need for saying that those who make the works of God the object of their research are such as interest themselves in them. We are led to the right meaning by לְכַל־הַפְּעוּלָה in 1 Kings ix. 11 in comparison with Isa. xlv. 28, xlvi. 10, cf. liii. 10, where הַפְּעוּלָה signifies God's purpose in accordance with His counsel: constantly searched into, and therefore a worthy object of research (דַּרְשׁ, root דָּרַר, to seek to know by rubbing, and in general experimentally, cf. دَرِي of knowledge empirically acquired) according to all their aims, i.e. in all phases of that which they have in view. In ver. 4 יִזְכֹּר points to the festival which propagates the remembrance of the deeds of God in the Mosaic age; מִטְּרָף, ver. 5, therefore points to the food provided for the Exodus, and to the Passover meal, together with the feast of unleavened bread, this memorial (זִכְרוֹן, Ex. xii. 14) of the exemption in faithfulness to the covenant which was experienced in Egypt. This Psalm, says Luther, looks to me as though it had been composed for the festival of Easter. Even from the time of Theodoret and Augustine the thought of the Eucharist has been connected with ver. 5 in the New Testament mind; and it is not without good reason that Ps. cxl. has become the Psalm of the church at the celebration of the Lord's Supper. In connection with הִיָּיר one is reminded of the Pesach-Haggada. The deed of redemption which it relates has a power that continues in operation; for to the church of Jahve is assigned the victory not only over the peoples of Canaan, but over the whole world. The power of Jahve's deeds, which He has made known to His people, and which they tell over again among themselves, aims at giving them the inheritance of the peoples. The works of His hands are truth and right, for they are the realization of that which is true and which lasts and verifies itself, and of that which is right, that triumphantly maintains its ground. His ordinances are נִצָּחִים (occasionally pointed נִצְחִים), established, attested, in themselves and in their results authorizing a firm confidence in their salutariness (cf. xix. 8). סְמוּכִים, supported, stayed, viz. not outwardly, but in themselves, therefore imperturbable (cf. סְמוּכָה used of the state of mind, cxii. 8, Isa. xxvi. 3). עֲשׂוּיִם, moulded, arranged, viz. on the part of God, "in truth, and upright;" יִשָּׂר is accusative of the predicate

(cf. cxix. 37), but without its being clear why it is not pointed וַיִּשָּׂר. If we have understood vers. 4–6 correctly, then פְּדִיתָ glances back at the deliverance out of Egypt. Upon this followed the ratification of the covenant on Sinai, which still remains inviolable down to the present time of the poet, and has the holiness and terribleness of the divine Name for a guarantee of its inviolability. The fear of Jahve, this holy and terrible God, is the beginning of wisdom—the motto of the Chokma in Job (ch. xxviii. 28) and Proverbs (ch. i. 7, ix. 10), the Books of the Chokma. Ver. 10*b* goes on in this Proverbs-like strain: the fear of God, which manifests itself in obedience, is to those who practise them (the divine precepts, פְּקוּדִים) טוֹב עִשְׂבֵל טוֹב (Prov. xiii. 15, iii. 4, cf. 2 Chron. xxx. 22), a fine sagacity, praiseworthy discernment—such a (dutiful) one partakes of everlasting praise. It is true, in glancing back to ver. 3*b*, הַתְּהַלְלֵתוּ seems to refer to God, but a glance forward to cxii. 3*b* shows that the praise of him who fears God is meant. The old observation therefore holds good: ubi hæc ode desinit, sequens incipit (Bakius).

The alphabetical Hallelujah Ps. cxi., which celebrated the government of God, is now followed by another coinciding with it in structure (CTYXOC KB, i.e. 22 στίχοι, as the Coptic version correctly counts), which celebrates the men whose conduct is ordered after the divine pattern.

As in the preceding Psalm, ver. 1 here also sets forth the theme of that which follows. What is there said in ver. 3 concerning the righteousness of God, ver. 3 here says of the righteousness of him who fears God: this also standeth fast for ever, it is indeed the copy of the divine, it is the work and gift of God (xxiv. 5), inasmuch as God's salutary action and behaviour, laid hold of in faith, works a like form of action and behaviour to it in man, which, as ver. 9 says, is, according to its nature, love. The promise in ver. 4 sounds like Isa. lx. 2. Hengstenberg renders: "There ariseth in the darkness light to the upright who is gracious and compassionate and just." But this is impossible as a matter of style. The three adjectives (as in cxi. 4, pointing back to Ex. xxxiv. 6, cf. cxlv. 8, cxvi. 5) are a mention of God according to His attributes. הַיָּהוָה and הַיָּהוָה never take the article in Biblical Hebrew, and צַדִּיק follows their example here (cf. on the contrary, Ex. ix. 27). God Himself is the light which arises in darkness for those who are sincere in their dealings with Him; He is the Sun of righteousness with wings of rays dispensing "grace" and "tender mercies," Mal. iii. 20 [iv. 2]. The fact that He arises for those who are compassionate as He is compassionate, is evident from ver. 5. טוֹב being, as in Isa. iii. 10, Jer. xliv. 17, intended of well-being, prosperity, טוֹב אֵיך is here equivalent to אֲשֶׁרֵי אֵיך, which is rendered טוֹבִיָּה דְּנִבְרָה in Targumic phrase. הוֹנֵן signifies, as in xxxvii. 26, 21, one who charitably dispenses his gifts around. Ver. 5b is not an extension of the picture of virtue, but, as in cxxvii. 5c, a promissory prospect: he will uphold in integrity (בְּמִשְׁפָּט, lxxii. 2, Isa. ix. 6 [7], and frequently), or rather (=בְּמִשְׁפָּט) in the cause (cxliii. 2, Prov. xxiv. 23, and frequently), the things which depend upon him, or with which he has to do; for בְּלִבֵּל, sustinere, signifies to sustain, i.e. to nourish, to sustain, i.e. endure, and also to support, maintain, i.e. carry through. This is explanatorily confirmed in ver. 6: he stands, as a general thing, imperturbably fast. And when he dies he becomes the object of everlasting remembrance, his name is still blessed (Prov. x. 7). Because he has a cheerful conscience, his heart too is not disconcerted by any evil tidings (Jer. xlix. 23): it remains נָכוֹן, erect, straight and firm, without suffering itself to bend or warp; 'בְּטַח פֶּה, full of confidence (passive, "in the sense of a passive state after a completed action of the person himself," like זָכוּר, ciii. 14); סָמְיָה, stayed in itself and established. The last two designations are taken from Isa. xxvi. 3, where it is the church of the last times that is spoken of. Ps. xci. 8 gives us information with reference to the meaning of בְּצָרָיִךְ; עַר, as in xciv. 13, of the inevitable goal, on this side of which he remains undismayed. 2 Cor. ix. 9, where Paul makes use of ver. 9 of the Psalm before us as an encouragement to Christian beneficence, shows how little the assertion "his righteousness standeth for ever" is opposed to the New Testament consciousness. פָּזַר of giving away liberally and in manifold ways, as in Prov. xi. 24. רוּם, ver. 9c, stands in opposition to the egoistical הָרִים in lxxv. 5 as a vegetative sprouting up (cxxxii. 17). The evil-doer must see this and, confounded, vex himself over it; he gnashes his teeth with the rage of envy and chagrin, and melts away, i.e. loses consistency, becomes unhinged, dies off (נָמַס, 3d præt. Niph. as in Ex. xvi. 21, pausal form of נָמַס = נָמַס). How often has he desired the ruin of him whom he must now see in honour! The tables are turned; this and his ungodly desire in general come to nought, inasmuch as the opposite is realized. On יִרְאָה, with its self-evident object, cf. Mic. vii. 10. Concerning the pausal form וּכְעַס, vid. xciii. 1. Hupfeld wishes to read תִּקְוָה after ix. 19, Prov. x. 28. In defence of the traditional reading, Hitzig rightly points to Prov. x. 24 together with ver. 28.

PSALM CXIII.

HALLELUJAH TO HIM WHO RAISETH OUT OF LOW ESTATE.

HALLELUJAH.

- 1 PRAISE, ye servants of Jahve,
Praise the Name of Jahve !
- 2 Blessed be the Name of Jahve
From this time forth and for evermore !
- 3 From the rising of the sun unto its going down
Is the Name of Jahve to be praised.

- 4 Exalted above all peoples is Jahve,
Above the heavens His glory.
- 5 Who is like Jahve our God,
He who sitteth enthroned on high,
- 6 He who looketh far below
In heaven and upon earth ?

- 7 Who raiseth up the lowly out of the dust,
Who lifteth the poor from the heap of ashes,
- 8 To set him with nobles,
With the nobles of His people.
- 9 Who maketh the barren woman to keep house,
As a joyful mother of the sons,
Hallelujah.

With this Psalm begins the Hallel, which is recited at the three great feasts, at the feast of the Dedication (Chanukka) and at the new moons, and not on New Year's day and the day of Atonement, because a cheerful song of praise does not harmonize with the mournful solemnity of these days. And they are recited only in fragments during the last days of the Passover, for "my creatures, saith the Holy One, blessed be He, were drowned in the sea, and ought ye to break out into songs of rejoicing?" In the family celebration of the Passover night it is divided into two parts, the one half, Ps. cxiii., cxiv., being sung before the repast, before the emptying of the second festal cup, and the other half, Ps. cxv.-cxviii., after the repast, after the filling of the fourth cup, to which the ὑμνήσαντες (Matt. xxvi. 30, Mark xiv. 26) after the institution of the Lord's Supper, which was connected with the fourth festal cup, may refer. Paulus Burgensis styles Ps. cxiii.-cxviii. Alleluja Judæorum magnum. This designation is also frequently found elsewhere. But according to the prevailing custom, Ps. cxiii.-cxviii., and more particularly Ps. cxv.-cxviii., are called only Hallel, and Ps. cxxxvi., with its "for His mercy endureth for ever" repeated twenty-six times, bears the name of "the Great Hallel" (הַלֵּל הַגָּדוֹל).*

A heaping up, without example elsewhere, of the so-called Chirek compaginis is peculiar to Ps. cxiii. Gesenius and others call the connecting vowels i and o (in proper names also u) the remains of old case terminations; with the former the Arabic genitive termination is compared, and with the latter the Arabic nominative termination. But in opposition to this it has been rightly observed, that this i and o are not attached to the dependent word (the genitive), but to the governing word. According to the more probable view of Ewald, § 211, i and o are equivalent connecting vowels which mark the relation of the genitive case, and are to be explained from the original oneness of the Semitic and Indo-Germanic languages.

The i is found most frequently appended to the first member of the stat. constr., and both to the  masc., viz. in Deut. xxxiii. 16, Zech. xi. 17 (perhaps twice, vid. Köhler in loc.), and to the femin., viz. in Gen. xxxi. 39, Ps. cx. 4, Isa. i. 21. Lev. xxvi. 42, Ps. cxvi. 1 hardly belong here. Then this i is also frequently found when the second member of the stat. constr. has a preposition, and this preposition is consequently in process of being resolved: Gen. xlix. 11, Ex. xv. 6, Obad. ver. 3 (Jer. xlix. 16), Hos. x. 11, Lam. i. 1, Ps. cxxiii. 1, and perhaps Cant. i. 9. Also in the Chethîb, Jer. xxii. 23, li. 13, Ezek. xxvii. 3. Thirdly, where a word stands between the two notions that belong together according to the genitival relation, and the stat. construct. is consequently really resolved: Ps. ci. 5, Isa. xxii. 16, Mic. vii. 14. It is the same i which is found in a great many proper names, both Israelitish, e.g. Gamaliel (benefit of God), and Phœnician, e.g. Melchizedek, Hanniba'al (the favour of Baal), and is also added to many Hebrew prepositions, like בְּלִי (where the i however can, according to the context, also be a pronominal suffix), וְלִי (where i can likewise be a suffix), כִּנִּי (poetical). In אֲנִי, on the other hand, the i is always a suffix. The tone of the i only retreats in accordance with rhythmical rule (vid. cx. 4), otherwise i is always accented. Ver. 8 shows how our Ps. cxiii. in particular delights in this ancient i, where it is even affixed to the infinitive as an ornament, a thing which occurs nowhere else, so that לְהוֹשִׁיבִי excites the suspicion of being written in error for לְהוֹשִׁיבוּ.

* Vid. the tractate Sofrim, xviii. § 2. Apart from the new moons, a which the recitation of the Hallel κατ' ἐξοχήν, i.e. Ps. cxiii.-cxviii., is only according to custom (מנהג), not according to the law, the Hallel was recited eighteen times a year during the continuance of the Temple (and in Palestine even in the present day), viz. once at the Passover, once at Shabuoth, eight times at Succoth, eight times at Chanucca (the feast of the Dedication); and now in the Exile twenty-one times, because the Passover and Succoth have received two feast-days and Shabuoth one as an addition, viz. twice at the Passover, twice at Shabuoth, nine times at Succoth. Instead of Hallel absolutely we also find the appellation "the Egyptian Hallel" (הַלֵּל הַמִּצְרַיִם) for Ps. cxiii.-cxviii. The ancient ritual only makes a distinction between this (Egyptian) Hallel and the Great Hallel, Ps. cxxxvi. (see there).

Among those things which make God worthy to be praised the Psalm gives prominence to the condescension of the infinitely exalted One towards the lowly one. It is the lowliness of God lowering itself for the exaltation of the lowly which performs its utmost in the work of redemption. Thus it becomes explicable that Mary in her Magnificat breaks forth into the same strain with the song of Hannah (1 Sam. ch. ii.) and this Psalm.

Vers. 1-3. The call, not limited by any addition as in cxxxiv. 1, or even, after the manner of ciii. 20 sq., extended over the earth, is given to the whole of the true Israel that corresponds to its election by grace and is faithful to its mission; and its designation by "servants of Jahve" (lxix. 37, cf. xxxiv. 23), or even "servant of Jahve" (cxxxvi. 22), has come into vogue more especially through the second part of Isaiah. This Israel is called upon to praise Jahve; for the praise and celebration of His Name, i.e. of His nature, which is disclosed by means of its manifestation, is a principal element, yea, the proper ground and aim, of the service, and shall finally become that which fills all time and all space. מְהִלֵּל, laudatum (est), is equivalent to αἰνέσιον, laudabile (LXX., Vulgate), and this does not differ greatly from laudetur. The predictive interpretation laudabitur is opposed to the context (cf. moreover Köhler on Mal. i. 11).

Vers. 4-6. This praiseworthiness is now confirmed. The opening reminds one of xcix. 2. Pasek stands between נִיּוּם and יְהוָה in order to keep them apart. The totality of the nations is great, but Jahve is raised above it; the heavens are glorious, but Jahve's glory is exalted above them. It is not to be explained according to cxlviii. 13; but according to lvii. 6, 12, רַם belongs to ver. 4b too as predicate. He is the incomparable One who has set up His throne in the height, but at the same time directs His gaze deep downwards (expression according to Ges. § 142, rem. 1) in the heavens and upon earth, i.e. nothing in all the realm of the creatures that are beneath Him escapes His sight, and nothing is so low that it remains unnoticed by Him; on the contrary, it is just that which is lowly, as the following strophe presents to us in a series of portraits so to speak, that is the special object of His regard. The structure of vers. 5, 6 militates against the construction of "in the heavens and upon the earth" with the interrogatory "who is like unto Jahve our God?" after Deut. iii. 24.

Vers. 7-9. The thoughts of vers. 7a and 8a are transplanted from the song of Hannah. עָפָר, according to 1 Kings xvi. 2, cf. xiv. 7, is an emblem of lowly estate (Hitzig), and אֲשֵׁפֶת (from שָׁפַת) an emblem of the deepest poverty and desertion; for in Syria and Palestine the man who is shut out from society lies upon the mezbele (the dunghill or heap of ashes), by day calling upon the passers-by for alms, and by night hiding himself in the ashes that have been warmed by the sun (Job, ii. 152). The movement of the thoughts in ver. 8, as in ver. 1, follows the model of the epizexis. Together with the song of Hannah the poet has before his eye Hannah's exaltation out of sorrow and reproach. He does not, however, repeat the words of her song which have reference to this (1 Sam. ii. 5), but clothes his generalization of her experience in his own language. If he intended that עֲקָרָה should be understood out of the genitival relation after the form עֲמָרָה, why did he not write מֵאִשִּׁיבֵי הַבַּיִת עֲקָרָה? הַבַּיִת would then be equivalent to בַּיְתָה, lxviii. 7. הַבַּיִת עֲקָרָה is the expression for a woman who is a wife, and therefore housewife, הַבַּיִת (בְּעֵלָתָה) נִינָה, but yet not a mother. Such an one has no settled position in the house of the husband, the firm bond is wanting in her relationship to her husband. If God gives her children, He thereby makes her then thoroughly at home and rooted-in in her position. In the predicate notion אֵם הַבָּנִים שְׂמֵחָה the definiteness attaches to the second member of the string of words, as in Gen. xlviii. 19, 2 Sam. xii. 30 (cf. the reverse instance in Jer. xxiii. 26, נְבִיאֵי הַשָּׁקֶר, those prophesying that which is false), therefore: a mother of the children. The poet brings the matter so vividly before him, that he points as it were with his finger to the children with which God blesses her.

PSALM CXIV.

COMMOTION OF NATURE BEFORE GOD THE REDEEMER OUT OF EGYPT.

- 1 WHEN Israel went forth out of Egypt,
The house of Jacob out of a people of strange language,
- 2 Then Judah became His sanctuary,
Israel His dominion.
- 3 The sea saw it, and fled,
Jordan turned backwards,
- 4 The mountains skipped like rams,
The hills like young sheep.
- 5 What aileth thee, O sea, that thou fleest?
O Jordan, that thou turnest backwards?
- 6 Ye mountains, that ye skip like rams?
Ye hills, like young sheep?—
- 7 Before the face of the Lord tremble, O earth,
Before the face of the God of Jacob,

8 Who changeth the rock into a pool of water,
The flinty rock into water-springs !

To the side of the general Hallelujah Ps. cxiii. comes an historical one, which is likewise adorned in ver. 8 with the Chirek compaginis, and still further with Cholem compaginis, and is the festival Psalm of the eighth Passover day in the Jewish ritual. The deeds of God at the time of the Exodus are here brought together to form a picture in miniature which is as majestic as it is charming. There are four tetrastichs, which pass by with the swiftness of a bird as it were with four flappings of its wings. The church sings this Psalm in a tonus peregrinus distinct from the eight Psalm-tones.

Vers. 1-4. Egypt is called עַם לִעֲרָב (from עֲרָב, cogn. עָרַב, עֲרָבָה), because the people spoke a language unintelligible to Israel (lxxxi. 6), and as it were a stammering language. The LXX., and just so the Targum, renders ἐκ λαοῦ βαρβάρου (from the Sanscrit barbaras, just as onomatopoeic as balbus, cf. Fleischer in Levy's Chaldäisches Wörterbuch, i. 420). The redeemed nation is called Judah, inasmuch as God made it His sanctuary (שְׁרָפָה) by setting up His sanctuary (שְׁרָפָה, Ex. xv. 17) in the midst of it, for Jerusalem (el-kuds) was Benjamitish Judæan, and from the time of David was accounted directly as Judæan. In so far, however, as He made this people His kingdom (מַמְשָׁלוֹתָי, an amplificative plural with Mem pathachatum), by placing Himself in the relation of King (Deut. xxxiii. 5) to the people of possession which by a revealed law He established characteristically as His own, it is called Israel. The predicate takes the form וְיָהוּי, for peoples together with country and city are represented as feminine (cf. Jer. viii. 5). The foundation of that new beginning in connection with the history of redemption was laid amidst majestic wonders, inasmuch as nature was brought into service, co-operating and sympathizing in the work (cf. lxxvii. 15 sqq.). The dividing of the sea opens, and the dividing of the Jordan closes, the journey through the desert to Canaan. The sea stood aside, Jordan halted and was dammed up on the north in order that the redeemed people might pass through. And in the middle, between these great wonders of the exodus from Egypt and the entrance into Canaan, arises the not less mighty wonder of the giving of the Law: the skipping of the mountains like rams, of the hills like בְּנֵי-צֹאֵן, i.e. lambs (Wisd. xix. 9), depicts the quaking of Sinai and its environs (Ex. xix. 18, cf. supra lxviii. 9, and on the figure xxix. 6).

Vers. 5-8. The poet, when he asks, "What aileth thee, O sea, that thou fleest . . . ?" lives and moves in this olden time as a cotemporary, or the present and the olden time as it were flow together to his mind; hence the answer he himself gives to the question propounded takes the form of a triumphant mandate. The Lord, the God of Jacob, thus mighty in wondrous works, it is before whom the earth must tremble. אָדֹנָי does not take the article because it finds its completion in the following יַעֲקֹב (אֱלֹהֵי); it is the same epizeuxis as in cxiii. 8, xciv. 3, xcvi. 7, 13. הַהַרְפָּנִי has the constructive i out of the genitival relation; and in לְמַעַיְנֵנו in this relation we have the constructive o, which as a rule occurs only in the genitival combination, with the exception of this passage and בָּנוּ בְּעָרָא, Num. xxiv. 3, 15 (not, however, in Prov. xiii. 4, "his, the sluggard's, soul"), found only in the name for wild animals הַיְחֹרֵאֲרָן, which occurs frequently, and first of all in Gen. i. 24. The expression calls to mind cvii. 35. הַצִּיֹּר is taken from Ex. xvii. 6; and חֲלָמִישׁ (LXX. τῆν ἀκρότομον, that which is rugged, abrupt) * stands, according to Deut. viii. 15, poetically for סִלְעַת, Num. xx. 11, for it is these two histories of the giving of water * One usually compares خلدنبوس, chalnabūs [the Karaite lexicographer Abraham ben David writes [חלמבוס]; but this obsolete word, as a compound from خلس, to be black-grey, and خنيس, to be hard, may originally signify a hard black-grey stone, whereas חלמיש looks like a mingling of the verbal stems חמס, to be hard, and חلس, to be black-brown (as جلود, a detached block of rock, is of the verbal stems جلد, to be hard, and جمد, to be massive). In Hauran the doors of the houses and the window-shutters are called حلسة when they consist of a massive slab of dolerite, probably from their blackish hue. Perhaps חלמיש is the ancient name for basalt; and in connection with the hardness of this form of rock, which resembles a mass of cast metal, the breaking through of springs is a great miracle.—WETZSTEIN. to which the poet points back. But why to these in particular? The causing of water to gush forth out of the flinty rock is a practical proof of unlimited omnipotence and of the grace which converts death into life. Let the earth then tremble before the Lord, the God of Jacob. It has already trembled before Him, and before Him let it tremble. For that which He has been He still ever is; and as He came once, He will come again.

PSALM CXV.

CALL TO THE GOD OF ISRAEL, THE LIVING GOD, TO RESCUE THE HONOUR OF HIS NAME.

- 1 NOT unto us, Jahve, not unto us,
But unto Thy Name give glory,
Because of Thy loving-kindness, because of Thy truth.
- 2 Wherefore shall the heathen say :
“ Where is now their God ? ”
- 3 And our God is in the heavens,
Whatsoever He willeth He carrieth out.
- 4 Their gods, however, are silver and gold,
The work of men’s hands.
- 5 They have a mouth and speak not,
They have eyes and see not,
- 6 They have ears and hear not,
They have a nose and smell not.
- 7 Their hands, with which they handle not,
Their feet, with which they walk not,
They speak not with their throat.
- 8 Like unto them do those who make them become,
Every one who trusteth in them.
- 9 Israel, trust thou in Jahve,
Their help and their shield is He.
- 10 O house of Aaron, trust ye in Jahve,
Their help and their shield is He.
- 11 Ye who fear Jahve, trust in Jahve,
Their help and their shield is He.

- 12 Jahve hath been mindful of us, He will bless—
 He will bless the house of Israel,
 He will bless the house of Aaron,
 13 He will bless those who fear Jahve,
 The small together with the great.
 14 Jahve will add to you,
 To you and your children.
- 15 Blessed be ye of Jahve,
 The Creator of heaven and earth.
 16 The heavens are heavens for Jahve,
 And the earth hath He given to the children of men.
 17 The dead praise not Jāh,
 Nor all those who go down into the silence of death;
 18 We, however, we will bless Jāh
 From henceforth and for evermore,
 Hallelujah.

This Psalm, which has scarcely anything in common with the preceding Psalm except that the expression "house of Jacob," cxiv. 1, is here broken up into its several members in vers. 12 sq., is found joined with it, making one Psalm, in the LXX., Syriac, Arabic, and Æthiopic versions, just as on the other hand Ps. cxvi. is split up into two. This arbitrary arrangement condemns itself. Nevertheless Kimchi favours it, and it has found admission into not a few Hebrew manuscripts.

It is a prayer of Israel for God's aid, probably in the presence of an expedition against heathen enemies. The two middle strophes of the four are of the same compass. Ewald's conjecture, that whilst the Psalm was being sung the sacrifice was proceeded with, and that in ver. 12 the voice of a priest proclaims the gracious acceptance of the sacrifice, is pleasing. But the change of voices begins even with ver. 9, as Olshausen also supposes.

Vers. 1, 2. It has to do not so much with the honour of Israel, which is not worthy of the honour (Ezek. xxxvi. 22 sq.) and has to recognise in its reproach a well-merited chastisement, as with the honour of Him who cannot suffer the reproaching of His holy name to continue long. He willeth that His name should be sanctified. In the consciousness of his oneness with this will, the poet bases his petition, in so far as it is at the same time a petition on behalf of Israel, upon God's χάρις and ἀλήθεια as upon two columns. The second ע, according to an express note of the Masora, has no Waw before it, although the LXX. and Targum insert one. The thought in ver. 2 is moulded after lxxix. 10, or after Joel ii. 17, cf. Ps. xlii. 4, Mic. vii. 10. אֱיִהְיֶה is the same style as אֱיִהְיֶה in cxvi. 18, cf. in the older language אֱלֹהֵי, אֱמֶנָה, and the like.

Vers. 3-8. The poet, with "And our God," in the name of Israel opposes the scornful question of the heathen by the believably joyous confession of the exaltation of Jahve above the false gods. Israel's God is in the heavens, and is therefore supramundane in nature and life, and the absolutely unlimited One, who is able to do all things with a freedom that is conditioned only by Himself: quod vult, valet (ver. 3b = cxxxv. 6, Wisd. xii. 18, and frequently). The carved gods (עֲצָב, from עָצַב, cogn. הָצַב, הָצַב) of the heathen, on the contrary, are dead images, which are devoid of all life, even of the sensuous life the outward organs of which are imaged upon them. It cannot be proved with Eccles. v. 16 that יִדְיָהֶם and רַגְלֵיהֶם are equivalent to רגלים, ידים להם. They are either subjects which the Waw apodosi (cf. Gen. xxii. 24, Prov. xxiii. 24, Hab. ii. 5) renders prominent, or casus absoluti (Ges. § 145, 2), since both verbs have the idols themselves as their subjects less on account of their gender (י and רגל are feminine, but the Hebrew usage of genders is very free and not carried out uniformly) as in respect of ver. 7c: with reference to their hands, etc. יִמְשִׁיחַ is the energetic future form, which goes over from מְשִׁיחַ into מִשַׁח, for יִמְשִׁיחַ. It is said once again in ver. 7c that speech is wanting to them; for the other negations only deny life to them, this at the same time denies all personality. The author might know from his own experience how little was the distinction made by the heathen worship between the symbol and the thing symbolized. Accordingly the worship of idols seems to him, as to the later prophets, to be the extreme of self-stupefaction and of the destruction of human consciousness; and the final destiny of the worshippers of false gods, as he says in ver. 8, is, that they become like to their idols, that is to say, being deprived of their consciousness, life, and existence, they come to nothing, like those their nothingnesses (Isa. xlv. 9). This whole section of the Psalm is repeated in Ps. cxxxv. (vers. 6, 15-18).

Vers. 9-14. After this confession of Israel there now arises a voice that addresses itself to Israel. The threefold division into Israel, the house of Aaron, and those who fear Jahve is the same as in cxviii. 2-4. In Ps. cxxxv. the "house of Levi" is further added to the house of Aaron. Those who fear Jahve, who also stand in the last passage, are probably the proselytes (in the Acts of the Apostles σεβόμενοι τὸν Θεόν, or merely σεβόμενοι*); at any rate these are included even if Israel in ver. 9 is meant to signify the laity, for the notion of "those who fear Jahve" extends beyond Israel. The fact that the threefold refrain of the summons does not run, as in xxxiii. 20, our help and shield is He, is to be explained from its being an antiphonal song. In so far, however, as the Psalm supplicates God's protection and help in a campaign the declaration of confident hope, their help and shield is He, may, with Hitzig, be referred to the army that is gone or is going forth. It is the same voice which bids Israel to be of good courage and announces to the people the well-pleased acceptance of the sacrifice with the words "Jahve hath been mindful of us" (ה' זָכָרָנוּ, cf. עֲתָה יִדְעָתִי, xx. 7), perhaps simultaneously with the presentation of the memorial portion (אֶזְכָּרָה) of the meat-offering (xxxviii. 1). The בָּרָךְ placed at the head is particularized threefold, corresponding to the threefold summons. The special promise of blessing which is added in ver. 14 is an echo of Deut. i. 11, as in 2 Sam. xxiv. 3. The contracted future יִסֶּף we take in a consolatory sense; for as an optative it would be too isolated here. In spite of all oppression on the part of the heathen, God will make His people ever more numerous, more capable of offering resistance, and more awe-inspiring.

Vers. 15-18. The voice of consolation is continued in ver. 15, but it becomes the voice of hope by being blended with the newly strengthened believing tone of the congregation. Jahve is here called the Creator of heaven and earth because the worth and magnitude of His blessing are measured thereby. He has reserved the heavens to Himself, but given the earth to men. This separation of heaven and earth is a fundamental characteristic of the post-diluvian history. The throne of God is in the heavens, and the promise, which is given to the patriarchs on behalf of all mankind, does not refer to heaven, but to the possession of the earth (xxxvii. 22). The promise is as yet limited to this present world, whereas in the New Testament this limitation is removed and the κληρονομία embraces heaven and earth. This Old Testament limitedness finds further expression in ver. 17, where הַשָּׁמַיִם, as in xciv. 17, signifies the silent land of Hades. The Old Testament knows nothing of a heavenly ecclesia that praises God without intermission, consisting not merely of angels, but also of the spirits of all men who die in the faith. Nevertheless there are not wanting hints that point upwards which were even better understood by the post-exilic than by the pre-exilic church. The New Testament morn began to dawn even upon the post-exilic church. We must not therefore be astonished to find the tone of vi. 6, xxx. 10, lxxxviii. 11–13, struck up here, although the echo of those earlier Psalms here is only the dark foil of the confession which the church makes in ver. 18 concerning its immortality. The church of Jahve as such does not die. That it also does not remain among the dead, in whatever degree it may die off in its existing members, the psalmist might know from Isa. xxvi. 19, xxv. 8. But the close of the Psalm shows that such predictions which light up the life beyond only gradually became elements of the church's consciousness, and, so to speak, dogmas.

* The appellation φοβόμενοι does not however occur, if we do not bring Acts x. 2 in here; but in Latin inscriptions in Orelli-Hentzen No. 2523, and in Auer in the Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 1852, S. 80, the proselyte (religionis Judaicæ) is called metuens.

PSALM CXVI.

THANKSGIVING SONG OF ONE WHO HAS ESCAPED FROM DEATH.

- 1 I LOVE, for Jahve heareth
My cry, my heartfelt supplication.
- 2 For He hath inclined His ear unto me,
Therefore will I call as long as I live.

- 3 The cords of death compassed me,
And the straitnesses of Hades came upon me,
Distress and sorrow did I experience.
- 4 Then upon the name of Jahve did I call :
O Jahve, deliver my soul.
- 5 Gracious is Jahve and righteous,
And our God a compassionate One.
- 6 A Guardian of the simple is Jahve ;
I was brought low, and He helped me.
- 7 Turn in, my soul, unto thy rest,
For Jahve dealeth bountifully with thee.
- 8 Yea, Thou hast delivered my soul from death,
Mine eyes from tears,
My feet from falling.
- 9 I will walk before Jahve
In the lands of the living.
- 10 I believe now, when I must speak :
“ I, I am afflicted very greatly.”
- 11 I have said to myself in my despair :
“ All men are liars.”
- 12 How can I repay Jahve
All His benefits toward me ?
- 13 The cup of salvation will I raise,
And proclaim the Name of Jahve.
- 14 My vows will I pay unto Jahve,
I will do it in the presence of all His people.
- 15 Precious in the eyes of Jahve
Is the death of His saints.
- 16 Yea, O Jahve, for I am Thy servant,
I am Thy servant, the son of Thy handmaid,
Thou hast loosed my bonds.
- 17 Unto Thee will I sacrifice a sacrifice of thanksgiving
And proclaim the Name of Jahve.
- 18 My vows will I pay unto Jahve,
I will do it in the presence of all His people,
- 19 In the courts of Jahve's house,
In the midst of thee, O Jerusalem !
Hallelujah.

We have here another anonymous Psalm closing with Hallelujah. It is not a supplicatory song with a hopeful prospect before it like Ps. cxv., but a thanksgiving song with a fresh recollection of some deadly peril that has just been got the better of; and is not, like Ps. cxv., from the mouth of the church, but from the lips of an individual who distinguishes himself from the church. It is an individual that has been delivered who here praises the loving-kindness he has experienced in the language of the tenderest affection. The LXX. has divided this deeply fervent song into two parts, cxvi. 1-9, 10-19, and made two Hallelujah-Psalms out of it; whereas it unites Ps. cxiv. and cxv. into one. The four sections or strophes, the beginnings of which correspond to one another (vers. 1 and 10, 5 and 15), are distinctly separate. The words יְבִישִׁים ה' אֶקְרָא are repeated three times. In the first instance they are retrospective, but then swell into an always more full-toned vow of thanksgiving. The late period of its composition makes itself known not only in the strong Aramaic colouring of the form of the language, which adopts all kinds of embellishments, but also in many passages borrowed from the pre-exilic Psalms. The very opening, and still more so the progress, of the first strophe reminds one of Ps. xviii., and becomes an important hint for the exposition of the Psalm.

Vers. 1-4. Not only is יָי אֲהַבְתִּי כִּי, "I love (like, am well pleased) that," like ἀγαπῶ ὅτι, Thucydides vi. 36, contrary to the usage of the language, but the thought, "I love that Jahve answereth me," is also tame and flat, and inappropriate to the continuation in ver. 2. Since vers. 3, 4 have come from xviii. 5-17, אֲהַבְתִּי is to be understood according to אֲרַחֲמֶךָ in xviii. 2, so that it has the following יְהוָה as its object, not it is true grammatically, but logically. The poet is fond of this pregnant use of the verb without an expressed object, cf. אֶקְרָא in ver. 2, and הִיאֲמַנְתִּי in ver. 10. The Pasek after שָׁמַע is intended to guard against the blending of the final a' with the initial a of אֲרָנִי (cf. lxvi. 18, v. 2, in Baer). In ver. 1b the accentuation prevents the rendering vocem orationis meae (Vulgate, LXX.) by means of Mugrash. The i of קוּלִי will therefore no more be the archaic connecting vowel (Ew. § 211, b) than in Lev. xxvi. 42; the poet has varied the genitival construction of xxviii.

6 to the permutative. The second בִּי, following close upon the first, makes the continuation of the confirmation retrospective. "In my days" is, as in Isa. xxxix. 8, Bar. iv. 20, cf. בְּחַיִּי in lxiii. 5, and frequently, equivalent to "so long as I live." We even here hear the tone of Ps. xviii. (ver. 2), which is continued in vers. 3, 4 as a freely borrowed passage. Instead of the "bands" (of Hades) there, the expression here is מַצָּרִי, angustia, plural of מַצָּר, after the form מַסָּב in cxviii. 5, Lam. i. 3 (Böttcher, De inferis, § 423); the straitnesses of Hades are deadly perils which can scarcely be escaped. The futures אֲמַצֵּר and אֲמַצֵּרָא, by virtue of the connection, refer to the contemporaneous past. אֲנִי (viz. בְּלִישׁן בְּקִשָּׁה, i.e. in a suppliant sense) is written with He instead of Aleph here and in five other instances, as the Masora observes. It has its fixed Metheg in the first syllable, in accordance with which it is to be pronounced āna (like בְּחַיִּים, bāttim), and has an accented ultima not merely on account of the following יהוה = יְהוָה (vid. on iii. 8), but in every instance; for even where (the Metheg having been changed into a conjunctive) it is supplied with two different accents, as in Gen. i. 17, Ex. xxxii. 31, the second indicates the tone-syllable.* Instead now of repeating "and Jahve answered me," the poet indulges in a laudatory confession of general truths which have been brought vividly to his mind by the answering of his prayer that he has experienced.

Vers. 5-9. With "gracious" and "compassionate" is here associated, as in cxii. 4, the term "righteous," which comprehends within itself everything that Jahve asserts concerning Himself in Ex. xxxiv. 6 sq. from the words "and abundant in goodness and truth" onwards. His love is turned especially toward the simple (LXX. τὰ νήπια, cf. Matt. xi. 25), who stand in need of His protection and give themselves over to it. פִּתְּאִים, as in Prov. ix. 6, is a mode of writing blended out of פִּתְּאִים and פִּתְּיִים. The poet also has experienced this love in a time of impotent need. הִלֹּתִי is accented on the ultima here, and not as in cxlii. 7 on the penult. The accentuation is regulated by some phonetic or rhythmical law that has not yet been made clear (vid. on Job xix. 17).* יְהוֹשִׁיעַ is a resolved Hiphil form, the use of which became common in the later period of the language, but is not alien to the earlier period, especially in poetry (xlv. 18, cf. lxxxii. 6, 1 Sam. xvii. 47, Isa. lii. 5). In ver. 7 we hear the form of soliloquy which has become familiar to us from Ps. xlii., xliii., ciii. שׁוּבִי is Milra here, as also in two other instances. The plural מְנוּחִים signifies full, complete rest, as it is found only in God; and the suffix in the address to the soul is ajchi for ajich, as in ciii. 3-5. The perfect נָמַל states that which is a matter of actual experience, and is corroborated in ver. 8 in retrospective perfects. In vers. 8, 9 we hear lvi. 14 again amplified; and if we add xxvii. 13, then we see as it were to the bottom of the origin of the poet's thoughts. מְנוּחֵי יְהוֹשִׁיעַ belongs still more decidedly than יְהוֹשִׁיעַ to the resolved forms which multiply in the later period of the language. In ver. 9 the poet declares the result of the divine deliverance. The Hithpa. אֶתְהַלֵּךְ denotes a free and contented going to and fro; and instead of "the land of the living," xxvii. 13, the expression here is "the lands (אֶרְצוֹת), i.e. the broad land, of the living." There he walks forth, with nothing to hinder his feet or limit his view, in the presence of Jahve, i.e. having his Deliverer from death ever before his eyes.

* Kimchi, mistaking the vocation of the Metheg, regards אֲנִי (אָנָּה) as Milel. But the Palestinian and the Babylonian systems of pointing coincide in this, that the beseeching אָנָּה (אָנָּה) is Milra, and the interrogatory אָנָּה Milel (with only two exceptions in our text, which is fixed according to the Palestinian Masora, viz. cxxxix. 7, Deut. i. 28, where the following word begins with Aleph), and these modes of accenting accord with the origin of the two particles. Pinsker (Einleitung, S. xiii.) insinuates against the Palestinian system, that in the cases where אָנָּה has two accents the pointing was not certain of the correct accentuation, only from a deficient knowledge of the bearings of the cases.

Vers. 10-14. Since כִּי אֶרְבֵּר does not introduce anything that could become an object of belief, הֶאֱמַנְתִּי is absolute here: to have faith, just as in Job xxiv. 22, xxix. 24, with לֹא it signifies "to be without faith, i.e. to despair." But how does it now proceed? The LXX. renders ἐπίστευσα, διὸ ἐλάλησα, which the apostle makes use of in 2 Cor. iv. 13, without our being

* The national grammarians, so far as we are acquainted with them, furnish no explanation. De Balmis believes that these Milra forms הִלֹּתִי, בְּלֹתִי, and the like, must be regarded as infinitives, but at the same time confirms the difference of views existing on this point.

therefore obliged with Luther to render: I believe, therefore I speak; כִּי does not signify διό. Nevertheless כִּי might according to the sense be used for לָכֵן, if it had to be rendered with Hengstenberg: "I believed, therefore I spake, but I was very much plagued." But this assertion does not suit this connection, and has, moreover, no support in the syntax. It might more readily be rendered: "I have believed that I should yet speak, i.e. that I should once more have a deliverance of God to celebrate;" but the connection of the parallel members, which is then only lax, is opposed to this. Hitzig's attempted interpretation, "I trust, when (כִּי as in Jer. xii. 1) I should speak: I am greatly afflicted," i.e. "I have henceforth confidence, so that I shall not suffer myself to be drawn away into the expression of despondency," does not commend itself, since ver. 10b is a complaining, but not therefore as yet a desponding assertion of the reality. Assuming that הֵאֲמַנְתִּי and אֶמְרֵהּ in ver. 11a stand on the same line in point of time, it seems that it must be interpreted I had faith, for I spake (was obliged to speak); but אָרַבְרָה, separated from הֵאֲמַנְתִּי by כִּי, is opposed to the colouring relating to the cotemporaneous past. Thus ver. 10 will consequently contain the issue of that which has been hitherto experienced: I have gathered up faith and believe henceforth, when I speak (have to speak, must speak): I am deeply afflicted (עָנָה as in cxix. 67, cf. عَنِ, to be bowed down, more particularly in captivity, whence العنائة, those who are bowed down). On the other hand, ver. 11 is manifestly a retrospect. He believes now, for he is thoroughly weaned from putting trust in men: I said in my despair (taken from xxxi. 23), the result of my deeply bowed down condition: All men are liars (πᾶς ἄνθρωπος ψεύστης, Rom. iii. 4). Forsaken by all the men from whom he expected succour and help, he experienced the truth and faithfulness of God. Striding away over this thought, he asks in ver. 12 how he is to give thanks to God for all His benefits. מָה is an adverbial accusative for בְּמָה, as in Gen. xliv. 16, and the substantive תְּגִמֵּל, in itself a later formation, has besides the Chaldaic plural suffix ōhi, which is without example elsewhere in Hebrew. The poet says in ver. 13 how alone he can and will give thanks to his Deliverer, by using a figure taken from the Passover (Matt. xxvi. 27), the memorial repast in celebration of the redemption out of Egypt. The cup of salvation is that which is raised aloft and drunk amidst thanksgiving for the manifold and abundant salvation (ישועות) experienced. קָרָא בְּשֵׁם ה' is the usual expression for a solemn and public calling upon and proclamation of the Name of God. In ver. 14 this thanksgiving is more minutely designated as שְׁלַמֵי נֶגֶד, which the poet now discharges. A common and joyous eating and drinking in the presence of God was associated with the shelamim. נָא (vid. cxv. 2) in the freest application gives a more animated tone to the word with which it stands. Because he is impelled frankly and freely to give thanks before the whole congregation, נָא stands beside נֶגֶד, and נֶגֶד, moreover, has the intentional ah.

Vers. 15-19. From what he has experienced the poet infers that the saints of Jahve are under His most especial providence. Instead of הַפְּנוּת the poet, who is fond of such embellishments, chooses the pathetic form הַפְּנוּתָהּ, and consequently, instead of the genitival construct state (מות), the construction with the Lamed of "belonging to." It ought properly to be "soul" or "blood," as in the primary passage lxxii. 14. But the observation of Grotius: quæ pretiosa sunt, non facile largimur, applies also to the expression "death." The death of His saints is no trifling matter with God; He does not lightly suffer it to come about; He does not suffer His own to be torn away from Him by death.* After this the poet goes on beseechingly: ānnāh Adonaj. The prayer itself is not contained in פָּתַחַתָּהּ לְמוֹסְרֵי, —for he is already rescued, and the perfect as a precativè is limited to such utterances spoken in the tone of an exclamation as we find in Job xxi. 16,—but remains unexpressed; it lies wrapped up as it were in this heartfelt ānnāh: Oh remain still so gracious to me as Thou hast already proved Thyself to me. The poet rejoices in and is proud of the fact that he may call himself the servant of God. With אִמְתָּךְ he is mindful of his pious mother (cf. lxxxvi.

* The Apostolic Constitutions (vi. 30) commend the singing of these and other words of the Psalms at the funerals of those who have departed in the faith (cf. Augusti, Denkwürdigkeiten, ix. 563). In the reign of the Emperor Decius, Babylas Bishop of Antioch, full of blessed hope, met death singing these words.

16). The Hebrew does not form a feminine, עֲבָדָה; אֵמֶת signifies a maid, who is not, as such, also عِبْدَةٌ, a slave. The dative of the object, לְמוֹסְרֵי (from מוֹסְרִים for the more usual מוֹסְרוֹת), is used with פְּתַחַת instead of the accusative after the Aramaic manner, but it does also occur in the older Hebrew (e.g. Job xix. 3, Isa. liii. 11). The purpose of publicly giving thanks to the Gracious One is now more full-toned here at the close. Since such emphasis is laid on the Temple and the congregation, what is meant is literal thank-offerings in payment of vows. In בְּתוֹכֵכִי (as in cxxxv. 9) we have in the suffix the ancient and Aramaic i (cf. ver. 7) for the third time. With אֲנִי the poet clings to Jahve, with בְּנִגְדֵי־נֶפֶשׁ to the congregation, and with בְּתוֹכֵכִי to the holy city. The one thought that fills his whole soul, and in which the song which breathes forth his soul dies away, is Hallelujah.

PSALM CXVII.

INVITATION TO THE PEOPLES TO COME INTO THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

- 1 PRAISE Jahve, all peoples,
Praise Him, all ye nations!
- 2 For mighty over us is His loving-kindness,
And the truth of Jahve endureth for ever,
Hallelujah!

The thanksgiving Psalm ending in Hallelujah is followed by this shortest of all the Psalms, a Hallelujah addressed to the heathen world. In its very brevity it is one of the grandest witnesses of the might with which, in the midst of the Old Testament, the world-wide mission of the religion of revelation struck against or undermined the national limitation. It is stamped by the apostle in Rom. xv. 11 as a locus classicus for the fore-ordained (gnadenrathschlussmässig) participation of the heathen in the promised salvation of Israel.

Even this shortest Psalm has its peculiarities in point of language. אַמִּים (Aramaic אַמִּי, Arabic امة) is otherwise alien to Old Testament Hebrew. The Old Testament Hebrew is acquainted only with אֱמֹנִים as an appellation of Ismaelitish or Midianitish tribes. אֱמֹנִים are, as in lxxii. 11, 17, all peoples without distinction, and אֱמֹנִים לְכָל אֲמֹנִים all nations without exception. The call is confirmed from the might of the mercy or loving-kindness of Jahve, which proves itself mighty over Israel, i.e. by its intensity and fulness superabundantly covering (כָּסָה as in ciii. 11; cf. ὑπερεπερίσσευσε, Rom. v. 20, ὑπερεπλεόνασε, 1 Tim. i. 14) human sin and infirmity; and from His truth, by virtue of which history on into eternity ends in a verifying of His promises. Mercy and truth are the two divine powers which shall one day be perfectly developed and displayed in Israel, and going forth from Israel, shall conquer the world

PSALM CXVIII.

FESTIVAL PSALM AT THE DEDICATION OF THE NEW TEMPLE.

(At the setting out.)

- 1 GIVE thanks unto Jahve, for He is good,
Yea, His mercy endureth for ever.
- 2 Let Israel say :
“Yea, His mercy endureth for ever.”
- 3 Let the house of Aaron say :
“Yea, His mercy endureth for ever.”
- 4 Let those who fear Jahve say :
“Yea, His mercy endureth for ever.”

(On the way.)

- 5 Out of straitness I cried unto Jah,
Jah answered me upon a broad plain.
- 6 Jahve is for me—I do not fear,
What can men do unto me?
- 7 Jahve is for me as my help,
Therefore shall I see my desire upon those who hate me.

- 8 It is better to hide one's self in Jahve
Than to put confidence in men.
- 9 It is better to take refuge in Jahve
Than to put confidence in princes.
- 10 Let all the heathen compass me about—
In the name of Jahve will I verily cut them in pieces.
- 11 Let them compass me about on all sides—
In the name of Jahve will I verily cut them in pieces.
- 12 Let them compass me about like bees—
They are extinguished like a fire of thorns,
In the name of Jahve will I verily cut them in pieces.
- 13 Thou gavest me indeed a thrust that I might fall,
But Jahve hath helped me.
- 14 My pride and my song is Jah,
And He became my salvation.
- 15 The cry of exultation and of salvation resoundeth in the tents of the righteous :
The right hand of Jahve getteth the victory.
- 16 The right hand of Jahve is highly exalted,
The right hand of Jahve getteth the victory.
- 17 I shall not die, nay I shall live,
And declare the deeds of Jah.
- 18 Jah hath chastened me sore,
But hath not given me over unto death.

(At the going in.)

- 19 Open to me the gates of righteousness,
That I may enter into them, that I may give thanks to Jah!

(Those who receive the festal procession.)

- 20 This is the gate of Jahve,
The righteous may enter there.
- 21 I give thanks unto Thee, for Thou hast answered me,
And art become my salvation.
- 22 The stone, which the builders despised,
Is become the corner and head stone.
- 23 From Jahve is this come to pass,
It is marvellous in our eyes.
- 24 This is the day which Jahve hath made,
Let us exult and rejoice at it!

- 25 O Jahve, save I beseech Thee,
 O Jahve, grant I beseech Thee prosperity !!
- 26 Blessed be he who cometh in the name of Jahve,
 We bless you from the house of Jahve.
- 27 God is Jahve and hath given us light—
 Bind the festive sacrifice with cords
 Even up to the horns of the altar !

(Answer of those who have arrived.)

- 28 My God art Thou, therefore will I give Thee thanks,
 My Deity, I will exalt Thee.

(All together.)

- 29 Give thanks unto Jahve, for He is good,
 Yea, His mercy endureth for ever.

What the close of Ps. cxvii. says of God's truth, viz. that it endureth for ever, the beginning of Ps. cxviii. says of its sister, His mercy or loving-kindness. It is the closing Psalm of the Hallel, which begins with Ps. cxiii., and the third Hodu (vid. on Ps. cv.). It was Luther's favourite Psalm: his beautiful Confitemini, which "had helped him out of troubles out of which neither emperor nor king, nor any other man on earth, could have helped him." With the exposition of this his noblest jewel, his defence and his treasure, he occupied himself in the solitude of his Patmos.

It is without any doubt a post-exilic song. Here too Hupfeld sweeps away everything into vague generality; but the history of the period after the Exile, without any necessity for our coming down to the Maccabæan period, as do De Wette and Hitzig, presents three occasions which might have given birth to it; viz. (1) The first celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles in the seventh month of the first year of the Return, when there was only a plain altar as yet erected on the holy place, Ezra iii. 1-4 (to be distinguished from a later celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles on a large scale and in exact accordance with the directions of the Law, Neh. ch. viii.). So Ewald. (2) The laying of the foundation-stone of the Temple in the second month of the second year, Ezra iii. 8 sqq. So Hengstenberg. (3) The dedication of the completed Temple in the twelfth month of the sixth year of Darius, Ezra vi. 15 sqq. So Stier. These references to cotemporary history have all three more or less in their favour. The first is favoured more especially by the fact, that at the time of the second Temple ver. 25 was the festal cry amidst which the altar of burnt-offering was solemnly compassed on the first six days of the Feast of Tabernacles once, and on the seventh day seven times. This seventh day was called the great Hosanna (Hosanna rabba), and not only the prayers for the Feast of Tabernacles, but even the branches of willow trees (including the myrtles) which are bound to the palm-branch (lulab), were called Hosannas (הושענות, Aramaic הושעני).* The second historical reference is favoured by the fact, that the narrative appears to point directly to our Psalm when it says: And the builders laid the foundation of the Temple of Jahve, and the priests were drawn up there in official robes with trumpets, and the Levites the descendants of Asaph with cymbals, to praise Jahve after the direction of David king of Israel, and they sang בְּהַלֵּל וּבְהוֹדוֹת לַיהוָה כִּי טוֹב כִּי־לְעוֹלָם חָסְדוֹ עַל־יִשְׂרָאֵל; and all the people raised a great shout בְּהַלֵּל לַיהוָה, because the house of Jahve was founded. But both of these derivations of the Psalm are opposed by the fact that vers. 19 and 20 assume that the Temple-building is already finished; whereas the unmistakable allusions to the events that transpired during the building of the Temple, viz. the intrigues of the Samaritans, the hostility of the neighbouring peoples, and the capriciousness of the Persian kings, favour the third. In connection with this reference of the Psalm to the post-exilic dedication of the Temple, vers. 19, 20, too, now present no difficulty. Ver. 22 is better understood as spoken in the presence of the now upreared Temple-building, than as spoken in the presence of the foundation-stone; and the words "unto the horns of the altar" in ver. 27, interpreted in many different ways, come into the light of Ezra vi. 17.

The Psalm falls into two divisions. The first division (vers. 1-19) is sung by the festive procession brought up by the priests and Levites, which is ascending to the Temple with the animals for sacrifice. With ver. 19 the procession stands at the entrance. The second part (vers. 20-27) is sung by the body of Levites who receive the festive procession. Then ver. 28 is the answer of those who have arrived, and ver. 29 the concluding song of all of them. This antiphonal arrangement is recognised even by the Talmud (B. Pesachim 119a) and Midrash. The whole Psalm, too, has moreover a peculiar formation. It resembles the Mashal Psalms, for each verse has of itself its completed sense, its own scent and hue; one thought is joined to another as branch to branch and flower to flower.

Vers. 1-18. The Hodu-cry is addressed first to all and every one; then the whole body of the laity of Israel and the priests, and at last (as it appears) the proselytes (vid. on cxv. 9-11) who fear the God of revelation, are urgently admonished to echo it back; for "yea, His mercy endureth for ever," is the required hypophon. In ver. 5, Israel too then begins as one man to praise the ever-gracious goodness of God. יְהוָה, the Jod of which might easily become inaudible after קָרָאתִי, has an emphatic Dagesh as in ver. 18a, and הַמְצִיֵר has the orthophonic stroke beside צִר (the so-called מִצְוֶה), which points to the correct tone-syllable of the word that has Dechâ.* Instead of עֲנֵנִי it is here pointed עֲנֵנִי, which also occurs in other instances not only with distinctive, but also (though not uniformly) with conjunctive accents.† The construction is a pregnant one (as in xxii. 22, xxviii. 1, lxxiv. 7, 2 Sam. xviii. 19, Ezra ii. 62, 2 Chron. xxxii. 1): He answered me by removing me to a free space

† Hitzig on Prov. viii. 22 considers the pointing עֲנֵנִי to be occasioned by Dechâ, and in fact עֲנֵנִי in the passage before us has Tarcha, and in 1 Sam. xxviii. 15 Munach; but in the passage before us, if we read במרהביה as one word according to the Masora, עֲנֵנִי is rather to be accented with Mugrash; and in 1 Sam. xxviii. 15 the reading עֲנֵנִי is found side by side with עֲנֵנִי (e.g. in Bibl. Bomberg. 1521). Nevertheless צרפתי xvii. 3, and הָרַנִּי Job xxx. 19 (according to Kimchi's Michlol, 30a), beside Mercha, show that the pointing beside conjunctive as beside disjunctive accents wavers between á and ā, although ā is properly only justified beside disjunctive accents, and עֲנֵנִי also really only occurs in pause.

(xviii. 20). Both lines end with יהִי; nevertheless the reading בְּמִרְחֵבֶיהָ is attested by the Masora (vid. Baer's Psalterium, pp. 132 sq.), instead of בְּמִרְחֵבֵי יְהוָה. It has its advocates even in the Talmud (B. Pesachim 117a), and signifies a boundless extent, יה expressing the highest degree of comparison, like מְאִפְלֵיָהּ in Jer. ii. 31, the deepest darkness. Even the LXX. appears to have read בְּמִרְחֵבֶיהָ thus as one word (εἰς πλατυσμόν, Symmachus εἰς εὐρυχωρίαν). The Targum and Jerome, however, render it as we do; it is highly improbable that in one and the same verse the divine name should not be intended to be used in the same force of meaning. Ps. lvi. (vers. 10; 5, 12) echoes in ver. 6; and in ver. 7 Ps. liv. (ver. 6) is in the mind of the later poet. In that passage it is still more clear than in the passage before us that by the Beth of בְּעֵזְרֵי Jahve is not meant to be designated as unus e multis, but as a helper who outweighs the greatest multitude of helpers. The Jewish people had experienced this helpful succour of Jahve in opposition to the persecutions of the Samaritans and the satraps during the building of the Temple; and had at the same time learned what is expressed in vers. 7, 8 (cf. cxlvi. 3), that trust in Jahve (for which בְּ יְהוָה is the proper word) proves true, and trust in men, on the contrary, and especially in princes, is deceptive; for under Pseudo-Smerdis the work, begun under Cyrus, and represented as open to suspicion even in the reign of Cambyses, was interdicted. But in the reign of Darius it again became free: Jahve showed that He disposes events and the hearts of men in favour of His people, so that out of this has grown up in the minds of His people the confident expectation of a world-subduing supremacy expressed in ver. 10.

The clauses vers. 10a, 11a, and 12a, expressed in the perfect form, are intended more hypothetically than as describing facts. The perfect is here set out in relief as a hypothetical tense by the following future. בְּלִבְנוֹתָם signifies, as in cxvii. 1, the heathen of every kind. דְּבַרְיָם (in the Aramaic and Arabic with ṭ) are both bees and wasps, which make themselves especially troublesome in harvest time. The suffix of אֲמִילָם (from מָלַל = מָלַל, to hew down, cut in pieces) is the same as in Ex. xxix. 30, ii. 17, and also beside a conjunctive accent in lxxiv. 8. Yet the reading אֲמִילָם, like יְהִיתָ Hab. ii. 17, is here the better supported (vid. Gesenius, Lehrgebäude, S. 177), and it has been adopted by Norzi, Heidenheim, and Baer. The ׀ is that which states the ground or reason, and then becomes directly confirmatory and assuring (cxxxviii. 2, 4), which here, after the "in the name of Jahve" that precedes it, is applied and placed just as in the oath in 1 Sam. xiv. 44. And in general, as Redslob has demonstrated, ׀ has not originally a relative, but a positive (determining) signification, ׀ being just as much a demonstrative sound as ׀, ׀, ׀, and ׀ (cf. ἐκεῖ, ἐκεῖνος, κείνος, ecce, hic, illic, with the Doric τηνεῖ, τῆνος). The notion of compassing round about is heightened in ver. 11a by the juxtaposition of two forms of the same verb (Ges. § 67, rem. 10), as in Hos. iv. 18, Hab. i. 5, Zeph. ii. 1, and frequently. The figure of the bees is taken from Deut. i. 44. The perfect ׀׀׀ (cf. Isa. xliii. 17) describes their destruction, which takes place instantly and unexpectedly. The Pual points to the punishing power that comes upon them: they are extinguished (extinguuntur) like a fire of thorns, the crackling flame of which expires as quickly as it has blazed up (lviii. 10). In ver. 13 the language of Israel is addressed to the hostile worldly power, as the antithesis shows. It thrust, yea thrust (inf. intens.) Israel, that it might fall (׀׀׀; with reference to the pointing, vid. on xl. 15); but Jahve's help would not suffer it to come to that pass. Therefore the song at the Red Sea is revived in the heart and mouth of Israel. Ver. 14 (like Isa. xii. 2) is taken from Ex. xv. 2. ׀׀ (in MSS. also written ׀׀) is a collateral form of ׀׀ (Ew. § 255, a), and here signifies the lofty self-consciousness which is united with the possession of power: pride and its expression an exclamation of joy. Concerning ׀׀׀ vid. on xvi. 6. As at that time, the cry of exultation and of salvation (i.e. of deliverance and of victory) is in the tabernacles of the righteous: the right hand of Jahve—they sing—׀׀׀׀ (Num. xxiv. 18), practises valour, proves itself energetic, gains (maintains) the victory. ׀׀׀׀ is Milva, and therefore an adjective: victoriosa (Ew. § 120, d), from ׀׀׀ = ׀׀ like ׀׀׀ from ׀׀׀. It is not the part. Pil. (cf. Hos. xi. 7), since the rejection of the participial Mem occurs in connection with Poal and Pual, but not elsewhere with Pilel (׀׀׀׀ = ׀׀׀׀ from ׀׀׀). The word yields a simpler sense, too, as adject. participiale Kal; romēmā'h is only the fuller form for ramā'h,

Ex. xiv. 8 (cf. ra'mah, Isa. xxvi. 11). It is not its own strength that avails for Israel's exultation of victory, but the energy of the right hand of Jahve. Being come to the brink of the abyss, Israel is become anew sure of its immortality through Him. God has, it is true, most severely chastened it (יִפְרֹץ with the suffix anni as in Gen. xxx. 6, and הָיָה with the emphatic Dagesh, which neither reduplicates nor connects, cf. ver. 5, xciv. 12), but still with moderation (Isa. xxvii. 7 sq.). He has not suffered Israel to fall a prey to death, but reserved it for its high vocation, that it may see the mighty deeds of God and proclaim them to all the world. Amidst such celebration of Jahve the festive procession of the dedication of the Temple has arrived at the enclosure wall of the Temple.

Vers. 19-29. The gates of the Temple are called gates of righteousness because they are the entrance to the place of the mutual intercourse between God and His church in accordance with the order of salvation. First the "gates" are spoken of, and then the one "gate," the principal entrance. Those entering in must be "righteous ones;" only conformity with the divine loving will gives the right to enter. With reference to the formation of the conclusion ver. 19*b*, vid. Ew. § 347, b. In the Temple-building Israel has before it a reflection of that which, being freed from the punishment it had had to endure, it is become through the mercy of its God. With the exultation of the multitude over the happy beginning of the rebuilding there was mingled, at the laying of the foundation-stone, the loud weeping of many of the grey-headed priests, Levites, and heads of the tribes who had also seen the first Temple (Ezra iii. 12 sq.). It was the troublous character of the present which made them thus sad in spirit; the consideration of the depressing circumstances of the time, the incongruity of which weighed so heavily upon their soul in connection with the remembrance of the former Temple, that memorably glorious monument of the royal power of David and Solomon.* And even further on there towered aloft before Zerubbabel, the leader of the building, a great mountain; gigantic difficulties and hindrances arose between the powerlessness of the present position of Zerubbabel and the completion of the building of the Temple, which had it is true been begun, but was impeded. This mountain God has made into a plain, and qualified Zerubbabel to bring forth the top and key-stone (הַאֲבֶן הַרְאִשׁוֹנָה) out of its past concealment, and thus to complete the building, which is now consecrated amidst a loud outburst of incessant shouts of joy (Zech. iv. 7). Ver. 22 points back to that disheartened disdain of the small troublous beginning, which was at work among the builders (Ezra iii. 10) at the laying of the foundation-stone, and then further at the interruption of the building. That rejected (disdained) corner-stone is nevertheless become הַאֲבֶן הַרְאִשׁוֹנָה, i.e. the head-stone of the corner (Job xxxviii. 6), which being laid upon the corner, supports and protects the stately edifice—an emblem of the power and dignity to which Israel has attained in the midst of the peoples out of deep humiliation.

In connection with this only indirect reference of the assertion to Israel we avoid the question,—perplexing in connection with the direct reference to the people despised by the heathen,—how can the heathen be called “the builders?” Kurtz answers: “For the building which the heathen world considers it to be its life’s mission and its mission in history to rear, viz. the Babel-tower of worldly power and worldly glory, they have neither been able nor willing to make use of Israel . . .” But this conjunction of ideas is devoid of scriptural support and without historical reality; for the empire of the world has set just as much value, according to political relations, upon the incorporation of Israel as upon that of every other people. Further, if what is meant is Israel’s own despising of the small beginning of a new era that is dawning, it is then better explained as in connection with the reference of the declaration to Jesus the Christ in Matt. xxi. 42-44, Mark xii. 10 sq., Acts iv. 11 (ὕψ’ ὑμῶν τῶν οἰκοδομούντων), 1 Pet. ii. 7, the builders are the chiefs and members of Israel itself, and not the heathen. From 1 Pet. ii. 6, Rom. ix. 33, we see how this reference to Christ is brought about, viz. by means of Isa. xxviii. 16, where Jahve says: Behold I am He who hath laid in Zion a stone, a stone of trial, a precious corner-stone of well-founded founding—whosoever believeth shall not totter. In the light of this Messianic prophecy of Isaiah ver. 22 of our Psalm also comes to have a Messianic meaning, which is warranted by the fact, that the history of Israel is recapitulated and culminates in the history of Christ; or, according to John ii. 19-21 (cf. Zech. vi. 12 sq.), still more accurately by the fact, that He who in His state of humiliation is the despised and rejected One is become in His state of glorification the eternal glorious Temple in which dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, and is united with humanity which has been once for all atoned for. In the joy of the church at the Temple of the body of Christ which arose after the three days of burial, the joy which is here typically expressed in the words: "From with Jahve, i.e. by the might which dwells with Him, is this come to pass, wonderful is it become (has it been carried out) in our eyes," therefore received its fulfilment. It is not נִפְלְאוֹת but נִפְלְאוֹת, like הַבְּנֵי in Gen. xxxiii. 11, קָרָא from קָרָה = קָרָה in Deut. xxxi. 29, Jer. xlv. 23, קָרָאת from קָרָה, to call, Isa. vii. 14. We can hear Isa. xxv. 9 sounding through this passage, as above in vers. 19 sq., Isa. xxvi. 1 sq. The God of Israel has given this turn, so full of glory for His people, to the history.* He is able now to plead for more distant salvation and prosperity with all the more fervent confidence. מִנְּיָה (six times מִנְּיָה) is, as in every other instance (vid. on cxvi. 4), Milra. הוֹשִׁיעָהּ is accented regularly on the penult., and draws the following מִנְּיָה towards itself by means of Dag. forte conj.; הַעֲלִיחָהּ on the other hand is Milra according to the Masora and other ancient testimonies, and מִנְּיָה is not dageshed, without Norzi being able to state any reason for this different accentuation. After this watchword of prayer of the thanksgiving feast, in ver. 26 those who receive them bless those who are coming (הַבְּנֵי with Dechî) in the name of Jahve, i.e. bid them welcome in His name. The expression "from the house of Jahve," like "from the fountain of Israel" in lxviii. 27, is equivalent to, ye who belong to His house and to the church congregated around it. In the mouth of the people welcoming Jesus as the Messiah, 'Ωσαννά was a "God save the king" (vid. on xx. 10); they scattered palm branches at the same time, like the lulabs at the joyous cry of the Feast of Tabernacles, and saluted Him

* The verse, "This is the day which the Lord hath made," etc., was, according to Chrysostom, an ancient hypophon of the church. It has a glorious history.

with the cry, "Blessed is He who cometh in the name of the Lord," as being the longed-for guest of the Feast (Matt. xxi. 9). According to the Midrash, in ver. 26 it is the people of Jerusalem who thus greet the pilgrims. In the original sense of the Psalm, however, it is the body of Levites and priests above on the Temple-hill who thus receive the congregation that has come up. The many animals for sacrifice which they brought with them are enumerated in Ezra vi. 17. On the ground of the fact that Jahve has proved Himself to be  $\text{לשׁ}$ , the absolutely mighty One, by having granted light to His people, viz. loving-kindness, liberty, and joy, there then issues forth the ejaculation, "Bind the sacrifice," etc. The LXX. renders συστήσασθε ἑορτήν ἐν τοῖς πυκάζουσιν, which is reproduced by the Psalterium Romanum: constituite diem solemnem in confrequentationibus, as Eusebius, Theodoret, and Chrysostom (although the last waveringly) also interpret it; on the other hand, it is rendered by the Psalterium Gallicum: in condensis, as Apollinaris and Jerome (in frondosis) also understand it. But much as Luther's version, which follows the latter interpretation, "Adorn the feast with green branches even to the horns of the altar," accords with our German taste, it is still untenable; for  $\text{סָבַר}$  cannot signify to encircle with garlands and the like, nor would it be altogether suited to  $\text{קַרְנֵי}$  in this signification.\* Thus then in this instance A. Lobwasser renders it comparatively more correctly, although devoid of taste: "The Lord is great and mighty of strength who lighteneth us all; fasten your bullocks to the horns beside the altar." To the horns?! So even Hitzig and others render it. But such a "binding to" is unheard of. And can  $\text{עַל סָבַר}$  possibly signify to bind on to anything? And what would be the object of binding them to the horns of the altar? In order that they might not run away?! Hengstenberg and von Lengerke at least disconnect the words "unto the horns of the altar" from any relation to this precautionary measure, by interpreting: until it (the animal for the festal sacrifice) is raised upon the horns of the altar and sacrificed. But how much is then imputed to these words! No indeed, אֵלֹהִים denotes the animals for the feast-offering, and there was so vast a number of these (according to Ezra loc. cit. seven hundred and twelve) that the whole space of the court of the priests was full of them, and the binding of them consequently had to go on as far as to the horns of the altar. Ainsworth (1627) correctly renders: "unto the hornes, that is, all the Court over, untill you come even to the hornes of the altar, intending hereby many sacrifices or boughs." The meaning of the call is therefore: Bring your hecatombs and make them ready for sacrifice.\* The words "unto (as far as) the horns of the altar" have the principal accent. In ver. 28 (cf. Ex. xv. 2) the festal procession replies in accordance with the character of the feast, and then the Psalm closes, in correspondence with its beginning, with a Hodu in which all voices join.

PSALM CXIX.

A TWENTY-TWO-FOLD STRING OF APHORISMS BY ONE WHO IS PERSECUTED FOR THE SAKE OF HIS FAITH.

Aleph.

- 1 BLESSED are those whose ways are blameless,
Who walk in the law of Jahve!

They walk in His ways.
- 4 THOU hast enjoined Thy precepts
To keep them diligently.
- 5 Oh that my ways were directed
To keep Thy statutes!
- 6 Then shall I not be ashamed,
When I have respect unto all Thy commandments.

When wilt Thou execute judgment on those who persecute

So will I keep the testimony of Thy mouth.

- 94 I am Thine, save me ;
For I seek Thy precepts.

Therefore I hate every false way.

Yet do I not forget Thy law.

And for the word of Thy righteousness.

And teach me Thy statutes.
- 125 Thy servant am I, give me understanding,
That I may know Thy testimonies.

They have made void Thy law.
- 127 Therefore I love Thy commandments
More than gold, and than fine gold.
- 128 Therefore I esteem all precepts concerning all things to
I hate every false way. [be right ;

Phe (Pe).

- 129 Wonderful are Thy testimonies :
Therefore doth my soul keep them.

- 130 The unfolding of Thy words giveth light ;
 Giving understanding unto the simple.

 Jahve, Thy statutes will I keep !
- 146 When I cry unto Thee, save me,
 And I will keep Thy testimonies !
- 147 Early, even before the dawning of the morning, did I

To meditate on Thy word.
- 149 Hear my voice according unto Thy loving-kindness ;
Jahve, quicken me according to Thy judgments.

Who are far from Thy law :
- 151 Thou comest all the nearer, O Jahve,
And all Thy commandments are truth.
- 152 From Thy testimonies I have known for a long time
That Thou hast founded them for ever.

For all my ways are before Thee.

Give me understanding according to Thy word.

And Thy law is my delight.
175 Let my soul live and praise Thee,
And let Thy judgments help me.
176 If I should go astray—as a lost sheep seek Thy servant,
For I do not forget Thy commandments.

To the Hodu Ps. cxviii., written in gnome-like, wreathed style, is appended the throughout gnomico-didactic Ps. cxix., consisting of one hundred and seventy-six Masoretic verses, or regarded in relation to the strophe, distichs, which according to the twenty-two letters of the alphabet fall into twenty-two groups (called by the old expositors the ὀγδοάδες or octonarii of this Psalms literatus s. alphabetites); for each group contains eight verses (distichs), each of which begins with the same consecutive letter ( $8 \times 22 = 176$ ). The Latin Psalters (as the Psalterium Veronense, and originally perhaps all the old Greek Psalters) have the name of the letter before each group; the Syriac has the signs of the letters; and in the Complutensian Bible, as also elsewhere, a new line begins with each group. The Talmud, B. Berachoth, says of this Psalm: "it consists of eight Alephs," etc.; the Masora styles it אלפא ביתא רבא; the Midrash on it is called מדרש אלפא ביתא, and the Pesikta d'thmani פסיקתא דתמניא אפי. In our German version it has the appropriate inscription, "The Christian's golden A B C of the praise, love, power, and use of the word of God;" for here we have set forth in inexhaustible fulness what the word of God is to a man, and how a man is to behave himself in relation to it. The Masora observes that the Psalm contains only the one verse 122, in which some reference or other to the word of revelation is not found as in all the 175 others\*—a many-linked chain of synonyms which runs through the whole Psalm. In connection with this ingenious arrangement, so artfully devised and carried out, it may also not be merely accidental that the address Jahve occurs twenty-two times, as Bengel has observed: bis et vicesies pro numero octonariorum.

All kinds of erroneous views have, however, been put forth concerning this Psalm. Köster, von Gerlach, Hengstenberg, and Hupfeld renounce all attempts to show that there is any accordance whatever with a set plan, and find here a series of maxims without any internal progression and connection. Ewald begins at once with the error, that we have before us the long prayer of an old experienced teacher. But from vers. 9 sq. it is clear that the poet himself is a "young man," a fact that is also corroborated by vers. 99 and 100. The poet is a young man, who finds himself in a situation which is clearly described: he is derided, oppressed, persecuted, and that by those who despise the divine word (for apostasy encompasses him round about), and more particularly by a government hostile to the true religion, vers. 23, 46, 161. He is lying in bonds (ver. 61, cf. 83), expecting death (ver. 109), and recognises in his affliction, it is true, God's salutary humbling, and in the midst of it God's word is his comfort and his wisdom, but he also yearns for help, and earnestly prays for it.—The whole Psalm is a prayer for stedfastness in the midst of an ungodly, degenerate race, and in the midst of great trouble, which is heightened by the pain he feels at the prevailing apostasy, and a prayer for ultimate deliverance which rises in group Kaph to an urgent how long! If this sharply-defined physiognomy of the Psalm is recognised, then the internal progression will not fail to be discerned.

* "In every verse," this is the observation of the Masora on ver. 122, "ver. 122 only excepted, we find one of the ten (pointing to the ten fundamental words or decalogue of the Sinaitic Law) expressions: word, saying, testimonies, way, judgment, precept, commandment (צְוִיָּה), law, statute, truth" (according to another reading, righteousness).

After the poet has praised fidelity to the word of God (Aleph), and described it as the virtue of all virtues which is of service to the young man and to which he devotes himself (Beth), he prays, in the midst of the scoffing and persecuting persons that surround him, for the grace of enlightenment (Gimel), of strengthening (Daleth), of preservation (He), of suitable and joyful confession (Vav); God's word is all his thought and pursuit (Zajin), he cleaves to those who fear God (Heth), and recognises the salutary element of His humbling (Teth), but is in need of comfort (Jod) and sighs: how long! (Kaph.) Without the eternal, sure, mighty word of God he would despair (Lamed); this is his wisdom in difficult circumstances (Mem); he has sworn fidelity to it, and maintains his fidelity as being one who is persecuted (Nun), and abhors and despises the apostates (Samech). He is oppressed, but God will not suffer him to be crushed (Ajin); He will not suffer the doings of the ungodly, which wring from him floods of tears, to prevail over him (Phe)—over him, the small (still youthful) and despised one whom zeal concerning the prevailing godlessness is consuming away (Tsade). Oh that God would hear his crying by day and by night (Koph), would revive him speedily with His helpful pity (Resh)—him, viz., who being persecuted by princes clings fast to Him (Shin), and would seek him the isolated and so sorely imperilled sheep! (Tav.) This outline does not exhaust the fundamental thoughts of the separate ogdoads, and they might surely be still more aptly reproduced, but this is sufficient to show that the Psalm is not wanting in coherence and progressive movement, and that it is not an ideal situation and mood, but a situation and mood based upon public relationships, from which this manifold celebration of the divine word, as a fruit of its teaching, has sprung.

It is natural to suppose that the composition of the Psalm falls in those times of the Greek domination in which the government was hostile, and a large party from among the Jews themselves, that was friendly towards the government, persecuted all decided confessors of the Tôra. Hitzig says, "It can be safely maintained that the Psalm was written in the Maccabæan age by a renowned Israelite who was in imprisonment under Gentile authorities." It is at least probable that the plaited work of so long a Psalm, which, in connection with all that is artificial about it, from beginning to end gives us a glimpse of the subdued afflicted mien of a confessor, is the work of one in prison, who whiled away his time with this plaiting together of his complaints and his consolatory thoughts.

Vers. 1-8. The eightfold Aleph. Blessed are those who act according to the word of God; the poet wishes to be one of these. The alphabetical Psalm on the largest scale begins appropriately, not merely with a simple (cxii. 1), but with a twofold ashré. It refers principally to those integri viæ (vitæ). In ver. 3 the description of those who are accounted blessed is carried further. Perfects, as denoting that which is habitual, alternate with futures used as presents. In ver. 4 לְשׂוֹר expresses the purpose of the enjoining, as in ver. 5 the goal of the directing. אֲחֵלֵי (whence אֲחֵלֵי, 2 Kings v. 3) is compounded of אָס (vid. supra, i. 428) and לֵי (לֵי), and consequently signifies o si. On יִבְנֵי cf. Prov. iv. 26 (LXX. κατευθυνθειήσαν). The retrospective יִשׁ is expanded anew in ver. 6b: then, when I namely. "Judgments of Thy righteousness" are the decisions concerning right and wrong which give expression to and put in execution the righteousness of God.* בְּלִמְרֵי refers to Scripture in comparison with history.

Vers. 9-16. The eightfold Beth. Acting in accordance with the word of God, a young man walks blamelessly; the poet desires this, and supplicates God's gracious assistance in order to it. To purify or cleanse one's way or walk (וַיְכַרְתֵּנִי, cf. lxxiii. 13, Prov. xx. 9) signifies to maintain it pure (כָּרַת, root כָּר),

* The word "judgments" of our English authorized version is retained in the text as being the most convenient word; it must, however, be borne in mind that in this Psalm it belongs to the "chain of synonyms," and does not mean God's acts of judgment, its more usual meaning in the Old Testament Scriptures, but is used as defined above, and is the equivalent here of the German Rechte, not Gerichte.—TR.

זך, to prick, to strike the eye, nitere;* vid. Fleischer in Levy's Chaldäisches Wörterbuch, i. 424) from the spotting of sin, or to free it from it. Ver. 9b is the answer to the question in ver. 9a; לְשׂמֵר signifies custodiendo semetipsum, for שָׁמַר can also signify "to be on one's guard" without נִבְשׂוּ (Josh. vi. 18). The old classic (e.g. xviii. 31) אֶמְרָתְךָ alternates throughout with דִּבְרָךְ; both are intended collectively. One is said to hide (צָפַן) the word in one's heart when one has it continually present with him, not merely as an outward precept, but as an inward motive power in opposition to selfish action (Job xxiii. 12). In ver. 12 the poet makes his way through adoration to petition. כִּפְרָתִי in ver. 13 does not mean enumeration, but recounting, as in Deut. vi. 7. עֲרוֹת is the plural to עָרוֹת; עָרוֹת, on the contrary, in ver. 138 is the plural to עָרָה: both are used of God's attestation of Himself and of His will in the word of revelation. כְּעַל signifies, according to ver. 162, "as over" (short for כְּבִאֲשֶׁר עַל), not: as it were more than (Olshausen); the כִּ would only be troublesome in connection with this interpretation. With reference to הוֹן, which has occurred already in xlv. 13, cxii. 3 (from הוֹן, הוֹן, to be light, levem), aisance, ease, opulence, and concrete, goods, property, vid. Fleischer in Levy's Chald. Wörterb. i. 423 sq. אֶרְחֹתֶיךָ, ver. 15, are the paths traced out in the word of God; these he will studiously keep in his eye.

Vers. 17-24. The eightfold Gimel. This is his life's aim: he will do it under fear of the curse of apostasy; he will do it also though he suffer persecution on account of it. In ver. 17 the expression is only אֶחֱיָה as cxviii. 19, not וְאֶחֱיָה as in vers. 77, 116, 144: the apodosis imper. only begins with וְאֶשְׁמְרָה, whereas אֶחֱיָה is the good itself for the bestowment of which the poet prays. גַּל in ver. 18a is imper. apoc. Piel for גָּלָה, like גַּם in Dan. i. 12. גִּבְלֵאוֹת is the expression for everything supernatural and mysterious which is incomprehensible to the ordinary understanding and is left to the perception of faith. The Tôra beneath the surface of its letter contains an abundance of such "wondrous things," into which only eyes from which

God has removed the covering of natural short-sightedness penetrate; hence the prayer in ver. 18. Upon earth we have no abiding resting-place, we sojourn here as in a strange land (ver. 19, xxxix. 13, 1 Chron. xxix. 15). Hence the poet prays in ver. 19 that God would keep His commandments, these rules of conduct for the journey of life, in living consciousness for him. Towards this, according to ver. 20, his longing tends. גָּרַם (Hiph. in Lam. iii. 16) signifies to crush in pieces, جرش, and here, like the Aramaic גָּרַם, גָּרַם, to be crushed, broken in pieces. לְחַאֲבָה (from חָאֵב, vers. 40, 174, a secondary form of חָאֵב) states the bias of mind in or at which the soul feels itself thus overpowered even to being crushed: it is crushing from longing after God's judgments, viz. after a more and more thorough knowledge of them. In ver. 21 the LXX. has probably caught the meaning of the poet better than the pointing has done, inasmuch as it draws ἐπικατάρατοι to ver. 21b, so that ver. 21a consists of two words, just like vers. 59a, 89a; and Kamphausen also follows this in his rendering. For אֲרִירִים as an attribute is unpoetical, and as an accusative of the predicate far-fetched; whereas it comes in naturally as a predicate before הַשֵּׁנִים מִמְצוֹתַיָּהּ : cursed (אָרַר = <sup>ه</sup>جَرَّ, detestari), viz. by God. Instead of גָּל, "roll" (from גָּלַל, Josh. v. 9), it is pointed in ver. 22 גָּל (מעל), "uncover" = גָּלָה, as in ver. 18, reproach being conceived of as a covering or veil (as e.g. in lxix. 8), cf. Isa. xxii. 8 (perhaps also Lam. ii. 14, iv. 22, if גָּלָה עַל there signifies "to remove the covering upon anything"). גַּם in ver. 23a, as in Jer. xxxvi. 25, has the sense of גַּם־כִּי, etiamsi; and גַּם in ver. 24a the sense of nevertheless, ὁμως, Ew. § 354, a. On גָּדַר בְּ (reciprocal), cf. Ezek. xxxiii. 30. As in a criminal tribunal, princes sit and deliberate how they may be able to render him harmless.

Vers. 25-32. The eightfold Daleth. He is in deep trouble, and prays for consolation and strengthening by means of God's word, to which he resigns himself. His soul is fixed to the dust (xliv. 26) in connection with such non-recognition and proscription, and is incapable of raising itself. In ver. 25b he implores new strength and spirits (הִיָּה as in lxxi. 20, lxxxv. 7) from God, in conformity with and by reason of His word. He has rehearsed his walk in every detail to God, and has not been left without an answer, which has assured him of His good pleasure: may He then be pleased to advance him ever further and further in the understanding of His word, in order that, though men are against him, he may nevertheless have God on his side, vers. 26, 27. The complaint and request expressed in ver. 25 are renewed in ver. 28.  $\text{דָּלָה}$  refers to the soul, which is as it were melting away in the trickling down of tears;  $\text{קִיָּים}$  is a Piel of Aramaic formation belonging to the later language. In vers. 29, 30 the way of lies or of treachery, and the way of faithfulness or of perseverance in the truth, stand in opposition to one another.  $\text{הִנֵּן}$  is construed with a double accusative, inasmuch as  $\text{תּוֹרָה}$  has not the rigid notion of a fixed teaching, but of living empirical instruction.  $\text{שָׁהָה}$  (short for  $\text{שָׁהָה לְנַגֵּד}$ , xvi. 8) signifies to put or set, viz. as a norma normans that stands before one's eyes. He cleaves to the testimonies of God; may Jahve not disappoint the hope which to him springs up out of them, according to the promise, ver. 31. He runs, i.e. walks vigorously and cheerfully, in the way of God's commandments, for He has widened his heart, by granting and preserving to the persecuted one the joyfulness of confession and the confidence of hope.

Vers. 33-40. The eightfold He. He further prays for instruction and guidance that he may escape the by-paths of selfishness and of disavowal. The noun  $\text{עֲקִיב}$ , used also elsewhere as an accus. adverb., in the signification ad extremum (vers. 33 and 112) is peculiar to our poet.  $\text{אֶצְרָנָה}$  (with a Shebā which takes a colouring in accordance with the principal form) refers back to  $\text{דָּרָה}$ . In the petition "give me understanding" (which occurs six times in this Psalm)  $\text{הִבֵּן}$  is causative, as in Job xxxii. 8, and frequently in the post-exilic writings.  $\text{בָּצַע}$  (from  $\text{בָּצַעַת}$ , abscindere, as  $\text{κέρδος}$  accords in sound with  $\text{κείρω}$ ) signifies gain and acquisition by means of the damage which one does to his neighbour by depreciating his property, by robbery, deceit, and extortion (1 Sam. viii. 3), and as a name of a vice, covetousness, and in general selfishness.  $\text{שֵׁנָה}$  is that which is without real, i.e. without divine, contents or intrinsic worth,—God-opposed teaching and life.  $\text{בְּדַרְבָּךְ}$ \* is a defective plural; cf.  $\text{הִסְרֶה}$ , ver. 41,  $\text{וּמִשְׁפָּטָה}$ , ver. 43, and frequently. Establishing, in ver. 38, is equivalent to a realizing of the divine word or promise. The relative clause  $\text{לְיִרְאָתָהּ}$  is not to be referred to  $\text{לְעֵבְרָהּ}$  according to ver. 85 (where the expression is different), but to  $\text{אֲמַרְתָּהּ}$ : fulfil to Thy servant Thy word or promise, as that which (quippe quæ) aims at men attaining the fear of Thee and increasing therein (cf. cxxx. 4, xl. 4). The reproach which the poet fears in ver. 39 is not the reproach of confessing, but of denying God. Accordingly  $\text{מִשְׁפָּטָיִךְ}$  are not God's judgments [i.e. acts of judgment], but revealed decisions or judgments: these are good, inasmuch as it is well with him who keeps them. He can appeal before God to the fact that he is set upon the knowledge and experience of these with longing of heart; and he bases his request upon the fact that God by virtue of His righteousness, i.e. the stringency with which He maintains His order of grace, both as to its promises and its duties, would quicken him, who is at present as it were dead with sorrow and weariness.

Vers. 41-48. The eightfold Vav. He prays for the grace of true and fearlessly joyous confession. The LXX. renders ver. 41a:  $\text{καὶ ἔλθοι ἐπ' ἐμὲ τὸ ἔλεός σου}$ ; but the Targum and Jerome rightly (cf. ver. 77, Isa. lxiii. 7) have the plural: God's proofs of loving-kindness in accordance with His promises will put him in the position that he will not be obliged to be dumb in the presence of him who reproaches him ( $\text{חֲרֹב}$ , prop. a plucker, cf.  $\text{خَرُوف}$ , a lamb = a plucker of leaves or grass), but will be able to answer him on the ground of his own experience. The verb  $\text{עָנָה}$ , which in itself has many meanings, acquires the signification "to give an answer" through the word,  $\text{דָּבַר}$ , that is added (synon.  $\text{הַשִּׁיב דְּבָר}$ ). Ver. 43 also refers to the duty of confessing God. The meaning of the prayer is, that God may not suffer him to come to such a pass that he will be utterly unable to witness for the truth; for language dies away in the mouth of him who is unworthy of it before God. The writer has no fear of this for himself, for his hope is set towards God's judgments ( $\text{לְמִשְׁפָּטָיִךְ}$ , defective plural, as also in ver. 149; in proof of which, compare vers. 156 and 175), his confidence takes its stand upon them. The futures which follow from vers. 44 to 48 declare that what he would willingly do by the grace of God, and strives to do, is to walk בְּרִחְבֵּהּ, in a broad space (elsewhere בְּמִרְחָב), therefore unstrained, which in this instance is not equivalent to happily, but courageously and unconstrainedly, without allowing myself to be intimidated, and said of inward freedom which makes itself known outwardly. In ver. 46 the Vulgate renders: Et loquebar de (in) testimoniis tuis in conspectu regum et non confundebam—the motto of the Augsburg Confession, to which it was adapted especially in connection with this historical interpretation of the two verbs, which does not correspond to the original text. The lifting up of the hands in ver. 48 is an expression of fervent longing desire, as in connection with prayer, xxviii. 2, lxiii. 5, cxxxiv. 2, cxli. 2, and frequently. The second אֲשֶׁר אֶהְבֵּתִי is open to the suspicion of being an inadvertent repetition. שִׁיחַ (synon. הִנְיָה) signifies a still or audible meditating that is absorbed in the object.

Vers. 49-56. The eightfold Zajin. God's word is his hope and his trust amidst all derision; and when he burns with indignation at the apostates, God's word is his solace. Since in ver. 49 the expression is not הִבְרִיר but הִבְרִי, it is not to be interpreted according to xcvi. 3, cvi. 45, but: remember the word addressed to Thy servant, because Thou hast made me hope (Piel causat. as e.g. נָשָׂה, to cause to forget, Gen. xli. 51), i.e. hast comforted me by promising me a blessed issue, and hast directed my expectation thereunto. This is his comfort in his dejected condition, that God's promissory declaration has quickened him and proved its reviving power in his case. In הִלְיוּנִי (הִלְיוּנִי), ludificantur, it is implied that the יָרִים are just לְצִיִּים, frivolous persons, libertines, free-thinkers (Prov. xxi. 24). מִשְׁפָּטֶיךָ, ver. 52, are the valid, verified decisions (judgments) of God revealed from the veriest olden times. In the remembrance of these, which determine the lot of a man according to the relation he holds towards them, the poet found comfort. It can be rendered: then I comforted myself; or according to a later usage of the Hithpa.: I was comforted. Concerning וְלַעֲפָה, æstus, vid. xi. 6, and on the subject-matter, vers. 21, 104. The poet calls his earthly life "the house of his pilgrimage;" for it is true the earth is man's (cxv. 16), but he has no abiding resting-place there (1 Chron. xxix. 15), his בַּיִת עוֹלָם (Eccles. xii. 5) is elsewhere (vid. supra, ver. 19, xxxix.

13). God's statutes are here his "songs," which give him spiritual refreshing, sweeten the hardships of the pilgrimage, and measure and hasten his steps. The Name of God has been in his mind hitherto, not merely by day, but also by night; and in consequence of this he has kept God's law (ואשמרה), as five times besides in this Psalm, cf. iii. 6, and to be distinguished from ואשמרה, ver. 44). Just this, that he keeps (observat) God's precepts, has fallen to his lot. To others something else is allotted (iv. 8), to him this one most needful thing.

Vers. 57-64. The eightfold Heth. To understand and to keep God's word is his portion, the object of his incessant praying and thanksgiving, the highest grace or favour that can come to him. According to xvi. 5, lxxiii. 26, the words חלקי ה' belong together. Ver. 57*b* is an inference drawn from it (אמר ?) as in Ex. ii. 14, and frequently), and the existing division of the verse is verified. חלקה פני, as in xlv. 13, is an expression of caressing, flattering entreaty; in Latin, caput mulcere (demulcere). His turning to the word of God the poet describes in ver. 59 as a result of a careful trying of his actions. After that he quickly and cheerfully, ver. 60, determined to keep it without any long deliberation with flesh and blood, although the snares of wicked men surround him. The meaning of חבלי is determined according to ver. 110: the pointing does not distinguish so sharply as one might have expected between חבלי, חבלי, ōdvas, and חבלי, snares, bonds (vid. xviii. 5 sq.); but the plural nowhere, according to the usage of the language as we now have it, signifies bands (companies), from the singular in 1 Sam. x. 5 (Böttcher, § 800). Thankfulness urges him to get up at midnight (acc. temp. as in Job xxxiv. 20) to prostrate himself before God and to pray. Accordingly he is on friendly terms with, he is closely connected with (Prov. xxviii. 24), all who fear God. Out of the fulness of the loving-kindness of God, which is nowhere unattested upon earth (ver. 64*a* = xxxiii. 5), he implores for himself the inward teaching concerning His word as the highest and most cherished of mercies.

Vers. 65-72. The eightfold Teth. The good word of the gracious God is the fountain of all good; and it is learned in the way of lowliness. He reviews his life, and sees in everything that has befallen him the good and well-meaning appointment of the God of salvation in accordance with the plan and order of salvation of His word. The form עֲבִירָה, which is the form out of pause, is retained in ver. 65*a* beside Athnach, although not preceded by Olewejored (cf. xxxv. 19, xlvi. 11, Prov. xxx. 21). Clinging believingly to the commandments of God, he is able confidently to pray that He would teach him "good discernment" and "knowledge." טַעַם is ethically the capacity of distinguishing between good and evil, and of discovering the latter as it were by touch; טוֹב טַעַם, good discernment, is a coupling of words like לֵב טוֹב, a happy disposition, cheerfulness. God has brought him into this relationship to His word by humbling him, and thus setting him right out of his having gone astray. אִמְרָה in ver. 67*b*, as in ver. 11, is not God's utterance conveying a promise, but imposing a duty. God is called טוֹב as He who is graciously disposed towards man, and מְטִיב as He who acts out this disposition; this loving and gracious God he implores to become his Teacher. In his fidelity to God's word he does not allow himself to be led astray by any of the lies which the proud try to impose upon him (Böttcher), or better absolutely (cf. Job xiii. 4): to patch together over him, making the true nature unrecognisable as it were by means of false plaster or whitewash (מָלַח, to smear over, bedaub, as the Targumic, Talmudic, and Syriac show). If the heart of these men, who by slander make him into a caricature of himself, is covered as it were with thick fat (a figure of insensibility and obduracy, xvii. 10, lxxiii. 7, Isa. vi. 10, LXX. ἐτυρώθη, Aquila ἐλπάνθη, Symmachus ἐμυαλώθη) against all the impressions of the word of God, he, on the other hand, has his delight in the law of God (שָׂשׂוֹנִים with an accusative of the object, not of that which is delighted, xciv. 19, but of that which delights). How beneficial has the school of affliction through which he has attained to this, been to him! The word proceeding from the mouth of God is now more precious to him than the greatest earthly riches.

Vers. 73-80. The eightfold Jod. God humbles, but He also exalts again according to His word; for this the poet prays in order that he may be a consolatory example to the God-fearing, to the confusion of his enemies. It is impossible that God should forsake man, who is His creature, and deny to him that which makes him truly happy, viz. the understanding and knowledge of His word. For this spiritual gift the poet prays in ver. 73 (cf. on 73*a*, Deut. xxxii. 6, Job x. 8, xxxi. 15); and he wishes in ver. 74 that all who fear God may see in him with joy an example of the way in which trust in the word of God is rewarded (cf. xxxiv. 3, xxxv. 27, lxix. 33, cvii. 42, and other passages). He knows that God's acts of judgment are pure righteousness, i.e. are regulated by God's holiness, out of which they spring, and by the salvation of men, at which they aim; and he knows that God has humbled him אָמִינָה (accus. adverb. for בְּאִמְיָנָה), being faithful in His intentions towards him; for it is just in the school of affliction that one first learns rightly to estimate the worth of His word, and comes to feel its power. But trouble, though sweetened by an insight into God's salutary design, is nevertheless always bitter; hence the well-justified prayer of ver. 76, that God's mercy may notwithstanding be bestowed upon him for his consolation, in accordance with the promise which is become his (לְ as in ver. 49*a*), His servant's. עֲוִיָּה, ver. 78, instead of being construed with the accusative of the right, or of the cause, that is perverted, is construed with the accusative of the person upon whom such perversion of right, such oppression by means of misrepresentation, is inflicted, as in Job xix. 6, Lam. iii. 36. Chajug' reads עֲוִיָּוִי as in ver. 61. The wish expressed in ver. 79 is to be understood according to lxxiii. 10, Jer. xv. 19, cf. Prov. ix. 4, 16. If instead of וְיִדְעֵי (which is favoured by ver. 63), we read according to the Chethib וְיִרְעֵי (cf. ver. 125), then what is meant by לְיִשְׁבוּ לִי is a turning towards him for the purpose of learning: may their knowledge be enriched from his experience. For himself, however, in ver. 80 he desires unreserved, faultless, unwavering adherence to God's word, for only thus is he secure against being ignominiously undeceived.

Vers. 81-88. The eightfold Kaph. This strengthening according to God's promise is his earnest desire (בְּקָהָ) now, when within a very little his enemies have compassed his ruin (בְּקָהָ). His soul and eyes languish (בְּקָהָ as in lxix. 4, lxxxiv. 3, cf. Job xix. 27) for God's salvation, that it may be unto him according to God's word or promise, that this word may be fulfilled. In ver. 83 כִּי is hypothetical, as in xxi. 12 and frequently; here, as perhaps also in xxvii. 10, in the sense of "although" (Ew. § 362, b). He does not suffer anything to drive God's word out of his mind, although he is already become like a leathern bottle blackened and shrivelled up in the smoke. The custom of the ancients of placing jars with wine over the smoke in order to make the wine prematurely old, i.e. to mellow it (vid. Rosenmüller), does not yield anything towards the understanding of this passage: the skin-bottle that is not intended for present use is hung up on high; and the fact that it had to withstand the upward ascending smoke is intelligible, notwithstanding the absence of any mention of the chimney. The point of comparison, in which we agree for the most part with Hitzig, is the removal of him who in his dungeon is continually exposed to the drudgery of his persecutors. כִּפּוֹת in ver. 84 is equivalent to "how few." Our life here below is short, so also is the period within which the divine righteousness can reveal itself. שִׁחֹת (instead of which the LXX. erroneously reads שִׁחֹת), pits, is an old word, lvii. 7. The relative clause, ver. 85*b*, describes the "proud" as being a contradiction to the revealed law; for there was no necessity for saying that to dig a pit for others is not in accordance with this law. All God's commandments are an emanation of His faithfulness, and therefore too demand faithfulness; but it is just this faithfulness that makes the poet an object of deadly hatred. They have already almost destroyed him "in the land." It is generally rendered "on earth;" but "in heaven" at the beginning of the following octonary is too far removed to be an antithesis to it, nor does it sound like one (cf. on the other hand ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς, Matt. v. 12). It is therefore: in the land (cf. lviii. 3, lxxiii. 9), where they think they are the only ones who have any right there, they have almost destroyed him, without shaking the constancy of his faith. But he stands in need of fresh grace in order that he may not, however, at last succumb.

Vers. 89-96. The eightfold Lamed. Eternal and imperishable in the constant verifying of itself is the vigorous and consolatory word of God, to which the poet will ever cling. It has heaven as its standing-place, and therefore it also has the qualities of heaven, and before all others, heaven-like stability. Ps. lxxxix. (ver. 3) uses similar language in reference to God's faithfulness, of which here ver. 90 says that it endureth into all generations. The earth hath He creatively set up, and it standeth, viz. as a practical proof and as a scene of His infinite, unchangeable faithfulness. Heaven and earth are not the subjects of ver. 91 (Hupfeld), for only the earth is previously mentioned; the reference to the heavens in ver. 89 is of a very different character. Hitzig and others see the subject in לְמִשְׁפָּטֶיךָ: with respect to Thy judgments, they stand fast unto this day; but the עֲבָדֶיךָ which follows requires another meaning to be assigned to עֲמָדִי: either of taking up one's place ready for service, or, since עָמַד לְמִשְׁפָּט is a current phrase in Num. xxxv. 12, Josh. xx. 6, Ezek. xlv. 24, of placing one's self ready to obey (Böttcher). The subject of עֲמָדִי, as the following הַכֹּל shows, is meant to be thought of in the most general sense (cf. Job xxxviii. 14): all beings are God's servants (subjects), and have accordingly to be obedient and humble before His judicial decisions—הַיּוֹם, "even to this day," the poet adds, for these judicial decisions are those which are formulated beforehand in the Tōra. Joy in this ever sure, all-conditioning word has upheld the poet in his affliction, ver. 92. He who has been persecuted and cast down as it were to death, owes his reviving to it, ver. 93. From Him whose possession or property he is in faith and love he also further looks for his salvation, ver. 94. Let evil-doers lie in wait for him (קָוִי in a hostile sense, as in lvi. 7, קָוִה, cf. הִבֵּה, going back to קָוִה, قَوِيَ, with the broad primary signification, to be tight, firm, strong) to destroy him, he meditates on God's testimonies. He knows from experience that all (earthly) perfection (תְּהִלָּה) has an end (inasmuch as, having reached its height, it changes into its opposite); God's commandment (singular as in Deut. xi. 22), on the contrary, is exceeding broad (cf. Job xi. 9), unlimited in its duration and verification.

Vers. 97-104. The eightfold Mem. The poet praises the practical wisdom which the word of God, on this very account so sweet to him, teaches. God's precious law, with which he unceasingly occupies himself, makes him superior in wisdom (Deut. iv. 6), intelligence, and judgment to his enemies, his teachers, and the aged (Job xii. 20). There were therefore at that time teachers and elders (πρεσβύτεροι), who (like the Hellenizing Sadducees) were not far from apostasy in their laxness, and hostilely persecuted the young and strenuous zealot for God's law. The construction of ver. 98a is like Joel i. 20,

Isa. lix. 12, and frequently. הָיָה refers to the commandments in their unity: he has taken possession of them for ever (cf. ver. 111*a*). The Mishna (Aboth iv. 1) erroneously interprets: from all my teachers do I acquire understanding. All three מִן in vers. 98-100 signify præ (LXX. ὑπέρ). In בְּלֵאָתִי, ver. 101*a*, from the mode of writing we see the verb Lamed Aleph passing over into the verb Lamed He. הוֹרִיתִנִי is, as in Prov. iv. 11 (cf. Ex. iv. 15), a defective mode of writing for הוֹרִיתֵנִי. נִמְלֵצוּ, ver. 103*a*, is not equivalent to נִמְרָצוּ, Job vi. 25 (vid. Job, i. 118, 279), but signifies, in consequence of the dative of the object לְחִבִּי, that which easily enters, or that which tastes good (LXX. ὡς γλυκέα); therefore surely from מְלָץ = מְלַט, to be smooth: how smooth, entering easily (Prov. xxiii. 31), are Thy words (promises) to my palate or taste! The collective singular נִמְרָצְתָּהּ is construed with a plural of the predicate (cf. Ex. i. 10). He has no taste for the God-estranged present, but all the stronger taste for God's promised future. From God's laws he acquires the capacity for proving the spirits, therefore he hates every path of falsehood (= ver. 128*b*), i.e. all the heterodox tendencies which agree with the spirit of the age.

Vers. 105-112. The eightfold Nun. The word of God is his constant guide, to which he has entrusted himself for ever. The way here below is a way through darkness, and leads close past abysses: in this danger of falling and of going astray the word of God is a lamp to his feet, i.e. to his course, and a light to his path (Prov. vi. 23); his lamp or torch and his sun. That which he has sworn, viz. to keep God's righteous requirements, he has also set up, i.e. brought to fulfilment, but not without being bowed down under heavy afflictions in confessing God; wherefore he prays (as in ver. 25) that God would revive him in accordance with His word, which promises life to those who keep it. The confessions of prayer coming from the inmost impulse of his whole heart, in which he owns his indebtedness and gives himself up entirely to God's mercy, he calls the free-will offerings of his mouth in ver. 108 (cf. l. 14, xix. 15). He bases the prayer for a gracious acceptance of these upon the fact of his being reduced to extremity. "To have one's soul in one's hand" is the same as to be in conscious peril of one's life, just as "to take one's soul into one's hand" (Judg. xii. 3, 1 Sam. xix. 5, xxviii. 21, Job xiii. 14) is the same as to be ready to give one's life for it, to risk one's life.* Although his life is threatened (ver. 87), yet he does not waver and depart from God's word; he has taken and obtained possession of God's testimonies for ever (cf. ver. 98); they are his "heritage," for which he willingly gives up everything else, for they (הַפֶּה inexactly for הַנֶּפֶשׁ) it is which bless and entrance him in his inmost soul. In ver. 112 it is not to be interpreted after xix. 12: eternal is the reward (of the carrying out of Thy precepts), but in ver. 33 עֲקֹב is equivalent to לָעַר, and ver. 44 proves that ver. 112b need not be a thought that is complete in itself.

Vers. 113-120. The eightfold Samech. His hope rests on God's word, without allowing itself to be led astray by doubters and apostates. מַעֲפִים (the form of nouns which indicate defects or failings) are those inwardly divided, halting between two opinions (מַעֲפִים), 1 Kings xviii. 21, who do homage partly to the worship of Jahve, partly to heathenism, and therefore are trying to combine faith and naturalism. In contrast to such, the poet's love, faith, and hope are devoted entirely to the God of revelation; and to all those who are desirous of drawing him away he addresses in ver. 115 (cf. vi. 9) an indignant "depart." He, however, stands in need of grace in order to persevere and to conquer. For this he prays in vers. 116, 117. The מֵן in מִשְׁבְּרֵי מֵן is the same as in בּוֹשׁ מֵן. The ah of וְאִשְׁעָה is the intentional ah (Ew. § 228, c), as in Isa. xli. 23. The statement of the ground of the קְלִיטָה, vilipendis, does not mean: unsuccessful is their deceit (Hengstenberg, Olshausen), but falsehood without the consistency of truth is their self-deceptive and seductive tendency. The LXX. and Syriac read תְּרַעֲיֵתָם, "their sentiment;" but this is an Aramaic word that is unintelligible in Hebrew, which the old translators have conjured into the text only on account of an apparent tautology. The reading הַשְּׁבֵתָהּ or הַשְּׁבֵתָהּ (Aquila, Symmachus, and Jerome; LXX. ἐλογισάμην, therefore חֲשַׁבְתִּי) instead of הַשְּׁבֵתָהּ might more readily be justified in ver. 119a; but the former gives too narrow a meaning, and the reading rests on a mistaking of the construction of הַשְּׁבִיתָהּ with an accusative of the object and of the effect : all the wicked, as many of them as are on the earth, dost Thou put away as dross (סַיִם). Accordingly משפּטֵיךָ in ver. 120 are God's punitive judgments, or rather (cf. ver. 91) God's laws (judgments) according to which He judges. What is meant are sentences of punishment, as in Lev. ch. xxvi., Deut. ch. xxviii. Of these the poet is afraid, for omnipotence can change words into deeds forthwith. In fear of the God who has attested Himself in Ex. xxxiv. 7 and elsewhere, his skin shudders and his hair stands on end.

Vers. 121-128. The eightfold Ajin. In the present time of apostasy and persecution he keeps all the more strictly to the direction of the divine word, and commends himself to the protection and teaching of God. In the consciousness of his godly behaviour (elsewhere always יִצְרָק וּמִשְׁפָּט, here in one instance משפּטֵיךָ וְצִרְק) the poet hopes that God will surely not (לֹא) leave him to the arbitrary disposal of his oppressors. This hope does not, however, raise him above the necessity and duty of constant prayer that Jahve would place Himself between him and his enemies. עָרַב seq. acc. signifies to stand in any one's place as furnishing a guarantee, and in general as a mediator, Job xvii. 3, Isa. xxxviii. 14; לְטוֹב similar to לְטוֹבָה, lxxxvi. 17, Neh. v. 19: in my behalf, for my real advantage. The expression of longing after redemption in ver. 123 sounds like vers. 81 sq. "The word of Thy righteousness" is the promise which proceeds from God's "righteousness," and as surely as He is "righteous" cannot remain unfulfilled. The one chief petition of the poet, however, to which he comes back in vers. 124 sq., has reference to the ever deeper knowledge of the word of God; for this knowledge is in itself at once life and blessedness, and the present calls most urgently for it. For the great multitude (which is the subject to הִפְרִי) practically and fundamentally break God's law; it is therefore time to act for Jahve (עָשֵׂה לִי) as in Gen. xxx. 30, Isa. lxiv. 3 [4], Ezek. xxix. 20), and just in order to this there is need of well-grounded, reliable knowledge. Therefore the poet attaches himself with all his love to God's commandments; to him they are above gold and fine gold (xix. 11), which he might perhaps gain by a disavowal of them. Therefore he is as strict as he possibly can be with God's word, inasmuch as he acknowledges and observes all precepts of all things (כָּל-פְּקוּדֵי כָל), i.e. all divine precepts, let them have reference to whatsoever they will, as ישרים, right (ישר, to declare both in avowal and deed to be right); and every false (lying) tendency, all pseudo-Judaism, he hates. It is true ver. 126a may be also explained: it is time that Jahve should act, i.e. interpose judicially; but this thought is foreign to the context, and affords no equally close union for על-כן; moreover it ought then to have been accented עת לעשות ליהוה. On כל-פקודי כל, "all commands of every purport," cf. Isa. xxix. 11, and more as to form, Num. viii. 16, Ezek. xlv. 30. The expression is purposely thus heightened; and the correction כל-פקודיך (Ewald, Olshausen, and Hupfeld) is also superfluous, because the reference of what is said to the God of revelation is self-evident in this connection.

Vers. 129-136. The eightfold Phē. The deeper his depression of spirit concerning those who despise the word of God, the more ardently does he yearn after the light and food of that word. The testimonies of God are פלאות, wonderful and strange (paradoxical) things, exalted above every-day life and the common understanding. In this connection of the thoughts נצרתם is not intended of careful observance, but of attentive contemplation that is prolonged until a clear penetrating understanding of the matter is attained. The opening, disclosure (פתח, apertio, with Tsere in distinction from פתח, porta) of God's word giveth light, inasmuch as it makes the simple (פתיים as in Prov. xxii. 3) wise or sagacious; in connection with which it is assumed that it is God Himself who unfolds the mysteries of His word to those who are anxious to learn. Such an one, anxious to learn, is the poet: he pants with open mouth, viz. for the heavenly fare of such disclosures (פער like פה פער in Job xxix. 23, cf. Ps. lxxxi. 11). יאב is a hapaxlegomenon, just as יאב is also exclusively peculiar to the Psalm before us; both are secondary forms of אבה. Love to God cannot indeed remain unresponded to. The experience of helping grace is a right belonging to those who love the God of revelation; love in return for love, salvation in return for the longing for salvation, is their prerogative. On the ground of this reciprocal relation the petitions in vers. 133-135 are then put up, coming back at last to the one chief prayer "teach me." אמרה, ver. 133, is not merely a "promise" in this instance, but the declared will of God in general. כל-אני refers pre-eminently to all sin of disavowal (denying God), into which he might fall under outward and inward pressure (עֶשֶׂק). For he has round about him those who do not keep God's law. On account of these apostates (עַל לֵא as in Isa. liii. 9, equivalent to עַל-אִישׁ לֵא his eyes run down rivers of water (יַרְי as in Lam. iii. 48, with an accusative of the object). His mood is not that of unfeeling self-glorying, but of sorrow like that of Jeremiah, because of the contempt of Jahve, and the self-destruction of those who contemn Him.

Vers. 137-144. The eightfold Tsade. God rules righteously and faithfully according to His word, for which the poet is accordingly zealous, although young and despised. The predicate יֵשֶׁר in ver. 137b precedes its subject בְּיִשְׁרָאֵל (God's decisions in word and in deed) in the primary form (after the model of the verbal clause cxxiv. 5), just as in German [and English] the predicative adjective remains undeclined. The accusatives צַדִּיק and אֱמוּנָה in ver. 138 are not predicative (Hitzig), to which the former ("as righteousness")—not the latter however—is not suited, but adverbial accusatives (in righteousness, in faithfulness), and בְּיִשְׁרָאֵל according to its position is subordinate to אֱמוּנָה as a virtual adjective (cf. Isa. xlvi. 9): the requirements of the revealed law proceed from a disposition towards and mode of dealing with men which is strictly determined by His holiness (צַדִּיק), and beyond measure faithfully and honestly designs the well-being of men (אֱמוּנָה מֵאֵד). To see this good law of God despised by his persecutors stirs the poet up with a zeal, which brings him, from their side, to the brink of extreme destruction (lxix. 10, cf. צַמְחָת, lxxxviii. 17). God's own utterance is indeed without spot, and therefore not to be carped at; it is pure, fire-proved, noblest metal (xviii. 31, xii. 7), therefore he loves it, and does not, though young (LXX. νεώτερος, Vulgate adolescentulus) and lightly esteemed, care for the remonstrances of his proud opponents who are old and more learned than himself (the organization of ver. 141 is like ver. 95, and frequently). The righteousness (צַדִּיקָה) of the God of revelation becomes eternal righteousness (צַדִּיק), and His law remains eternal truth (אֱמֶת). צַדִּיקָה is here the name of the attribute and of the action that is conditioned in accordance with it; צַדִּיק the name of the state that thoroughly accords with the idea of that which is right. So too in ver. 144: צַדִּיק are Jahve's testimonies for ever, so that all creatures must give glory to their harmony with that which is absolutely right. To look ever deeper and deeper into this their perfection is the growing life of the spirit. The poet prays for this vivifying insight.

Vers. 145-152. The eightfold Koph. Fidelity to God's word, and deliverance according to His promise, is the purport of his unceasing prayer. Even in the morning twilight (נֶשֶׁף) he was awake praying. It is not הַנֶּשֶׁף, I anticipated the twilight; nor is קִרְמִיתִי, according to lxxxiv. 14, equivalent to קִרְמִתִּי, but קִרְמִיתִי . . . קִרְמִיתִי is the resolution of the otherwise customary construction קִרְמִיתִי לְשָׁנָה, Jonah iv. 2, inasmuch as קָרַם may signify "to go before" (lxviii. 26), and also "to make haste (with anything):" even early before the morning's dawn I cried. Instead of לְדַבְרֶיךָ the Keri (Targum, Syriac, Jerome) more appropriately reads לְדַבְרֶיךָ after vers. 74, 81, 114. But his eyes also anticipated the night-watches, inasmuch as they did not allow themselves to be caught not sleeping by any of them at their beginning (cf. לְרֵאשִׁית, Lam. ii. 19). אִמְרָה is here, as in vers. 140, 158, and frequently, the whole word of God, whether in its requirements or its promises. In ver. 149 כְּמִשְׁפָּטֶיךָ is a defective plural as in ver. 43 (vid. on ver. 37), according to ver. 156, although according to ver. 132 the singular (LXX., Targum, Jerome) would also be admissible: what is meant is God's order of salvation, or His appointments that relate thereto. The correlative relation of vers. 150 and 151 is rendered natural by the position of the words. With קָרַבִּי (cf. קָרַב) is associated the idea of rushing upon him with hostile purpose, and with קָרוֹב, as in lxix. 19, Isa. lviii. 2, of hastening to his succour. זָמָה is infamy that is branded by the law: they go forth purposing this, but God's law is altogether self-verifying truth. And the poet has long gained the knowledge from it that it does not aim at merely temporary recompense. The sophisms of the apostates cannot therefore lead him astray. יִסְדֹּתֵיהֶם for יִסְדֹּתָי, like הַפְּתִיחַ in ver. 111.

Vers. 153-160. The eightfold Resh. Because God cannot suffer those who are faithful to His word to succumb, he supplicates His help against his persecutors. רִיבָה is Milra before the initial (half-guttural) Resh, as in xliii. 1, lxxiv. 22. The Lamed of לְאִמְרֹתֶיךָ is the Lamed of reference (with respect to Thine utterance), whether the reference be normative (=כַּאֲמַרְתָּךְ, ver. 58), as in Isa. xi. 3, or causal, xxv. 2, Isa. lv. 5, Job xlii. 5. The predicate רָחֹק, like יִשָּׁר in ver. 137, stands first in the primary, as yet indefinite form. Concerning ver. 156*b* vid. on ver. 149. At the sight of the faithless he felt a profound disgust; וַאֲתַקֹּטְטָהּ, pausal aorist, supply בָּהֶם, cxxxix. 21. It is all the same in the end whether we render אִשָּׁר quippe qui or siquidem. שָׂא in ver. 160 signifies the head-number or sum. If he reckons up the word of God in its separate parts and as a whole, truth is the denominator of the whole, truth is the sum-total. This supplicatory הִינֵי is repeated three times in this group. The nearer it draws towards its end the more importunate does the Psalm become.

Vers. 161-168. The eightfold שׁ (both Shin and Sin *). In the midst of persecution God's word was still his fear, his joy, and his love, the object of his thanksgiving, and the ground of his hope. Princes persecute him without adequate cause, but his heart does not fear before them, but before God's words (the Kerî likes the singular, as in ver. 147), to deny which would be to him the greatest possible evil. It is, however, a fear that is associated with heartfelt joy (ver. 111). It is the joy of a conflict that is rewarded by rich spoil (Judg. v. 30, Isa. ix. 2 [3]). Not merely morning and evening, not merely three times a day (lv. 18), but seven times (שֶׁשׁ as in Lev. xxvi. 18, Prov. xxiv. 16), i.e. ever again and again, availing himself of every prayerful impulse, he gives thanks to God for His word, which so righteously decides and so correctly guides, is a source of transcendent peace to all who love it, and beside which one is not exposed to any danger of stumbling (מִבְּשׁוֹל, LXX. σκάνδαλον, cf. 1 John ii. 10) without some effectual counter-working. In ver. 166*a* he speaks like Jacob in Gen. xlix. 18, and can speak thus, inasmuch as he has followed earnestly and untiringly after sanctification. He endeavours to keep God's law most conscientiously, in proof of which he is able to appeal to God, the Omniscient One. שֶׁמֶרָה is here the 3*d* pratt., whereas in lxxxvi. 2 it is imperat. The future of אָהֵב is both אָהֵב and אָהֵב, just as of אָהֵו both אָהֵו and אָהֵו.

Vers. 169-176. The eightfold Tav. May God answer this his supplication as He has heard his praise, and interest Himself on behalf of His servant, the sheep that is exposed to great danger. The petitions "give me understanding" and "deliver me" go hand-in-hand, because the poet is one who is persecuted for the sake of his faith, and is just as much in need of the fortifying of his faith as of deliverance from the outward restraint that is put upon him. רָנָה is a shrill audible prayer; תְּהַחֲנֶה, a fervent and urgent prayer. עָנָה, prop. to answer, signifies in ver. 172 to begin, strike up, attune (as does ἀποκρίνεσθαι also sometimes). According to the rule in l. 23 the poet bases his petition for help upon the purpose of thankful praise of God and of His word. Knowing how to value rightly what he possesses, he is warranted in further supplicating and hoping for the good that he does not as yet possess. The "salvation" for which he longs (תַּצִּיל as in vers. 40, 20) is redemption from the evil world, in which the life of his own soul is imperilled. May then God's judgments (defective plural, as in vers. 43, 149, which the Syriac only takes as singular) succour him (יַעֲזֹרֵי, not יַעֲזֹרֵי). God's hand, ver. 173, and God's word afford him succour; the two are involved in one another, the word is the medium of His hand. After this relationship of the poet to God's word, which is attested a hundredfold in the Psalm, it may seem strange that he can say of himself אֶבֶר תְּעִיתִי כְּשֶׁה אֶבֶר; and perhaps the accentuation is correct when it does not allow itself to be determined by Isa. liii. 6, but interprets: If I have gone astray—seek Thou like a lost sheep Thy servant. שֶׁה אֶבֶר is a sheep that is lost (cf. אֶבְרִים as an appellation of the dispersion, Isa. xxvii. 13) and in imminent danger of total destruction (cf. xxxi. 13 with Lev. xxvi. 38). In connection with that interpretation which is followed by the interpunction, ver. 176b is also more easily connected with what precedes: his going astray is no apostasy; his home, to which he longs to return when he has been betrayed into by-ways, is beside the Lord.

THE FIFTEEN SONGS OF DEGREES, OR GRADUAL PSALMS.

Ps. CXX.—CXXXIV.

These songs are all inscribed שִׁיר הַמַּעֲלֹה. The LXX., according to the most natural signification of the word, renders: ὠδὴ τῶν ἀναβαθμῶν; the Italic and Vulgate, canticum graduum (whence the liturgical term “gradual Psalms”). The meaning at the same time remains obscure. When, however, Theodotion renders ᾠσμα τῶν ἀναβάσεων, Aquila and Symmachus ὠδὴ εἰς τὰς ἀναβάσεις (as though it were absolutely שִׁיר הַמַּעֲלֹה, as in cxxi. 1), it looks even like an explanation. The fathers, more particularly Theodoret, and in general the Syrian church, associate with it the idea of ἡ ἀπὸ Βαβυλῶνος ἐπάνοδος. Ewald has long advocated this view. In his Introduction to Die poetischen Bücher des Alten Bundes (1839), and elsewhere, he translated it “Songs of the Pilgrim caravans” or “of the homeward marches,” and explained these fifteen Psalms as old and new travelling songs of those returning from the Exile. The verb הָעָלָה certainly is the usual word for journeying to Palestine out of the Babylonian low country, as out of the country of the Egyptian Nile Valley. And the fact that the Return from the Exile is called הַמַּעֲלָה מִבָּבֶל in Ezra vii. 9 is enticing. Some of these Psalms, as cxxi., cxxiii.—cxxv., cxxix., cxxx., cxxxii., cxxxiii., are also suited to this situation, or can at least be adapted to it. But Ps. cxx., if it is to be referred to the Exile, is a song that comes out of the midst of it; Ps. cxxvi. might, so far as its first half is concerned, be a travelling song of those returning, but according to its second half it is a prayer of those who have returned for the restoration of the whole of Israel, based upon thanksgiving; and Ps. cxxii. assumes the existence and frequenting of the Temple and of the holy city, and Ps. cxxxiv. the full exercise of the Temple-service. It is also inconvenient that הַמַּעֲלָה, which in itself only expresses a journey up, not a journey homewards, is without any closer definition; and more particularly since, in connection with this form of the word, the signification of a something (a step, a sun-dial, rising thoughts, Ezek. xi. 5) is at least just as natural as that of an action. שִׁיר הָעֲלִיִּים would have been at once palpable. And what is meant by the plural? The interpretation of the plural of the different caravans or companies in which the exiles returned, assumes a usus loquendi with which we are altogether unacquainted.

Relatively more probable is the reference to the pilgrimage-journeys at the three great feasts,—according to a later Hebrew expression, the שָׁלֹשׁ רִגְלִים. This going up to Jerusalem required by the Law is also usually called עלה. So Agellius (1606), Herder, Eichhorn, Maurer, Hengstenberg, Keil, and others, and so now even Ewald in the second edition (1866) of the Introduction to Die Dichter des Alten Bundes, so Kamphausen, and Reuss in his treatise Chants de Pèlerinage ou petit Psautier des Pèlerins du second temple (in the Nouvelle Revue de Théologie, i. 273–311), and Liebusch in the Quedlinburg Easter Programm, 1866: “The pilgrim songs in the Fifth Book of the Psalter.” But מַעְלֶה in this signification is without precedent; and when Hupfeld says in opposition to this, “the fact that a noun accidentally does not occur in the Old Testament does not matter, since here at any rate it is a question of the interpretation of a later usage of the language,” we may reply that neither does the whole range of the post-biblical Hebrew exhibit any trace of this usage. Thenius accordingly tries another way of doing justice to the word. He understands מעלות of the different stations, i.e. stages of the journey up, that are to be found in connection with the festive journeys to high-lying Jerusalem. But the right name for “stations” would be מַסְעוֹת or מַעְמָדוֹת; and besides, the notion borrowed from the processions to Mount Calvary is without historical support in the religious observances of Israel. Thus, then, the needful ground in language and custom for referring this title of the Psalms to the journeyings up to the feasts is taken from under us; and the consideration that the first three and the last three songs are suited to the hymn-book of a festal pilgrimage, and that they all bear in them, as Liebusch has demonstrated, the characteristic features of the spiritual national song, is not able to decide the doubtful meaning of מעלות.

We will now put the later Jewish interpretation to the proof. According to Middoth ii. 5, Succa 15*b*, a semi-circular staircase with fifteen steps led out of the court of the Israelitish men (עזרת ישראל) down into the court of the women (עזרת נשים), and upon these fifteen steps, which correspond to the fifteen gradual Psalms, the Levites played musical instruments on the evening of the first day of the Feast of Tabernacles in connection with the joyful celebration of the water-drawing,* and above them in the portal (upon the threshold of the Nicanor-gate or Agrippa-gate†) stood two priests with trumpets. It has been said that this is a Talmudic fable invented on behalf of the inscription שיר המעלות, and that the fifteen steps are got out of Ezek. xl. 26, 31 by reading the two verses together. This aspersion is founded on ignorance. For the Talmud does not say in that passage that the fifteen Psalms have taken their name from the fifteen steps; it does not once say that these Psalms in particular were read aloud upon the fifteen steps, but it only places the fifteen steps on a parallel with the fifteen Psalms; and, moreover, interprets the name שיר המעלות quite differently, viz. from a legend concerning David and Abithophel, Succa 53a, Maccoth 11a (differently rendered in the section Chelek of the tractate Sanhedrin in the Jerusalem Talmud). This legend to which the Targum inscription relates (vid. Buxtorf, Lex. Talmud. s.v. קפא) is absurd enough, but it has nothing to do with the fifteen steps. It is not until a later period that Jewish expositors say that the fifteen Psalms had their name from the fifteen steps.‡ Even Hippolytus must have heard something similar when he says (p. 190, ed. Lagarde): πάλιw τε αὐτοῦ εἰσὶ τινες τῶν ἀναβαθμῶν ᾠδαί, τὸν ἀριθμὸν πεντεκαίδεκα, ὅσοι καὶ οἱ ἀναβαθμοὶ τοῦ ναοῦ, τάχα δελοῦσαι τὰς ἀναβάσεις περιέχεσθαι ἐν τῷ ἐβδόμῳ καὶ ὀγδόῳ ἀριθμῷ, upon which Hilary relies: esse autem in templo gradus quindecim historia * Vid. my Geschichte der jüdischen Poesie, S. 193 f.

† It was called the Nicanor-gate in the Temple of Zerubbabel, and the Agrippa-gate in the Temple of Herod: in both of them they ascended to its threshold by fifteen steps; vid. Unruh, Das alte Jerusalem und seine Bauwerke (1861), S. 137, cf. 194.

nobis locuta est; viz. 15 (7 + 8) steps leading out of the court of the priests into the Holy of holies. In this, then, the allegory in which the interpretation of the church delighted for a long time seemed naturally at hand, viz., as Otmar Nachtgal explains, "Song of the steps or ascents, which indicate the spirit of those who ascend from earthly things to God." The Furtmaier Codex in Maihingen accordingly inscribes them "Psalm of the first step" (Psalm der ersten staffeln), and so on. If we leave this sensus anagogicus to itself, then the title, referred to the fifteen steps, would indeed not be inappropriate in itself (cf. Graduale or Gradale in the service of the Romish Church), but is of an external character such as we find nowhere else.*

Gesenius has the merit of having first discerned the true meaning of the questioned inscription, inasmuch as first in 1812 (Hallische Lit. Zeitschrift, 1812, Nr. 205), and frequently since that time, he has taught that the fifteen songs have their name from their step-like progressive rhythm of the thoughts, and that consequently the name, like the triolet (roundelay) in Western poetry, does not refer to the liturgical usage, but to the technical structure. The correctness of this view has been duly appraised more particularly by De Wette, who adduces this rhythm of steps or degrees, too, among the more artificial rhythms. The songs are called Songs of degrees or Gradual Psalms as being songs that move onward towards a climax, and that by means of πλοκή (ἐπιπλοκή), i.e. a taking up again of the immediately preceding word by way of giving intensity to the expression; and they are placed together on account of this common characteristic, just like the Michtammim, which bear that name from a similar characteristic. The fact, as Liebusch objects, that there is no trace of תלול in this figurative signification elsewhere, is of no consequence, since in the inscriptions of the Psalms in general we become acquainted with a technical language which (apart from a few echoes in the Chronicles) is without example elsewhere, in relation to poetical and musical technology. Neither are we refuted by the fact that this as it were climbing movement of the thoughts which plants upon a preceding word, and thus carries itself forward, is not without example even outside the range of these fifteen songs in the Psalter itself (e.g. xciii., xcvi.), as also elsewhere (Isa. xvii. 12 sq., xxvi. 5 sq., and more particularly in the song of Deborah, Judg. v. 3, 5, 6, etc.), and that it is not always carried out in the same manner in the fifteen Psalms. It is quite sufficient that the parallelism retires into the background here as nowhere else in fifteen songs that are linked together (even in cxxv., cxxvii., cxxviii., cxxxii.); and the onward course is represented with decided preference as a gradation or advance step by step, that which follows being based upon what goes before, and from that point advancing and ascending still higher.

PSALM CXX.

CRY OF DISTRESS WHEN SURROUNDED BY CONTENTIOUS MEN.

- 1 TO Jahve in my distress
Do I cry, and He answereth me.
- 2 O Jahve, deliver my soul from a lying lip,
From a crafty tongue!
- 3 What shall He give to thee, and what shall He further give
Thou crafty tongue? [to thee,
- 4 Arrows of a mighty one, sharpened,
Together with coals of broom.
- 5 Woe is me that I sojourn in Meshech,
That I  dwell beside the tents of Kedar!
- 6 Long enough hath my soul  dwelt
With those who hate  peace.
- 7 I am  peace; yet when I speak,
They are for war.

This first song of degrees attaches itself to Ps. cxix. 176. The writer of Ps. cxix., surrounded on all sides by apostasy and persecution, compares himself to a sheep that is easily lost, which the shepherd has to seek and bring home if it is not to perish; and the writer of Ps. cxx. is also "as a sheep in the midst of wolves." The period at which he lived is uncertain, and it is consequently also uncertain whether he had to endure such endless malignant attacks from foreign barbarians or from his own worldly-minded fellow-countrymen. E. Tilling has sought to establish a third possible occasion in his Disquisitio de ratione inscript. XV Pss. grad. (1765). He derives this and the following songs of degrees from the time immediately succeeding the Return from the Exile, when the secret and open hostility of the Samaritans and other neighbouring peoples (Neh. ii. 10, 19, iv. 1 [7], vi. 1) sought to keep down the rise of the young colony.

Vers. 1-4. According to the pointing וַיִּעַנֵּי, the poet appears to base his present petition, which from ver. 2 onwards is the substance of the whole Psalm, upon the fact of a previous answering of his prayers. For the petition in ver. 2 manifestly arises out of his deplorable situation, which is described in vers. 5 sqq. Nevertheless there are also other instances in which וַיִּעַנֵּי might have been expected, where the pointing is וַיִּעַנֵּי (iii. 5, Jonah ii. 3), so that consequently וַיִּעַנֵּי may, without any prejudice to the pointing, be taken as a believing expression of the result (cf. the future of the consequence in Job ix. 16) of the present cry for help. צָרָתָהּ, according to the original signification, is a form of the definition of a state or condition, as in iii. 3, xlv. 27, lxiii. 8, Jonah ii. 10, Hos. viii. 7, and בְּצָרָתָהּ לִי = בְּצָר־לִי, xviii. 7, is based upon the customary expression צָר לִי. In ver. 2 follows the petition which the poet sends up to Jahve in the certainty of being answered. רַמְיָהּ beside לָשׁוֹן, although there is no masc. רַמִּי (cf. however the Aramaic רַמִּי, רַמְיָהּ), is taken as an adjective after the form מְרִיָּהּ, which it is also perhaps in Mic. vi. 12. The parallelism would make לָשׁוֹן natural, like לָשׁוֹן מְרִמָּה in lii. 6; the pointing, which nevertheless disregarded this, will therefore rest upon tradition. The apostrophe in ver. 3 is addressed to the crafty tongue. לָשׁוֹן is certainly feminine as a rule; but whilst the tongue as such is feminine, the לָשׁוֹן רַמִּיהּ of the address, as in lii. 6, refers to him who has such a kind of tongue (cf. Hitzig on Prov. xii. 27), and thereby the לָשׁוֹן is justified; whereas the rendering,

“what does it bring to thee, and what does it profit thee?” or, “of what use to thee and what advancement to thee is the crafty tongue?” is indeed possible so far as concerns the syntax (Ges. § 147, e), but is unlikely as being ambiguous and confusing in expression. It is also to be inferred from the correspondence between  $\text{מִה־יִתֶּן לְךָ וּמִה־יִסִּיף לְךָ}$  and the formula of an oath  $\text{כִּי יֵעָשֶׂה לְךָ אֱלֹהִים וְכִי יִסִּיף}$ , 1 Sam. iii. 17, xx. 13, xxv. 22, 2 Sam. iii. 35, Ruth i. 17, that God is to be thought of as the subject of  $\text{יִתֶּן}$  and  $\text{יִסִּיף}$ : “what will,” or rather, in accordance with the otherwise precative use of the formula and with the petition that here precedes: “what shall He (is He to) give to thee ( $\text{תֵּן}$ ) as in Hos. ix. 14), and what shall He add to thee, thou crafty tongue?” The reciprocal relation of ver. 4a to  $\text{מִה־יִתֶּן}$ , and of ver. 4b with the superadding  $\text{עַם}$  to  $\text{מִה־יִסִּיף}$ , shows that ver. 4 is not now a characterizing of the tongue that continues the apostrophe to it, as Ewald supposes. Consequently ver. 4 gives the answer to ver. 3 with the twofold punishment which Jahve will cause the false tongue to feel. The question which the poet, sure of the answering of his cry for help, puts to the false tongue is designed to let the person addressed hear by a flight of sarcasm what he has to expect. The evil tongue is a sharp sword (lvii. 5), a pointed arrow (Jer. ix. 7 [8]), and it is like a fire kindled of hell (Jas. iii. 6). The punishment, too, corresponds to this its nature and conduct (lxiv. 4). The “mighty one” (LXX. δυνατός) is God Himself, as it is observed in B. Erachin 15b with a reference to Isa. xlii. 13: “There is none mighty but the Holy One, blessed is He.” He requites the evil tongue like with like. Arrows and coals (cxl. 11) appear also in other instances among His means of punishment. It, which shot piercing arrows, is pierced by the sharpened arrows of an irresistibly mighty One; it, which set its neighbour in a fever of anguish, must endure the lasting, sure, and torturingly consuming heat of broom-coals. The LXX. renders it in a general sense,  $\sigma\upsilon\nu\ \tau\omicron\iota\varsigma\ \acute{\alpha}\nu\theta\rho\alpha\chi\iota\ \tau\omicron\iota\varsigma\ \acute{\epsilon}\rho\eta\mu\iota\kappa\omicron\iota\varsigma$ ; Aquila, following Jewish tradition,  $\acute{\alpha}\rho\kappa\epsilon\upsilon\theta\iota\upsilon\alpha\iota\varsigma$ ; but  $\text{רְתֵם}$ , Arabic  $\text{رتم}$ , ratem, is the broom-shrub (e.g. uncommonly frequent in the Belkâ).

Vers. 5-7. Since arrows and broom-fire, with which the evil tongue is requited, even now proceed from the tongue itself, the poet goes on with the deep heaving אִיָּהּ (only found here). נִוַּר with the accusative of that beside which one sojourns, as in v. 5, Isa. xxxiii. 14, Judg. v. 17. The Moschi (מִשְׁכֵּךְ, the name of which the LXX. takes as an appellative in the signification of long continuance; cf. the reverse instance in Isa. lxvi. 19 LXX.) dwelt between the Black and the Caspian Seas, and it is impossible to dwell among them and the inhabitants of Kedar (vid. lxxxiii. 7) at one and the same time. Accordingly both these names of peoples are to be understood emblematically, with Saadia, Calvin, Amyraldus, and others, of homines similes ejusmodi barbaris et truculentis nationibus.* Meshech is reckoned to Magog in Ezek. xxxviii. 2, and the Kedarites are possessed by the lust of possession (Gen. xvi. 12) of the bellum omnium contra omnes. These rough and quarrelsome characters have surrounded the poet (and his fellow-countrymen, with whom he perhaps comprehends himself) too long already. רִבָּה abundantly (vid. lxv. 10), appears, more particularly in 2 Chron. xxx. 17 sq., as a later prose word. The לָהּ, which throws the action back upon the subject, gives a pleasant, lively colouring to the declaration, as in cxxii. 3, cxxiii. 4. He on his part is peace (cf. Mic. v. 4 [5], Ps. cix. 4, cx. 3), inasmuch as the love of peace, willingness to be at peace, and a desire for peace fill his soul; but if he only opens his mouth, they are for war, they are abroad intent on war, their mood and their behaviour become forthwith hostile. Ewald (§ 362, b) construes it (following Saadia): and I—although I speak peace; but if בִּי (like עַר, cxli. 10) might even have this position in the clause, yet וְבִי cannot. שְׁלוֹם is not on any account to be supplied in thought to אֶרְבֵּר, as Hitzig suggests (after cxxii. 8, xxviii. 3, xxxv. 20). With the shrill dissonance of שְׁלוֹם and מִלְחָמָה the Psalm closes; and the cry for help with which it opens hovers over it, earnestly desiring its removal.

* If the Psalm were a Maccabæan Psalm, one might think מִשְׁכֵּךְ, from מִשְׁכָּר, σύρμα, alluded to the Syrians or even to the Jewish apostates with reference to ΕΡΚΛΗ, ἑρκουλαῖοι ἡτὰ ἀκροβυσσίου (1 Cor. vii. 18).

PSALM CXXI.

THE CONSOLATION OF DIVINE PROTECTION.

- 1 I LIFT up mine eyes unto the mountains:
Whence shall come my help?
- 2 My help cometh from Jahve,
The Creator of heaven and earth.
- 3 He will not indeed suffer thy foot to totter,
Thy Keeper will not slumber.
- 4 Behold slumbereth not and sleepeth not
The Keeper of Israel.
- 5 Jahve is thy Keeper,
Jahve is thy shade upon thy right hand:
- 6 By day the sun shall not smite thee,
And the moon in the night.
- 7 Jahve shall keep thee from all evil,
He shall keep thy soul.
- 8 Jahve shall keep thy going out and thy coming in
From this time forth and for evermore.

This song of degrees is the only one that is inscribed שִׁיר לְמַעְלוֹת and not שִׁיר הַמַּעְלוֹת. The LXX., Targum, and Jerome render it as in the other instances; Aquila and Symmachus, on the contrary, ᾠδὴ (ᾠσμα) εἰς τὰς ἀναβάσεις, as the Midrash Sifrî also mystically interprets it: Song upon the steps, upon which God leads the righteous up into the other world. Those who explain הַמַּעְלוֹת of the homeward caravans or of the pilgrimages rightly regard this לְמַעְלוֹת, occurring only once, as favouring their explanation. But the Lamed is that of the rule or standard. The most prominent distinguishing mark of Ps. cxxi. is the step-like movement of the thoughts: it is formed לְמַעְלוֹת, after the manner of steps. The view that we have a pilgrim song before us is opposed by the beginning, which leads one to infer a firmly limited range of vision, and therefore a fixed place of abode and far removed from his native mountains. The tetrastichic arrangement of the Psalm is un mistakeable.

Vers. 1-4. Apollinaris renders as meaninglessly as possible: ὄμματα δενδροκόμων ὀρέων ὑπερεξετάνουσα—with a reproduction of the misapprehended ἦρα of the LXX. The expression in fact is  $\text{נִשְׁנָה}$ , and not  $\text{יְהִי־נִשְׁנָה}$ . And the mountains towards which the psalmist raises his eyes are not any mountains whatsoever. In Ezekiel the designation of his native land from the standpoint of the Mesopotamian plain is “the mountains of Israel.” His longing gaze is directed towards the district of these mountains, they are his kibla, i.e. the sight-point of his prayer, as of Daniel’s, ch. vi. 11 [10]. To render “from which my help cometh” (Luther) is inadmissible.  $\text{יְהִי־נִשְׁנָה}$  is an interrogative even in Josh. ii. 4, where the question is an indirect one. The poet looks up to the mountains, the mountains of his native land, the holy mountains (cxxxiii. 3, lxxxvii. 1, cxxv. 2), when he longingly asks: whence will my help come? and to this question his longing desire itself returns the answer, that his help comes from no other quarter than from Jahve, the Maker of heaven and earth, from Him who sits enthroned behind and upon these mountains, whose helpful power reaches to the remotest ends and corners of His creation, and with ( $\text{עֲשֵׂה}$ ) whom is help, i.e. both the willingness and the power to help, so that therefore help comes from nowhere but from ( $\text{יְהוָה}$ ) Him alone. In ver. 1*b* the poet has propounded a question, and in ver. 2 replies to this question himself. In ver. 3 and further the answering one goes on speaking to the questioner. The poet is himself become objective, and his Ego, calm in God, promises him comfort, by unfolding to him the joyful prospects contained in that hope in Jahve. The subjective  $\text{לֹא}$  expresses a negative in both cases with an emotional rejection of that which is absolutely impossible. The poet says to himself: He will, indeed, surely not abandon thy foot to the tottering ( $\text{עֲרֹכֵל}$ , as in lxvi. 9, cf. lv. 23), thy Keeper will surely not slumber; and then confirms the assertion that this shall not come to pass by heightening the expression in accordance with the step-like character of the Psalm: Behold the Keeper of Israel slumbereth not and sleepeth not, i.e. He does not fall into slumber from weariness, and His life is not an alternate waking and sleeping. The eyes of His providence are ever open over Israel.

Vers. 5-8. That which holds good of “the Keeper of Israel" the poet applies believingly to himself, the individual among God's people, in ver. 5 after Gen. xxviii. 15. Jahve is his Keeper, He is his shade upon his right hand (יְהוָה יְמִינֵי as in Judg. xx. 16, 2 Sam. xx. 9, and frequently; the construct state instead of an apposition, cf. e.g. جانب الغربي, the side of the western = the western side), which protecting him and keeping him fresh and cool, covers him from the sun's burning heat. על, as in cix. 6, cx. 5, with the idea of an overshadowing that screens and spreads itself out over anything (cf. Num. xiv. 9). To the figure of the shadow is appended the consolation in ver. 6. יְהוָה of the sun signifies to smite injuriously (Isa. xlix. 10), plants, so that they wither (cii. 5), and the head (Jonah iv. 8), so that symptoms of sun-stroke (2 Kings iv. 19, Judith viii. 2 sq.) appear. The transferring of the word to the moon is not zeugmatic. Even the moon's rays may become insupportable, may affect the eyes injuriously, and (more particularly in the equatorial regions) produce fatal inflammation of the brain.* From the hurtful influences of nature that are round about him the promise extends in vers. 7, 8 in every direction. Jahve, says the poet to himself, will keep (guard) thee against all evil, of whatever kind it may be and whence-soever it may threaten; He will keep thy soul, and therefore thy life both inwardly and outwardly; He will keep (יִשְׁמְרֵנִי, cf. on the other hand יִשְׁמְרֵנִי in ix. 9) thy going out and coming in, i.e. all thy business and intercourse of life (Deut. xxviii. 6, and frequently); for, as Chrysostom observes, ἐν τοῦτοις ὁ βίος ἅπας, ἐν εἰσόδου καὶ ἐξόδου, therefore: everywhere and at all times; and that from this time forth even for ever. In connection with this the thought is natural, that the life of him who stands under the so universal and unbounded protection of eternal love can suffer no injury.

* Many expositors, nevertheless, understand the destructive influence of the moon meant here of the nightly cold, which is mentioned elsewhere in the same antithesis, Gen. xxxi. 40, Jer. xxxvi. 30. De Sacy observes also: On dit quelquefois d'un grand froid, comme d'un grand chaud, qu'il est brûlant. The Arabs also say of snow and of cold as of fire: jahrik, it burns.

PSALM CXXII.

A WELL-WISHING GLANCE BACK AT THE PILGRIMS' CITY.

- 1 I REJOICED in those who said to me :
 "Let us go into the house of Jahve !"
- 2 Our feet stood still Within thy gates, O Jerusalem,
- 3 Jerusalem, thou that art built up again
 As a city which is compact in itself !
- 4 Whither the tribes went up,
The tribes of Jāh—
 A precept for Israel—
 To give thanks unto the Name of Jahve.
- 5 For there were set thrones for judgment,
Thrones for the house of David.
- 6 Wish ye Jerusalem peace :
May it be well with those who love thee !
- 7 Peace be within thy walls,
Prosperity within thy palaces !
- 8 For my brethren and my friends' sakes
 Will I speak peace concerning thee.
- 9 For the sake of the house of Jahve, our God,
 Will I seek thy good.

If by "the mountains" in cxxi. 1 the mountains of the Holy Land are to be understood, it is also clear for what reason the collector placed this Song of degrees, which begins with the expression of joy at the pilgrimage to the house of Jahve, and therefore to the holy mountain, immediately after the preceding song. By its peace-breathing (שלום) contents it also, however, touches closely upon Ps. cxx. The poet utters aloud his hearty benedictory salutation to the holy city in remembrance of the delightful time during which he sojourned there as a visitor at the feast, and enjoyed its inspiring aspect. If in respect of the לְיְהוָה the Psalm were to be regarded as an old Davidic Psalm, it would belong to the series of those Psalms of the time of the persecution by Absalom, which cast a yearning look back towards home, the house of God (xxiii., xxvi., lv. 15, lxi., and more particularly lxiii.). But the לָרוּר is wanting in the LXX., Codd. Alex. and Vat.; and the Cod. Sinait., which has  $\overline{\text{ΤΩ ΔΑΔ}}$ , puts this before Ps. cxxiv., εἰ μὴ ὅτι κύριος, κ.τ.λ., also, contrary to Codd. Alex. and Vat. Here it is occasioned by ver. 5, but without any critical discernment. The measures adopted by Jeroboam I. show, moreover, that the pilgrimages to the feasts were customary even in the time of David and Solomon. The images of calves in Dan and Bethel, and the changing of the Feast of Tabernacles to another month, were intended to strengthen the political rupture, by breaking up the religious unity of the people and weaning them from visiting Jerusalem. The poet of the Psalm before us, however, lived much later. He lived, as is to be inferred with Hupfeld from ver. 3, in the time of the post-exilic Jerusalem which rose again out of its ruins. Thither he had been at one of the great feasts, and here, still quite full of the inspiring memory, he looks back towards the holy city; for, in spite of Reuss, Hupfeld, and Hitzig, vers. 1 sq., so far as the style is concerned, are manifestly a retrospect.

Vers. 1-3. The preterite עָמְדָהּי may signify: I rejoice (1 Sam. ii. 1), just as much as: I rejoiced. Here in comparison with ver. 2a it is a retrospect; for הָיָה with the participle has for the most part a retrospective signification, Gen. xxxix. 22, Deut. ix. 22, 24, Judg. i. 7, Job i. 14. True, עָמְדוֹת הָיָה might also signify: they have been standing and still stand (as in x. 14, Isa. lix. 2, xxx. 20); but then why was it not more briefly expressed by עָמְדוּ (xxvi. 12)? The LXX. correctly renders: εὐφράνθην and ἑστῶτες ἦσαν. The poet, now again on the journey homewards, or having returned home, calls to mind the joy with which the cry for setting out, "Let us go up to the house of Jahve!" filled him. When he and the other visitors to the feast had reached the goal of their pilgrimage, their feet came to a stand-still, as if spell-bound by the overpowering, glorious sight.* Reviving this memory, he exclaims: Jerusalem, O thou who art built up again—true, בָּנָה in itself only signifies “to build,” but here, where, if there is nothing to the contrary, a closed sense is to be assumed for the line of the verse, and in the midst of songs which reflect the joy and sorrow of the post-exilic restoration period, it obtains the same meaning as in cii. 17, cxlvii. 2, and frequently (Gesenius: O Hierosolyma restituta). The parallel member, ver. 3*b*, does not indeed require this sense, but is at least favourable to it. Luther’s earlier rendering, “as a city which is compacted together,” was happier than his later rendering, “a city where they shall come together,” which requires a Niph. or Hithpa. instead of the passive. בָּרַחֲבָה signifies, as in Ex. xxviii. 7, to be joined together, to be united into a whole; and יִתְקַבְּצוּ strengthens the idea of that which is harmoniously, perfectly, and snugly closed up (cf. cxxxiii. 1). The Kaph of בָּרַחֲבָה is the so-called Kaph veritatis: Jerusalem has risen again out of its ruined and razed condition, the breaches and gaps are done away with (Isa. lviii. 12), it stands there as a closely compacted city, in which house joins on to house. Thus has the poet seen it, and the recollection fills him with rapture.*

Vers. 4, 5. The imposing character of the impression was still greatly enhanced by the consideration, that this is the city where at all times the twelve tribes of God’s nation (which were still distinguished as its elements even after the Exile, Rom. xi. 1, Luke ii. 36, Jas. i. 1) came together at the three great feasts. The use of the שׁ twice as equivalent to אִשֶׁר is (as in Canticles) appropriate to the ornamental, happy, miniature-like manner of these Songs of degrees. In שָׁשׂוּ the שׁ is, as in Eccles. i. 7, equivalent to שָׂמְחָה, which on the other hand in ver. 5 is no more than an emphatic שׁ (cf. lxxvi. 4, lxxviii. 7). עָלַי affirms a habit (cf. Job i. 4) of the past, which extends into the present. עֲדוּת לְיִשְׂרָאֵל is not an accusative of the definition or destination (Ew. § 300, c), but an apposition to the previous clause, as e.g. in Lev. xxiii. 14, 21, 31 (Hitzig), referring to the appointment in Ex. xxiii. 17, xxxiv. 23, Dent.

to give time to the amazement with which the sight of the Temple, the citadel of the king, and the magnificent city filled them.”

* In synagogue and church it is become customary to interpret ver. 3 of the parallelism of the heavenly and the earthly Jerusalem.

xvi. 16. The custom, which arose thus, is confirmed in ver. 5 from the fact, that Jerusalem, the city of the one national sanctuary, was at the same time the city of the Davidic kingship. The phrase לְמִשְׁפָּט יָשֵׁב is here transferred from the judicial persons (cf. xxix. 10 with ix. 5, Isa. xxviii. 6), who sit in judgment, to the seats (thrones) which are set down and stand there for judgment (cf. cxxv. 1, and θρόνος ἔκειτο, Apoc. iv. 2). The Targum is thinking of seats in the Temple, viz. the raised (in the second Temple resting upon pillars) seat of the king in the court of the Israelitish men near the שַׁעַר הָעֵלְיוֹן, but לְמִשְׁפָּט points to the palace, 1 Kings vii. 7. In the flourishing age of the Davidic kingship this was also the highest court of judgment of the land; the king was the chief judge (2 Sam. xv. 2, 1 Kings iii. 16), and the sons, brothers, or kinsmen of the king were his assessors and advisers. In the time of the poet it is different; but the attractiveness of Jerusalem, not only as the city of Jahve, but also as the city of David, remains the same for all times.

Vers. 6-9. When the poet thus calls up the picture of his country's "city of peace" before his mind, the picture of the glory which it still ever possesses, and of the greater glory which it had formerly, he spreads out his hands over it in the distance, blessing it in the kindling of his love, and calls upon all his fellow-countrymen round about and in all places: apprecamini salutem Hierosolymis. So Gesenius correctly (Thesaurus, p. 1347); for just as לִי אֶשְׁאַל לְיִשְׁרָאֵל signifies to inquire after any one's well-being, and to greet him with the question: הֲשָׁלוֹם לְךָ (Jer. xv. 5), so אֶשְׁאַל לְיִשְׁרָאֵל signifies to find out any one's prosperity by asking, to gladly know and gladly see that it is well with him, and therefore to be animated by the wish that he may prosper; Syriac, שְׂאֵל שְׂלֵמָא directly: to salute any one; for the interrogatory הֲשָׁלוֹם לְךָ and the well-wishing אֶשְׁאַל לְיִשְׁרָאֵל, εἰρήνη σοί (Luke x. 5, John xx. 19 sqq.), have both of them the same source and meaning. The reading אֶשְׁאַל לְיִשְׁרָאֵל, commended by Ewald, is a recollection of Job xii. 6 that is violently brought in here. The loving ones are comprehended with the beloved one, the children with the mother. אֶשְׁאַל forms an alliteration with שָׁלוֹם; the emphatic form אֶשְׁאַלִּי occurs even in other instances out of pause (e.g. lvii. 2). In ver. 7 the alliteration of שָׁלוֹם and שָׁלוֹם is again taken up, and both accord with the name of Jerusalem. Ad elegantiam facit, as Venema observes, perpetua vocum ad se invicem et omnium ad nomen Hierosolymæ alliteratio. Both together mark the Song of degrees as such. Happiness, cries out the poet to the holy city from afar, be within thy bulwarks, prosperity within thy palaces, i.e. without and within. הַיִל, ramparts, circumvallation (from הוּל, to surround, Arabic حَوْل, round about, equally correct whether written הַיִל or הַל), and אֶרְמִינּוֹת as the parallel word, as in xlvi. 14. The twofold motive of such an earnest wish for peace is love for the brethren and love for the house of God. For the sake of the brethren is he cheerfully resolved to speak peace (τὰ πρὸς εἰρήνην αὐτῆς, Luke xix. 42) concerning (דִּבֶּר בְּ, as in lxxxvii. 3, Deut. vi. 7, LXX. περὶ σοῦ; cf. דִּבֶּר שְׁלוֹם with אֶל and לְ, to speak peace to, lxxxv. 9, Esth. x. 3) Jerusalem, for the sake of the house of Jahve will he strive after good (i.e. that which tends to her well-being) to her (like בָּקַשׁ טוֹבָה לְ in Neh. ii. 10, cf. דִּרְשׁ שְׁלוֹם, Deut. xxiii. 7 [6], Jer. xxix. 7). For although he is now again far from Jerusalem after the visit that is over, he still remains united in love to the holy city as being the goal of his longing, and to those who dwell there as being his brethren and friends. Jerusalem is and will remain the heart of all Israel as surely as Jahve, who has His house there, is the God of all Israel.

· PSALM CXXIII.

UPWARD GLANCE TO THE LORD IN TIMES OF CONTEMPT.

- 1 TO Thee do I lift up mine eyes,
                                   Thou who art enthroned in the heavens!
- 2 Behold, as the eyes of servants unto the hand of their master,
As the eyes of a maid unto the hand of her mistress:
 So our eyes are unto Jahve our God, until He be gracious unto us.
- 3 Be gracious unto us, Jahve, be gracious unto us,
                                   for of contempt are we full enough.

4 Full enough is our soul
 With the scorn of the haughty, the contempt of despots.

This Psalm is joined to the preceding Psalm by the community of the divine name Jahve our God. Alsted (died 1638) gives it the brief, ingenious inscription oculus sperans. It is an upward glance of waiting faith to Jahve under tyrannical oppression. The fact that this Psalm appears in a rhyming form, "as scarcely any other piece in the Old Testament" (Reuss), comes only from those inflexional rhymes which creep in of themselves in the tephilla style.

Vers. 1, 2. The destinies of all men, and in particular of the church, are in the hand of the King who sits enthroned in the unapproachable glory of the heavens and rules over all things, and of the Judge who decides all things. Up to Him the poet raises his eyes, and to Him the church, together with which he may call Him "Jahve our God," just as the eyes of servants are directed towards the hand of their lord, the eyes of a maid towards the hand of her mistress; for this hand regulates the whole house, and they wait upon their winks and signs with most eager attention. Those of Israel are Jahve's servants, Israel the church is Jahve's maid. In His hand lies its future. At length He will take compassion on His own. Therefore its longing gaze goes forth towards Him, without being wearied, until He shall graciously turn its distress. With reference to the i of הַיְשָׁבִי, vid. on cxiii., cxiv. אֲדוֹנֵיהֶם is their common lord; for since in the antitype the sovereign Lord is meant, it will be conceived of as plur. excellentiæ, just as in general it occurs only rarely (Gen. xix. 2, 18, Jer. xxvii. 4) as an actual plural.

Vers. 3, 4. The second strophe takes up the "be gracious unto us" as it were in echo. It begins with a Kyrie eleison, which is confirmed in a crescendo manner after the form of steps. The church is already abundantly satiated with ignominy. רַב is an abstract "much," and רַבָּה (cf. lxxv. 10, cxx. 6) is concrete, "a great measure," like רַבָּה, lxxii. 3, something great (vid. Böttcher, Lehrbuch, § 624). The subjectivizing, intensive לָּהּ accords with cxx. 6—probably an indication of one and the same author. בּוֹ is strengthened by לְעַג, like בּוֹ in Ezek. xxxvi. 4. The article of הִלְעַג is retrospectively demonstrative: full of such scorn of the haughty (Ew. § 290, d). הַבּוֹ is also retrospectively demonstrative; but since a repetition of the article for the fourth time would have been inelegant, the poet here says לְנֹאֲיוּנִים with the Lamed, which serves as a circumlocution of the genitive. The Masora reckons this word among the fifteen "words that are written as one and are to be read as two." The Keri runs viz. לְנֹאֲיוּנִי יוֹנִים, superbis oppressorum (יוֹנִים, part. Kal, like הַיּוֹנָה Zeph. iii. 1, and frequently). But apart from the consideration that instead of נֹאֲיוּנִי, from the unknown נֹאֲיוּ, it might more readily be pointed נֹאֲיוּ, from נֹאֲיוּ (a form of nouns indicating defects, contracted נֹאֲיוּ), this genitival construction appears to be far-fetched, and, inasmuch as it makes a distinction among the oppressors, inappropriate. The poet surely meant לְנֹאֲיוּנִים or לְנֹאֲיוּנֵי. This word נֹאֲיוּ (after the form רַעֲיוּן, אֶרְבִּיּוּן, עֶלְיוּן) is perhaps an intentional new formation of the poet. Saadia interprets it after the Talmudic לְגִיּוֹן, legio; but how could one expect to find such a Grecized Latin word (λεγεών) in the Psalter! Dunash ben-Labrat (about 960) regards נֹאֲיוּנִים as a compound word in the signification of הַנֹּאֲיוּנִים הַיּוֹנִים. In fact the poet may have chosen the otherwise unused adjectival form נֹאֲיוּנִים because it reminds one of יוֹנִים, although it is not a compound word like רַב־יוֹנִים. If the Psalm is a Maccabæan Psalm, it is natural to find in לְנֹאֲיוּנִים an allusion to the despotic domination of the יוֹנִים.

PSALM CXXIV.

THE DELIVERER FROM DEATH IN WATERS AND IN A SNARE.

- 1 HAD not Jahve been for us,
Let Israel say—
- 2 Had not Jahve been for us,
When men rose up against us:
- 3 Then had they swallowed us up alive,
When their anger was kindled against us—
- 4 Then had the waters overwhelmed us,
The stream had gone over our soul—

- 5 Then had gone over our soul
The proudly swelling waters.
- 6 Blessed be Jahve, who hath not abandoned us
A prey to their teeth !
- 7 Our soul, like a bird hath it escaped
Out of the snare of the fowlers :
The snare was broken
And we—we escaped.
- 8 Our help is in the Name of Jahve,
The Creator of heaven and earth.

The statement "the stream had gone over our soul" of this fifth Song of degrees, coincides with the statement "our soul is full enough" of the fourth; the two Psalms also meet in the synonymous new formations מַצִּיּוֹנִים and מְרוֹנִים, which also look very much as though they were formed in allusion to cotemporary history. The מְרוֹנִים is wanting in the LXX., Codd. Alex. and Vat., here as in Ps. cxxii., and with the exception of the Targum is wanting in general in the ancient versions, and therefore is not so much as established as a point of textual criticism. It is a Psalm in the manner of the Davidic Psalms, to which it is closely allied in the metaphors of the overwhelming waters, xviii. 5, 17 (cf. cxliv. 7), lxix. 2 sq., and of the little bird; cf. also on לִיְלִי xxvii. 13, on אֲרָם used of hostile men lvi. 12, on בָּלַע הַיָּם lv. 16, on בְּרוּךְ ה' xxviii. 6, xxxi. 22. This beautiful song makes its modern origin known by its Aramaizing character, and by the delight, after the manner of the later poetry, in all kinds of embellishments of language. The art of the form consists less in strophic symmetry than in this, that in order to take one step forward it always goes back half a step. Luther's imitation (1524), "Were God not with us at this time" (Wäre Gott nicht mit uns diese Zeit), bears the inscription "The true believers' safeguard."

Vers. 1-5. It is commonly rendered, "If it had not been Jahve who was for us." But, notwithstanding the subject that is placed first (cf. Gen. xxiii. 13), the ש belongs to the לִיְלִי;

since in the Aramaizing Hebrew (cf. on the other hand Gen. xxxi. 42) לֹאֲנִי שֵׁ (cf. לֹאֲ אֲנִי) signifies nisi (prop. nisi quod), as in the Aramaic (ܩܝ) ܩܝܢ (ܩܝܢܐ), o si (prop. o si quod). The ܩܝܢ, peculiar to this Psalm in the Old Testament, instead of ܩܝܢ follows the model of the dialectic ܩܝܢܐ, ܩܝܢܐ, ܩܝܢܐ.

In order to begin the apodosis of לֹאֲנִי (ܩܝܢܐ) emphatically the older language makes use of the confirmatory כִּי, Gen. xxxi. 42, xliii. 10; here we have ܩܝܢ (well rendered by the LXX. ἀρα), as in cxix. 92. The Lamed of ܩܝܢ is raphe in both instances, according to the rule discussed above, vol. ii. 145. When men (אֲנָשִׁים) rose up against Israel and their anger was kindled against them, they who were feeble in themselves over against the hostile world would have been swallowed up alive if they had not had Jahve for them, if they had not had Him on their side. This "swallowing up alive" is said elsewhere of Hades, which suddenly and forcibly snatches away its victims, lv. 16, Prov. i. 12; here, however, as ver. 6 shows, it is said of the enemies, who are represented as wild beasts. In ver. 4 the hostile power which rolls over them is likened to an overflowing stream, as in Isa. viii. 7 sq., the Assyrian. ܩܝܢܐ, a stream or river, is Milel; it is first of all accusative: towards the stream (Num. xxxiv. 5); then, however, it is also used as a nominative, like ܩܝܢܐ, ܩܝܢܐ, and the like (cf. common Greek ἡ σύχθα, ἡ νεότητα); so that ܩܝܢܐ is related to ܩܝܢ (ܩܝܢ) as ܩܝܢܐ, ܩܝܢܐ to ܩܝܢ and ܩܝܢ (Böttcher, § 615). These latest Psalms are fond of such embellishments by means of adorned forms and Aramaic or Aramaizing words. ܩܝܢܐ is a word which is indeed not unhebraic in its formation, but is more indigenous to Chaldee; it is the Targum word for ܩܝܢ in lxxxvi. 14, cxix. 51, 78 (also in liv. 5 for ܩܝܢ), although according to Levy the MSS. do not present ܩܝܢܐ but ܩܝܢܐ. In the passage before us the Targum renders: the king who is like the proud waters (ܩܝܢܐ ܩܝܢܐ) of the sea (Antiochus Epiphanes?—A scholium explains οἱ ὑπερήφανοι). With reference to ܩܝܢܐ before a plural subject, vid. Ges. § 147.

Vers. 6-8. After the fact of the divine succour has been expressed, in ver. 6 follows the thanksgiving for it, and in ver. 7 the joyful shout of the rescued one. In ver. 6 the enemies are conceived of as beasts of prey on account of their blood-thirstiness, just as the worldly empires are in the Book of Daniel; in ver. 7 as “fowlers” on account of their cunning. According to the punctuation it is not to be rendered: Our soul is like a bird that is escaped, in which case it would have been accented נפשנו כצפור, but: our soul (subject with Rebia magnum) is as a bird (צפור as in Hos. xi. 11, Prov. xxiii. 32, Job xiv. 2, instead of the syntactically more usual בצפור) escaped out of the snare of him who lays snares (יקיש, elsewhere יקיש, יקיש, a fowler, xci. 3). וְנִשְׁפָּר (with ā beside Rebia) is 3d præt.: the snare was burst, and we—we became free. In ver. 8 (cf. cxxi. 2, cxxxiv. 3) the universal, and here pertinent thought, viz. the help of Israel is in the name of Jahve, the Creator of the world, i.e. in Him who is manifest as such and is continually verifying Himself, forms the epiphonematic close. Whether the power of the world seeks to make the church of Jahve like to itself or to annihilate it, it is not a disavowal of its God, but a faithful confession, stedfast even to death, that leads to its deliverance.

PSALM CXXV.

ISRAEL'S BULWARK AGAINST TEMPTATION TO APOSTASY.

- 1 THEY who trust in Jahve are as Mount Zion,
Which doth not totter, it standeth fast for ever.
- 2 As for Jerusalem—mountains are round about her,
And Jahve is round about His people
From this time and for evermore.
- 3 For the sceptre of wickedness shall not rest
Upon the lot of the righteous,
Lest the righteous stretch out
Their hands unto iniquity.
- 4 O show Thyself good, Jahve, unto the good
And to those who are upright in their hearts.

5 But those who turn aside their crooked paths—

Jahve cause them to pass away with the workers of iniquity.
Peace be upon Israel!

The favourite word Israel furnished the outward occasion for annexing this Psalm to the preceding. The situation is like that in Ps. cxxiii. and cxxiv. The people are under foreign dominion. In this lies the seductive inducement to apostasy. The pious and the apostate ones are already separated. Those who have remained faithful shall not, however, always remain enslaved. Round about Jerusalem are mountains, but more important still: Jahve, of rocks the firmest, Jahve encompasses His people.

That this Psalm is one of the latest, appears from the circumstantial expression "the upright in their hearts," instead of the old one, "the upright of heart," from יְהוֹשֵׁעַ instead of the former יְהוֹשֵׁעַ, and also from לִמְעַן לֹא (beside this passage occurring only in cxix. 11, 80, Ezek. xix. 9, xxvi. 20, Zech. xii. 7) instead of לִמְעַן אֲשֶׁר לֹא or בְּיָן.

Vers. 1, 2. The steadfastness which those who trust in Jahve prove in the midst of every kind of temptation and assault is likened to Mount Zion, because the God to whom they believingly cling is He who sits enthroned on Zion. The future יֹשֵׁב signifies: He sits and will sit, that is to say, He continues to sit, cf. ix. 8, cxxii. 5. Older expositors are of opinion that the heavenly Zion must be understood on account of the Chaldæan and the Roman catastrophes; but these, in fact, only came upon the buildings on the mountain, not upon the mountain itself, which in itself and according to its appointed destiny (vid. Mic. iii. 12, iv. 1) remained unshaken. In ver. 2 also it is none other than the earthly Jerusalem that is meant. The holy city has a natural circumvallation of mountains, and the holy nation that dwells and worships therein has a still infinitely higher defence in Jahve, who encompasses it round (vid. on xxxiv. 8), as perhaps a wall of fire (Zech. ii. 9 [5]), or an impassably broad and mighty river (Isa. xxxiii. 21); a statement which is also now confirmed, for, etc. Instead of inferring from the clause ver. 2 that which is to be expected with לָךְ, the poet confirms it with כִּי by that which is surely to be expected.

Ver. 3. The pressure of the worldly power, which now lies heavily upon the holy land, will not last for ever; the duration of the calamity is exactly proportioned to the power of resistance of the righteous, whom God proves and purifies by calamity, but not without at the same time graciously preserving them. "The rod of wickedness" is the heathen sceptre, and "the righteous" are the Israelites who hold fast to the religion of their fathers. The holy land, whose sole entitled inheritors are these righteous, is called their "lot" (גֹּרֶל, κληρος = κληρονομία). נָחַת signifies to alight or settle down anywhere, and having alighted, to lean upon or rest (cf. Isa. xi. 2 with John i. 32, ἔμεινεν). The LXX. renders οὐκ ἀφήσει, i.e. יִנָּח לֹא (cf. on the other hand יִנָּח, He shall let down, cause to come down, in Isa. xxx. 32). Not for a continuance shall the sceptre of heathen tyranny rest upon the holy land, God will not suffer that: in order that the righteous may not at length, by virtue of the power which pressure and use exercises over men, also participate in the prevailing ungodly doings. שָׁלַח with Beth: to seize upon anything wrongfully, or even only (as in Job xxviii. 9) to lay one's hand upon anything (frequently with עַל). As here in the case of עֲלֵהָה, in lxxx. 3 too the form that is the same as the locative is combined with a preposition.

Vers. 4, 5. On the ground of the strong faith in vers. 1 sq. and of the confident hope in ver. 3, the petition now arises that Jahve would speedily bestow the earnestly desired blessing of freedom upon the faithful ones, and on the other hand remove the cowardly [lit. those afraid to confess God] and those who have fellowship with apostasy, together with the declared wicked ones, out of the way. For such is the meaning of vers. 4 sq. טוֹבִים (in Proverbs alternating with the "righteous," ch. ii. 20, the opposite being the "wicked," רָשָׁעִים, ch. xiv. 19) are here those who truly believe and rightly act in accordance with the good will of God,* or, as the parallel member of the verse explains (where לִישָׁרִים did not require the article on account of the addition), those who in the bottom of their heart are uprightly disposed, as God desires to have it. The poet supplicates good for them, viz. preservation against denying God and deliverance out of slavery; for those, on the contrary, who bend (הִטּוּ) their crooked paths, i.e. turn aside their paths in a crooked direction from the right way (הִטּוּ מִדֶּרֶךְ יְשָׁרִים, cf. Judg. v. 6, no less than in Amos ii. 7, Prov. xvii. 23, an accusative of the object, which is more natural than that it is the accusative of the direction, after Num. xxii. 23 extrem., cf. Job xxiii. 11, Isa. xxx. 11)—for these he wishes that Jahve would clear them away (הִלֵּךְ like أَهْلَكَ, perire facere = perdere) together with the workers of evil, i.e. the open, manifest sinners, to whom these lukewarm and sly, false and equivocal ones are in no way inferior as a source of danger to the church. LXX. correctly: τοὺς δὲ ἐκκλίνοντας εἰς τὰς στραγγαλιὰς (Aquila διαπλοκάς, Symmachus σκολιότητας, Theodotion διεστραμμένα) ἀπάξει κύριος μετὰ, κ.τ.λ. Finally, the poet, stretching out his hand over Israel as if pronouncing the benediction of the priest, gathers up all his hopes, prayers, and wishes into the one prayer: "Peace be upon Israel." He means "the Israel of God," Gal. vi. 16. Upon this Israel he calls down peace from above. Peace is the end of tyranny, hostility, dismemberment, unrest, and terror; peace is freedom and harmony and unity and security and blessedness.

PSALM CXXVI.

THE HARVEST OF JOY AFTER THE SOWING OF TEARS.

- 1 WHEN Jahve brought back the returning ones of Ziou,
We were as those who dream.
- 2 Then laughter filled our mouth,
And our tongue a shout of joy.
Then said they among the heathen :
"Great things hath Jahve done for them"—
- 3 Great things hath Jahve done for us,
We became glad.

- 4 Oh lead back, Jahve, our captive ones,
As streams in the south country !
- 5 Those who sow with tears,
Shall reap with a shout of joy.
- 6 He goeth to and fro amidst weeping,
Bearing the scattering of the seed—
He cometh along with a shout of joy,
Bearing his sheaves.

It is with this Psalm, which the favourite word Zion connects with the preceding Psalm, exactly as with Ps. lxxxv., which also gives thanks for the restoration of the captive ones of Israel on the one hand, and on the other hand has to complain of the wrath that is still not entirely removed, and prays for a national restoration. There are expositors indeed who also transfer the grateful retrospect with which this Song of degrees (vers. 1-3), like that Korahitic Psalm (vers. 2-4), begins, into the future (among the translators Luther is at least more consistent than the earlier ones); but they do this for reasons which are refuted by Ps. lxxxv., and which are at once silenced when brought face to face with the requirements of the syntax.

Vers. 1-3. When passages like Isa. i. 9, Gen. xlvii. 25, or others where  $\text{וַיִּיָּחַד}$  is perf. consec., are appealed to in order to prove that  $\text{וַיִּיָּחַד$  may signify erimus quasi somniantes, they are instances that are different in point of syntax. Any other rendering than that of the LXX. is here impossible, viz.: Ἐν τῷ ἐπιστρέψαι κύριον τὴν αἰχμαλωσίαν Σιών ἐγενήθημεν ὡς παρακεκλημένοι ( $\text{וַיִּיָּחַד}$ ?—Jerome correctly, quasi somniantes). It is, however, just as erroneous when Jerome goes on to render: tunc implebitur risu os nostrum; for it is true the future after  $\text{יִּשְׁ$  has a future signification in passages where the context relates to matters of future history, as in xcvi. 12, Zeph. iii. 9, but it always has the signification of the imperfect after the key-note of the historical past has once been struck, Ex. xv. 1, Josh. viii. 30, x. 12, 1 Kings xi. 7, xvi. 21, 2 Kings xv. 16, Job xxxviii. 21; it is therefore, tunc implebatur. It is the exiles at home again upon the soil of their fatherland who here cast back a glance into the happy time when their destiny suddenly took another turn, by the God of Israel disposing the heart of the conqueror of Babylon to set them at liberty, and to send them to their native land in an honourable manner. שׁוּבָה is not equivalent to שׁוּבָיִת, nor is there any necessity to read it thus (Olshausen, Böttcher, and Hupfeld). שׁוּבָה (from שׁוּב, like בִּיָּאָה, קִיָּמָה) signifies the return, and then those returning; it is, certainly, an innovation of this very late poet. When Jahve brought home the homeward-bound ones of Zion—the poet means to say—we were as dreamers. Does he mean by this that the long seventy years' term of affliction lay behind us like a vanished dream (Joseph Kimchi), or that the redemption that broke upon us so suddenly seemed to us at first not to be a reality but a beautiful dream? The tenor of the language favours the latter: as those not really passing through such circumstances, but only dreaming. Then—the poet goes on to say—our mouth was filled with laughter (Job viii. 21) and our tongue with a shout of joy, inasmuch, namely, as the impression of the good fortune which contrasted so strongly with our trouble hitherto, compelled us to open our mouth wide in order that our joy might break forth in a full stream, and our jubilant mood impelled our tongue to utter shouts of joy, which knew no limit because of the inexhaustible matter of our rejoicing. And how awe-inspiring was Israel's position at that time among the peoples! and what astonishment the marvellous change of Israel's lot produced upon them! Even the heathen confessed that it was Jahve's work, and that He had done great things for them (Joel ii. 20 sq., 1 Sam. xii. 24)—the glorious predictions of Isaiah, as in ch. xlv. 14, lii. 10, and elsewhere, were being fulfilled. The church on its part seals that confession coming from the mouth of the heathen. This it is that made them so joyful, that God had acknowledged them by such a mighty deed.

Vers. 4-6. But still the work so mightily and graciously begun is not completed. Those who up to the present time have returned, out of whose heart this Psalm is, as it were, composed, are only like a small vanguard in relation to the whole nation. Instead of שׁוּבָתֵנוּ the Keri here reads שׁוּבָתֵנוּ, from שׁוּבָיִת, Num. xxi. 29, after the form בְּבָיִת in Gen. i. 4. As we read elsewhere that Jerusalem yearns after her children, and Jahve solemnly assures her, "thou shalt put them all on as jewels and gird thyself like a bride" (Isa. xlix. 18), so here the poet proceeds from the idea that the holy land yearns after an abundant, reanimating influx of population, as the Negeb (i.e. the Judæan south country, Gen. xx. 1, and in general the south country lying towards the desert of Sinai) thirsts for the rain-water streams, which disappear in the summer season and regularly return in the winter season. Concerning נַעֲבֹת, "a water-holding channel," vid. on xviii. 16. If we translate converte captivitatem nostram (as Jerome does, following the LXX.), we shall not know what to do with the figure, whereas in connection with the rendering reduc captivos nostros it is just as beautifully adapted to the object as to the governing verb. If we have rightly referred negeb not to the land of the Exile but to the Land of Promise, whose appearance at this time is still so unlike the promise, we shall now also understand by those who sow in tears not the exiles, but those who have already returned home, who are again sowing the old soil of their native land, and that with tears, because the ground is so parched that there is little hope of the seed springing up. But this tearful sowing will be followed by a joyful harvest. One is reminded here of the drought and failure of the crops with which the new colony was visited in the time of Haggai, and of the coming blessing promised by the prophet with a view to the work of the building of the Temple being vigorously carried forward. Here, however, the tearful sowing is only an emblem of the new foundation-laying, which really took place not without many tears (Ezra iii. 12), amidst sorrowful and depressed circumstances; but in its general sense the language of the Psalm coincides with the language of the Preacher on the Mount, Matt. v. 4: Blessed are those who mourn, for they shall be comforted. The subject to ver. 6 is the husbandman, and without a figure, every member of the ecclesia pressa. The gerundial construction in ver. 6*a* (as in 2 Sam. iii. 16, Jer. l. 4, cf. the more Indo-Germanic style of expression in 2 Sam. xv. 30) depicts the continual passing along, here the going to and fro of the sorrowfully pensive man; and ver. 6*b* the undoubted coming and sure appearing of him who is highly blessed beyond expectation. The former bears כִּי־שָׂדֶה הַזֶּרַע, the seed-draught, i.e. the handful of seed taken from the rest for casting out (for כִּי־שָׂדֶה הַזֶּרַע in Amos ix. 13 signifies to cast forth the seed along the furrows); the latter his sheaves, the produce (תְּבִיאָה), such as puts him to the blush, of his, as it appeared to him, forlorn sowing. As by the sowing we are to understand everything that each individual contributes towards the building up of the kingdom of God, so by the sheaves, the wholesome fruit which, by God bestowing His blessing upon it beyond our prayer and comprehension, springs up from it.

PSALM CXXVII.

EVERYTHING DEPENDS UPON THE BLESSING OF GOD.*

- 1 If Jahve build not the house,
They labour in vain thereon who build it.
If Jahve watch not over the city,
In vain doth he keep awake who watcheth over it.
- 2 In vain is it that ye rise up early
And only sit down late,
Eating the bread of sorrowful labour
Even so He giveth to His beloved in sleep.
- 3 Behold a heritage of Jahve are sons,
A reward is the fruit of the womb.
- 4 As arrows in the hand of a mighty man,
So are sons of the youth.
- 5 Blessed is the man
Who hath his quiver full of them :
They shall not be ashamed,
When they speak with enemies in the gate.

The inscribed יְשֻׁלָּמָה is only added to this Song of degrees because there was found in ver. 2 not only an allusion to the name Jedidiah, which Solomon received from Nathan (2 Sam. xii. 25), but also to his being endowed with wisdom and riches in the dream at Gibeon (1 Kings iii. 5 sqq.). And to these is still to be added the Proverbs-like form of the Psalm; for, like the proverb-song, the extended form of the Mashal, it consists of a double string of proverbs, the expression of which reminds one in many ways of the Book of Proverbs (יְעֲבִים in ver. 2, toilsome efforts, as in Prov. v. 10; מְאֵהָרִי, as in Prov. xxiii. 30; בְּנֵי הַנְּעוּרִים in ver. 4, sons begotten in one's youth, as in Prov. v. 18 אִשָּׁת נְעוּרַיִם, a wife married in one's youth; בְּשֹׁעַר in ver. 5, as in Prov. xxii. 22, xxiv. 7), and which together are like the unfolding of the proverb, ch. x. 22: The blessing of Jahve, it maketh rich, and labour addeth nothing beside it. Even Theodoret observes, on the natural assumption that ver. 1 points to the building of the Temple, how much better the Psalm suits the time of Zerubbabel and Joshua, when the building of the Temple was imperilled by the hostile neighbouring peoples; and in connection with the relatively small number of those who had returned home out of the Exile, a numerous family, and more especially many sons, must have seemed to be a doubly and threefoldly precious blessing from God.

Vers. 1, 2. The poet proves that everything depends upon the blessing of God from examples taken from the God-ordained life of the family and of the state. The rearing of the house which affords us protection, and the stability of the city in which we securely and peaceably dwell, the acquisition of possessions that maintain and adorn life, the begetting and rearing of sons that may contribute substantial support to the father as he grows old—all these are things which depend upon the blessing of God without natural preliminary conditions being able to guarantee them, well-devised arrangements to ensure them, unwearied labours to obtain them by force, or impatient care and murmuring to get them by defiance. Many a man builds himself a house, but he is not able to carry out the building of it, or he dies before he is able to take possession of it, or the building fails through unforeseen misfortunes, or, if it succeeds, becomes a prey to violent destruction: if God Himself do not build it, they labour thereon (עִמַּלָּךְ, Jonah iv. 10, Ecces. ii. 21) in vain who build it. Many a city is well-ordered, and seems to be secured by wise precautions against every misfortune, against fire and sudden attack; but if God Himself do not guard it, it is in vain that those to whom its protection is entrusted give themselves no sleep and perform (שָׁקַד, a word that has only come into frequent use since the literature of the Salomonic age) the duties of their office with the utmost devotion. The perfect in the apodosis affirms what has been done on the part of man to be ineffectual if the former is not done on God's part; cf. Num. xxxii. 23. Many rise up early in order to get to their work, and delay the sitting down as long as possible; i.e. not: the lying down (Hupfeld), for that is שָׁכַב, not יָשַׁב; but to take a seat in order to rest a little, and, as what follows shows, to eat (Hitzig). שָׁבַת and קָיָם stand opposed to one another: the latter cannot therefore mean to remain sitting at one's work, in favour of which Isa. v. 11 (where בָּבִקֵּר and בְּנִשְׁתֵּי form an antithesis) cannot be properly compared. 1 Sam. xx. 24 shows that prior to the incursion of the Grecian custom they did not take their meals lying or reclining (ἀνα- or κατακείμενος), but sitting. It is vain for you—the poet exclaims to them—it will not after all bring what you think to be able to acquire; in so doing you eat only the bread of sorrow, i.e. bread that is procured with toil and trouble (cf. Gen. iii. 17, בֶּעָצְבוֹן): כֵּן, in like manner, i.e. the same as you are able to procure only by toilsome and anxious efforts, God gives to His beloved (lx. 7, Deut. xxxiii. 12) שָׁנָא (= שָׁנָה), in sleep (an adverbial accusative like בָּקֵר, לַיְלָה, עָרַב), i.e. without restless self-activity, in a state of self-forgetful renunciation, and modest, calm surrender to Him: "God bestows His gifts during the night," says a German proverb, and a Greek proverb even says: εὐδουτι κύριος αἰρεῖ. Böttcher takes כֵּן in the sense of "so = without anything further;" and כֵּן certainly has this meaning sometimes (vid. introduction to Ps. cx.), but not in this passage, where, as referring back, it stands at the head of the clause, and where what this mimic כֵּן would import lies in the word שָׁנָא.

Vers. 3-5. With הִנֵּה it goes on to refer to a specially striking example in support of the maxim that everything depends upon God's blessing. פְּרֵי הַבָּטָן (Gen. xxx. 2, Deut. vii. 13) beside בָּנִים also admits of the including of daughters. It is with שָׂכָר (recalling Gen. xxx. 18) just as with נַחֲלֵת. Just as the latter in this passage denotes an inheritance not according to hereditary right, but in accordance with the free-will of the giver, so the former denotes not a reward that is paid out as in duty bound, but a recompense that is bestowed according to one's free judgment, and in fact looked for in accordance with a promise given, but cannot by any means be demanded. Sons are a blessed gift from above. They are—especially when they are the offspring of a youthful marriage (opp. בְּרִיתֵינִים, Gen. xxxvii. 3, xliv. 20), and accordingly themselves strong and hearty (Gen. xlix. 3), and at the time that the father is growing old are in the bloom of their years—like arrows in the hand of a warrior. This is a comparison which the circumstances of his time made natural to the poet, in which the sword was carried side by side with the trowel, and the work of national restoration had to be defended step by step against open enemies, envious neighbours, and false brethren. It was not sufficient then to have arrows in the quiver; one was obliged to have them not merely at hand, but in the hand (בְּיָד), in order to be able to discharge them and defend one's self. What a treasure, in such a time when it was needful to be constantly ready for fighting, defensive or offensive, was that which youthful sons afforded to the elderly father and weaker members of the family! Happy is the man—the poet exclaims—who has his quiver, i.e. his house, full of such arrows, in order to be able to deal out to the enemies as many arrows as may be needed. The father and such a host of sons surrounding him (this is the complex notion of the subject) form a phalanx not to be broken through. If they have to speak with enemies in the gate—i.e. candidly to upbraid them with their wrong, or to ward off their unjust accusation—they shall not be ashamed, i.e. not be overawed, disheartened, or disarmed. Gesenius in his Thesaurus, as Ibn-Jachja has already done, takes יָדָר here in the signification “to destroy;” but in Gen. xxxiv. 13 this Piel signifies to deal behind one's back (deceitfully), and in 2 Chron. xxii. 10 to get rid of by assassination.

This shade of the notion, which proceeds from יָדָר, pone esse (vid. xviii. 48, xxviii. 2), does not suit the passage before us, and the expression לֹא יִבְשֵׁי is favourable to the idea of the gate as being the forum, which arises from taking יָדָר in its ordinary signification. Unjust judges, malicious accusers, and false witnesses retire shy and faint-hearted before a family so capable of defending itself. We read the opposite of this in Job v. 4 of sons upon whom the curse of their fathers rests.

PSALM CXXVIII.

THE FAMILY PROSPERITY OF THE GOD-FEARING MAN.

- 1 HAPPY is every one who feareth Jahve,
Who walketh in His ways.
- 2 The labour of thy hands shalt thou surely eat,
Happy art thou, and it is well with thee.
- 3 Thy wife, like a fruitful vine is she,
In the inner part of thy house ;
Thy children are like shoots of olive-trees
Round about thy table.
- 4 Behold, surely thus is the man blessed
Who feareth Jahve.
- 5 Jahve bless thee out of Zion,
And see thou the prosperity of Jerusalem
All the days of thy life,
- 6 And see thou thy children's children—
Peace be upon Israel !

Just as Ps. cxxvii. is appended to Ps. cxxvi. because the fact that Israel was so surprised by the redemption out of exile that they thought they were dreaming, finds its interpretation in the universal truth that God bestows upon him whom He loves, in sleep, that which others are not able to acquire by toiling and moiling day and night: so Ps. cxxviii. follows Ps. cxxvii. for the same reason as Ps. ii. follows Ps. i. In both instances they are Psalms placed together, of which one begins with ashrê and one ends with ashrê. In other respects Ps. cxxviii. and cxxvii. supplement one another. They are related to one another much as the New Testament parables of the treasure in the field and the one pearl are related. That which makes man happy is represented in Ps. cxxvii. as a gift coming as a blessing, and in Ps. cxxviii. as a reward coming as a blessing, that which is briefly indicated in the word שָׁכַר in cxxvii. 3 being here expanded and unfolded. There it appears as a gift of grace in contrast to the God-estranged self-activity of man, here as a fruit of the ora et labora. Ewald considers this and the preceding Psalm to be songs to be sung at table. But they are ill-suited for this purpose; for they contain personal mirrorings instead of petitions, and instead of benedictions of those who are about to partake of the food provided.

Vers. 1-3. The  $\text{וְ}$  in ver. 2 signifies neither "for" (Aquila, κόπον τῶν ταρσῶν σου ὅτι φάγεσαι), nor "when" (Symmachus, κόπον χειρῶν σου ἐσθίων); it is the directly affirmative  $\text{וְ}$ , which is sometimes thus placed after other words in a clause (cxviii. 10-12, Gen. xviii. 20, xli. 32). The proof in favour of this asseverating  $\text{וְ}$  is the very usual  $\text{וְ עַתָּה וְ}$  in the apodoses of hypothetical protases, or even  $\text{וְ יִצְחָק וְ}$  in Job xi. 15, or also only  $\text{וְ}$  in Isa. vii. 9, 1 Sam. xiv. 39: "surely then;" the transition from the confirmative to the affirmative signification is evident from ver. 4 of the Psalm before us. To support one's self by one's own labour is a duty which even a Paul did not wish to avoid (Acts xx. 34), and so it is a great good fortune ( $\text{וְ לֵב טוֹב}$  as in cxix. 71) to eat the produce of the labour of one's own hands (LXX. τοὺς καρπούς τῶν πόνων, or according to an original reading, τοὺς πόνους τῶν καρπῶν\*); for he who can make himself useful to others and still is also independent of them, he eats the bread of blessing which God gives, which is sweeter than the bread of charity which men give. In close connection with this is the prosperity of a house that is at peace and contented within itself, of an amiable and tranquil and hopeful (rich in hope) family life. "Thy wife ( $\text{וְ אִשְׁתְּךָ}$ , found only here, for  $\text{וְ אִשְׁתְּךָ}$ ) is as a fruit-producing vine."  $\text{פְּרִיָּהּ}$  for  $\text{פְּרָהּ}$ , from  $\text{פָּרָה} = \text{פָּרָי}$ , with the Jod of the root retained, like  $\text{בֹּכִיָּה}$ , Lam. i. 16. The figure of the vine is admirably suited to the wife, who is a shoot or sprig of the husband, and stands in need of the man's support as the vine needs a stick or the wall of a house (pergula).  $\text{בְּיַרְכֵּי בֵּיתִי}$  does not belong to the figure, as Kimchi is of opinion, who thinks of a vine starting out of the room and climbing up in the open air outside. What is meant is the angle, corner, or nook (יִרְבֵּתִי, in relation to things and artificial, equivalent to the natural יִרְבֵּי), i.e. the background, the privacy of the house, where the housewife, who is not to be seen much out of doors, leads a quiet life, entirely devoted to the happiness of her husband and her family. The children springing from such a noble vine, planted around the family table, are like olive shoots or cuttings; cf. in Euripides, Medea, 1098: τέκνων ἐν οἴκοις γλυκερὸν βλάστημα, and Herc. Fur. 839: καλλίπαις στέφανος. Thus fresh as young layered small olive-trees and thus promising are they.

* The fact that the τῶν καρπῶν of the LXX. here, as in Prov. xxxi. 20, is intended to refer to the hands is noted by Theodoret and also by Didymus (in Rosenmüller): καρπούς φησι εὖν ὡς ἀπὸ μέρους τᾶς χειρᾶς (i.e. per synecdochen partis pro toto), ταυτέστι τῶν πρακτικῶν σου δυνάμεων φάγεσαι τούς πόνους.

Vers. 4-6. Pointing back to this charming picture of family life, the poet goes on to say: behold, for thus = behold, thus is the man actually blessed who fears Jahve. בִּי confirms the reality of the matter of fact to which the הִנֵּה points. The promissory future in ver. 5a is followed by imperatives which call upon the God-fearing man at once to do that which, in accordance with the promises, stands before him as certain. מְצִיֵן as in cxxxiv. 3, xx. 3. בְּנִים לְבָנֶיךָ instead of בְּנֵי בָנֶיךָ gives a designed indefiniteness to the first member of the combination. Every blessing the individual enjoys comes from the God of salvation, who has taken up His abode in Zion, and is perfected in participation in the prosperity of the holy city and of the whole church, of which it is the centre. A New Testament song would here open up the prospect of the heavenly Jerusalem. But the character of limitation to this present world that is stamped upon the Old Testament does not admit of this. The promise refers only to a present participation in the well-being of Jerusalem (Zech. viii. 15) and to long life prolonged in one's children's children; and in this sense calls down intercessorily peace upon Israel in all its members, and in all places and all ages.

PSALM CXXIX.

THE END OF THE OPPRESSORS OF ZION.

1 ENOUGH have they oppressed me from my youth up,
Let Israel say—

- 2 *Enough have they oppressed me from my youth up,
Nevertheless they have not prevailed against me.*
- 3 Upon my back the ploughers ploughed,
They made long their furrow-strip.
- 4 Jahve is righteous :
He hath cut asunder the cords of the wicked.
- 5 They must be ashamed and turn back,
All who hate Zion.
- 6 They must become as grass of the house-tops,
Which, ere it shooteth up, withereth—
- 7 Wherewith the reaper filleth not his hand,
Nor he who bindeth sheaves his bosom,
- 8 Neither do they who pass by say :
*The blessing of Jahve be upon you !
“ We bless you in the name of Jahve ! ! ”*

Just as Ps. cxxiv. with the words “ let Israel say ” was followed by Ps. cxxv. with “ peace be upon Israel, ” so Ps. cxxviii. with “ peace be upon Israel ” is followed by Ps. cxxix. with “ let Israel say. ” This Ps. cxxix. has not only the call “ let Israel say, ” but also the situation of a deliverance that has been experienced (cf. ver. 4 with cxxiv. 6 sq.), from which point it looks gratefully back and confidently forward into the future, and an Aramaic tinge that is noticeable here and there by the side of all other classical character of form, in common with Ps. cxxiv.

Vers. 1, 2. Israel is gratefully to confess that, however much and sorely it was oppressed, it still has not succumbed. רָבַח, together with רָבַחָה, has occurred already in lxx. 10, lxii. 3, and it becomes usual in the post-exilic language, cxx. 6, cxxiii. 4, 2 Chron. xxx. 18 ; Syriac rebath. The expression “ from my youth ” glances back to the time of the Egyptian bondage ; for the time of the sojourn in Egypt was the time of Israel’s youth (Hos. ii. 17 [15], xi. 1, Jer. ii. 2, Ezek. xxiii. 3). The protasis ver. 1a is repeated in an interlinked, chain-like conjunction in order to complete the thought ; for ver. 2b is the turning-point, where בָּ, having reference to the whole negative clause, signifies "also" in the sense of "nevertheless," ὅμως (synon. בְּכִלְיָאֵת), as in Ezek. xvi. 28, Eccles. vi. 7, cf. above, cxix. 24 : although they oppressed me much and sore, yet have they not overpowered me (the construction is like Num. xiii. 30, and frequently).

Vers. 3-5. Elsewhere it is said that the enemies have driven over Israel (lxvi. 12), or have gone over its back (Isa. li. 23) ; here the customary figurative language חָרַשׁ אֶת in Job iv. 8 (cf. Hos. x. 13) is extended to another figure of hostile dealing : without compassion and without consideration they ill-treated the stretched-forth back of the people who were held in subjection, as though it were arable land, and, without restraining their ferocity and setting a limit to their spoiling of the enslaved people and country, they drew their furrow-strip (מַעֲנֵתָם, according to the Keri מַעֲנֹתָם) long. But מַעֲנֵה does not signify (as Keil on 1 Sam. xiv. 14 is of opinion, although explaining the passage more correctly than Thenius) the furrow (= תְּלֵם, תְּרוּר), but, like عِنْدَة, a strip of arable land which the ploughman takes in hand at one time, at both ends of which consequently the ploughing team (צֶמֶד) always comes to a stand, turns round, and ploughs a new furrow ; from עָנָה, to bend, turn (vid. Wetzstein's Excursus II. at the end of this volume). It is therefore : they drew their furrow-turning long (dative of the object instead of the accusative with Hiph., as e.g. in Isa. xxix. 2, cf. with Piel in xxxiv. 4, cxvi. 16, and Kal lxix. 6, after the Aramaic style, although it is not unhebraic). Righteous is Jahve—this is an universal truth, which has been verified in the present circumstances ;—He hath cut asunder the cords of the wicked (עֲבוֹת) as in ii. 3 ; here, however, it is suggested by the metaphor in ver. 3, cf. Job xxxix. 10 ; LXX. αὐχένας, i.e. עֲנוּק), with which they held Israel bound. From that which has just been experienced Israel derives the hope that all Zion's haters (a newly coined name for the enemies of the religion of Israel) will be obliged to retreat with shame and confusion.

Vers. 6-8. The poet illustrates the fate that overtakes them by means of a picture borrowed from Isaiah and worked up (ch. xxxvii. 27) : they become like "grass of the house-tops," etc. פֶּשֶׁ is a relative to יֵבֵשׁ (quod exarescit), and קִרְמַת priusquam, is Hebraized after מִן־קֶרְמֶת דִּנְהָ in Dan. vi. 11, or מִן־קֶרְמֶת דִּנְהָ in Ezra v. 11. הִלָּשׁ elsewhere has the signification "to draw forth" of a sword, shoe, or arrow, which is followed by the LXX., Theodotion, and the Quinta: πρὸ τοῦ ἐκσπασθῆναι, before it is plucked. But side by side with the ἐκσπασθῆναι of the LXX. we also find the reading ἐξανθῆσαι; and in this sense Jerome renders (statim ut) viruerit, Symmachus ἐκκαυλῆσαι (to shoot into a stalk), Aquila ἀνέθαιεν, the Sexta ἐκσπερεῶσαι (to attain to full solidity). The Targum paraphrases הִלָּשׁ in both senses: to shoot up and to pluck off. The former signification, after which Venema interprets: antequam se evaginet vel evaginetur, i.e. antequam e vaginulis suis se evolvat et succrescat, is also advocated by Parchon, Kimchi, and Aben-Ezra. In the same sense von Ortenberg conjectures הִלָּשׁ. Since the grass of the house-tops or roofs, if one wishes to pull it up, can be pulled up just as well when it is withered as when it is green, and since it is the most natural thing to take הַצִּיר as the subject to הִלָּשׁ, we decide in favour of the intransitive signification, "to put itself forth, to develope, shoot forth into ear." The roof-grass withers before it has put forth ears or blossoms, just because it has no deep root, and therefore cannot stand against the heat of the sun.* The poet pursues the figure of the grass of the house-tops still further. The encompassing lap or bosom (κόλπος) is called elsewhere הִצִּיר (Isa. xlix. 22, Neh. v. 13); here it is הִצִּיר, like the Arabic hidn (diminutive hodein), of the same root with מִחַץ, a creek, in cvii. 30. The enemies of Israel are as grass upon the house-tops, which is not garnered in; their life closes with sure destruction, the germ of which they (without any need for any rooting out) carry within themselves. The observation of Knapp, that any Western poet would have left off with ver. 6, is based upon the error that vers. 7, 8 are an idle embellishment. The greeting addressed to the reapers in ver. 8 is taken from life; it is not denied even to heathen reapers. Similarly Boaz (Ruth ii. 4) greets them with "Jahve be with you," and receives the counter-salutation, "Jahve bless thee." Here it is the passers-by who call out to those who are harvesting: The blessing (בְּרִצָּת) of Jahve happen to you (אֵלֶיְכֶם),* as in the Aaronitish blessing), and (since "we bless you in the name of Jahve" would be a purposeless excess of politeness in the mouth of the same speakers) receive in their turn the counter-salutation: We bless you in the name of Jahve. As a contrast it follows that there is before the righteous a garnering in of that which they have sown amidst the exchange of joyful benedictory greetings.

PSALM CXXX.

DE PROFUNDIS.

- 1 OUT of the depths do I call unto Thee, Jahve.
- 2 Lord, O hearken to my voice,
Let Thine ears be attentive
To the voice of my supplication !
- 3 If Thou keepest iniquities, Jāh—
Lord, who can stand ? !
- 4 Yet with Thee is the forgiveness,
That Thou mayest be feared.
- 5 I hope in Jahve, my soul hopeth,
And upon His word do I wait.
- 6 My soul waiteth for the Lord,
More than the night-watchers for the morning,
The night-watchers for the morning.
- 7 Wait, Israel, for Jahve,
For with Jahve is the mercy,
And abundantly is there with Him redemption.
- 8 And HE will redeem Israel
From all its iniquities.

* Here and there עֲלֵיכֶם is found as an error of the copyist. The Hebrew Psalter, Basel 1547, 12mo, notes it as a various reading.

Luther, being once asked which were the best Psalms, replied, Psalmi Paulini; and when his companions at table pressed him to say which these were, he answered: Ps. xxxii., li., cxxx., and cxliii. In fact in Ps. cxxx. the condemnability of the natural man, the freeness of mercy, and the spiritual nature of redemption are expressed in a manner thoroughly Pauline. It is the sixth among the seven Psalmi pœnitentiales (vi., xxxii., xxxviii., li., cii., cxxx., cxliii.).

Even the chronicler had this Psalm before him in the present classification, which puts it near to Ps. cxxxii.; for the independent addition with which he enriches Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the Temple, 2 Chron. vi. 40-42, is compiled out of passages of Ps. cxxx. (ver. 2, cf. the divine response, 2 Chron. vii. 15) and Ps. cxxxii. (vers. 8, 16, 10).

The mutual relation of Ps. cxxx. to Ps. lxxxvi. has been already noticed there. The two Psalms are first attempts at adding a third, Adonajic style to the Jehovic and Elohimic Psalm-style. There Adonaj is repeated seven times, and three times in this Psalm. There are also other indications that the writer of Ps. cxxx. was acquainted with that Ps. lxxxvi. (compare ver. 2a, שְׁמַעָה בְּקוֹלִי, with lxxxvi. 6, וְהִקְשִׁיבָה בְּקוֹלִי; ver. 2b, לְקוֹל תְּהַנְנִי, with lxxxvi. 6, בְּקוֹל תְּהַנְנִינֹתַי; ver. 4, עֲמֹד הַפְּלִיטָה, with lxxxvi. 5, וְסִלָּה; ver. 8, עִם ה' הִתְקַדֵּר, with lxxxvi. 5, 15, רַב־הִתְקַדֵּר). The fact that קָשׁוּב (after the form שְׁבִיבִיל) occurs besides only in those dependent passages of the chronicler, and קָשָׁב only in Neh. i. 6, 11, as פְּלִיטָה besides only in Dan. ix. 9, Neh. ix. 17, brings our Psalm down into a later period of the language; and moreover Ps. lxxxvi. is not Davidic.

Vers. 1-4. The depths (מַעְמָקִים) are not the depths of the soul, but the deep outward and inward distress in which the poet is sunk as in deep waters (lxix. 3, 15). Out of these depths he cries to the God of salvation, and importunately prays Him who rules all things and can do all things to grant him a compliant hearing (שְׁמַעָה, Gen. xxi. 12, xxvii. 13, xxx. 6, and other passages). God hears indeed even in Himself, as being the omniscient One, the softest and most secret as well as the loudest utterance; but, as Hilary observes, fides officium suum exsequitur, ut Dei auditionem roget, ut qui per naturam suam audit per orantis precem dignetur audire. In this sense the poet prays that His ears may be turned קָשְׁבוֹת (duller collateral form of קָשָׁה, to be in the condition of arrectæ aures), with strained attention, to his loud and urgent petition (xxviii. 2). His life hangs upon the thread of the divine compassion. If God preserves iniquities, who can stand before Him?! He preserves them (שָׁמַר) when He puts them down to one (xxxii. 2) and keeps them in remembrance (Gen. xxxvii. 11), or, as it is figuratively expressed in Job xiv. 17, sealed up as it were in custody in order to punish them when the measure is full. The inevitable consequence of this is the destruction of the sinner, for nothing can stand against the punitive justice of God (Nah. i. 6, Mal. iii. 2, Ezra ix. 15). If God should show Himself as Jāh,* no creature would be able to stand before Him, who is Adonaj, and can therefore carry out His judicial will or purpose (Isa. li. 16). He does not, however, act thus. He does not proceed according to the legal stringency of re-compensative justice. This thought, which fills up the pause after the question, but is not directly expressed, is confirmed by the following יָ, which therefore, as in Job xxii. 2, xxxi. 18, xxxix. 14, Isa. xxviii. 28 (cf. Eccles. v. 6), introduces the opposite. With the Lord is the willingness to forgive (הִסְלִיחַ), in order that He may be feared; i.e. He forgives, as it is expressed elsewhere (e.g. lxxix. 9), for His Name's sake: He seeks therein the glorifying of His Name. He will, as the sole Author of our salvation, who, putting all vain-glorying to shame, causes mercy instead of justice to take its course with us (cf. li. 6), be revered; and gives the sinner occasion, ground, and material for reverential thanksgiving and praise by bestowing "forgiveness" upon him in the plenitude of absolutely free grace.

Vers. 5-8. Therefore the sinner need not, therefore too the poet will not, despair. He hopes in Jahve (acc. obj. as in xxv. 5, 21, xl. 2), his soul hopes; hoping in and waiting upon God is the mood of his inmost and of his whole being. He waits upon God's word, the word of His salvation (cxix. 81), which, if it penetrates into the soul and cleaves there, calms * Eusebius on Ps. lxxviii. (lxxvii.) 5 observes that the Logos is called "Ια as μορφὴν δούλου λαβὼν καὶ τὰς ἀκτίνας τῆς ἑαυτοῦ θεότητος συστρίλαι καὶ ὡσπερ καταδύς ἐν τῷ σώματι. There is a similar passage in Vincentius Ciconia (1567), which we introduced into our larger Commentary on the Psalms (1859-60).

all unrest, and by the appropriated consolation of forgiveness transforms and enlightens for it everything in it and outside of it. His soul is לְאֵרֶנִּי, i.e. steadfastly and continually directed towards Him; as Chr. A. Crusius when on his death-bed, with hands and eyes uplifted to heaven, joyfully exclaimed: "My soul is full of the mercy of Jesus Christ. My whole soul is towards God." The meaning of לְאֵרֶנִּי becomes at once clear in itself from cxliii. 6, and is defined moreover, without supplying שִׁמְרָה (Hitzig), according to the following לְבַקֵּר. Towards the Lord he is expectantly turned, like those who in the night-time wait for the morning. The repetition of the expression "those who watch for the morning" (cf. Isa. xxi. 11) gives the impression of protracted, painful waiting. The wrath, in the sphere of which the poet now finds himself, is a nightly darkness, out of which he wishes to be removed into the sunny realm of love (Mal. iii. 20 [iv. 2]); not he alone, however, but at the same time all Israel, whose need is the same, and for whom therefore believing waiting is likewise the way to salvation. With Jahve, and with Him exclusively, with Him, however, also in all its fulness, is הַחֶסֶד (contrary to lxii. 13, without any pausal change in accordance with the varying of the segolates), the mercy, which removes the guilt of sin and its consequences, and puts freedom, peace, and joy into the heart. And plenteous (הַרְבִּי, an adverbial infin. absol., used here, as in Ezek. xxi. 20, as an adjective) is with Him redemption; i.e. He possesses in the richest measure the willingness, the power, and the wisdom, which are needed to procure redemption, which rises up as a wall of partition (Ex. viii. 19) between destruction and those imperilled. To Him, therefore, must the individual, if he will obtain mercy, to Him must His people, look up hopefully; and this hope directed to Him shall not be put to shame: He, in the fulness of the might of His free grace (Isa. xliii. 25), will redeem Israel from all its iniquities, by forgiving them and removing their unhappy inward and outward consequences. With this promise (cf. xxv. 22) the poet comforts himself. He means complete and final redemption, above all, in the genuinely New Testament manner, spiritual redemption.

PSALM CXXXI.

CHILD-LIKE RESIGNATION TO GOD.

- 1 JAHVE, my heart is not haughty, and mine eyes are not
 Neither have I to do with great things [lofty,
 And extraordinary which are beyond me.
- 2 Verily I have smoothed down and calmed my soul;
Like a child that is weaned beside its mother,
Like the child that is weaned is my soul beside me.
- 3 Wait, Israel, upon Jahve
 From henceforth and for ever.

This little song is inscribed לְיְהוָה because it is like an echo of the answer (2 Sam. vi. 21 sq.) with which David repelled the mocking observation of Michal when he danced before the Ark in a linen ephod, and therefore not in kingly attire, but in the common raiment of the priests: I esteem myself still less than I now show it, and I appear base in mine own eyes. In general David is the model of the state of mind which the poet expresses here. He did not push himself forward, but suffered himself to be drawn forth out of seclusion. He did not take possession of the throne violently, but after Samuel has anointed him he willingly and patiently traverses the long, thorny, circuitous way of deep abasement, until he receives from God's hand that which God's promise had assured to him. The persecution by Saul lasted about ten years, and his kingship in Hebron, at first only incipient, seven years and a half. He left it entirely to God to remove Saul and Ishbosheth. He let Shimei curse. He left Jerusalem before Absalom. Submission to God's guidance, resignation to His dispensations, contentment with that which was allotted to him, are the distinguishing traits of his noble character, which the poet of this Psalm indirectly holds up to himself and to his cotemporaries as a mirror, viz. to the Israel of the period after the Exile, which, in connection with small beginnings under difficult circumstances, had been taught humbly contented and calm waiting.

With לֹא־נָבְהָ לְבָבִי the poet repudiates pride as being the state of his soul; with לֹא־רָמַו עֵינַי (lo-ramū' as in Prov. xxx. 13, and before Ajin, e.g., also in Gen. xxvi. 10, Isa. xi. 2, in accordance with which the erroneous placing of the accent in Baer's text is to be corrected), pride of countenance and bearing; and with וְלֹא־הִלַּכְתִּי, pride of endeavour and mode of action. Pride has its seat in the heart, in the eyes especially it finds its expression, and great things are its sphere in which it diligently exercises itself. The opposite of "great things" (Jer. xxiii. 3, xlv. 5) is not that which is little, mean, but that which is small; and the opposite of "things too wonderful for me" (Gen. xviii. 14) is not that which is trivial, but that which is attainable.

אִם־לֹא does not open a conditional protasis, for where is the indication of the apodosis to be found? Nor does it signify "but," a meaning it also has not in Gen. xxiv. 38, Ezek. iii. 6. In these passages too, as in the passage before us, it is asseverating, being derived from the usual formula of an oath: verily I have, etc. שָׁוְהָ signifies (Isa. xxviii. 25) to level the surface of a field by ploughing it up, and has an ethical sense here, like יִשָּׁר with its opposites עָקַב and עָפַל. The Poel דִּוְמַם is to be understood according to דִּוְמִיָּה in lxii. 2, and דִּוְמַם in Lam. iii. 26. He has levelled or made smooth his soul, so that humility is its entire and uniform state; he has calmed it so that it is silent and at rest, and lets God speak and work in it and for it: it is like an even surface, and like the calm surface of a lake. Ewald and Hupfeld's rendering: "as a weaned child on its mother, so my soul, being weaned, lies on me," is refuted by the consideration that it ought at least to be בְּנִמּוּלָהּ, but more correctly בְּנִמּוּלָהּ; but it is also besides opposed by the article which is swallowed up in בְּנִמּוּלָהּ, according to which it is to be rendered: like one weaned beside its mother (here בְּנִמּוּלָהּ on account of the determinative collateral definition), like the weaned one (here בְּנִמּוּלָהּ because without any collateral definition: cf., with Hitzig, Deut. xxxii. 2, and the like; moreover, also, because referring back to the first נִמּוּלָהּ, cf. Hab. iii. 8), is my soul beside me (Hitzig, Hengstenberg, and most expositors). As a weaned child—viz. not one that is only just begun to be weaned, but an actually weaned child (נִמּוּלָהּ, cognate נִמַּר, to bring to an end, more particularly to bring suckling to an end, to wean)—lies upon its mother without crying impatiently and craving for its mother's breast, but contented with the fact that it has its mother—like such a weaned child is his soul upon him, i.e. in relation to his Ego (which is conceived of in עָפְרָא as having the soul upon itself, cf. xlii. 7, Jer. viii. 18; Psychology, S. 151 f., tr. p. 180): his soul, which is by nature restless and craving, is stilled; it does not long after earthly enjoyment and earthly good that God should give these to it, but it is satisfied in the fellowship of God, it finds full satisfaction in Him, it is satisfied (satiated) in Him.

By the closing strain, ver. 3, the individual language of the Psalm comes to have a reference to the congregation at large. Israel is to renounce all self-boasting and all self-activity, and to wait in lowliness and quietness upon its God from now and for evermore. For He resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble.

PSALM CXXXII.

PRAYER FOR THE HOUSE OF GOD AND THE HOUSE OF DAVID.

- 1 REMEMBER, Jahve, to DAVID
All the trouble endured by him,
- 2 Him who hath sworn unto Jahve,
Hath vowed unto the Mighty One of Jacob :
- 3 "I will not enter into the tent of my house,
I will not go up to the bed of my couch ;
- 4 I will not give sleep to mine eyes,
Slumber to mine eyelids,
- 5 Until I find a place for Jahve,
A dwelling-tent for the Mighty One of Jacob!"
- 6 Behold it was, we heard it, in Ephrâthah,
We found it in the fields of Ja'ar.
- 7 So let us go into His dwelling-tent,
Let us prostrate ourselves before His footstool.
- 8 Arise, Jahve, to Thy rest,
Thou and the Ark of Thy majesty !

- 9 *Let Thy priests clothe themselves with righteousness,
And Thy saints shout for joy.*
- 10 For the sake of DAVID Thy servant
Turn not back the face of Thine anointed!
- 11 Jahve hath sworn to DAVID
In truth that which He will not recall:
"Of the fruit of thy body
Do I appoint a possessor of thy throne.
- 12 If thy children keep My covenant
And My testimony, which I teach them:
Their children also shall for ever
Sit upon thy throne."
- 13 For Jahve hath chosen Zion,
He hath desired it as an abode for Himself.
- 14 "This is my rest for ever,
Here will I dwell, for I have desired it."
- 15 Her provision will I bless abundantly,
Her poor will I satisfy with bread,
- 16 *And her priests will I clothe with salvation,
And her saints shall shout aloud for joy.*
- 17 There will I make a horn to shoot forth for DAVID,
I will prepare a lamp for mine anointed.
- 18 His enemies will I clothe with shame,
And upon himself shall his crown blossom.

Ps. cxxxi. designedly precedes Ps. cxxxii. The former has grown out of the memory of an utterance of David when he brought home the Ark, and the latter begins with the remembrance of David's humbly zealous endeavour to obtain a settled and worthy abode for the God who sits enthroned above the Ark among His people. It is the only Psalm in which the sacred Ark is mentioned. The chronicler put vers. 8-10 into the mouth of Solomon at the dedication of the Temple (2 Chron. vi. 41 sq.). After a passage borrowed from Ps. cxxx. 2 which is attached by יהוה to Solomon's Temple-dedication prayer, he appends further borrowed passages out of Ps. cxxxii. with יהוה. The variations in these verses of the Psalms, which are annexed by him with a free hand and from memory (Jahve Elohim for

Jahve, לְנִדְחָךְ for לְמִנְחֻרְחָךְ, לְשׁוּעָה for צָדֵק, יִשְׁמְחוּ בְטוֹב for יִרְנְנוּ, just as much prove that he has altered the Psalm, and not reversely (as Hitzig persistently maintains), that the psalmist has borrowed from the Chronicles. It is even still distinctly to be seen how the memory of Isa. lv. 3 has influenced the close of ver. 42 in the chronicler, just as the memory of Isa. lv. 2 has perhaps also influenced the close of ver. 41.

The psalmist supplicates the divine favour for the anointed of Jahve for David's sake. In this connection this anointed one is neither the high priest, nor Israel, which is never so named (vid. Hab. iii. 13), nor David himself, who "in all the necessities of his race and people stands before God," as Hengstenberg asserts, in order to be able to assign this Song of degrees, as others, likewise to the post-exilic time of the new colony. Zerubbabel might more readily be understood (Baur), with whom, according to the closing prophecy of the Book of Haggai, a new period of the Davidic dominion is said to begin. But even Zerubbabel, the בְּתֹחַת יְהוּדָה, could not be called מְשִׁיחַ, for this he was not. The chronicler applies the Psalm in accordance with its contents. It is suited to the mouth of Solomon. The view that it was composed by Solomon himself when the Ark of the covenant was removed out of the tent-temple on Zion into the Temple-building (Amyraldus, De Wette, Tholuck, and others), is favoured by the relation of the circumstances, as they are narrated in 2 Chron. v. 5 sqq., to the desires of the Psalm, and a close kinship of the Psalm with Ps. lxxii. in breadth, repetitions of words, and a laboured forward movement which is here and there a somewhat uncertain advance. At all events it belongs to a time in which the Davidic throne was still standing and the sacred Ark was not as yet irrecoverably lost. That which, according to 2 Sam. ch. vi., vii., David did for the glory of Jahve, and on the other hand is promised to him by Jahve, is here made by a post-Davidic poet into the foundation of a hopeful intercessory prayer for the kingship and priesthood of Zion and the church presided over by both.

The Psalm consists of four ten-line strophes. Only in connection with the first could any objection be raised, and the strophe be looked upon as only consisting of nine lines. But the other strophes decide the question of its measure; and the breaking up of the weighty ver. 1 into two lines follows the accentuation, which divides it into two parts and places  $\text{הא}$  by itself as being  $\text{הא}$  (according to Accentssystem, xviii. 2, with Mugrash). Each strophe is adorned once with the name of David; and moreover the step-like progress which comes back to what has been said, and takes up the thread and carries it forward, cannot fail to be recognised.

Vers. 1-5. One is said to remember anything to another when he requites him something that he has done for him, or when he does for him what he has promised him. It is the post-Davidic church which here reminds Jahve of the hereinafter mentioned promises (of the "mercies of David," 2 Chron. vi. 42, cf. Isa. lv. 3) with which He has responded to David's  $\text{עֲנִיתָ}$ . By this verbal substantive of the Pual is meant all the care and trouble which David had in order to procure a worthy abode for the sanctuary of Jahve.  $\text{בְּעִנְיָתִי}$  signifies to trouble or harass one's self about anything, afflictari (as frequently in the Book of Ecclesiastes); the Pual here denotes the self-imposed trouble, or even that imposed by outward circumstances, such as the tedious wars, of long, unsuccessful, and yet never relaxed endeavours (1 Kings v. 17 [3]). For he had vowed unto God that he would give himself absolutely no rest until he had obtained a fixed abode for Jahve. What he said to Nathan (2 Sam. vii. 2) is an indication of this vowed resolve, which was now in a time of triumphant peace, as it seemed, ready for being carried out, after the first step towards it had already been taken in the removal of the Ark of the covenant to Zion (2 Sam. ch. vi.); for 2 Sam. ch. vii. is appended to 2 Sam. ch. vi. out of its chronological order and only on account of the internal connection. After the bringing home of the Ark, which had been long yearned for (cf. ci. 2), and did not take place without difficulties and terrors, was accomplished, a series of years again passed over, during which David always carried about with him the thought of erecting God a Temple-building. And when he had received the tidings through Nathan that he should not build God a house, but that it should be done by his son and successor, he nevertheless did as much towards the carrying out of the desire of his heart as was possible in connection with this declaration of the will of Jahve. He consecrated the site of the future Temple, he procured the necessary means and materials for the building of it, he made all the necessary arrangements for the future Temple-service, he inspired the people for the gigantic work of building that was before them, and handed over to his son the model for it, as it is all related to us in detail by the chronicler. The divine name "the mighty One of Jacob" is taken from Gen. xlix. 24, as in Isa. i. 24, xlix. 26, lx. 16. The Philistines with their Dagon had been made to feel this mighty Rock of Jacob when they took the sacred Ark along with them (1 Sam. ch. v.). With אֱלֹהֵי דָוִד David solemnly declares what he is resolved not to do. The meaning of the hyperbolically expressed vow in the form of an oath is that for so long he will not rejoice at his own dwelling-house, nor give himself up to sleep that is free from anxiety; in fine, for so long he will not rest. The genitives after אֱלֹהֵי and עָרִשׁ are appositional genitives; Ps. xlv. delights in similar combinations of synonyms. יַיִרְעִי (Latin strata mea) is a poetical plural, as also is מִשְׁבְּנוֹת. With תַּנְדִּיבָה (which is always said of the eyelids, Gen. xxxi. 40, Prov. vi. 4, Eccles. viii. 16, not of the eyes) alternates שָׁנָה (according to another reading שְׁנָה) for שָׁנָה. The ath is the same as in נִחַלְתָּ in xvi. 6, cf. lx. 13, Ex. xv. 2, and frequently. This Aramaizing rejection of the syllable before the tone is, however, without example elsewhere. The LXX. adds to ver. 4, καὶ ἀνάπανσιν τοῖς κροτάφοις μου (וּבְמִנְתָּה לְרִקְוֹתַי), but this is a disagreeable overloading of the verse.

Vers. 6-10. In ver. 6 begins the language of the church, which in this Psalm reminds Jahve of His promises and comforts itself with them. Olshausen regards this ver. 6 as altogether inexplicable. The interpretation nevertheless has some safe starting-points. (1) Since the subject spoken of is the founding of a fixed sanctuary, and one worthy of Jahve, the suffix of שְׁמֵעֲנֵהָ (with Chateph as in Hos. viii. 2, Ew. § 60, a) and מְצִאֲנֵהָ refers to the Ark of the covenant, which is fem. also in other instances (1 Sam. iv. 17, 2 Chron. viii. 11). (2) The Ark of the covenant, fetched up out of Shiloh by the Israelites to the battle at Ebenezer, fell into the hands of the victors, and remained, having been again given up by them, for twenty years in Kirjath-Jearim (1 Sam. vii. 1 sq.), until David removed it out of this Judæan district to Zion (2 Sam. vi. 2-4; cf.

2 Chron. i. 4). What is then more natural than that שִׁירֵי־עֵר is a poetical appellation of Kirjath-Jearim (cf. "the field of Zoan" in lxxviii. 12)? Kirjath-Jearim has, as a general thing, very varying names. It is also called Kirjath-ha-jearim in Jer. xxvi. 20 (Kirjath-arim in Ezra ii. 25, cf. Josh. xviii. 28), Kirjath-baal in Josh. xv. 60, Baalah in Josh. xv. 9, 1 Chron. xiii. 6 (cf. Har-ha-baalah, Josh. xv. 11, with Har-Jearim in Josh. xv. 10), and, as it seems, even Baalé Jehudah in 2 Sam. vi. 2. Why should it not also have been called Ja'ar side by side with Kirjath-Jearim, and more especially if the mountainous district, to which the mention of a hill and mountain of Jearim points, was, as the name "city of the wood" implies, at the same time a wooded district? We therefore fall in with Kühnöl's (1799) rendering: we found it in the meadows of Jaar, and with his remark: "Jaar is a shortened name of the city of Kirjath-Jearim."

The question now further arises as to what Ephrathah is intended to mean. This is an ancient name of Bethlehem; but the Ark of the covenant never was in Bethlehem. Accordingly Hengstenberg interprets, "We knew of it in Bethlehem (where David had spent his youth) only by hearsay, no one had seen it; we found it in Kirjath-Jearim, yonder in the wooded environs of the city, where it was as it were buried in darkness and solitude." So even Anton Hulsius (1650): Ipsæ David loquitur, qui dicit illam ipsam arcam, de qua quum adhuc Bethlehemi versaretur inaudivisset, postea a se (vel majoribus suis ipso adhuc minorenni) inventam fuisse in campis Jaar. But (1) the supposition that David's words are continued here does not harmonize with the way in which they are introduced in ver. 2, according to which they cannot possibly extend beyond the vow that follows. (2) If the church is speaking, one does not see why Bethlehem is mentioned in particular as the place of the hearsay. (3) We heard it in Ephrathah cannot well mean anything else than, per antiptosin (as in Gen. i. 4, but without ׀?), we heard that it was in Ephrathah. But the Ark was before Kirjath-Jearim in Shiloh. The former lay in the tribe of Judah close to the western borders of Benjamin, the latter in the midst of the tribe of Ephraim. Now since אֶפְרַתִּי quite as often means an Ephraimite as it does a Bethlehemite, it may be asked whether Ephrathah is not intended of the Ephraimitish territory (Kühnöl, Gesenius, Maurer, Tholuck, and others). The meaning would then be: we had heard that the sacred Ark was in Shiloh, but we found it not there, but in Kirjath-Jearim. And we can easily understand why the poet has mentioned the two places just in this way. Ephrath, according to its etymon, is fruitful fields, with which are contrasted the fields of the wood—the sacred Ark had fallen from its original, more worthy abode, as it were, into the wilderness. But is it probable, more especially in view of Mic. v. 1, that in a connection in which the memory of David is the ruling idea, Ephrathah signifies the land of Ephraim? No, Ephrathah is the name of the district in which Kirjath-Jearim lay. Caleb had, for instance, by Ephrath, his third wife, a son named Hûr (Chûr), 1 Chron. ii. 19. This Hûr, the first-born of Ephrathah, is the father of the population of Bethlehem (1 Chron. iv. 4), and Shobal, a son of this Hûr, is father of the population of Kirjath-Jearim (1 Chron. ii. 50). Kirjath-Jearim is therefore, so to speak, the daughter of Bethlehem. This was called Ephrathah in ancient times, and this name of Bethlehem became the name of its district (Mic. v. 1). Kirjath-Jearim belonged to Caleb-Ephrathah (1 Chron. ii. 24), as the northern part of this district seems to have been called in distinction from Negeb-Caleb (1 Sam. xxx. 14).

But מִשְׁכְּנֹתַי in ver. 7 is now neither a designation of the house of Abinadab in Kirjath-Jearim, for the expression would be too grand, and in relation to ver. 5 even confusing, nor a designation of the Salomonic Temple-building, for the expression standing thus by itself is not enough alone to designate it. What is meant will therefore be the tent-temple erected by David for the Ark when removed to Zion (2 Sam. vii. 2, יְרִיעָה). The church arouses itself to enter this, and to prostrate itself in adoration towards (vid. xcix. 5) the footstool of Jahve, i.e. the Ark; and to what purpose? The Ark of the covenant is now to have a place more worthy of it; the מִנְחָה, i.e. the מִנְחָה בַּיִת, 1 Chron. xxviii. 2, in which David's endeavours have through Solomon reached their goal, is erected: let Jahve and the Ark of His sovereign power, that may not be touched (see the examples of its inviolable character in 1 Sam. ch. v., vi., 2 Sam. vi. 6 sq.), now enter this fixed abode! Let His priests who are to serve Him there clothe themselves in "righteousness," i.e. in conduct that is according to His will and pleasure; let His saints, who shall there seek and find mercy, shout for joy! More especially, however, let Jahve for David's sake, His servant, to whose restless longing this place of rest owes its origin, not turn back the face of His anointed one, i.e. not reject his face which there turns towards Him in the attitude of prayer (cf. lxxxiv. 10). The chronicler has understood ver. 10 as an intercession on behalf of Solomon, and the situation into which we are introduced by vers. 6-8 seems to require this. It is, however, possible that a more recent poet here, in vers. 7, 8, reproduces words taken from the heart of the church in Solomon's time, and blends petitions of the church of the present with them. The subject all through is the church, which is ever identical although changing in the persons of its members. The Israel that brought the sacred Ark out of Kirjath-Jearim to Zion and accompanied it thence to the Temple-hill, and now worships in the sanctuary raised by David's zeal for the glory of Jahve, is one and the same. The prayer for the priests, for all the saints, and more especially for the reigning king, that then resounded at the dedication of the Temple, is continued so long as the history of Israel lasts, even in a time when Israel has no king, but has all the stronger longing for the fulfilment of the Messianic promise.

Vers. 11-13. The "for the sake of David" is here set forth in detail.  $\text{נֶאֱמַת}$  in ver. 11a is not the accusative of the object, but an adverbial accusative. The first member of the verse closes with  $\text{לְרֹר}$ , which has the distinctive Pazer, which is preceded by Legarmeh as a sub-distinctive; then follows at the head of the second member  $\text{נֶאֱמַת}$  with Zinnor, then  $\text{לֹא־יִשְׁבַּח מִמֶּנָּה}$  with Olewejored and its conjunctive Galgal, which regularly precedes after the sub-distinctive Zinnor. The suffix of  $\text{מִמֶּנָּה}$  refers to that which was affirmed by oath, as in Jer. iv. 28. Lineal descendants of David will Jahve place on the throne ( $\text{לְכִבֵּשׂ}$  like  $\text{לְרֹאשִׁי}$  in xxi. 4) to him, i.e. so that they shall follow him as possessors of the throne. David's children shall for ever (which has been finally fulfilled in Christ) sit  $\text{לְכִבֵּשׂ}$  to him (cf. ix. 5, Job xxxvi. 7). Thus has Jahve promised, and expects in return from the sons of David the observance of His Law. Instead of  $\text{וְיִעָרְתִּי}$  it is pointed  $\text{וְיִעָרְתִּי}$ . In Hahn's edition  $\text{וְיִעָרְתִּי}$  has Mercha in the penult. (cf. the retreat of the tone in אָרְבֵי זָה (Dan. x. 17), and in Baer's edition the still better attested reading Mahpach instead of the counter-tone Metheg, and Mercha on the ultima. It is not plural with a singular suffix (cf. Deut. xxviii. 59, Ges. § 91, 3), but, as זָה = זָהָה indicates, the singular for עָרִיבִי, like הַתְּהַלֵּתִי for הַתְּהַלֵּנִתִּי in 2 Kings vi. 8; and signifies the revelation of God as an attestation of His will. אֶלְמָרָם has Mercha mahpach., זָה Rebia parvum, and עָרִיבִי Mercha; and according to the interpunction it would have to be rendered: "and My self-attestation there" (vid. on ix. 16), but it is relative: My self-attestation (revelation), which I teach them. The divine words extend to the end of ver. 12. The hypotheses with אָם, as the fulfilment in history shows, were conditions of the continuity of the Davidic succession; not, however,—because human unfaithfulness does not annul the faithfulness of God,—of the endlessness of the Davidic throne. In ver. 13 the poet states the ground of such promissory mercy. It is based on the universal mercy of the election of Jerusalem. אָהָה has He mappic. like עָנִה in Deut. xxii. 29, or the stroke of Raphe (Ew. § 247, d), although the suffix is not absolutely necessary. In the following strophe the purport of the election of Jerusalem is also unfolded in Jahve's own words.

Vers. 14-18. Shiloh has been rejected (lxxviii. 60), for a time only was the sacred Ark in Bethel (Judg. xx. 27) and Mizpah (Judg. xxi. 5), only somewhat over twenty years was it sheltered by the house of Abinadab in Kirjath-Jearim (1 Sam. vii. 2), only three months by the house of Obed-Edom in Perez-Uzzah (2 Sam. vi. 11)—but Zion is Jahve's abiding dwelling-place, His own proper settlement, מְנוּחָה (as in Isa. xi. 10, lxvi. 1, and besides 1 Chron. xxviii. 2). In Zion, His chosen and beloved dwelling-place, Jahve blesses everything that belongs to her temporal need (וַיְרַחֵם לָהּ, vid. on xxviii. 5, note); so that her poor do not suffer want, for divine love loves the poor most especially. His second blessing refers to the priests, for by means of these He will keep up His intercourse with His people. He makes the priesthood of Zion a real institution of salvation: He clothes her priests with salvation, so that they do not merely bring it about instrumentally, but personally possess it, and their whole outward appearance is one which proclaims salvation. And to all her saints He gives cause and matter for high and lasting joy, by making Himself known also to the church, in which He has taken up His abode, in deeds of mercy (loving-kindness or grace). There (צפ, cxxxiii. 3) in Zion is indeed the kingship of promise, which cannot fail of fulfilment. He will cause a horn to shoot forth, He will prepare a lamp, for the house of David, which David here represents as being its ancestor and the anointed one of God reigning at that time; and all who hostilely rise up against David in his seed, He will cover with shame as with a garment (Job viii. 22), and the crown consecrated by promise, which the seed of David wears, shall blossom like an unfading wreath. The horn is an emblem of defensive might and victorious dominion, and the lamp (נר, 2 Sam. xxi. 17, cf נר, 2 Chron. xxi. 7, LXX. λύχνον) an emblem of brilliant dignity and joyfulness. In view of Ezek. xxix. 21, of the predictions concerning the Branch (zemach) in Isa. iv. 2, Jer. xxiii. 5, xxxiii. 15, Zech. iii. 8, vi. 12 (cf. Heb. vii. 14), and of the fifteenth Beracha of the Shemone-Esre (the daily Jewish prayer consisting of eighteen benedictions): "make the branch (zemach) of David Thy servant to shoot forth speedily, and let his horn rise high by virtue of Thy salvation,"—it is hardly to be doubted that the poet attached a Messianic meaning to this promise. With reference to our Psalm, Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, changes that supplicatory beracha of his nation (Luke i. 68–70) into a praiseful one, joyfully anticipating the fulfilment that is at hand in Jesus.

PSALM CXXXIII.

PRAISE OF BROTHERLY FELLOWSHIP.

- 1 BEHOLD how good it is, and how delightful,
That brethren also dwell together!
- 2 Like the fine oil upon the head,
Flowing gently down upon the beard, the beard of Aaron,
Which flows gently down upon the hem of his garments—
- 3 Like the dew of Hermon, which flows gently down upon the mountains of Zion,
For there hath Jahve commanded the blessing,
Life, for evermore.

In this Psalm, says Hengstenberg, "David brings to the consciousness of the church the glory of the fellowship of the saints, that had so long been wanting, the restoration of which had begun with the setting up of the Ark in Zion." The Psalm, in fact, does not speak of the termination of the dispersion, but of the uniting of the people of all parts of the land for the purpose of divine worship in the one place of the sanctuary; and, as in the case of Ps. cxxii., its counterpart, occasions can be found in the history of David adapted to the לָרוּר of the inscription. But the language witnesses against David; for the construction of שׁ with the participle, as שִׁירָר, qui descendit (cf. cxxxv. 2, שֹׁעֲמָרִים, qui stant), is unknown in the usage of the language prior to the Exile. Moreover the inscription לָרוּר is wanting in the LXX. Cod. Vat. and the Targum; and the Psalm may only have been so inscribed because it entirely breathes David's spirit, and is as though it had sprung out of his love for Jonathan.

With הַנְּחִימָנוּ the assertion passes on from the community of nature and sentiment which the word "brethren" expresses to the outward active manifestation and realization that correspond to it: good and delightful (cxxxv. 3) it is when brethren united by blood and heart also (corresponding to this their brotherly nature) dwell together—a blessed joy which Israel has enjoyed during the three great Feasts, although only for a brief period (vid. Ps. cxxii.). Because the high priest, in whom the priestly mediatorial office culminates, is the chief personage in the celebration of the feast, the nature and value of that local reunion is first of all expressed by a metaphor taken from him. שֶׁמֶן הַזַּיִת is the oil for anointing described in Ex. xxx. 22–33, which consisted of a mixture of oil and aromatic spices strictly forbidden to be used in common life. The sons of Aaron were only sprinkled with this anointing oil; but Aaron was expressly anointed with it, inasmuch as Moses poured it upon his head; hence he is called par excellence "the anointed priest" (הַכֹּהֵן הַמְּשֻׁחַ), whilst the other priests are only "anointed" (מְשֻׁחִים, Num. iii. 3) in so far as their garments, like Aaron's, were also sprinkled with the oil (together with the blood of the ram of consecration), Lev. viii. 12, 30. In the time of the second Temple, to which the holy oil of anointing was wanting, the installation into the office of high priest took place by his being invested in the pontifical robes. The poet, however, when he calls the high priest as such Aaron, has the high-priesthood in all the fulness of its divine consecration (Lev. xxi. 10) before his eyes. Two drops of the holy oil of anointing, says a Haggada, remained for ever hanging on the beard of Aaron like two pearls, as an emblem of atonement and of peace. In the act of the anointing itself the precious oil freely poured out ran gently down upon his beard, which in accordance with Lev. xxi. 5 was unshortened.

In that part of the Tōra which describes the robe of the high priest, שׂוּלָיו is its hems, פִּי רֹאשׁוֹ, or even absolutely פִּי, the opening for the head, or the collar, by means of which the sleeveless garment was put on, and שֵׁפָה the binding, the embroidery, the border of this collar (vid. Ex. xxviii. 32, xxxix. 23; cf. Job xxx. 18, פִּי כְתָנִי, the collar of my shirt). פִּי must apparently be understood according to these passages of the Tōra, as also the appellation מִדָּוָה (only here for מִדָּוָה), beginning with Lev. vi. 3, denotes the whole vestment of the high priest, yet without more exact distinction. But the Targum translates פִּי with אֹרָא (ora = fimbria)—a word which is related to אֹרְאָה, agnus, like ᾠα to ὄϊς. This ᾠα is used both of the upper and lower edge of a garment. Accordingly Apollinaris and the Latin versions understand the ἐπὶ τὴν ᾠαν of the LXX. of the hem (in oram vestimenti); Theodoret, on the other hand, understands it to mean the upper edging: ᾠαν ἐκάλεσεν ὁ καλοῦμεν περιτραχήλιον, τοῦτο δὲ καὶ ὁ Ἀκύλας στόμα ἐνδυμάτων εἶρηκε. So also De Sacy: sur le bord de son vêtement, c'est-à-dire, sur le haut de ses habits pontificaux. The decision of the question depends upon the aim of this and the following figure in ver. 3. If we compare the two figures, we find that the point of the comparison is the uniting power of brotherly feeling, as that which unites in heart and soul those who are most distant from one another locally, and also brings them together in outward circumstance. If this is the point of the comparison, then Aaron's beard and the hem of his garments stand just as diametrically opposed to one another as the dew of Hermon and the mountains of Zion. פִּי is not the collar above, which gives no advance, much less the antithesis of two extremes, but the hem at the bottom (cf. פִּי, Ex. xxvi.

4, of the edge of a curtain). It is also clear that שֵׁיֶרֶת cannot now refer to the beard of Aaron, either as flowing down over the upper border of his robe, or as flowing down upon its hem ; it must refer to the oil, for peaceable love that brings the most widely separated together is likened to the oil. This reference is also more appropriate to the style of the onward movement of the gradual Psalms, and is confirmed by ver. 3, where it refers to the dew, which takes the place of the oil in the other metaphor. When brethren united in harmonious love also meet together in one place, as is the case in Israel at the great Feasts, it is as when the holy, precious chrism, breathing forth the blended odour of many spices, upon the head of Aaron trickles down upon his beard, and from thence to the extreme end of his vestment. It becomes thoroughly perceptible, and also outwardly visible, that Israel, far and near, is pervaded by one spirit and bound together in unity of spirit.

This uniting spirit of brotherly love is now symbolized also by the dew of Hermon, which descends in drops upon the mountains of Zion. "What we read in the 133d Psalm of the dew of Hermon descending upon the mountains of Zion," says Van de Velde in his Travels (Bd. i. S. 97), "is now become quite clear to me. Here, as I sat at the foot of Hermon, I understood how the water-drops which rose from its forest-mantled heights, and out of the highest ravines, which are filled the whole year round with snow, after the sun's rays have attenuated them and moistened the atmosphere with them, descend at evening-time as a heavy dew upon the lower mountains which lie round about as its spurs. One ought to have seen Hermon with its white-golden crown glistening aloft in the blue sky, in order to be able rightly to understand the figure. Nowhere in the whole country is so heavy a dew perceptible as in the districts near to Hermon." To this dew the poet likens brotherly love. This is as the dew of Hermon : of such pristine freshness and thus refreshing, possessing such pristine power and thus quickening, thus born from above (cx. 3), and in fact like the dew of Hermon which comes down upon the mountains of Zion—a feature in the picture which is taken from the natural reality ; for an abundant dew, when warm days have preceded, might very well be diverted to Jerusalem by the operation of the cold current of air sweeping down from the north over Hermon. We know, indeed, from our own experience how far off a cold air coming from the Alps is perceptible and produces its effects. The figure of the poet is therefore as true to nature as it is beautiful. When brethren bound together in love also meet together in one place, and in fact when brethren out of the north unite with brethren in the south in Jerusalem, the city which is the mother of all, at the great Feasts, it is as when the dew of Mount Hermon, which is covered with deep, almost eternal snow,* descends upon the bare, unfruitful—and therefore longing for such quickening—mountains round about Zion. In Jerusalem must love and all that is good meet. For there (צֶמַח as in cxxxii. 17) hath Jahve commanded (צִוָּה) as in Lev. xxv. 21, cf. Ps. xlii. 9, lxviii. 29) the blessing, i.e. there allotted to the blessing its rendezvous and its place of issue. אֶת־הַבְּרָכָה is appositionally explained by הַיּוֹם: life is the substance and goal of the blessing, the possession of all possessions, the blessing of all blessings. The closing words עֲדֵה־עוֹלָם (cf. xxviii. 9) belong to צִוָּה: such is God's inviolable, ever-enduring order.

PSALM CXXXIV.

NIGHT-WATCH GREETING AND COUNTER-GREETING.

The Call.

- 1 BEHOLD, bless ye Jahve, all ye servants of Jahve,
Who serve in the house of Jahve by night!
- 2 Lift up your hands to the sanctuary
And bless ye Jahve!

* A Hauranitish poem in Wetzstein's Lieder-Sammlungen begins: — — البارحة هبت علينا شرارة | من على الثلج
“Yesterday there blew across to me a spark | from the lofty snow-mountain (the Hermon),” on which the commentator dictated to him the remark, that شرارة, the glowing spark, is either the snow-capped summit of the mountain glowing in the morning sun or a burning cold breath of air, for one says in everyday life الصَّحَّح يَحْرِقُ, the frost burns [vid. note to cxxi. 6].

The Answer.

3 Jahve bless thee out of Zion,
The Creator of heaven and earth!

This Psalm consists of a greeting, vers. 1, 2, and the reply thereto. The greeting is addressed to those priests and Levites who have the night-watch in the Temple; and this antiphon is purposely placed at the end of the collection of Songs of degrees in order to take the place of a final beracha. In this sense Luther styles this Psalm epiphonema superiorum. It is also in other respects (vid. Symbolæ, p. 66) an appropriate finale.

Vers. 1, 2. The Psalm begins, like its predecessor, with הַיְיָ; there it directs attention to an attractive phenomenon, here to a duty which springs from the office. For that it is not the persons frequenting the Temple who are addressed is at once clear from the fact that the tarrying of these in the Temple through the night, when such a thing did actually occur (Luke ii. 37), was only an exception. And then, however, from the fact that עָמַד is the customary word for the service of the priests and Levites, Deut. x. 8, xviii. 7, 1 Chron. xxiii. 30, 2 Chron. xxix. 11 (cf. on Isa. lxi. 10, and Ps. cx. 4), which is also continued in the night, 1 Chron. ix. 33. Even the Targum refers ver. 1b to the Temple-watch. In the second Temple the matter was arranged thus. After midnight the chief over the gate-keepers took the keys of the inner Temple and went with some of the priests through the little wicket of the Fire Gate (שַׁעַר בֵּית הַמִּזְבֵּחַ). In the inner court this patrol divided into two companies, each with a burning torch; one company turned west, the other east, and so they compassed the court to see whether everything was in readiness for the service of the dawning day. At the bakers' chamber, in which the Mincha of the high priest was baked (לְשֹׁכֵת עֹשֵׂי הַבֵּיתִין), they met with the cry: All is well. In the meanwhile the rest of the priests also arose, bathed, and put on their garments. Then they went into the stone chamber (one half of which was the place of session of the Sanhedrim), where, under the superintendence of the chief over the drawing of the lots and of a judge, around whom stood all the priests in their robes of office, the functions of the priests in the service of the coming day were assigned to them by lot (Luke i. 9). Accordingly Tholuck, with Köster, regards vers. 1 sq. and 3 as the antiphon of the Temple-watch going off duty and those coming on. It might also be the call and counter-call with which the watchmen greeted one another when they met. But according to the general keeping of the Psalm, vers. 1 sq. have rather to be regarded as a call to devotion and intercession, which the congregation addresses to the priests and Levites entrusted with the night-service in the Temple. It is an error to suppose that "in the nights" can be equivalent to "early and late." If the Psalter contains Morning Psalms (iii., lxiii.) and Evening Psalms (iv., cxli.), why should it then not contain a vigil Psalm? On this very ground Venema's idea too, that בְּלֵילוֹת is syncopated from בְּהַלְלוֹת, "with Hallels, i.e. praises," is useless. Nor is there any reason for drawing ἐν ταῖς νυκτί, as the LXX. does, to ver. 2,* or, what would be more natural, to the בְּרַבִּי that opens the Psalm, since it is surely not strange that, so long as the sanctuary was standing, a portion of the servants of God who ministered in it had to remain up at night to guard it, and to see to it that nothing was wanting in the preparations for the early service. That this ministering watching should be combined with devotional praying is the purport of the admonition in ver. 2. Raising suppliant hands (יְרִיבֵם, negligently written for יְרִיבֵם) towards the Most Holy Place (τὰ ἁγία), they are to bless Jahve. קָרַשׁ (according to B. Sota 39a, the accusative of definition: in holiness, i.e. after washing of hands), in view of xxviii. 2, v. 8, cxxxviii. 2 (cf. רוֹם in Hab. iii. 10), has to be regarded as the accusative of the direction.

Ver. 3. Calling thus up to the Temple-hill, the church receives from above the benedictory counter-greeting: Jahve bless thee out of Zion (as in cxxviii. 5), the Creator of heaven and earth (as in cxv. 15, cxxi. 2, cxxiv. 8). From the time of Num. vi. 24 jebaréchja is the ground-form of the priestly benediction. It is addressed to the church as one person, and to each individual in this united, unit-like church.

* The LXX. adjusts the shortening of ver. 1b arising from this, by reading העומדים בבית ה' בחצרות בית אלהינו after cxxxv. 2.

PSALM CXXXV.

FOUR-VOICED HALLELUJAH TO THE GOD OF ISRAEL, THE GOD OF GODS.

HALLELUJAH.

- 1 PRAISE ye the Name of Jahve,
Praise ye, O ye servants of Jahve,
- 2 Who stand in the house of Jahve,
In the courts of the house of our God!
- 3 Praise ye Jāh, for Jahve is good ;
Harp unto His Name, for it is lovely ;
- 4 For Jacob hath Jāh chosen for Himself,
Israel as His possession.

- 5 For I know that Jahve is great
And our Lord above all gods.
- 6 All that Jahve willeth He carrieth out
In heaven and upon earth,
In the seas and in all the depths ;
- 7 Who bringeth the vapours up from the end of the earth,
He maketh lightnings for the rain,
Who bringeth forth wind out of His treasures.

- 8 Who smote the first-born of Egypt
From man down to the cattle,
- 9 Sent signs and wonders
Into the midst of thee, O Egypt,
Against Pharaoh and all his servants !

- 10 Who smote great nations
And slew mighty kings,
- 11 Sihon, king of the Amorites,
And Og, king of Bashan,
And all the kingdoms of Canaan ;
- 12 And gave over their land as a heritage,
As a heritage to Israel His people.

- 13 Jahve, Thy Name endureth for ever,
Thy memorial, Jahve, unto all generations.

- 14 For Jahve will render justice to His people,
And repent Himself concerning His servants.
- 15 The idols of the heathen are silver and gold,
The work of men's hands.
- 16 A mouth have they and cannot speak,
Eyes have they and cannot see,
- 17 Ears have they and cannot hear,
Nor is there any breath at all in their mouth.
- 18 Like unto them must they who made them become,
Every one who trusted in them.
- 19 O house of Israel, bless ye Jahve!
O house of Aaron, bless ye Jahve!
- 20 O house of Levi, bless ye Jahve!
Ye who fear Jahve, bless Jahve!—
- 21 Blessed be Jahve out of Zion,
Who dwelleth in Jerusalem,
Hallelujah!

Ps. cxxxv. is here and there (vid. Tôsefôth Pesachim 117a) taken together with Ps. cxxxiv. as one Psalm. The combining of Ps. cxv. with cxiv. is a misapprehension caused by the inscriptionless character of Ps. cxv, whereas Ps. cxxxv. and cxxxiv. certainly stand in connection with one another. For the Hallelujah Ps. cxxxv. is, as the mutual relation between the beginning and close of Ps. cxxxiv. shows, a Psalm-song expanded out of this shorter hymn, that is in part drawn from Ps. cxv.

It is a Psalm in the mosaic style. Even the Latin poet Lucilius transfers the figure of mosaic-work to style, when he says: quam lepide læxéis compostæ ut tesserculæ omnes . . . In the case of Ps. cxxxv. it is not the first time that we have met with this kind of style. We have already had a glimpse of it in Ps. xcvi. and xcvi. These Psalms were composed more especially of deutero-Isaianic passages, whereas Ps. cxxxv. takes its tesserulæ out of the Law, Prophets, and Psalms.

Vers. 1-4. The beginning is taken from cxxxiv. 1; ver. 2b recalls cxvi. 19 (cf. xcii. 14); and ver. 4 is an echo of Deut. vii. 6. The servants of Jahve to whom the summons is addressed, are not, as in cxxxiv. 1 sq., His official servants in particular, but according to ver. 2*b*, where the courts, in the plural, are allotted to them as their standing-place, and according to vers. 19, 20, those who fear Him as a body. The three-fold Jahve at the beginning is then repeated in Jāh (הַלְלִי־יְהוָה, cf. note * to civ. 35), Jahve, and Jāh. The subject of בְּיָנְעִים is by no means Jahve (Hupfeld), whom they did not dare to call נְעִים in the Old Testament, but either the Name, according to liv. 8 (Luther, Hitzig), or, which is favoured by cxlvii. 1 (cf. Prov. xxii. 18), the praising of His Name (Apollinaris: ἐπειὶ τὸδε καλὸν ἀείδεν): His Name to praise is a delightful employ, which is incumbent on Israel as the people of His choice and of His possession.

Vers. 5-7. The praise itself now begins. בְּיָ in ver. 4*a* set forth the ground of the pleasant duty, and the כִּי that begins this strophe confirms that which warrants the summons out of the riches of the material existing for such a hymn of praise. Worthy is He to be praised, for Israel knows full well that He who hath chosen it is the God of gods. The beginning is taken from cxv. 3, and ver. 7 from Jer. x. 13 (li. 16). Heaven, earth, and water are the three kingdoms of created things, as in Ex. xx. 4. נִשְׂיֵא signifies that which is lifted up, ascended; here, as in Jeremiah, a cloud. The meaning of עָשָׂה לְמַטְרַי לְבָרָקִים is not: He makes lightnings into rain, i.e. resolves them as it were into rain, which is unnatural; but either according to Zech. x. 1: He produces lightnings in behalf of rain, in order that the rain may pour down in consequence of the thunder and lightning, or poetically: He makes lightnings for the rain, so that the rain is announced (Apollinaris) and accompanied by them. Instead of מוֹצֵא (cf. lxxviii. 16, cv. 43), which does not admit of the retreating of the tone, the expression is מוֹצֵא, the ground-form of the part. Hiph. for plurals like מְהַצֵּרִים, מְהַלְלִים, מְעוֹרְרִים, perhaps not without being influenced by the מוֹצֵא in Jeremiah, for it is not מוֹצֵא from מוֹצֵא that signifies "producing," but מוֹצֵא = מַפְיֵא. The metaphor of the treasures is like Job xxxviii. 22. What is intended is the fulness of divine power, in which lie the grounds of the origin and the impulses of all things in nature.

Vers. 8, 9. Worthy is He to be praised, for He is the Redeemer out of Egypt. בְּתוֹכְבִי as in cxvi. 19, cf. cv. 27.

Vers. 10-12. Worthy is He to be praised, for He is the Conqueror of the Land of Promise. In connection with ver. 10 one is reminded of Deut. iv. 38, vii. 1, ix. 1, xi. 23, Josh. xxiii. 9. גְּוֵוִים רַבִּים are here not many, but great peoples (cf. גְּוֵוִלִים in cxxxvi. 17), since the parallel word עֲצוּמִים is by no means intended of a powerful number, but of powerful might (cf. Isa. liii. 12). As to the rest also, the poet follows the Book of Deuteronomy: viz. מְמַלְכֹת as in Deut. iii. 21, and נָתַן נַחֲלָה as in Deut. iv. 38 and other passages. It is all Deuteronomic with the exception of the ו, and the ל in ver. 11 as the nota accus. (as in cxxxvi. 19 sq., cf. lxix. 6, cxvi. 16, cxxxix. 3); the construction of הָרִי is just as Aramaizing in Job v. 2, 2 Sam. iii. 30 (where vers. 30, 31, like vers. 36, 37, are a later explanatory addition). The הָרִי alternating with הַרְבֵּה is, next to the two kings, also referred to the kingdoms of Canaan, viz. their inhabitants. Og was also an Amoritish king, Deut. iii. 8.

Vers. 13, 14. This God who rules so praiseworthy in the universe and in the history of Israel is the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever. Just as ver. 13 (cf. cii. 13) is taken from Ex. iii. 15, so ver. 14 is taken from Deut. xxxii. 36, cf. xc. 13, and vid. on Heb. x. 30, 31 (vol. ii. 191).

Vers. 15-18. For the good of His proved church He ever proves Himself to be the Living God, whereas idols and idol-worshippers are vain—throughout following cxv. 4-8, but with some abridgments. Here only the הָא used as a particle recalls what is said there of the organ of smell (הָא) of the idols that smells not, just as the רִיחַ which is here (as in Jer. x. 14) denied to the idols recalls the הָרִיחַ denied to them there. It is to be rendered: also there is not a being of breath, i.e. there is no breath at all, not a trace thereof, in their mouth. It is different in 1 Sam. xxi. 9, where אֵין אֵין (not אֵין) is meant to be equivalent to the Aramaic אֵין אֵית, num (an) est; אֵין is North-Palestinian, and equivalent to the interrogatory אֵם (after which the Targum renders אֵית אֵית).

Vers. 19-21. A call to the praise of Jahve, who is exalted above the gods of the nations, addressed to Israel as a whole, rounds off the Psalm by recurring to its beginning. The three-fold call in cxv. 9-11, cxviii. 2-4, is rendered fourfold here by the introduction of the house of the Levites, and the wishing of a blessing in cxxxiv. 3 is turned into an ascription of praise. Zion, whence Jahve's self-attestation, so rich in power and loving-kindness, is spread abroad, is also to be the place whence His glorious attestation by the mouth of men is spread abroad. History has realized this.

PSALM CXXXVI.

O GIVE THANKS UNTO THE LORD, FOR HE IS GOOD.

- 1 GIVE thanks unto Jahve, for He is good,
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 2 Give thanks unto the God of gods,
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 3 Give thanks unto the Lord of lords—
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 4 To Him who alone doeth great wonders,
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 5 To Him who by wisdom made the heavens,
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 6 To Him who stretched out the earth above the waters—
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 7 To Him who made great lights,
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 8 The sun for dominion by day,
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 9 The moon and stars for dominions by night—
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 10 To Him who smote the Egyptians in their first-born,
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 11 And brought forth Israel out of their midst,
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 12 With a strong hand and a stretched-out arm—
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 13 To Him who divided the Red Sea into parts,
For His goodness endureth for ever.

- 14 And made Israel to pass through in the midst of it,
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 15 And overthrew Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea—
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 16 To Him who led His people in the desert,
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 17 To Him who smote great kings,
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 18 And slew glorious kings—
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 19 Sihon, king of the Amorites,
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 20 And Og, king of Bashan,
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 21 And gave their land as a heritage,
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 22 As a heritage to Israel His servant—
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 23 Who in our low estate remembered us,
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 24 And redeemed us from our adversaries,
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 25 Giving bread to all flesh—
For His goodness endureth for ever.
- 26 Give thanks unto the God of heaven,
For His goodness endureth for ever.

The cry cxxxv. 3, Praise ye Jāh, for good is Jahve, is here followed by a Hodu, the last of the collection, with “for His goodness endureth for ever” repeated twenty-six times as a versus intercalaris. In the liturgical language this Psalm is called par excellence the great Hallel, for according to its broadest compass the great Hallel comprehends Ps. cxx. to cxxxvi.*

---

* There are three opinions in the Talmud and Midrash concerning the compass of the “Great Hallel,” viz. (1) Ps. cxxxvi., (2) Ps. cxxxv. 4–cxxxvi., (3) Ps. cxx.–cxxxvi.

whilst the Hallel which is absolutely so called extends from Ps. cxiii. to cxviii. Down to ver. 18 the song and counter-song organize themselves into hexastichic groups or strophes, which, however, from ver. 19 (and therefore from the point where the dependence on Ps. cxxxv., already begun with ver. 17, becomes a borrowing, onwards) pass over into octastichs. In Heidenheim's Psalter the Psalm appears (after Norzi) in two columns (like Deut. ch. xxxii.), which it is true has neither tradition (vid. on Ps. xviii.) nor MSS. precedent in its favour, but really corresponds to its structure.

Vers. 1-9. Like the preceding Psalm, this Psalm allies itself to the Book of Deuteronomy. Vers. 2*a* and 3*a* (God of gods and Lord of lords) are taken from Deut. x. 17; ver. 12*a* (with a strong hand and stretched-out arm) from Deut. iv. 34, v. 15, and frequently (cf. Jer. xxxii. 21); ver. 16*a* like Deut. viii. 15 (cf. Jer. ii. 6). With reference to the Deuteronomic colouring of vers. 19-22, vid. on cxxxv. 10-12; also the expression "Israel His servant" recalls Deut. xxxii. 36 (cf. cxxxv. 14, xc. 13), and still more Isa. xl.-lxvi., where the comprehension of Israel under the unity of this notion has its own proper place. In other respects, too, the Psalm is an echo of earlier model passages. Who alone doeth great wonders sounds like lxxii. 18 (lxxxvi. 10); and the adjective "great" that is added to "wonders" shows that the poet found the formula already in existence. In connection with ver. 5*a* he has Prov. iii. 19 or Jer. x. 12 in his mind; תְּבוּנָה, like הַחֵמָה, is the demiurgic wisdom. Ver. 6*a* calls to mind Isa. xlii. 5, xliv. 24; the expression is "above the waters," as in xxiv. 2 "upon the seas," because the water is partly visible and partly invisible מִתַּחַת לְאֵרֶץ (Ex. xx. 4). The plural אוֹרִים, lucēs, instead of מְאֵרוֹת, lumina (cf. Ezek. xxxii. 8, מְאֵרֵי אוֹר), is without precedent. It is a controverted point whether אֹרֶת in Isa. xxvi. 19 signifies lights (cf. אֹרֶה, cxxxix. 12) or herbs (2 Kings iv. 39). The plural מְשֵׁלוֹת is also rare (occurring only besides in cxiv. 2): it here denotes the dominion of the moon on the one hand, and (going beyond Gen. i. 16) of the stars on the other. בְּיָלֵהּ, like בְּיוֹם, is the second member of the stat. construct.

Vers. 10-26. Up to this point it is God the absolute in general, the Creator of all things, to the celebration of whose praise they are summoned; and from this point onwards the God of the history of salvation. In ver. 13a גִּזְרָה (instead of בְּקָעָה, lxxviii. 13, Ex. xiv. 21, Neh. ix. 11) of the dividing of the Red Sea is peculiar; גִּזְרִים (Gen. xv. 17, side by side with בְּתַרְרִים) are the pieces or parts of a thing that is cut up into pieces. גִּזְרָה is a favourite word taken from Ex. xiv. 27. With reference to the name of the Egyptian ruler Pharaoh (Herodotus also, ii. 111, calls the Pharaoh of the Exodus the son of Sesostri-Rameses Miumun, not Μενόφθας, as he is properly called, but absolutely Φερώων), vid. on lxxiii. 22. After the God to whom the praise is to be ascribed has been introduced with ה' by always fresh attributes, the ה' before the names of Sihon and of Og is perplexing. The words are taken over, as are the six lines of vers. 17a-22a in the main, from cxxxv. 10-12, with only a slight alteration in the expression. In ver. 23 the continued influence of the construction ה' הוֹרֵי is at an end. The connection by means of ו (cf. cxxxv. 8, 10) therefore has reference to the preceding "for His goodness endureth for ever." The language here has the stamp of the latest period. It is true וְכִי with Lamed of the object is used even in the earliest Hebrew, but וְכִי is only authenticated by Eccles. x. 6, and בְּרִיקָה, to break loose = to rescue (the customary Aramaic word for redemption), by Lam. v. 8, just as in the closing verse, which recurs to the beginning, "God of heaven" is a name for God belonging to the latest literature, Neh. i. 4, ii. 4. In ver. 23 the praise changes suddenly to that which has been experienced very recently. The attribute in ver. 25a (cf. cxlvii. 9, cxlv. 15) leads one to look back to a time in which famine befell them together with slavery.

PSALM CXXXVII.

BY THE RIVERS OF BABYLON.

- 1 BY the rivers of Babylon, there we sat and wept,
When we remembered Zion.
- 2 Upon the willows in the midst thereof
We hung our citherns.

- 3 For there our oppressors asked of us
The words of songs,
And our tormentors joy :
Sing us a song of Zion !
- 4 How are we to sing Jahve's songs
Upon strange soil ? !
- 5 If I forget thee, O Jerusalem,
Let my right hand become lame !
- 6 Let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth,
If I do not remember thee,
If I do not set Jerusalem
Above all my joys !
- 7 Remember, Jahve, the children of Edom
In the day of Jerusalem,
Who said : Raze, raze it
Even to the foundation !
- 8 O daughter of Babylon, thou wasted one, blessed is he who giveth thee thy reward,
Which thou hast merited for us !
- 9 Blessed is he who taketh and dasheth thy little ones
Against the rock !

The Hallelujah Ps. cxxxv. and the Hodu Ps. cxxxvi. are followed by a Psalm which glances back into the time of the Exile, when such cheerful songs as they once sang to the accompaniment of the music of the Levites at the worship of God on Mount Zion were obliged to be silent. It is anonymous. The inscription Τῷ Δαυὶδ (διὰ) Ἱερεμίου found in codices of the LXX., which is meant to say that it is a Davidic song coming from the heart of Jeremiah,* is all the more erroneous as Jeremiah never was one of the Babylonian exiles.

The ψ, which is repeated three times in vers. 8 sq., corresponds to the time of the composition of the Psalm which is required by its contents. It is just the same with the paragogic i in the future in ver. 6. But in other respects the language is classic; and the rhythm, at the beginning softly elegiac, then more and more excited, and abounding in guttural and sibilant sounds, is so expressive that scarcely any Psalm is so easily impressed on the memory as this, which is so pictorial even in sound.

* Reversely Ellies du Pin (in the preface of his Bibliothèque des Auteurs Ecclésiastiques) says : Le Pseaume 136 porte le nom de David et de Jeremie, ce qu'il faut apparemment entendre ainsi : Pseaume de Jeremie fait à l'imitation de David.

The metre resembles the elegiac as it appears in the so-called cæsura schema of the Lamentations and in the cadence of Isa. xvi. 9, 10, which is like the Sapphic strophe. Every second line corresponds to the pentameter of the elegiac metre.

Vers. 1-6. Beginning with perfects, the Psalm has the appearance of being a Psalm not belonging to the Exile, but written in memory of the Exile. The bank of a river, like the seashore, is a favourite place of sojourn of those whom deep grief drives forth from the bustle of men into solitude. The boundary line of the river gives to solitude a safe back; the monotonous splashing of the waves keeps up the dull, melancholy alternation of thoughts and feelings; and at the same time the sight of the cool, fresh water exercises a soothing influence upon the consuming fever within the heart. The rivers of Babylon are here those of the Babylonian empire: not merely the Euphrates with its canals, and the Tigris, but also the Chaboras (Chebar) and Eulæos (Ulai), on whose lonesome banks Ezekiel (ch. i. 3) and Daniel (ch. viii. 2) beheld divine visions. The נַחַשׁ is important: there, in a strange land, as captives under the dominion of the power of the world. And נַחַשׁ is purposely chosen instead of י: with the sitting down in the solitude of the river's banks weeping immediately came on; when the natural scenery around contrasted so strongly with that of their native land, the remembrance of Zion only forced itself upon them all the more powerfully, and the pain at the isolation from their home would have all the freer course where no hostilely observant eyes were present to suppress it. The willow (תְּלַחְתָּיִם) and viburnum, those trees which are associated with flowing water in hot low-lying districts, are indigenous in the richly watered lowlands of Babylonia. עֲרַב (עֲרַבָה), if one and the same with عرب, is not the willow, least of all the weeping-willow, which is called şafsâf mustahî in Arabic, "the bending-down willow," but the viburnum with dentate leaves, described by Wetzstein on Isa. xlv. 4. The Talmud even distinguishes between tsaph-tsapha and 'araba, but without our being able to obtain any sure botanic picture from it. The עֲרָבָה, whose branches belong to the constituents of the lulab of the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. xxiii. 40), is understood of the crack-willow [Salix fragilis], and even in the passage before us is surely not distinguished with such botanical precision but that the gharab and willow together with the weeping-willow (Salix Babylonica) might be comprehended under the word עֲרָבָה. On these trees of the country abounding in streams the exiles hung their citherns. The time to take delight in music was past, for μουσικὰ ἐν πένθει ἄκαιρος διήγησις, Sir. xxii. 6. Joyous songs, as the word שִׁיר designates them, were ill suited to their situation.

In order to understand the פִּי in ver. 3, vers. 3 and 4 must be taken together. They hung up their citherns; for though their lords called upon them to sing in order that they might divert themselves with their national songs, they did not feel themselves in the mind for singing songs as they once resounded at the divine services of their native land. The LXX., Targum, and Syriac take תּוֹלְלֵינִי as a synonym of שׁוֹבְיֵינִי, synonymous with שׁוֹלְלֵינִי, and so, in fact, that it signifies not, like שׁוֹלְלֵי, the spoiled and captive one, but the spoiler and he who takes others prisoners. But there is no Aramaic שָׁלַל = תָּלַל. It might more readily be referred back to a Poel תּוֹלַל (= הִתַּל), to disappoint, deride (Hitzig); but the usage of the language does not favour this, and a stronger meaning for the word would be welcome. Either תּוֹלַל = תְּהוֹלַל, like מְהוֹלַל, cii. 9, signifies the raving one, i.e. a bloodthirsty man or a tyrant, or from יָלַל, ejulare, one who causes the cry of woe or a tormentor,—a signification which commends itself in view of the words תּוֹשֵׁב and תְּלַמִּיד, which are likewise formed with the preformative ת. According to the sense the word ranks itself with an Hiph. הוֹלִיל, like הוֹעֵלָה, with הוֹעִיל and הוֹכִיחַ, in a mainly abstract signification (Dietrich, Abhandlungen, S. 160 f.). The יְבִירֵי שִׁיר is used as in xxxv. 20, lxxv. 4, cv. 27, cxlv. 5, viz. partitively, dividing up the genitival notion of the species: words of songs as being parts or fragments of the national treasury of song, similar to מְשִׁיר a little further on, on which Rosenmüller correctly says: sacrum aliquod carmen ex veteribus illis suis Sionicis. With the expression "song of Zion" alternates in ver. 4 "song of Jahve," which, as in 2 Chron. xxix. 27, cf. 1 Chron. xxv. 7, denotes sacred or liturgical songs, that is to say, songs belonging to Psalm poesy (including the Cantica).

Before ver. 4 we have to imagine that they answered the request of the Babylonians at that time in the language that follows, or thought thus within themselves when they withdrew themselves from them. The meaning of the interrogatory exclamation is not that the singing of sacred songs in a foreign land (חוצה לארץ) is contrary to the law, for the Psalms continued to be sung even during the Exile, and were also enriched by new ones. But the shir had an end during the Exile, in so far as that it was obliged to retire from publicity into the quiet of the family worship and of the houses of prayer, in order that that which is holy might not be profaned; and since it was not, as at home, accompanied by the trumpets of the priests and the music of the Levites, it became more recitative than singing properly so called, and therefore could not afford any idea of the singing of their native land in connection with the worship of God on Zion. From the striking contrast between the present and the former times the people of the Exile had in fact to come to the knowledge of their sins, in order that they might get back by the way of penitence and earnest longing to that which they had lost. Penitence and home-sickness were at that time inseparable; for all those in whom the remembrance of Zion was lost gave themselves over to heathenism and were excluded from the redemption. The poet, translated into the situation of the exiles, and arming himself against the temptation to apostasy and the danger of denying God, therefore says: If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, הֲשִׁיבָה יְיָ. הֲשִׁיבָה has been taken as an address to Jahve: obliviscaris dextera mea (e.g. Wolfgang Dachstein in his song "An Wasserflüssen Babylon"), but it is far from natural that Jerusalem and Jahve should be addressed in one clause. Others take יְיָ as the subject and הֲשִׁיבָה transitively: obliviscatur dextera mea, scil. artem psallendi (Aben-Ezra, Kimchi, Pagninus, Grotius, Hengstenberg, and others); but this ellipsis is arbitrary, and the interpolation of מִנִּי after יְיָ (von Ortenberg, following Olshausen) produces an inelegant cadence. Others again assign a passive sense to תשכח: oblivioni detur (LXX., Italic, Vulgate, and Luther), or a half-passive sense, in oblivione sit (Jerome); but the thought: let my right hand be forgotten, is awkward and tame. Obliviscatur me (Syriac, Saadia, and the Psalterium Romanum) comes nearer to the true meaning. תשכח is to be taken reflexively: obliviscatur sui ipsius, let it forget itself, or its service (Amyraldus, Schultens, Ewald, and Hitzig), which is equivalent to let it refuse or fail, become lame, become benumbed, much the same as we say of the arms or legs that they "go to sleep," and just as the Arabic نَسِيَ signifies both to forget and to become lame (cf. Gesenius, Thesaurus, p. 921b). La Harpe correctly renders: O Jerusalem! si je t'oublie jamais, que ma main oublie aussi le mouvement! Thus there is a correspondence between vers. 5 and 6: My tongue shall cleave to my palate if I do not remember thee, if I do not raise Jerusalem above the sum of my joy. אֲזַכֵּרְךָ has the affixed Chirek, with which these later Psalms are so fond of adorning themselves. רֵאשׁ is apparently used as in cxix. 160: supra summam (the totality) lætitiæ meæ, as Coccejus explains, h.e. supra omnem lætitiâ meam. But why not then more simply על כל, above the totality? רֵאשׁ here signifies not κεφάλαιον, but κεφαλή: if I do not place Jerusalem upon the summit of my joy, i.e. my highest joy; therefore, if I do not cause Jerusalem to be my very highest joy. His spiritual joy over the city of God is to soar above all earthly joys.

Vers. 7-9. The second part of the Psalm supplicates vengeance upon Edom and Babylon. We see from Obadiah's prophecy, which is taken up again by Jeremiah, how shamefully the Edomites, that brother-people related by descent to Israel and yet pre-eminently hostile to it, behaved in connection with the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldæans as their malignant, rapacious, and inhuman helpers. The repeated imper. Piel עָרַר, from עָרַר (not imper. Kal from עָרַר, which would be עָרַר), ought to have been accented on the ult.; it is, however, in both cases accented on the first syllable, the pausal עָרַר (cf. עָרַר in xxxvii. 20, and also עָרַר, Neh. viii. 11) giving rise to the same accentuation of the other (in order that two tone-syllables might not come together). The Pasek also stands between the two repeated words in order that they may be duly separated, and secures, moreover, to the guttural initial of the second  $\Psi$  its distinct pronunciation (cf. Gen. xxvi. 28, Num. xxxv. 16). It is to be construed: lay bare, lay bare (as in Hab. iii. 13, cf.  $\text{גָּבַהַּ}$  in Mic. i. 6) in it (Beth of the place), or in respect of it (Beth of the object), even to the foundation, i.e. raze it even to the ground, leave not one stone upon another. From the false brethren the imprecation turns to Babylon, the city of the imperial power of the world. The daughter, i.e. the population, of Babylon is addressed as  $\text{הַשְׂדֵדוּרָה}$ . It certainly seems the most natural to take this epithet as a designation of its doings which cry for vengeance. But it cannot in any case be translated: thou plunderer (Syriac like the Targum: bozuzto; Symmachus  $\eta$  ληστροίς), for  $\Psi$  does not mean to rob and plunder, but to offer violence and to devastate. Therefore: thou devastator; but the word so pointed as we have it before us cannot have this signification: it ought to be  $\text{הַשְׂדֵדוּרָה}$ , like  $\text{בְּנִדְרָה}$  in Jer. iii. 7, 10, or  $\text{הַשְׂדֵדוּרָה}$  (with an unchangeable  $\bar{a}$ ), corresponding to the Syriac active intensive form ālūso, oppressor, gōdūfo, slanderer, and the Arabic likewise active intensive form  $\text{فَاعُول}$ , e.g. fāshūs, a boaster, and also as an adjective: gōz fāshūs, empty nuts, cf.  $\text{יָקִישׁ} = \text{יָקִישׁ}$ , a fowler, like nātūr ( $\text{נֹאטוּר}$ ), a field-watcher. The form as it stands is partic. pass., and signifies προνενομευμένη (Aquila), vastata (Jerome). It is possible that this may be said in the sense of vastanda, although in this sense of a part. fut. pass. the participles of the Niphal (e.g. xxii. 32, cii. 19) and of the Pual (xviii. 4) are more commonly used. It cannot at any rate signify vastata in an historical sense, with reference to the destruction of Babylon by Darius Hystaspes (Hengstenberg); for ver. 7 only prays that the retribution may come: it cannot therefore as yet have been executed; but if  $\text{הַשְׂדֵדוּרָה}$  signified the already devastated one, it must (at least in the main) have been executed already. It might be more readily understood as a prophetic representation of the executed judgment of devastation; but this prophetic rendering coincides with the imprecative: the imagination of the Semite when he utters a curse sees the future as a realized fact. "Didst thou see the smitten one (madrūb)," i.e. he whom God must smite? Thus the Arab inquires for a person who is detested. "Pursue him who is seized (ilhak el-ma'chúdh),” i.e. him whom God must allow thee to seize! They speak thus inasmuch as the imagination at once anticipates the seizure at the same time with the pursuit. Just as here both madrúbb and ma'chúdh are participles of Kal, so therefore הַשְׂרִירָה may also have the sense of vastanda (which must be laid waste!). That which is then further desired for Babylon is the requital of that which it has done to Israel, Isa. xlvii. 6. It is the same penal destiny, comprehending the children also, which is predicted against it in Isa. xiii. 16–18, as that which was to be executed by the Medes. The young children (with reference to עֹלֵל, עֹלֵל, vid. on viii. 3) are to be dashed to pieces in order that a new generation may not raise up again the world-wide dominion that has been overthrown, Isa. xiv. 21 sq. It is zeal for God that puts such harsh words into the mouth of the poet. “That which is Israel’s excellency and special good fortune the believing Israelite desires to have bestowed upon the whole world, but for this very reason he desires to see the hostility of the present world of nations against the church of God broken” (Hofmann). On the other hand, it cannot be denied that the “blessed” of this Psalm is not suited to the mouth of the New Testament church. In the Old Testament the church as yet had the form of a nation, and the longing for the revelation of divine righteousness clothed itself accordingly in a warlike garb.

PSALM CXXXVIII.

THE MEDIATOR AND PERFECTER.

- 1 I WILL give thanks unto Thee with my whole heart,
Before the gods will I harp unto Thee.
- 2 I will worship towards Thy holy Temple,
And give thanks unto Thy Name because of Thy mercy and Thy truth,
That Thou hast magnified Thy promise above all Thy Name.
- 3 In the day that I called Thou didst answer me, Thou didst inspire me with courage—a lofty feeling pervaded my soul.

- 4 All the kings of the earth shall give thanks unto Thee, Jahve,
When they have heard the utterances of Thy mouth ·
- 5 And they shall sing of the ways of Jahve,
That great is the glory of Jahve :
- 6 For exalted is Jahve and He seeth the lowly,
And the proud He knoweth well afar off.
- 7 If I walk in the midst of trouble, Thou dost revive me,
Over the wrath of mine enemies dost Thou stretch forth
Thy hand,
And Thy right hand saveth me.
- 8 Jahve will perfect for me ;
Jahve, Thy mercy endureth for ever,
The work of Thy hands—Thou wilt not forsake it.

There will come a time when the praise of Jahve, which according to cxxxvii. 3 was obliged to be dumb in the presence of the heathen, will, according to cxxxviii. 5, be sung by the kings of the heathen themselves. In the LXX. Ps. cxxxvii. side by side with τῶ Δαυὶδ also has the inscription 'Ιερεμίου, and Ps. cxxxviii. has 'Αγγαίου καὶ Ζαχαρίου. Perhaps these statements are meant to refer back the existing recension of the text of the respective Psalms to the prophets named (vid. Köhler, Haggai, S. 33). From the fact that these names of psalmists added by the LXX. do not come down beyond Malachi, it follows that the Psalm-collection in the mind of the LXX. was made not later than in the time of Nehemiah.

The speaker in Ps. cxxxviii., to follow the lofty expectation expressed in ver. 4, is himself a king, and according to the inscription, David. There is, however, nothing to favour his being the author; the Psalm is, in respect of the Davidic Psalms, composed as it were out of the soul of David—an echo of 2 Sam. ch. vii. (1 Chron. ch. xvii.). The superabundant promise which made the throne of David and of his seed an eternal throne is here gratefully glorified. The Psalm can at any rate be understood, if with Hengstenberg we suppose that it expresses the lofty self-consciousness to which David was raised after victorious battles, when he humbly ascribed the glory to God and resolved to build Him a Temple in place of the tent upon Zion.

Vers. 1, 2 The poet will give thanks to Him, whom he means without mentioning Him by name, for His mercy, i.e. His anticipating, condescending love, and for His truth, i.e. truthfulness and faithfulness, and more definitely for having magnified His promise (אִמְרָה) above all His Name, i.e. that He has given a promise which infinitely surpasses everything by which He has hitherto established a name and memorial for Himself (עַל-לִשְׁמֹךְ), with  $\bar{o}$  instead of  $\bar{o}$ , an anomaly that is noted by the Masora, vid. Baer's Psalterium, p. 133). If the promise by the mouth of Nathan (2 Sam. ch. vii.) is meant, then we may compare 2 Sam. vii. 21. אֱלֹהֵי אֱמֶת, אֱלֹהֵי אֱמֶת are repeated in that promise and its echo coming from the heart of David so frequently, that this אֱלֹהֵי אֱמֶת seems like a hint pointing to that history, which is one of the most important crises in the history of salvation. The expression נִגַּד אֱלֹהִים also becomes intelligible from this history. Ewald renders it: "in the presence of God!" which is surely meant to say: in the holy place (De Wette, Olshausen). But "before God will I sing praise to Thee (O God!)"—what a jumble! The LXX. renders ἐναντίον ἀγγέλων, which is in itself admissible and full of meaning,\* but without coherence in the context of the Psalm, and also is to be rejected because it is on the whole very questionable whether the Old Testament language uses אֱלֹהִים thus, without anything further to define it, in the sense of "angels." It might be more readily rendered "in the presence of the gods," viz. of the gods of the peoples (Hengstenberg, Hupfeld, and Hitzig); but in order to be understood of gods which are only seemingly such, it would require some addition. Whereas אֱלֹהִים can without any addition denote the magisterial possessors of the dignity that is the type of the divine, as follows from lxxxii. 1 (cf. xlv. 7) in spite of Knobel, Graf, and Hupfeld; and thus, too (cf. אֱלֹהֵי אֱמֶת in cxix. 46), we understand it here, with Rashi, Aben-Ezra, Kimchi, Flaminus, Bucer, Clericus, and others. What is meant are "the great who are in the earth," 2 Sam. vii. 9, with whom David, inasmuch as he became king from being a shepherd, is ranked, and above whom he has been lifted up by the promise of an eternal kingship. Before these earthly "gods" will David praise the God of the promise; they shall hear for their salutary confusion, for their willing rendering of homage, that God hath made him "the highest with respect to the kings of the earth" (lxxxix. 28).

Vers. 3-6. There are two things for which the poet gives thanks to God: He has answered him in the days of trouble connected with his persecution by Saul and in all distresses; and by raising him to the throne, and granting him victory upon victory, and promising him the everlasting possession of the throne, He has filled him with a proud courage, so that lofty feeling has taken up its abode in his soul, which was formerly fearful about help. Just as רהב signifies impetuosity, vehemence, and then also a monster, so הִרְהִיב signifies both to break in upon one violently and overpoweringly (Cant. vi. 5; cf. Syriac arheb, Arabic arhaba, to terrify), and to make any one courageous, bold, and confident of victory. עָוֹנִי forms a corollary to the verb that is marked by Mugrash or Dechû: so that in my soul there was עָוֹנִי, i.e. power, viz. a consciousness of power (cf. Judg. v. 21). The thanksgiving, which he, the king of the promise, offers to God on account of this, will be transmitted to all the kings of the earth when they shall hear (שָׁמְעוּ in the sense of a fut. exactum) the words of His mouth, i.e. the divine אִמְרָה, and they shall sing of (שִׁירִי with בְּ, like בְּ רִפְּרִי in lxxxvii. 3, בְּ שִׁירִי in cv. 2 and frequently, בְּ הַלֵּל in xliv. 9, בְּ הַזְבִּיר in xx. 8, and the like) the ways of the God of the history of salvation, they shall sing that great is the glory of Jahve. Ver. 6 tells us by what means He has so super-gloriously manifested Himself in His leadings of David. He has shown Himself to be the Exalted One who in His all-embracing rule does not leave the lowly (cf. David's confessions in cxxxi. 1, 2 Sam. vi. 22) unnoticed (cxiii. 6), but on the contrary makes him the especial object of His regard; and on the other hand even from afar (cf. cxxxix. 2) He sees through (יָרַע as in xciv. 11, Jer. xxix. 23) the lofty one who thinks himself unobserved and conducts himself as if he were answerable to no higher being (x. 4). In correct texts ונבה has Mugrash, and מִמְרָחָה Mercha. The form of the fut. Kal יִירַע is formed after the analogy of the Hiphil forms יִלְיִל in Isa. xvi. 7, and frequently, and יִיטִיב in Job xxiv. 21; probably the word is intended to be all the more emphatic, inasmuch as the first radical, which disappears in יִרַע, is thus in a certain measure restored.*

Vers. 7, 8. Out of these experiences—so important for all mankind—of David, who has been exalted by passing through humiliation, there arise for him confident hopes concerning the future. The beginning of this strophe calls xxiii. 4 to mind. Though his way may lead through the midst of heart-oppressing trouble, Jahve will loose these bands of death and quicken him afresh (הִיָּה as in xxx. 4, lxxi. 20, and frequently). Though his enemies may rage, Jahve will stretch forth His hand threateningly and tranquillizingly over their wrath, and His right hand will save him. יִמְיִנֶה is the subject according to cxxxix. 10 and other passages, and not (for why should it be supposed to be this?) accus. instrumenti (vid. lx. 7). In ver. 8 יִגְבֹּר is intended just as in lvii. 3: the work begun He will carry out, ἐπιτελεῖν (Phil. i. 6); and בְּעָרִי (according to its meaning, properly: covering me) is the same as עָלִי in that passage (cf. xiii. 6, cxlii. 8). The pledge of this completion is Jahve's everlasting mercy, which will not rest until the promise is become perfect truth and reality. Thus, therefore, He will not leave, forsake the works of His hands (vid. xc. 16 sq.), i.e., as Hengstenberg correctly explains, everything that He has hitherto accomplished for David, from his deliverance out of the hands of Saul down to the bestowment of the promise—He will not let one of His works stand still, and least of all one that has been so gloriously begun. הִרְפָּה (whence הִתְרַפָּה) signifies to slacken, to leave slack, i.e. leave uncarried out, to leave to itself, as in Neh. vi. 3.  $\text{לֹא}$  expresses a negation with a measure of inward excitement.

* The Greek imperfects with the double (syllabic and temporal) augment, as ἄραρον, ἀνέωγον, are similar. Chajug' also regards the first Jod in these forms as the preformative and the second as the radical, whereas Abulwalid, Gramm. ch. xxvi. p. 170, explains the first as a prosthesis and the second as the preformative. According to the view of others, e.g. of Kimchi, יִרַע might be fut. Hiph. weakened from יִרְעַע (יִרְעִיעַ), which, apart from the unsuitable meaning, assumes a change of consonants that is all the more inadmissible as ירַע itself springs from ורַע. Nor is it to be supposed that יִרַע is modified from יִרַע (Luzzatto, § 197), because it is nowhere written יִרַע.

PSALM CXXXIX.

ADORATION OF THE OMNISCIENT AND OMNIPRESENT
ONE.

- 1 JAHVE, Thou searchest and knowest me!
- 2 THOU knowest my sitting down and my rising up,
Thou understandest my thought afar off.
- 3 My path and my lying down Thou searchest,
And with all my ways art Thou familiar.
- 4 For there is not a word on my tongue—
Lo, Thou, O Jahve, knowest it altogether.
- 5 Behind and before dost Thou surround me,
And hast laid Thy hand upon me.
- 6 Incomprehensible to me is such knowledge,
It is too high, I have not grown up to it.
- 7 Whither could I go from Thy Spirit,
And whither could I flee from Thy presence?!
- 8 If I should ascend to heaven, there art THOU;
And if I should make Hades my resting-place, here art Thou also.
- 9 If I should raise the wings of the morning,
If I should settle down at the extremity of the sea—
- 10 There also Thy hand would guide me,
And Thy right hand lay hold of me.
- 11 And if I should say: Let nothing but darkness enwrap me,
And let the light round about me become night—
- 12 Even the darkness would not be too dark for Thee,
And the night would be to Thee bright as the day;
Darkness and light are alike to Thee.
- 13 For THOU hast brought forth my reins,
Thou didst interweave me in my mother's womb.
- 14 I give Thee thanks that I am fearfully, wonderfully made;
Wonderful are Thy works,
And my soul knoweth it right well.

- 15 My bones were not hidden from Thee,
I who was wrought in secret,
Curiously wrought in the depths of the earth.
- 16 When an embryo Thine eyes saw me,
And in Thy book were they all written:
Days which were already sketched out,
And for it one among them.
- 17 And how precions are Thy thoughts unto me, O God,
How mighty is their sum!
- 18 If I would count them, they are more than the sand;
I awake and I am still with Thee.
- 19 Oh that Thou wouldest slay the wicked, Eloah;
And ye men of blood-guiltiness, depart from me!
- 20 They who mention Thee craftily,
Speak out deceitfully—Thine adversaries.
- 21 Should I not hate those who hate Thee, Jahve,
And be indignant at those who rise up against Thee?!
- 22 With the utmost hatred do I hate them,
They are to me as mine own enemies.
- 23 Search me, O God, and know my heart,
Prove me and know my thoughts,
- 24 And see whether there is in me any way of pain,
And lead me in the everlasting way!

In this Aramaizing Psalm what the preceding Psalm says in ver. 6 comes to be carried into effect, viz.: for Jahve is exalted and He seeth the lowly, and the proud He knoweth from afar. This Psalm has manifold points of contact with its predecessor. From a theological point of view it is one of the most instructive of the Psalms, and both as regards its contents and poetic character in every way worthy of David. But it is only inscribed לָדָוִד because it is composed after the Davidic model, and is a counterpart to such Psalms as Ps. xix. and to other Davidic didactic Psalms. For the addition לַמְנַצֵּחַ neither proves its ancient Davidic origin, nor in a general way its origin in the period prior to the Exile, as Ps. lxxiv. for example shows, which was at any rate not composed prior to the time of the Chaldæan catastrophe.

The Psalm falls into three parts: vers. 1b-12, 13-18,

19-24; the strophic arrangement is not clear. The first part celebrates the Omniscient and Omnipresent One. The poet knows that he is surrounded on all sides by God's knowledge and His presence; His Spirit is everywhere and cannot be avoided; and His countenance is turned in every direction and inevitably, in wrath or in love. In the second part the poet continues this celebration with reference to the origin of man; and in the third part he turns in profound vexation of spirit towards the enemies of such a God, and supplicates for himself His proving and guidance. In vers. 1 and 4 God is called Jahve, in ver. 17 El, in ver. 19 Eloah, in ver. 21 again Jahve, and in ver. 23 again El. Strongly as this Psalm is marked by the depth and pristine freshness of its ideas and feeling, the form of its language is still such as is without precedent in the Davidic age. To all appearance it is the Aramæo-Hebrew idiom of the post-exilic period pressed into the service of poetry. The Psalm apparently belongs to those Psalms which, in connection with a thoroughly classical character of form, bear marks of the influence which the Aramaic language of the Babylonian kingdom exerted over the exiles. This influence affected the popular dialect in the first instance, but the written language also did not escape it, as the Books of Daniel and Ezra show; and even the poetry of the Psalms is not without traces of this retrograde movement of the language of Israel towards the language of the patriarchal ancestral house. In the Cod. Alex. Zachariou is added to the τῷ Δαυιδ ψαλμός, and by a second hand ἐν τῇ διασπορᾷ, which Origen also met with "in some copies."

Vers. 1-7. The Aramaic forms in this strophe are the ἀπαξ λεγομ. רַע (ground-form רַעַי) in vers. 2 and 17, endeavour, desire, thinking, like רַעִית and רַעִיוֹן in the post-exilic books, from רַעַה (רַעַא), cupere, cogitare; and the ἀπ. λεγ. רַבַע in ver. 3, equivalent to רַבַּן, a lying down, if רַבַּעִי be not rather an infinitive like בַּלַּעִי in Job vii. 19, since אַרְהִי is undoubtedly not inflected from אַרַח, but, as being infinitive, like עֲבַרִי in Deut. iv. 21, from אַרַח; and the verb אַרַח also, with the exception of this passage, only occurs in the speeches of Elihu (Job xxxiv. 8), which are almost more strongly Aramaizing than the Book of Job itself. Further, as an Aramaizing feature we have the objective relation marked by Lamed in the expression בְּנִתָּה לְרַעִי, Thou understandest my thinking, as in cxvi. 16, cxxix. 3, cxxxv. 11, cxxxvi. 19 sq. The monostichic opening is after the Davidic style, e.g. xxiii. 1b. Among the prophets, Isaiah in particular is fond of such thematic introductions as we have here in ver. 1b. On וַיִּתְרַע instead of וַיִּתְרַעֲנִי vid. on cvii. 20; the pronominal object stands once beside the first verb, or even beside the second (2 Kings ix. 25), instead of twice (Hitzig). The "me" is then expanded: sitting down, rising up, walking and lying, are the sum of human conditions or states. רַעִי is the totality or sum of the life of the spirit and soul of man, and רִבְרִבֵי the sum of human action. The divine knowledge, as וַיִּתְרַע says, is the result of the scrutiny of man. The poet, however, in vers. 2 and 3 uses the perfect throughout as a mood of that which is practically existing, because that scrutiny is a scrutiny that is never unexecuted, and the knowledge is consequently an ever-present knowledge. מְרַחוֹק is meant to say that He sees into not merely the thought that is fully fashioned and matured, but even that which is being evolved. וַיְרִיָּה from וַיְרִיָּה is combined by Luther (with Azulai and others) with וַיְרִי, a wreath (from וַיְרִי, constringere, cingere), inasmuch as he renders: whether I walk or lie down, Thou art round about me (Ich gehe oder lüge, so bistu um mich). וַיְרִי ought to have the same meaning here, if with Wetzstein one were to compare the Arabic, and more particularly Beduin, ذَرَى, dherrâ, to protect; the notion of affording protection does not accord with this train of thought, which has reference to God's omniscience: what ought therefore to be meant is a hedging round which secures its object to the knowledge, or even a protecting that places it in security against any exchanging, which will not suffer the object to escape it.*

* This Verb. tert. و et ی is old, and the derivative dherâ, protection, is an elegant word; with reference to another derivative, dherwe, a wall of rock protecting one from the winds, vid. Job, ii. 23, note. The II. form (Piel) signifies to protect in the widest possible sense, e.g. (in Neshwân, ii. 343b), "ذَرَى الشَّاءِ, he protected the sheep (against being exchanged) by leaving a lock of wool upon their backs when they were shorn, by which they might be recognised among other sheep."

The Arabic ذرى, to know, which is far removed in sound, is by no means to be compared; it is related to دُرأ, to push, urge forward, and denotes knowledge that is gained by testing and experimenting. But we also have no need of that ذرى, to protect, since we can remain within the range of the guaranteed Hebrew usage, inasmuch as זרה, to winnow, i.e. to spread out that which has been threshed and expose it to the current of the wind, in Arabic likewise ذرى (whence מורה, midhrá, a winnowing-fork, like רחת, racht, a winnowing-shovel), gives an appropriate metaphor. Here it is equivalent to: to investigate and search out to the very bottom; LXX., Symmachus, and Theodotus, ἐξιχνύσας, after which the Italic renders investigasti, and Jerome eventilasti. והסבין with the accusative, as in Job xxii. 21 with עם: to enter into neighbourly, close, familiar relationship, or to stand in such relationship, with any one; cogn. שכנ, שכנ. God is acquainted with all our ways not only superficially, but closely and thoroughly, as that to which He is accustomed.

In ver. 4 this omniscience of God is illustratively corroborated with כי; ver. 4b has the value of a relative clause, which, however, takes the form of an independent clause. מלה (pronounced by Jerome in his letter to Sunnia and Fretela, § 82, MALA) is an Aramaic word that has been already incorporated in the poetry of the Davidico-Salomonian age. מלה signifies both all of it and every one. In ver. 5 Luther has been misled by the LXX. and Vulgate, which take צור in the signification formare (whence צורה, forma); it signifies, as the definition "behind and before" shows, to surround, encompass. God is acquainted with man, for He holds him surrounded on all sides, and man can do nothing, if God, whose confining hand he has lying upon him (Job ix. 23), does not allow him the requisite freedom of motion. Instead of רעתך (LXX. ἡ γυνώσις σου) the poet purposely says in ver. 6a merely רעה: a knowledge, so all-penetrating, all-comprehensive as God's knowledge. The Keri reads פליאה, but the Chethib פליאה is supported by the Chethib פליא in Judg. xiii. 18, the Keri of which there is not פליא, but פלי (the pausal form of an adjective פלי, the feminine of which would be פְּלִיָּה). With קִפְּוִי the transcendence, with נִשְׁנָבָה the unattainableness, and with לֹא-אֵיכָל לֵב the incomprehensibility of the fact of the omniscience of God is expressed, and with this, to the mind of the poet, coincides God's omnipresence; for true, not merely phenomenal, knowledge is not possible without the immanence of the knowing one in the thing known. God, however, is omnipresent, sustaining the life of all things by His Spirit, and revealing Himself either in love or in wrath,—what the poet styles His countenance. To flee from this omnipresence (מִי, away from), as the sinner and he who is conscious of his guilt would gladly do, is impossible. Concerning the first אָנָּה, which is here accented on the ultima, vid. on cxvi. 4.

Vers. 8-12. The future form פִּעֲשֶׂה, customary in the Aramaic, may be derived just as well from פִּלַּק (פִּלְקִי), by means of the same mode of assimilation as in יִפֹּב = יִפְּבֹב, as from יִפֹּק (יִפְּקִי), which latter is certainly only insecurely established by Dan. vi. 24, לֹהֲנִסְקָהּ (cf. לֹהֲנִנְקָהּ, Ezra iv. 22; הִנְפִּיק, Dan. v. 2), since the Num., as in לֹהֲנִעְקָהּ, Dan. iv. 3, can also be a compensation for the resolved doubling (vid. Bernstein in the Lexicon Chrestom. Kirschianæ, and Levy s.v. יִפֹּק). אָנָּה with the simple future is followed by cohortatives (vid. on lxxiii. 16) with the equivalent שִׁעֲשֶׂה among them: et si stratum facerem (mih) infernum (accusative of the object as in Isa. lviii. 5), etc. In other passages the wings of the sun (Mal. iii. 20 [iv. 2]) and of the wind (xviii. 11) are mentioned, here we have the wings of the morning's dawn. Pennæ auroræ, Eugubinus observes (1548), est velocissimus auroræ per omnem mundum decursus. It is therefore to be rendered: If I should lift wings (אֲשִׁיב כְּנָפַיִם) as in Ezek. x. 16, and frequently) such as the dawn of the morning has, i.e. could I fly with the swiftness with which the dawn of the morning spreads itself over the eastern sky, towards the extreme west and alight there. Heaven and Hades, as being that which is superterrestrial and subterrestrial, and the east and west are set over against one another. אֶת־הַיָּם הַרְחֵייתִי is the extreme end of the sea (of the Mediterranean with the "isles of the Gentiles"). In ver. 10 follows the apodosis: nowhere is the hand of God, which governs everything, to be escaped, for dextera Dei ubique est. וְאֵימֶר (not וְאֵמֶר, Ezek. xiii. 15), "therefore I spake," also has the value of a hypothetical protasis: quodsi dixerim. חָשׂ and חָשַׁח belong together: meræ tenebræ (vid. xxxix. 6 sq.); but חָשַׁח is obscure. The signification secured to it of conterere, contundere, in Gen. iii. 15, Job ix. 17, which is followed by the LXX. (Vulgate) καταπαρήσει, is inappropriate to darkness. The signification inhiare, which may be deduced as possible from חָשַׁח, suits relatively better, yet not thoroughly well (why should it not have been חָשַׁח?). The signification obvelare, however, which one expects to find, and after which the Targum, Symmachus, Jerome, Saadia, and others render it, seems only to be guessed at from the connection, since חָשַׁח has not this signification in any other instance, and in favour of it we cannot appeal either to חָשַׁח—whence חָשַׁח, which belongs together with חָשַׁח, חָשַׁח, and חָשַׁח—or to חָשַׁח, the root of which is חָשַׁח (חָשַׁח), or to חָשַׁח, whence חָשַׁח, which does not signify to cover, veil, but according to ضعف, to fold, fold together, to double. We must therefore either assign to חָשַׁח the signification operiat me without being able to prove it, or we must put a verb of this signification in its place, viz. חָשַׁח (Ewald) or חָשַׁח (Böttcher), which latter is the more commendable here, where darkness (חָשַׁח, synon. חָשַׁח) is the subject: And if I should say, let nothing but darkness cover me, and as night (the predicate placed first, as in Amos iv. 13) let the light become about me, i.e. let the light become night that shall surround and cover me (חָשַׁח, poetic for חָשַׁח, like חָשַׁח in 2 Sam. ch. xxii.)—the darkness would spread abroad no obscurity (cv. 28) that should extend beyond (חָשַׁח) Thy piercing eye and remove me from Thee. In the word חָשַׁח, too, the Hiphil signification is not lost: the night would give out light from itself, as if it were the day; for the distinction of day and night has no conditioning influence upon God, who is above and superior to all created things (der Uebercreatürliche), who is light in Himself. The two חָשַׁח are correlative, as e.g. in 1 Kings xxii. 4. חָשַׁח (with a superfluous Jod) is an old word, but חָשַׁח (cf. Aramaic חָשַׁח) is a later one.

Vers. 13-18. The fact that man is manifest to God even to the very bottom of his nature, and in every place, is now confirmed from the origin of man. The development of the child in the womb was looked upon by the Israelitish Chokma as one of the greatest mysteries, Eccles. xi. 5; and here the poet praises this coming into being as a marvellous work of the omniscient and omnipresent omnipotence of God. נִקְנָה here signifies condere; and כִּבֵּד not: to cover, protect, as in cxi. 8, Job. xl. 22, prop. to cover with network, to hedge in, but: to plait, interweave, viz. with bones, sinews, and veins, like שִׁבְבָה in Job x. 11. The reins are made specially prominent in order to mark them, the seat of the tenderest, most secret emotions, as the work of Him who trieth the heart and the reins. The προσευχή becomes in ver. 14 the εὐχαριστία: I give thanks unto Thee that I have wonderfully come into being under fearful circumstances, i.e. circumstances exciting a shudder, viz. of astonishment (נִרְאָה as in lxv. 6). נִפְלְאָה (= נִפְלְאָה) is the passive to הִפְלִיא, iv. 4, xvii. 7. Hitzig regards נִפְלִיתָה (Thou hast shown Thyself wonderful), after the LXX., Syriac, Vulgate, and Jerome, as the only correct reading; but the thought which is thereby gained comes indeed to be expressed in the following line, ver. 14*b*, which sinks down into tautology in connection with this reading. עֲצָמַי (collectively equivalent to עֲצָמַיִם, Eccles. xi. 5) is the bones, the skeleton, and, starting from that idea, more generally the state of being as a sum-total of elements of being. וְאֶשְׂרָא, without being necessarily a conjunction (Ew. § 333, a), attaches itself to the suffix of עֲצָמַי. רִקְמָה, “to be worked in different colours, or also embroidered,” of the system of veins ramifying the body, and of the variegated colouring of its individual members, more particularly of the inward parts; perhaps, however, more generally with a retrospective conception of the colours of the outline following the undeveloped beginning, and of the forming of the members and of the organism in general.* The mother’s womb is here called not merely כִּתְרָה (cf. Æschylus’ Eumenides, 665: ἐν σκοτόσισι νηδύος τετραμμένη, and the designation of the place where the fœtus is formed as “a threefold darkness” in the Koran, Sur. xxxix. 8), the ē of which is retained here in pause (vid. Böttcher, Lehrbuch, § 298), but by a bolder appellation תְּהִמֹת אֲרֶץ, the lowest parts of the earth, i.e. the interior of the earth (vid. on lxiii. 10) as being the secret laboratory of the earthly origin, with the same retrospective reference to the first formation of the human body out of the dust of the earth, as when Job says, ch. i. 21: "naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither"—עָשָׂה, viz. εἰς τὴν γῆν τὴν μητέρα πάντων, Sir. xl. 1. The interior of Hades is also called לִישָׁן עֲצָב in Jonah ii. 3 [2], Sir. li. 5. According to the view of Scripture the mode of Adam's creation is repeated in the formation of every man, Job xxxiii. 6, cf. 4. The earth was the mother's womb of Adam, and the mother's womb out of which the child of Adam comes forth is the earth out of which it is taken.

(Ver. 16.) The embryo folded up in the shape of an egg is here called עֲבִי, from עָבַה, to roll or wrap together (cf. glomus, a ball), in the Talmud said of any kind of unshapen mass (LXX. ἀκατέργαστον, Symmachus ἀμόρφωτον) and raw material, e.g. of the wood or metal that is to be formed into a vessel (Chullin 25a, to which Saadia has already referred).* As to the rest, compare similar retrospective glances into the embryonic state in Job x. 8-12, 2 Macc. vii. 22 sq. (Psychology, S. 209 ff., tr. pp. 247 sq.). On the words in libro tuo Bellarmine makes the following correct observation: quia habes apud te exemplaria sive ideas omnium, quomodo pictor vel sculptor scit ex informi materia quid futurum sit, quia videt exemplar. The signification of the future יִצְרֵי is regulated by יָצָא, and becomes, as relating to the synchronous past, scribebantur. The days יָצְרֵי, which were already formed, are the subject. It is usually rendered: "the days which had first to be formed." If יָצְרֵי could be equivalent to יִצְרֵי, it would be to be preferred; but this rejection of the præform. fut. is only allowed in the fut. Piel of the verbs Pe Jod, and that after a Waw convertens, e.g. וַיִּצְרֵשׁ = וַיִּצְרֵשׁ, Nah. i. 4 (cf. Caspari on Obad. ver. 11).† Accordingly, assuming the original character of the לֹא in a negative signification, it is to be rendered: The days which were (already) formed, and there was not one among them, i.e. when none among them had as yet become a reality. The suffix of עֲבִים

* Epiphanius, Hær. xxx. § 31, says the Hebrew γολμη signifies the peeled grains of spelt or wheat before they are mixed up and backed, the still raw (only bruised) flour-grains—a signification that can now no longer be supported by examples.

† But outside the Old Testament it also occurs in the Pual, though as a wrong use of the word; vide my Anekdotia (1841), S. 372 f.

points to the succeeding ימים, to which יצרו is appended as an attributive clause; וְלֹא אֶחָד בָּהֶם is subordinated to this יצרו: cum non or nondum (Job xxii. 16) unus inter eos = unus eorum (Ex. xiv. 28) esset. But the expression (instead of וְעוֹד לֹא הָיָה or הָיָה טָרַם) remains doubtful, and it becomes a question whether the Kerî וְלוֹ (vid. on c. 3), which stands side by side with the Chethîb וְלֹא (which the LXX., Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, the Targum, Syriac, Jerome, and Saadia follow), is not to be preferred. This וְלוֹ, referred to גַּלְמֵי, gives the acceptable meaning: and for it (viz. its birth) one among them (these days), without our needing to make any change in the proposed exposition down to יצרו. We decide in favour of this, because this וְלוֹ אֶחָד בָּהֶם does not, as וְלֹא אֶחָד בָּהֶם, make one feel to miss any הָיָה, and because the וְלֵי which begins ver. 17 connects itself to it by way of continuation. The accentuation has failed to discern the reference of כֻּלָּם to the following ימים, inasmuch as it places Olewejored against יִתְחַבְּוּ. Hupfeld follows this accentuation, referring כֻּלָּם back to גַּלְמֵי as a coil of days of one's life; and Hitzig does the same, referring it to the embryos. But the precedence of the relative pronoun occurs in other instances also,* and is devoid of all harshness, especially in connection with כֻּלָּם, which directly signifies altogether (e.g. Isa. xliii. 14). It is the confession of the omniscience that is united with the omnipotence of God, which the poet here gives utterance to with reference to himself, just as Jahve says with reference to Jeremiah, Jer. i. 5. Among the days which were preformed in the idea of God (cf. on יצרו, Isa. xxii. 11, xxxvii. 26) there was also one, says the poet, for the embryonic beginning of my life. The divine knowledge embraces the beginning, development, and completion of all things (Psychology, S. 37 ff., tr. pp. 46 sqq.). The knowledge of the thoughts of God which are written in the book of creation and revelation is the poet's cherished possession, and to ponder over them is his favourite pursuit: they are precious to him, יְקָרִי (after xxxvi. 8), not: difficult of comprehension (schwerbegreiflich, Maurer, Olshausen), after Dan. ii. 11, which would surely have been expressed by עֲמִיקֵי (xcii. 6), more readily: very weighty (schwergewichtig, Hitzig), but better according to the prevailing Hebrew usage: highly valued (schwergewerthet), cara.* “Their sums” are powerful, prodigious (xl. 6), and cannot be brought to a summa summarum. If he desires to count them (fut. hypothet. as in xci. 7, Job xx. 24), they prove themselves to be more than the sand with its grains, that is to say, innumerable. He falls asleep over the pondering upon them, wearied out; and when he wakes up, he is still with God, i.e. still ever absorbed in the contemplation of the Unsearchable One, which even the sleep of fatigue could not entirely interrupt. Ewald explains it somewhat differently: if I am lost in the stream of thoughts and images, and recover myself from this state of reverie, yet I am still ever with Thee, without coming to an end. But it could only perhaps be interpreted thus if it were הִתְעוֹרְרָתִי or הִעִירוֹתִי. Hofmann’s interpretation is altogether different: I will count them, the more numerous than the sand, when I awake and am continually with Thee, viz. in the other world, after the awaking from the sleep of death. This is at once impossible, because הַקִּיצִיתִי cannot here, according to its position, be a perf. hypotheticum. Also in connection with this interpretation עוֹר would be an inappropriate expression for “continually,” since the word only has the sense of the continual duration of an action or a state already existing; here of one that has not even been closed and broken off by sleep. He has not done; waking and dreaming and waking up, he is carried away by that endless, and yet also endlessly attractive, pursuit, the most fitting occupation of one who is awake, and the sweetest (cf. Jer. xxxi. 26) of one who is asleep and dreaming.

Vers. 19-21. And this God is by many not only not believed in and loved, but even hated and blasphemed! The poet now turns towards these enemies of God in profound vexation of spirit. The אִם, which is conditional in ver. 8, here is an optative o si, as in lxxxix. 9, xcvi. 7. The expression הִקְטַלְתָּ אֱלֹהִים reminds one of the Book of Job, for, with the exception of our Psalm, this is the only book that uses the verb הִקְטַל, which is more Aramaic than Hebrew, and the divine name Eloah occurs more frequently in it than anywhere else. The transition from the optative to the imperative סורי is difficult; it would have been less so if the Waw copul. had been left out: cf. the easier expression in vi. 9, cxix. 115. But we may not on this account seek to read יִסּוּרֵי, as Olshausen does. Everything here is remarkable; the whole Psalm has a characteristic form in respect to the language. מָנִי is the ground-form of the overloaded מִמְנִי, and is also like the Book of Job, ch. xxi. 16, cf. מָנְהוּ ch. iv. 12, Ps. lxxviii. 24. The mode of writing יִמְרוּךְ (instead of which, however, the Babylonian texts had יִאֲמַרְרוּךְ) is the same as in 2 Sam. xix. 15, cf. in 2 Sam. xx. 9 the same melting away of the Aleph into the preceding vowel in connection with אָהוּ, in 2 Sam. xxii. 40 in connection with אָזִיר, and in Isa. xiii. 20 with אָהֵל. Construed with the accusative of the person, אָמַר here signifies to declare any one, profiteri, a meaning which, we confess, does not occur elsewhere. But לְמִזְמָה (cf. לְמִרְמָה, xxiv. 4; the Targum: who swear by Thy name for wantonness) and the parallel member of the verse, which as it runs is moulded after Ex. xx. 7, show that it has not to be read יִמְרוּךְ (Quinta: παρεπίκρανάν σε). The form נְשׂוּא, with Aleph otians, is also remarkable; it ought at least to have been written נְשׂוּאֵי (cf. נְרַפּוּא, Ezek. xlvi. 8) instead of the customary נְשׂוּאֵי; yet the same mode of writing is found in the Niphal in Jer. x. 5, יִנְשׂוּא, it assumes a ground-form נְשׂוּה (xxxii. 1) = נְשׂוּא, and is to be judged of according to נְבּוּא in Isa. xxviii. 12 [Ges. § 23, 3, rem. 3]. Also one feels the absence of the object to נְשׂוּאֵי לְשׂוּא. It is meant to be supplied according to the decalogue, Ex. xx. 7, which certainly makes the alteration שְׂמַךְ (Böttcher, Olsh.) or יְכַרְךָ (Hitzig on Isa. xxvi. 13), instead of עָרִיךְ, natural. But the text as we now have it is also intelligible: the object to נְשׂוּא is derived from יִמְרוּךְ, and the following עָרִיךְ is an explanation of the subject intended in נְשׂוּא that is introduced subsequently. Ps. lxxxix. 52 proves the possibility of this structure of a clause. It is correctly rendered by Aquila ἀντιζηλοί σου, and Symmachus οἱ ἐναντίοι σου. עָרִי, an enemy, prop. one who is zealous, a zealot (from עָרַר, or rather עָרַר = غار med. Je, ζηλοῦν, whence עָרַר = غيرة = קְנִיָּאָה), is a word that is guaranteed by 1 Sam. xxviii. 16, Dan. iv. 16, and as being an Ara-maism is appropriate to this Psalm. The form תְּקוּמָם for מְתוּמָם has cast away the preformative Mem (cf. שְׁפָתַיִם and מִשְׁפָּתַיִם, מִקְרָה in Deut. xxiii. 11 for מִמְקָרָה); the suffix is to be understood according to xvii. 7. Pasek stands between יהוה and אֲשֶׁנָּה in order that the two words may not be read together (cf. Job xxvii. 13, and above x. 3). הַתְּקוּמָה as in the recent Ps. cxix. 158. The emphasis in ver. 22*b* lies on לִי; the poet regards the adversaries of God as enemies of his own. תְּקִלָּית takes the place of the adjective: extremo (odio) odi eos. Such is the relation of the poet to the enemies of God, but without indulging any self-glorying.

* It should be noted that the radical idea of the verb, viz. being heavy (German schwer), is retained in all these renderings.—Tr.

Vers. 23, 24. He sees in them the danger which threatens himself, and prays God not to give him over to the judgment of self-delusion, but to lay bare the true state of his soul. The fact "Thou hast searched me," which the beginning of the Psalm confesses, is here turned into a petitioning "search me." Instead of רְעִים in ver. 17, the poet here says שְׂרַעְפִּים, which signifies branches (Ezek. xxxi. 5) and branchings of the act of thinking (thoughts and cares, xciv. 19). The Resh is epenthetic, for the first form is שְׂרַעְפִּים, Job iv. 13, xx. 2. The poet thus sets the very ground and life of his heart, with all its outward manifestations, in the light of the divine omniscience. And in ver. 24 he prays that God would see whether any דֶּרֶךְ-עֶצֶב cleaves to him (דֶּ as in 1 Sam. xxv. 24), by which is not meant "a way of idols" (Rosenmüller, Gesenius, and Maurer), after Isa. xlvi. 5, since an inclination towards, or even apostasy to, heathenism cannot be an unknown sin; nor to a man like the writer of this Psalm is heathenism any power of temptation. דֶּרֶךְ בְּצַע (Grätz) might more readily be admissible, but דֶּרֶךְ עֶצֶב is a more comprehensive notion, and one more in accordance with this closing petition. The poet gives this name to the way that leads to the pain, torture, viz. of the inward and outward punishments of sin; and, on the other hand, the way along which he wishes to be guided he calls דֶּרֶךְ עוֹלָם, the way of endless continuance (LXX., Vulgate, Luther), not the way of the former times, after Jer. vi. 16 (Maurer, Olshausen), which thus by itself is ambiguous (as becomes evident from Job xxii. 15, Jer. xviii. 15), and also does not furnish any direct antithesis. The "everlasting way" is the way of God (xxvii. 11), the way of the righteous, which stands fast for ever and shall not "perish" (i. 6).

PSALM CXL.

PRAYER FOR PROTECTION AGAINST WICKED, CRAFTY MEN.

- 2 DELIVER me, Jahve, from wicked men,
From the violent man preserve me,
- 3 Who plot wickedness in the heart,
Daily do they stir up wars.
- 4 They sharpen their tongue like a serpent,
Adder's poison is under their lips. (Sela.)
- 5 Keep me, Jahve, from the hands of the wicked,
From the violent man preserve me,
Who purpose to thrust aside my footsteps
- 6 The proud hide snares for me and cords,
They spread nets close by the path,
They set traps for me. (Sela.)
- 7 I say to Jahve : My God art Thou,
Oh give ear, Jahve, to the cry of my supplication.

The close of the preceding Psalm is the key to David's position and mood in the presence of his enemies which find expression in this Psalm. He complains here of serpent-like, crafty, slanderous adversaries, who are preparing themselves for war against him, and with whom he will at length have to fight in open battle. The Psalm, in its form more bold than beautiful, justifies its לָדוֹר in so far as it is Davidic in thoughts and figures, and may be explained from the circumstances of the rebellion of Absalom, to which as an outbreak of Ephraim-ite jealousy the rebellion of Sheba ben Bichri the Benjamite attached itself. Ps. lviii. and lxiv. are very similar. The close of all three Psalms sounds much alike, they agree in the use of rare forms of expression, and their language becomes fearfully obscure in style and sound where they are directed against the enemies.

Vers. 2-4. The assimilation of the Nun of the verb נָצַר is given up, as in lxi. 8, lxxviii. 7, and frequently, in order to make the form more full-toned. The relative clause shows that אִישׁ הַמָּסִים (vid. vol. i. 277) is not intended to be understood exclusively of one person. בָּלֵב strengthens the notion of that which is deeply concealed and premeditated. It is doubtful whether יָגִיר signifies to form into troops or to stir up. But from the fact that גָּיַר in lvi. 7, lix. 4, Isa. liv. 15, signifies not congregare but se congregare, it is to be inferred that גָּיַר in the passage before us, like גָּיַר (or הִתְגָּיַר in Deut. ii. 9, 24), in Syriac and Targumic גָּיַר, signifies concitare, to excite (cf. שׂוּר together with שָׂרָה, Hos. xii. 4 sq.). In ver. 4 the Psalm coincides with lxiv. 4, lviii. 5. They sharpen their tongue, so that it inflicts a fatal sting like the tongue of a serpent, and under their lips, shooting out from thence, is the poison of the adder (cf. Cant. iv. 11). עֲבָשׁ is a ἀπαξ λεγομ. not from בָּשָׁב (Jesurun, p. 207), but from עָבַשׁ and عكش and عكس, root עכ (vid. Fleischer on Isa. lix. 5, עֲבָשׁ), both of which have the significations of bending, turning, and coiling after the manner of a serpent; the Beth is an organic addition modifying the meaning of the root.*

* According to the original Lexicons عكس signifies to bend one's self, to wriggle, to creep sideways like the roots of the vine, in the V. form to

Vers. 5, 6. The course of this second strophe is exactly parallel with the first. The perfects describe their conduct hitherto, as a comparison of ver. 3*b* with 3*a* shows. פָּעָמִים is poetically equivalent to רַגְלָיִם, and signifies both the foot that steps (lvii. 7, lviii. 11) and the step that is made by the foot (lxxxv. 14, cxix. 133), and here the two senses are undistinguishable. They are called נְאִים on account of the inordinate ambition that infatuates them. The metaphors taken from the life of the hunter (cxli. 9, cxlii. 4) are here brought together as it were into a body of synonyms. The meaning of לְיַד־מַעְגָּל becomes explicable from cxlii. 4; לְיַד, at hand, is equivalent to "immediately beside" (1 Chron. xviii. 17, Neh. xi. 24). Close by the path along which he has to pass, lie gins ready to spring together and ensnare him when he appears.

Vers. 7-9. Such is the conduct of his enemies; he, however, prays to his God and gets his weapons from beside Him. The day of equipment is the day of the crisis when the battle is fought in full array. The perfect פְּבוֹתָהּ states what will then take place on the part of God: He protects the head of His anointed against the deadly blow. Both ver. 8*a* and 8*b* point to the helmet as being מַעֲזוֹ רֹאשׁ, lx. 9; cf. the expression "the helmet of salvation" in Isa. lix. 17. Beside מְאַתִּי, from the ἄπ. λεγ. מְאַוּה, there is also the reading מְאַתִּי, which Abulwäld found in his Jerusalem codex (in Saragossa). The move one's self like an adder (according to the Kamûs) and to walk like a drunken man (according to Neshwân); but عكش signifies to be inter-twined, knit or closely united together, said of hairs and of the branches of trees, in the V. form to fight hand to hand and to get in among the crowd. The root is apparently expanded into עֲכָשׁוּב by an added Beth which serves as a notional speciality, as in عرْقُوب the convex bend of the steep side of a rock, or in the case of the knee of the hind-legs of animals, and in خرنوب (in the dialect of the country along the coast of Palestine, where the tree is plentiful, in Neshwân churnûb), the horn-like curved pod of the carob-tree (Ceratonia Siliqua), syncopated خروب, charrûb (not charûb), from خرن, cogn. قرن a horn, cf. خرنابية the beak of a bird of prey, خرنوق the stork [vid. on civ. 17], خرنين the rhinoceros [vid. on xxix. 6], خرنيت the unicorn [vid. ibid.].—WETZSTEIN.

regular form would be מֵאֲוַי, and the doubly irregular ma'awajjê follows the example of מִחֲשָׁבֵי, מִחֲמָדֵי, and the like, in a manner that is without example elsewhere. מִזְמָו for מִזְמָתוֹ is also a hapaxlegomenon; according to Gesenius the principal form is זָמַם, but surely more correctly זָמַם (like קָרַב), which in Aramaic signifies a bridle, and here a plan, device. The Hiph. הִזְמִיָּק (root זָמַק, whence נִזְמַק, نَفَقَ) signifies educere in the sense of reportare, Prov. iii. 13, viii. 35, xii. 2, xviii. 22, and of porrigere, cxliv. 13, Isa. lviii. 10. A reaching forth of the plan is equivalent to the reaching forth of that which is projected. The choice of the words used in this Psalm coincides here, as already in מִעֲגָלָה, with Proverbs and Isaiah. The future יִרְמֹו expresses the consequence (cf. lxi. 8) against which the poet wishes to guard.

Vers. 10-12. The strophic symmetry is now at an end. The longer the poet lingers over the contemplation of the rebels the more lofty and dignified does his language become, the more particular the choice of the expressions, and the more difficult and unmanageable the construction. The Hiph. הִסִּב signifies, causatively, to cause to go round about (Ex. xiii. 18), and to raise round about (2 Chron. xiv. 6); here, after Josh. vi. 11, where with an accusative following it signifies to go round about: to make the circuit of anything, as enemies who surround a city on all sides and seek the most favourable point for assault; מִסִּבֵּי from the participle מִסִּב. Even when derived from the substantive מִסִּב (Hupfeld), "my surroundings" is equivalent to אֲיָבֵי סְבִיבוֹתַי in xxvii. 6. Hitzig, on the other hand, renders it: the head of my slanderers, from סִבַּב, to go round about, Arabic to tell tales of any one, defame; but the Arabic

سَبَّ, fut. u., to abuse, the IV. form (Hiphil) of which moreover is not used either in the ancient or in the modern language, has nothing to do with the Hebrew סָבַב, but signifies originally to cut off round about, then to clip (injure) any one's honour and good name.* The fact that the enemies who surround

* The lexicographer Neshwân says, i. 279b: السَّبُّ الشَّتْمُ وقيل إن أصل السَّبِّ القَطْعُ ثم صار الشَّتْمُ "sebb is to abuse; still, the more original signification of cutting off is said to lie at the foundation of this the psalmist on every side are just such calumniators, is intimated here in the word שְׂפָתָיו. He wishes that the trouble which the enemies' slanderous lips occasion him may fall back upon their own head. ראש is head in the first and literal sense according to vii. 17; and יְכַפִּימוּ (with the Jod of the ground-form כָּסַי, as in Deut. xxxii. 26, 1 Kings xx. 35; Chetkib יְכַפִּימוּ,* after the attractional schema, 2 Sam. ii. 4, Isa. ii. 11, and frequently; cf. on the masculine form, Prov. v. 2, x. 21) refers back to ראש, which is meant of the heads of all persons individually. In ver. 11 יְמִיטוּ (with an indefinite subject of the higher punitive powers, Ges. § 137, note), in the signification to cause to descend, has a support in lv. 4, whereas the Niph. נָמוּט, fut. יִמֹט, which is preferred by the Keri, in the signification to be made to descend, is contrary to the usage of the language. The ἄπ. λεγ. מְהַמְרוֹת has been combined by Parchon and others with the Arabic همر, which, together with other significations (to strike, stamp, cast down, and the like), also has the signification to flow (whence e.g. in the Koran, mā munhamir, flowing water). "Fire" and "water" are emblems of perils that cannot be escaped, lxvi. 12, and the mention of fire is therefore appropriately succeeded by places of flowing water, pits of water. The signification "pits" is attested by the Targum, Symmachus, Jerome, and the quotation in Kimchi: "first of all they buried them in מְהַמְרוֹת; when the flesh was consumed they collected the bones and buried them in coffins." On בְּלִי־יָקוּמוּ cf. Isa. xxvi. 14. Like vers. 10, 11, ver. 12 is also not to be taken as a general maxim, but as expressing a wish in accordance with the excited tone of this strophe. אִישׁ לִשְׁוֹן is not a great talker, i.e. boaster, but an idle talker, i.e. slanderer (LXX. ἀνήρ γλωσσώδης, cf. Sir. viii. 4). According to the accents, רַע אִישׁ הָמָס רַע is the parallel; but what would be the object of this designation of violence as worse or more malignant? With Sommer, Olshausen, and others, we take רַע as the subject

to יִצְוֶנֶנִי: let evil, i.e. the punishment which arises out of evil, hunt him; cf. Prov. xiii. 21, הַמַּצְאִים תְּרִדָּה רָעָה, and the opposite in xxiii. 6. It would have to be accented, according to this our construction of the words, רַע יִצְוֶנִי לְמִדְחָפָה. The ἀπ. λεγ. לְמִדְחָפָה we do not render, with Hengstenberg, Olshausen, and others: push upon push, with repeated pushes, which, to say nothing more, is not suited to the figure of hunting, but, since רָעָה always has the signification of precipitate hastening: by hastenings, that is to say, forced marches.

Vers. 13, 14. With ver. 13 the mood and language now again become cheerful, the rage has spent itself; therefore the style and tone are now changed, and the Psalm trips along merrily as it were to the close. With reference to ירעה for ירעתי (as in Job xlii. 2), vid. xvi. 2. That which David in ix. 5 confidently expects on his own behalf is here generalized into the certain prospect of the triumph of the good cause in the person of all its representatives at that time oppressed. אָף, like ירעתי, is an expression of certainty. After seeming abandonment God again makes Himself known to His own, and those whom they wanted to sweep away out of the land of the living have an ever sure dwelling-place with His joyful countenance (xvi. 11).

PSALM CXLI.

EVENING PSALM IN THE TIMES OF ABSALOM.

- 1 JAHVE, I call upon Thee, Oh haste Thee unto me;
Oh hearken to my voice, when I call upon Thee!
- 2 Let my prayer be accounted as incense before Thee,
The lifting up of my hands as the evening meat-offering.
- 3 Oh set a watch, Jahve, upon my mouth,
A protection upon the door of my lips.
- 4 Incline not my heart to an evil matter,
To practise knavish things in iniquity
With the lords who rule wickedly,
And let me not taste their dainties.
- 5 Let a righteous man smite me lovingly and rebuke me,

- Such oil upon the head let not my head refuse,
 For still do I meet their wickedness only with prayer.
- 6 Hurl'd down upon the sides of the rock are their judges,
 And they hear my words as welcome.
- 7 As when one furroweth and breaketh up the earth,
 Are our bones sowed at the gate of Hades.
- 8 For unto Thee, Jahve Lord! do mine eyes look,
 In Thee do I hide, pour not my soul out!
- 9 Keep me from the hands of the snare of those who lay snares for me,
 And from the traps of those who rule wickedly.
- 10 Let the wicked fall into their own net,
 Whilst I altogether escape.

The four Psalms, cxl., cxli., cxlii., and cxliii., are interwoven with one another in many ways (Symbolæ, pp. 67 sq.). The following passages are very similar, viz. cxl. 7, cxli. 1, cxlii. 2, and cxliii. 1. Just as the poet complains in cxlii. 4, "when my spirit veils itself within me," so too in cxliii. 4; as he prays in cxlii. 8, "Oh bring my soul out of prison," so in cxliii. 11, "bring my soul out of distress," where צרה takes the place of the metaphorical מטטר. Besides these, compare cxl. 5, 6 with cxli. 9; cxlii. 7 with cxliii. 9; cxl. 3 with cxli. 5, רעות; cxl. 14 with cxlii. 8; cxlii. 4 with cxliii. 8.

The right understanding of the Psalm depends upon the right understanding of the situation. Since it is inscribed לָרֹר, it is presumably a situation corresponding to the history of David, out of the midst of which the Psalm is composed, either by David himself or by some one else who desired to give expression in Davidic strains to David's mood when in this situation. For the gleanings of Davidic Psalms which we find in the last two Books of the Psalter is for the most part derived from historical works in which these Psalms, in some instances only free reproductions of the feelings of David with respect to old Davidic models, adorned the historic narrative. The Psalm before us adorned the history of the time of the persecution by Absalom. At that time David was driven out of Jerusalem, and consequently cut off from the sacrificial worship of God upon Zion; and our Psalm is an evening hymn of one of those troublous days. The ancient church, even prior to the time of Gregory (Constitutiones Apostolicæ, ii. 59), had chosen it for its evening hymn, just as it had chosen Ps. lxiii. for its morning hymn. Just as Ps. lxiii. was called ὁ ὀρθρινός (ibid. viii. 37), so this Psalm, as being the Vesper Psalm, was called ὁ ἐπιλύχνος (ibid. viii. 35).

Vers. 1, 2. The very beginning of Ps. cxli. is more after the manner of David than really Davidic; for instead of haste thee to me, David always says, haste thee for my help, xxii. 20, xxxviii. 23, xl. 14. The הָלֵךְ that is added to בְּקִרְבִּי (as in iv. 2) is to be explained, as in lvii. 3: when I call to Thee, i.e. when I call Thee, who art now far from me, to me. The general cry for help is followed in ver. 2 by a petition for the answering of his prayer. Luther has given an excellent rendering: Let my prayer avail to Thee as an offering of incense; the lifting up of my hands, as an evening sacrifice (Mein Gebet müsse für dir tügen wie ein Rauchopfer, Meine Hände aufheben, wie ein Abendopfer). הִבִּיחַ is the fut. Niph. of בָּנָה, and signifies properly to be set up, and to be established, or reflexive: to place and arrange or prepare one's self, Amos iv. 12; then to continue, e.g. ci. 7; therefore, either let it place itself, let it appear, sistat se, or better: let it stand, continue, i.e. let my prayer find acceptance, recognition with Thee קִטְרֶת, and the lifting up of my hands מְנַחֵת-עַרְבֵי. Expositors say that this in both instances is the comparatio decurtata, as in xi. 1 and elsewhere: as an incense-offering, as an evening mincha. But the poet purposely omits the בְּ of the comparison. He wishes that God may be pleased to regard his prayer as sweet-smelling smoke or as incense, just as this was added to the azcara of the meal-offering, and gave it, in its ascending perfume, the direction upward to God,* and that He may be pleased to regard the

* It is not the priestly קִטְרֶת תְּמִיד, i.e. the daily morning and evening incense-offering upon the golden altar of the holy place, Ex. xxx. 8, that is meant (since it is a non-priest who is speaking, according to Hitzig, of course John Hyrcanus), but rather, as also in Isa. i. 13, the incense of the azcara of the meal-offering which the priest burnt (הִקְטִיר) upon the altar; the incense (Isa. lxvi. 3) was entirely consumed, and not merely a handful taken from it.

lifting up of his hands (מִשְׁאֵת, the construct with the reduplication given up, from מִשְׁאֵת, or even, after the form מִתְּנֶה, from מִשְׁאֵת, here not oblatio, but according to the phrase נָשָׂא כַּפַּיִם [וַיִּרֶם], elevatio, Judg. xx. 38, 40, cf. Ps. xxviii. 2, and frequently) as an evening mincha, just as it was added to the evening tamid according to Ex. xxix. 38–42, and concluded the work of the service of the day.*

Vers. 3, 4. The prayer now begins to be particularized, and that in the first instance as a petition for the grace of silence, calling to mind old Davidic passages like xxxix. 2, xxxiv. 14. The situation of David, the betrayed one, requires caution in speaking; and the consciousness of having sinned, not indeed against the rebels, but against God, who would not visit him thus without his deserving it, stood in the way of any outspoken self-vindication. In pone custodiam ori meo שְׁמֵרָה is ἀπ. λεγ., after the infinitive form דְּבַקָּה, עֲצֹמָה, עֲצֹמָה. In ver. 3b לֵל is ἀπ. λεγ. for דְּלָת; cf. “doors of the mouth” in Mic. vii. 5, and πύλαι στόματος in Euripides. נִצְרָה might be imper. Kal: keep I pray, with Dag. dirimens as in Prov. iv. 13. But נִצַּר לֵל is not in use; and also as the parallel word to שְׁמֵרָה, which likewise has the appearance of being imperative, נִצְרָה is explicable as regards its pointing by a comparison of יִקָּה in Gen. xlix. 10, דְּבַרָּה in Deut. xxxiii. 3, and קָרְבָּה in lxxiii. 28. The prayer for the grace of silence is followed in ver. 4 by a prayer for the breaking off of all fellowship with the existing rulers. By a flight of irony they are called אֲיִשִּׁים, lords, in the sense of בְּנֵי אֵישׁ, iv. 3 (cf. the Spanish hidalgos = hijos d'algo, sons of somebody). The evil thing (דְּבַר יָרָע, with Pasek between the two ר, as in Num. vii. 13, Deut. vii. 1 between the two ם, and in 1 Chron. xxii. 3 between the two ל), to which Jahve may be pleased never to incline his heart (חַט, fut. apoc. Hiph. as in xxvii. 9), is forthwith more particularly designated: perpetrare faci-

* The reason of it is this, that the evening mincha is oftener mentioned than the morning mincha (see, however, 2 Kings iii. 20). The whole burnt-offering of the morning and the meat-offering of the evening (2 Kings xvi. 15, 1 Kings xviii. 29, 36) are the beginning and close of the daily principal service; whence, according to the example of the usus loquendi in Dan. ix. 21, Ezra ix. 4 sq., later on mincha directly signifies the afternoon or evening.

nora maligne cum dominis, etc. עָלָלוּ of great achievements in the sense of infamous deeds, also occurs in xiv. 1, xcix. 8. Here, however, we have the Hithpo. הִתְעַלְלָה, which, with the accusative of the object עָלָלוּ, signifies: wilfully to make such actions the object of one's acting (cf. تعَلَّلَ بالشئ, to meddle with any matter, to amuse, entertain one's self with a thing). The expression is made to express disgust as strongly as possible; this poet is fond of glaring colouring in his language. In the dependent passage neve eorum vescar cupediis, לָחֵם is used poetically for אֲכָלוּ, and בְּ is the partitive Beth, as in Job xxi. 25. מִנְעֻמִּים is another hapaxlegomenon, but as being a designation of dainties (from נָעַם, to be mild, tender, pleasant), it may not have been an unusual word. It is a well-known thing that usurpers revel in the cuisine and cellars of those whom they have driven away.

Vers. 5-7. Thus far the Psalm is comparatively easy of exposition; but now it becomes difficult, yet not hopelessly so. David, thoroughly conscious of his sins against God and of his imperfection as a monarch, says, in opposition to the abuse which he is now suffering, that he would gladly accept any friendly reproof: "let a righteous man smite in kindness and reprove me—head-oil (i.e. oil upon the head, to which such reproof is likened) shall my head not refuse." So we render it, following the accents, and not as Hupfeld, Kurtz, and Hitzig do: "if a righteous man smites me, it is love; if he reproves me, an anointing of the head is it unto me;" in connection with which the designation of the subject with יָשָׁר would be twice wanting, which is more than is admissible. צַדִּיק stands here as an abstract substantive: the righteous man, whoever he may be, in antithesis, namely, to the rebels and to the people who have joined them. Amyraldus, Maurer, and Hengstenberg understand it of God; but it only occurs of God as an attribute, and never as a direct appellation. חֶסֶד, as in Jer. xxxi. 3, is equivalent to בְּחַסְדֶּךָ, cum benignitate = benigne. What is meant is, as in Job vi. 14, what Paul (Gal. vi. 1) styles πνεῦμα πραύτητος. And הִלֵּם, tundere, is used of the strokes of earnest but well-meant reproof, which is called "the blows of a friend" in Prov. xxvii. 6. Such reproof shall be to him as head-oil (xxiii. 5, cxxxiii. 2), which his head does not despise. וְיִ, written defectively for וְיִי, like וְיִ in lv. 16, וְיִי, 1 Kings xxi. 29 and frequently; וְיִי (root וְיִ, וְיִ, with the nasal n, which also expresses the negation in the Indo-Germanic languages) here signifies to deny, as in xxxiii. 10 to bring to nought, to destroy. On the other hand, the LXX. renders μη λυπανάτω τήν κεφαλήν μου, which is also followed by the Syriac and Jerome, perhaps after the Arabic نَوَى, to become or to be fat, which is, however, altogether foreign to the Aramaic, and is, moreover, only used of fatness of the body, and in fact of camels. The meaning of the figure is this: well-meant reproof shall be acceptable and spiritually useful to him. The confirmation וְיִי עוֹר וְיִ follows, which is enigmatical both in meaning and expression. This עוֹר is the cipher of a whole clause, and the following וְיִ is related to this עוֹר as the Waw that introduces the apodosis, not to וְיִ, as in 2 Chron. xxiv. 20, since no progression and connection is discernible if וְיִ is taken as a subordinating quia. We interpret thus: for it is still so (the matter still stands thus), that my prayer is against their wickednesses; i.e. that I use no weapon but that of prayer against these, therefore let me always be in that spiritual state of mind which is alive to well-meant reproof. Mendelssohn's rendering is similar: I still pray, whilst they practise infamy. On וְיִ עוֹר cf. Zech. viii. 20 עוֹר וְיִי (vid. Köhler), and Prov. xxiv. 27 וְיִי אֶחָר. He who has prayed God in ver. 3 to set a watch upon his mouth is dumb in the presence of those who now have dominion, and seeks to keep himself clear of their sinful doings, whereas he willingly allows himself to be chastened by the righteous; and the more silent he is towards the world (see Amos v. 13), the more constant is he in his intercourse with God. But there will come a time when those who now behave as lords shall fall a prey to the revenge of the people who have been misled by them; and on the other hand, the confession of the salvation, and of the order of the salvation, of God, that has hitherto been put to silence, will again be able to make itself freely heard, and find a ready hearing.

As ver. 6 says, the new rulers fall a prey to the indignation of the people and are thrown down the precipices, whilst the people, having again come to their right mind, obey the words of David and find them pleasant and beneficial (vid. Prov. xv. 26, xvi. 24).  $\text{בְּצַדֵּי}$  is to be explained according to 2 Kings ix. 33. The casting of persons down from the rock was not an unusual mode of execution (2 Chron. xxv. 12).  $\text{עַל־צַדֵּי}$  are the sides (cxl. 6, Judg. xi. 26) of the rock, after which the expression ἐχόμενα πέτρας of the LXX., which has been misunderstood by Jerome, is intended to be understood;\* they are therefore the sides of the rock conceived of as it were as the hands of the body of rock, if we are not rather with Böttcher to compare the expressions  $\text{בְּצַדֵּי}$  and  $\text{עַל־צַדֵּי}$  construed with verbs of abandoning and casting down, Lam. i. 14, Job xvi. 11, and frequently. In ver. 7 there follows a further statement of the issue on the side of David and his followers: instar findentis et secantis terram ( $\text{עַבְדָּךְ}$  with Beth, elsewhere in the hostile signification of irrumperere) dispersa sunt ossa nostra ad ostium ( $\text{פִּי}$  as in Prov. viii. 3) orci; Symmachus: ὡσπερ γεωργὸς ὅταν ῥήσῃ τὴν γῆν, οὕτως ἐσκορπίσθη τὰ ὀστά ἡμῶν εἰς στόμα ἄδου; Quinta: ὡς καλλιερῶν καὶ σκάπτων ἐν τῇ γῆ, κ.τ.λ. Assuming the very extreme, it is a look of hope into the future: should his bones and the bones of his followers be even scattered about the mouth of Sheól (cf. the Syrian picture of Sheól: "the dust upon its threshold 'al-escúfteh," Deutsche Morgenländ. Zeitschrift, xx. 513), their soul below, their bones above—it would nevertheless be only as when one in ploughing cleaves the earth; i.e. they do not lie there in order that they may continue lying, but that they may rise up anew, as the seed that is sown sprouts up out of the upturned earth. LXX. Codd. Vat. et Sinait. τὰ ὀστά ἡμῶν, beside which, however, is found the reading αὐτῶν (Cod. Alex. by a second hand, and the Syriac, Arabic, and Æthiopic versions), as Böttcher also, pro ineptissimo utcunque, thinks  $\text{עַצְמוֹתַי}$  must be read, understanding this, according to 2 Chron. xxv. 12 extrem., of the mangled bodies of those cast down from the rock. We here discern the hope of a resurrection, if not directly, at least (cf. Oehler in Herzog's Real-Encyclopädic, concluding volume, S. 422) as an emblem of victory in spite of having succumbed. That which authorizes this interpretation lies in the figure of the husbandman, and in the conditional clause (ver. 8), which leads to the true point of the comparison; for as a complaint concerning a defeat that had been suffered: "so are our bones scattered for the mouth of the grave (in order to be swallowed up by it)," ver. 7, would be alien and isolated with respect to what precedes and what follows.

Vers. 8-10. If ver. 7 is not merely an expression of the complaint, but at the same time of hope, we now have no need to give the פִּי the adversative sense of imo, but we may leave it its most natural confirmatory signification namque. From this point the Psalm gradually dies away in strains comparatively easy to be understood and in perfect keeping with the situation. In connection with ver. 8 one is reminded of xxv. 15, xxxi. 2; with vers. 9 sq., of vii. 16, lxix. 23, and other passages. In "pour not out (פָּעַר with sharpened vowel instead of פָּעַר, Ges. § 75, rem. 8) my soul," עָרָה, Piel, is equivalent to the Hiph. הָעָרָה in Isa. liii. 12. יָדַי פָּח are as it were the hands of the seizing and capturing snare; and יִקְשֵׁוּ לִי is virtually a genitive: qui insidias tendunt mihi, since one cannot say יִקְשֵׁוּ פָּח, ponere laqueum. מִבְּמִרְיִם, nets, in ver. 10 is another hapaxlegomenon; the enallage numeri is as in lxii. 5, Isa. ii. 8, v. 23,—the singular that slips in refers what is said of the many to each individual in particular. The plural מִקְשֹׁתַי for מִקְשֵׁי, xviii. 6, lxiv. 6, also occurs only here. יָחַד is to be explained as in iv. 9: it is intended to express the coincidence of the overthrow of the enemies and the going forth free of the persecuted one. With אָנֹכִי the poet gives prominence to his simultaneous, distinct destiny: simul ego dum (עַד as in Job viii. 21, cf. i. 18) prætereo h. e. evado. The inverted position of the פִּי in cxviii. 10-12 may be compared; with cxx. 7 and 2 Kings ii. 14, however (where instead of אֶת־הַיְהוָה it is with Thenius to be read אֶת־יְהוָה), the case is different.

PSALM CXXII.

CRY SENT FORTH FROM THE PRISON TO THE BEST OF FRIENDS.

2 WITH my voice to Jahve do I cry,
With my voice to Jahve do I make supplication,

- 3 I pour forth before Him my complaint,
My trouble do I make known before Him.
4 When my spirit veils itself within me,
Thou indeed art acquainted with my way.

On the path along which I must go,
they hide a trap for me.

- 5 Look to the right and see,
no friend appeareth for me ;
All refuge hath failed me,
no one careth for my soul.
6 I cry unto Thee, Jahve,
I say : THOU art my refuge,
My portion in the land of the living.

- 7 Oh hearken to my cry of woe,
for I am very weak ;
Deliver me from my persecutors,
for they are too strong for me.

- 8 Oh lead my soul out of imprisonment, to praise Thy Name—
In me shall the righteous glory :
that Thou dealest bountifully with me.

This the last of the eight Davidic Psalms, which are derived by their inscriptions from the time of the persecution by Saul (vid. on Ps. xxxiv.), is inscribed : A Meditation by David, when he was in the cave, a Prayer. Of these eight Psalms, Ps. lii. and liv. also bear the name of Maskîl (vid. on Ps. xxxii.) ; and in this instance מַשְׁכִּיל (which occurs besides as an inscription only in xc. 1, cii. 1, Hab. iii. 1) is further added, which looks like an explanation of the word maskîl (not in use out of the range of Psalm-poetry). The article of בְּמַעְרָה, as in lvii. 1, points to the cave of Adullam (1 Sam. ch. xxii.) or the cave of Engedi (1 Sam. ch. xxiv.), which latter, starting from a narrow concealed entrance, forms such a labyrinthine maze of passages and vaults that the torches and lines of explorers have not to the present time been able to reach the extremities of it.

The Psalm does not contain any sure signs of a post-Davidic age ; still it appears throughout to be an imitation of older models, and pre-eminently by means of vers. 2 sq. (cf. lxxvii. 2 sq.) and ver. 4 (cf. lxxvii. 4) it comes into a relation of dependence to Ps. lxxvii., which is also noticeable in Ps. cxliii. (cf. ver. 5 with lxxvii. 12 sq.). The referring back of the two Psalms to David comes under one and the same judgment.

Vers. 2-4a. The emphasis of the first two lines rests upon אֶל־ה'־לֹא־נִשְׁכַּח. Forsaken by all created beings, he confides in Jahve. He turns to Him in pathetic and importunate prayer (פָּשַׁע, the parallel word being נִתְחַנֵּן, as in xxx. 9), and that not merely inwardly (Ex. xiv. 15), but with his voice (vid. on iii. 5)—for audible prayer reacts soothingly, strengtheningly, and sanctifyingly upon the praying one—he pours out before Him his trouble which distracts his thoughts (תִּשְׁכַּח אֶשְׁכַּח as in cii. 1, cf. lxii. 9, lxiv. 2, 1 Sam. i. 16), he lays open before Him everything that burdens and distresses him. Not as though He did not also know it without all this; on the contrary, when his spirit (רוּחִי as in cxliii. 4, lxxvii. 4, cf. נִשְׁכַּח־יֹנָה Jonah ii. 8 [7], Ps. cvii. 5, לִבִּי lxii. 3) within him (לִפְנֵי, see xlii. 5) is enshrouded and languishes, just this is his consolation, that Jahve is intimately acquainted with his way together with the dangers that threaten him at every step, and therefore also understands how to estimate the title (right) and meaning of his complaints. The Waw of וְנִחַמְתִּי is the same as in 1 Kings viii. 36, cf. 35. Instead of saying: then I comfort myself with the fact that, etc., he at once declares the fact with which he comforts himself. Supposing this to be the case, there is no need for any alteration of the text in order to get over that which is apparently incongruous in the relation of ver. 4b to 4a.

Vers. 4b-6. The prayer of the poet now becomes deep-breathed and excited, inasmuch as he goes more minutely into the details of his straitened situation. Everywhere, whithersoever he has to go (cf. on cxliii. 8), the snares of craftily calculating foes threaten him. Even God's all-seeing eye will not discover any one who would right faithfully and carefully interest himself in him. הִבֵּיתִי, look! is a graphic hybrid form of הִבֵּיתִי and הִבֵּיתִי, the usual and the rare imperative form; cf. הִבֵּיתִי 1 Sam. xx. 40 (cf. Jer. xvii. 18), and the same modes of writing the inf. absol. in Judg. i. 28, Amos ix. 8, and the fut. conv. in Ezek. xl. 3. מִבִּיר is, as in Ruth ii. 19, cf. 10, one who looks kindly upon any one, a considerate (cf. the phrase הַבִּיר פָּנִים) well-wisher and friend. Such an one, if he had one, would be עֹמֵד עַל-יְמִינוֹ or מְיֻמְּנוֹ (xvi. 8), for an open attack is directed to the arms-bearing right side (cix. 6), and there too the helper in battle (cx. 5) and the defender or advocate (cix. 31) takes his place in order to cover him who is imperilled (cxxi. 5). But then if God looks in that direction, He will find him, who is praying to Him, unprotected. Instead of יָמִין one would certainly have sooner expected אֲשֶׁר or כִּי as the form of introducing the condition in which he is found; but Hitzig's conjecture, הַבִּיר יָמִין, "looking for days and seeing," gives us in the place of this difficulty a confusing half-Aramaism in יָמִין = יוֹמִין in the sense of יָמִים in Dan. viii. 27, Neh. i. 4. Ewald's rendering is better: "though I look to the right hand and see (וְרָאֵה), yet no friend appears for me;" but this use of the inf. absol. with an adversative apodosis is without example. Thus therefore the pointing appears to have lighted upon the correct idea, inasmuch as it recognises here the current formula הַבִּיר וְרָאֵה, e.g. Job xxxv. 5, Lam. v. 1. The fact that David, although surrounded by a band of loyal subjects, confesses to having no true friend, is to be understood similarly to the language of Paul when he says in Phil. ii. 20: "I have no man like-minded." All human love, since sin has taken possession of humanity, is more or less selfish, and all fellowship of faith and of love imperfect; and there are circumstances in life in which these dark sides make themselves felt overpoweringly, so that a man seems to himself to be perfectly isolated and turns all the more urgently to God, who alone is able to supply the soul's want of some object to love, whose love is absolutely unselfish, and unchangeable, and unclouded, to whom the soul can confide without reserve whatever burdens it, and who not only honestly desires its good, but is able also to compass it in spite of every obstacle. Surrounded by bloodthirsty enemies, and misunderstood, or at least not thoroughly understood, by his friends, David feels himself broken off from all created beings. On this earth every kind of refuge is for him lost (the expression is like Job xi. 20). There is no one there who should ask after or care for his soul, and should right earnestly exert himself for its deliverance. Thus, then, despairing of all visible things, he cries to the Invisible One. He is his "refuge" (xci. 9) and his "portion" (xvi. 5, lxiii. 26), i.e. the share in a possession that satisfies him. To be allowed to call Him his God—this it is which suffices him and outweighs everything. For Jahve is the Living One, and he who possesses Him as his own finds himself thereby “in the land of the living” (xxvii. 13, lii. 7). He cannot die, he cannot perish.

Vers. 7, 8. His request now ascends all the more confident of being answered, and becomes calm, being well-grounded in his feebleness and the superiority of his enemies, and aiming at the glorifying of the divine Name. In ver. 7  $\text{רְבִי}$  calls to mind xvii. 1; the first confirmation, lxxix. 8, and the second, xviii. 18. But this is the only passage in the whole Psalter where the poet designates the “distress” in which he finds himself as a prison ( $\text{מִסְגֵּר}$ ). Ver. 8b brings the whole congregation of the righteous in in the praising of the divine Name. The poet therefore does not after all find himself so absolutely alone, as it might seem according to ver. 5. He is far from regarding himself as the only righteous person. He is only a member of a community or church whose destiny is interwoven with his own, and which will glory in his deliverance as its own; for “if one member is honoured, all the members rejoice with it” (1 Cor. xii. 26). We understand the differently interpreted  $\text{יִבְהִי־י$  after this “rejoicing with” (συγαλπει). The LXX., Syriac, and Aquila render: the righteous wait for me; but to wait is  $\text{בָּתַר}$  and not  $\text{הִבְהִי־י}$ . The modern versions, on the other hand, almost universally, like Luther after Felix Pratensis, render: the righteous shall surround me (flock about me), in connection with which, as Hengstenberg observes,  $\text{בִּי}$  denotes the tender sympathy they feel with him: crowding closely upon me. But there is no instance of a verb of surrounding ( $\text{אָפַף}$ ,  $\text{סָבַב}$ ,  $\text{עָוֵר}$ ,  $\text{עָטַר}$ ,  $\text{הִקִּיף}$ ) taking  $\text{בִּי}$ ; the accusative stands with  $\text{הִבְהִי־י}$  in Hab. i. 4, and  $\text{בָּתַר}$  in xxii. 13, in the signification cingere. Symmachus (although erroneously rendering: τὸ ὄνομά σου στεφανώσονται δίκαιοι), Jerome (in me coronabuntur justi), Parchon, Aben-Ezra, Coccejus, and others, rightly take  $\text{יִבְהִי־י}$  as a denominative from  $\text{בָּתַר}$ , to put on a crown or to crown (cf. Prov. xiv. 18): on account of me the righteous shall adorn themselves as with crowns, i.e. shall triumph, that Thou dealest bountifully with me (an echo of xiii. 6). According to passages like lxiv. 11, xl. 17, one might have expected  $\text{בּו}$  instead of  $\text{בִּי}$ . But the close of Ps. xxii. (vers. 23 sqq.), cf. cxi. 12 sq., shows that ו is also admissible. The very fact that David contemplates his own destiny and the destiny of his foes in a not merely ideal but foreordainedly causal connection with the general end of the two powers that stand opposed to one another in the world, belongs to the characteristic impress of the Psalms of David that come from the time of Saul's persecution.

PSALM CXLIII.

LONGING AFTER MERCY IN THE MIDST OF DARK IMPRISONMENT.

- 1 JAHVE, hear my prayer, oh give ear to my supplication ;
In Thy faithfulness answer me, in Thy righteousness.
- 2 And enter not into judgment with Thy servant,
For before Thee no man living is righteous.
- 3 For the enemy hath persecuted my soul,
He hath crushed my life to the ground,
He hath made me to lie down in terrible darkness, like those for ever dead.
- 4 And my spirit languisheth within me,
In my inward part my heart is benumbed.
- 5 I remember the days of old,
I meditate upon all Thy doing,
I muse upon the work of Thy hands.
- 6 I stretch forth my hands unto Thee,
My soul is as a thirsty land unto Thee ! (Sela.)
- 7 Answer me speedily, Jahve, my spirit yearneth :
Hide not Thy face from me,
I should become like those who go down to the pit.
- 8 Let me hear Thy loving-kindness with the dawn of the
For I trust in Thee. [morning,
Make known to me the way in which I am to go,
For unto Thee do I lift up my soul.
- 9 Deliver me from mine enemies, Jahve !
I have hidden myself with Thee.

- 10 Teach me to do Thy will,
 For Thou art my God ;
 Let Thy good Spirit lead me in an even land.
- 11 For Thy Name's sake, Jahve, quicken me again,
 In Thy righteousness be pleased to bring my soul out of trouble,
- 12 And in Thy loving-kindness cut off mine enemies,
 And destroy all the oppressors of my soul,
 For I am Thy servant.

In some codices of the LXX. this Psalm (as Euthymius also bears witness) has no inscription at all ; in others, however, it has the inscription : Ψαλμὸς τῷ Δαυεὶδ ὅτε αὐτὸν ἐδίωκεν Ἀβεσσαλὼμ ὁ υἱὸς αὐτοῦ (Cod. Sinait. ὅτε αὐτὸν ὁ υἱὸς καταδίωκει). Perhaps by the same poet as Ps. cxlii., with which it accords in vers. 4, 8, 11 (cf. cxlii. 4, 8), it is like this a modern offshoot of the Davidic Psalm-poetry, and is certainly composed as coming out of the situation of him who was persecuted by Absalom. The Psalms of this time of persecution are distinguished from those of the time of the persecution by Saul by the deep melancholy into which the mourning of the dethroned king was turned by blending with the penitential sorrowfulness of one conscious of his own guilt. On account of this fundamental feature the church has chosen Ps. cxliii. for the last of its seven Psalmi pœnitentiales. The Sela at the close of ver. 6 divides the Psalm into two halves.

Vers. 1-6. The poet pleads two motives for the answering of his prayer which are to be found in God Himself, viz. God's אֱמֻנָה, truthfulness, with which He verifies the truth of His promises, that is to say, His faithfulness to His promises ; and His צְדָקָה, righteousness, not in a recompensative legal sense, but in an evangelical sense, in accordance with His counsel, i.e. the strictness and earnestness with which He maintains the order of salvation established by His holy love, both against the ungratefully disobedient and against those who insolently despise Him. Having entered into this order of salvation, and within the sphere of it serving Jahve as his God and Lord, the poet is the servant of Jahve. And because the conduct of the God of salvation, ruled by this order of salvation, or His "righteousness" according to its fundamental manifestation, consists in His justifying the sinful man who has no righteousness that he can show corresponding to the divine holiness, but penitently confesses this disorganized relationship, and, eager for salvation, longs for it to be set right again,—because of all this, the poet prays that He would not also enter into judgment (בּוֹא בְּמִשְׁפָּט as in Job ix. 32, xxii. 4, xiv. 3) with him, that He therefore would let mercy instead of justice have its course with him. For, apart from the fact that even the holiness of the good spirits does not coincide with God's absolute holiness, and that this defect must still be very far greater in the case of spirit-corporeal man, who has earthiness as the basis of his origin,—yea, according to li. 7, man is conceived in sin, so that he is sinful from the point at which he begins to live onward,—his life is indissolubly interwoven with sin, no living man possesses a righteousness that avails before God (Job iv. 17, ix. 2, xiv. 3 sq., xv. 14, and frequently).*

With יְיָ (ver. 3) the poet introduces the ground of his petition for an answer, and more particularly for the forgiveness of his guilt. He is persecuted by deadly foes and is already nigh unto death, and that not without transgression of his own, so that consequently his deliverance depends upon the forgiveness of his sins, and will coincide with this. "The enemy persecuteth my soul" is a variation of language taken from vii. 6 (הָיָה for הָיִים, as in lxxviii. 50, and frequently in the Book of Job, more particularly in the speeches of Elihu). Ver. 3c also recalls vii. 6, but as to the words it sounds like Lam. iii. 6 (cf. lxxxviii. 7). מֵיְיָ עוֹלָם (LXX. νεκρὸς αἰῶνος) are either those for ever dead (the Syriac), after שָׁנַת עוֹלָם in Jer. li. 39, cf. בַּיַּת עוֹלָמוֹ in Eccles. xii. 5, or those dead time out of mind (Jerome), after עַם עוֹלָם in Ezek. xxvi. 20. The genitive construction admits both senses; the former, however, is rendered more natural by the consideration that הוֹשִׁיבֵנִי glances back to the beginning that seems to have no end: the poet seems to himself like one who is buried alive for ever. In consequence of this hostility which aims at his destruction, the poet feels his spirit within him, and consequently his inmost life, veil itself (the expression is the same as cxlii. 4, lxxvii. 4); and in his inward part his heart falls into a state of disturbance (שֵׁתוֹמִים, a Hithpo. peculiar to the later language), so that it almost ceases to beat. He calls to mind the former days, in which Jahve was manifestly with him; he reflects upon the great redemptive work of God, with all the deeds of might and mercy in which it has hitherto been unfolded; he meditates upon the doing (בְּמַעֲשָׂיו, Ben-Naphtali בְּמַעֲשֵׂהוּ) of His hands, i.e. the hitherto so wondrously moulded history of himself and of his people. They are echoes out of lxxvii. 4-7, 12 sq. The contrast which presents itself to the Psalmist in connection with this comparison of his present circumstances with the past opens his wounds still deeper, and makes his prayer for help all the more urgent. He stretches forth his hands to God that He may protect and assist him (vid. Hölemann, Bibelstudien, i. 150 f.). Like a parched land is his soul turned towards Him,—language in which we recognise a bending round of the primary passage lxiii. 2. Instead of אֵלֵּי it would be אֵלַי, if סָלָה (Targum לְעֵלְמִין) were not, as it always is, taken up and included in the sequence of the accents.

* Gerson observes on this point (vid. Thomasius, Dogmatik, iv. 251): I desire the righteousness of pity, which Thou bestowest in the present life, not the judgment of that righteousness which Thou wilt put into operation in the future life—the righteousness which justifies the repentant one.

Vers. 7-12. In this second half the Psalm seems still more like a reproduction of the thoughts of earlier Psalms. The prayer, “answer me speedily, hide not Thy face from me,” sounds like lxix. 18, xxvii. 9, cf. cii. 3. The expression of languishing longing, בְּלִתֵּה רִחִי, is like lxxxiv. 3. And the apodosis, “else I should become like those who go down into the pit,” agrees word for word with xxviii. 1, cf. lxxxviii. 5. In connection with the words, “cause me to hear Thy loving-kindness in the early morning,” one is reminded of the similar prayer of Moses in xc. 14, and with the confirmatory “for in Thee do I trust” of xxv. 2, and frequently. With the prayer that the night of affliction may have an end with the next morning’s dawn, and that God’s helping loving-kindness may make itself felt by him, is joined the prayer that God would be pleased to grant him to know the way that he has to go in order to escape the destruction into which they are anxious to ensnare him. This last prayer has its type in Ex. xxxiii. 13, and in the Psalter in xxv. 4 (cf. cxlii. 4); and its confirmation:

for to Thee have I lifted up my soul, viz. in a craving after salvation and in the confidence of faith, has its type in xxv. 1, lxxxvi. 4. But the words אֲלֵיךְ בְּסִיחִי, which are added to the petition "deliver me from mine enemies" (lix. 2, xxxi. 16), are peculiar, and in their expression without example. The Syriac version leaves them untranslated. The LXX. renders: ὄτι πρὸς σὲ κατέφυγον, by which the defective mode of writing נִסְתִּי is indirectly attested, instead of which the translators read נִסְתִּי (cf. נִסַּע עַל in Isa. x. 3); for elsewhere not הִסְתִּי but נִסַּע is reproduced with καταφυγεῖν. The Targum renders it מִיִּמְרֵךְ לְפָרִיק מִיָּמִינִי, Thy Logos do I account as (my) Redeemer (i.e. regard it as such), as if the Hebrew words were to be rendered: upon Thee do I reckon or count, בְּסִיחִי = בְּסִיחִי, Ex. xii. 4. Luther closely follows the LXX.: "to Thee have I fled for refuge." Jerome, however, inasmuch as he renders: ad te protectus sum, has pointed בְּסִיחִי (בְּסִיחִי). Hitzig (on the passage before us and Prov. vii. 20) reads בְּסִיחִי from בָּקַע = בָּקַע, to look ("towards Thee do I look"). But the Hebrew contains no trace of that verb; the full moon is called כֶּסֶף (כֶּסֶף), not as being "a sight or vision, species," but from its covered orb (vol. ii. 394).

The בְּסִיחִי before us only admits of two interpretations: (1) Ad (apud) te tavi = to Thee have I secretly confided it (Rashi, Aben-Ezra, Kimchi, Coccejus, J. H. Michaelis, J. D. Michaelis, Rosenmüller, Gesenius, and De Wette). But such a *constructio prægna*ns, in connection with which בָּקַע would veer round from the signification to veil (cf. כֶּסֶף מִן, Gen. xviii. 17) into its opposite, and the clause have the meaning of בְּסִיחִי אֲלֵיךְ נִלְתִּי, Jer. xi. 20, xx. 12, is hardly conceivable. (2) Ad (apud) te abscondidi, scil. me (Saadia, Calvin, Maurer, Ewald, and Hengstenberg), in favour of which we decide; for it is evident from Gen. xxxviii. 14, Deut. xxii. 12, cf. Jonah iii. 6, that בָּקַע can express the act of covering as an act that is referred to the person himself who covers, and so can obtain a reflexive meaning. Therefore: towards Thee, with Thee have I made a hiding = hidden myself, which according to the sense is equivalent to הִסְתִּי (vid. vol. i. 99), as Hupfeld (with a few MSS.) wishes to read; but Abulwalid has already remarked that the same goal is reached with בְּסִיחִי. Jahve, with whom he hides himself, is alone able to make known to him what is right and beneficial in the position in which he finds himself, in which he is exposed to temporal and spiritual dangers, and is able to teach him to carry out the recognised will of God ("the will of God, good and well-pleasing and perfect," Rom. xii. 2); and this it is for which he prays to Him in ver. 10 (רְצוֹנֶךָ; another reading, רְצוֹנֶךָ). For Jahve is indeed his God, who cannot leave him, who is assailed and tempted without and within, in error; may His good Spirit then (רוּחַ הַטּוֹבָה for הַטּוֹבָה, Neh. ix. 20*) lead him in a level country, for, as it is said in Isaiah, ch. xxvi. 7, in looking up to Jahve, "the path which the righteous man takes is smoothness; Thou makest the course of the righteous smooth." The geographical term אֶרֶץ מִישׁוֹר, Deut. iv. 43, Jer. xlviii. 21, is here applied spiritually. Here, too, reminiscences of Psalms already read meet us everywhere: cf. on "to do Thy will," xl. 9; on "for Thou art my God," xl. 6, and frequently; on "Thy good Spirit," li. 14; on "a level country," and the whole petition, xxvii. 11 (where the expression is "a level path"), together with v. 9, xxv. 4 sq., xxxi. 4. And the Psalm also further unrolls itself in such now well-known thoughts of the Psalms: For Thy Name's sake, Jahve (xxv. 11), quicken me again (lxxi. 20, and frequently); by virtue of Thy righteousness be pleased to bring my soul out of distress (cxlii. 8, xxv. 17, and frequently); and by virtue of Thy loving-kindness cut off mine enemies (liv. 7). As in ver. 1 faithfulness and righteousness, here loving-kindness (mercy) and righteousness, are coupled together; and that so that mercy is not named beside רַחֲמֶיךָ, nor righteousness beside הַצִּדִּיקִים, but the reverse (vid. on ver. 1). It is impossible that God should suffer him who has hidden himself in Him to die and perish, and should suffer his enemies on the other hand to triumph. Therefore the poet confirms * Properly, "Thy Spirit, a good one," so that טוֹבָה is an adjectival apposition; as we can also say רוּחַ הַטּוֹבָה, a spirit, the good one, although such irregularities may also be a negligent usage of the language, like the Arabic مسجد الجامع, the chief mosque, which many grammarians regard as a construct relationship, others as an ellipsis (inasmuch as they supply المكان between the words); the former is confirmed from the Hebrew, vid. Ewald, § 287, a.

the prayer for the cutting off (הַצְמִיתָ as in xciv. 23) of his enemies and the destruction (הָאֲבִיר, elsewhere אֲבִיר) of the oppressors of his soul (elsewhere צָרָרִי) with the words: for I am Thy servant.

PSALM CXLIV.

TAKING COURAGE IN GOD BEFORE A DECISIVE COMBAT.

The blessed condition of God's people.

- 1 BLESSED be Jahve my Rock,
Who traineth my hands for the fight,
My fingers for the war—
- 2 My loving-kindness and my fortress,
My high tower and my deliverer for me,
My shield and He in whom I hide,
Who subdueth my people under me !
- 3 Jahve, what is man that Thou takest knowledge of him,
The child of mortal man that Thou heedest him !
- 4 As for man, he is like a breath,
His days are as a shadow that vanisheth away.
- 5 Jahve, bow Thy heavens and come down,
Touch the mountains that they smoke.
- 6 Cast forth lightnings to scatter them ;
Send forth Thine arrows to destroy them.
- 7 Send Thy hands from above,
Rescue me and deliver me out of great waters :
Out of the hand of the sons of the strange land,
- 8 Whose mouth speaketh vanity,
And whose right hand is a right hand of falsehood.
- 9 Elohim, a new song will I sing unto Thee,
Upon a ten-stringed nabla will I play unto Thee,
- 10 Who giveth salvation unto kings,
Who rescueth David His servant from the evil sword,
- 11 Rescue and deliver me out of the hand of the sons of the strange land,

Whose mouth speaketh vanity,
Whose right hand is a right hand of falsehood.

- 12 *Because our sons are as high-reared plants in their youthful vigour,
Our daughters as adorned corners after the mode of structure of a palace ;*
- 13 *Our garners full, affording every kind of store ;
Our sheep bringing forth by thousands, multiplying by tens of thousands in our pastures ;*
- 14 *Our kine bearing without mishap and without loss,
And no lamentation in our streets.*
- 15 *Blessed is the people that is in such a case,
Blessed is the people whose God is Jahve !*

Praised be Jahve who teacheth me to fight and conquer (vers. 1, 2), me the feeble mortal, who am strong only in Him, vers. 3, 4. May Jahve then be pleased to grant a victory this time also over the boastful, lying enemies, vers. 5-8 ; so will I sing new songs of thanksgiving unto Him, the bestower of victory, vers. 9, 10. May He be pleased to deliver me out of the hand of the barbarians who envy us our prosperity, which is the result of our having Jahve as our God, vers. 11-15. A glance at this course of the thought commends the additional inscription of the LXX. (according to Origen only "in a few copies"), πρὸς τὸν Γολιάδ, and the Targumist's reference of the "evil sword" in ver. 10 to the sword of Goliath (after the example of the Midrash). Read 1 Sam. xvii. 47. The Psalm has grown out of this utterance of David. In one of the old histories, just as several of these lie at the foundation of our Books of Samuel as sources of information that are still recognisable, it was intended to express the feelings with which David entered upon the single-handed combat with Goliath and decided the victory of Israel over the Philistines. At that time he had already been anointed by Samuel, as both the narratives which have been worked up together in the First Book of Samuel assume : see 1 Sam. xvi. 13, x. 1. And this victory was for him a gigantic stride to the throne.

If אֲנִי in ver. 12*a* is taken as eo quod, so that envy is brought under consideration as a motive for the causeless (אֲנִי), lyingly treacherous rising (יָמִין שָׁקֵר) of the neighbouring peoples, then the passage vers. 12–15 can at any rate be comprehended as a part of the form of the whole. But only thus, and not otherwise; for אִשֶׁר cannot be intended as a statement of the aim or purpose: in order that they may be . . . (Jerome, De Wette, Hengstenberg, and others), since nothing but illustrative substantival clauses follow; nor do these clauses admit of an optative sense: We, whose sons, may they be . . . (Maurer); and אִשֶׁר never has an assuring sense (Vaihinger). It is also evident that we cannot, with Saadia, go back to ver. 9 for the interpretation of the אִשֶׁר (ما اسبم على ما). But that junction by means of eo quod is hazardous, since envy or ill-will (קנאה) is not previously mentioned, and יָמִין שָׁקֵר expresses a fact, and not an action. If it is further considered that nothing is wanting in the way of finish to the Psalm if it closes with ver. 11, it becomes all the more doubtful whether vers. 12–15 belonged originally to the Psalm. And yet we cannot discover any Psalm in its immediate neighbourhood to which this piece might be attached. It might the most readily, as Hitzig correctly judges, be inserted between vers. 13 and 14 of Ps. cxlvii. But the rhythm and style differ from this Psalm, and we must therefore rest satisfied with the fact that a fragment of another Psalm is here added to Ps. cxliv., which of necessity may be accounted as an integral part of it; but in spite of the fact that the whole Psalm is built up on a gigantic scale, this was not its original corner-stone, just as one does not indeed look for anything further after the refrain, together with the mention of David in vers. 10 sq., cf. xviii. 51.

Vers. 1, 2. The whole of this first strophe is an imitation of David's great song of thanksgiving, Ps. xviii. Hence the calling of Jahve "my rock," xviii. 3, 47; hence the heaping up of other appellations in ver. 2a, in which xviii. 3 is echoed; but וַיִּמְפְּלֵטֵי לִי (with Lamed deprived of the Dagesh) follows the model of 2 Sam. xxii. 2. The naming of Jahve with הַסֵּדִי is a bold abbreviation of אֱלֹהֵי הַסֵּדִי in lix. 11, 18, as also in Jonah ii. 9 [8] the God whom the idolatrous ones forsake is called הַסֵּדִים. Instead of מְלַחֵמָה the Davidic Psalms also poetically say קָרַב, lv. 22, cf. lxxviii. 9. The expression "who traineth my hands for the fight" we have already read in xviii. 35. The last words of the strophe, too, are after xviii. 48; but instead of וַיִּדְבֹר this poet says הִרְוֶה, from רָוָה = רָרָה (cf. Isa. xlv. 1; xli. 2), perhaps under the influence of וַיִּמְרֵד in 2 Sam. xxii. 48. In Ps. xviii. 48 we however read עָמִים, and the Masora has enumerated Ps. cxliv. 2, together with 2 Sam. xxii. 44, Lam. iii. 14, as the three passages in which it is written עָמִי, whilst one expects עָמִים (ג' וְסִבְרִין עָמִים), as the Targum, Syriac, and Jerome (yet not the LXX.) in fact render it. But neither from the language of the books nor from the popular dialect can it be reasonably expected that they would say עָמִי for עָמִים in such an ambiguous connection. Either, therefore, we have to read עָמִים,* or we must fall in with the strong expression, and this is possible: there is, indeed, no necessity for the subduing to be intended of the use of despotic power, it can also be intended of God-given power, and of subjugating authority. David, the anointed one, but not having as yet ascended the throne, here gives expression to the hope that Jahve will grant him deeds of victory which will compel Israel to submit to him, whether willingly or reluctantly.

Vers. 3, 4. It is evident that ver. 3 is a variation of viii. 5 with the use of other verbs. יָרַע in the sense of loving intimacy; חָשַׁב, properly to count, compute, here rationem habere. Instead of בִּי followed by the future there are consecutive futures here, and בְּרִאשֹׁנִים is aramaizingly (בְּרִאשֹׁנִישׁ) metamorphosed into בְּרִאשֹׁנִישׁ. Ver. 4 is just such another imitation, like a miniature of xxxix. 6 sq., 11, cf. lxii. 10. The figure of the shadow is the same as in cii. 12, cf. cix. 23. The connection of the third stanza with the second is still more disrupt than that of the second with the first.

Vers. 5-8. The deeds of God which Ps. xviii. celebrates are here made an object of prayer. We see from xviii. 10 that וַתִּירָר, ver. 5a, has Jahve and not the heavens as its subject; and from xviii. 15 that the suffix em in ver. 6 is meant in both instances to be referred to the enemies. The enemies are called sons of a foreign country, i.e. barbarians, as in xviii. 45 sq. The fact that Jahve stretches forth His hand out of the heavens and rescues David out of great waters, is taken verbatim from xviii. 17; and the poet has added the interpretation to the figure here. On ver. 8a cf. xii. 3, xli. 7. The combination of words "right hand of falsehood" is the same as in cix. 2. But our poet, although so great an imitator, has, however, much also that is peculiar to himself. The verb בָּרַק, "to send forth lightning;" the verb פָּצַח in the Aramæo-Arabic signification "to tear out of, rescue," which in David always only signifies "to tear open, open wide" (one's mouth), xxii. 14, lxvi. 14; and the combination "the right hand of falsehood" (like "the tongue of falsehood" in cix. 2), i.e. the hand raised for a false oath, are only found here. The figure of Omnipotence, "He toucheth the mountains and they smoke," is, as in civ. 32, taken from the mountains that smoked at the giving of the Law, Ex. xix. 18, xx. 15. The mountains, as in lxviii. 17 (cf. lxxvi. 5), point to the worldly powers. God only needs to touch these as with the tip of His finger, and the inward fire, which will consume them, at once makes itself known by the smoke, which ascends from them. The prayer for victory is followed by a vow of thanksgiving for that which is to be bestowed.

Vers. 9-11. With the exception of Ps. cviii., which is composed of two Davidic Elohim-Psalms, the Elohim in ver. 9 of this strophe is the only one in the last two Books of the Psalter, and is therefore a feeble attempt also to reproduce the Davidic Elohimic style. The "new song" calls to mind xxxiii. 3, xl. 4; and נִבְלָ עֲשׂוֹר also recalls xxxiii. 2 (which see). The fact that David mentions himself by name in his own song comes about in imitation of xviii. 51. From the eminence of thanksgiving the song finally descends again to petition, vers. 7c, 8 being repeated as a refrain. The petition develops itself afresh out of the attributes of the Being invoked (ver. 10), and these are a pledge of its fulfilment. For how could the God to whom all victorious kings owe their victory (xxxiii. 16, cf. 2 Kings v. 1, 1 Sam. xvii. 47) possibly suffer His servant David to succumb to the sword of the enemy! חֶרֶב רָעָה is the sword that is engaged in the service of evil.

Vers. 12-15. With reference to the relation of this passage to the preceding, vid. the introduction. אֲשֶׁר (it is uncertain whether this is a word belonging originally to this piece or one added by the person who appended it as a sort of clasp or rivet) signifies here quoniam, as in Judg. ix. 17, Jer. xvi. 13, and frequently. LXX. ὡν οἱ υἱοὶ (אֲשֶׁר בְּנֵיהֶם); so that the temporal prosperity of the enemies is pictured here, and in ver. 15 the spiritual possession of Israel is contrasted with it. The union becomes satisfactorily close in connection with this reading, but the reference of the description, so designedly set forth, to the enemies is improbable. In vers. 12-14 we hear a language that is altogether peculiar, without any assignable earlier model. Instead of נְטָעִים we read נְטָעִים elsewhere; "in their youth" belongs to "our sons." מְזוּיָנוּ, our garners or treasuries, from a singular מְזוּן or מְזוּ (apparently from a verb מְזָה, but contracted out of מְזוּה), is a hapaxlegomenon; the older language has the words מְזוּהָ, מְזוּרָה, אֲסָם instead of it. In like manner זָן, genus (vid. Ewald, Lehrbuch, S. 380), is a later word (found besides only in 2 Chron. xvi. 14, where זָנִים signifies et varia quidem, Syriac z'nonoje, or directly spices from species); the older language has מִין for this word. Instead of אֲלֵפִים, kine, which signifies "princes" in the older language, the older language says אֲלָפִים in viii. 8. The plena scriptio צְאוּנֵי, in which the Waw is even inaccurate, corresponds to the later period; and to this corresponds שׁ = אֲשֶׁר in ver. 15, cf. on the other hand xxxiii. 12. Also מְסַבְּלִים, laden = bearing, like the Latin forda from ferre (cf. מְעַבֵּר in Job xxi. 10), is not found elsewhere. צֶאֱן is (contrary to Gen. xxx. 39) treated as a feminine collective, and אֲלֵוִה (cf. שׁוֹר in Job xxi. 10) as a nomen epicænum. Contrary to the usage of the word, Maurer, Köster, Von Lengerke, and Fürst render it: our princes are set up (after Ezra vi. 3); also, after the mention of animals of the fold upon the meadows out-of-doors, one does not expect the mention of princes, but of horned cattle that are to be found in the stalls. זָיִת elsewhere signifies a corner, and here, according to the prevailing view, the corner-pillars; so that the elegant slender daughters are likened to tastefully sculptured Caryatides—not to sculptured projections (Luther). For (1) זָיִת does not signify a projection, but a corner, an angle, Arabic زَاوِيَة, zāwīa (in the terminology of the stone-mason the square-stone = אֲבָן פְּנֵה, in the terminology of the carpenter the square), from زَوَى, abdere (cf. e.g. the proverb: fī 'l zawājá chabôjâ, in the corners are treasures). (2) The upstanding pillar is better adapted to the comparison than the overhanging projection. But that other prevailing interpretation is also doubtful. The architecture of Syria and Palestine—the ancient, so far as it can be known to us from its remains, and the new—exhibits nothing in connection with which one would be led to think of “corner-pillars.” Nor is there any trace of that signification to be found in the Semitic זוית. On the other hand, the corners of large rooms in the houses of persons of position are ornamented with carved work even in the present day, and since this ornamentation is variegated, it may be asked whether מחטבות does here signify “sculptured,” and not rather “striped in colours, variegated,” which we prefer, since חטב (cogn. חצב) signifies nothing more than to hew firewood;* and on the other side, the signification of the Arabic حطب, to be striped, many-coloured (IV. to become green-striped, of the coloquintida), is also secured to the verb חטב side by side with that signification by Prov. vii. 16. It is therefore to be rendered: our daughters are as corners adorned in varied colours after the architecture of palaces.† The words האילנות,

* In every instance where חטב (cogn. חצב) occurs, frequently side by side with שאב מים (to draw water), it signifies to hew wood for kindling; wherefore in Arabic, in which the verb has been lost, حطب signifies firewood (in distinction from خشب, wood for building, timber), and not merely this, but fuel in the widest sense, e.g. in villages where wood is scarce, cow-dung (vid. Job, i. 377, note), and the hemp-stalk, or stalk of the maize, in the desert the بعرقة, i.e. camel-dung (which blazes up with a blue flame), and the perennial steppe-plant or its root. In relation to حطب احطب signifies lopped, pruned, robbed of its branches (of a tree), and حرب حاطب a pruning war, which devastates a country, just as the wood-gathering women of a settlement (styled العاطبات or العواط) with their small hatchet (مِحطب) lay a district covered with tall plants bare in a few days. In the villages of the Merg' the little girls who collect the dry cow-dung upon the pastures are called بنات حاطبات.—WETZSTEIN.

† Corners with variegated carved work are found even in the present to bring forth by thousands, and מֵרֶבֶב (denominative from רֶבֶבָה), which surpasses it, multiplied by tens of thousands, are freely formed. Concerning הַיְצוֹחַ, meadows, vid. on Job xviii. 17. פָּרַץ, in a martial sense a defeat, clades, e.g. in Judg. xxi. 15, is here any violent misfortune whatever, as murrain, which causes a breach, and יוצאת any head of cattle which goes off by a single misfortune. The lamentation in the streets is intended as in Jer. xiv. 2. שִׁכְבָּה is also found in Cant. v. 9; nor does the poet, however, hesitate to blend this ש with the tetragrammaton into one word. The Jod is not dageshed (cf. cxxiii. 2), because it is to be read שְׁאֲרֵי מִיְהוָה = מִיְהוָה in Gen. xviii. 14. Luther takes ver. 15*a* and 15*b* as contrasts: Blessed is the people that is in such a case, But blessed is the people whose God is the Lord. There is, however, no antithesis intended, but only an exceeding of the first declaration by the second. For to be allowed to call the God from whom every blessing comes his God, is still infinitely more than the richest abundance of material blessing. The pinnacle of Israel's good fortune consists in being, by the election of grace, the people of the Lord (xxxii. 12).

day in Damascus in every reception-room (the so-called تاجة) of respectable houses [cf. Lane, Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians, Introduction]. An architectural ornament composed with much good taste and laborious art out of wood carvings, and glittering with gold and brilliant colours, covers the upper part of the corners, of which a kā'a may have as many as sixteen, since three wings frequently abut upon the bēt el-bahāra, i.e. the square with its marble basin. This decoration, which has a most pleasing effect to the eye, is a great advantage to saloons from two to three storeys high, and is evidently designed to get rid of the darker corners above on the ceiling, comes down from the ceiling in the corners of the room for the length of six to nine feet, gradually becoming narrower as it descends. It is the broadest above, so that it there also covers the ends of the horizontal corners formed by the walls and the ceiling. If this crowning of the corners, the technical designation of which, if I remember rightly, is القرنية, kornā, might be said to go back into Biblical antiquity, the Psalmist would have used it as a simile to mark the beauty, gorgeous dress, and rich adornment of women. Perhaps, too, because they are not only modest and chaste (cf. Arabic mesturāt, a veiled woman, in opposition to memshushāt, one shone on by the sun), but also, like the children of respectable families, hidden from the eyes of strangers; for the Arabic proverb quoted above says, "treasures are hidden in the corners," and the superscription of a letter addressed to a lady of position runs: "May it kiss the hand of the protected lady and of the hidden jewel."—WETZSTEIN,

- 21 ת Let my mouth then speak the praise of Jahve,
And let all flesh bless His holy Name for ever and ever !

With Ps. cxliv. the collection draws doxologically towards its close. This Psalm, which begins in the form of the beracha (ברוך ה'), is followed by another in which benedicam (vers. 1, 2) and benedicat (ver. 21) is the favourite word. It is the only Psalm that bears the title תהלה, whose plural תהלים is become the collective name of the Psalms. In B. Berachoth 4b it is distinguished by the apophthegm: "Every one who repeats the תהלה ליה three times a day may be sure that he is a child of the world to come (בן העולם הבא)." And why? Not merely because this Psalm, as the Gemara says, אחיה באלה בית, i.e. follows the course of the alphabet (for Ps. cxix. is in fact also alphabetical, and that in an eightfold degree), and not merely because it celebrates God's care for all creatures (for this the Great Hallel also does, Ps. cxxxvi. 25), but because it unites both these prominent qualities in itself (משום דאית ביה תרתי). In fact, Ps. cxlv. 16 is a celebration of the goodness of God which embraces every living thing, with which only cxxxvi. 25, and not cxi. 5, can be compared. Valde sententiosus hic Psalmus est, says Bakius; and do we not find in this Psalm our favourite Benedicite and Oculi omnium which our children repeat before a meal? It is the ancient church's Psalm for the noon-day repast (vid. Armknecht, Die heilige Psalmodie, 1855, S. 54); ver. 15 was also used at the holy communion, hence Chrysostom says it contains τὰ ῥήματα ταῦτα, ἅπερ οἱ μεμνημένοι συνεχῶς υποψάλλουσι λέγοντες. Οἱ ὀφθαλμοὶ πάντων εἰς σὲ ἐλπίζουσιν καὶ σὺ δίδως τὴν τροφήν αὐτῶν ἐν εὐκαιρίᾳ.

Κατὰ στοιχείον, observes Theodoret, καὶ οὗτος ὁ ὕμνος σύγκειται. The Psalm is distichic, and every first line of the distich has the ordinal letter; but the distich Nun is wanting.

The Talmud (loc. cit.) is of opinion that it is because the fatal נפלה (Amos v. 2), which David, going on at once with סוֹמֵךְ ה' לְכַל־הַנְּפִלִים, skips over, begins with Nun. On the other hand, Ewald, Vaihinger, and Sommer, like Grotius, think that the Nun-strophe has been lost. The LXX. (but not Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, nor Jerome in his translation after the original text) gives such a strophe, perhaps out of a ms. (like the Dublin Cod. Kennicot, 142) in which it was supplied: Πιστὸς (נאמן as in cxi. 7) κύριος ἐν (πᾶσι) τοῖς λόγοις αὐτοῦ καὶ ὁσιος ἐν πᾶσι τοῖς ἔργοις αὐτοῦ (according with ver. 17, with the change only of two words of this distich). Hitzig is of opinion that the original Nun-strophe has been welded into Ps. cxli.; but only his clairvoyant-like historical discernment is able to amalgamate ver. 6 of this Psalm with our Ps. cxlv. We are contented to see in the omission of the Nun-strophe an example of that freedom with which the Old Testament poets are wont to handle this kind of forms. Likewise there is no reason apparent for the fact that Jeremiah has chosen in ch. ii., iii., and iv. of the Lamentations to make the Ajin-strophe follow the Pe-strophe three times, whilst in ch. i. it precedes it.

Vers. 1-7. The strains with which this hymn opens are familiar Psalm-strains. We are reminded of xxx. 2, and the likewise alphabetical song of praise and thanksgiving xxxiv. 2. The plena scriptio יְהוָה אֱלֹהֵינוּ in cxliii. 10 is repeated here. God is called "the King" as in xx. 10, xcvi. 6. The language of address "my God the King," which sounds harsh in comparison with the otherwise usual "my King and my God" (v. 3, lxxxiv. 4), purposely calls God with unrelated generality, that is to say in the most absolute manner, the King. If the poet is himself a king, the occasion for this appellation of God is all the more natural and the signification all the more pertinent. But even in the mouth of any other person it is significant. Whosoever calls God by such a name acknowledges His royal prerogative, and at the same time does homage to Him and binds himself to allegiance; and it is just this confessional act of exalting Him who in Himself is the absolutely lofty One that is here called רֹיבֵם. But how can the poet express the purpose of praising God's Name for ever? Because the praise of God is a need of his inmost nature, he has a perfect right to forget his own mortality when engaged upon this devotion to the ever-living King. Clinging adoringly to the Eternal One, he must seem to himself to be eternal; and if there is a practical proof for a life after death, it is just this ardent desire of the soul, wrought of God Himself, after the praise of the God of its life (lit. its origin) which affords it the highest, noblest delight. The idea of the silent Hades, which forces itself forward elsewhere, as in vi. 6, where the mind of the poet is beclouded by sin, is here entirely removed, inasmuch as here the mind of the poet is the undimmed mirror of the divine glory. Therefore ver. 2 also does not concede the possibility of any interruption of the praise: the poet will daily (lxviii. 20) bless God, be they days of prosperity or of sorrow, uninterruptedly in all eternity will he glorify His Name (יְהוָה לְלֵלָהּ as in lxix. 31). There is no worthier and more exhaustless object of praise (ver. 3): Jahve is great, and greatly to be praised (מְהִלָּל, taken from xlvi. 2, as in xcvi. 4, cf. xviii. 4), and of His "greatness" (cf. 1 Chron. xxix. 11, where this attribute precedes all others) there is no searching out, i.e. it is so abysmally deep that no searching can reach its bottom (as in Isa. xl. 28, Job xi. 7 sq.). It has, however, been revealed, and is being revealed continually, and is for this very reason thus celebrated in ver. 4: one generation propagates to the next the growing praise of the works that He has wrought out (עֲשֵׂה מַעֲשִׂים), and men are able to relate all manner of proofs of His victorious power which prevails over everything, and makes everything subject to itself (נִבְרָתָהּ as in xx. 7, and frequently). This historically manifest and traditional divine doxa and the facts (דְּבָרָי as in cv. 27) of the divine wonders the poet will devoutly consider. כְּבוֹד הַרְר stands in attributive relation to כְּבוֹד, as this on its part does to הוֹרֵד: Thy brilliantly glorious (kingly) majesty (cf. Jer. xxii. 18, Dan. xi. 21). The poet does not say גַּם אֲנִי, nor may we insert it, either here in ver. 5, or in ver. 6, where the same sequence of thoughts recurs, more briefly expressed. The emphasis lies on the objects. The mightiness (עֲוִוָה as in lxxviii. 4, and in Isa. xlii. 25, where it signifies violence) of His terrible acts shall pass from mouth to mouth (אָמַר with a substantival object as in xl. 11), and His mighty acts (גְּדֻלּוֹת, magnalia, as in 1 Chron. xvii. 19, 21)—according to the Keri (which is determined by the suffix of אֲמַסְפְּרִנָּה; cf., however, 2 Sam. xxii. 23, 2 Kings iii. 3, x. 26, and frequently): His greatness (נִדְבָרָה)—will he also on his part make the matter of his narrating. It is, however, not alone the awe-inspiring majesty of God which is revealed in history, but also the greatness (גִּבּוֹר) used as a substantive as in xxxi. 20, Isa. lxiii. 7, xxi. 7, whereas רַבִּים in xxxii. 10, lxxxix. 51 is an adjective placed before the noun after the manner of a numeral), i.e. the abundant measure, of His goodness and His righteousness, i.e. His acting in inviolable correspondence with His counsel and order of salvation. The memory of the transcendent goodness of God is the object of universal, overflowing acknowledgment, and the righteousness of God is the object of universal exultation (רִנָּה with the accusative as in li. 16, lix. 17). After the poet has sung the glorious self-attestation of God according to both its sides, the fiery and the light sides, he lingers by the light side, the front side of the Name of Jahve unfolded in Ex. xxxiv. 6.

Vers. 8-13. This memorable utterance of Jahve concerning Himself the writer of Ps. ciii., which is of kindred import, also interweaves into his celebration of the revelation of divine love in ver. 8. Instead of רַב־חַסֵּד the expression here, however, is וְגִדּוֹל חַסֵּד (Kerî, as in Nah. i. 3, cf. lxxxix. 29, with Makkeph-וְגִדּוֹל). The real will of God tends towards favour, which gladly giving stoops to give (חַנּוּן), and towards compassion, which interests itself on behalf of the sinner for his help and comfort (רַחוּם). Wrath is only the background of His nature, which He reluctantly and only after long waiting (אֶרְדֵּף אֲפַיִם) lets loose against those who spurn His great mercy. For His goodness embraces, as ver. 9 says, all; His tender mercies are over all His works, they hover over and encompass all His creatures. Therefore, too, all His works praise Him: they are all together loud-speaking witnesses of that sympathetic all-embracing love of His, which excludes no one who does not exclude himself; and His saints, who live in God's love, bless Him (יְבָרְכוּהוּ written as in 1 Kings xviii. 44): their mouth overflows with the declaration (אִמְרָה) of the glory of the kingdom of this loving God, and in speaking (דִּבְרָה) of the sovereign power with which He maintains and extends this kingdom. This confession they make their employ, in order that the knowledge of the mighty acts of God and the glorious majesty of His kingdom may at length become the general possession of mankind. When the poet in ver. 12 sets forth the purpose of the proclamation, he drops the form of address. God's kingdom is a kingdom of all æons, and His dominion is manifested without exception and continually in all periods or generations (בְּכָל־דְּיוֹרָךְ as in xlv. 18, Esth. ix. 28, a pleonastic strengthening of the expression בְּיָרֵךְ, xc. 1). It is the eternal circumference of the history of time, but at the same time its eternal substance, which more and more unfolds and achieves itself in the succession of the periods that mark its course. For that all things in heaven and on earth shall be gathered up together (ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι, Eph. i. 10) in the all-embracing kingdom of God in His Christ, is the goal of all history, and therefore the substance of history which is working itself out. With ver. 13 (cf. Dan. iii. 33 [iv. 3], iv. 31 [34], according to Hitzig the primary passages) another paragraph is brought to a close.

Vers. 14-21. The poet now celebrates in detail the deeds of the gracious King. The words with לְ are pure datives, cf. the accusative expression in cxlvi. 8. He in person is the support which holds fast the falling ones (נֹשֵׁאֵם, here not the fallen ones, see xxviii. 1) in the midst of falling (Nicephorus: τοὺς καταπεσεῖν μέλλοντας ἐδραιοῖ, ὥστε μὴ καταπεσεῖν), and the stay by which those who are bowed together raise themselves. He is the Provider for all beings, the Father of the house, to whom in the great house of the world the eyes (עֵינַי with the second é toneless, Ew. § 100, b) of all beings, endowed with reason and irrational, are directed with calm confidence (Matt. vi. 26), and who gives them their food in its, i.e. in due season. The language of civ. 27 is very similar, and it proceeds here, too, as there in ver. 28 (cf. Sir. xl. 14). He opens His hand, which is ever full, much as a man who feeds the doves in his court does, and gives נֵצַח, pleasure, i.e. that which is good, which is the fulfilling of their desire, in sufficient fulness to all living things (and therefore those in need of support for the body and the life). Thus it is to be interpreted, according to Deut. xxxiii. 23 (after which here in the LXX. the reading varies between εὐδοκίας and εὐλογίας), cf. Acts xiv. 17, ἐμπιπλῶν τροφῆς καὶ εὐφροσύνης τὰς καρδίας ἡμῶν. עֵינַי is construed with a dative and accusative of the object instead of with two accusatives of the object (Ges. § 139. 1, 2). The usage of the language is unacquainted with נֵצַח as an adverb in the sense of "willingly" (Hitzig), which would rather be ברצונך. In all the ways that Jahve takes in His historical rule He is "righteous," i.e. He keeps strictly to the rule (norm) of His holy love; and in all His works which He accomplishes in the course of history He is merciful (חַסִּיד), i.e. He practises mercy (חַסֵּד, see xii. 2); for during the present time of mercy the primary essence of His active manifestation is free preventing mercy, condescending love. True, He remains at a distance from the hypocrites, just as their heart remains far from Him (Isa. xxix. 13); but as for the rest, with impartial equality He is nigh (קָרוֹב as in xxxiv. 19) to all who call upon Him בְּאַמְתָּה, in firmness, certainty, truth, i.e. so that the prayer comes from their heart and is holy fervour (cf. Isa. x. 20, xlvi. 1). What is meant is true and real prayer in opposition to the νεκρὸν ἔργον, as is also meant in the main in John iv. 23 sq. To such true praying ones Jahve is present, viz. in mercy (for in respect of His power He is everywhere); He makes the desire of those who fear Him a reality, their will being also His; and He grants them the salvation (σωτηρία) prayed for. Those who are called in ver. 19 those who fear Him, are called in ver. 20 those who love Him. Fear and love of God belong inseparably together; for fear without love is an unfree, servile disposition, and love without fear, bold-faced familiarity: the one dishonours the all-gracious One, and the other the all-exalted One. But all who love and fear Him He preserves, and on the other hand exterminates all wanton sinners. Having reached the Tav, the hymn of praise, which has traversed all the elements of the language, is at an end. The poet does not, however, close without saying that praising God shall be his everlasting employment (פָּי יְדָבָר with Olewejored, the Mahpach or rather Jethib sign of which above represents the Makkeph), and without wishing that all flesh, i.e. all men, who are σὰρξ καὶ αἷμα, בְּשָׂר וָדָם, may bless God's holy Name to all eternity. The realization of this wish is the final goal of history. It will then have reached ver. 43 of the great song in Deut. ch. xxxii.—Jahve one and His Name one (Zech. xiv. 9), Israel praising God ὑπὲρ ἀληθείας, and the Gentiles ὑπὲρ ἐλέους (Rom. xv. 8 sq.).

PSALM CXLVI.

HALLELUJAH TO GOD THE ONE TRUE HELPER.

HALLELUJAH.

- 1 PRAISE, O my soul, Jahve!
- 2 I will praise Jahve as long as I live,
I will harp unto my God as long as I have any being.
- 3 Trust not in princes,
In the son of man, who is not capable of help!
- 4 If his breath goeth forth, he returneth to his clod—
In that day his devices perish.

- 5 Happy is he whose help is the God of Jacob,
Whose confidence is in Jahve his God,
- 6 The Creator of heaven and earth,
Of the sea and all that is therein—
Who keepeth truth for ever,
- 7 Obtaining judgment for the oppressed,
Giving bread to the hungry.

- Jahve looseth those who are bound,
- 8 Jahve maketh the blind to see,
Jahve raiseth up those who are bowed down,
Jahve loveth the righteous,
- 9 Jahve preserveth the strangers,
He helpeth up the orphan and widow,
And the way of the wicked He turneth down.
- 10 Jahve reigneth as King for ever,
Thy God, O Zion, unto all generations—
Hallelujah.

The Psalter now draws to a close with five Hallelujah Psalms. This first closing Hallelujah has many points of coincidence with the foregoing alphabetical hymn (compare אֱהַיְיָ֙לֵלָהּ in ver. 2 with cxlv. 2; שִׁבְרוּ in ver. 5 with cxlv. 15; “who giveth bread to the hungry” in ver. 7 with cxlv. 15 sq.; “who maketh the blind to see” in ver. 8 with cxlv. 14; “Jahve reigneth, etc.,” in ver. 10 with cxlv. 13)—the same range of thought betrays one author. In the LXX. Ps. cxlvi.-cxlviii. (according to its enumeration four Psalms, viz. cxlv.-cxlviii., Ps. cxlvii. being split up into two) have the inscription Ἀλληλούια. Ἀγγαίου καὶ Ζαχαρίου, which is repeated four times. These Psalms appear to have formed a separate Hallel, which is referred back to these prophets, in the old liturgy of the second Temple. Later on they became, together with Ps. cxlix., cl., an integral part of the daily morning prayer, and in fact of the פסוקי דזמרה, i.e. of the mosaic-work of Psalms and other poetical pieces that was incorporated in the morning prayer, and are called even in Shabbath 118*b* Hallel,* but expressly distinguished from the Hallel to be recited at the Passover and other feasts, which is called “the Egyptian Hallel.” In distinction from this, Krochmal calls these five Psalms the Greek Hallel. But there is nothing to oblige us to come down beyond the time of Ezra and Nehemiah. The agreement between 1 Macc. ii. 63 (ἔστρεψεν εἰς τὸν χοῦν αὐτοῦ, καὶ ὁ διαλογισμὸς αὐτοῦ ἀπόλετο) and ver. 4 of our Psalm, which Hitzig has turned to good account, does not decide anything concerning the age of the Psalm, but only shows that it was in existence at the time of the author of the First Book of Maccabees,—a point in favour of which we were not in need of any proof. But there was just as much ground for dissuading against putting confidence in princes in the time of the Persians as in that of the Grecian domination.

Vers. 1-4. Instead of “bless,” as in ciii. 1, civ. 1, the poet of this Psalm says “praise.” When he attunes his soul to the praise of God, he puts himself personally into this mood of mind, and therefore goes on to say “I will praise.” He will, however, not only praise God in the song which he is beginning, but בְּתִי (vid. on lxiii. 5), filling up his life with it, or בְּעוֹרִי (prop. “in my yet-being,” with the suffix of the noun, whereas עוֹרִי with the verbal suffix is “I still am”), so that his continued life is also a constant continued praising, viz. (and this is in the mind of the poet here, even at the commencement of the Psalm) of the God and King who, as being the Almighty, Eternal, and unchangeably Faithful One, is the true ground of confidence. The warning against putting trust in princes calls to mind cxviii. 8 sq. The clause: the son of man, who has no help that he could afford, is to be understood according to lx. 13. The following אֲדַמְתּוֹ shows that the poet by the expression בְּן־אָדָם combines the thoughts of Gen. ii. 7 and iii. 19. If his breath goes forth, he says, basing the untrustworthiness and feebleness of the son of Adam upon the inevitable final destiny of the son of Adam taken out of the ground, then he returns to his earth, i.e. the earth of his first beginning; cf. the more exact expression אֶל־עֵפָרָם, after which the εἰς τὴν γῆν αὐτοῦ of the LXX. is exchanged for εἰς τὸν χοῦν αὐτοῦ in 1 Macc. ii. 63. On the hypothetical relation of the first future clause to the second, cf. cxxxix. 8-10, 18; Ew. § 357, b. In that day, the inevitable day of death, the projects or plans of man are at once and for ever at an end. The אַפ. λεγ. עֲשֵׂתָנָה describes these with the collateral notion of subtleness and magnitude.

Vers. 5-7*a*. Man's help is of no avail; blessed is he (this is the last of the twenty-five אֲשֶׁר of the Psalter), on the contrary, who has the God of Jacob (שֵׁאל like שִׁיחָה in cxliv. 15) as Him in whom is his succour (בְּעֵזְרוֹ with Beth essentia, vid. on xxxv. 2),—he, whose confidence (שִׁבְרָא as in cxix. 116) rests on Jahve, whom he can by faith call his God. Men often are not able to give help although they might be willing to do so: He, however, is the Almighty, the Creator of the heavens, the earth, and the sea, and of all living things that fill these three (cf. Neh. ix. 6). Men easily change their mind and do not keep their word: He, however, is He who keepeth truth or faithfulness, inasmuch as He unchangeably adheres to the fulfilling of His promises. שִׁמְרָא is in form equivalent substantially to שִׁמְרָא הַסֵּד and שִׁמְרָא הַבְּרִית. And that which He is able to do as being the Almighty, and cannot as being the Truthful One leave undone, is also really His mode of active manifestation made evident in practical proofs: He obtains right for the oppressed, gives bread to the hungry, and consequently proves Himself to be the succour of those who suffer wrong without doing wrong, and as the provider for those who look for their daily bread from His gracious hand. With הַשִּׁמְרָא, the only determinate participle, the faithfulness of God

His promises is made especially prominent.

Vers. 7b-10. The five lines beginning with Jahve belong together. Each consists of three words, which in the main is also the favourite measure of the lines in the Book of Job. The expression is as brief as possible. יהִיִר is transferred from the yoke and chains to the person himself who is bound, and עֵינָיו is transferred from the eyes of the blind to the person himself. The five lines celebrate the God of the five-divided Tōra, which furnishes abundant examples for these celebrations, and is directed with most considerate tenderness towards the strangers, orphans, and widows in particular. The orphan and the widow, says the sixth line, doth He recover, strengthen (with reference to עֲרִיר see xx. 9, xxxi. 12). Valde gratus mihi est hic Psalmus, Bakius observes, ob Trifolium illud Dei: Advenas, Pupillos, et Viduas, versu uno luculentissime depictum, id quod in toto Psalterio nullibi fit. Whilst Jahve, however, makes the manifold sorrows of His saints to have a blessed issue, He bends (עֲוִת) the way of the wicked, so that it leads into error and ends in the abyss (i. 6). This judicial manifestation of Jahve has only one line devoted to it. For He rules in love and in wrath, but delights most of all to rule in love. Jahve is, however, the God of Zion. The eternal duration of His kingdom is also the guarantee for its future glorious completion, for the victory of love. Hallelujah!

PSALM CXLVII.

HALLELUJAH TO THE SUSTAINER OF ALL THINGS, THE RESTORER OF JERUSALEM

- 1 HALLELUJAH,
For it is good to celebrate our God in song,
For it is lovely, comely is a hymn of praise.
- 2 The builder up of Jerusalem is Jahve,
The outcasts of Israel He gathereth together;
- 3 He healeth the broken in heart,
And bindeth up their wounds;
- 4 Telling the number of the stars,
He calleth them all by names.
- 5 Great is our Lord and rich in strength,
To His understanding there is no number.

- 6 Jahve helpeth up the afflicted,
He casteth the wicked down to the ground.
- 7 Sing unto Jahve a thanksgiving song,
Play unto our God upon the cithern !
- 8 Who covereth the heaven with clouds,
Who prepareth rain for the earth,
Who maketh the mountains shoot forth grass ;
- 9 Giving to the beast its food,
To the young ravens which call.
- 10 Not in the strength of the horse doth He delight,
Not in the legs of a man doth He take pleasure—
- 11 Jahve hath pleasure in those who fear Him,
In those who hope in His mercy.
- 12 Celebrate, O Jerusalem, Jahve,
Praise Thy God, O Zion !
- 13 For He hath made the bolts of thy gates fast,
He hath blessed thy children in the midst of thee—
- 14 He it is who giveth thy border peace,
He satisfieth thee with the fat of wheat ;
- 15 Who sendeth forth His commandment to the earth,
His word runneth very swiftly ;
- 16 Who giveth snow like wool,
He scattereth hoar-frost like ashes,
- 17 He casteth down His ice like morsels—
Before His cold, who can stand ? !
- 18 He sendeth forth His word and causeth everything to melt,
He causeth His wind to blow, forthwith the waters flow.
- 19 He made known His word unto Jacob,
His statutes and His judgments unto Israel.
- 20 He hath not dealt so with any nation ;
And as for His judgments—they do not know them,
Hallelujah.

It is the tone of the restoration-period of Ezra and Nehemiah that meets us sounding forth out of this and the two following Psalms, even more distinctly and recognisably than out of the nearly related preceding Psalm (cf. ver. 6 with cxlvi. 9). In Ps. cxlvii. thanksgiving is rendered to God for the restoration of Jerusalem, which is now once more a city with walls and gates; in Ps. cxlviii. for the restoration of the national independence; and in Ps. cxlix. for the restoration of the capacity of joyously and triumphantly defending themselves to the people so long rendered defenceless and so ignominiously enslaved.

In the seventh year of Artachshasta (Artaxerxes I. Longimanus) Ezra the priest entered Jerusalem, after a journey of five months, with about two thousand exiles, mostly out of the families of the Levites (458 B.C.). In the twentieth year of this same clement king, that is to say, thirteen years later (445 B.C.), came Nehemiah, his cup-bearer, in the capacity of a Tirshâtha (vid. Isaiah, vol. i. 2). Whilst Ezra did everything for introducing the Mosaic Law again into the mind and commonwealth of the nation, Nehemiah furthered the building of the city, and more particularly of the walls and gates. We hear from his own mouth, in ch. ii.–vii. of the Book that is extracted from his memoirs, how indefatigably and cautiously he laboured to accomplish this work. Ch. xii. 27–45 is closely connected with these notes of Nehemiah's own hand. After having been again in the meanwhile in Susa, and there neutralized the slanderous reports that had reached the court of Persia, he appointed, at his second stay in Jerusalem, a feast in dedication of the walls. The Levite musicians, who had settled down for the most part round about Jerusalem, were summoned to appear in Jerusalem. Then the priests and Levites were purified; and they purified the people, the gates, and the walls, the bones of the dead (as we must with Herzfeld picture this to ourselves) being taken out of all the tombs within the city and buried before the city; and then came that sprinkling, according to the Law, with the sacred lye of the red heifer, which is said (Para iii. 5) to have been introduced again by Ezra for the first time after the Exile. Next the princes of Judah, the priests, and Levite musicians were placed in the west of the city in two great choirs (חֲוֹלָה*) and processions

* The word has been so understood by Menahem, Juda ben Koreish, and Abulwalid; whereas Herzfeld is thinking of becatombs for a thank-offering, which might have formed the beginning of both festive processions.

(תהלכת). The one festal choir, which was led by the one half of the princes, and among the priests of which Ezra went on in front, marched round the right half of the city, and the other round the left, whilst the people looked down from the walls and towers. The two processions met on the east side of the city and drew up in the Temple, where the festive sacrifices were offered amidst music and shouts of joy.

The supposition that Ps. cxlvii.-cl. were all sung at this dedication of the walls under Nehemiah (Hengstenberg) cannot be supported; but as regards Ps. cxlvii., the composition of which in the time of Nehemiah is acknowledged by the most diverse parties (Keil, Ewald, Dillmann, Zunz), the reference to the Feast of the Dedication of the walls is very probable. The Psalm falls into two parts, vers. 1-11, 12-20, which exhibit a progression both in respect of the building of the walls (vers. 2, 13), and in respect of the circumstances of the weather, from which the poet takes occasion to sing the praise of God (vers. 8 sq., 16-18). It is a double Psalm, the first part of which seems to have been composed, as Hitzig suggests, on the appearing of the November rain, and the second in the midst of the rainy part of the winter, when the mild spring breezes and a thaw were already in prospect.

Vers. 1-6. The Hallelujah, as in cxxxv. 3, is based upon the fact, that to sing of our God, or to celebrate our God in song (זמר with an accusative of the object, as in xxx. 13, and frequently), is a discharge of duty that reacts healthfully and beneficially upon ourselves: "comely is a hymn of praise" (taken from xxxiii. 1), both in respect of the worthiness of God to be praised, and of the gratitude that is due to Him. Instead of זמר or לזמר, xcii. 2, the expression is זמרה, a form of the infin. Piel, which at least can still be proved to be possible by לזרה in Lev. xxvi. 18. The two זר are co-ordinate, and זר-זר no more refers to God here than in cxxxv. 3, as Hitzig supposes when he alters ver. 1 so that it reads: "Praise ye Jah because He is good, play unto our God because He is lovely." Ps. xcii. 2 shows that זר-טוב can refer to God; but זר-זר said of God is contrary to the custom and spirit of the Old Testament, whereas טוב and זר-טוב are also in cxxxiii. 1 neuter predicates of a subject that is set forth in the infinitive form. In ver. 2 the praise begins, and at the same time the confirmation of the delightful duty. Jahve is the builder up of Jerusalem, He brings together (בָּנֵה as in Ezekiel, the later word for בָּנֵה and קִבְּץ) the outcasts of Israel (as in Isa. xi. 12, lvi. 8); the building of Jerusalem is therefore intended of the rebuilding up, and to the dispersion of Israel corresponds the holy city laid in ruins. Jahve healeth the heart-broken, as He has shown in the case of the exiles, and bindeth up their pains (xvi. 4), i.e. smarting wounds; רָפָא, which is here followed by הַבֵּיט, also takes to itself a dative object in other instances, both in an active and (Isa. vi. 10) an impersonal application; but for שְׁבוּרֵי לֵב the older language says לֵב נִשְׁבְּרֵי לֵב, xxxiv. 19, Isa. lxi. 1. The connection of the thoughts, which the poet now brings to the stars, becomes clear from the primary passage, Isa. xl. 26, cf. 27. To be acquainted with human woe and to relieve it is an easy and small matter to Him who allots a number to the stars, that are to man innumerable (Gen. xv. 5), i.e. who has called them into being by His creative power in whatever number He has pleased, and yet a number known to Him (מִנְיָה, the part. præs., which occurs frequently in descriptions of the Creator), and calls to them all names, i.e. names them all by names which are the expression of their true nature, which is well known to Him, the Creator. What Isaiah says (ch. xl. 26) with the words, "because of the greatness of might, and as being strong in power," and (ver. 28) "His understanding is unsearchable," is here asserted in ver. 5 (cf. cxlv. 3): great is our Lord, and capable of much (as in Job xxxvii. 23, שְׁנֵינָה כֹחַ), and to His understanding there is no number, i.e. in its depth and fulness it cannot be defined by any number. What a comfort for the church as it traverses its ways, that are often so labyrinthine and entangled! Its Lord is the Omniscient as well as the Almighty One. Its history, like the universe, is a work of God's infinitely profound and rich understanding. It is a mirror of gracious love and righteous anger. The patient sufferers (עֲנִיִּים) He strengthens (מְעוֹרֵר as in cxlvi. 9); malevolent sinners (רָשָׁעִים), on the other hand, He casts down to the earth (עָרִי-אָרָץ, cf. Isa. xxvi. 5), casting deep down to the ground those who exalt themselves to the skies.

Vers. 7-11. With ver. 7 the song takes a new flight.  $\text{לְעֹנֵה לְעֹנֵה}$  signifies to strike up or sing in honour of any one, Num. xxi. 27, Isa. xxvii. 2. The object of the action is conceived of in  $\text{בְּתוֹרֵהָ}$  as the medium of it (cf. e.g. Job xvi. 4). The participles in vers. 8 sq. are attributive clauses that are attached in a free manner to  $\text{לְאֵלֵינוּ}$ .  $\text{לְאֵלֵינוּ}$  signifies to prepare, procure, as e.g. in Job xxxviii. 41—a passage which the psalmist has had in his mind in connection with ver. 9.  $\text{מַצְמִיחַ}$ , as being the causative of a verb. crescendi, is construed with a double accusative: “making mountains (whither human agriculture does not reach) to bring forth grass;” and the advance to the thought that God gives to the cattle the bread that they need is occasioned by the “He causeth grass to grow for the cattle” of the model passage civ. 14, just as the only hinting  $\text{אֲשֶׁר יִקְרָאֵי}$ , which is said of the young of the raven (which are forsaken and cast off by their mothers very early), is explained from  $\text{יִלְדֵיוֹ אֶל־אֵל יִשְׁעוּ}$  in Job loc. cit. The verb  $\text{קָרָא}$ , κράζειν (cf. κράζειν), is still more expressive for the cry of the raven, κόραξ, Sanscrit kārava, than that  $\text{שָׁעַ$ ; κοράττειν and κορακέυεσθαι signify directly to implore incessantly, without taking any refusal. Towards Him, the gracious Sustainer of all beings, are the ravens croaking for their food pointed (cf. Luke xii. 24, “Consider the ravens”), just like the earth that thirsts for rain. He is the all-conditioning One. Man, who is able to know that which the irrational creature unconsciously acknowledges, is in the feeling of his dependence to trust in Him and not in himself. In all those things to which the God-estranged self-confidence of man so readily clings, God has no delight ( $\text{יְהִי־פֶשַׁע}$ , pausal form like  $\text{יְהִי־פֶשַׁע}$ ) and no pleasure, neither in the strength of the horse, whose rider imagines himself invincible, and, if he is obliged to flee, that he cannot be overtaken, nor in the legs of a man, upon which he imagines himself so firm that he cannot be thrown down, and which, when he is pursued, will presumptively carry him far enough away into safety.  $\text{שָׂקִי}$ , ساق, is the leg from the knee to the foot, from  $\text{سَاق}$ , root  $\text{سَق}$ , to drive, urge forward, more particularly to urge on to a gallop (like crus, according to Pott, from the root car, to go). What is meant here is, not that the strength of the horse and muscular power are of no avail when God wills to destroy a man (xxxiii. 16 sq., Amos ii. 14.

sq.), but only that God has no pleasure in the warrior's horse and in athletic strength. Those who fear Him, i.e. with a knowledge of the impotency of all power possessed by the creature in itself, and in humble trust feel themselves dependent upon His omnipotence—these are they in whom He takes pleasure (הִצִּיף with the accusative), those who, renouncing all carnal defiance and self-confident self-working, hope in His mercy.

Vers. 12-20. In the LXX. this strophe is a Psalm (Lauda Jerusalem) of itself. The call goes forth to the church again on the soil of the land of promise assembled round about Jerusalem. The holy city has again risen out of its ruins; it now once more has gates which can stand open in the broad daylight, and can be closed and bolted when the darkness comes on for the security of the municipality that is only just growing into power (Neh. vii. 1-4). The blessing of God again rests upon the children of the sacred metropolis. Its territory, which has experienced all the sufferings of war, and formerly resounded with the tumult of arms and cries of woe and destruction, God has now, from being an arena of conflict, made into peace (the accusative of the effect, and therefore different from Isa. lx. 17); and since the land can now again be cultivated in peace, the ancient promise (lxxxix. 17) is fulfilled, that God would feed His people, if they would only obey Him, with the fat of wheat. The God of Israel is the almighty Governor of nature. It is He who sends His fiat (וַיִּצְוֶה after the manner of the וַיִּצְוֶה of the history of creation, cf. xxxiii. 9) earthwards (וְצִוְיָהּ, the accusative of the direction). The word is His messenger (vid. on cvii. 20), עֲרִמְהֶרָה, i.e. it runs as swiftly as possible, viz. in order to execute the errand on which it is sent. He it is who sends down snow-flakes like flocks of wool, so that the fields are covered with snow as with a white-woollen warming covering.* He scatters hoar-frost (קִפּוֹר from קָפַר, to cover over) about like ashes, so that trees, roofs, etc., are crusted over with the fine frozen dew or mist as though they were powdered with ashes that the wind had blown about. Another time He casts His ice * (קָרָה from קָרָה; or according to another reading, קָרָהוּ from קָרָה) down like morsels, fragments, כְּפִתִּים, viz. as hail-stones, or as sleet. The question: before His cold—who can stand? is formed as in Nah. i. 6, cf. cxxx. 3. It further comes to pass that God sends forth His word and causes them (snow, hoarfrost, and ice) to melt away: He makes His thawing wind blow, waters flow; i.e. as soon as the one comes about, the other also takes place forthwith. This God now, who rules all things by His word and moulds all things according to His will, is the God of the revelation pertaining to the history of salvation, which is come to Israel, and as the bearer of which Israel takes the place of honour among the nations, Deut. iv. 7 sq., 32–34. Since the poet says מְבַיֵּד and not הַבַּיֵּד, he is thinking not only of the Tôra, but also of prophecy as the continuous self-attestation of God, the Lawgiver. The Keri קִבְּרֵי, occasioned by the plurals of the parallel member of the verse, gives an unlimited indistinct idea. We must keep to קִבְּרֵי, with the LXX., Aquila, Theodotion, the Quinta, Sexta, and Jerome. The word, which is the medium of God's cosmical rule, is gone forth as a word of salvation to Israel, and, unfolding itself in statutes and judgments, has raised Israel to a legal state founded upon a positive divine law or judgment such as no Gentile nation possesses. The Hallelujah does not exult over the fact that these other nations are not acquainted with any such positive divine law, but (cf. Deut. iv. 7 sq., Baruch iv. 4) over the fact that Israel is put into possession of such a law. It is frequently attested elsewhere that this possession of Israel is only meant to be a means of making salvation a common property of the world at large.

PSALM CXLVIII.

HALLELUJAH OF ALL HEAVENLY AND EARTHLY BEINGS.

HALLELUJAH.

1 PRAISE ye Jahve from the heavens,
Praise ye Him in the heights.

---

* LXX. (Italic, Vulgate) κρύσταλλον, i.e. ice, from the root κρυ, to freeze, to congeal (Jerome glaciem). Quid est crystallum? asks Augustine, and replies: Nix est glacie durata per multos annos ita ut a sole vel igne acile dissolvi non possit.

- 2 Praise ye Him, all His angels,
Praise ye Him, all His host.
- 3 Praise ye Him, sun and moon,
Praise Him all ye stars of light.
- 4 Praise Him ye heavens of heavens,
And ye waters that are above the heavens.
- 5 Let them praise the Name of Jahve,
For HE commanded and they were created,
- 6 And He set them there for ever and ever ;
He gave a law, and not one transgresseth it.
- 7 Praise ye Jahve from the earth,
Sea-monsters and all deeps ;
- 8 Fire and hail, snow and vapour,
Stormy wind fulfilling His word ;
- 9 Ye mountains and all hills,
Fruit-trees and all cedars ;
- 10 Ye wild beasts and all cattle,
Creeping things and winged birds ;
- 11 Kings of the earth and all tribes,
Princes and all judges of the earth ;
- 12 Young men and also maidens,
Old men together with youths—
- 13 Let them praise the Name of Jahve,
For His Name is highly exalted, He alone,
His glory is above earth and heaven.
- 14 And He hath raised a horn for His people,
For a praise for all His saints,
For the children of Israel, for the people near unto Him
Hallelujah.

After the Psalmist in the foregoing Hallelujah has made the gracious self-attestation of Jahve in the case of the people of revelation, in connection with the general government of the almighty and all-benevolent One in the world, the theme of his praise, he calls upon all creatures in heaven and on earth, and more especially mankind of all peoples and classes and races and ages, to join in concert in praise of the Name of Jahve, and that on the ground of the might and honour which He has bestowed upon His people, i.e. has bestowed upon them once more now when they are gathered together again out of exile and Jerusalem has risen again out of the ruins of its overthrow. The hymn of the three in the fiery furnace, which has been interpolated in ch. iii. of the Book of Daniel in the LXX., is for the most part an imitation of this Psalm. In the language of the liturgy this Psalm has the special name of Laudes among the twenty Psalmi alleluaticci, and all the three Psalms cxlviii.-cl. which close the Psalter are called αἶνοι, Syriac shabclûh (praise ye Him).

In this Psalm the loftiest consciousness of faith is united with the grandest contemplation of the world. The church appears here as the choir-leader of the universe. It knows that its experiences have a central and universal significance for the whole life of creation; that the loving-kindness which has fallen to its lot is worthy to excite joy among all beings in heaven and on earth. And it calls not only upon everything in heaven and on earth that stands in fellowship of thought, of word, and of freedom with it to praise God, but also the sun, moon, and stars, water, earth, fire, and air, mountains, trees, and beasts, yea even such natural phenomena as hail, snow, and mist. How is this to be explained? The easiest way of explaining is to say that it is a figure of speech (Hupfeld); but this explanation explains nothing. Does the invitation in the exuberance of feeling, without any clearness of conception, here overstep the boundary of that which is possible? Or does the poet, when he calls upon these lifeless and unconscious things to praise God, mean that we are to praise God on their behalf—ἀφορᾶν εἰς ταῦτα, as Theodoret says, καὶ τοῦ Θεοῦ τὴν σοφίαν καταμανθάνειν καὶ διὰ πάντων αὐτῷ πλέκειν τὴν ὑμνωδίαν? Or does the "praise ye" in its reference to these things of nature proceed on the assumption that they praise God when they redound to the praise of God, and find its justification in the fact that the human will enters into this matter of fact which relates to things, and is devoid of any will, and seizes it and drags it into the concert of angels and men? All these explanations are unsatisfactory. The call to praise proceeds rather from the wish that all creatures, by becoming after their own manner an echo and reflection of the divine glory, may participate in the joy at the glory which God has bestowed upon His people after their deep humiliation. This wish, however, after all rests upon the great truth, that the way through suffering to glory which the church is traversing, has not only the glorifying of God in itself, but by means of this glorifying, the glorifying of God in all creatures and by all creatures, too, as its final aim, and that these, finally transformed (glorified) in the likeness of transformed (glorified) humanity, will become the bright mirror of the divine doxa and an embodied hymn of a thousand voices. The calls also in Isa. xlv. 23, xlix. 13, cf. lii. 9, and the descriptions in Isa. xxxv. 1 sq., xli. 19, lv. 12 sq., proceed from the view to which Paul gives clear expression from the stand-point of the New Testament in Rom. viii. 18 sqq.

Vers. 1-6. The call does not rise step by step from below upwards, but begins forthwith from above in the highest and outermost spheres of creation. The place whence, before all others, the praise is to resound is the heavens; it is to resound in the heights, viz. the heights of heaven (Job xvi. 19, xxv. 2, xxxi. 2). The מן might, it is true, also denote the birth or origin: ye of the heavens, i.e. ye celestial beings (cf. lxviii. 27), but the parallel בַּמְרוֹמִים renders the immediate construction with הַלְלוּ more natural. Vers. 2-4 tell who are to praise Jahve there: first of all, all His angels, the messengers of the Ruler of the world—all His host, i.e. angels and stars, for יְצָאֵי (Chethîb) or כְּרִי (Kerî as in ciii. 21) is the name of the heavenly host armed with light which God Tsebaoth commands (vid. on Gen. ii. 1),—a name including both stars (e.g. in Deut. iv. 19) and angels (e.g. in Josh. v. 14 sq., 1 Kings xxii. 19); angels and stars are also united in the Scriptures in other instances (e.g. Job xxxviii. 7). When the psalmist calls upon these beings of light to praise Jahve, he does not merely express his delight in that which they do under any circumstances (Hengstenberg), but comprehends the heavenly world with the earthly, the church above with the church here below (vid. on Ps. xxix., ciii.), and gives a special turn to the praise of the former, making it into an echo of the praise of the latter, and blending both harmoniously together. The heavens of heavens are, as in Deut. x. 14, 1 Kings viii. 27, Sir. xvi. 18, and frequently, those which lie beyond the heavens of the earth which were created on the fourth day, therefore they are the outermost and highest spheres. The waters which are above the heavens are, according to Hupfeld, "a product of the fancy, like the upper heavens and the whole of the inhabitants of heaven." But if in general the other world is not a notion to which there is no corresponding entity, this notion may also have things for its substance which lie beyond our knowledge of nature. The Scriptures, from the first page to the last, acknowledge the existence of celestial waters, to which the rain-waters stand in the relation as it were of a finger-post pointing upwards (see Gen. i. 7). All these beings belonging to the superterrestrial world are to praise the Name of Jahve, for HE, the God of Israel, it is by whose fiat (צִוָּה, like אָמַר in xxxiii. 9*) the heavens and all their host are created (xxxiii. 6). He has set them, which did not previously exist, up (הִעֲמִיר as e.g. in Neh. vi. 7, the causative to עָמַר in xxxiii. 9, cf. cxix. 91), and that for ever and ever (cxi. 8), i.e. in order for ever to maintain the position in the whole of creation which He has assigned to them. He hath given a law (חָק) by which its distinctive characteristic is stamped upon each of these heavenly beings, and a fixed bound is set to the nature and activity of each in its mutual relation to all, and not one transgresses (the individualizing singular) this law given to it. Thus וְלֹא יַעֲבֹר is to be understood, according to Job xiv. 5, cf. Jer. v. 22, Job xxxviii. 10, Ps. civ. 9. Hitzig makes the Creator Himself the subject; but then the poet would have at least been obliged to say חָק־נָתַן לָמוֹ, and moreover it may be clearly seen from Jer. xxxi. 36, xxxiii. 20, how the thought that God inviolably keeps the orders of nature in check is expressed θεοπροπῶς. Jer. v. 22, by way of example, shows that the law itself is not, with Ewald, Maurer, and others, following the LXX., Syriac, Italic, Jerome, and Kimchi, to be made the subject: a law hath He given, and it passes not away (an imperishable one). In combination with חָק, עָבַר always signifies "to pass over, transgress."

Vers. 7-14. The call to the praise of Jahve is now turned, in the second group of verses, to the earth and everything belonging to it in the widest extent. Here too כְּהַחֲרָץ, like מִן־הַשָּׁמַיִם, ver. 1, is intended of the place whence the praise is to resound, and not according to x. 18 of earthly beings. The call is addressed in the first instance to the sea-monsters or dragons (lxxiv. 13), i.e., as Pindar (Nem. iii. 23 sq.) expresses it, θηρας ἐν πελάγει ὑπερόχους, and to the surging mass of waters (תְּהוֹמוֹת) above and within the earth. Then to four phenomena of nature, coming down from heaven and ascending heavenwards, which are so arranged in ver. 8a, after the model of the chiasmus (crosswise position), that fire and smoke (קִיטוֹר), more especially of the mountains (Ex. xix. 18), hail and snow stand in reciprocal relation; and to the storm-wind (רֵיחַ סַעֲרָה), an appositional construction, as in cvii. 25), which, beside a seeming freeness and untractableness, performs God's word. What is said of this last applies also to the fire, etc.; all these phenomena of nature are messengers and servants of God, civ. 4, cf. ciii. 20. When the poet wishes that they all may join in concert with the rest of the creatures to the praise of God, he excepts the fact that they frequently become destructive powers executing judicial punishment, and only has before his mind their (more especially to the inhabitant of Palestine, to whom the opportunity of seeing hail, snow, and ice was more rare than with us, imposing) grandeur and their relatedness to the whole of creation, which is destined to glorify God and to be itself glorified. He next passes over to the mountains towering towards the skies and to all the heights of earth; to the fruit-trees, and to the cedars, the kings among the trees of the forest; to the wild beasts, which are called הַחַיָּה because they represent the most active and powerful life in the animal world, and to all quadrupeds, which, more particularly the four-footed domestic animals, are called בְּהֵמָה; to the creeping things (שֹׁרֵץ) which cleave to the ground as they move along; and to the birds, which are named with the descriptive epithet winged (צִפּוֹר קָנָף as in Deut. iv. 17, cf. Gen. vii. 14, Ezek. xxxix. 17, instead of עוֹף קָנָף, Gen. i. 21). And just as the call in Ps. ciii. finds its centre of gravity, so to speak, at last in the soul of man, so here it is addressed finally to humanity, and that, because mankind lives in nations and is comprehended under the law of a state commonwealth, in the first instance to its heads: the kings of the earth, i.e. those who rule over the earth by countries, to the princes and all who have the administration of justice and are possessed of supreme power on the earth, then to men of both sexes and of every age.

All the beings mentioned from ver. 1 onwards are to praise the Name of Jahve ; for His Name, He (the God of this Name) alone (Isa. ii. 11, Ps. lxxii. 18) is גִּשְׁבֹּג, so high that no name reaches up to Him, not even from afar ; His glory (His glorious self-attestation) extends over earth and heaven (vid. viii. 2). וְ, without our being able and obliged to decide which, introduces the matter and the ground of the praise ; and the fact that the desire of the poet comprehends in יְהִלְלוּ all the beings mentioned is seen from his saying “earth and heaven,” as he glances back from the nearer things mentioned to those mentioned farther off (cf. Gen. ii. 4). In ver. 14 the statement of the object and of the ground of the praise is continued. The motive from which the call to all creatures to Hallelujah proceeds, viz. the new mercy which God has shown towards His people, is also the final ground of the Hallelujah which is to sound forth ; for the church of God on earth is the central-point of the universe, the aim of the history of the world, and the glorifying of this church is the turning-point for the transformation of the world. It is not to be rendered : He hath exalted the horn of His people, any more than in cxxxii. 17 : I will make the horn of David to shoot forth. The horn in both instances is one such as the person named does not already possess, but which is given him (different from lxxxix. 18, 25, xcii. 11, and frequently). The Israel of the Exile had lost its horn, i.e. its comeliness and its defensive and offensive power. God has now given it a horn again, and that a high one, i.e. has helped Israel to attain again an independence among the nations that commands respect. In Ps. cxxxii., where the horn is an object of the promise, we might directly understand by it the Branch (Zemach). Here, where the poet speaks out of his own present age, this is at least not the meaning which he associates with the words. What now follows is an apposition to יָרָם קֶרֶן לְעַמּוֹ : He has raised up a horn for His people —praise (we say : to the praise of ; cf. the New Testament εἰς ἑπαινον) to all His saints, the children of Israel, the people who stand near Him. Others, as Hengstenberg, take תְּהִלָּה as a second object, but we cannot say הַיְרִים תְּהִלָּה. Israel is called עַם קְרִבּוֹ, the people of His near = of His nearness or vicinity (Köster), as Jerusalem is called in Eccles. viii. 10 מְקוֹם קְרוֹיֵשׁ instead of מְקוֹם קָרִישׁ (Ew. § 287, a, b). It might also be said, according to Lev. x. 3, עַם קָרִיבֵי, the nation of those who are near to Him (as the Targum renders it). In both instances עַם is the governing noun, as, too, surely נֶבֶר עֲמִיתִי, Zech. xiii. 7, which need not signify, by going back to the abstract primary signification of עֲמִית, a man of my near fellowship, but can also signify a man of my neighbour, i.e. my nearest man, according to Ew. loc. cit. (cf. above on cxliii. 10, lxxviii. 49). As a rule, the principal form of עַם is pointed עָם; and it is all the more unnecessary, with Olshausen and Hupfeld, to take the construction as adjectival for עַם קָרוֹב לִי. It might, with Hitzig after Aben-Ezra, be more readily regarded as appositional (to a people, His near, i.e. standing near to Him). We have here an example of the genitival subordination, which is very extensive in Hebrew, instead of an appositional co-ordination: populo propinqui sui, in connection with which propinqui may be referred back to propinquum = propinquitas, but also to propinquus (literally: a people of the kind of one that is near to Him). Thus is Israel styled in Deut. iv. 7. In the consciousness of the dignity which lies in this name, the nation of the God of the history of salvation comes forward in this Psalm as the leader (choragus) of all creatures, and strikes up a Hallelujah that is to be followed by heaven and earth.

PSALM CXLIX.

HALLELUJAH TO THE GOD OF VICTORY OF HIS PEOPLE.

HALLELUJAH.

- 1 SING unto Jahve a new song,
His praise in the congregation of the saints.
- 2 Let Israel rejoice in its Maker,
Let the children of Zion be joyful in their King
- 3 Let them praise His Name with dance,
With timbrel and cithern let them play unto Him
- 4 For Jahve taketh pleasure in His people,
He adorneth the humble with salvation.

- 5 Let the saints exult in glory,
Let them shout aloud upon their beds.
- 6 Hymns of God fill their throats,
And a two-edged sword is in their hand,
7 To execute vengeance among the nations,
Punishments among the peoples ;
8 To bind their kings with chains
And their nobles with iron fetters,
9 To execute upon them the written judgment---
It is glory for all His saints,
Hallelujah.

This Psalm is also explained, as we have already seen on Ps. cxlvii., from the time of the restoration under Ezra and Nehemiah. The new song to which it summons has the supreme power which Israel has attained over the world of nations for its substance. As in cxlviii. 14 the fact that Jahve has raised up a horn for His people is called תְּהַלֶּה לְכַל־הַסִּדְרִי, so here in cxlix. 9 the fact that Israel takes vengeance upon the nations and their rulers is called הִרְרָה לְכַל־הַסִּדְרִי. The writer of the two Psalms is one and the same. The fathers are of opinion that it is the wars and victories of the Maccabees that are here prophetically spoken of. But the Psalm is sufficiently explicable from the newly strengthened national self-consciousness of the period after Cyrus. The stand-point is somewhere about the stand-point of the Book of Esther. The New Testament spiritual church cannot pray as the Old Testament national church here prays. Under the illusion that it might be used as a prayer without any spiritual transmutation, Ps. cxlix. has become the watchword of the most horrible errors. It was by means of this Psalm that Caspar Scloppius in his Classicum Belli Sacri, which, as Bakius says, is written not with ink, but with blood, inflamed the Roman Catholic princes to the Thirty Years' religious War. And in the Protestant Church Thomas Münzer stirred up the War of the Peasants by means of this Psalm. We see that the Christian cannot make such a Psalm directly his own without disavowing the apostolic warning, "the weapons of our warfare are not carnal" (2 Cor. x. 4). The praying Christian must therefore trans-pose the letter of this Psalm into the spirit of the New Covenant; the Christian expositor, however, has to ascertain the literal meaning of this portion of the Scriptures of the Old Testament in its relation to cotemporary history.

Vers. 1-5. A period, in which the church is renewing its youth and drawing nearer to the form it is finally to assume, also of inward necessity puts forth new songs. Such a new era has now dawned for the church of the saints, the Israel that has remained faithful to its God and the faith of its fathers. The Creator of Israel (עֲשֵׂי, plural, with the plural suffix, like עֲשֵׂ in Job xxxv. 10, עֲשֵׂי in Isa. liv. 5, cf. עֲשֵׂ in Job xl. 19; according to Hupfeld and Hitzig, cf. Ew. § 256, b, Ges. § 93, 9, singular; but aj, ajich, aw, are always really plural suffixes) has shown that He is also Israel's Preserver and the King of Zion, that He cannot leave the children of Zion for any length of time under foreign dominion, and has heard the sighing of the exiles (Isa. lxiii. 19, xxvi. 13). Therefore the church newly appropriated by its God and King is to celebrate Him, whose Name shines forth anew out of its history, with festive dance, timbrel, and cithern. For (as the occasion, hitherto only hinted at, is now expressly stated) Jahve takes a pleasure in His people; His wrath in comparison with His mercy is only like a swiftly passing moment (Isa. liv. 7 sq.). The futures that follow state that which is going on at the present time. עֲנִיִּים is, as frequently, a designation of the ecclesia pressa, which has hitherto, amidst patient endurance of suffering, waited for God's own act of redemption. He now adorns them with יִשְׁעָה, help against and victory over the hostile world; now the saints, hitherto enslaved and contemned, exult בְּכְבוֹד, in honour, or on account of the honour which vindicates them before the world and is anew bestowed upon them (ךְ of the reason, or, which is more probable in connection with the boldness of the expression, of the state and mood*); they shout for joy upon their beds, upon which they have hitherto poured forth their complaints over the present (cf. Hos. vii. 14), and ardently longed for a better future (Isa xxvi. 8); for the bed is the place of soliloquy (iv. 5), and the tears shed there (vi. 7) are turned into shouts of joy in the case of Israel.

Vers. 6-9. The glance is here directed to the future. The people of the present have again, in their God, attained to a lofty self-consciousness, the consciousness of their destiny, viz. to subjugate the whole world of nations to the God of Israel. In the presence of the re-exaltation which they have experienced their throat is full of words and songs exalting Jahve (רוֹמְמוֹת, plural of רוֹמָם, or, according to another reading, רוֹמָם, lvi. 17), and as servants of this God, the rightful Lord of all the heathen (lxxxii. 8), they hold in their hand a many-mouthed, i.e. many-edged sword (vid. supra, p. 28), in order to take the field on behalf of the true religion, as the Maccabees actually did, not long after: ταῖς μὲν χερσὶν ἀγωνιζόμενοι, ταῖς δὲ καρδίαις πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν εὐχόμενοι (2 Macc. xv. 27). The meaning of ver. 9a becomes a different one, according as we take this line as co-ordinate or subordinate to what goes before. Subordinated, it would imply the execution of a penal jurisdiction over those whom they carried away, and כְּתִיב would refer to prescriptive facts such as are recorded in Num. xxxi. 8, 1 Sam. xv. 32 sq. (Hitzig). But it would become the religious lyric poet least of all to entertain such an unconditional prospect of the execution of the conquered worldly rulers. There is just as little ground for thinking of the judgment of extermination pronounced upon the nations of Canaan, which was pronounced upon them for an especial reason. If ver. 9a is taken as co-ordinate, the "written judgment" (Recht) consists in the complete carrying out of the subjugation; and this is commended by the perfectly valid parallel, Isa. xlv. 14. The poet, however, in connection with the expression "written," has neither this nor that passage of Scripture in his mind, but the testimony of the Law and of prophecy in general, that all kingdoms shall become God's and His Christ's. Subjugation (and certainly not without bloodshed) is the scriptural מִשְׁפָּט for the execution of which Jahve makes use of His own nation. Because the God who thus vindicates Himself is Israel's God, this subjugation of the world is הֲרָרָה, splendour and glory, to all who are in love devoted to Him. The glorifying of Jahve is also the glorifying of Israel.

PSALM CL.

THE FINAL HALLELUJAH.

- 1 HALLELUJAH,
 PRAISE YE GOD IN HIS SANCTUARY,
 PRAISE HIM IN HIS STRONG FIRMAMENT!
- 2 PRAISE HIM IN HIS MIGHTY ACTS, PRAISE HIM ACCORDING TO THE ABUNDANCE OF HIS GREATNESS!
- 3 PRAISE HIM WITH THE SOUND OF HORNS, PRAISE HIM WITH HARP AND CITHERN!
- 4 PRAISE HIM WITH TIMBREL AND DANCE,
 PRAISE HIM WITH STRINGS AND SHALM!
- 5 PRAISE HIM WITH CLEAR CYMBALS,
 PRAISE HIM WITH CLASHING CYMBALS!
- 6 LET EVERYTHING THAT HATH BREATH PRAISE JAH,
 HALLELUJAH.

The call to praise Jahve "with dance and with timbrel" in cxlix. 3 is put forth here anew in ver. 4, but with the introduction of all the instruments; and is addressed not merely to Israel, but to every individual soul.

Vers. 1-5. The Synagogue reckons up thirteen divine attributes according to Ex. xxxiv. 6 sq. (שֵׁלֶשׁ עָשָׂרָה מִדּוֹת), to which, according to an observation of Kimchi, correspond the thirteen הַלְלָהּ of this Psalm. It is, however, more probable that in the mind of the poet the tenfold הַלְלָהּ encompassed by Hallelujahs is significative; for ten is the number of rounding off, completeness, exclusiveness, and of the extreme of exhaustibleness. The local definitions in ver. 1 are related attributively to God, and designate that which is heavenly, belonging to the other world, as an object of praise. קָדֹשׁ (the possible local meaning of which is proved by the קָדֹשׁ and קְדוֹשִׁים of the Tabernacle and of the Temple) is in this passage the heavenly הַיְכָל; and רָקִיעַ עֲזוּ is the firmament spread out by God's omnipotence and testifying of God's omnipotence (lxviii. 35), not according to its front side, which is turned towards the earth, but according to the reverse or inner side, which is turned towards the celestial world, and which marks it off from the earthly world. The third and fourth hālalu give as the object of the praise that which is at the same time the ground of the praise: the tokens of His  $\text{גְּבוּרָה}$ , i.e. of His all-subduing strength, and the plenitude of His greatness ( $\text{גְּדֻלָּה} = \text{גְּדֻלָּה}$ ), i.e. His absolute, infinite greatness. The fifth and sixth hālalu bring into the concert in praise of God the ram's horn,  $\text{שׁוֹפָר}$ , the name of which came to be improperly used as the name also of the metallic  $\text{הַצִּצְרָה}$  (vid. on lxxxii. 4), and the two kinds of stringed instruments (vid. xxxiii. 2), viz. the nabla (i.e. the harp and lyre) and the kinnor (the cithern), the ψαλτήριον and the κιθάρα (κινύρα). The seventh hālalu invites to the festive dance, of which the chief instrumental accompaniment is the  $\text{תָּה}$  (Arabic duff, Spanish adufe, derived from the Moorish) or tambourine. The eighth hālalu brings on the stringed instruments in their widest compass,  $\text{מִנִּים}$  (cf. xlv. 9) from  $\text{מִן}$ , Syriac menîn, and the shepherd's pipe,  $\text{נֶבֶל}$  (with the Gimel raphé =  $\text{עֵינֵב}$ ); and the ninth and tenth, the two kinds of castanets ( $\text{צִלְצִלִּים}$ , construct form of  $\text{צִלְצִלִּים}$ , singular  $\text{צִלְצִל}$ ), viz. the smaller clear-sounding, and the larger deeper-toned, more noisy kinds (cf. κύμβαλον ἀλαλάζον, 1 Cor. xiii. 1), as  $\text{צִלְצִלֵי שִׁמְע}$  (pausal form of  $\text{שִׁמְע} = \text{שִׁמְע}$ , like  $\text{סִתָּר}$  in Deut. xxvii. 15, and frequently, from  $\text{סִתָּר} = \text{סִתָּר}$ ) and  $\text{צִלְצִלֵי תְרוּעָה}$  are, with Schultens, Pfeifer, Burk, Köster, and others, to be distinguished.

Ver. 6. The call to praise has thus far been addressed to persons not mentioned by name, but, as the names of instruments thus heaped up show, to Israel especially. It is now generalized to "the totality of breath," i.e. all the beings who are endowed by God with the breath of life ( $\text{נְשִׁמַת חַיִּים}$ ), i.e. to all mankind.

With this full-toned Finale the Psalter closes. Having risen as it were by five steps, in this closing Psalm it hovers over the blissful summit of the end, where, as Gregory of Nyssa says, all creatures, after the disunion and disorder caused by sin have been removed, are harmoniously united for one choral dance (εἰς μίαν χοροστασίαν), and the chorus of mankind concerting with the angel chorus are become one cymbal of divine praise, and the final song of victory shall salute God, the triumphant Conqueror (τῷ τροπαιούχῳ), with shouts of joy. There is now no need for any special closing beracha. This whole closing Psalm is such. Nor is there any need even of an Amen (cvi. 48, cf. 1 Chron. xvi. 36). The Hallelujah includes it within itself and exceeds it.

EXCURSUS BY J. G. WETZSTEIN.

I.—CONCERNING דָּרוֹר, THE NAME OF A BIRD.

On Ps. lxxxiv. 4 (p. 4).

SAADIA GAON explains דָּרוֹר by the Arabic دَوْرِيَّة, a word the correctness of which has been doubted. It is, however, perfectly correct; for in Syria and Palestine the common sparrow is called دَوْرِي, dūrī, whence the nomen unitatis دَوْرِيَّة. The word is to be traced back to دَوْر, the plural of دَار, the “farm-yard one,” and signifies properly “that which is found or dwells in the farm-yards;” thus the Kamûs (s.v. دَار) cites the phrase مَا بَهْ دَوْرِي (used of a desolated locality), “there is no being that dwells in farm-yards therein,” where we should say: “no living soul.” In this phrase it is exchanged at pleasure for the synonyms دِيَّار, دِيَّارِي, and دِيَّوْر, which are likewise denominatives of دَار.

The word dūrī is a thoroughly characteristic appellation for the sparrow, which inhabits the villages in immense flocks, where the standing corn and the corn lying on the threshing-floors in the open fields feed it for one half of the year, whilst it finds its food during the other half in the courts of the houses. It builds its nest in the walls by digging out the mortar between the air-dried bricks. These holes are stopped up once a year, because they injure the walls; and the birds that are then taken out always furnish an abundant repast, the only one of the kind, moreover, in the year, for no one takes the trouble to make a sport of shooting sparrows.

It is another question, whether the derôr, also, really corresponds to the dūrī? This would be impossible if the sippôr, which is connected with derôr in Ps. lxxxiv. 4 and Prov. xxvi. 2, as is supposed, signifies the sparrow. Saadia is consequently obliged to interpret צפור differently. But is צפור then the sparrow? Is it possible for a word which the Bible uses to designate almost all kinds of birds to be the name of a particular species? Its comparison with the Arabic عصفور, from which it certainly differs only dialectically, does not support that supposition; for this word is a collective name for the whole bulk of the small chirping and singing birds, side by side with which the separate species must also have its special name. The fact that in Syria one rarely sees and hears anything of any other 'osfûr than the sparrow, arises from the fact that the sparrow has multiplied so excessively there, whilst the land, that has been deprived of its woods and is overrun with birds of prey, is very poor in singing birds of all kinds. But if the sippôr corresponds to the 'osfûr in this sense, then the derôr might well be the dûrî. The swallow, which one usually thinks of, has its own name; and the wood-pigeon, which others suppose to be the derôr, does not suit Prov. xxvi. 2.

The etymology of the word derôr is obscure. If it signifies the sparrow, it will be a so-called primitive; at least it is then more natural to regard the Syro-Arabic dûrî as a derôr that has been corrupted by a later supposition of a more transparent etymology, than to regard derôr as a defectively written and hence erroneously pointed פעליל form (perhaps like פרוּר) from the root דרר.

II.—CONCERNING THE SIGNIFICATION OF THE WORD מַעֲנָה IN ITS APPLICATION TO AGRICULTURE.

On Ps. cxxix. 3 (p. 299), cf. on Ps. lxxv. 11 (vol. ii. p. 230).

THE word מַעֲנָה, Arabic مَعْنَاةٌ, signifies a strip of arable land which the ploughman takes in hand at one time, at both ends of which consequently the ploughing-team always comes to a stand, turns round, and begins a new furrow. The length of the ma'nâh is of course the same as the length of the furrows. Since the ordinary ox of Palestine is smaller and weaker than ours, and easily becomes tired under the yoke, which presses heavily on the nape of its neck and confines its neck, they are obliged to give it time to recover its strength by frequent resting. This always takes place at the termination of a furrow, when the peasant raises the unwieldy plough out of the earth, and turns it over, when he is obliged to clear off the moist earth with the jábút (יַאֲבֹוּת, a small iron shovel at the lower end of the oxen-stick or goad) and to hammer the loosened wedges and rings tight again, during which time the team is able to recover itself by resting. Hence, too, they do not make the furrows a great length. If the field is under two hundred feet long, it forms only one ma'náh; but when in level districts the long parcels of ground (sihám from the singular שִׁיחָם) of the separate peasant farmers of a village frequently extend to the distance of a mile and a half, the ploughman is compelled to divide his parcel of ground into several מְעָאֵי (מְעָאֵי), each of which is ploughed by itself. The furrows, that is to say, cannot be made breadthwise, because the small plots are mostly far too narrow, and because the fields of his neighbours on either side that might be already tilled would be injured by it; for the boundaries of the fields (hudúd from the singular חֹד) are not formed, as with us, by rows, i.e. by broad strips of green sward, but only by isolated heaps of stones, of which two larger ones lie between every two fields, and are called amámá (from the singular אִמָּא, “mother ridge, i.e. main ridge”), and a number of smaller ones called ka'ákír (from the singular קַעֲקִיר). Moreover cross-ploughing would be rendered difficult by these boundary stones, and the plough would often be seriously injured. In my collection of Hauranitish peasants' proverbs and maxims the following is to be found: “One ox is as much use to thee as two, and the shortness of the ma'náh as much as its length” (يَعْنِيكَ عَنْ ثَوْرَيْنِ ثَوْرٍ وَيَعْنِيكَ عَنْ طَوْلِ الْمَعَانِي) (قصرها), on which I have recorded the following original interpretation: If it does not make any difference to the produce of the field whether the ma'náh be greater or less, but in connection with the former the ploughing oxen are exhausted even after half a day's work, whereas in connection with the latter they remain fit for work the whole day, it is more profitable to the peasant to make his ma'náh as short as practicable.

The word מענה only occurs besides in 1 Sam. xiv. 14, where it is said that Jonathan with his armour-bearer, in connection with an attack upon one of the posts of the enemy, slew twenty men, and that within the short space of about half a מענה, i.e. not during a long pursuit and by degrees, but in a brief hot battle on an arena of about a hundred paces. In the passage in the Psalm the back is conceived of as a field which is divided into several long מענות. To our taste the plural is certainly disturbing; the comparison of the back to one long-extended מענה, which may indeed have a hundred furrows, is simpler, and the impression produced by it more forcible; hence the Ker supposes the singular מעֵנִית, which must be regarded as an Aramaizing collateral form of the singular מענה, for the difference in forms like مصفاة, مصفاية, مصفوية, مصفوية, and مصفیت in connection with Lamed He stems is for the most part only idiomatic.

According to its derivation, מענה (with local Mem) is perhaps the portion of a field taken in hand by the ploughman, from עָנָה, to work; or with reference to the two ends, within the limit of which the ploughing is done, the furrow-turning, στροφή, from עָנָה, to turn; or a tract or space of a certain length, from עָנָה, to strive after, to seek to attain, whence the well-known Arabic word مَعْنَى (masculine of مَعْنَى), that which is striven after, the desired object, then specially that which is aimed at by the language, the drift (the meaning and sense).

The Arabic معناة, together with the greater part of the agrarian terminology, is not found in the original lexicons, because it was not regarded as purely Arabic, but as belonging to the Nabatæan and Syrian dialects. The terms must therefore still be collected among the peasants. I found a good many in the Merg'-country, where I had my country estate; but the most interesting were in the Hawân, where, too, معناة still belongs to the living language.

GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT,

BEING

Grimm's Wilke's Clavis Novi Testamenti.

TRANSLATED, REVISED, AND ENLARGED

BY

JOSEPH HENRY THAYER, D.D.,

BUSSEY PROFESSOR OF NEW TESTAMENT CRITICISM AND INTERPRETATION IN THE DIVINITY SCHOOL OF HARVARD UNIVERSITY.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

TOWARDS the close of the year 1862, the "Arnoldische Buchhandlung" in Leipzig published the First Part of a Greek-Latin Lexicon of the New Testament, prepared, upon the basis of the "Clavis Novi Testamenti Philologica" of C. G. Wilke (second edition, 2 vols. 1851), by Professor C. L. WILBALD GRIMM of Jena. In his Prospectus Professor Grimm announced it as his purpose not only (in accordance with the improvements in classical lexicography embodied in the Paris edition of Stephen's Thesaurus and in the fifth edition of Passow's Dictionary edited by Rost and his coadjutors) to exhibit the historical growth of a word's significations, and accordingly in selecting his vouchers for New Testament usage to show at what time and in what class of writers a given word became current, but also duly to notice the usage of the Septuagint and of the Old Testament Apocrypha, and especially to produce a Lexicon which should correspond to the present condition of textual criticism, of exegesis, and of biblical theology. He devoted more than seven years to his task. The successive Parts of his work received, as they appeared, the outspoken commendation of scholars diverging as widely in their views as Hupfeld and Hengstenberg; and since its completion in 1868 it has been generally acknowledged to be by far the best Lexicon of the New Testament extant.'

'I regard it as a work of the greatest importance. . . . It seems to me a work showing the most patient diligence, and the most carefully arranged collection of useful and helpful references.'—THE BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL.

'The use of Professor Grimm's book for years has convinced me that it is not only unquestionably the best among existing New Testament Lexicons, but that, apart from all comparisous, it is a work of the highest intrinsic merit, and one which is admirably adapted to initiate a learner into an acquaintance with the language of the New Testament. It ought to be regarded as one of the first and most necessary requisites for the study of the New Testament, and consequently for the study of theology in general.'—PROFESSOR EMIL SCHÜRER.

'This is indeed a noble volume, and satisfies in these days of advancing scholarship a very great want. It is certainly unequalled in its lexicography, and invaluable in its literary perfectness. . . . It should, will, must make for itself a place in the library of all those students who want to be thoroughly furnished for the work of understanding, expounding, and applying the Word of God.'—Evangelical Magazine.

'Undoubtedly the best of its kind. Beautifully printed and well translated, with some corrections and improvements of the original, it will be prized by students of the Christian Scriptures.'—Athenæum.

A STUDY IN THE EARLIEST HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY.

By VINCENT HENRY STANTON, M.A., FELLOW, TUTOR, AND DIVINITY LECTURER OF TRINITY COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE; LATE HULSEAN LECTURER.

'Mr. Stanton's book answers a real want, and will be indispensable to students of the origin of Christianity. We hope that Mr. Stanton will be able to continue his labours in that most obscure and most important period, of his competency to deal with which he has given such good proof in this book.'—Guardian.

'We welcome this book as a valuable addition to the literature of a most important subject. . . . The book is remarkable for the clearness of its style. Mr. Stanton is never obscure from beginning to end, and we think that no reader of average attainments will be able to put the book down without having learnt much from his lucid and scholarly exposition.'—Ecclesiastical Gazette.

The First Division, which will probably be in a single volume, is undergoing revision by the Author. (The Second Division is complete in itself.)

'Under Professor Schürer's guidance, we are enabled to a large extent to construct a social and political framework for the Gospel History, and to set it in such a light as to see new evidences of the truthfulness of that history and of its contemporaneity. . . . The length of our notice shows our estimate of the value of his work.'—English Churchman.

MICROCOSMUS:

Concerning Man and his relation to the World.

BY HERMANN LOTZE.

Translated from the German

BY ELIZABETH HAMILTON AND E. E. CONSTANCE JONES.

'The English public have now before them the greatest philosophic work produced in Germany by the generation just past. The translation comes at an opportune time, for the circumstances of English thought, just at the present moment, are peculiarly those with which Lotze attempted to deal when he wrote his "Microcosmus," a quarter of a century ago. . . . Few philosophic books of the century are so attractive both in style and matter.'—Athenæum.

'These are indeed two masterly volumes, vigorous in intellectual power, and translated with rare ability. . . . This work will doubtless find a place on the shelves of all the foremost thinkers and students of modern times.'—Evangelical Magazine.

'Lotze is the ablest, the most brilliant, and most renowned of the German philosophers of to-day. . . . He has rendered invaluable and splendid service to Christian thinkers, and has given them a work which cannot fail to equip them for the sturdiest intellectual conflicts and to ensure their victory.'—Baptist Magazine.

'The reputation of Lotze both as a scientist and a philosopher, no less than the merits of the work itself, will not fail to secure the attention of thoughtful readers.'—Scotsman.

'The translation of Lotze's Microcosmus is the most important of recent events in our philosophical literature. . . . The discussion is carried on on the basis of an almost encyclopædic knowledge, and with the profoundest and subtlest critical insight. We know of no other work containing so much of speculative suggestion, of keen criticism, and of sober judgment on these topics.'—Andover Review.

NATURE AND THE BIBLE:

LECTURES ON THE MOSAIC HISTORY OF CREATION IN ITS RELATION TO NATURAL SCIENCE.

BY DR. FR. H. REUSCH.

REVISED AND CORRECTED BY THE AUTHOR.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FOURTH EDITION BY KATHLEEN LYTTTELTON.

'Other champions much more competent and learned than myself might have been placed in the field; I will only name one of the most recent, Dr. Reusch, author of "Nature and the Bible."—The Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE.

'The work, we need hardly say, is of profound and perennial interest, and it can scarcely be too highly commended as, in many respects, a very successful attempt to settle one of the most perplexing questions of the day. It is impossible to read it without obtaining larger views of theology, and more accurate opinions respecting its relations to science, and no one will rise from its perusal without feeling a deep sense of gratitude to its author.'—Scottish Review.

'This graceful and accurate translation of Dr. Reusch's well-known treatise on the identity of the doctrines of the Bible and the revelations of Nature is a valuable addition to English literature.'—Whitehall Review.

'We owe to Dr. Reusch, a Catholic theologian, one of the most valuable treatises on the relation of Religion and Natural Science that has appeared for many years. Its fine impartial tone, its absolute freedom from passion, its glow of sympathy with all sound science, and its liberality of religious views, are likely to surprise all readers who are unacquainted with the fact that, whatever may be the errors of the Romish Church, its more enlightened members are, as a rule, free from that idolatry of the letter of Scripture which is one of the most dangerous faults of ultra-Protestantism.'—Literary World.

BIBLICAL, HISTORICAL, DOCTRINAL, AND PRACTICAL THEOLOGY.

BASED ON THE REAL-ENCYKLOPÄDIE OF HERZOG, PLITT, AND HAUCK.

EDITED BY

PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D., LL.D.,

PROFESSOR IN THE UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, NEW YORK.

---

'As a comprehensive work of reference, within a moderate compass, we know nothing at all equal to it in the large department which it deals with.'—Church Bells.

'The work will remain as a wonderful monument of industry, learning, and skill. It will be indispensable to the student of specifically Protestant theology; nor, indeed, do we think that any scholar, whatever be his especial line of thought or study, would find it superfluous on his shelves.'—Literary Churchman.

'We commend this work with a touch of enthusiasm, for we have often wanted such ourselves. It embraces in its range of writers all the leading authors of Europe on ecclesiastical questions. A student may deny himself many other volumes to secure this, for it is certain to take a prominent and permanent place in our literature.'—Evangelical Magazine.

'Dr. Schaff's name is a guarantee for valuable and thorough work. His new Encyclopædia (based on Herzog) will be one of the most useful works of the day. It will prove a standard authority on all religious knowledge. No man in the country is so well fitted to perfect such a work as this distinguished and exact scholar.'—HOWARD CROSBY, D.D., LL.D., ex-Chancellor of the University, New York.

'This work will prove of great service to many; it supplies a distinct want in our theological literature, and it is sure to meet with welcome from readers who wish a popular book of reference on points of historical, biographical, and theological interest. Many of the articles give facts which may be sought far and wide, and in vain in our encyclopædias.'—Scotsman.

'Those who possess the latest edition of Herzog will still find this work by no means superfluous. . . . Strange to say, the condensing process seems to have improved the original articles. . . . We hope that no minister's library will long remain without a copy of this work.'—Daily Review.

'For fulness, comprehensiveness, and accuracy, it will take the first place among Biblical Encyclopædias.'—WM. . TAYLOR, D.D.

TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE.

HE volume which is here presented to English readers is the first of three which will contain the Solomonian writings. They form the last section of the "Keil and Delitzsch" series of Commentaries on the Books of the Old Testament Scriptures. The remaining volume on the Proverbs, as well as that on Ecclesiastes and the Canticles, which has also been prepared by Delitzsch, and is now in course of publication in Germany, will be issued with as little delay as possible.

In this translation I have endeavoured accurately to reproduce the original, so as to bring the student as much as possible into direct contact with the learned commentator himself. Any explanatory notes or words I have thought it right to add are enclosed in square brackets [ ], so as to be easily distinguishable. The Arabic and Syriac words occurring in the original have been, with very few exceptions, printed in English characters. In their vocalization I have followed the system of Forbes in his Arabic Grammar, so that the student will be readily able to restore the original. When nothing depends on the inflection of these words, the consonants only are printed.

It might appear superfluous in me to speak in commendation of the great work which is now drawing to a close; but a translator, since he has necessarily been in close fellowship with the author, may be expected to be in a position to offer an opinion on the character of the work on which he has been engaged; and I am sure that all my collaborateurs will concur with me in speaking of the volumes which form this commentary as monuments of deep and careful research into the meaning of the sacred Scriptures. Whether or not we can in all cases accept the conclusions reached by the respected authors, no one can fail to see how elaborate and minute the investigation has been. These volumes are the ripest fruits of life-long study of the Old Testament. Their authors are exegetes who have won for themselves an honoured place in the foremost rank for their profound acquaintance with the Hebrew and its cognate languages. With a scholarship of rare compass and accuracy, they combine a reverent sympathy with the sacred Scriptures, and a believing appreciation of its saving truths.

The satisfaction I have had in the study of this work, and in spending so many of my leisure hours in rendering it into English, is greatly heightened by the reflection, that I have been enabled in this way to contribute to the number of exegetical works within reach of the English student. The exegetical study of God's word, which appears to be increasingly drawing the attention of theologians, and which has been so greatly stimulated by the Translations issued by the publishers of this work, cannot fail to have the most beneficial results. The minister of the gospel will find such study his best and truest preparation for his weighty duties as an expounder of Scripture, if prosecuted in the spirit of a devout recognition of the truth, that "bene orasse est bene studuisse." Thus is he led step by step into a thorough and full understanding of the words and varying forms of expression used by those "holy men of old, who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."

AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

THE preparation of this Commentary on the Mishle, which was begun in 1869 (not without previous preparation), and twice interrupted by providential events, extended into the winter of 1872. There is now wanting to the completion of the Commentary on the Old Testament, undertaken by Dr. Keil and myself, only the Commentary on the Canticles and Ecclesiastes, which will form the concluding volume.

In the preparation of this Commentary on the Proverbs, I am indebted in varied ways to my friends Fleischer and Wetzstein. In the year 1836, Fleischer entered on his duties as Professor at Leipzig by delivering a course of lectures on the Book of the Proverbs of Solomon. I was one of his hearers, and am now so fortunate as to be able from his own ms. (begun 13th May, completed 9th September 1836) to introduce this beloved teacher into the number of interpreters of the Book of Proverbs. The assistance contributed by Wetzstein begins at chapter xxx., and consists in remarks on Mühlau's work on the Proverbs of Agur and Lemuel (1869), which my Dorpat friend placed at my disposal.

The exegetical apparatus has in the course of this work extended far beyond the list given at pp. 50, 51. I obtained the Commentary of the Caraites Ahron b. Joseph (1294), which was printed at Koslow (Eupatoria) in 1835, and had lent to me from the library of Dr. Hermann Lotze the Commentary by the Roman poet Immanuel [born at Rome about 1265], who was intimately associated with Dante, printed at Naples in 1487, and equal in value to a ms. Among the interpreters comprehended in the Biblia Rabbinica, I made use also of the Commentary of the Spanish

Menachem b. Salomo Meïri (1447), which first appeared in the Amsterdam Bibelwerk, and came under my notice in a more handy edition (Fürth, 1844) from the library of my dear friend and companion in study, Baer. To him I owe, among many other things, the comparison of several MSS., particularly of one brought from Arabia by Jacob Sappir, which has come into his possession.

In making use of the Græcus Venetus, I was not confined to Villoison's edition (1784). The only existing MS. (found in Venice) of this translation one of my young friends, von Gebhardt, has compared with the greatest care with Villoison's printed edition, in which he has found many false readings and many omissions. We have to expect from him a critical, complete edition of this singular translation, which, both as regards the knowledge its author displays of the Hebrew language and his skill in the Greek language, remains as yet an unsolved mystery.

The Index<sup>1</sup> (to the words etymologically explained in this Commentary) has been prepared by Dr. Hermann Strack, who, by his recently-published Prolegomena ad Vetus Testamentum Hebraicum, has shown himself to be a Hebraist of rare attainments.

Bacon, in his work De Augmentis Scientiarum (viii. 2), rightly speaks<sup>2</sup> of Solomon's proverbs as an unparalleled collection. May it be granted me, by the help of God, to promote in some degree the understanding of this incomparable Book, as to its history, its language, and its practical lessons!

THE BOOK OF PROVERBS.

INTRODUCTION.

THE Book of Proverbs bears the external title סֵפֶר מִשְׁלֵי, which it derives from the words with which it commences. It is one of the three books which are distinguished from the other twenty-one by a peculiar system of accentuation, the best exposition of which that has yet been given is that by S. Baer,<sup>1</sup> as set forth in my larger Psalmencommentar.<sup>2</sup> The memorial word for these three books, viz. Job, Mishle (Proverbs), and Tehillim (Psalms), is אִתָּה, formed from the first letter of the first word of each book, or, following the Talmudic and Masoretic arrangement of the books, תָּאָה.

Having in view the superscription מִשְׁלֵי שְׁלֹמֹה, with which the book commences, the ancients regarded it as wholly the composition of Solomon. The circumstance that it contains only 800 verses, while according to 1 Kings v. 12 (iv. 32) Solomon spake 3000 proverbs, R. Samuel bar-Nachmani explains by remarking that each separate verse may be divided into two or three allegories or apothegms (e.g. xxv. 12), not to mention other more arbitrary modes of reconciling the discrepancy.<sup>3</sup> The opinion also of R. Jonathan, that Solomon first composed the Canticles, then the Proverbs, and last of all Ecclesiastes, inasmuch as the first corresponds<sup>4</sup> with the spring-time of youth, the second with the wisdom of manhood, and the third with the disappointment of old age, is founded on the supposition of the unity of the book and of its Solomonic authorship.

At the present day also there are some, such as Stier, who regard the Book of Proverbs from first to last as the work of Solomon, just as Klauss (1832) and Randegger (1841) have ventured to affirm that all the Psalms without exception were composed by David. But since historical criticism has been applied to Biblical subjects, that blind submission to mistaken tradition appears as scarcely worthy of being mentioned. The Book of Proverbs presents itself as composed of various parts, different from each other in character and in the period to which they belong. Under the hands of the critical analysis it resolves itself into a mixed market of the most manifold intellectual productions of proverbial poetry, belonging to at least three different epochs.

1. The external plan of the Book of Proverbs, and its own testimony as to its origin.—The internal superscription of the book, which recommends it, after the manner of later Oriental books, on account of its importance and the general utility of its contents, extends from ver. 1 to ver. 6. Among the moderns this has been acknowledged by Löwenstein and Maurer; for ver. 7, which Ewald, Bertheau, and Keil have added to it, forms a new commencement to the beginning of the book itself. The book is described as “The Proverbs of Solomon,” and then there is annexed the statement of its object. That object, as summarily set forth in ver. 2, is practical, and that in a twofold way: partly moral, and partly intellectual. The former is described in vers. 3–5. It presents moral edification, moral sentiments for acceptance, not merely to help the unwise to attain to wisdom, but also to assist the wise. The latter object is set forth in ver. 6. It seeks by its contents to strengthen and discipline the mind to the understanding of thoughtful discourses generally. In other words, it seeks to gain the moral ends which proverbial poetry aims at, and at the same time to make familiar with it, so that the reader, in these proverbs of Solomon, or by means of them as of a key, learns to understand such like apothegms in general. Thus interpreted, the title of the book does not say that the book contains proverbs of other wise men besides those of Solomon; if it did so, it would contradict itself. It is possible that the book contains proverbs other than those of Solomon, possible that the author of the title of the book added such to it himself, but the title presents to view only the Proverbs of Solomon. If i. 7 begins the book, then after reading the title we cannot think otherwise than that here begin the Solomonic proverbs. If we read farther, the contents and the form of the discourses which follow do not contradict this opinion; for both are worthy of Solomon. So much the more astonished are we, therefore, when at x. 1 we meet with a new superscription, מִשְׁלֵי שְׁלֹמֹה, from which point on to xxii. 16 there is a long succession of proverbs of quite a different tone and form—short maxims, Mashals proper—while in the preceding section of the book we find fewer proverbs than monitory discourses. What now must be our opinion when we look back from this second superscription to the part i. 7–ix., which immediately follows the title of the book? Are i. 7–ix., in the sense of the book, not the “Proverbs of Solomon”? From the title of the book, which declares them to be so, we must judge that they are. Or are they “Proverbs of Solomon”? In this case the new superscription (x. 1), “The Proverbs of Solomon,” appears altogether incomprehensible. And yet only one of these two things is possible: on the one side, therefore, there must be a false appearance of contradiction, which on a closer investigation disappears. But on which side is it? If it is supposed that the tenor of the title, i. 1–6, does not accord with that of the section x. 1–xxii. 6, but that it accords well with that of i. 7–ix. (with the breadth of expression in i. 7–ix., it has also several favourite words not elsewhere occurring in the Book of Proverbs; among these, עֲרֻמָּה, subtilty, and מִזְפָּה, discretion, i. 4), then Ewald’s view is probable, that i.–ix. is an original whole written at once, and that the author had no other intention than to give it as an introduction to the larger Solomonic Book of Proverbs beginning at x. 1. But it is also possible that the author of the title has adopted the style of the section i. 7–ix. Bertheau, who has propounded this view, and at the same time has rejected, in opposition to Ewald, the idea of the unity of the section, adopts this conclusion, that in i. 8–ix. there lies before us a collection of the admonitions of different authors of proverbial poetry, partly original introductions to larger collections of proverbs, which the author of the title gathers together in order that he may give a comprehensive introduction to the larger collection contained in x. 1–xxii. 16. But such an origin of the section as Bertheau thus imagines is by no means natural; it is more probable that the author, whose object is, according to the title of the book, to give the proverbs of Solomon, introduces these by a long introduction of his own, than that, instead of beginning with Solomon's proverbs, he first presents long extracts of a different kind from collections of proverbs. If the author, as Bertheau thinks, expresses indeed, in the words of the title, the intention of presenting, along with the "Proverbs of Solomon," also the "words of the wise," then he could not have set about his work more incorrectly and self-contradictorily than if he had begun the whole, which bears the superscription "Proverbs of Solomon" (which must be regarded as presenting the proverbs of Solomon as a key to the words of the wise generally), with the "words of the wise." But besides the opinion of Ewald, which in itself, apart from internal grounds, is more natural and probable than that of Bertheau, there is yet the possibility of another. Keil, following H. A. Hahn, is of opinion, that in the sense of the author of the title, the section i.-ix. is Solomonic as well as x.-xxii., but that he has repeated the superscription "Proverbs of Solomon" before the latter section, because from that point onward proverbs follow which bear in a special measure the characters of the Mashal (Hävernick's Einkl. iii. 428). The same phenomenon appears in the book of Isaiah, where, after the general title, there follows an introductory address, and then in ii. 1 the general title is repeated in a shorter form. That this analogy, however, is here inapplicable, the further discussion of the subject will show.

The introductory section i. 7-ix., and the larger section x.-xxii. 16, which contains uniform brief Solomonic apothegms, are followed by a third section, xxii. 17-xxiv. 22. Hitzig, indeed, reckons x.-xxiv. 22 as the second section, but with xxii. 17 there commences an altogether different style, and a much freer manner in the form of the proverb; and the introduction to this new collection of proverbs, which reminds us of the general title, places it beyond a doubt that the collector does not at all intend to set forth these proverbs as Solomonic. It may indeed be possible that, as Keil (iii. 410) maintains, the collector, inasmuch as he begins with the words, "Incline thine ear and hear words of the wise," names his own proverbs generally as "words of the wise," especially since he adds, "and apply thine heart to my knowledge;" but this supposition is contradicted by the superscription of a fourth section, xxiv. 23 ff., which follows. This short section, an appendix to the third, bears the superscription, "These things also are לְהַכְמִים." If Keil thinks here also to set aside the idea that the following proverbs, in the sense of this superscription, have as their authors "the wise," he does unnecessary violence to himself. The ל is here that of authorship; and if the following proverbs are composed by the חֲכָמִים, "the wise," then they are not the production of the one חָכֵם, "wise man," Solomon, but they are "the words of the wise" in contradistinction to "the Proverbs of Solomon."

The Proverbs of Solomon begin again at xxv. 1; and this second large section (corresponding to the first, x. 1-xxii. 16) extends to xxix. This fifth portion of the book has a superscription, which, like that of the preceding appendix, commences thus: "Also (אֲשֶׁר) these are proverbs of Solomon which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah collected." The meaning of the word הֶעֱתִיקוּ is not doubtful. It signifies, like the Arameo-Arabic נסב, to remove from their place, and denotes that the men of Hezekiah removed from the place where they found them the following proverbs, and placed them together in a separate collection. The words have thus been understood by the Greek translator. From the supplementary words αἱ ἀδιάκριτοι (such as exclude all διάκρισις) it is seen that the translator had a feeling of the important literary historical significance of that superscription, which reminds us of the labours of the poetical grammarians appointed by Pisistratus to edit older works, such as those of Hesiod. The Jewish interpreters, simply following the Talmud, suppose that the "also" (אֲשֶׁר) belongs to the whole superscription, inclusive of the relative sentence, and that it thus bears witness to the editing of the foregoing proverbs also by Hezekiah and his companions;<sup>1</sup> which is altogether improbable, for then, if such were the meaning of the words, "which the men of Hezekiah," etc., they ought to have stood after i. 1. The superscription xxv. 1 thus much rather distinguishes the following collection from that going before, as having been made under Hezekiah. As two appendices followed the "Proverbs of Solomon," x. 1-xxii. 16, so also two appendices the Hezekiah-gleanings of Solomonic proverbs. The former two appendices, however, originate in general from the "wise," the latter more definitely name the authors: the first, xxx., is by "Agur the son of Jakeh;" the second, xxxi.

1-9, by a "King Lemuel." In so far the superscriptions are clear. The names of the authors, elsewhere unknown, point to a foreign country; and to this corresponds the peculiar complexion of these two series of proverbs. As a third appendix to the Hezekiah collection, xxxi. 10 ff. follows, a complete alphabetical proverbial poem which describes the praiseworthy qualities of a virtuous woman.

We are thus led to the conclusion that the Book of Proverbs divides itself into the following parts:—(1) The title of the book, i. 1-6, by which the question is raised, how far the book extends to which it originally belongs; (2) the hortatory discourses, i. 7-ix., in which it is a question whether the Solomonic proverbs must be regarded as beginning with these, or whether they are only the introduction thereto, composed by a different author, perhaps the author of the title of the book; (3) the first great collection of Solomonic proverbs, x.-xxii. 16; (4) the first appendix to this first collection, "The words of the wise," xxii. 17-xxiv. 22; (5) the second appendix, supplement of the words of some wise men, xxiv. 23 ff.; (6) the second great collection of Solomonic proverbs, which the "men of Hezekiah" collected, xxv.-xxix.; (7) the first appendix to this second collection, the words of Agur the son of Jakeh, xxx.; (8) the second appendix, the words of King Lemuel, xxxi. 1-9; (9) third appendix, the acrostic ode, xxxi. 10 ff. These nine parts are comprehended under three groups: the introductory hortatory discourses with the general title at their head, and the two great collections of Solomonic proverbs with their two appendices. In prosecuting our further investigations, we shall consider the several parts of the book first from the point of view of the manifold forms of their proverbs, then of their style, and thirdly of their type of doctrine. From each of these three subjects of investigation we may expect elucidations regarding the origin of these proverbs and of their collections.

2. The several parts of the Book of Proverbs with respect to the manifold forms of the proverbs.—If the Book of Proverbs were a collection of popular sayings, we should find in it a multitude of proverbs of one line each, as e.g., "Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked" (1 Sam. xxiv. 13); but we seek for such in vain. At the first glance, xxiv. 23*b* appears to be a proverb of one line; but the line "To have respect of persons in judgment is not good," is only the introductory line of a proverb which consists of several lines, ver. 24 f. Ewald is right in regarding as inadmissible a comparison of the collections of Arabic proverbs by Abu-Obeida, Meidani, and others, who gathered together and expounded the current popular proverbs, with the Book of Proverbs. Ali's Hundred Proverbs are, however, more worthy of being compared with it. Like these, Solomon's proverbs are, as a whole, the production of his own spirit, and only mediately of the popular spirit. To make the largeness of the number of these proverbs a matter of doubt were inconsiderate. Eichhorn maintained that even a god-like genius scarcely attains to so great a number of pointed proverbs and ingenious thoughts. But if we distribute Solomon's proverbs over his forty years' reign, then we have scarcely twenty for each year; and one must agree with the conclusion, that the composition of so many proverbs even of the highest ingenuity is no impossible problem for a "godlike genius." When, accordingly, it is related that Solomon wrote 3000 proverbs, Ewald, in his History of Israel, does not find the number too great, and Bertheau does not regard it as impossible that the collection of the "Proverbs of Solomon" has the one man Solomon as their author. The number of the proverbs thus cannot determine us to regard them as having for the most part originated among the people, and the form in which they appear leads to an opposite conclusion. It is, indeed, probable that popular proverbs are partly wrought into these proverbs,<sup>1</sup> and many of their forms of expression are moulded after the popular proverbs; but as they thus lie before us, they are, as a whole, the production of the technical Mashal poetry.

The simplest form is, according to the fundamental peculiarity of the Hebrew verse, the distich. The relation of the two lines to each other is very manifold. The second line may repeat the thought of the first, only in a somewhat altered form, in order to express this thought as clearly and exhaustively as possible. We call such proverbs synonymous distichs; as e.g. xi. 25 :

A soul of blessing is made fat,
And he that watereth others is himself watered.

Or the second line contains the other side of the contrast to the statement of the first; the truth spoken in the first is explained in the second by means of the presentation of its contrary. We call such proverbs antithetic distichs; as e.g. x. 1 :

<sup>1</sup> Isaac Euchel († 1804), in his Commentary on the Proverbs, regards xiv. 4a and xvii. 19b as such popular proverbs.

A wise son maketh his father glad,
And a foolish son is his mother's grief.

Similar forms, x. 16, xii. 5. Elsewhere, as xviii. 14, xx. 24, the antithesis clothes itself in the form of a question. Sometimes it is two different truths that are expressed in the two lines; and the authorization of their union lies only in a certain relationship, and the ground of this union in the circumstance that two lines are the minimum of the technical proverb—synthetic distichs; e.g. x. 18:

A cloak of hatred are lying lips,
And he that spreadeth slander is a fool.

Not at all infrequently one line does not suffice to bring out the thought intended, the begun expression of which is only completed in the second. These we call integral (eingedankige) distichs; as e.g. xi. 31 (cf. 1 Pet. iv. 18):

The righteous shall be recompensed on the earth—
How much more the ungodly and the sinner!

To these distichs also belong all those in which the thought stated in the first receives in the second, by a sentence presenting a reason, or proof, or purpose, or consequence, a definition completing or perfecting it; e.g. xiii. 14, xvi. 10, xix. 20, xxii. 28.<sup>1</sup> But there is also a fifth form, which corresponds most to the original character of the Mashal: the proverb explaining its ethical object by a resemblance from the region of the natural and every-day life, the παραβολή proper. The form of this parabolic proverb is very manifold, according as the poet himself expressly compares the two subjects, or only places them near each other in order that the hearer or reader may complete the comparison. The proverb is least poetic when the likeness between the two subjects is expressed by a verb; as xxvii. 15 (to which, however, ver. 16 belongs):

A continual dropping in a rainy day
And a contentious woman are alike.

The usual form of expression, neither unpoetic nor properly poetic, is the introduction of the comparison by ʔ [as], and of the similitude in the second clause by ʔ [so]; as x. 26:

As vinegar to the teeth, and as smoke to the eyes,
So is the sluggard to them who give him a commission.

This complete verbal statement of the relation of likeness may also be abbreviated by the omission of the ʔ; as xxv. 13, xxvi. 11:

As a dog returning to his vomit—
A fool returning to his folly.

We call the parabolic proverbs of these three forms comparisons. The last, the abbreviated form of the comparative proverb, forms the transition to another kind of parabolic proverb, which we will call, in contradistinction to the comparative, the emblematic, in which the contrast and its emblem are loosely placed together without any nearer expression of the similitude; as e.g. xxvi. 20, xxvii. 17, 18, 20. This takes place either by means of the copulative Vav, ʔ, as xxv. 25—

Cold water to a thirsty soul,
And good news from a far country.<sup>1</sup>

Or without the Vav; in which case the second line is as the sub-
xxv. 11 f., xi. 22:

A gold ring in a swine's snout—
A fair woman and without understanding.

These ground-forms of two lines can, however, expand into forms of several lines. Since the distich is the peculiar and most appropriate form of the technical proverb, so, when two lines are not sufficient for expressing the thought intended, the multiplication to four, six, or eight lines is most natural. In the tetrastich the relation of the last two to the first two is as manifold as is the relation of the second line to the first in the distich. There is, however, no suitable example of four-lined stanzas in antithetic relation. But we meet with synonymous tetrastichs, e.g. xxiii. 15 f., xxiv. 3 f., 28 f.; synthetic, xxx. 5 f.; integral, xxx. 17 f., especially of the form in which the last two lines constitute a proof passage beginning with 'פ, xxii. 22 f., or 'פ, xxii. 24 f., or without exponents, xxii. 26 f.; comparative without expressing the comparison, xxv. 16 f. (cf., on the other hand, xxvi. 18 f., where the number of lines is questionable), and also the emblematical, xxv. 4 f.:

Take away the dross from the silver,
And there shall come forth a vessel for the goldsmith;
Take away the wicked from before the king,
And his throne shall be established in righteousness.

Proportionally the most frequently occurring are tetrastichs, the second half of which forms a proof clause commencing with 'פ or 'פ. Among the less frequent are the six-lined, presenting (xxiii. 1-3, xxiv. 11 f.) one and the same thought in manifold aspects, with proofs interspersed. Among all the rest which are found in the collection, xxiii. 12-14, 19-21, 26-28, xxx. 15 f., xxx. 29-31, the first two lines form a prologue introductory to the substance of the proverb; as e.g. xxiii. 12-14:

O let instruction enter into thine heart,
And apply thine ears to the words of knowledge.
Withhold not correction from the child;
For if thou beatest him with the rod—he dies not.
Thou shalt beat him with the rod,
And deliver his soul from hell.

Similarly formed, yet more expanded, is the eight-lined stanza, xxiii. 22-28:

Hearken unto thy father that begat thee,
And despise not thy mother when she is old.
Buy the truth and sell it not:
Wisdom, and virtue, and understanding.
The father of a righteous man greatly rejoices,
And he that begetteth a wise child hath joy of him.
Thy father and thy mother shall be glad,
And she that bare thee shall rejoice.

The Mashal proverb here inclines to the Mashal ode; for this octastich may be regarded as a short Mashal song,—like the alphabetical Mashal psalm xxxvii., which consists of almost pure tetrastichs.

We have now seen how the distich form multiplies itself into forms consisting of four, six, and eight lines; but it also unfolds itself, as if in one-sided multiplication, into forms of three, five, and seven lines. Tristichs arise when the thought of the first line is repeated (xxvii. 22) in the second according to the synonymous scheme, or when the thought of the second line is expressed by contrast in the third (xxii. 29, xxviii. 10) according to the antithetic scheme, or when to the thought expressed in one or two lines (xxv. 8, xxvii. 10) there is added its proof. The parabolic scheme is here represented when the object described is unfolded in two lines, as in the comparison xxv. 13, or when its nature is portrayed by two figures in two lines, as in the emblematic proverb xxv. 20 :

To take off clothing in cold weather,
Vinegar upon nitre,
And he that singeth songs to a heavy heart.

In the few instances of pentastichs which are found, the last three lines usually unfold the reason of the thought of the first two: xxiii. 4 f., xxv. 6 f., xxx. 32 f.; to this xxiv. 13 forms an exception, where the ♀ before the last three lines introduces the expansion of the figure in the first two. As an instance we quote xxv. 6 f. :

Seek not to display thyself in the presence of the king,
And stand not in the place of the great.
For better that it be said unto thee, "Come up hither,"
Than that they humble thee in the presence of the prince,
While thine eyes have raised themselves.

Of heptastichs I know of only one example in the collection, viz. xxiii. 6-8 :

Eat not the bread of the jealous,
And lust not after his dainties ;
For he is like one who calculates with himself :—
"Eat and drink," saith he to thee,
And his heart is not with thee.
Thy morsel which thou hast eaten must thou vomit up,
And thou hast wasted thy pleasant words.

From this heptastich, which one will scarcely take for a brief Mashal ode according to the compound strophe-scheme, we see that the proverb of two lines can expand itself to the dimensions of seven and eight lines. Beyond these limits the whole proverb ceases to be משל in the proper sense; and after the manner of Ps. xxv., xxxiv., and especially xxxvii., it becomes a Mashal ode. Of this class of Mashal odes are, besides the prologue, xxii. 17-21, that of the drunkard, xxiii. 29-35; that of the slothful man, xxiv. 30-34; the exhortation to industry, xxvii. 23-27; the prayer for a moderate portion between poverty and riches, xxx. 7-9; the mirror for princes, xxxi. 2-9; and the praise of the excellent wife, xxxi. 10 ff. It is singular that this ode furnishes the only example of the alphabetical acrostic in the whole collection. Even a single trace of original alphabetical sequence afterwards broken up cannot be found. There cannot also be discovered, in the Mashal songs referred to, anything like a completed strophe-scheme; even in xxxi. 10 ff. the distichs are broken by tristichs intermingled with them.

In the whole of the first part, i. 7-ix., the prevailing form is that of the extended flow of the Mashal song; but one in vain seeks for strophes. There is not here so firm a grouping of the lines; on the supposition of its belonging to the Solomonian era, this is indeed to be expected. The rhetorical form here outweighs the purely poetical. This first part of the Proverbs consists of the following fifteen Mashal strains: (1) i. 7-19, (2) 20 ff., (3) ii., (4) iii. 1-18, (5) 19-26, (6) 27 ff., (7) iv. 1-v. 6, (8) 7 ff., (9) vi. 1-5, (10) 6-11, (11) 12-19, (12) 20 ff., (13) vii., (14) viii., (15) ix. In iii. and ix. there are found a few Mashal odes of two lines and of four lines which may be regarded as independent Mashals, and may adapt themselves to the schemes employed; other brief complete parts are only waves in the flow of the larger discourses, or are altogether formless, or more than octastichs. The octastich vi. 16-19 makes the proportionally greatest impression of an independent inwoven Mashal. It is the only proverb in which symbolical numbers are used which occurs in the collection from i. to xxix.:

There are six things which Jahve hateth,
 And seven are an abhorrence to His soul:
 Haughty eyes, a lying tongue,
 And hands that shed innocent blood;
 An heart that deviseth the thoughts of evil,
 Feet that hastily run to wickedness,
 One that uttereth lies as a false witness,
 And he who soweth strife between brethren.

Such numerical proverbs to which the name משל has been given by later Jewish writers (see my Gesch. der jüd. Poesie, pp. 199, 202) are found in xxx. With the exception of xxx. 7-9, 24-28 (cf. Sir. xxv. 1, 2), the numerical proverb has this peculiarity, found also in most of the numerical proverbs of Sirach (Sir. xxiii. 16, xxv. 7, xxvi. 5, 28), that the number named in the first parallel line is in the second (cf. Job v. 9) increased by one. On the other hand, the form of the Priamel<sup>1</sup> is used neither in the Book of Proverbs nor in that of Sirach. Proverbs such as xx. 10 ("Diverse weights, diverse measures—an abomination to Jahve are they both") and xx. 12 ("The hearing ear, the seeing eye—Jahve hath created them both"), to be distinguished from xvii. 3, xxvii. 21, and the like, where the necessary unity, and from xxvii. 3, where the necessary resemblance, of the predicate is wanting, are only a weak approach to the Priamel,—a stronger, xxv. 3, where the three subjects form the preamble ("The heaven for height, and the earth for depth, and the heart of kings—are unsearchable"). Perhaps xxx. 11-14 is a greater mutilated Priamel. Here four subjects form the preamble, but there is wanting the conclusion containing the common predicate. This, we believe, exhausts the forms of the Mashal in the collection. It now only remains to make mention of the Mashal chain, i.e. the ranging together in a series of proverbs of a similar character, such as the chain of proverbs regarding the fool, xxvi. 1-12, the sluggard, xxvi. 13-16, the tale-bearer, xxvi. 20-22, the malicious, xxvi. 23-28—but this form belongs more to the technics of the Mashal collection than to that of the Mashal poetry.

We now turn to the separate parts of the book, to examine more closely the forms of their proverbs, and gather materials for a critical judgment regarding the origin of the proverbs which they contain. Not to anticipate, we take up in order the separate parts of the arrangement of the collection. Since, then, it cannot be denied that in the introductory pædagogic part, i. 7-ix., notwithstanding its rich and deep contents, there is exceedingly little of the technical form of the Mashal, as well as generally of technical form at all. This part, as already shown, consists not of proper Mashals, but of fifteen Mashal odes, or rather, perhaps, Mashal discourses, didactic poems of the Mashal kind. In the flow of these discourses separate Mashals intermingle, which may either be regarded as independent, or, as i. 32, iv. 18 f., can easily be so understood. In the Mashal chains of chap. iv. and ix. we meet with proverbs that are synonymous (ix. 7, 10), antithetic (iii. 35, ix. 8), integral, or of one thought (iii. 29, 30), and synthetic (i. 7, iii. 5, 7), of two lines and of four lines variously disposed (iii. 9 f., 11 f., 31 f., 33 f.); but the parabolic scheme is not at all met with, separate proverbs such as iii. 27 f. are altogether without form, and keeping out of view the octastich numerical proverb, vi. 16-19, the thoughts which form the unity of separate groups are so widely expanded that the measure of the Mashal proper is far exceeded. The character of this whole part is not concentrating, but unfolding. Even the intermingling proverbs of two lines possess the same character. They are for the most part more like dissolved drops than gold coins with sharp outline and firm impress; as e.g. ix. 7 :

He that correcteth the mocker getteth to himself shame ;
And he that rebuketh the sinner his dishonour.

The few that consist of four lines are closer, more compact, more finished, because they allow greater space for the expression; e.g. iii. 9 f. :

Honour Jahve with thy wealth,
And with the first-fruits of all thine income :
And thy barns shall be filled with plenty,
And thy vats shall overflow with must.

But beyond the four lines the author knows no limits of artistic harmony; the discourse flows on till it has wholly or provisionally exhausted the subject; it pauses not till it reaches the end of its course, and then, taking breath, it starts anew. We cannot, moreover, deny that there is beauty in this new springing forth of the stream of the discourse with its fresh transparent waves; but it is a peculiar beauty of the rhetorically decomposed, dissolved Mashal, going forth, as it were, from its confinement, and breathing its fragrance far and wide.

The fifteen discourses, in which the Teacher appears twelve times and Wisdom three times, are neither of a symmetrically chiselled form nor of internally fashioned coherence, but yet are a garland of songs having internal unity, with a well-arranged manifoldness of contents. It is true that Bertheau recognises here neither unity of the contents nor unity of the formal character; but there is no Old Testament portion of like extent, and at the same time of more systematic internal unity, and which bears throughout a like formal impress, than this. Bertheau thinks that he has discovered in certain passages a greater art in the form; and certainly there are several sections which consist of just ten verses. But this is a mere accident; for the first Mashal ode consists of groups of 1, 2, and 10 verses, the second of 8 and 6 verses, the third of 10 and 12, the fourth of 10 and 8, the fifth of 2 and 6, etc.—each group forming a complete sense. The 10 verses are met with six times, and if iv. 1–9 from the Peshito, and iv. 20–27 from the LXX., are included, eight times, without our regarding these decades as strophes, and without our being able to draw any conclusion regarding a particular author of these decade portions. In i. 20–33, Bertheau finds indeed, along with the regular structure of verses, an exact artistic formation of strophes (3 times 4 verses with an echo of 2). But he counts instead of the stichs the Masoretic verses, and these are not the true formal parts of the strophe.

We now come to the second part of the collection, whose superscription מְשָׁלֵי שְׁלֵמָה can in no respect be strange to us, since the collection of proverbs here commencing, compared with i. 7–ix., may with special right bear the name Mishle. The 375 proverbs which are classed together in this part, x.–xxii. 16, without any comprehensive plan, but only according to their more or fewer conspicuous common characteristics (Bertheau, p. xii), consist all and every one of distichs; for each Masoretic verse falls naturally into two stichs, and nowhere (not even xix. 19) does such a distich proverb stand in necessary connection with one that precedes or that follows; each is in itself a small perfected and finished whole. The tristich xix. 7 is only an apparent exception. In reality it is a distich with the disfigured remains of a distich that has been lost. The LXX. has here two distichs which are wanting in our text. The second is that which is found in our text, but only in a mutilated form:

ὁ πολλὰ κακοποιῶν τελευσιουργεῖ κακίαν,

[He that does much harm perfects mischief,] ὃς δὲ ἐρροίξει λόγους οὐ σωθήσεται.

[And he that uses provoking words shall not escape.]

Perhaps the false rendering of מרע רבים ישלם-רע

מרדף אמרים לא ימלט:

The friend of every one is rewarded with evil,
He who pursues after rumours does not escape.

But not only are all these proverbs distichs, they have also, not indeed without exception, but in by far the greatest number, a common character in that they are antithetic. Distichs of predominating antithetic character stand here together. Along with these all other schemes are, it is true, represented: the synonymous, xi. 7, 25, 30, xii. 14, 28, xiv. 19, etc.; the integral, or of one thought, xiv. 7, xv. 3, etc., particularly in proverbs with the comparative מְּ, xii. 9, xv. 16, 17, xvi. 8, 19, xvii. 10, xxi. 19, xxii. 1, and with the ascending מְּ מְּ [much more], xi. 31, xv. 11, xvii. 7, xix. 7, 10, xxi. 27; the synthetic, x. 18, xi. 29, xiv. 17, xix. 13; the parabolic, the most feebly represented, for the only specimens of it are x. 26, xi. 22; besides which I know not what other Bertheau could quote. We shall further see that in another portion of the book the parabolic proverbs are just as closely placed together as are the antithetic. Here almost universally the two members of the proverbs stand together in technical parallelism as thesis and antithesis; also in the synonymous proverbs the two members are the parallel rays of one thought; in the synthetic two monostichs occur in loose external connection to suffice for the parallelism as a fundamental law of the technical proverb. But also in these proverbs in which a proper parallelism is not found, both members being needed to form a complete sentence, verse and members are so built up, according to Bertheau's self-confirmatory opinion, that in regard to extent and the number of words they are like verses with parallel members.

To this long course of distichs which profess to be the Mishle of Solomon, there follows a course, xxii. 17–xxiv. 22, of "words of the wise," prefaced by the introduction xxii. 17–21, which undeniably is of the same nature as the greater introduction, i. 7–ix., and of which we are reminded by the form of address preserved throughout in these "words of the wise." These "words of the wise" comprehend all the forms of the Mashal, from those of two lines in xxii. 28, xxiii. 9, xxiv. 7, 8, 9, 10, to the Mashal song xxiii. 29–35. Between these limits are the tetrastichs, which are the most popular form, xxii. 22 f., 24 f., 26 f., xxiii. 10 f., 15 f., 17 f., xxiv. 1 f., 3 f., 5 f., 15 f., 17 f., 19 f., 21 f.,—pentastichs, xxiii. 4 f., xxiv. 13 f., and hexastichs, xxiii. 1–3, 12–14, 19–21, 26–28, xxiv. 11 f.;—of tristichs, heptastichs, and octastichs are at least found one specimen of each, xxii. 29, xxiii. 6–8, xxiii. 22–25. Bertheau maintains that there is a difference between the structure of these proverbs and that of the preceding, for he counts the number of the words which constitute a verse in the case of the latter and of the former; but such a proceeding is unwarrantable, for the remarkably long Masoretic verse xxiv. 12 contains eighteen words; and the poet is not to be made accountable for such an arrangement, for in his mind xxiv. 11 f. forms a hexastich, and indeed a very elegant one. Not the words of the Masoretic verse, but the stichs are to be counted. Reckoning according to the stichs, I can discover no difference between these proverbs and the preceding. In the preceding ones also the number of the words in the stichs extends from two to five, the number two being here, however, proportionally more frequently found (e.g. xxiv. 4*b*, xxiv. 8*a*, 10*b*); a circumstance which has its reason in this, that the symmetry of the members is often very much disturbed, there being frequently no trace whatever of parallelism. To the first appendix to the "Proverbs of Solomon" there follows a second, xxiv. 23 ff., with the superscription, "These things also to the wise," which contains a hexastich, xxiv. 23*b*-25, a distich, ver. 26, a tristich, ver. 27, a tetrastich, ver. 28 f., and a Mashal ode, ver. 30 ff., on the sluggard—the last in the form of an experience of the poet like Ps. xxxvii. 35 f. The moral which he has drawn from this recorded observation is expressed in two verses such as we have already found at vi. 10 f. These two appendices are, as is evident from their commencement as well as from their conclusion, in closest relation to the introduction, i. 7-ix.

There now follows in xxv.-xxix. the second great collection of "Proverbs of Solomon," "copied out," as the superscription mentions, by the direction of King Hezekiah. It falls, apparently, into two parts; for as xxiv. 30 ff., a Mashal hymn, stands at the end of the two appendices, so the Mashal hymn xxvii. 23 ff. must be regarded as forming the division between the two halves of this collection. It is very sharply distinguished from the collection beginning with chap. x. The extent of the stichs and the greater or less observance of the parallelism furnish no distinguishing mark, but there are others worthy of notice. In the first collection the proverbs are exclusively in the form of distichs; here we have also some tristichs, xxv. 8, 13, 20, xxvii. 10, 22, xxviii. 10, tetrastichs, xxv. 4 f., 9 f., 21 f., xxvi. 18 f., 24 f., xxvii. 15 f., and pentastichs, xxv. 6 f., besides the Mashal hymn already referred to. The kind of arrangement is not essentially different from that in the first collection; it is equally devoid of plan, yet there are here some chains or strings of related proverbs, xxvi. 1-12, 13-16, 20-22. A second essential distinction between the two collections is this, that while in the first the antithetic proverb forms the prevailing element, here it is the parabolic, and especially the emblematic; in xxv.-xxvii. are sentences almost wholly of this character. We say almost, for to place together proverbs of this kind exclusively is not the plan of the collector. There are also proverbs of the other schemes, fewer synonymous, etc., than antithetic, and the collection begins in very varied quodlibet: xxv. 2, an antithetic proverb; xxv. 3, a priamel with three subjects; xxv. 4 f., an emblematic tetrastich; xxv. 6 f., a pentastich; xxv. 8, a tristich; xxv. 9 f., a tetrastich, with the negative  $\text{p}$ ; xxv. 11, an emblematic distich ("Golden apples in silver caskets—a word spoken in a fitting way"). The antithetic proverbs are found especially in xxviii. and xxix.: the first and the last proverb of the whole collection, xxv. 2, xxix. 27, are antithetic; but between these two the comparative and the figurative proverbs are so prevalent, that this collection appears like a variegated picture-book with explanatory notes written underneath. In extent it is much smaller than the foregoing. I reckon 126 proverbs in 137 Masoretic verses.

The second collection of Solomon's proverbs has also several appendices, the first of which, xxx., according to the inscription, is by an otherwise unknown author, Agur the son of Jakeh. The first poem of this appendix presents in a thoughtful way the unsearchableness of God. This is followed by certain peculiar pieces, such as a tetrastich regarding the purity of God's word, xxx. 5 f.; a prayer for a moderate position between riches and poverty, vers. 7-9; a distich against slander, ver. 10; a priamel without the conclusion, vers. 11-14; the insatiable four (a Midda), ver. 15 f.; a tetrastich regarding the disobedient son, ver. 17; the incomprehensible four, vers. 18-20; the intolerable four, vers. 21-23; the diminutive but prudent four, vers. 24-28; the excellent four, vers. 29-31; a pentastich recommending prudent silence, ver. 32 f. Two other supplements form the conclusion of the whole book: the counsel of Lemuel's mother to her royal son, xxxi. 2-9, and the praise of the virtuous woman in the form of an alphabetical acrostic, xxxi. 10 ff.

After we have acquainted ourselves with the manifold forms of the technical proverbs and their distribution in the several parts of the collection, the question arises, What conclusions regarding the origin of these several parts may be drawn from these forms found in them? We connect with this the conception of Ewald, who sees represented in the several parts of the collection the chief points of the history of proverbial poetry. The "Proverbs of Solomon," x. 1-xxii. 16, appear to him to be the oldest collection, which represents the simplest and the most ancient kind of proverbial poetry. Their distinguishing characteristics are the symmetrical two-membered verse, complete in itself, containing in itself a fully intelligible meaning, and the quick contrast of thesis and antithesis. The oldest form of the technical proverb, according to Ewald, is, according to our terminology, the antithetic distich, such as predominates in x. 1-xxii. 16. Along with these antithetic distichs we find here also others of a different kind. Ewald so considers the contrast of the two members to be the original fundamental law of the technical proverb, that to him these other kinds of distichs represent the diminution of the inner force of the two-membered verse, the already begun decay of the art in its oldest limits and laws, and the transition to a new method. In the "Proverbs of Solomon," xxv.-xxix., of the later collection, that rigorous formation of the verse appears already in full relaxation and dissolution: the contrast of the sense of the members appears here only exceptionally; the art turns from the crowded fulness and strength of the representation more to the adorning of the thought by means of strong and striking figures and forms of expression, to elegant painting of certain moral conditions and forms of life; and the more the technical proverb is deprived of the breath of a vigorous poetic spirit, so much the nearer does it approach to the vulgar proverb; the full and complete symmetry of the two members disappears, less by the abridgment of one of them, than by the too great extension and amplification of the two-membered proverb into longer admonitions to a moral life, and descriptions relating thereto. So the proverbial poetry passes essentially into a different form and manner. "While it loses in regard to internal vigorous brevity and strength, it seeks to gain again by means of connected instructive exposition, by copious description and detailed representation; breaking up its boldly delineated, strong, and yet simply beautiful form, it rises to oratorical display, to attractive eloquence, in which, indeed, though the properly poetical and the artistic gradually disappears, yet the warmth and easy comprehension are increased." In chap. i.-ix., the introduction of the older collection, and xxii. 17-xxiv., of the first half of the supplement to the older collection (xxv.-xxix. is the second half), supplied by a later writer, the great change is completed, the growth of which the later collection of the "Proverbs of Solomon," particularly in xxv.-xxix., reveals. The symmetry of the two members of the verse is here completely destroyed; the separate proverb appears almost only as an exception; the proverbial poetry has passed into admonition and discourse, and has become in many respects lighter, and more flexible, and flowing, and comprehensible. "It is true that on the side of this later form of proverbial poetry there is not mere loss. While it always loses the excellent pointed brevity, the inner fulness and strength of the old proverbs, it gains in warmth, impressiveness, intelligibility; the wisdom which at first strives only to make its existence and its contents in endless manifoldness known, reaches this point at last, that having become clear and certain, it now also turns itself earnestly and urgently to men." In the later additions, chap. xxx. xxxi., appended altogether externally, the proverbial poetry has already disappeared, and given place to elegant descriptions of separate moral truths. While the creative passes into the background, the whole aim is now toward surprising expansion and new artistic representation.

This view of the progressive development of the course of proverbial poetry is one of the chief grounds for the determination of Ewald's judgment regarding the parts that are Solomonic and those that are not Solomonic in the collection. In x. 1-xxii. 16 he does not regard the whole as Solomon's, as immediately and in their present form composed by Solomon; but the breath of the Solomonic spirit enlivens and pervades all that has been added by other and later poets. But most of the proverbs of the later collection (xxv.-xxix.) are not much older than the time of Hezekiah; yet there are in it some that are Solomonic, and of the period next to Solomon. The collection stretches backward with its arms, in part indeed, as the superscription, the "Proverbs of Solomon," shows, to the time of Solomon. On the other hand, in the introduction, i.-ix., and in the first half of the appendix (xxii. 17-xxiv.), there is not found a single proverb of the time of Solomon; both portions belong to two poets of the seventh century B.C., a new era, in which the didactic poets added to the older Solomonic collection longer pieces of their own composition. The four small pieces, xxx. 1-14, 15-33, xxxi. 1-9, 10 ff., are of a still later date;

they cannot belong to an earlier period than the end of the seventh or the beginning of the sixth century B.C.

We recognise the penetration, the sensibility, the depth of thought indicated by this opinion of Ewald's regarding the origin of the book; yet for the most part it is not supported by satisfactory proof. If we grant that he has on the whole rightly construed the history of proverbial poetry, nevertheless the conclusion that proverbs which bear in themselves the marks of the oldest proverbial poetry belong to the Solomonic era, and that the others belong to a period more nearly or more remotely subsequent to it, is very fallacious. In this case much that is found in Sirach's Book of Proverbs must be Solomonic; and the משלי אסף of Isaac Satanow,<sup>1</sup> the contemporary of Moses Mendelssohn, as well as many other proverbs in the collection מלין דרבנן, and in the poetical works of other Jewish poets belonging to the middle ages or to later times, might be dated back perhaps a thousand years. Along with the general course of development the individuality of the poet is also to be taken into account; an ancient poet can, along with the formally completed, produce the imperfect, which appears to belong to a period of art that has degenerated, and a modern poet can emulate antiquity with the greatest accuracy. But Ewald's construction of the progress of the development of proverbial poetry is also in part arbitrary. That the two-membered verse is the oldest form of the technical proverb we shall not dispute, but that it is the two-membered antithetic verse is a supposition that cannot be proved; and that Solomon wrote only antithetic distichs is an absurd assertion, to which Keil justly replies, that the adhering to only one form and structure is a sign of poverty, of mental narrowness and one-sidedness. There are also other kinds of parallelism, which are not less beautiful and vigorous than the antithetic, and also other forms of proverbs besides the distich in which the thought, which can in no way be restrained within two lines, must necessarily divide itself into the branches of a greater number of lines. Thus I must agree with Keil in the opinion, that Ewald's assertion that in the Hezekiah-collection the strong form of the technical proverb is in full dissolution, contains an exaggeration. If the first collection, x. 1-xxii. 16, contains only two (x. 26, xi. 22) figurative proverbs, while it would be altogether foolish to deny that these two, because they were figurative proverbs, were Solomonic, or to affirm that he was the author of only these two, so it is self-evident that the Hezekiah-collection, which is principally a collection of figurative proverbs, must contain many proverbs in which a different kind of parallelism prevails, which has the appearance of a looser connection. Is it not probable that Solomon, who had an open penetrating eye for the greatest and the smallest objects of nature, composed many such proverbs? And is e.g. the proverb xxvi. 23,

Dross of silver spread over a potsherd—
Burning lips and a wicked heart, less beautiful, and vigorous, and worthy of Solomon than any anti-thetic distich? If Ewald imagines that the 3000 proverbs which Solomon wrote were all constructed according to this one model, we are much rather convinced that Solomon's proverbial poetry, which found the distich and the tetrastich as forms of proverbs already in use, would not only unfold within the limits of the distich the most varied manifoldness of thought and form, but would also within the limits of the Mashal generally, run through the whole scale from the distich up to octastichs and more extensive forms. But while we cannot accept Ewald's criteria which he applies to the two collections, x. 1-xxii. 16 and xxv.-xxix., yet his delineation of the form and kind of proverbial poetry occurring in i.-ix., xxii. 17 ff., is excellent, as is also his conclusion, that these portions belong to a new and more recent period of proverbial poetry. Since in xxii. 17-21 manifestly a new course of "Words of the Wise" by a poet later than Solomon is introduced, it is possible, yea, not improbable, that he, or, as Ewald thinks, another somewhat older poet, introduces in i. 7-ix. the "Proverbs of Solomon" following, from x. 1 onward.

But if Solomon composed not only distichs, but also tristichs, etc., it is strange that in the first collection, x.-xxii. 16, there are exclusively distichs; and if he constructed not only contrasted proverbs, but equally figurative proverbs, it is as strange that in the first collection the figurative proverbs are almost entirely wanting, while in the second collection, xxv.-xxix., on the contrary, they prevail. This remarkable phenomenon may be partly explained if we could suppose that not merely the second collection, but both of them, were arranged by the "men of Hezekiah," and that the whole collection of the Solomonic proverbs was divided by them into two collections according to their form. But leaving out of view other objections, one would in that case have expected in the first collection the proportionally great number of the antithetic distichs which stand in the second. If we regard both collections as originally one whole, then there can be no rational ground for its being divided in this particular way either by the original collector or by a later enlarger of the collection. We have therefore to regard the two portions as the work of two different authors. The second is by the "men of Hezekiah;" the first cannot be by Solomon himself, since the number of proverbs composed, and probably also written out by Solomon, amounted to 3000; besides, if Solomon was the author of the collection, there would be visible on it the stamp of his wisdom in its plan and order: it is thus the work of another author, who is certainly different from the author of the introductory Mashal poems, i. 7-ix. For if the author of the title of the book were not at the same time the author of the introduction, he must have taken it from some other place; thus it is inconceivable how he could give the title "Proverbs of Solomon," etc., i. 1-6, to poems which were not composed by Solomon. If i. 7-ix. is not by Solomon, then these Mashal poems are explicable only as the work of the author of the title of the book, and as an introduction to the "Proverbs of Solomon," beginning x. 1. It must be one and the same author who edited the "Proverbs of Solomon" x. 1-xxii. 16, prefixed i. 7-ix. as an introduction to them, and appended to them the "Words of the Wise," xxii. 17-xxiv. 22; the second collector then appended to this book a supplement of the "Words of the Wise," xxiv. 23 ff., and then the Hezekiah-collection of Solomonic proverbs, xxv.-xxix.; perhaps also, in order that the book might be brought to a close in the same form in which it was commenced, he added<sup>1</sup> the non-Solomonic proverbial poem xxx. f. We do not, however, maintain that the book has this origin, but only this, that on the supposition of the non-Solomonic origin of i. 7-ix. it cannot well have any other origin. But the question arises again, and more emphatically, How was it possible that the first collector left as gleanings to the second so great a number of distichs, almost all parabolical, and besides, all more than two-lined proverbs of Solomon? One can scarcely find the reason of this singular phenomenon in anything else than in the judgment of the author of the first collection as the determining motive of his selection. For when we think also on the sources and origin of the two collections, the second always presupposes the first, and that which is singular in the author's thus restricting himself can only have its ground in the freedom which he allowed to his subjectivity.

Before we more closely examine the style and the teaching of the book, and the conclusions thence arising, another phenomenon claims our attention, which perhaps throws light on the way in which the several collections originated; but, at all events, it may not now any longer remain out of view, when we are in the act of forming a judgment on this point.

3. The repetitions in the Book of Proverbs.—We find not only in the different parts of the collection, but also within the limits of one and the same part, proverbs which wholly or in part are repeated in the same or in similar words. Before we can come to a judgment, we must take cognizance as closely as possible of this fact. We begin with "The Proverbs of Solomon," x.-xxii. 16; for this collection is in relation to xxv.-xxix. certainly the earlier, and it is especially with respect to the Solomonic proverbs that this fact demands an explanation. In this earlier collection we find, (1) whole proverbs repeated in exactly the same words: xiv. 12 = xvi. 25;—(2) proverbs slightly changed in their form of expression: x. 1 = xv. 20, xiv. 20 = xix. 4, xvi. 2 = xxi. 2, xix. 5 = xix. 9, xx. 10 = xx. 23, xxi. 9 = xxi. 19;—(3) proverbs almost identical in form, but somewhat different in sense: x. 2 = xi. 4, xiii. 14 = xiv. 27;—(4) proverbs the first lines of which are the same: x. 15 = xviii. 11;—(5) proverbs with their second lines the same: x. 6 = x. 11, x. 8 = x. 10, xv. 33 = xviii. 12;—(6) proverbs with one line almost the same: xi. 13 = xx. 19, xi. 21 = xvi. 5, xii. 14 = xiii. 2, xiv. 31 = xvii. 5, xvi. 18 = xviii. 12, xix. 12 = xx. 2; comp. also xvi. 28 with xvii. 9, xix. 25 with xxi. 11. In comparing these proverbs, one will perceive that for the most part the external or internal resemblance of the surrounding has prompted the collector to place the one proverb in this place and the other in that place (not always indeed; for what reason e.g. could determine the position of xvi. 25 and xix. 5, 9, I cannot say); then that the proverb standing earlier is generally, to all appearance, also the earlier formed, for the second of the pair is mostly a synonymous distich, which generally further extends antithetically one line of the first: cf. xviii. 11 with x. 15, xx. 10, 23 with xi. 1, xx. 19 with xi. 13, xvi. 5 with xi. 21, xx. 2 with xix. 12, also xvii. 5 with xiv. 31, where from an antithetic proverb a synthetic one is formed; but here also there are exceptions, as xiii. 2 compared with xii. 14, and xv. 33 with xviii. 12, where the same line is in the first case connected with a synonymous, and in the second with an antithetic proverb; but here also the contrast is so loose, that the earlier-occurring proverb has the appearance of priority.

We now direct our attention to the second collection, xxv.-xxix. When we compare the proverbs found here with one another, we see among them a disproportionately smaller number of repetitions than in the other collection; only a single entire proverb is repeated in almost similar terms, but in an altered sense, xxix. 20 = xxvi. 12; but proverbs such as xxviii. 12, 28, xxix. 2, notwithstanding the partial resemblance, are equally original. On the other hand, in this second collection we find numerous repetitions of proverbs and portions of proverbs from the first:—(1) Whole proverbs perfectly identical (leaving out of view insignificant variations): xxv. 24 = xxi. 9, xxvi. 22 = xviii. 8, xxvii. 12 = xxii. 3, xxvii. 13 = xx. 16;—(2) proverbs identical in meaning, with somewhat changed expression: xxvi. 13 = xxii. 13, xxvi. 15 = xix. 24, xxviii. 6 = xix. 1, xxviii. 19 = xii. 11, xxix. 13 = xxii. 2;—(3) proverbs with one line the same and one line different: xxvii. 21 = xvii. 3, xxix. 22 = xv. 18; cf. also xxvii. 15 with xix. 13. When we compare these proverbs with one another, we are uncertain as to many of them which has the priority, as e.g. xxvii. 21 = xvii. 3, xxix. 22 = xv. 18; but in the case of others there is no doubt that the Hezekiah-collection contains the original form of the proverb which is found in the other collection, as xxvi. 13, xxviii. 6, 19, xxix. 13, xxvii. 15, in relation to their parallels. In the other portions of this book also we find such repetitions as are met with in these two collections of Solomonic proverbs. In i. 7-ix. we have ii. 16, a little changed, repeated in vii. 5, and iii. 15 in viii. 11; ix. 10a = i. 7a is a case not worthy of being mentioned, and it were inappropriate here to refer to ix. 4, 16. In the first appendix of "the Words of the Wise," xxii. 17-xxiv. 22, single lines often repeat themselves in another connection; cf. xxiii. 3 and 6, xxiii. 10 and xxii. 28, xxiii. 17 f. and xxiv. 13 f., xxii. 23 and xxiii. 11, xxiii. 17 and xxiv. 1. That in such cases the one proverb is often the pattern of the other, is placed beyond a doubt by the relation of xxiv. 19 to Ps. xxxvii. 1; cf. also xxiv. 20 with Ps. xxxvii. 38. If here there are proverbs like those of Solomon in their expression, the presumption is that the priority belongs to the latter, as xxiii. 27 cf. xxii. 14, xxiv. 5 f. cf. xi. 14, xxiv. 19 f. cf. xiii. 9, in which latter case the justice of the presumption is palpable. Within the second appendix of "the Words of the Wise," xxiv. 23 ff., no repetitions are to be expected on account of its shortness; yet is xxiv. 23 repeated from the Solomonic Mashal xxviii. 21, and as xxiv. 33 f. are literally the same as vi. 10 f., the priority is presumably on the side of the author of i. 7-ix., at least of the Mashal in the form in which he communicates it. The supplements xxx. and xxxi. afford nothing that is worth mention as bearing on our present inquiry,<sup>1</sup> and we may therefore now turn to the question, What insight into the origin of these proverbs and their collection do the observations made afford?

From the numerous repetitions of proverbs and portions of proverbs of the first collection of the "Proverbs of Solomon" in the Hezekiah-collection, as well as from another reason stated at the end of the foregoing section of our inquiry, we conclude that the two collections were by different authors; in other words, that they had not both "the men of Hezekiah" for their authors. It is true that the repetitions in themselves do not prove anything against the oneness of their authorship; for there are within the several collections, and even within i.-ix. (cf. vi. 20 with i. 8, viii.

<sup>1</sup> Quite the same phenomenon, Fleischer remarks, presents itself in the different collections of proverbs ascribed to the Caliph Ali, where frequently one and the same thought in one collection is repeated in manifold forms in a second, here in a shorter, there in a longer form. As a general principle this is to be borne in mind, that the East transmits unchanged, with scrupulous exactness, only religious writings regarded as holy and divine, and therefore these Proverbs have been transmitted unchanged only since they became a distinct part of the canon; before that time it happened to them, as to all in the East that is exposed to the arbitrariness of the changing spirit and the intercourse of life, that one and the same original text has been modified by one speaker and writer after another. Thus of the famous poetical works of the East, such e.g. as Firdusi's Schah-Nameh [Book of the Kings] and Sadi's Garden of Roses, not one MS. copy agrees with another.

10 f. with iii. 14 f.), repetitions, notwithstanding the oneness of their authorship. But if two collections of proverbs are in so many various ways different in their character, as x. 1-xxii. 16 and xxv.-xxix., then the previous probability rises almost to a certainty by such repetitions. From the form, for the most part anomalous, in which the Hezekiah-collection presents the proverbs and portions of proverbs which are found also in the first collection, and from their being otherwise independent, we further conclude that "the men of Hezekiah" did not borrow from the first collection, but formed it from other sources. But since one does not understand why "the men of Hezekiah" should have omitted so great a number of genuine Solomonic proverbs which remain, after deducting the proportionally few that have been repeated (for this omission is not to be explained by saying that they selected those that were appropriate and wholesome for their time), we are further justified in the conclusion that the other collection was known to them as one current in their time. Their object was, indeed, not to supplement this older collection; they rather regarded their undertaking as a similar people's book, which they wished to place side by side with that collection without making it superfluous. The difference of the selection in the two collections has its whole directing occasion in the difference of the intention. The first collection begins (x. 1) with the proverb—

A wise son maketh glad his father,
And a foolish son is the grief of his mother;

the second (xxv. 2) with the proverb—

It is the glory of God to conceal a thing,
And the glory of kings to search out a matter.

The one collection is a book for youth, to whom it is dedicated in the extended introduction, i. 7-ix.; the second is a people's book suited to the time of Hezekiah ("Solomon's Wisdom in Hezekiah's days," as Stier has named it), and therefore it takes its start not, like the first, from the duties of the child, but from those of the king. If in the two collections everything does not stand in conscious relation to these different objects, yet the collectors at least have, from the commencement to the close (cf. xxii. 15 with xxix. 26), these objects before their eyes.

As to the time at which the first collection was made, the above considerations also afford us some materials for forming a judgment. Several pairs of proverbs which it contains present to us essentially the same sayings in older and more recent forms. Keil regards the proverbs also that appear less original as old-Solomonic, and remarks that one and the same poet does not always give expression to the same thoughts with the same pregnant brevity and excellence, and affirms that changes and reproductions of separate proverbs may proceed even from Solomon himself. This is possible; but if we consider that even Davidic psalms have been imitated, and that in the "Words of the Wise" Solomonic proverbs are imitated,—moreover, that proverbs especially are subject to changes, and invite to imitation and transformation,—we shall find it to be improbable. Rather we would suppose, that between the publication of the 3000 proverbs of Solomon and the preparation of the collection x.—xxii. 16 a considerable time elapsed, during which the old-Solomonic Mashal had in the mouths of the people and of poets acquired a multitude of accretions, and that the collector had without hesitation gathered together such indirect Solomonic proverbs with those that were directly Solomonic. But did not then the 3000 Solomonic proverbs afford to him scope enough? We must answer this question in the negative; for if that vast number of Solomonic proverbs was equal in moral-religious worth to those that have been preserved to us, then neither the many repetitions within the first collection nor the proportional poverty of the second can be explained. The "men of Hezekiah" made their collection of Solomonic proverbs nearly 300 years after Solomon's time; but there is no reason to suppose that the old book of the Proverbs of Solomon had disappeared at that time. Much rather we may with probability conclude, from the subjects to which several proverbs of these collections extend (husbandry, war, court life, etc.), and from Solomon's love for the manifold forms of natural and of social life, that his 3000 proverbs would not have afforded much greater treasures than these before us. But if the first collection was made at a time in which the old-Solomonic proverbs had been already considerably multiplied by new combinations, accretions, and imitations, then probably a more suitable time for their origination could not be than that of Jehoshaphat, which was more related to the time of Solomon than to that of David. The personality of Jehoshaphat, inclined toward the promotion of the public worship of God, the edification of the people, the administration of justice; the dominion of the house of David recognised and venerated far and wide among neighbouring peoples ; the tendencies of that time towards intercourse with distant regions ; the deep peace which followed the subjugation of the confederated nations,—all these are features which stamped the time of Jehoshaphat as a copy of that of Solomon. Hence we are to expect in it the fostering care of the Chokma. If the author of the introduction and editor of the older book of Proverbs lived after Solomon and before Hezekiah, then the circumstances of the case most suitably determine his time as at the beginning of the reign of Jehoshaphat, some seventy years after Solomon's death. If in i.-ix. it is frequently said that wisdom was seen openly in the streets and ways, this agrees with 2 Chron. xvii. 7-9, where it is said that princes, priests, and Levites, sent out by Jehoshaphat (compare the Carolingian missi), went forth into the towns of Judah with the book of the law in their hands as teachers of the people, and with 2 Chron. xix. 4, where it is stated that Jehoshaphat himself "went out through the people from Beer-sheba to Mount Ephraim, and brought them back unto the Lord God of their fathers." We have an evidence of the fondness for allegorical forms of address at that time in 2 Kings xiv. 8-11 (2 Chron. xxv. 17-21), which is so far favourable to the idea that the allegorizing author of i.-ix. belonged to that epoch of history.

This also agrees with the time of Jehoshaphat, that in the first collection the kingdom appears in its bright side, adorned with righteousness (xiv. 35, xvi. 10, 12, 13, xx. 8), wisdom (xx. 26), grace and truth (xx. 28), love to the good (xxii. 11), divine guidance (xxi. 1), and in the height of power (xvi. 14, 15, xix. 12) ; while in the second collection, which immediately begins with a series of the king's sayings, the kingdom is seen almost only (with exception of xxix. 14) on its dark side, and is represented under the destructive dominion of tyranny (xxviii. 15, 16, xxix. 2), of oppressive taxation (xxix. 4), of the Camarilla (xxv. 5, xxix. 12), and of multiplied authorities (xxviii. 2). Elster is right when he remarks, that in x.-xxii. 16 the kingdom in its actual state corresponds to its ideal, and the warning against the abuse of royal power lies remote. If these proverbs more distinguishably than those in xxv.-xxix. bear the physiognomy of the time of David and Solomon, so, on the other hand, the time of Jehoshaphat, the son and successor of Asa, is favourable to their collection ; while in the time of Hezekiah, the son and successor of Ahaz, and father and predecessor of Manasseh, in which, through the sin of Ahaz, negotiations with the world-kingdom began, that cloudy aspect of the kingdom which is borne by the second supplement, xxiv. 23-25, was brought near.

Thus between Solomon and Hezekiah, and probably under Jehoshaphat, the older Book of Proverbs contained in i.-xxiv. 22 first appeared. The "Proverbs of Solomon," x. 1-xxii. 16, which formed the principal part, the very kernel of it, were enclosed on the one side, at their commencement, by the lengthened introduction i. 7-ix., in which the collector announces himself as a highly gifted teacher and as the instrument of the Spirit of revelation, and on the other side are shut in at their close by "the Words of the Wise," xxii. 17-xxiv. 34. The author, indeed, does not announce i. 6 such a supplement of "the Words of the Wise;" but after these words in the title of the book, he leads us to expect it. The introduction to the supplement xxii. 17-21 sounds like an echo of the larger introduction, and corresponds to the smaller compass of the supplement. The work bears on the whole the stamp of a unity; for even in the last proverb with which it closes (xxiv. 21 f., "My son, fear thou Jahve and the king," etc.), there still sounds the same key-note which the author had struck at the commencement. A later collector, belonging to the time subsequent to Hezekiah, enlarged the work by the addition of the Hezekiah-portion, and by a short supplement of "the Words of the Wise," which he introduces, according to the law of analogy, after xxii. 17-xxiv. 22. The harmony of the superscriptions xxiv. 23, xxv. 1, favours at least the supposition that these supplements are the work of one hand. The circumstance that "the Words of the Wise," xxii. 17-xxiv. 22, in two of their maxims refer to the older collection of Solomonic proverbs, but, on the contrary, that "the Words of the Wise," xxiv. 23 ff., refer in xxiv. 23 to the Hezekiah-collection, and in xxiv. 33 f. to the introduction i. 7-ix., strengthens the supposition that with xxiv. 23 a second half of the book, added by another hand, begins. There is no reason for not attributing the appendix xxx.-xxxi. to this second collector; perhaps he seeks, as already remarked above, to render by means of it the conclusion of the extended Book of Proverbs uniform with that of the older book. Like the older collection of "Proverbs of Solomon," so also now the Hezekiah-collection has "Proverbs of the Wise" on the right and on the left, and the king of proverbial poetry stands in the midst of a worthy retinue. The second collector distinguishes himself from the first by this, that he never professes himself to be a proverbial poet. It is possible that the proverbial poem of the "virtuous woman," xxxi. 10 ff., may be his work, but there is nothing to substantiate this opinion.

After this digression, into which we have been led by the repetitions found in the book, we now return, conformably to our plan, to examine it from the point of view of the forms of its language and of its doctrinal contents, and to inquire whether the results hitherto attained are confirmed, and perhaps more fully determined, by this further investigation.

4. The Book of the Proverbs on the side of its manifoldness of style and form of instruction.—We commence our inquiry with the relation in which x.—xxii. 16 and xxv.—xxix. stand to each other with reference to their forms of language. If the primary stock of both of these sections belongs indeed to the old time of Solomon, then they must bear essentially the same verbal stamp upon them. Here we of course keep out of view the proverbs that are wholly or partially identical. If the expression חַרְרֵי־בֶטֶן (the chambers of the body) is in the first collection a favourite figure (xviii. 8, xx. 27, 30), coined perhaps by Solomon himself, the fact that this figure is also found in xxvi. 22 is not to be taken into account, since in xxvi. 22 the proverb xviii. 8 is repeated. Now it cannot at all be denied, that in the first collection certain expressions are met with which one might expect to meet again in the Hezekiah-collection, and which, notwithstanding, are not to be found in it. Ewald gives a list of such expressions, in order to show that the old-Solomonic dialect occurs, with few exceptions, only in the first collection. But his catalogue, when closely inspected, is unsatisfactory. That many of these expressions occur also in the introduction i. 1–ix. proves, it is true, nothing against him. But מְרִפָּא (health), xii. 18, xiii. 17, xiv. 30, xv. 4, xvi. 24, occurs also in xxix. 1; רָדַף (he pursueth), xi. 19, xii. 11, xv. 9, xix. 7, also in xxviii. 19; נִרְקָן (a tattler), xvi. 28, xviii. 8, also in xxvi. 20, 22; לֹא יִנְקָה (not go unpunished), xi. 21, xvi. 5, xvii. 5, also in xxviii. 20. These expressions thus supply an argument for, not against, the linguistic oneness of the two collections. The list of expressions common to the two collections might be considerably increased, e.g.: נִפְרָע (are unruly), xxix. 18, Kal xiii. 18, xv. 32; אָץ (he that hastens), xix. 2, xxi. 5, xxviii. 20, xxix. 19; מְדֻנִּים (of contentions), xxi. 9 (xxv. 24), xxi. 19, xxiii. 29, xxvi. 21, xxvii.

25. If it may be regarded as a striking fact that the figures of speech מְקוֹר חַיִּים (a fountain of life), x. 11, xiii. 14, xiv. 27, xvi. 22, and עֵץ חַיִּים (a tree of life), xi. 30, xiii. 12, xv. 4, as also the expressions מַחְתָּה (destruction), x. 14, 15, xiii. 3, xiv. 28, xviii. 7, x. 29, xxi. 15, יִפֶּה (he uttereth), xii. 17, xiv. 5, 25, xix. 5, 9; סָלַף (perverteth), xiii. 6, xix. 3, xxi. 12, xxii. 12, and סָלַף (perverseness), xi. 3, xv. 4, are only to be found in the first collection, and not in that by the "man of Hezekiah," it is not a decisive evidence against the oneness of the origin of the proverbs in both collections. The fact also, properly brought forward by Ewald, that proverbs which begin with שֵׁן (there is),—e.g. xi. 24, "There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth still,"—are exclusively found in the first collection, need not perplex us; it is one peculiar kind of proverbs which the author of this collection has by preference gathered together, as he has also omitted all parabolic proverbs except these two, x. 26, xi. 22. If proverbs beginning with שֵׁן are found only in the first, so on the other hand the parabolic Vav and the proverbial perfect, reporting as it were an experience (cf. in the second collection, besides xxvi. 13, xxvii. 12, xxix. 13, also xxviii. 1, xxix. 9), for which Döderlein<sup>1</sup> has invented the expression aoristus gnomicus,<sup>2</sup> are common to both sentences. Another remark of Ewald's (Jahrb. xi. 28), that extended proverbs with שֵׁן are exclusively found in the Hezekiah-collection (xxix. 9, 3, xxv. 18, 28), is not fully established; in xvi. 27–29 three proverbs with שֵׁן are found together, and in xx. 6 as well as in xxix. 9 שֵׁן occurs twice in one proverb. Rather it strikes us that the article, not merely the punctatorially syncopated, but that expressed by ה, occurs only twice in the first collection, in xx. 1, xxi. 31; oftener in the second, xxvi. 14, 18, xxvii. 19, 20, 22. Since, however, the first does not wholly omit the article, this also cannot determine us to reject the linguistic unity of the second collection with the first, at least according to their primary stock.

But also what of the linguistic unity of i. 1–ix. with both of these, maintained by Keil? It is true, and merits all consideration, that a unity of language and of conception between i. 1–ix. and x.–xxii. 16 which far exceeds the degree of unity between x.–xxii. 16 and xxv.–xxix. may be proved. The introduction is bound with the first collection in the closest manner by the same use of such expressions as אָגַד (gathereth), vi. 8, x. 5; אִישׁוֹן (the middle, i.e. of the night, deep darkness), vii. 9, xx. 20; אַחֲרֵיית (the end), v. 4, xxiii. 18, xxiv. 14; אַכְזָרִי (fierce), v. 9, xvii. 11; תְּבִינָה (understanding), i. 2, xvi. 16; תְּבִינָה (understanding), ii. 6, iii. 19, xxi. 30; זָרָה (an adulteress), v. 3, xxii. 14, xxiii. 33; חָסֵר לֵב (lacking understanding), vi. 32, vii. 7, xii. 11; יוֹסֵף לָמַד (will increase learning), i. 5, ix. 9, xvi. 21, 23; יָפִיחַ (uttereth), vi. 19, xiv. 5, xix. 5, 9; נִלְוָה (perverted), iii. 32, xiv. 2; מְרִיבִים (contention), vi. 14, 19, x. 12; מְרַפֵּא (health), iv. 22, xii. 18, xiii. 17, xvi. 24 (deliverance, xxix. 1); נִסְחָה (are plucked up), ii. 22, xv. 25; הֵעִז (strengthened, i.e. the face), vii. 13, xxi. 29; עֵץ חַיִּים (tree of life), iii. 18, xi. 30, xiii. 12, xv. 4; עָרַב (becometh surety) and חָקַע (strieketh hands) occurring together, vi. 1, xvii. 18, xxii. 26; פְּתוּיִים and פְּתוּיָאִים (simplicity, folly), i. 22, 32, viii. 5, ix. 6, xxiii. 3; קָרַץ (to wink with the eyes), vi. 13, x. 10; קָרָה (a city), viii. 3, ix. 3, 14, xi. 11; רֵאשִׁית (the beginning), i. 7, xvii. 14; שְׂכַל טוֹב (good understanding), iii. 4, xiii. 15; יִשְׁבְּנוּ אֶרֶץ (shall dwell in the land), ii. 21, x. 30; שְׁלַח מִדָּוָן (sendeth forth strife), vi. 14, xvi. 28; תְּהַפְכוֹת (evil words), ii. 12, vi. 14, x. 31, xvi. 28; תּוֹרָה (instruction), i. 8, iii. 1, iv. 2, vii. 2, xiii. 14; תְּנַחֲמָה (counsel), iii. 21, viii. 14, xviii. 1; תְּחַבְּלוֹת (prudent measures), i. 5, xx. 18, xxiv. 6;—and these are not the only points of contact between the two portions which an attentive reader will meet with. This relation of i. 1–ix. 18 to x.–xxii. 16 is a strong proof of the internal unity of that portion, which Bertheau has called in question. But are we therefore to conclude, with Keil, that the introduction is not less of the old time of Solomon than x.–xxii. 16? Such a conclusion lies near, but we do not yet reach it. For with these points of contact there are not a few expressions exclusively peculiar to the introduction;—the expressions מְנַחֵם sing. (counsel), i. 4, iii. 21; עֲרֻמָּה (prudence), i. 4, viii. 5, 12; מְלִצְיָה (an enigma, obscure maxim), i. 6; מַעַל (a path of life), ii. 9, iv. 11, 26; מַעְנֵלָה, ii. 15, 18, v. 6, 21; אִישׁוֹן (the apple of the eye), vii. 2, 9; פְּרִירֹת (the throat), i. 9, iii. 3, 22; the verbs אָתַה (cometh), i. 27, פָּלַם (make level or plain), iv. 26, v. 6, 21, and שָׁטָה (deviate), iv. 15, vii. 25. Peculiar to this section is the heaping together of synonyms in close connection, as “congregation” and “assembly,” v. 14, “lovely hind” and “pleasant roe,” v. 19; cf. v. 11, vi. 7, vii. 9, viii. 13, 31. This usage is, however, only a feature in the characteristic style of this section altogether different from that of x. 1-xxii. 16, as well as from that of xxv.-xxix., of its disjointed diffuse form, delighting in repetitions, abounding in synonymous parallelism, even to a repetition of the same words (cf. e.g. vi. 2), which, since the linguistic and the poetic forms are here inseparable, we have already spoken of in the second part of our introductory dissertation. This fundamental diversity in the whole condition of the section, notwithstanding those numerous points of resemblance, demands for i. 1-ix. an altogether different author from Solomon, and one who is more recent. If we hold by this view, then these points of resemblance between the sections find the most satisfactory explanation. The gifted author of the introduction (i. 1-ix.) has formed his style, without being an altogether slavish imitator, on the Solomonic proverbs. And why, then, are his parallels confined almost exclusively to the section x. 1-xxii. 16, and do not extend to xxv.-xxix.? Because he edited the former and not the latter, and took pleasure particularly in the proverbs which he placed together, x. 1-xxii. 16. Not only are expressions of this section, formed by himself, echoed in his poetry, but the latter are for the most part formed out of germs supplied by the former. One may regard xix. 27, cf. xxvii. 11, as the germ of the admonitory addresses to the son, and xiv. 1 as the occasion of the allegory of the wise and the foolish woman, ix. Generally, the poetry of this writer has its hidden roots in the older writings. Who does not hear, to mention only one thing, in i. 7-ix. an echo of the old שמע (hear), Deut. vi. 4-9, cf. xi. 18-21? The whole poetry of this writer savours of the Book of Deuteronomy. The admonitory addresses i. 7-ix. are to the Book of Proverbs what Deuteronomy is to the Pentateuch. As Deuteronomy seeks to bring home and seal upon the heart of the people the תורה of the Mosaic law, so do they the תורה of the Solomonic proverbs.

We now further inquire whether, in the style of the two supplements, xxii. 17-xxiv. 22 and xxiv. 23 ff., it is proved that the former concludes the Book of Proverbs edited by the author of the general introduction, and that the latter was added by a different author at the same time with the Hezekiah-collection. Bertheau places both supplements together, and attributes the introduction to them, xxii. 17-21, to the author of the general introduction, i. 7-ix. From the fact that in ver. 19 of this lesser introduction ("I have taught thee, אַתָּה־אֲנִי, even thee") the pronoun is as emphatically repeated as in xxiii. 15 (לְבִי גַם־אֲנִי), cf. xxiii. 14, 19), and that נְעִים (sweet), xxii. 18, also occurs in the following proverbs, xxiii. 8, xxiv. 4, I see no ground for denying it to the author of the larger general introduction, since, according to Bertheau's own just observation, the linguistic form of the whole collection of proverbs has an influence on the introduction of the collector; with more justice from עֲלֵי־יָשִׁים, xxii. 20 [only in Keri], as the title of honour given to the collection of proverbs, compared with נְיָרִים, viii. 6, may we argue for the identity of the authorship of both introductions. As little can the contemporaneousness of the two supplements be shown from the use of the pronoun, xxiv. 32, the שֵׁית לֵב (animum advertere, xxiv. 32), and יִנְעַם (shall be delight) xxiv. 25, for these verbal points of contact, if they proved anything, would prove too much: not only the contemporaneousness of the two supplements, but also the identity of their authorship; but in this case one does not see what the superscription גַּם־אֵלֶּה לְחַכְמִים (these also of the wise men), separating them, means. Moreover, xxiv. 33 f. are from vi. 10 f., and nearer than the comparison of the first supplement lies the comparison of ינעם with ii. 10, ix. 17, אָדָם חָסֵר לֵב (a man lacking understanding) with xvii. 18, יִעֲמֹדוּ with xxii. 14,—points of contact which, if an explanatory reason is needed, may be accounted for from the circumstance that to the author or authors of the proverbs xxiv. 23 ff. the Book of Proverbs i. 1—xxiv. 22 may have been perfectly familiar. From imitation also the points of contact of xxii. 17—xxiv. 22 may easily be explained; for not merely the lesser introduction, the proverbs themselves also in part strikingly agree with the prevailing language of i. 1—ix.: cf. אֲשֶׁר בְּיַרְדֵּךְ (go straight forward in the way), xxiii. 19, with iv. 14; חֵכְמוֹת (wisdom), xxiv. 7, with i. 20, ix. 1; and several others. But if, according to i. 7, we conceive of the older Book of Proverbs as accompanied with, rather than as without הַבְּרִי חֲכָמִים (words of wise men), then from the similarity of the two superscriptions xxiv. 23, xxv. 1, it is probable that the more recent half of the canonical book begins with xxiv. 23, and we cannot therefore determine to regard xxiv. 23 ff. also as a component part of the older Book of Proverbs; particularly since xxiv. 23b is like xxviii. 21a, and the author of the introduction can scarcely have twice taken into his book the two verses xxiv. 33 f., which moreover seem to stand in their original connection at vi. 10f.

The supplements to the Hezekiah-collection, xxx. f., are of so peculiar a form, that it will occur to no one (leaving out of view such expressions as רָעַת קְדוּשִׁים, knowledge of the Holy, xxx. 3, cf. ix. 10) to ascribe them to one of the authors of the preceding proverbs. We content ourselves here with a reference to Mühlau's work, De Proverbiorum quæ dicuntur Aguri et Lemuelis origine atque indole, 1869, where the Aramaic-Arabic colouring of this in all probability foreign section is closely investigated.

Having thus abundantly proved that the two groups of proverbs bearing the inscription מִשְׁלֵי שְׁכֵמָה are, as to their primary stock, truly old-Solomonic, though not without an admixture of imitations; that, on the contrary, the introduction, i. 7-ix., as well as the רִבְרֵי חֲכָמִים, xxii. 17-xxiv. and xxx. f., are not at all old-Solomonic, but belong to the editor of the older Book of Proverbs, which reaches down to xxiv. 22, so that thus the present book of the poetry of Solomon contains united with it the poems of the older editor, and besides of other poets, partly unknown Israelites, and partly two foreigners particularly named, Agur and Lemuel; we now turn our attention to the DOCTRINAL CONTENTS of the work, and ask whether a manifoldness in the type of instruction is noticeable in it, and whether there is perceptible in this manifoldness a progressive development. It may be possible that the Proverbs of Solomon, the Words of the Wise, and the Proverbial poetry of the editor, as they represent three eras, so also represent three different stages in the development of proverbial poetry. However, the Words of the Wise xxii. 17-xxiv. are so internally related to the Proverbs of Solomon, that even the sharpest eye will discover in them not more than the evening twilight of the vanishing Solomonic Mashal. There thus remain on the one side only the Proverbs of Solomon with their echo in the Words of the Wise, on the other the Proverbial Poems of the editor; and these present themselves as monuments of two sharply defined epochs in the progressive development of the Mashal.

The common fundamental character of the book in all its parts is rightly defined when we call it a Book of Wisdom. Indeed, with the Church Fathers not only the Book of Sirach and the Solomonic Apocrypha, but also this Book of Proverbs bears this title, which seems also to have been in use among the Jews, since Melito of Sardes adds to the title "Proverbs of Solomon," ἡ καὶ Σοφία; since, moreover, Eusebius (H. E. iv. 22) affirms, that not only Hegesippus and Irenæus, but the whole of the ancients, called the Proverbs of Solomon Πανάρετος Σοφία.<sup>1</sup> It is also worthy of observation that it is called by Dionysius of Alexandria ἡ σοφὴ βιβλος, and by Gregory of Nazianzum ἡ παιδαγωγικὴ σοφία. These names not only express praise of the book, but they also denote at the same time the circle of human intellectual activity from which it emanated. As the books of prophecy are a product of the נְבוּיָה, so the Book of the Proverbs is a product of the חֵכְמָה, σοφία, the human effort to apprehend the objective σοφία, and thus of φιλοσοφία, or the studium sapientiæ. It has emanated from the love of wisdom, to incite to the love of wisdom, and to put into the possession of that which is the object of love—for this end it was written. We need not hesitate, in view of Col. ii. 8, to call the Book of Proverbs a “philosophical” treatise, since the origin of the name φιλοσοφία is altogether noble: it expresses the relativity of human knowledge as over against the absoluteness of the divine knowledge, and the possibility of an endlessly progressive advancement of the human toward the divine. The characteristic ideas of a dialectic development of thought and of the formation of a scientific system did not primarily appertain to it—the occasion for this was not present to the Israelitish people: it required fructification through the Japhetic spirit to produce philosophers such as Philo, Maimonides, and Spinoza. But philosophy is everywhere present when the natural, moral, positive, is made the object of a meditation which seeks to apprehend its last ground, its legitimate coherence, its true essence and aim. In this view C. B. Michaelis, in his Adnotationes uberiores in Hagiographa, passes from the exposition of the Psalms to that of the Proverbs with the words, “From David’s closet, consecrated to prayer, we now pass into Solomon’s school of wisdom, to admire the greatest of philosophers in the son of the greatest of theologians.”<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This name [meaning “wisdom, including all virtue”], there are many things to show, was common in Palestine. The Jerusalem Talmud, in a passage quoted by Krochmal, Kerem Chemed, v. 79, divides the canon into תורה, נבואה, חכמה, and ספרי חכמה. Rashi, in Baba bathra, 14b, calls Mishle (Proverbs) and Koheleth (Ecclesiastes) ספרי חכמה. The Book of Koheleth is called (b. Megilla, 7a), according to its contents, חכמתו של שלמה. The Song bears in the Syriac version (the Peshito) the inscription chekmetho dechekmotho.

When we give the name φιλοσοφία to the tendency of mind to which the Book of Proverbs belongs, we do not merely use a current scientific word, but there is an actual internal relation of the Book of Proverbs to that which is the essence of philosophy, which Scripture recognises (Acts xvii. 27, cf. Rom. i. 19 f.) as existing within the domain of heathendom, and which stamps it as a natural product of the human spirit, which never can be wanting where a human being or a people rises to higher self-consciousness, and begins to reflect on the immediate self-consciousness and its operations in their changing relation to the phenomena of the external world. The mysteries of the world without him and of the world within him give man no rest, he must seek to solve them; and whenever he does that, he philosophizes, i.e. he strives after a knowledge of the nature of things, and of the laws which govern them in the world of phenomena and of events; on which account also Josephus, referring to Solomon's knowledge of nature, says (Ant. viii. 2. 5), οὐδεμίαν τούτων φύσιν ἠγγόησεν οὐδὲ παρήλθεν ἀνεξέταστον ἀλλ' ἐν πάσαις ἐφιλοσόφησεν. Cf. Irenæus, Cont. Her. iv. 27. 1: eam quæ est in conditione (κτίσει) sapientiam Dei exponebat physiologicè.

The historical books show us how much the age of Solomon favoured philosophical inquiries by its prosperity and peace, its active and manifold commercial intercourse with foreign nations, its circle of vision extending to Tarshish and Ophir, and also how Solomon himself attained to an unequalled elevation in the extent of his human and secular knowledge. We also read of some of the wise men in 1 Kings v. 11, cf. Ps. lxxxviii. lxxxix., who adorned the court of the wisest of kings; and the משל, which became, through his influence, a special branch of Jewish literature, is the peculiar poetic form of the חכמה. Therefore in the Book of Proverbs we find the name דברי חכמים (words of the wise) used for משלים (proverbs); and by a careful consideration of all the proverbs in which mention is made of the חכמים, one will convince himself that this name has not merely a common ethical sense, but begins to be the name of those who made wisdom, i.e. the knowledge of things in the depths of their essence, their special lifework, and who connected themselves together in oneness of sentiment and fellowship into a particular circle within the community. To this conclusion we are conducted by such proverbs as xiii. 20—

Sicut enim arenæ maris universas orbis oras circumdant, ita et sapientia ejus omnia humana non minus quam divina complexa est. In aphorismis vero illis præter alia magis theologica reperies liquido haud pauca præcepta et monita civilia præstantissima, ex profundis quidem sapientiæ penetralibus scaturientia atque in amplissimum varietatis campum excurrentia." Accordingly, in the same work Bacon calls the Proverbs of Solomon "insignes parabolas s. aphorismos de divina atque morali philosophia."

He that walketh with wise men becomes wise,
And whoever has intercourse with fools is destroyed ;

xv. 12—

The scorner loveth not that one reprove him :
To wise men he goeth not ;—

and by the contrast, which prevails in the Book of Proverbs, between  $\text{לֹצֵן}$  (mockers) and  $\text{חָכָם}$  (wise), in which we see that, at the same time with the striving after wisdom, scepticism also, which we call free thought, obtained a great ascendancy in Israel. Mockery of religion, rejection of God in principle and practice, a casting away of all fear of Jahve, and in general of all δαιμονία, were in Israel phenomena which had already marked the times of David. One may see from the Psalms that the community of the Davidic era is to be by no means regarded as furnishing a pattern of religious life : that there were in it  $\text{גוֹיִם}$  (Gentile nations) which were in no way externally inferior to them, and that it did not want for rejecters of God. But it is natural to expect that in the Solomonic era, which was more than any other exposed to the dangers of sensuality and worldliness, and of religious indifference and free-thinking latitudinarianism, the number of the  $\text{לֹצֵן}$  increased, and that scepticism and mockery became more intensified. The Solomonic era appears to have first coined the name of  $\text{לֹצֵן}$  for those men who despised that which was holy, and in doing so laid claim to wisdom (xiv. 6), who caused contention and bitterness when they spake, and carefully avoided the society of the  $\text{חַכְמִים}$ , because they thought themselves above their admonitions (xv. 12). For in the psalms of the Davidic time the word  $\text{בָּבֵל}$  is commonly used for them (it occurs in the Proverbs only in xvii. 21, with the general meaning of low fellow, Germ. Bube), and the name  $\text{לֹצֵן}$  is never met with except once, in Ps. i. 1, which belongs to the post-Davidic era. One of the Solomonic proverbs (xxi. 24) furnishes a definite idea of this newly formed word :

An inflated arrogant man they call a scorner ( $\text{לֹצֵן}$ ),
One who acts in the superfluity of haughtiness.

By the self-sufficiency of his ungodly thoughts and actions he is distinguished from the פְּתִי (simple), who is only misled, and may therefore be reclaimed, xix. 25, xxi. 11; by his non-recognition of the Holy in opposition to a better knowledge and better means and opportunities, he is distinguished from the כְּסִיל (foolish, stupid), xvii. 16, the אָוִיל (foolish, wicked), i. 7, vii. 22, and the הַסֵּר לֵב (the void of understanding), vi. 32, who despise truth and instruction from want of understanding, narrowness, and forgetfulness of God, but not from perverse principle. This name specially coined, the definition of it given (cf. also the similarly defining proverb xxiv. 8), and in general the rich and fine technical proverbs in relation to the manifold kinds of wisdom (בְּיָנָה, xvi. 16; בּוֹסֵר, i. 8; תְּבִינָה, xxi. 30; מְבִינָה, v. 2; תַּחְבֻּלֹת, i. 5, xii. 5; the תְּוֹשִׁיָה first coined by the Chokma, etc.), of instruction in wisdom (לְקַח, i. 5; תּוֹרָה, iv. 2, vi. 23; רָעָה, to tend a flock, to instruct, x. 21; חָנֵף, xxii. 6; הוֹכֵחַ, xv. 12; לְקַח נַפְשׁוֹת, to win souls, vi. 25, xi. 30), of the wise men themselves (הַכֵּם, xii. 15; נְבוֹן, x. 13; מוֹכִיחַ, a reprove, preacher of repentance, xxv. 12, etc.), and of the different classes of men (among whom also אָחָרִי, one who steps backwards [retrograder], xxviii. 23)—all this shows that חֵכְמָה was at that time not merely the designation of an ethical quality, but also the designation of a science rooted in the fear of God to which many noble men in Israel then addicted themselves. Jeremiah places (xviii. 18) the חֵכְם along with the כֹּהֵן (priest) and נְבִיא (prophet); and if Ezek. (vii. 26) uses זָקֵן (old man) instead of חֵכְם, yet by reference to Job xii. 12 this may be understood. In his "Dissertation on the popular and intellectual freedom of Israel from the time of the great prophets to the first destruction of Jerusalem" (Jahrbücher, i. 96 f.), Ewald says, "One can scarcely sufficiently conceive how high the attainment was which was reached in the pursuit after wisdom (philosophy) in the first centuries after David, and one too much overlooks the mighty influence it exerted on the entire development of the national life of Israel. The more closely those centuries are inquired into, the more are we astonished at the vast power which wisdom so early exerted on all sides as the common object of pursuit of many men among the people. It first openly manifested itself in special circles of the people, while in the age after Solomon, which was peculiarly favourable to it, eagerly inquisitive scholars gathered around individual masters, until ever increasing schools were formed. But its influence gradually penetrated all the other pursuits of the people, and operated on the most diverse departments of authorship." We are in entire sympathy with this historical view first advanced by Ewald, although we must frequently oppose the carrying of it out in details. The literature and the national history of Israel are certainly not understood if one does not take into consideration, along with the נְבִיאָה (prophecy), the influential development of the חֻמְרָה as a special aim and subject of intellectual activity in Israel.

And how was this Chokma conditioned—to what was it directed? To denote its condition and aim in one word, it was universalistic, or humanistic. Emanating from the fear or the religion of Jahve (הַדְרָה, the way of the Lord, x. 29), but seeking to comprehend the spirit in the letter, the essence in the forms of the national life, its effort was directed towards the general truth affecting mankind as such. While prophecy, which is recognised by the Chokma as a spiritual power indispensable to a healthful development of a people (בְּאֵין חוּזֵן יִפְרַע עִם, xxix. 18), is of service to the historical process into which divine truth enters to work out its results in Israel, and from thence outward among mankind, the Chokma seeks to look into the very essence of this truth through the robe of its historical and national manifestation, and then to comprehend those general ideas in which could already be discovered the fitness of the religion of Jahve for becoming the world-religion. From this aim towards the ideal in the historical, towards the everlasting same amid changes, the human (I intentionally use this word) in the Israelitish, the universal religion in the Jahve-religion (Jahvetum), and the universal morality in the Law, all the peculiarities of the Book of Proverbs are explained, as well as of the long, broad stream of the literature of the Chokma, beginning with Solomon, which, when the Palestinian Judaism assumed the rugged, exclusive, proud national character of Pharisaism, developed itself in Alexandrinism. Bertheau is amazed that in the Proverbs there are no warnings given against the worship of idols, which from the time of the kings gained more and more prevalence among the Israelitish people. "How is it to be explained," he asks (Spr. p. xlii.), "if the proverbs, in part at least, originated during the centuries of conflict between idolatry and the religion of Jahve, and if they were collected at a time in which this conflict reached its climax and stirred all ranks of the people—this conflict against the immorality of the Phœnician-Babylonian religion of nature, which must often have led into the same region of the moral contemplation of the world over which this book moves?!" The explanation lies in this, that the Chokma took its stand-point in a height and depth in which it had the mingling waves of international life and culture under it and above it, without being internally moved thereby. It naturally did not approve of heathenism, it rather looked upon the fear of Jahve as the beginning of wisdom, and the seeking after Jahve as implying the possession of all knowledge (xxviii. 5, cf. 1 John ii. 20); but it passed over the struggle of prophecy against heathendom, it confined itself to its own function, viz. to raise the treasures of general religious-moral truth in the Jahve-religion, and to use them for the ennobling of the Israelites as men. In vain do we look for the name חֵכֶמָה in the Proverbs, even the name חָכְמָה has a much more flexible idea attached to it than that of the law written at Sinai (cf. xxviii. 4, xxix. 18 with xxviii. 7, xiii. 14, and similar passages); prayer and good works are placed above sacrifice, xv. 8, xxi. 3, 27, —practical obedience to the teaching of wisdom above all, xxviii. 9. The Proverbs refer with special interest to Gen. i. and ii., the beginnings of the world and of the human race before nations took their origin. On this primitive record in the book of Genesis, to speak only of the עֵץ חַיָּים, the figure of the tree of life (perhaps also of the fountain of life), found nowhere else in the Old Testament, leans; on it leans also the contrast, deeply pervading the Proverbs, between life (immortality, xii. 28) and death, or between that which is above and that which is beneath (xv. 24); on it also many other expressions, such, e.g., as what is said in xx. 27 of the "spirit of man." This also, as Stier (Der Weise ein König, 1849, p. 240) has observed, accounts for the fact that רוּחַ אָדָם occurs by far most frequently in the Book of Job and in the Solomonic writings. All these phenomena are explained from the general human universal aim of the Chokma.

When James (iii. 17) says that the "wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy," his words most excellently designate the nature and the contents of the discourse of wisdom in the Solomonic proverbs, and one is almost inclined to think that the apostolic brother of the Lord, when he delineates wisdom, has before his eyes the Book of the Proverbs, which raises to purity by the most impressive admonitions. Next to its admonitions to purity are those especially to peacefulness, to gentle resignation (xiv. 30), quietness of mind (xiv. 33) and humility (xi. 2, xv. 33, xvi. 5, 18), to mercy (even toward beasts, xii. 10), to firmness and sincerity of conviction, to the furtherance of one's neighbour by means of wise discourse and kind help. What is done in the Book of Deuteronomy with reference to the law is continued here. As in Deuteronomy, so here, love is at the bottom of its admonitions, the love of God to men, and the love of men to one another in their diverse relations (xii. 2, xv. 9); the conception of  $\text{רַחֲמִים}$  gives way to that of charity, of almsgiving ( $\text{δικαιοσύνη} = \text{ἐλεημοσύνη}$ ). Forgiving, suffering love (x. 12), love which does good even to enemies (xxv. 21 f.), rejoices not over the misfortune that befalls an enemy (xxiv. 17 f.), retaliates not (xxiv. 28 f.), but commits all to God (xx. 22),—love in its manifold forms, as that of husband and wife, of children, of friends,—is here recommended with New Testament distinctness and with deepest feeling. Living in the fear of God (xxviii. 14), the Omniscient (xv. 3, 11, xvi. 2, xxi. 2, xxiv. 11 f.), to whom as the final Cause all is referred (xx. 12, 24, xiv. 31, xxii. 2), and whose universal plan all must subserve (xvi. 4, xix. 21, xxi. 30), and on the other side active pure love to man—these are the hinges on which all the teachings of wisdom in the Proverbs turn. Frederick Schlegel, in the fourteenth of his Lectures on the History of Literature, distinguishes, not without deep truth, between the historico-prophetic books of the Old Testament, or books of the history of redemption, and the Book of Job, the Psalms, and the Solomonic writings, as books of aspiration, corresponding to the triple chord of faith, hope, charity as the three stages of the inner spiritual life. The Book of Job is designed to support faith amid trials; the Psalms breathe forth and exhibit hope amid the conflicts of earth's longings; the Solomonic writings reveal to us the mystery of the divine love, and the Proverbs that wisdom which grows out of and is itself eternal love. When Schlegel in the same lecture says that the books of the Old Covenant, for the most part, stand under the signature of the lion as the element of the power of will and spirited conflict glowing in divine fire, but that in the inmost hidden kernel and heart of the sacred book the Christian figure of the lamb rises up out of the veil of this lion strength, this may specially be said of the Book of Proverbs, for here that same heavenly wisdom preaches, which, when manifested in person, spake in the Sermon on the Mount, New Testament love in the midst of the Old Testament.

It is said that in the times before Christ there was a tendency to apocryphize not only the Song of Solomon and Ecclesiastes, but also the Book of Proverbs, and that for the first time the men of the Great Synagogue established their canonicity on the ground of their spiritual import; they became perplexed about the Proverbs, according to b. Sabbath, 30*b*, on account of such self-contradictory proverbs as xxvi. 4, 5, and according to Aboth de-Rabbi Nathan, c. 1, on account of such secular portions as that of the wanton woman, vii. But there is no need to allegorize this woman, and that self-contradiction is easily explained. The theopneustic character of the book and its claim to canonicity show themselves from its integral relation to the Old Testament preparation for redemption; but keeping out of view the book as a whole, it is self-evident that the conception of a practical proverb such as xiv. 4 and of a prophecy such as Isa. vii. 14 are very different phenomena of the spiritual life, and that in general the operation of the Divine Spirit in a proverb is different from that in a prophecy.

We have hitherto noted the character of the instruction set forth in the Proverbs according to the marks common to them in all their parts, but in such a way that we have taken our proofs only from the "Proverbs of Solomon" and the "Words of the Wise," with the exclusion of the introductory proverbial poems of the older editor. If we compare the two together, it cannot be denied that in the type of the instruction contained in the latter, the Chokma, of which the book is an emanation and which it has as its aim (לְרַעַת חֵכְמָה, i. 2), stands before us in proportionally much more distinctly defined comprehension and form; we have the same relation before us whose adumbration is the relation of the instruction of wisdom in the Avesta and in the later Minochired (Spiegel, Parsi-Grammatik, p. 182 ff.). The Chokma appears also in the "Proverbs of Solomon" as a being existing in and for itself, which is opposed to ambiguous subjective thought (xxviii. 26); but here there is attributed to it an objectivity even to an apparent personality: it goes forth preaching, and places before all men life and death for an eternally decisive choice, it distributes the spirit to those who do not resist (i. 23), it receives and answers prayer (i. 28). The speculation regarding the Chokma is here with reference to Job xxviii. (cf. Prov. ii. 4, iii. 14 f., viii. 11, 19), and particularly to xxviii. 27, where a demiurgic function is assigned to wisdom, carried back to its source in eternity: it is the medium by which the world was created, iii. 19; it was before the creation of the world with God as from everlasting, His son of royal dignity, viii. 22-26; it was with Him in His work of creation, viii. 27-30; after the creation it remained as His delight, rejoicing always before Him, and particularly on the earth among the sons of men, viii. 30 f. Staudenmaier (Lehre von der Idee, p. 37) is certainly not on the wrong course, when under this rejoicing of wisdom before God he understands the development of the ideas or life-thoughts intimately bound up in it—the world-idea. This development is the delight of God, because it represents to the divine contemplation the contents of wisdom, or of the world-idea founded in the divine understanding, in all its activities and inner harmonies; it is a calm delight, because the divine idea unites with the fresh and ever young impulse of life, the purity, goodness, innocence, and holiness of life, because its spirit is light, clear, simple, childlike, in itself peaceful, harmonious, and happy; and this delight is experienced especially on the earth among the sons of men, among whom wisdom has its delight; for, as the divine idea, it is in all in so far as it is the inmost life-thought, the soul of each being, but it is on the earth of men in whom it comes to its self-conception, and self-conscious comes forth into the light of the clear day. Staudenmaier has done the great service of having worthily estimated the rich and deep fulness of this biblical theologumenon of wisdom, and of having pointed out in it the foundation-stone of a sacred metaphysics and a means of protection against pantheism in all its forms. We see that in the time of the editor of the older Book of Proverbs the wisdom of the schools in its devotion to the chosen object of its pursuit, the divine wisdom living and moving in all nature, and forming the background of all things, rises to a height of speculation on which it has planted a banner showing the right way to latest times. Ewald rightly points to the statements in the introduction to the Proverbs regarding wisdom as a distinct mark of the once great power of wisdom in Israel; for they show us how this power learned to apprehend itself in its own purest height, after it had become as perfect, and at the same time also as self-conscious, as it could at all become in ancient Israel.

Many other appearances also mark the advanced type of instruction contained in the introduction. Hitzig's view (Sprüche, p. xvii. f.), that i. 6-ix. 18 are the part of the whole collection which was earliest written, confutes itself on all sides; on the contrary, the views of Bleek in his Introduction to the Old Testament, thrown out in a sketchy manner and as if by a diviner, surprisingly agree with our own results, which have been laboriously reached and are here amply established. The advanced type of instruction in the introduction, i.—ix., appears among other things in this, that we there find the allegory, which up to this place occurs in Old Testament literature only in scattered little pictures built up into independent poetic forms, particularly in ix., where without any contradiction אִשָּׁת פְּסִילִית [a simple woman, v. 13] is an allegorical person. The technical language of the Chokma has extended itself on many sides and been refined (we mention these synonyms: הַחֵכְמָה, הָעֵצָה, בֵּינָה, עֲרֻמָּה, מְזֻמָּה, מִיֶּסֶד, תְּרוּמָה); and the seven pillars in the house of wisdom, even though it be inadmissible to think of them as the seven liberal arts, yet point to a division into seven parts of which the poet was conscious to himself. The common address, בְּנִי [my son], which is not the address of the father to the son, but of the teacher to the scholar, countenances the supposition that there were at that time בְּנֵי חֲכָמִים, i.e. scholars of the wise men, just as there were “sons of the prophets” (בְּנֵי נְבִיאִים), and probably also schools of wisdom. “And when it is described how wisdom spake aloud to the people in all the streets of Jerusalem, in the high places of the city and in every favourable place, does not one feel that such sublime descriptions could not be possible unless at that time wisdom were regarded by the people as one of the first powers, and the wise men truly displayed a great public activity?” We must answer this question of Ewald’s in the affirmative.

Bruch, in his Weisheitslehre der Hebraer, 1851, was the first to call special attention to the Chokma or humanism as a peculiar intellectual tendency in Israel; but he is mistaken in placing it in an indifferent and even hostile relation to the national law and the national cultus, which he compares to the relation of Christian philosophy to orthodox theology. Oehler, in his Grundzüge der alttestamentl. Weisheit, which treats more especially of the doctrinal teachings of the Book of Job, judges more correctly; cf. also his comprehensive article, Pädagogik des A. T. in Schmid’s Pädagogischer Encyclopädie, pp. 653–695 (partic. 677–683).

5. The Alexandrian Translation of the Book of Proverbs.—Of highest interest for the history of the Book of Proverbs is the relation of the LXX. to the Hebrew text. One half of the proverbs of Agur (xxx. of the Hebrew text) are placed in it after xxiv. 22, and the other half after xxiv. 34; and the proverbs of King Lemuel (xxxi. 1-9 of the Hebrew text) are placed after the proverbs of Agur, while the acrostic proverbial poem of the virtuous woman is in its place at the end of the book. That transposition reminds us of the transpositions in Jeremiah, and rests in the one place as well as in the other on a misunderstanding of the true contents. The translator has set aside the new superscription, x. 1, as unsuitable, and has not marked the new beginning, xxii. 17; he has expunged the new superscription, xxiv. 23, and has done the same to the superscription, "The words of Agur" (xxx. 1), in two awkward explanations (λόγον φυλασσόμενος and τοὺς ἐμοὺς λόγους φοβήθητι), and the superscription, "The words of Lemuel" (xxxi. 1), in one similar (οἱ ἐμοὶ λόγοι εἴρηνται ὑπὸ Θεοῦ), so that the proverbs of Agur and of Lemuel are without hesitation joined with those of Solomon, whereby it yet remains a mystery why the proverbs beginning with "The words of Agur" have been divided into two parts. Hitzig explains it from a confounding of the columns in which, two being on each page, the Hebrew ms. which lay before the translator was written, and in which the proverbs of Agur and of Lemuel (names which tradition understood symbolically of Solomon) were already ranked in order before ch. xxv. But besides these, there are also many other singular things connected with this Greek translation interesting in themselves and of great critical worth. That it omits i. 16 may arise from this, that this verse was not found in the original ms., and was introduced from Isa. lix. 7; but there are wanting also proverbs such as xxi. 5, for which no reason can be assigned. But the additions are disproportionately more numerous. Frequently we find a line added to the distich, such as in i. 18, or an entire distich added, as iii. 15; or of two lines of the Hebrew verse, each is formed into a separate distich, as i. 7, xi. 16; or we meet with longer interpolations, extending far beyond this measure, as that added to iv. 27. Many of these proverbs are easily re-translated into the Hebrew, as that added to iv. 27, consisting of four lines:

כי דרבי מימינים ידע יהוה
ענקשים דרבי משמאילים

הוא יפלם מענלוהוֹיך
: אדרוהוֹיך בשלום יצליח :

But many of them also sound as if they had been originally Greek; e.g. the lines appended to ix. 10, xiii. 15; the distich, vi. 11; the imperfect tristich, xxii. 14; and the formless trian, xxv. 10. The value of these enlargements is very diverse; not a few of these proverbs are truly thoughtful, such as the addition to xii. 13—

He who is of mild countenance findeth mercy;

He who is litigious crushes souls—and singularly bold in imagery, as the addition to ix. 12—

He who supports himself by lies hunts after (רעה) the wind,

He catches at fluttering birds;

For he forsakes the ways of his own vineyard,

And wanders away from the paths of his own field,

And roams through arid steppes and a thirsty land,

And gathers with his hand withered heath.

The Hebrew text lying before the Alexandrian translators had certainly not all these additions, yet in many passages, such as xi. 16, it is indeed a question whether it is not to be improved from the LXX.; and in other passages, where, if one reads the Greek, the Hebrew words naturally take their place, whether these are not at least old Hebrew marginal notes and interpolations which the translation preserves. But this version itself has had its gradual historical development. The text, the κοινή (communis), proceeds from the Hexaplar text edited by Origen, which received from him many and diverse revisions; and in the times before Christ, perhaps (as Hitz. supposes), down to the second century after Christ, the translation itself, not being regarded as complete, was in the progress of growth, for not unfrequently two different translations of one and the same proverb stand together, as xiv. 22, xxix. 25 (where also the Peshito follows the LXX. after which it translates), or also interpenetrate one another, as xxii. 8, 9. These doubled translations are of historical importance both in relation to the text and to the interpretation of it. Along with the Books of Samuel and Jeremiah, there is no book in regard to which the LXX. can be of higher significance than the Book of Proverbs; we shall seek in the course of our exposition duly to estimate the text<sup>1</sup> as adopted by Bertheau (1847) and Hitzig (1858) in their commentaries, and by Ewald in his Jahrb. xi. (1861) and his commentary (2d ed. 1867). The historical importance of the Egyptian text-recension is heightened by this circumstance, that the old Syrian translator of the Solomonic writings had before him not only the original text, but also the LXX.; for the current opinion, that the Peshito, as distinguished from the Syro-Hexaplar version, sprang solely from the original text with the assistance of the Targum, is more and more shown to be erroneous. In the Book of Proverbs the relation of the Peshito and Targum is even the reverse; the Targum of the Proverbs, making use of the Peshito, restores the Masoretic text,—the points of contact with the LXX. showing themselves here and there, are brought about<sup>1</sup> by the Peshito. But that Jerome, in his translation of the Vulgate according to the Hebræa veritas, sometimes follows the LXX. in opposition to the original text, is to be explained with Hitzig from the fact that he based his work on an existing Latin translation made from the LXX. Hence it comes that the two distichs added in the LXX. to iv. 27 remain in his work, and that instead of the one distich, xv. 6, we have two:—In abundanti (after the phrase בָּרַבִּי instead of בְּיָתִי of the Masoretic text) justitia virtus maxima est, cogitationes autem impiorum eradicabuntur. Domus (בֵּיתִי) justi plurima fortitudo, et in fructibus impij conturbatio; for Jerome has adopted the two translations of the LXX., correcting the second according to the original text.<sup>2</sup>

der Proverbien, 1863; M. Heidenheim's Zur Textkritik der Proverbien, in his Quarterly Journal for German and English Theological Criticism and Investigation, No. VIII. (1865), and IX., XI. (1866). The text of the LXX. (cf. Angelo Mai's Classici Auctores, t. ix.) used by Procopius in his 'Ἑρμηνεία εἰς τὰς παροιμίας' is peculiar, and here and there comes near to the Hebrew original. The scholion of Evagrius in the Σχόλια εἰς τὰς παροιμίας of Origen, edited by Tischendorf in his Notitia, 1860, from a MS. of Patmos, shows how soon even the Hexaplar text became ambiguous.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Dathe, De ratione consensu Versionis Syriacæ et Chaldaicæ Proverbiorum Salomonis (1764), edited by Rosenmüller in his Opuscula. Maybaum, in the Treatise on the Language of the Targum to the Proverbs and its relation to the Syriac, in Merx's Archiv, ii. 66-93, labours in vain to give the priority to that of the Targum: the Targum is written from the Peshito, and here and there approaches the Hebrew text; the language is, with few differences, the Syriac of the original.

<sup>2</sup> The Ethiopic translation, also, is in particular points, as well as on the whole, dependent on the LXX., for it divides the Book of Proverbs into proverbs (παροιμίας), i. -xxiv., and instructions (παιδείαι) of Solomon, xxv.-xxxi. Vid. Dillmann in Ewald's Jahrb. v. 147, 150.

The fragments of the translations of Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, etc., contained in Greek and Syrian sources, have been recently collected, more perfectly than could have been done by Montfaucon, by Fried. Field, in his work Origenis Hexaplorum quæ supersunt, etc. (Oxonii, 1867, 4). Of special interest is the more recent translation of the original text, existing only in a MS. laid up in the Library of St. Mark [at Venice], executed in bold language, rich in rare and newly invented words, by an unknown author, and belonging to an age which has not yet been determined (Græcus Venetus): cf. d'Ansse de Villoison's nova versio Græca Proverborum, Ecclesiastis, Cantici Canticorum, etc., Argentorati, 1784; and also the Animadversiones thereto of Jo. Ge. Dahler, 1786.

The literature of the interpretation of the Book of Proverbs is found in Keil's Einleitung in das A. T. (1859), p. 346 f. [Manual of Historico-Critical Introduction to the Old Testament, translated by Professor Douglas, D.D., Free Church College, Glasgow. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark. Vol. i. p. 468 f.]. The most important of the older linguistic works on this book is the commentary of Albert Schultens (Lugduni Batavorum, 1748, 4), whose service to the cause of Semitic philology and O. T. exegesis Mühlau has brought to remembrance in the Lutheran Zeitschrift, 1870, 1; Vogel's abstract (Halæ, 1769), prefaced by Semler, does not altogether compensate for the original work. From the school of Schultens, and also from that of Schröder, originate the Anmerkungen by Alb. Jac. Arnoldi, maternal grandson of Schultens, a Latin edition of which was published (Lugduni Bat. 1783) by Henr. Alb. Schultens, the grandson of Schultens by his son. Among the commentaries of English interpreters, that in Latin by Thomas Cartwright (Amstelredami, 1663, 4), along with the Exposition of the Book of Proverbs by Charles Bridges (4th ed., London, 1859), hold an honourable place. The Critical Remarks on the Books of Job, Proverbs, etc., by D. Durell (Oxford, 1772, 4), also merit attention. Of more recent commentaries, since Keil gave his list of the literature of the subject, have been published those of Elster (1858) and of Zöckler (1867), forming a part of the theologico-homiletical Bibelwerk edited by J. P. Lange. Chaps. xxv.–xxix. Rud. Stier has specially interpreted in two works entitled Der

Weise ein König ["The Wise Man a King"], and Salomonis Weisheit in Hiskiastagen ["Solomon's Wisdom in the Days of Hezekiah"], 1849; and chapters xxx. xxxi. in a work entitled Die Politik der Weisheit ["The Politics of Wisdom"], 1850. Part III. (1865) of the new exegetico-critical Aehrenlese ["Gleanings"] of Fried. Böttcher, edited by Mühlau, furnishes 39 pages of remarks on the Proverbs. Leop. Dukes, author of the Rabbinical Blumenlese ["Anthology"], 1844, and the Schrift zur rabbinischen Spruchkunde, 1851, has published (1841) a commentary to the Proverbs in Cahen's French Bibelwerk. There also is furnished a list of Jewish interpreters down to the appearance of L. H. Loewenstein's Commentary (1838), which contains valuable contributions to the critical confirmation of the Masoretic text, in which Heidenheim's MS. remains, and also the Codex of 1294 mentioned in my preface to Baer's edition of the Psalter, and in the Specimen Lectionum of Baer's edition of Genesis, are made use of. Among Malbim's best works are, after his Commentary on Isaiah, that on the Mishle (Warsaw, 1867). [Vide Preface.]

THE OLDER BOOK OF PROVERBS.

I.-XXIV.

SUPERSCRPTION AND MOTTO, I. 1-7.

THE external title, i.e. the Synagogue name, of the whole collection of Proverbs is מְשָׁלִי (Mishle), the word with which it commences. Origen (Euseb. H. E. vi. 25) uses the name Μισλώθ, i.e. מִשְׁלוֹת, which occurs in the Talmud and Midrash as the designation of the book, from its contents. In a similar way, the names given to the Psalter, תְּהִלִּים and תְּהִלּוֹת, are interchanged.

This external title is followed by one which the Book of Proverbs, viewed as to its gradual formation, and first the older portion, gives to itself. It reaches from i. 1 to ver. 6, and names not only the contents and the author of the book, but also commends it in regard to the service which it is capable of rendering. It contains "Proverbs of Solomon, the son of David, king of Israel." The books of the נְבוּאָה and חִכְמָה, including the Canticles, thus give their own titles; among the historical books, that of the memoirs of Nehemiah is the only one that does so. מְשָׁלִי has the accent Declî, to separate<sup>1</sup> it from the following complex genitive which it governs, and מֶלֶךְ יִשְׂרָאֵל is made the second hemistich, because it belongs to שְׁלֵמָה, not to דָּוִד.<sup>2</sup> As to the fundamental idea of the word מְשָׁלִי, we refer to the derivation given in the Gesch. der jud. Poesie, p. 196, from מְשָׁל, Aram. מְתָל, root תל, Sanskr. tul (whence tulâ, balance, similarity), Lat. tollere; the comparison of the Arab. mathal leads to the same conclusion. “מִשָּׁל signifies, not, as Schultens and others after him affirm, effigies ad similitudinem alius rei expressa, from מִשָּׁל in the primary signification premere, premente manu tractare; for the corresponding Arab. verb mathal does not at all bear that meaning, but signifies to stand, to present oneself, hence to be like, properly to put oneself forth as something, to represent it; and in the Hebr. also to rule, properly with עָל to stand on or over something, with אָ to hold it erect, like Arab. kam with b, rem administravit [vid. Jesaia, p. 691]. Thus e.g., Gen. xxiv. 2, it is said of Eliezer: הַמִּשָּׁל בְּכָל-אֲשֶׁר-לִי, who ruled over all that he (Abraham) had (Luther: was a prince over all his goods). Thus מִשָּׁל, figurative discourse which represents that which is real, similitude; hence then parable or shorter apothegm, proverb, in so far as they express primarily something special, but which as a general symbol is then applied to everything else of a like kind, and in so far stands figuratively. An example is found in 1 Sam. x. 11 f. It is incorrect to conclude from this meaning of the word that such memorial sayings or proverbs usually contained comparisons, or were clothed in figurative language; for that is the case in by far the fewest number of instances: the oldest have by far the simplest and most special interpretations” (Fleischer). Hence Mashal, according to its fundamental idea, is that which stands with something = makes something stand forth = representing. This something that represents may be a thing or a person; as e.g. one may say Job is a Mashal, i.e. a representant, similitude, type of Israel (vide the work entitled עַן הַחַיִּים, by Ahron b. Elia, c. 90, p. 143); and, like Arab. mathal (more commonly mithl = מִשָּׁל, cf. מִשָּׁל, Job xli. 25), is used quite as generally as is its etymological cogn. instar (instare). But in Hebr. Mashal always denotes representing discourse with the additional marks of the figurative and concise, e.g. the section which presents (Hab. ii. 6) him to whom it refers as a warning example, but particularly, as there defined, the gnome, the apothegm or maxim, in so far as this represents general truths in sharply outlined little pictures.

<sup>2</sup> If it had belonged to דָּוִד, then the sentence would have been accented thus: מְשָׁלִי שְׁלֵמָה בְּדָוִד מֶלֶךְ יִשְׂרָאֵל.

Ver. 2. Now follows the statement of the object which these proverbs subserve; and first, in general,

To become acquainted with wisdom and instruction,
To understand intelligent discourses.

They seek on the one side to initiate the reader in wisdom and instruction, and on the other to guide him to the understanding of intelligent discourses, for they themselves contain such discourses in which there is a deep penetrating judgment, and they sharpen the understanding of him who engages his attention with them.<sup>1</sup> As Schultens has already rightly determined the fundamental meaning of יָדַע, frequently compared with the Sanskr. vid, to know (whence by gunating,<sup>2</sup> vēda, knowledge), after the Arab. wad'a, as deponere, penes se condere, so he also rightly explains חִכְמָה by soliditas; it means properly (from חָכַם, Arab. hakm, R. hk, vide under Ps. x. 8, to be firm, closed) compactness, and then, like πικνότης, ability, worldly wisdom, prudence, and in the higher general sense, the knowledge of things in the essence of their being and in the reality of their existence. Along with wisdom stands the moral בְּיָסוּר, properly discipline, i.e. moral instruction, and in conformity with this, self-government, self-guidance, from יָסַר = יָסַר, cogn. אָסַר, properly adstrictio or constrictio; for the ׀ of the noun signifies both id quod or aliquid quod (δ,τι) and quod in the conjunctive sense (δτι), and thus forms both a concrete (like מוֹסֵר = בְּאֵסַר, fetter, chain) and an abstract idea. The first general object of the Proverbs is יָדַעַת, the reception into oneself of wisdom and moral edification by means of education and training; the second is to comprehend utterances of intelligence, i.e. such as proceed from intelligence and give expression to it (cf. אָמַרְי אֶמֶת, xxii. 21). בָּרַז, Kal, to be distinguished (whence בָּרַז, between, constr. of בָּרַז, space between, interval), signifies in Hiph. to distinguish, to understand; בִּינָה is, according to the sense, the n. actionis of this Hiph., and signifies the understanding as the capability effective in the possession of the right criteria of distinguishing between the true and the false, the good and the bad (1 Kings iii. 9), the wholesome and the pernicious.

Vers. 3-5. In the following, 2*a* is expanded in vers. 3-5, then 2*b* in ver. 6. First the immediate object:

- 3 To attain intelligent instruction,
Righteousness, and justice, and integrity;
- 4 To impart to the inexperienced prudence,
To the young man knowledge and discretion
- 5 Let the wise man hear and gain learning,
And the man of understanding take to himself rules of conduct.

With רָצַח, denoting the reception into oneself, acquiring, is interchanged (cf. ii. 1) קָחַת, its synonym, used of intellectual reception and appropriation, which, contemplated from the point of view of the relation between the teacher and the learner, is the correlative of תָּת, παραδιδόναι, tradere (ix. 9). But מוֹסַר הַשֵּׁבֶל is that which proceeds from chokma and musar when they are blended together: discipline of wisdom, discipline training to wisdom; i.e. such morality and good conduct as rest not on external inheritance, training, imitation, and custom, but is bound up with the intelligent knowledge of the Why and the Wherefore. הַשֵּׁבֶל, as xxi. 16, is inf. absol. used substantively (cf. הִשְׁקַט, keeping quiet, Isa. xxxii. 17) of שֵׁבֶל (whence שֵׁבֶל, intellectus), to entwine, involve; for the thinking through a subject is represented as an interweaving, complicating, configuring of the thoughts (the syllogism is in like manner represented as אֲשֵׁבֶל, Aram. סִנּוּל, a bunch of grapes), (with which also כֹּבֵל, a fool, and הִסְבִּיל, to act foolishly, are connected, from the confusion of the thoughts, the entangling of the conceptions; cf. Arab. 'akl, to understand, and מְעַבֵּל). The series of synonyms (cf. xxiii. 23) following in 3*b*, which are not well fitted to be the immediate object to לְקַחַת, present themselves as the unfolding of the contents of the מוֹסַר הַשֵּׁבֶל, as meaning that namely which is dutiful and right and honest. With the frequently occurring two conceptions צְדָקָה וּמִשְׁפָּט (ii. 9), (or with the order reversed as in Ps. cxix. 121) is interchanged צְדָקָה וּמִשְׁפָּט (or with the order also reversed, xxi. 3). The remark of Heidenheim, that in צְדָקָה the conception of the justum, and in צְדָקָה that of the aequum prevails, is suggested by the circumstance that not צְדָקָה but צְדָקָה signifies δικαιοσύνη (cf. x. 2) in the sense of liberality, and then of almsgiving (ἐλεημοσύνη); but צְדָקָה also frequently signifies a way of thought and action which is regulated not by the letter of the law and by talio, but by love (cf. Isa. xli. 2, xlii. 6). Tsedek and ts'dakah have almost the relation to one another of integrity and justice which practically brings the former into exercise. מִשְׁפָּט (from שָׁפַט, to make straight, to adjust, cf. שָׁבַט, Arab. sabita, to be smooth) is the right and the righteousness in which it realizes itself, here subjectively considered, the right mind.<sup>1</sup> מִישְׁרִים (defect. for מישרים, from יָשַׁר, to be straight, even) is plur. tantum; for its sing. מִישָׁר.

<sup>1</sup> According to Malbim, מִשְׁפָּט is the fixed objective right, צְדָקָה the righteousness which does not at once decide according to the letter of the law, but always according to the matter and the person.

(after the form מִיִּטְבֵּב the form מִיִּשׁוֹר (in the same ethical sense, e.g. Mal. ii. 6) is used: it means thus a way of thought and of conduct that is straight, i.e. according to what is right, true, i.e. without concealment, honest, i.e. true to duty and faithful to one's word.

Ver. 4. This verse presents another aspect of the object to be served by this book: it seeks to impart prudence to the simple. The form פְּתָאִים<sup>1</sup> (in which, as in גִּיִּים, the ם plur. remains unwritten) is, in this mongrel form in which it is written (cf. vii. 7, viii. 5, ix. 6, xiv. 18, xxvii. 12), made up of פְּתִיִּים (i. 22, 32, once written plene, פְּתִיִּים, xxii. 3) and פְּתָאִים (vii. 7). These two forms with ם and the transition of ם into ם are interchanged in the plur. of such nouns as פְּתִי, segolate form, "from פְּתָה (cogn. פְּתָה), to be open, properly the open-hearted, i.e. one whose heart stands open to every influence from another, the harmless, good-natured,—a vox media among the Hebrews commonly (though not always, cf. e.g. Ps. cxvi. 6) in malam partem: the foolish, silly, one who allows himself to be easily persuaded or led astray, like similar words in other languages—Lat. simplex, Gr. εὐήθης, Fr. naïf; Arab. fatyn, always, however, in a good sense: a high and noble-minded man, not made as yet mistrustful and depressed by sad experiences, therefore juvenis ingenuus, vir animi generosi" (Fl.). The פְּתָאִים, not of firm and constant mind, have need of עֲרָמָה; therefore the saying xiv. 15, cf. viii. 5, xix. 25. The noun עֲרָמָה (a fem. segolate form like חֲכָמָה) means here calliditas in a good sense, while the corresponding Arab. 'aram (to be distinguished from the verb 'aram, עָרַם, to peel, to make bare, nudare) is used only in a bad sense, of malevolent, deceptive conduct. In the parallel member the word יָעַר is used, generally (collectively) understood, of the immaturity which must first obtain intellectual and moral clearness and firmness; such an one is in need of peritia et sollertia, as Fleischer well renders it; for יָעַר is experimental knowledge, and מְצִיָּה (from צָמַץ, according to its primary signification, to press together, comprimere; then, referred to mental concentration: to think) signifies in the sing., sensu bono, the capability of comprehending the right purposes, of seizing the right measures, of projecting the right plans.

Ver. 5. In this verse the infinitives of the object pass into independent sentences for the sake of variety. That  $\text{שָׁמַע}$  cannot mean audiet, but audiat, is shown by ix. 9; but  $\text{שָׁמַע}$  is jussive (with the tone thrown back before  $\text{לֵאמֹר}$ ; cf. x. 9, and xvi. 21, 23 where the tone is not thrown back, as also 2 Sam. xxiv. 3) with the consecutive Vav (י) (= Arab.  $\text{ف}$ , f): let him hear, thus will he . . . or, in order that he. Whoever is wise is invited to hear these proverbs in order to add learning (doctrinam) to that which he already possesses, according to the principle derived from experience, ix. 9, Matt. xiii. 12. The segolate  $\text{לָקַח}$ , which in pausa retains its  $\text{־}$  (as also  $\text{לָשַׁע}$ ,  $\text{לָצַח}$ ,  $\text{לָמַד}$ ,  $\text{לָדַק}$ ,  $\text{לָרַם}$ , and others), means reception, and concretely what one takes into himself with his ear and mind; therefore learning ( $\text{διδασχῆ}$  with the object of the  $\text{ἀποδοσχῆ}$ ), as Deut. xxxii. 2 (parallel  $\text{אָמַרָה}$ , as iv. 2  $\text{תּוֹרָה}$ ), and then learning that has passed into the possession of the receiver, knowledge, science (Isa. xxix. 24, parall.  $\text{בִּינָה}$ ). Schultens compares the Arab. lakah, used of the fructification of the female palm by the flower-dust of the male. The part.  $\text{נָבֵן}$  (the fin. of which is found only once, Isa. x. 13) is the passive or the reflexive of the Hiph.  $\text{נָבַן}$ , to explain, to make to understand: one who is caused to understand or who lets himself be informed, and thus an intelligent person—that is one who may gain  $\text{תְּהִבְלוֹתָ$  by means of these proverbs. This word, found only in the plur. (probably connected with  $\text{תְּבַל}$ , shipmaster, properly one who has to do with the  $\text{תְּבָלִים}$ , ship's ropes, particularly handles the sails, LXX.  $\text{κυβέρνησις}$ ), signifies guidance, management, skill to direct anything (Job xxxii. 7, of God's skill which directs the clouds), and in the plur. conception, the taking measures, designs, in a good sense, or also (as in xii. 5) in a bad sense; here it means guiding thoughts, regulating principles, judicious rules and maxims, as xi. 14, prudent rules of government, xx. 18, xxiv. 6 of stratagems. Fl. compares the Arab. tedbîr (guidance, from  $\text{דָּבַר}$ , to lead cattle), with its plur. tedâbîr, and the Syr. dubôro, direction, management, etc.

Ver. 6. The mediate object of these proverbs, as stated in ver. 2*b*, is now expanded, for again it is introduced in the infinitive construction:—The reader shall learn in these proverbs, or by means of them as of a key, to understand such like apothegms generally (as xxii. 17 ff.):

To understand proverb and symbol,
The words of wise men and their enigmas.

In the Gesch. der jüd. Poesie, p. 200 f., the derivation of the noun מְלִיצָה is traced from לָץ, primarily to shine, Sanskr. las, frequently with the meanings ludere and lucere; but the Arab. brings near another primary meaning. “מְלִיצָה, from Arab. root las, flexit, torsit, thus properly oratio detorta, obliqua, non aperta; hence לָץ, mocker, properly qui verbis obliquis utitur: as Hiph. הִלִּץ, to scoff, but also verba detorta retorquere, i.e. to interpret, to explain” (Fl.). Of the root ideas found in הִירָה, to be sharp, pointed (חָר, perhaps related to the Sanskr. katu, sharp of taste, but not to acutus), and to be twisted (cf. אָחַד, אָנַר, אָנַר, אָנַר, harmonizing with the at present mysterious catena), the preference is given to the latter already, Ps. lxxviii. 2. “The Arab. hād, to revolve, to turn (whence hid, bend, turn aside!), thence הִירָה, στροφή, cunning, intrigue, as also enigma, dark saying, perplexè dictum” (Fl.) The comparison made by Schultens with the Arab. hidt as the name of the knot on the horn of the wild-goat shows the sensible fundamental conception. In post-biblical literature חִירָה is the enigma proper, and מְלִיצָה poetry (with הִלִּצָה of poetical prose). The Græc. Venet. translates it ῥητοπέλας.

Ver. 7. The title of the book is followed by its motto, symbol, device:

The fear of Jahve is the beginning of knowledge;
Wisdom and discipline is despised by fools.

The first hemistich expresses the highest principle of the Israelitish Chokma, as it is found also in ix. 10 (cf. xv. 33), Job xxviii. 28, and in Ps. cxi. 10 (whence the LXX. has interpolated here two lines). רֵאשִׁית combines in itself, as ἀρχή, the ideas of initium (accordingly J. H. Michaelis: initium cognitionis, a quo quisquis recte philosophari cupit auspiciam facere debet) and principium, i.e. the basis, thus the root (cf. Mic. i. 13 with Job xix. 28).<sup>1</sup> Wisdom comes from God, and whoever fears Him receives it (cf. Jas. i. 5 f.). יִרְאָה יְהוָה is reverential subordination to the All-directing, and since designedly יְהוָה is used, and not אֱלֹהִים (ה), to the One God, the Creator and Governor of the world, who gave His law unto Israel, and also beyond Israel left not His holy will unattested; the reverse side of the fear of Jahve as the Most Holy One is רַע וְשָׂנְאָתָּהּ, viii. 13 (post-biblical יִרְאָתָּהּ הַמְּאֹד). The inverted placing of the words 7b imports that the wisdom and discipline which one obtains in the way of the fear of God is only despised by the אֲדִיִּים, i.e. the hard, thick, stupid; see regarding the root-word לִיִּים, coalescere, cohærere, incrassari, der Prophet Jesaia, p. 424, and at Ps. lxxiii. 4. Schultens rightly compares παχεῖς, crassi pro stupidis.<sup>1</sup> בָּוֹ has the tone on the penult., and thus comes from בָּב; the 3d pr. of בָּוֹת would be בָּוֹת or בָּוֹת. The perf. (cf. ver. 29) is to be interpreted after the Lat. oderunt (Ges. § 126).

FIRST INTRODUCTORY MASHAL DISCOURSE, I. 8-19.

WARNING AGAINST FELLOWSHIP WITH THOSE WHO SIN AGAINST THEIR NEIGHBOUR'S LIFE AND PROPERTY.

Vers. 8, 9. After the author has indicated the object which his Book of Proverbs is designed to subserve, and the fundamental principle on which it is based, he shows for whom he has intended it; he has particularly the rising generation in his eye:

- 8 Hear, my son, thy father's instruction,
And refuse not the teaching of thy mother;
9 For these are a fair crown to thy head,
And jewels to thy neck.

"My son," says the teacher of wisdom to the scholar whom he has, or imagines that he has, before him, addressing him as a fatherly friend. The N. T. representation of birth into a new spiritual life, 1 Cor. iv. 15, Philem. 10, Gal. iv. 19, lies outside the circle of the O. T. representation; the teacher feels himself as a father by virtue of his benevolent, guardian, tender love. Father and mother are the beloved parents of those who are addressed. When the Talmud understands אֱלֹהֵי אֲבוֹתָם of God, אֱמִתּוֹת of the people (אֱמִתּוֹת), that is not the grammatico-historic meaning, but the practical interpretation and exposition, after the manner of the Midrash. The same admonition (with נִצֵּר, keep, instead of שָׁמַע, hear, and מִצְוֹת, command, instead of מוֹסֵר, instruction) is repeated in vi. 20, and what is said of the parents in one passage is in x. 1 divided into two synonymous parallel passages. The stricter

musar, which expresses the idea of sensible means of instruction (discipline), (xiii. 24, xxii. 15, xxiii. 13 f.), is suitably attributed to the father, and the torah to the mother, only administered by the word; Wisdom also always says תּוֹרָתִי (my torah), and only once, viii. 10, מוֹסְרִי (my musar).

Ver. 9. הֵם, which is also used in the neut. illa, e.g. Job xxii. 24, refers here to the paternal discipline and the maternal teaching. These, obediently received and followed, are the fairest ornament of the child. לָוִיָּהּ, from לָוָה, to wind, to roll, Arab. lawy (from לוּ, whence also לָלַי = לָלַי, as רוּד, to boil up, = רוּדוּ), means winding, twisted ornament, and especially wreath; a crown of gracefulness is equivalent to a graceful crown, a corolla gratiosa, as Schultens translates it; cf. iv. 9, according to which, Wisdom bestows such a crown.<sup>1</sup> עֲנָקִים (or עֲנָקוֹת, Judg. viii. 26) are necklaces, jewels for the neck; denom. of the Arab. 'unek, and Aram. עֲנִיק, the neck (perhaps from עָנַק = עָנַק, to oppress, of heavy burdens; cf. αὐχῆν, the neck). גַּרְגְּרוֹת is, like fauces, the throat by which one swallows (Arab. g'arg'ara, tag'ary'ara), a plur. extensive (Böttcher, § 695), and is better fitted than גַּרְוֹן to indicate the external throat; Ezekiel, however, uses (xvi. 11) garon, as our poet (iii. 3, 22, vi. 21) uses garg'roth, to represent the front neck.<sup>2</sup>

Ver. 10. The general counsel of ver. 9 is here followed by a more special warning:

My son, if sinners entice thee
Consent thou not.

The בְּנִי<sup>3</sup> (my son) is emphatically repeated. The intensive form הַמַּטְאִים signifies men to whom sin has become a habit, thus vicious, wicked. פָּתָה (Pi. of פָּתַח, to open) is not denom., to make or wish to make a פָּתִי; the meaning, to entice (harmonizing with πείθειν), פָּתָה obtains from the root-meaning of the Kal, for it is related to it as pandere (januam) to patere: to open, to make accessible, susceptible, namely to persuasion. The warning 10b is as brief as possible a call of alarm back from the abyss. In the form תִּבֵּא (from אָבָה, to agree to, to be willing, see Wetstein on Job, p. 349)

<sup>1</sup> In לִיִּת הֵן the הֵן has the conjunctive accent shalsheth, on account of which the Pesiq accent (·) is omitted. This small shalsheth occurs only eight times. See Torath Emeth, p. 36.

<sup>2</sup> The writing varies greatly. Here and at vi. 21 we have לְגַרְגְּרוֹתֶךָ; at iii. 3, עַל־גַּרְגְּרוֹתֶךָ; iii. 22, לְגַרְגְּרוֹתֶיךָ. Thus according to the Masora and correct texts.

the preformative  $\aleph$  is wanting, as in  $\text{חָטְרוּ}$ , 2 Sam. xix. 14, cf. Ps. cxxxix. 20, Ges. § 68, 2, and instead of  $\text{חָבֵה}$  (=  $\text{חָבֵה}$ , 1 Kings xx. 8) is vocalized not  $\text{חָבֵה}$  (cf. xi. 25), but after the Aram.  $\text{חָבֵה}$  (cf.  $\text{יְגִלִי}$ ); see Gen. xxvi. 29, and Comment. on Isaiah, p. 648; Gesen. § 75, 17.

Vers. 11-14. Of the number of wicked men who gain associates to their palliation and strengthening, they are adduced as an example whom covetousness leads to murder.

- 11 If they say, "Go with us, we will lurk for blood,
Lie in wait for the innocent without cause;
- 12 Like the pit we will swallow them alive
And in perfect soundness like them that go down to the grave.
- 13 We find all manner of precious treasure,
Fill our houses with spoil.
- 14 Thou shalt cast thy lot amongst us,
We all have only one purse."

Ver. 11. The verb  $\text{חָבֵה}$  signifies nectere, to bind fast (from  $\text{חָב}$ , close, compact), (see under Isa. xxv. 11), and particularly (but so that it bears in itself its object without ellipse) insidias nectere = insidiari. Regarding  $\text{לָרֵם}$  Fleischer remarks: "Either elliptically for  $\text{לְשֹׁפְדֵי דָם}$  (Jewish interp.), or, as the parallelism and the usage of the language of this book rather recommend, per synecd. for: for a man, with particular reference to his blood to be poured out (cf. our saying 'ein junges Blut,' a young blood = a youth, with the underlying conception of the blood giving colour to the body as shining through it, or giving to it life and strength), as Ps. xciv. 21." As in post-biblical Heb.  $\text{בָּשָׂר וְדָם}$  (or inverted,  $\text{αἷμα καὶ σὰρξ}$ , Heb. ii. 14), used of men as such, is not so used in the O. T., yet  $\text{דָּם}$ , like  $\text{נַפְשׁוֹ}$ , is sometimes used synecdochically for the person, but never with reference to the blood as an essentially constituent part of corporeality, but always with reference to violent putting to death, which separates the blood from the body (cf. my System der bib. Psychologie, p. 242). Here  $\text{לָרֵם}$  is explained by  $\text{לְרִמָּה}$ , with which it is interchanged, Mic. vii. 2: let us lurk for blood (to be poured out). The verb  $\text{צָפֵן}$  is never, like  $\text{חָטָן}$  (to conceal), connected with  $\text{חָבֵה}$ ,  $\text{חָבֵה}$ ,  $\text{חָבֵה}$ —thus none of these words is here to be supplied; the idea of gaining over one expressed in the organic root  $\text{צָפָה}$  (whence  $\text{צָפָה}$ , diducendo obducere) has passed over into that of restraining oneself, watching, lurking, hence  $\text{צָפֵן}$  (cog. Aram.  $\text{צָפֵן}$ ) in the sense of speculari, insidiari, interchanges with  $\text{צָפָה}$  (to spy), (cf. Ps. x. 8, lvi. 7 with xxxvii. 32). The adv.  $\text{חֶמֶד}$  (an old accus. from וְנִ) properly means in a gracious manner, as a free gift (δωρεάν, gratis = gratius), and accordingly, without reward, also without cause, which frequently = without guilt; but it never signifies sine effectu qui noceat, i.e. with impunity (Löwenst.). We have thus either to connect together וְנִ) וְנִ)קִי, "innocent in vain" (as וְנִ)קִי וְנִ)קִי, my enemies without a cause, Lam. iii. 52): his innocence helps him nothing whom God protects not against us notwithstanding his innocence (Schultens, Bertheau, Elster, and others); or connect וְנִ) with the verb (lie in wait for), for which Hitzig, after the LXX., Syr., Rashi,<sup>1</sup> Ralbag, Immanuel, rightly decides in view of 1 Sam. xix. 5, xxv. 31; cf. also Job ix. 17, where the succession of the accents is the same (Tarcha transmuted from Mugrash). Frequently there are combined together in this וְנִ) (cf. Isa. xxviii. 14 f.), that which the author thinks, and that which those whom he introduces as speaking think.

Ver. 12. The first clause of this verse Hitzig translates: "as the pit (swallows) that which lives." This is untenable, because וְנִ) with the force of a substantive (as instar, likeness) is regarded as a preposition, but not a conjunction (see at Ps. xxxviii. 14 f.). וְנִ)קִי (the living) is connected with וְנִ)קִי, and is the accus. of the state (حال, according to the terminology of the Arab. grammarians) in which they will, with impunity, swallow them up like the pit (the insatiable, xxvii. 20, xxx. 16), namely, while these their sacrifices are in the state of life's freshness,<sup>2</sup> "the living,"—without doubt, like Ps. lv. 16, lxiii. 10, cxxiv. 3, in fact and in expression an allusion to the fate of the company of Korah, Num. xvi. 30, 33. If this is the meaning of וְנִ)קִי, then וְנִ)קִי as the parallel word means integros not in an ethical sense, in which it would be a synonym of וְנִ)קִי of ver. 11b (cf. xxix. 10 with Ps. xix. 14), but in a physical sense (Græc. Venet. καὶ τελείους; Parchon as Rashi, בְּרִיאים וְנִ)קִי, vid. Böttcher, De Inferis, § 293). This physical sense is claimed for וְנִ)קִי, Job xxi. 23, for וְנִ)קִי probably, Ps. lxxiii. 4, and why should not וְנִ)קִי, used in the law regarding sacrifices (e.g. Ex. xii. 5, "without blemish") of the faultlessness of the victim, also signify such an one אִשֶׁר אֵין-בוֹ מָחַם (Isa. i. 6)? In the midst of complete external health they will devour them like those that go down to the grave (cf. Ps. xxviii. 1, lxxxviii. 5, with Isa. xiv. 19), i.e. like those under whose feet the earth is suddenly opened, so that, without leaving any trace behind, they sink into the grave and into Hades. The connection of the finite with the accus. of place, Ps. lv. 16, lies at the foundation of the genitive connection יִרְדּוּ בֹרַי (with the tone thrown back): those that go down to the grave.

Vers. 13, 14.<sup>1</sup> To their invitation, bearing in itself its own condemnation, they add as a lure the splendid self-enriching treasures which in equal and just fellowship with them they may have the prospect of sharing. הֵן (from הֵן, levem, then facilem esse, être aisé, à son aise) means aisance, convenience, opulence, and concretely that by which life is made agreeable, thus money and possessions (Fleischer in Levy's Chald. Wörterbuch, i. 423 f.). With this הֵן with remarkable frequency in the Mishle יָקָר (from יָקָר, Arab. wakar, grave esse) is connected in direct contrast, according to its primary signification; cf. xii. 27, xxiv. 4: heavy treasures which make life light. Yet it must not be maintained that, as Schultens has remarked, this oxymoron is intended, nor also that it is only consciously present in the language. מִצָּן has here its primitive appropriate signification of attaining, as Isa. x. 14 of reaching. שָׁלַל (from שָׁלַל, to draw from, draw out, from שָׁל, cf. שָׁלַח, שָׁלַח, Arab. salab, Comm. on Isa. p. 447) is that which is drawn away from the enemy, exuvia, and then the booty and spoil taken in war generally. מִלֵּא, to fill with anything, make full, governs a double accusative, as the Kal (to become full of anything) governs only one. In ver. 14, the invitation shows how the prospect is to be realized. Interpreters have difficulty in conceiving what is here meant. Do not a share by lot and a common purse exclude one another? Will they truly, in the distribution of the booty by lot, have equal portions at length, equally much in their money-bags? Or is it meant that, apart from the portion of the booty which falls to every one by lot, they have a common purse which, when their business is ebbing, must supply the wants of the company, and on which the new companion can maintain himself beforehand? Or does it mean only that they will be as mutually helpful to one another, according to the principle τὰ τῶν φίλων κοινά (amicorum omnia communia), as if they had only one purse? The meaning is perfectly simple. The oneness of the purse consists in this, that the booty which each of them gets, belongs not wholly or chiefly to him, but to the whole together, and is disposed of by lot; so that, as far as possible, he who participated not at all in the affair in obtaining it, may yet draw the greatest prize. This view harmonizes the relation between 14*b* and 14*a*. The common Semitic כֶּסֶף is even used at the present day in Syria and elsewhere as the name of the Exchange ("Börse") (plur. akjās); here it is the purse ("Kasse") (χρημάτων δοχείον, Procop.), which is made up of the profits of the business. This profit consists not merely in gold, but is here thought of in regard to its worth in gold. The apparent contradiction between distributing by lot and having a common purse disappears when the distribution by lot of the common property is so made, that the retaining of a stock-capital, or reserve fund, is not excluded.

Ver. 15. After the men are described against whose enticements a warning is given forth, the warning is emphatically repeated, and is confirmed by a threefold reason :

My son! go not in the way with them.
Keep back thy foot from their path.

If בְּרֵיךְ (in the way), taken alone, cannot be equivalent to בְּרֵיךְ אִתָּם (in one way), so is אִתָּם (with them) to be regarded as its determination.<sup>1</sup> Foot (not feet), as eye, hand, etc., is used where the members come less under consideration than what they unitedly bring about (iv. 26 f.). נִתְיָחָה, from יָחָה, signifies properly that which is raised, especially the (raised) footstep.

Ver. 16. The first argument to enforce the warning :

For their feet run to the evil,
And hasten to shed blood.

That this is their object they make no secret (ver. 11 ff.); but why is it that such an object as this should furnish no ground of warning against them, especially as on this beginning the stamp of that which is morally blamable is here impressed with לָרַע ?

<sup>1</sup> The Arab. grammarians regard this as half determination, and call it takhsys; that אִתָּם has with them the force of a virtually co-ordinated attributive; while, according to the Arab. gram., it is also possible that בְּרֵיךְ, "in one way," is equivalent to on the common way, for in the indetermination sometimes there lies the conception not merely of âhad, but of wehad.

Besides, this circular movement of the thoughts is quite after the manner of this poet; and that ver. 16 is in his style, vi. 18 shows. The want of this distich (16b = Rom. iii. 15) in LXX. B. א. weighs heavier certainly than the presence of it in LXX. A. (Procop., Syro-Hexap.), since the translation is not independent, but is transferred from Isa. lix. 7; but if for the first time, at a later period, it is supplied in the LXX., yet it has the appearance of an addition made to the Hebr. text from Isa. lix. 7 (Hitzig, Lagarde); cf. Comm. on Isaiah, xl.–lxvi. לְשֹׁפָר is always pointed thus; for, as a regular rule, after ל as well as מ the aspiration disappears; but in Ezek. xvii. 17 בְּשֹׁפָר is also found, and in this case (cf. at Ps. xl. 15) the punctuation is thus inconsequent.

Ver. 17. The second argument in support of the warning.

For in vain is the net spread out
In the eyes of all (the winged) birds.

The interpretation conspersum est rete, namely, with corn as a bait, which was put into circulation by Rashi, is inadmissible; for as little as הִזָּה (Hiph. of הִזָּה) can mean to strew, can נִזָּה mean to spread. The object is always that which is scattered (gestreut), not that which is spread (bestreut). Thus, expansum est rete, but not from מִזָּר, extendere, from which מִזְוֶרֶה<sup>1</sup> in this form cannot be derived (it would in that case be מִזְוֶרֶה), but from זָרָה, pass. of זָרָה, to scatter, spread out. The alluring net, when it is shaken out and spread, is, as it were, scattered, ventilatur. But if this is done incautiously before the eyes of the birds to be caught, they forthwith fly away. The principal stress lies on the בְּעֵינֵי (before the eyes) as the reason of the הִנָּם (in vain), according to the saying of Ovid, Quæ nimis apparent retia, vitat avis. The applicatio similitudinis lying near, according to J. H. Michaelis, is missed even by himself and by most others. If the poet wished to say that they carried on their work of blood with such open boldness, that he must be more than a simpleton who would allow himself to be caught by them, that would be an unsuitable ground of warning; for would there not be equally great need for warning against fellowship with them, if they had begun their enticement with more cunning, and reckoned on greater success? Hitzig, Ewald, Zöckler, and others, therefore interpret חַנּוּם, not in the sense of

in vain, inasmuch as they do not let themselves be caught; but: in vain, for they see not the net, but only the scattered corn. But according to the preceding, הַרְשֵׁת (the net) leads us to think only either of the net of the malicious designs, or the net of the alluring deceptions. Thus, as Ziegler has noticed, the warned ought to make application of the similitude to himself: Go not with them, for their intention is bad; go not with them, for if the bird flees away from the net which is spread out before it, thou wilt not surely be so blind as suffer thyself to be ensnared by their gross enticements. בְּעַל כַּנְף: the furnished with the wing (wings in Eccles. x. 20); בַּעַל forms the idea of property (lord).

Ver. 18. The causal conj. וְ (for) in vers. 16 and 17 are co-ordinated; and there now follows, introduced by the conj. וְ ("and"), a third reason for the warning:

And they lie in wait for their own blood,
They lay snares for their own lives.

The warning of ver. 16 is founded on the immorality of the conduct of the enticer; that of 17 on the audaciousness of the seduction as such, and now on the self-destruction which the robber and murderer bring upon themselves: they wish to murder others, but, as the result shows, they only murder themselves. The expression is shaped after ver. 11, as if it were: They lay snares, as they themselves say, for the blood of others; but it is in reality for their own blood: they certainly lie in wait, as they say; but not, as they add, for the innocent, but for their own lives (Fl.). Instead of לְרַמֵּם, there might be used לְרַמֵּיהֶם, after Mic. vii. 2; but לְנַפְשָׁם would signify ipsis (post-biblical, לְעַצְמָם), while לְנַפְשָׁתָם leaves unobliterated the idea of the life: animis ipsorum; for if the O. T. language seeks to express ipse in any other way than by the personal pronoun spoken emphatically, this is done by the addition of נַפְשׁ (Isa. liii. 11). וְהֵם was on this account necessary, because ver. 17 has another subject (cf. Ps. lxiii. 10).

Ver. 19. An epiphonema:

Such is the lot of all who indulge in covetousness;
It takes away the life of its owner.

This language is formed after Job viii. 13. Here, as there, in the word אֲרֵרוֹת, the ideas of action and issue, manner of life and its result, are all combined. בַּצֵּעַ signifies properly that which is cut off, a piece, fragment broken off, then that which one breaks off and takes to himself—booty, gain, particularly unjust gain (xxviii. 16).  $\text{עַבְדֵי בַצֵּעַ}$  is he who is greedy or covetous. The subject to  $\text{קָרָא}$  is  $\text{עַבְדֵי}$ , covetousness, πλεονεξία (see Isa. lvii. 17). As Hosea, iv. 11, says of three other things that they take away  $\text{לֵב}$ , the understanding (νοῦς), so here we are taught regarding unjust gain or covetousness, that it takes away  $\text{נַפְשׁוֹ}$ , the life (ψυχὴ) ( $\text{שָׁקַטְנוּ לָקַחַתְנוּ$ , to take away the life, 1 Kings xix. 10, Ps. xxxi. 14).  $\text{בַּעַלְיָדָיִם}$  denotes not the possessor of unjust gain, but as an inward conception, like  $\text{בַּעַל־מַדְבָּר}$ , xxii. 24, cf. xxiii. 2, xxiv. 8, Eccles. x. 11, him of whom covetousness is the property. The sing.  $\text{שָׁקַטְנוּ}$  does not show that  $\text{בַּעַלְיָדָיִם}$  is thought of as sing.; cf. xxii. 23, Ps. xxxiv. 23; but according to iii. 27, xvi. 22, Eccles. viii. 8, this is nevertheless probable, although the usage without the suffix is always  $\text{עַבְדֵי עַבְדֵי}$ , and not  $\text{בַּעַלְיָדָיִם}$  (of plur. intens.  $\text{בַּעַלְיָדָיִם}$ ).

SECOND INTRODUCTORY MASHAL DISCOURSE, I. 20-33.

DISCOURSE OF WISDOM TO HER DESPISERS.

After the teacher of wisdom has warned his disciples against the allurements of self-destroying sin, whose beastly demoniacal nature culminates in murder and robbery, he introduces Wisdom herself saying how by enticing promises and deterring threatenings she calls the simple and the perverse to repentance. Wisdom is here personified, i.e. represented as a person. But this personification presupposes, that to the poet wisdom is more than a property and quality of human subjectivity: she is to him as a divine power, existing independently, to submit to which is the happiness of men, and to reject which is their destruction. And also to the public appearance of wisdom, as it is here represented, there must be present objective reality, without which the power of conviction departs from the figure. The author must think on historical and biographical facts, on human organs (as 2 Chron. xvii. 7-9, cf. Wisd. vii. 27), through which, without words and in words, Wisdom delivers such addresses. But the figure cannot be so historical that it sustains only the relation to a definite time, and not to all time; it is a call to repentance, going forth to all time and to all places, which, divested of all the accidents of its externality, he here refers to its invisible divine background, when he begins in these words:

- 20 Wisdom cries, sounding loudly in the streets,
She causes her voice to be heard in the chief streets.
- 21 Over the places of greatest tumult she calleth ;
In the porches of the gates, in the city, she speaketh forth her words.

Ver. 20. Looking to its form and vocalization, חִכְמוֹת may be an Aramaizing abstract formation (Gesen. ; Ew. 165, c ; Olsh. 219, b) ; for although the forms אֲחֻזָּה and גְּלוּת are of a different origin, yet in רְבוֹת and הַגְּלוּת such abstract formations lie before us. The termination úth is here, by the passing over of the u into the less obscure but more intensive o (cf. יְהוּ in the beginning and middle of the word, and יְהוֹ יְהוֹ at the end of the word), raised to óth, and thereby is brought near to the fem. plur. (cf. חִכְמוֹת, xiv. 1, sapientia, as our plur. of the neut. sapiens, חִכְמָה), approaching to the abstract. On the other hand, that חִכְמוֹת is sing. of abstract signification, is not decisively denoted by its being joined to the plur. of the predicate (for חִרְוָה here, as at viii. 3, is scarcely plur. ; and if רִאמוֹת, xxiv. 7, is plur., חִכְמוֹת as the numerical plur. may refer to the different sciences or departments of knowledge) ; but perhaps by this, that it interchanges with תְּבִינּוֹת, Ps. xlix. 4, cf. Prov. xi. 12, xxviii. 16, and that an abstract formation from חִכְמָה (fem. of חָכַם, חִכְמָה), which besides is not concrete, was unnecessary. Still less is חִכְמוֹת = חִכְמָת a singular, which has it in view to change חִכְמָה into a proper name, for proof of which Hitzig refers to תְּהוֹמוֹת, Ps. lxxviii. 15 ; the singular ending óth without an abstract signification does not exist. After that Dietrich, in his Abhandl. 1846, has shown that the origin of the plur. proceeds not from separate calculation, but from comprehension,<sup>1</sup> and that particularly also names denoting intellectual strength are frequently plur., which multiply the conception not externally but internally, there is no longer any justifiable doubt that חִכְמוֹת signifies the all-comprehending, absolute, or, as Böttcher, § 689, expresses it, the full personal wisdom. Since such intensive plurals are sometimes united with the plur. of the predicate, as e.g. the monotheistically interpreted Elohim, Gen. xxxv. 7 (see l. c.), so חִרְוָה may be plur. On the other hand, the idea that it is a forma mixta of חִרְוָה (from חָרַן) and חִרְוָה (Job xxxix. 23) or חִרְוָה, the final sound in ah opposes. It may, however, be the emphatic form of the 3d fem. sing. of חָרַן ; for, that the

Hebr. has such an emphatic form, corresponding to the Arab. taktulanna, is shown by these three examples (keeping out of view the suspicion of a corruption of the text, Olsh. p. 452), Judg. v. 26, Job xvii. 16, Isa. xxviii. 3; cf. תְּשִׁלְחָנָה, Obad. 13 (see Caspari, l.c.), an example of the 2d masc. sing. of this formation. רִנָּן (with רִנָּה) is a word imitative of sound (Schallwort), used to denote "a clear-sounding, shrill voice (thence the Arab. rannan, of a speaker who has a clear, piercing voice); then the clear shrill sound of a string or chord of a bow, or the clear tinkle of the arrow in the quiver, and of the metal that has been struck" (Fl.). The meaning of רְחֹבוֹת is covered by platea (Luke xiv. 21), wide places; and חָרֵץ, which elsewhere may mean that which is without, before the gates of the city and courts, here means the "open air," in contradistinction to the inside of the houses.

Ver. 21. הַמְיֹחַ (plur. of הוֹמֵי, the ground-form of הוֹמָה, from הָמַי = הָמָה), "they who are making noise;" for the epithet is poetically used (Isa. xxii. 2) as a substantive, crowded noisy streets or places. רֹאשׁ is the place from which on several sides streets go forth: cf. ras el-ain, the place where the well breaks forth; ras en-nahr, the place from which the stream divides itself; the sing. is meant distributively as little as at viii. 2. פֶּתַח, if distinguished from שַׁעַר (which also signifies cleft, breach), is the opening of the gate, the entrance by the gate. Four times the poet says that Wisdom goes forth preaching, and four times that she preaches publicly; the בְּעִיר used in five places implies that Wisdom preaches not in the field, before the few who there are met with, but in the city, which is full of people.

Ver. 22. The poet has now reached that part of his introduction where he makes use of the very words uttered by Wisdom:

How long, ye simple, will ye love simplicity,
And scorers delight in scorning,
And fools hate knowledge?

Three classes of men are here addressed: the פְּתִיִּים, the simple, who, being accessible to seduction, are only too susceptible of evil; the לְצִיִּים, mockers, i.e. free-thinkers (from לָרַץ, Arab. lus, flectere, torquere, properly qui verbis obliquis utitur); and the בְּטִילִים, fools, i.e. the mentally imbecile and stupid (from בָּטַל, Arab. kasal, to be thick, coarse, indolent). The address to these passes immediately over into a declaration regarding them; cf. the same enallage, i. 27 f. עֲרֻמְתִּי has the accent Mahpach, on account of the Pasek following; vid. Torath

Emeth, p. 26. Intentionally, Wisdom addresses only the פתים, to whom she expects to find soonest access. Between the futt., which express the continuing love and hatred, stands the perf. חִמְדוּ, which expresses that in which the mockers found pleasure, that which was the object of their love. לָהֶם is the so-called dat. ethicus, which reflexively refers to that which is said to be the will and pleasure of the subject; as we say, "I am fond of this and that." The form תִּאֲהָבוּ, Abulwalid, Parchon, and Kimchi regard as Piel; but תִּאֲהָבוּ instead of תִּאֲהָבוּ would be a recompensation of the virtual doubling, defacing the character of the Piel. Schultens regards it as a defectively written Paiël (in Syr.), but it is not proved that this conjugation exists in Hebr.; much rather תִּאֲהָבוּ is the only possible Kal form with תִּאֲהָבוּ without the pause, regularly formed from תִּאֲהָבוּ (vid. Ewald, § 193, a). The division by the accent Mercha-Mahpach of the two words תִּאֲהָבוּ פתִי is equal in value to the connecting of them by Makkeph; vid. Baer's Psalterium, p. x. In codd., and also in correct texts, תִּאֲהָבוּ is written with the accent Galgol on the first syllable, as the servant of the Mercha-Mahpach. The Gaja is incorrectly here and there placed under the תִּ.

Ver. 23. To the call to thoughtfulness which lies in the complaint "How long?" there follows the entreaty:

Turn ye at my reproof!
Behold! I would pour out my Spirit upon you,
I would make you to know my words.

23a is not a clause expressive of a wish, which with the particle expressive of a wish, which is wanting, would be תִּשְׁכַּחְנִי, or according to xxiii. 1 and xxvii. 23 would be שׁוּב תִּשְׁכַּחְנִי. The הִנֵּה, introducing the principal clause, stamps 23a as the conditional clause; the relation of the expressions is as Isa. xxvi. 10, Job xx. 24. תִּשְׁכַּחְנִי<sup>1</sup> is not equivalent to si convertamini, which would require תִּפְנִי, but to si revertamini; but לְתוֹכְחָתִי<sup>2</sup> does not therefore mean at my reproof, i.e. in consequence of it (Hitzig, after Num. xvi. 34), but it is a constructio prægans: turning and placing yourselves under my reproof. With תוֹכַחַת there is supposed an ἔλεγχος (LXX., Symm.): bringing proof, conviction, punishment. If they, leaving their hitherto accustomed way, permit themselves to be warned against their wickedness, then would Wisdom cause her words to flow forth to them, i.e. would without reserve disclose and communicate to them her spirit, cause them to know (namely by experience) her words.  $\text{וַיִּפְּרֹץ}$  (from  $\text{נָצַח}$ , R. נב; vid. Genesis, p. 635) is a common figurative word, expressive of the free pouring forth of thoughts and words, for the mouth is conceived of as a fountain (cf. xviii. 4 with Matt. xii. 34), and the  $\rho\acute{\eta}\sigma\iota\varsigma$  (vid. LXX.) as  $\rho\acute{\epsilon}\upsilon\sigma\iota\varsigma$ ; only here it has the Spirit as object, but parallel with  $\text{וַיִּפְּרֹץ}$ , thus the Spirit as the active power of the words, which, if the Spirit expresses Himself in them, are  $\pi\nu\epsilon\upsilon\mu\alpha$  καὶ ζωή, John vi. 63. The addresses of Wisdom in the Book of Proverbs touch closely upon the discourses of the Lord in the Logos-Gospel. Wisdom appears here as the fountain of the words of salvation for men; and these words of salvation are related to her, just as the  $\lambda\acute{o}\gamma\omicron\iota$  to the divine  $\lambda\acute{o}\gamma\omicron\varsigma$  expressing Himself therein.

<sup>2</sup> The Metheg belongs to the ת, under which it should be placed (and not to the ל), as the commencing sound of the second syllable before the tone-syllable; cf. ver. 25.

Vers. 24-27. The address of Wisdom now takes another course. Between vers. 23 and 24 there is a pause, as between Isa. i. 20 and 21. In vain Wisdom expects that her complaints and enticements will be heard. Therefore she turns her call to repentance into a discourse announcing judgment.

- 24 Because I have called, and ye refused;
 Stretched out my hand, and no man regarded;
 25 And ye have rejected all my counsel,
 And to my reproof have not yielded:
 26 Therefore will I also laugh at your calamity,
 Will mock when your terror cometh;
 27 When like a storm your terror cometh,
 And your destruction sweeps on like a whirlwind;
 When distress and anguish cometh upon you.

Commencing with  $\text{וַיִּפְּרֹץ}$  (which, like  $\text{וַיִּפְּרֹץ}$ , from  $\text{נָצַח}$ , to oppose, denotes the intention, but more the fundamental reason or the cause than, as  $\text{וַיִּפְּרֹץ}$ , the motive or object), the clause, connected with  $\text{וַיִּפְּרֹץ}$ , ego vicissim, turns to the conclusion. As here  $\text{וַיִּפְּרֹץ}$  (as the word of Jahve) are connected by  $\text{וַיִּפְּרֹץ}$  to the expression of the talio in Isa. lxvi. 4, so also  $\text{וַיִּפְּרֹץ}$ , with its contrast  $\text{וַיִּפְּרֹץ}$ , Isa. i. 19 f. The construction quoniam vocavi et renuistis for quoniam quum vocarem renuistis (cf. Isa. xii. 1) is the common diffuse (zerstreute) Semitic, the paratactic instead of the periodizing style. The stretching out of the hand is, like the "spreading out" in Isa. lxxv. 2, significant of striving to beckon to the wandering, and to bring them near. Regarding הַקָּשִׁיב, viz. אָנֹחַ, to make the ear stiff (R. קש), arrigere, incorrectly explained by Schultens, after the Arab. kashab, polire, by aurem purgare, vid. Isaiah, p. 257, note.

Ver. 25. פָּרַע is synonymous with נָטַשׁ, i. 8; cf. iv. 15 פָּרַעְתִּי, turn from it. Gesenius has inaccurately interpreted the phrase פָּרַע ראשׁ of the shaving off of the hair, instead of the letting it fly loose. פָּרַע means to loosen (= to lift up, syn. הִחִיל), to release, to set free; it combines the meanings of loosening and making empty, or at liberty, which is conveyed in Arab. by فَرَع and فَرَّغ. The latter means, intrans., to be set free, therefore to be or to become free from occupation or business; with מִן of an object, to be free from it, i.e. to have accomplished it, to have done with it (Fl.). Thus: since ye have dismissed (missum fecistis) all my counsel (עֲצָה as לִרְהוּ, from עָצָה, i.e. what I always would advise to set you right. אָבָה combines in itself the meanings of consent, i. 10, and compliance, i. 30 (with לְ), and, as here, of acceptance. The principal clause begins like an echo of Ps. ii. 4 (cf. Jer. xx. 7).

Vers. 26, 27. שָׁחַק, as xxxi. 25 shows, is not to be understood with בָּ; בָּ is that of the state or time, not of the object. Regarding אָרַב, calamitas opprimens, obruens (from אָרַב = אָרַב, to burden, to oppress), see at Ps. xxxi. 12. בָּא is related to יָאֲתָה as arriving to approaching; פָּחַדְכֶם is not that for which they are in terror,—but that which, in the midst of this, will frighten and alarm them. The Chethib שָׁחַב is pointed thus, שָׁחַבָה (from שָׁחַב = שָׁחַב, as רָאָה, after the form אָהַבָה, רָאָהָה); the Keri substitutes for this infinitive name the usual particip. שָׁחַבָה (where then the Vav is יחיר, “superfluous”), crashing (fem. of שָׁחַב), then a crash and an overthrow with a crash; regarding its root-meaning (to be waste, and then to sound hollow), see under Ps. xxxv. 8. סִפָּה (from סִפָּה = סִפָּה), sweeping forth as a (see x. 25) whirlwind. The infinitive construction of 27a is continued in 27b in the finite. “This syntactical and logical attraction, by virtue of which a modus or tempus passes by ו or by the mere parallel arrangement (as ii. 2) from one to another, attracted into the signification and nature of the latter, is peculiar to the Hebr. If there follows a new clause or section of a clause where the discourse takes, as it were, a new departure, that attraction ceases, and the original form of expression is resumed; cf. i. 22, where after the accent Athnach the future is returned to, as here in 27c the infinitive construction is restored" (Fl.). The alliterating words צָרָה וְצִיָּקָה, cf. Isa. xxx. 6, Zeph. i. 15, are related to each other as narrowness and distress (Hitzig); the Mashal is fond of the stave-rhyme.<sup>1</sup>

Vers. 28-31. Then—this sublime preacher in the streets continues—distress shall teach them to pray :

- 28 Then shall they call on me, and I will not answer;
 They shall early seek after me, and not find me;
 29 Because that they hated knowledge,
 And did not choose the fear of Jahve.
 30 They have not yielded to my counsel,
 Despised all my reproof :
 31 Therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their way,
 And satiate themselves with their own counsels.

In the full emphatic forms, יִקְרְאוּנִי, they shall call on me, יִשְׁחַרְנִי, they shall seek me, and יִמְצְאוּנִי, they shall find me, the suffix נִי may be joined to the old plur. ending ûn (Gesenius, Olshausen, Böttcher); but open forms like יְבַרְכֵנִי, He will bless him, יִבְבְּרֵנִי, He will honour me (from יִבְבְּרֵנִי), and the like, rather favour the conclusion that נִי is epenthetic (Ew. § 250, b).<sup>2</sup> The address here takes the form of declaration: Stultos nunc indignos censet ulteriori alloquio (Mich.). It is that laughter and scorn, ver. 26, which here sounds forth from the address of the Judge regarding the incorrigible. שָׁחַר is denom. of שָׁחַר, to go out and to seek with the morning twilight, as also בָּקַר, Ps. xxvii. 5, perhaps to appear early, and usually (Arab.) bakar (I. II. IV.), to rise early, to be zealous (Lane: "He hastened to do or accomplish, or attain the thing needed"). Zöckler, with Hitzig, erroneously regards vers. 29, 30 as the antecedent to ver. 31. With וַיֵּאָכְלוּ, "and they shall eat," the fut. announcing judgment are continued from ver. 28; cf. Deut. xxviii. 46-48. The conclusion after לְכֵּן, "therefore because," or as usually expressed (except here and Deut. iv. 37, cf. Gen. iv. 25), תַּחַת אֲשֶׁר (ánt' óv), is otherwise characterized, Deut. xxii. 29, 2 Chron. xxi. 12; and besides, תַּחַת אֲשֶׁר stands after (e.g. 1 Sam. xxvi. 21; 2 Kings xxii. 17; Jer. xxix. 19) oftener than before the principal clause. תַּחַת combines in itself the meanings of eligere and diligere (Fl.). The construction of תַּחַת אֲבָהָה לְ (to be inclining towards) follows that of the analogous לְ שָׁמַעַ (to hear). Each one eats of the fruit of his way—good fruit of good ways (Isa. iii. 10), and evil fruit of evil ways. “The מן, 31b, introduces the object from which, as a whole, that which one eats, and with which he is satisfied, is taken as a part, or the object from which, as from a fountain, satisfaction flows forth” (Fl.). In correct texts, מִן אֲכָלִי has the accent Dechi, and at the same time Munach as its servant. Regarding the laws of punctuation, according to which מִן מְעַצְחֵיהֶם (with Munach on the tone-syllable, Tarcha on the antepenult, and Metheg before the Chateph-Pathach) is to be written, see Baer's Torath Emeth, p. 11, Accentssystem, iv. § 4. Norzi accents the word incorrectly with Rebia Mugarash. With the exception of Prov. xxii. 22, the plural<sup>1</sup> מִן מְעַצְחֵי has always the meaning of ungodly counsels.

<sup>1</sup> Jul. Ley, in his work on the Metrical Forms of Hebrew Poetry, 1866, has taken too little notice of these frequently occurring alliteration staves; Lagarde communicated to me (8th Sept. 1846) his view of the stave-rhyme in the Book of Proverbs, with the remark, "Only the Hebr. technical poetry is preserved to us in the O. T. records; but in such traces as are found of the stave-rhyme, there are seen the echoes of the poetry of the people, or notes passing over from it."

<sup>2</sup> In the Codd. יִקְרְאוּנִי is written; in this case the Metheg indicates the tone syllable: vid. Torah Emeth, p. 7 note, p. 21 note; and Accentssystem, ii. § 1, note. In יִשְׁחַרְנִי the Rebia is to be placed over the ר. In the Silluk-word יִמְצְאוּנִי it appears undoubtedly that the form is to be spoken as Milel, i.e. with tone on the penult.

Vers. 32, 33. The discourse is now summarily brought to a close:

32 For the perverseness of the simple slays them,
And the security of fools destroys them.

33 But whoever hearkeneth to me dwells secure,
And is at rest from fear of evil.

Of the two interpretations of שׁוּב, a turning towards (with לְ and the like, conversion) or a turning away (with מִן אֲחֵרִי or מַעַל, desertion), in מִן שׁוּבָה the latter (as in the post-Bib. מִן שׁוּבָה, repentance, the former) is expressed; apostasy from wisdom and from God are conjoined. שׁוּבָה is here carnalis securitas; but the word may also denote the external and the internal peace of the righteous, as שׁוּבָה, whence שׁוּבָה, Job xxi. 23, as a superlative is formed by the insertion of the לְ of שׁוּבָה, is taken in bonam et malam partem. שׁוּבָה is, according to the Masora (also in Jer. xxx. 10, xlvi. 27, xlviii. 11), 3d perf. Pilel (Ewald, § 120, a), from the unused שׁוּבָה, to be quiet: he has attained to full quietness, and enjoys such. The construction with מן follows the analogy of מן הַיָּיִחַ (to give rest from), מן שָׁקֵט (to rest from), and the like. The negative interpretation of מן, sine ullo pavore mali

(Schultens, Ewald), is unnecessary; also Job xxi. 9 may be explained by "peace from terror," especially since שָׁלוֹם is derived from the root שָׁל, extrahere. פֶּחַד רָעָה, "fear of evil," one may perhaps distinguish from פֶּחַד רַע as the genitive of combination.

THIRD INTRODUCTORY MASHAL DISCOURSE, II.

EARNEST STRIVING AFTER WISDOM AS THE WAY TO THE FEAR OF GOD AND TO VIRTUE.

The admonition so far has almost wholly consisted of warning and threatening. The teacher, directing back to the discipline of the paternal home, warns against fellowship in the bloody deeds of the covetous, which issue in self-murder; and Wisdom holds up before her despisers the mirror of the punishment which awaits them. Now the admonition becomes positive. The teacher describes separately the blessings of the endeavour after wisdom; the endeavour after wisdom, which God rewards with the gift of wisdom, leads to religious and moral knowledge, and this guards men on the way of life from all evil. The teacher accordingly interweaves conditions and promises:

- 1 My son, if thou receivest my words,
And keepest my commandments by thee;
- 2 So that thou inclinest thine ear unto wisdom,
Turnest thine heart to understanding;—
- 3 Yea, if thou callest after knowledge,
To understanding directest thy voice;
- 4 If thou seekest her as silver,
And searchest for her as for treasures:
- 5 Then shalt thou understand the fear of Jahve,
And find the knowledge of God.
- 6 For Jahve giveth wisdom:
From His mouth cometh knowledge and understanding.
- 7 He preserves for the upright promotion;
A shield for such as walk in innocence.
- 8 For He protects the paths of justice,
And guards the way of His saints.

The first מִן, with that which it introduces, vers. 1, 2, is to be interpreted as an exclamation, "O that!" (O si), and then as an optative, as Ps. lxxxii. 9, cxxxix. 19. מִן . . . מִן, vers. 3-5, with the inserted connecting clauses, would then be confirmatory, "for then." But since this poet loves to unfold one and the same thought in ever new forms, one has perhaps to begin the conditional premisses with ver. 1, and to regard כִּי אֵין as a new commencement. Hitzig takes this כִּי אֵין in the sense of imo: "much more if thou goest to meet her, e.g. by curious inquiry, not merely permittest her quietly to come to thee." אֵין would then preserve its conditional meaning; and כִּי, as in Job xxxi. 18, Ps. cxxx. 4, since it implies an intentional negative, would receive the meaning of imo. But the sentences ranged together with אֵין are too closely related in meaning to admit such a negative between them. כִּי will thus be confirmatory, not mediately, but immediately; it is the "for = yes" of confirmation of the preceding conditions, and takes them up again (Ewald, § 356 b, cf. 330 b) after the form of the conditional clause was given up. The אֵין, which in i. 11, 18 is the synonym of אֵין, speculari, presents itself here, 1*b*, 7*a*, as the synonym of אֵין, whence אֵין, synon. of אֵין, recondita; the group of sounds, אֵין, אֵין, אֵין (cf. also אֵין, in Arab. dafan, whence dafynat, treasure), express shades of the root representation of pressing together. The inf. of the conclusion אֵין, to incline (Gr. Venet. ὡς ἀκροῶτο), is followed by the accus. of the object אֵין, thine ear, for אֵין properly means to stiffen (not to purge, as Schultens, nor to sharpen, as Gesenius thinks); cf. under Ps. x. 17. With אֵין are interchanged אֵין, which properly means that which is distinguished or separated, and אֵין, which means the distinguishing, separating, appellations of the capacity of distinguishing in definite cases and in general; but it does not represent this as a faculty of the soul, but as a divine power which communicates itself as the gift of God (charisma).

Vers. 3-8. Instead of אֵין כִּי there is an old אֵין תִּקְרִי<sup>1</sup> (read not so, but thus), אֵין כִּי (if thou callest understanding mother), which supposes the phrase אֵין כִּי (LXX.) as traditional. If אֵין were intended (according to which the Targ. in the Bibl. rabbinica, but not in Norzi's text, translates), then 3*b* would correspond; vid. vii. 4, cf. Job xvii. 14. Thus: Yea, if thou callest for understanding, i.e. callest her to thee (xviii. 6), investest her to thee (ix. 15). The אֵין is, with the exception of the imper. (e.g. אֵין), always without the Dagesh. Ver. 4*b* belongs to the ideas in the Book of Job found in these introductory discourses, cf. Job iii. 21, as at ver.

14, Job iii. 22 (Ewald, Sprüche, p. 49). שֹׁפֵט (שֹׁפֵט), scrutari, proceeds, as שֹׁפֵט shows, from the primary meaning of a ditch, and is thus in its root-idea related to חָפַר (to dig, search out). In the principal clause of ver. 5 the 'הָאֵתָהּ', as Ps. xix. 10, is the fear of Jahve as it ought to be, thus the reverence which is due to Him, the worshipping of Him as revealed. 'הָ and אֱלֹהִים are interchanged as אֱלֹהִים and 'הָ at ix. 10. דַּעַת is knowledge proceeding from practice and experience, and thus not merely cognition (Kenntnis), but knowledge (Erkenntnis). The thoughts revolve in a circle only apparently. He who strives after wisdom earnestly and really, reaches in this way fellowship with God; for just as He gives wisdom, it is nowhere else than with Him, and it never comes from any other source than from Him. It comes (ver. 6) מִפִּי (LXX. erroneously מִפִּי), i.e. it is communicated through the medium of His word, Job xxii. 22, or also (for λόγος and πνεῦμα lie here undistinguished from one another) it is His breath (Book of Wisdom vii. 25: ἀτμὴς τῆς τοῦ Θεοῦ δυνάμεως καὶ ἀπόρροια τῆς τοῦ παντοκράτορος δόξης εἰδικρινῆς); the inspiration (נְשִׁמָה) of the Almighty (according to Job xxxii. 8) gives men understanding. In ver. 7a, whether חֶתְיָב (Chethîb) or כֶּרִי (Kerî) is read, the meaning is the same. The former is the expression of the completed fact, as ἠτολμασεν, 1 Cor. ii. 9, and is rightly preferred by LXX. and Syr., for one reluctantly misses the copula (since the thought is new in comparison with ver. 6). לְיִשְׂרָאֵל should be written with the accent Dechî. The Chokma-word (besides in Proverbs and Job, found only in Mic. vi. 9 and Isa. xxviii. 29) חֶתְיָב is a Hiphil formation (with the passing over of ō into û, as in חֶתְיָב from חֶתְיָב) (whence the pr. names חֶתְיָב and חֶתְיָב) = (Arab.) wasy and asy, to re-establish, to advance, Hiph. of חָשָׁב = חָשָׁב, to stand, and thus means furtherance, i.e. the power or the gift to further, and concretely that which furthers and profits, particularly true wisdom and true fortune.<sup>1</sup> The derivation from חָשָׁב (viii. 21) is to be rejected, because "the formation would be wholly without analogy, so much the more because the ' of this word does not represent the place of the ' , as is seen from the Arab. ليس and the Syr. "ܠܥ" (Fl.);<sup>1</sup> and the derivation of שָׁוה = שָׁוה, to be smooth (Hitzig), passes over without any difficulty into another system of roots.<sup>2</sup> In the passage under consideration (ver. 7), תְּשִׁיחַ signifies advancement in the sense of true prosperity. The parallel passage 7a clothes itself in the form of an apposition: (He) a shield (מָגֵן, n. instr. of מָגַן, to cover) for הַלְכֵי הַם, pilgrims of innocence (Fl.), i.e. such as walk in the way (the object-accus., as vi. 12, for which in x. 9 בָּ) of innocence. הַם is whole, full submission, moral faultlessness, which chooses God with the whole heart, seeks good without exception: a similar thought is found in Ps. lxxxiv. 12. לְנַגֵּר, 8a, is such an inf. of consequence as לְהַקְשִׁיב (ver. 2), and here, as there, is continued in the finite. The "paths of justice" are understood with reference to those who enter them and keep in them; parallel, "the way of His saints" (חַסִּיד, he who cherishes חֶסֶד, earnest inward love to God), for that is just אֲרוּחַ צְדָקָה (xii. 28): they are הַלְכֵי צְדָקוֹת (Isa. xxxiii. 15). Instead of the Mugrash, the conjunctive Tarcha is to be given to יִדְרֶה.

Vers. 9–11. With the אָז repeated, the promises encouraging to the endeavour after wisdom take a new departure:

- 9 Then shalt thou understand righteousness, and justice,
And uprightness; every way of good.
- 10 For wisdom will enter into thine heart,
And knowledge will do good to thy soul;
- 11 Discretion will keep watch over thee,
Understanding will keep thee.

mental signification "furtherance" (cf. Seneca, Deus stator stabilitorque est). "תְּשִׁיחַ, from Arab. asy and wasy, to further by word and deed, to assist by counsel and act, to render help, whence the meanings auxilium, salus, and prudens consilium, sapientia, easily follow; cf. Ali's Arab. proverb, واساك من تغافل—'He furthers thee, who does not trouble himself about thee.'

<sup>1</sup> The Arab. أيس (almost only in the negative ليس = أيس), of the same signification as يش, with which the Aram. אַיִת (אֵיִתִּי) is associated, presupposes an أس (= أس), to be founded, to found, and is rightly regarded by the Arabs as an old segolate noun in which the verbal force was comprehended.

<sup>2</sup> The Arab. سوي and سوي are confounded in common usage (Wetstein, Deutsch. Morgenl. Zeitschr. xxii. 19), but the roots שו and שו are different; ש and ש, on the contrary, are modifications of one root.

Regarding the ethical triad מִישְׁרִים [righteousness, rightness], מִשְׁפָּט [judgment], and יֶדְרֵךְ [rectitude], vid. i. 3. Seb. Schmid is wrong in his rendering, et omnis via qua bonum aditur erit tibi plana, which in comparison with Isa. xxvi. 7 would be feebly expressed. J. H. Michaelis rightly interprets all these four conceptions as object-accusatives; the fourth is the summarizing asyndeton (cf. Ps. viii. 7) breaking off the enumeration: omnem denique orbitam boni; Jerome, bonam: in this case, however, טוב would be genitive (vid. xvii. 2). מַעְנֵל is the way in which the chariot rolls along; in עָנַל there are united the root-conceptions of that which is round (עָנַל) and rolling (עָנַל). Whether וְ, ver. 10, is the argumentative "because" (according to the versions and most interpreters) or "for" ("denn," J. H. Michaelis, Ewald, and others), is a question. That with וְ = "for" the subject would precede the verb, as at vers. 6, 21, and i. 32 (Hitzig), determines nothing, as ver. 18 shows. On the one hand, the opinion that וְ = "because" is opposed by the analogy of the וְ, ver. 6, following אֵל, ver. 5; the inequality between vers. 5-8 and ver. 9 ff. if the new commencement, ver. 9, at once gives place to another, ver. 10; the relationship of the subject ideas in vers. 10, 11, which makes ver. 11 unsuitable to be a conclusion from ver. 10. On the contrary, the promise not only of intellectual, but at the same time also of practical, insight into the right and the good, according to their whole compass and in their manifoldness, can be established or explained quite well as we thus read vers. 10, 11: For wisdom will enter (namely, to make it a dwelling-place, xiv. 33; cf. John xiv. 23) into thine heart, and knowledge will do good to thy soul (namely, by the enjoyment which arises from the possession of knowledge, and the rest which its certainty yields). רָעַת, γνώσις, is elsewhere fem. (Ps. cxxxix. 6), but here, as at viii. 10, xiv. 6, in the sense of τὸ γινῶναι, is masc. In ver. 11 the contents of the אֵל תְּבַן (ver. 9) are further explained. שָׁמַר עַל, of watching (for Job xvi. 16 is to be interpreted differently), is used only by our poet (here and at vi. 22). Discretion, i.e. the capacity of well-considered action, will hold watch over thee, take thee under protection; understanding, i.e. the capacity in the case of opposing rules to make the right choice, and in the matter of extremes to choose the right medium, will be bestowed upon thee. In תִּנְצְרָתָהּ, as in Ps. lxi. 8, cxl. 2, 5, Deut. xxxiii. 9, etc., the first stem letter is not assimilated, in order that the word may have a fuller sound; the writing  $\text{הַרְבֵּה}$  for  $\text{רַב}$  is meant to affect the eye.<sup>1</sup>

Vers. 12–15. As in vers. 10, 11, the  $\text{אִן תִּבְיִן}$  (“then shalt thou understand,” ver. 5) is expanded, so now the watching, preserving, is separately placed in view:

- 12 To deliver thee from an evil way,
From the man who speaks falsehood;
- 13 (From those) who forsake the ways of honesty
To walk in ways of darkness,
- 14 Who rejoice to accomplish evil,
Delight in malignant falsehood—
- 15 They are crooked in their paths,
And perverse in their ways.

That  $\text{רַב רַב}$  is not genitival, via mali, but adjectival, via mala, is evident from  $\text{רַב רַב לְאֵמוּנָה}$ , xvi. 29. From the evil way, i.e. conduct, stands opposed to the false words represented in the person of the deceiver; from both kinds of contagium wisdom delivers.  $\text{תְּהַפְכוֹת}$  (like the similarly formed  $\text{תְּהַבְלוֹת}$ , occurring only as plur.) means misrepresentations, viz. of the good and the true, and that for the purpose of deceiving (xvii. 20), fallaciæ, i.e. intrigues in conduct, and lies and deceit in words. Fl. compares Arab. ifk, a lie, and affak, a liar.  $\text{לְהַצִּילֶךָ}$  has Munach, the constant servant of Dechi, instead of Metheg, according to rule (Accentssystem, vii. § 2).  $\text{הַעֲוִיּוֹת}$  (ver. 13) is connected with the collective  $\text{עֲוִיּוֹת}$  (cf. Judg. ix. 55); we have in the translation separated it into a relative clause with the abstract present. The vocalization of the article fluctuates, yet the expression  $\text{הַעֲוִיּוֹת}$ , like ver. 17  $\text{הַעֲוִיבֹת}$ , is the better established (Michlol 53b);  $\text{הַעֲוִיּוֹת}$  is one of the three words which retain their Metheg, and yet add to it a Munach in the tone-syllable (vid. the two others, Job xxii. 4, xxxix. 26). To the “ways of honesty” (Geradheit) (cf. the adj. expression, Jer. xxxi. 9), which does not shun to come to the light, stand opposed the “ways of darkness,” the  $\text{\xi\rho\rho\gamma\alpha\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \sigma\acute{\alpha}\lambda\omicron\tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma}$ , Rom. xiii. 12, which designedly conceal themselves from God (Isa. xxix. 15) and men (Job xxiv. 15, xxxviii. 13, 15).

Ver. 14. In this verse the regimen of the  $\text{וְעַל}$ , 12b, is to be regarded as lost; the description now goes on independently. Whoever does not shrink back from evil, but gives himself up to deceit, who finally is at home in it as in his own proper life-element, and rejoices, yea, delights in that which he ought to shun as something destructive and to be rejected. The neut.  $\text{רַע}$  is frequently an attributive genit., vi. 24, xv. 26, xxviii. 5; cf.  $\text{טוב}$ , xxiv. 25, which here, since  $\text{הַמַּכּוֹת}$  are those who in themselves are bad, does not separate, but heightens: perversitates non simplices aut vulgares, sed pessimæ et ex omni parte vitiosæ (J. H. Michaelis). With  $\text{רָשָׁע}$  (oītwes), ver. 15, this part is brought to a conclusion. Fleischer, Bertheau, and others interpret  $\text{אֲרָחֻתְהֶם}$ , as the accus. of the nearer definition, as σκολιὸς τὸν νοῦν, τὰς πράξεις; but should it be an accus., then would we expect, in this position of the words,  $\text{עֲקָשׁוּ}$  (Isa. lix. 8; Prov. x. 9, cf. ix. 15).  $\text{עֲקָשׁוּם}$  is the pred.; for  $\text{אֲרָחַ$ , like  $\text{רָחַץ}$ , admits of both genders.  $\text{וַיִּלְחָצוּם}$  carries in it its subject  $\text{הֵם}$ ;  $\text{לָהּ}$ , like the Arab. l'd, l'dh, is a weaker form of  $\text{לָהּ}$ , flectere, inclinare, intrans. recedere: they are turned aside, inclined out of the way to the right and left in their walk ( $\text{אָ}$  as xvii. 20).

Vers. 16-19. With the resumption of  $\text{לְהַצִּילָהּ}$ , the watchful protection which wisdom affords to its possessors is further specified in these verses:

- 16 To save thee from the strange woman,
From the stranger who useth smooth words;
- 17 Who forsakes the companion of her youth,
And forgets the covenant of her God;
- 18 For she sinks down to death together with her house,
And to the shadow of Hades her paths—
- 19 All they who go to her return not again,
And reach not the paths of life

The subject here continued is the fourfold wisdom named in vers. 10, 11.  $\text{רַע}$  signifies alienus, which may also be equivalent to alius populi, but of a much wider compass—him who does not belong to a certain class (e.g. the non-priestly or the laity), the person or thing not belonging to me, or also some other than I designate; on the other hand,  $\text{נִכְרִי}$ , peregrinus, scarcely anywhere divests itself of the essential mark of a strange foreign origin. While thus  $\text{אִשָּׁה זָרָה}$  is the non-married wife,  $\text{נִכְרִיָּה}$  designates her as non-Israelitish. Prostitution was partly sanctioned in the cultus of the Midianites, Syrians, and other nations neighbouring to Israel, and thus was regarded as nothing less than customary. In Israel, on the contrary, the law (Deut. xxiii. 18 f.) forbade it under a penalty, and therefore it was chiefly practised by foreign women (xxiii. 27, and cf. the exception, Ruth ii. 10),<sup>1</sup>—an inveterate vice, which spread itself particularly from the latter days of Solomon, along with general ungodliness, and excusing itself under the polygamy sanctioned by the law, brought ruin on the state. The Chokma contends against this, and throughout presents monogamy as alone corresponding to the institution and the idea of the relation. Designating marriage as the “covenant of God,” it condemns not only adulterous but generally promiscuous intercourse of the sexes, because unhallowed and thus unjustifiable, and likewise arbitrary divorce. Regarding the ancient ceremonies connected with the celebration of marriage we are not specially informed; but from ver. 17, Mal. ii. 14 (Ewald, Bertheau, Hitzig, but not Köhler), it appears that the celebration of marriage was a religious act, and that they who were joined together in marriage called God to witness and ratify the vows they took upon themselves. The perf. in the attributive clause אֲמַרְיָהּ הַחֲלִיקָה proceeds on the routine acquired in cajoling and dissembling: who has smoothed her words, i.e. learned to entice by flattering words (Fl.).

Vers. 17–19. אֲלִיָּהּ, as here used, has nothing to do with the phylarch-name, similar in sound, which is a denom. of אֲלִיָּהּ; but it comes immediately from אֲלִיָּהּ, to accustom oneself to a person or cause, to be familiar therewith (while the Aram. אֲלִיָּהּ, יָלַח, to learn, Pa. to teach), and thus means, as the synon. of רֵעַ, the companion or familiar associate (vid. Schultens). Parallels such as Jer. iii. 4 suggested to the old interpreters the allegorical explanation of the adulteress as the personification of the apostasy or of heresy. Ver. 18a the LXX. translate: ἔθετο γὰρ παρὰ τῷ θανάτῳ τὸν οἶκον αὐτῆς: she (the dissolute wife) has placed her house beside death (the abyss of death). This שָׁחָה [ἔθετο] is perhaps the original, for the text as it lies before us is doubtful, though, rightly understood, admissible. The accentuation marks בִּיתָהּ as the subject, but בֵּית is elsewhere always masc., and does not, like the rarer אָרַח, ver. 15, admit in usage a double gender; also, if the fem. usage were here introduced (Bertheau, Hitzig), then the predicate, even though בֵּיתָהּ were regarded as fem., might be, in conformity with rule, שָׁחָה, as e.g. Isa. ii. 17. שָׁחָה is, as in Ps. xlv. 26, 3d pr. of שָׁחָה, Arab. sākh, to go down, to sink; the emendation שָׁחָה

(Joseph Kimchi) does not recommend itself on this account, that שָׁחָה and שָׁחָה mean, according to usage, to stoop or to bend down; and to interpret (Ralbag, השפילה) שָׁחָה transitively is inadmissible. For that reason Aben Ezra interprets ביתה as in apposition: to death, to its house; but then the poet in that case should say אֶל-שְׁאוֹל, for death is not a house. On the other hand, we cannot perceive in ביתה an accus. of the nearer definition (J. H. Michaelis, Fl.); the expression would here, as 15a, be refined without purpose. Böttcher has recognised ביתה as permutative, the personal subject: for she sinks down to death, her house, i.e. she herself, together with all that belongs to her; cf. the permutative of the subject, Job xxix. 3, Isa. xxix. 23 (vid. comm. l.c.), and the more particular statement of the object, Ex. ii. 6, etc. Regarding רַפְּאִים, shadows of the under-world (from רָפָה, synon. הָלָה, weakened, or to become powerless), a word common to the Solomonic writings, vid. Comment. on Isaiah, p. 206. What ver. 18b says of the person of the adulteress, ver. 19 says of those who live with her ביתה, her house-companions. בָּאִיהָ, “those entering in to her,” is equivalent to בָּאִים אֵלֶיהָ; the participle of verbs eundi et veniendi takes the accusative object of the finite as gen. in st. constr., as e.g. i. 12, ii. 7, Gen. xxiii. 18, ix. 10 (cf. Jer. x. 20). The לֹא-שׁוּבָה, with the tone on the ult., is a protestation: there is no return for those who practise fornication,<sup>1</sup> and they do not reach the paths of life from which they have so widely strayed.<sup>2</sup>

Vers. 20-22. With לִמְעַן there commences a new section, co-ordinating itself with the לְהַצִּילֶךָ (“to deliver thee”) of vers. 12, 16, unfolding that which wisdom accomplishes as a preserver and guide:

- 20 So that thou walkest in the good way,
And keepst the right paths.
21 For the upright shall inhabit the land,
And the innocent shall remain in it.
22 But the godless are cut off out of the land,
And the faithless are rooted out of it.

<sup>1</sup> One is here reminded of the expression in the Æneid, vi. 127-129:

*Revocare gradum superasque evadere ad auras,
Hoc opes, hoc labor est.*

See also an impure but dreadful Talmudic story about a dissolute Rabbi, b. Aboda zara, 17a.

Wisdom—thus the connection—will keep thee, so that thou shalt not fall under the seductions of man or of woman; keep, in order that thou . . . לְמַעַן (from מַעַן = מַעְנֶה, tendency, purpose) refers to the intention and object of the protecting wisdom. To the two negative designations of design there follows, as the third and last, a positive one. טוֹבִים (contrast to רָעִים, xiv. 19) is here used in a general ethical sense: the good (Guten, not Gütigen, the kind). שָׁמַר, with the object of the way, may in another connection also mean to keep oneself from, cavere ab (Ps. xvii. 4); here it means: carefully to keep in it. The promise of ver. 21 is the same as in the Mashal Ps. xxxvii. 9, 11, 22; cf. Prov. x. 30. אֶרֶץ is Canaan, or the land which God promised to the patriarchs, and in which He planted Israel, whom He had brought out of Egypt; not the earth, as Matt. v. 5, according to the extended, unlimited N. T. circle of vision. יִמְלֵךְ (Milel) is erroneously explained by Schultens: funiculis bene firmis irroborabunt in terra. The verb יָמַר, Arab. watar, signifies to yoke (whence יָמָר, a cord, rope), then intrans. to be stretched out in length, to be hanging over (vid. Fleischer on Job xxx. 11); whence יָמַר, residue, Zeph. ii. 9, and after which the LXX. here renders ὑπολειφθήσονται, and Jerome permanebunt. In 22b the old translators render יִמְלֵךְ as the fut. of the pass. יִמְלָךְ, Deut. xxviii. 63; but in this case it would be יִמְלָךְ. The form יִמְלָךְ, pointed יִמְלָךְ, might be the Niph. of יָמַר, but יָמַר can neither be taken as one with יִמְלָךְ, of the same meaning, nor with Hitzig is it to be vocalized יִמְלָךְ (Hoph. of יָמַר); nor, with Böttcher (§ 1100, p. 453), is יִמְלָךְ to be regarded as a veritable fut. Niph. יִמְלָךְ is, as at xv. 25, Ps. lii. 7, active: evellant; and this, with the subj. remaining indefinite (for which J. H. Michaelis refers to Hos. xii. 9), is equivalent to evellentur. This indefinite "they" or "one" ("man"); Fleischer remarks, can even be used of God, as here and Job vii. 3,—a thing which is common in Persian, where e.g. the expression rendered hominem ex pulvere fecerunt is used instead of the fuller form, which would be rendered homo a Deo ex pulvere factus est. בּוֹנֵי־יָם bears (as בְּנֵי־יָם proves) the primary meaning of concealed, i.e. malicious (treacherous and rapacious, Isa. xxxiii. 1), and then faithless men.<sup>1</sup>

FOURTH INTRODUCTORY MASHAL DISCOURSE, III. 1-18.

EXHORTATION TO LOVE AND FAITHFULNESS, AND SELF-SACRIFICING DEVOTION TO GOD, AS THE TRUE WISDOM.

The foregoing Mashal discourse seeks to guard youth against ruinous companionship; this points out to them more particularly the relation toward God and man, which alone can make them truly happy, vers. 1-4.

- 1 My son, forget not my doctrine,
And let thine heart keep my commandments;
- 2 For length of days, and years of life,
And peace, will they add to thee.
- 3 Let not kindness and truth forsake thee:
Bind them about thy neck,
Write them on the tablet of thy heart,
- 4 And obtain favour and true prudence
In the eyes of God and of men.

The admonition takes a new departure. תורת and מצות refer to the following new discourse and laws of conduct. Here, in the midst of the discourse, we have יצר and not יניצר; the non-assimilated form is found only in the conclusion, e.g. ii. 11; v. 2. The plur. יוסיפי (ver. 2) for תוספתה (they will bring, add) refers to the doctrine and the precepts; the synallage has its ground in this, that the fem. construction in Hebrew is not applicable in such a case; the vulgar Arab. also has set aside the forms jaktubna, taktubna. "Extension of days" is continuance of duration, stretching itself out according to the promise, Ex. xx. 12; and "years of life" (ix. 11) are years—namely, many of them—of a life which is life in the full sense of the word. חיים has here the pregnant signification vita vitalis, βίος βιωτός (Fl.). שלום (R. של) is pure well-being, free from all that disturbs peace or satisfaction, internal and external contentment.

Ver. 3. With this verse the doctrine begins; אל (not לא) shows that 3a does not continue the promise of ver. 2. הסר (R. הס, stringere, afficere) is, according to the prevailing usage of the language, well-affectedness, it may be of God toward men, or of men toward God, or of men toward one another—a loving disposition, of the same meaning as the N. T. ἀγάπη (vid. e.g. Hos. vi. 6). אמת (from אמת), continuance, a standing to one's promises, and not falsifying just expectations; thus fidelity, πίστις, in the inter-related sense of fides and fidelitas. These two states of mind and of conduct are here contemplated as moral powers (Ps. lxi. 8, xliii. 3), which are of excellent service, and bring precious gain; and 4b shows that their ramification on the side of God and of men, the religious and the moral, remains radically inseparable. The suffix  $\text{־}$  does not refer to the doctrine and the precepts, but to these two cardinal virtues. If the disciple is admonished to bind them about his neck (vid. i. 9, cf. iii. 22), so here reference is made, not to ornament, nor yet to protection against evil influences by means of them, as by an amulet<sup>1</sup> (for which proofs are wanting), but to the signet which was wont to be constantly carried (Gen. xxxviii. 18, cf. Cant. viii. 6) on a string around the neck. The parallel member 3c confirms this; 3b and 3c together put us in mind of the Tephilim (phylacteries), Ex. xiii. 16, Deut. vi. 8, xi. 18, in which what is here a figure is presented in external form, but as the real figure of that which is required in the inward parts.  $\text{לָהֹלֵךְ}$  (from  $\text{לָהֹלֵךְ}$ , Arab. lah, to begin to shine, e.g. of a shooting star, gleaming sword; vid. Wetzstein, Deutsch. morgenl. Zeitschr. xxii. 151 f.) signifies the tablet prepared for writing by means of polish; to write love and fidelity on the tablet of the heart, is to impress deeply on the heart the duty of both virtues, so that one will be impelled to them from within outward (Jer. xxxi. 33).

Ver. 4. To the admonitory imper. there follows here a second, as iv. 4, xx. 13, Amos v. 4, 2 Chron. xx. 20, instead of which also the perf. consec. might stand; the counsellor wishes, with the good to which he advises, at the same time to present its good results.  $\text{שֶׁכֶּלֶת}$  is (1 Sam. xxv. 3) the appearance, for the Arab. shakl means forma, as uniting or binding the lineaments or contours into one figure, σχημα, according to which  $\text{שֶׁכֶּלֶת טוֹב}$  may be interpreted of the pleasing and advantageous impression which the well-built external appearance of a man makes, as an image of that which his internal excellence produces; thus, favourable view, friendly judgment, good reputation (Ewald, Hitzig, Zöckler). But everywhere else (xiii. 15; Ps. cxi. 10; 2 Chron. xxx. 22) this phrase means good, i.e. fine, well-becoming insight, or prudence; and  $\text{שֶׁכֶּלֶת}$ has in the language of the Mishle no other meaning than intellectus, which proceeds from the inwardly forming activity of the mind. He obtains favour in the eyes of God and man, to whom favour on both sides is shown; he obtains refined prudence, to whom it is on both sides adjudicated. It is unnecessary, with Ewald and Hitzig, to assign the two objects to God and men. In the eyes of both at the same time, he who carries love and faithfulness in his heart appears as one to whom  $\text{יְהוָה}$  and  $\text{שָׂכַל טוֹב}$  must be adjudicated.

Vers. 5-8. Were "kindness and truth" (ver. 3) understood only in relation to men, then the following admonition would not be interposed, since it proceeds from that going before, if there the quality of kindness and truth, not only towards man, but also towards God, is commended :

- 5 Trust in Jahve with thy whole heart,
And lean not on thine own understanding.
- 6 In all thy ways acknowledge Him,
And He will make plain thy paths.
- 7 Be not wise in thine own eyes;
Fear Jahve, and depart from evil.
- 8 Health will then come to thy navel,
And refreshing to thy bones.

From God alone comes true prosperity, true help. He knows the right way to the right ends. He knows what benefits us. He is able to free us from that which does us harm: therefore it is our duty and our safety to place our confidence wholly in Him, and to trust not to our own judgment. The verb  $\text{בָּטַח}$ , Arab. bath, has the root-meaning expandere, whence perhaps, by a more direct way than that noted under Ps. iv. 6, it acquires the meaning confidere, to lean with the whole body on something, in order to rest upon it, strengthened by  $\text{עַל}$ , if one lean wholly—Fr. se reposer sur quelqu'un; Ital. riposarsi sopra alcuno,—like  $\text{הִשָּׁתָּעַן עִלָּיו}$  with  $\text{עַל}$ , to lean on anything, so as to be supported by it; with  $\text{עַל}$ , to support oneself on anything (Fl.).  $\text{דָּעוּתוֹ}$  (the same in form as  $\text{שָׂאֵתוֹ}$ , Num. xi. 12) is not fully represented by "acknowledge Him;" as in 1 Chron. xxviii. 9 it is not a mere theoretic acknowledgment that is meant, but earnest penetrating cognizance, engaging the whole man. The practico-mystical  $\text{דָּעוּתוֹ}$ , in and of itself full of significance, according to O. and N. T. usage, is yet strengthened by toto corde. The heart is the central seat of all spiritual soul-strength; to love God with the whole heart is to concentrate the whole inner life on the active contemplation of God, and the ready observance of His will. God requites such as show regard to Him, by making plain their path before them, i.e. by leading them directly to the right end, removing all hindrances out of their way. אֲרָחֶיךָ has Cholem in the first syllable (vid. Kimchi's Lex.).<sup>1</sup> "Be not wise in thine own eyes" is equivalent to ne tibi sapiens videre; for, as J. H. Michaelis remarks, confidere Deo est sapere, sibi vero ac suæ sapientiæ, desipere. "Fear God and depart from evil" is the twofold representation of the εὐσεβεια, or practical piety, in the Chokma writings: Prov. xvi. 6, the Mashal psalm xxxiv. 10, 15, and Job xxviii. 28 cf. i. 2. For מַרְעָה, the post-biblical expression is יָרָא חַטָּא.

Ver. 8. The subject to יִהְיֶה (it shall be) is just this religious-moral conduct. The conjectural reading קְלִיכָרִי (Clericus), לְשָׂרְךָ = לְשָׂאֲרֶךָ (Ewald, Hitzig), to thy flesh or body, is unnecessary; the LXX. and Syr. so translating, generalize the expression, which is not according to their taste. שָׂר, from שָׂרַר, Arab. sarr, to be fast, to bind fast, properly, the umbilical cord (which the Arabs call surr, whence the denom. sarra, to cut off the umbilical cord of the new-born); thus the navel, the origin of which coincides with the independent individual existence of the new-born, and is as the firm centre (cf. Arab. saryr, foundation, basis, Job, p. 487) of the existence of the body. The system of punctuation does not, as a rule, permit the doubling of ר, probably on account of the prevailing half guttural, i.e. the uvular utterance of this sound by the men of Tiberias.<sup>2</sup> לְשָׂרְךָ here, and שָׂרְךָ at Ezek. xvi. 4, belong to the exceptions; cf. the expanded duplication in שָׂרְרָךְ, Cant. vii. 3, to which a chief form שָׂרֶר is as little to be assumed as is אֶרְרָךְ to הֶרְרִי. The ἀπ. γεργ. רַפְּאוֹת, healing, has here, as מַרְפֵּא, iv. 22, xvi. 24, and הַרְוֵסָה, Ezek. xlvi. 12, not the meaning of restoration from sickness, but the raising up of enfeebled strength, or the confirming of that which exists; the navel comes into view as the middle point of the vis vitalis. נְשָׂוִי is a Piel formation, corresponding to the abstract Kal formation רַפְּאוֹת; the Arab. سَقَى, used transit.

(to give to drink), also سَقَى (cf. Pu. Job xxi. 24) and اسقى, like the Hebr. הִשְׁקָה (Hiph. of שָׁקַה, to drink); the infin. سَقَى means, to the obliterating of the proper signification, distribution, benefaction, showing friendship, but in the passage before us is to be explained after Job xxi. 24 (the marrow of his bones is well watered; Arnheim—full of sap) and xv. 30. Bertheau and Hitzig erroneously regard ver. 8 as the conclusion to ver. 7, for they interpret רפאות as the subject; but had the poet wished to be so understood, he should have written יתנהו. Much rather the subject is devotion withdrawn from the evil one and turned to God, which externally proves itself by the dedication to Him of earthly possessions.

Ver. 9 Honour Jahve with thy wealth,
 And with the first-fruits of all thine increase:
 10 Then shall thy barns be filled with plenty,
 And thy vats overflow with must.

It may surprise us that the Chokma, being separated from the ceremonial law, here commends the giving of tithes. But in the first place, the consciousness of the duty of giving tithes is older than the Mosaic law, Gen. xxviii. 22; in this case, the giving of tithes is here a general ethical expression. עָשָׂר and מְעַשְׂרֵךְ do not occur in the Book of Proverbs; in the post-biblical phraseology the tithes are called חֶלֶק הַנְּבִיא, the portion of the Most High. כָּבֵר, as the Arab. wakkra, to make heavy, then to regard and deal with as weighty and solemn (opp. קָלֵל, to regard and treat as light, from קָלַל = Arab. hān, to be light). הוֹן, properly lightness in the sense of aisance, opulency, forms with כָּבֵר an oxymoron (fac Jovam gravem de levitate tua), but one aimed at by the author neither at i. 13 nor here. כֵּן (in כִּהְיוֹנָה and כִּבְר', ver. 9) is in both cases participative, as in the law of the Levitical tenths, Lev. xxvii. 30, and of the Challa (heave-offering of dough), Num. xv. 21, where also רְאִישִׁית (in Heb. vii. 4, ἀκροθίνια) occurs in a similar sense, cf. Num. xviii. 12 (in the law of the Theruma or wave-offering of the priests), as also תְּבוּאָה in the law of the second tenths, Deut. xiv. 22, cf. Num. xviii. 30 (in the law of the tenths of the priests). Ver. 10. With apodosis imperativi the conclusion begins. שָׂבַע, satisfaction, is equivalent to fulness, making satisfied, and that, too, richly satisfied; תִּירַשׁ also is such an accusative, as verbs of filling govern it, for בָּרַח, to break through, especially to overflow, signifies to be or become overflowing full (Job i. 10). אָמַם (from אָמַם, Chald. ܡܫܢ, Syr. ásan, to lay up in granaries) is the granary, of the same meaning as the Arab. ákhzan (from khazan = ܡܫܢ, Isa. xxiii. 18, recondere), whence the Spanish magazen, the French and German magazin. ܝܩܒ (from ܝܩܒ, Arab. wakab, to be hollow) is the vat or tub into which the must flows from the wine-press (ܩܒ or ܩܪܒ), λάκκος or ἵπολήμιον. Cf. the same admonition and promise in the prophetic statement of Mal. iii. 10–12.

Vers. 11, 12. The contrast here follows. As God should not be forgotten in days of prosperity, so one should not suffer himself to be estranged from Him by days of adversity.

11 The school of Jahve, my son, despise thou not,
Nor loathe thou His correction;

12 For Jahve correcteth him whom He loveth,
And that as a father his son whom he loveth

Vid. the original passage Job v. 17 f. There is not for the Book of Job a more suitable motto than this tetrastich, which expresses its fundamental thought, that there is a being chastened and tried by suffering which has as its motive the love of God, and which does not exclude sonship.<sup>1</sup> One may say that ver. 11 expresses the problem of the Book of Job, and ver. 12 its solution. ܡܫܢ, paideia, we have translated "school," for ܝܦܪ, paideúein, means in reality to take one into school. Ahdung [punishment] or Rüge [reproof] is the German word which most corresponds to the Hebr. תּוֹכַחַת or תּוֹכַחָה. ܩܪܒ (whence here the prohibitive ܩܪܒ with ܐ) means to experience loathing (disgust) at anything, or aversion (vexation) toward anything. The LXX. (cited Heb. xii. 5 f.), μηδὲ ἐκλύου, nor be faint-hearted, which joins in to the general thought, that we should not be frightened away from God, or let ourselves be estranged from Him by the attitude of anger in which He appears in His determination to inflict suffering. In 12a the accentuation leaves it undefined whether יהוה as subject belongs to the relative or to the principal clause; the traditional succession of accents, certified also by Ben Bileam, is ܝܗוה ܝܐܬܪ ܝܝܫܪܐܝܝܠ, for this passage belongs to the few in which more than three servants (viz. Mahpach, Mercha, and three Munachs) go before the Athnach.<sup>2</sup> The further peculiarity is here to be observed, that ܝܗוה,

although without the Makkeph, retains its Segol, besides here only in Ps. xlvii. 5, lx. 2. 12*b* is to be interpreted thus (cf. ix. 5*b*): "and (that) as a father the son, whom he loves." The ו is explanatory, as 1 Sam. xxviii. 3 (Gesenius, § 155, 1*a*), and יִרְצֶה (which one may supplement by אָהוּ or בּוֹ) is a defining clause having the force of a clause with אִשְׂרָאֵל. The translation, et ut pater qui filio bene cupit, is syntactically (cf. Isa. xl. 11) and accentually (vid. 13*b*) not less admissible, but translating "and as a father he holds his son dear," or with Hitzig (after Jer. xxxi. 10, a passage not quite syntactically the same), "and holds him dear, as a father his son" (which Zöckler without syntactical authority prefers on account of the 2*d* modus, cf. e.g. Ps. li. 18), does not seem a right parallel clause, since the giving of correction is the chief point, and the love only the accompanying consideration (xiii. 24). According to our interpretation, יִרְצֶה is to be carried forward in the mind from 12*a*. The LXX. find the parallel word in כִּמְאֹב, for they translate μαστιγοῖ δὲ πάντα υἱὸν, ὃν παραδέχεται, and thus have read יִרְצֶה or יִרְצֶה.

Vers. 13-15. Such submission to God, the All-wise, the All-directing, who loves us with fatherly affection, is wisdom, and such wisdom is above all treasures.

- 13 Blessed is the man who has found wisdom,
And the man who has gained understanding ;
14 For better is her acquisition than the acquisition of silver,
And her gain than fine gold.
15 More precious is she than corals ;
And all thy jewels do not equal her value.

The imperfect יִרְצֶה, which as the Hiph. of רָצָה, exire, has the general meaning educere, interchanges with the perfect רָצָה. This bringing forth is either a delivering up, i.e. giving out or presenting, Isa. lviii. 10, Ps. cxl. 9, cxliv. 13 (cf. נָפַס, Arab. nafak, to give out, to pay out), or a fetching out, getting out, receiving, viii. 35, xii. 2, xviii. 22. Thus 13*a* reminds one of the parable of the treasure in the field, and 13*b* of that of the goodly pearl for which the ἔμπορος who sought the pearl parted with all that he had. Here also is declared the promise of him who trades with a merchant for the possession of wisdom ; for פְּתָרָה and פְּתָרָה (both, as Isa. xxiii. 3, 18, xlv. 15, from פְּתָר, the latter after the forms יָרַע, נָפַס, without our needing to assume a second primary form, פְּתָר) go back to the root-word פְּתָר, to trade, go about as a trader, with the fundamental meaning ἐμπορεύεσθαι (LXX.); and also the mention of the pearls is not wanting here, for at all events the meaning "pearls" has blended itself with פְּנִינִים, which is a favourite word in the Mashal poetry, though it be not the original meaning of the word. In 14b פְּנִינִים is surpassed by הַרְוֵי (besides in the Proverbs, found only in this meaning in Ps. lxxviii. 14), which properly means ore found in a mine, from רָוַה, to cut in, to dig up, and hence the poetic name of gold, perhaps of gold dug out as distinguished from molten gold. Hitzig regards χρυσός as identical with it; but this word (Sansk. without the ending hir, Zend. zar) is derived from ghar, to glitter (vid. Curtius). הַבְּוֹאֲתָהּ we have translated "gain," for it does not mean the profit which wisdom brings, the tribute which it yields, but the gain, the possession of wisdom herself.

Ver. 15. As regards פְּנִינִים, for which the Kethib has פְּנִינִים, the following things are in favour of the fundamental meaning "corals," viz.: (1.) The name itself, which corresponds with the Arab. فَن; this word, proceeding from the root-idea of shooting forth, particularly after the manner of plants, means the branch and all that raises or multiplies itself branch-like or twig-like (Fleischer). (2.) The redness attributed to the פְּנִינִים, Lam. iv. 7, in contradistinction to the pure whiteness attributed to snow and milk (vid. at Job xxviii. 18). The meaning of the word may, however, have become generalized in practice (LXX. in loc. λίθων πολυτελών, Græc. Venet. λιθιδίων); the meaning "pearls," given to it in the Job-Targum by Rashi, and particularly by Bochart, lay so much the nearer as one may have wrought also corals and precious stones, such as the carbuncle, sardius, and sapphire, into the form of pearls. יָקָרָה, in consequence of the retrogression of the tone, has Munach on the penult., and that as an exception, as has been remarked by the Masora, since in substantives and proper names terminating in הָ the אחור, i.e. the receding of the tone, does not elsewhere appear, e.g. יָפָה הָיָה, Gen. xii. 14, בָּרָה הָיָה, Cant. vi. 9, צָרָה הָיָה, Jer. xxx. 7. "יָפָן is first abstr., a being inclined to something, lust, will, pleasure in anything, then also concr., anything in which one has pleasure, what is beautiful, precious; cf. شهى نفيس, hence نجارة نفيسة, "precious stones" (Fleischer). שָׁוָה with אָ means to be an equivalent (purchase-price, exchange) for anything; the most natural construction in Arab. as well as in Hebr. is that with ל, to be the equivalent of a thing (vid. at Job xxxiii. 27); the פ is the Beth pretii, as if one said in Arab.: biabi anta thou art in the estimate of my father, I give it for thee. One distinctly perceives in vers. 14, 15, the echo of Job xxviii. This tetrastich occurs again with a slight variation at viii. 10, 11. The Talmud and the Midrash accent it so, that in the former the expression is וכל־הפצים, and in the latter וכל־הפציר, and they explain the latter of precious stones and pearls (אבנים טובות ומרגליות).

Vers. 16-18. That wisdom is of such incomparable value is here confirmed:

- 16 Length of days is in her right hand;
 In her left, riches and honour.
 17 Her ways are pleasant ways,
 And all her paths are peace.
 18 A tree of life is she to those that lay hold upon her,
 And he who always holdeth her fast is blessed.

As in the right hand of Jahve, according to Ps. xvi. 11, are pleasures for evermore, so Wisdom holds in her right hand "length of days," viz. of the days of life, thus life, the blessing of blessings; in her left, riches and honour (viii. 18), the two good things which, it is true, do not condition life, but, received from Wisdom, and thus wisely, elevate the happiness of life—in the right hand is the chief good, in the left the προσθήκη, Matt. vi. 33. Didymus: Per sapientiæ dextram divinarum rerum cognitio, ex qua immortalitatis vita oritur, significatur; per sinistram autem rerum humanarum notitia, ex qua gloria opumque abundantia nascitur. The LXX., as between 15a and 15b, so also here after ver. 16, interpolate two lines: "From her mouth proceedeth righteousness; justice and mercy she bears upon her tongue,"—perhaps translated from the Hebr., but certainly added by a reader.

Ver. 17. דרכי־נעים are ways on which one obtains what is agreeable to the inner and the outer man, and which it does good to enjoy. The parallel שלום is not a genitive to נתיבות to be supplied; the paths of Wisdom are themselves שלום, for she brings well-being on all sides and deep inward satisfaction (peace). In regard to נתיבה, via eminens, elata, Schultens is right (vid. under i. 15);<sup>1</sup> נתיבותיה has Munach, and instead of the Metheg, Tarcha, vid. under i. 31b.

<sup>1</sup> The root is not תב, to grope, but נת; whence Arab. natt, to bubble up, natâ, to raise oneself, to swell up, etc.

The figure of the tree of life the fruit of which brings immortality, is, as xi. 30, xv. 4 (cf. xiii. 12), Rev. ii. 7, taken from the history of paradise in the Book of Genesis. The old ecclesiastical saying, Lignum vitæ cruz Christi, accommodates itself in a certain measure, through Matt. xi. 19, Luke xi. 49, with this passage of the Book of Proverbs.  $\text{בָּרַבְרָה}$  means to fasten upon anything, more fully expressed in Gen. xxi. 18, to bind the hand firm with anything, to seize it firmly. They who give themselves to Wisdom, come to experience that she is a tree of life whose fruit contains and communicates strength of life, and whoever always keeps fast hold of Wisdom is blessed, i.e. to be pronounced happy (Ps. xli. 3, vid. under Ps. cxxxvii. 8). The predicate  $\text{בְּרָכָה}$ , blessed, refers to each one of the  $\text{הַמְּבָרָכִים}$ , those who hold her, cf. xxvii. 16, Num. xxiv. 9. It is the so-called distributive singular of the predicate, which is freely used particularly in those cases where the plur. of the subject is a participle (vid. under ver. 35).

FIFTH INTRODUCTORY MASHAL DISCOURSE, III. 19-26.

THE WORLD-CREATIVE WISDOM AS MEDIATRIX OF DIVINE PROTECTION.

O son, guard against seducers (i. 8 ff.); listen to the warning voice of Wisdom (i. 20 ff.); seek after Wisdom: she is the way to God, comes from God, and teaches thee to shun the wicked way and to walk in the way that is good (ii.); thou shalt obtain her if, renouncing self-confidence, thou givest thyself unreservedly to God (iii. 1-18)—these are the four steps, so far, of this introductory παράδεισις. Each discourse contributes its own to present vividly and impressively what Wisdom is and what she procures, her nature and her blessings. From her hand come all good gifts of God to men. She is the tree of life. Her place between God and men is thus that of a mediatrix.

Vers. 19, 20. This place of a mediatrix—the speaker here now continues—she had from the beginning. God's world-creating work was mediated by her:

19 Jahve hath by wisdom founded the earth,
Established the heavens by understanding.

20 By His knowledge the water-floods broke forth,
And the sky dropped down dew.

That wisdom is meant by which God planned the world-idea, and now also wrought it out; the wisdom in which God conceived the world ere it was framed, and by which also He gave external realization to His thoughts; the wisdom which is indeed an attribute of God and a characteristic of His actions, since she is a property of His nature, and His nature attests itself in her, but not less, as appears, not from this group of tetrastichs, but from all that has hitherto been said, and from the personal testimony, viii. 22 ff., of which it is the prælude, she goes forth as a divine power to which God has given to have life in herself. Considered apart from the connection of these discourses, this group of verses, as little as Jer. x. 2, Ps. civ. 24, determines regarding the attributive interpretation; the Jerusalem Targum, I., when it translates, Gen. i. 1, בראשית by בְּחִיכְמָא (בְּחִיכְמָא), combines viii. 22 with such passages as this before us. יָסַד (here with the tone thrown back) properly signifies, like the Arab. wasad, to lay fast, to found, for one gives to a fact the firm basis of its existence. The parallel Pil. of בָּן (Arab. kān, cogn. כָּהַן, see on Isaiah, p. 691) signifies to set up, to restore; here equivalent to, to give existence.

Ver. 20. It is incorrect to understand 20a, with the Targ., of division, i.e. separating the water under the firmament from the water above the firmament; נִבְּקַע is spoken of water, especially of its breaking forth, Gen. vii. 11, Ex. xiv. 21, cf. Ps. lxxiv. 15, properly dividing itself out, i.e. welling forth from the bowels of the earth; it means, without distinguishing the primordial waters and the later water-floods confined within their banks (cf. Job xxxviii. 8 f., Ps. civ. 6-8), the overflowing of the earth for the purpose of its processes of cultivation and the irrigation of the land. תְּהוֹמוֹת (from הוּם = הִמָּה, to groan, to roar) are chiefly the internal water stores of the earth, Gen. xlix. 25, Ps. xxxiii. 7. But while 20a is to be understood of the waters under the firmament, 20b is to be interpreted of those above. שְׁחָקִים (from שָׁחַק, Arab. shak, comminuere, attenuare) properly designates the uppermost stratum of air thinly and finely stretching itself far and wide, and then poetically the clouds of heaven (vid. under Ps. lxxvii. 18). Another name, עֲרִיפִים, comes from עָרַף, which is transposed from רָעַף (here used in 20b), Arab. r'af, to drop, to run. The טָל added on the object accusative represents synecdochically all the waters coming down from heaven and fructifying the earth. This watering proceeds from above (ורעפו); on the contrary, the endowing of the surface of the earth with great and small rivers is a fundamental fact in creation (נבקעו).

Vers. 21–22. From this eminence, in which the work of creation presents wisdom, exhortations are now deduced, since the writer always expresses himself only with an ethical intention regarding the nature of wisdom :

- 21 My son, may they not depart from thine eyes—
 Preserve thoughtfulness and consideration,
 22 And they will be life to thy soul
 And grace to thy neck.

If we make the synonyms of wisdom which are in 21b the subject per prolepsin to אֱלֹהֵי יָלְוֶיךָ (Hitzig and Zöckler), then 19–20 and 21–22 clash. The subjects are wisdom, understanding, knowledge, which belong to God, and shall from Him become the possession of those who make them their aim. Regarding לֵךְ, obliquari, deflectere, see under ii. 15, cf. iv. 21; regarding תִּשְׁמַרְתָּ (here defective after the Masora, as rightly in Vened. 1515, 1521, and Nissel, 1662), see at ii. 7; יִלְוֶיךָ for תִּלְוֶיךָ, see at iii. 2b. The LXX. (cf. Heb. ii. 1) translate without distinctness of reference: σιὲ μὴ παραρῶνς (παρὰρῶνς), let it not flow past, i.e. let it not be unobserved, hold it always before thee; the Targ. with the Syr. render לֵךְ נִלְוֶיךָ, ne vilescat, as if the words were אֱלֹהֵי יָלְוֶיךָ. In 22a the synallage generis is continued: יְהִיִּי for יִתְהַיֶּיךָ. Regarding נִרְרֶיךָ, see at i. 9. By wisdom the soul gains life, divinely true and blessed, and the external appearance of the man grace, which makes him pleasing and gains for him affection.

Vers. 23–26. But more than this, wisdom makes its possessor in all situations of life confident in God :

- 23 Then shalt thou go thy way with confidence,
 And thy foot shall not stumble.
 24 When thou liest down, thou art not afraid,
 But thou layest thyself down and hast sweet sleep.
 25 Thou needest not be afraid of sudden alarm,
 Nor for the storm of the wicked when it breaketh forth.
 26 For Jahve will be thy confidence
 And keep thy foot from the snare.

The לֵבְבָהּ (cf. our "bei guter Laune" = in good cheer), with ל of the condition, is of the same meaning as the conditional adverbial accusative בְּטֶמֶח, x. 9, i. 33. Ver. 23b the LXX. translate ὁ δὲ πούς σου οὐ μὴ προσκόψῃ, while, on the contrary, at Ps. xci. 12 they make the person the subject (μήποτε προσκόψῃς τὸν κ.τ.λ.); here also we retain more surely the subject from 23a, especially since for the intrans. of נָנָה (to smite, to push) a Hithpa. הִתְנַנְּה is used Jer. xiii. 16. In ver. 24 there is the echo of Job xi. 18, and in ver. 25 of Job v. 21. 24b is altogether the same as Job v. 24b: et decumbes et suavis erit somnus tuus = si decubueris, suavis erit. The hypothetic perf., according to the sense, is both there and at Job xi. 18 (cf. Jer. xx. 9) oxytoned as perf. consec. Similar examples are vi. 22, Gen. xxxiii. 13, I Sam. xxv. 31, cf. Ewald, § 357a. עָרְבָה (of sleep as Jer. xxxi. 26) is from עָרַב, which in Hebr. is used of pleasing impressions, as the Arab. 'ariba of a lively, free disposition. הִנָּנָה, somnus (nom. actionis from הִנָּן, with the ground-form sina preserved in the Arab. lidat, vid. Job, p. 284, note), agrees in inflexion with הִנָּנָה, annus. אַי, ver. 25a, denies, like Ps. cxxi. 3, with emphasis: be afraid only not = thou hast altogether nothing to fear. Schultens rightly says: Subest species prohibitionis et tanquam abominationis, ne tale quicquam vel in suspicionem veniat in mentemve cogitando admittatur. פָּחַד here means terror, as i. 26 f., the terrific object; פִּתְאוֹם (with the accus. om) is the virtual genitive, as xxvi. 2 הִנָּנָה (with accus. am). Regarding הִנָּנָה, see under i. 27. The genitive הִנָּנָה may be, after Ps. xxxvii. 17, the genit. subjecti, but still it lies nearer to say that he who chooses the wisdom of God as his guiding star has no ground to fear punishment as transgressors have reason to fear it; the הִנָּנָה is meant which wisdom threatens against transgressors, i. 27. He needs have no fear of it, for wisdom is a gift of God, and binds him who receives it to the giver: Jahve becomes and is henceforth his confidence. Regarding ב essentia, which expresses the closest connection of the subject with the predicate which it introduces, see under Ps. xxxv. 2. As here, so also at Ex. xviii. 4, Ps. cxviii. 7, cxlvi. 5, the predicate is a noun with a pronominal suffix. בְּכַסְלִי is, as at Ps. lxxviii. 7, Job xxxi. 24, cognate to בְּכַסְתָּ and בְּכַסְתָּ, the object and ground of confidence. That the word in other connections may mean also foolhardiness, Ps. xlix. 14, and folly, Eccles. vii. 25 (cf. regarding כְּסָלִים, which in Arab. as belid denotes the dull, in Hebr. fools, see under i. 22), it follows that it proceeds from the fundamental con-

1 According to Malbim, תִּקְוָה is the expectation of good, and בְּכַסְלִי, confidence in the presence of evil.

ception of fulness of flesh and of fat, whence arise the conceptions of dulness and slothfulness, as well as of confidence, whether confidence in self or in God (see Schultens l.c., and Wünsche's Hosea, p. 207 f.). לָכַד is taking, catching, as in a net or trap or pit, from לָכַד, to catch (cf. Arab. lakida, to fasten, III. IV. to hold fast); another root-meaning, in which Arab. lak connects itself with nak, נָךְ, to strike, to assail (whence al-lakdat, the assault against the enemy, Deutsch. Morgenl. Zeitsch. xxii. 140), is foreign to the Hebr. Regarding the מן of מִלְכָד, Fleischer remarks: "The מן after verbs of guarding, preserving, like שָׁמַר and נָצַר, properly expresses that one by those means holds or seeks to hold a person or thing back from something, like the Lat. defendere, tueri aliquem ab hostibus, a periculo."<sup>1</sup>

SIXTH INTRODUCTORY MASHAL DISCOURSE, III. 27-35.

EXHORTATION TO BENEVOLENCE AND RECTITUDE.

The promise in which it terminates, designates the close of the fifth discourse. The sixth differs from it in this, that, like none of the preceding, it adds proverb to proverb. The first series recommends love to one's neighbour, and the second warns against fellowship with the uncharitable.

Vers. 27, 28. The first illustration of neighbourly love which is recommended, is readiness to serve :

<sup>1</sup> Hitzig rejects iii. 22-26 as a later interpolation. And why? Because iii., which he regards as a complete discourse, consists of twice ten verses beginning with בְּנִי. In addition to this symmetry other reasons easily reveal themselves to his penetration. But the discourses contained in chap. i.-ix. do not all begin with בְּנִי (vid. i. 20); and when it stands in the beginning of the discourse, it is not always the first word (vid. i. 8); and when it occurs as the first word or in the first line, it does not always commence a new discourse (vid. i. 15 in the middle of the first, iii. 11 in the middle of the fourth); and, moreover, the Hebr. poetry and oratory does not reckon according to verses terminated by Soph Pasuk, which are always accented distichs, but they in reality frequently consist of three or more lines. The rejected verses are in nothing unlike those that remain, and which are undisputed; they show the same structure of stichs, consisting for the most part of three, but sometimes also only of two words (cf. iii. 22*b* with i. 9*b*, 10*b*), the same breadth in the course of the thoughts, and the same accord with Job and Deuteronomy.

- 27 Refuse no manner of good to him to whom it is due
When it is in thy power to do it.
- 28 Say not to thy neighbour, "Go, and come again,
To-morrow I will give it," whilst yet thou hast it.

Regarding the intensive plur. בְּעָלָיו with a sing. meaning, see under i. 19. The form of expression without the suffix is not בְּעָלִי but בְּעַל טוֹב; and this denotes here, not him who does good (בעל as Arab. dhw or ṣahab), but him to whom the good deed is done (cf. xvii. 8), i.e. as here, him who is worthy of it (בעל as Arab. āhl), him who is the man for it (Jewish interp.: מִי שְׂהוּא רֵאוּי לוֹ). We must refuse nothing good (nothing either legally or morally good) to him who has a right to it (בְּמַנְעַת כֹּזֵן as Job xxii. 7, xxxi. 16),<sup>1</sup> if we are in a condition to do him this good. The phrase יָשׁ לְאֵל יָדִי, Gen. xxxi. 29, and frequently, signifies: it is belonging to (practicable) the power of my hand, i.e. I have the power and the means of doing it. As יָדִי signifies the haughty, insolent, but may be also used in the neuter of insolent conduct (vid. Ps. xix. 14), so אֵל signifies the strong, but also (although only in this phrase) strength. The Keri rejects the plur. יָדַי, because elsewhere the hand always follows אֵל in the singular. But it rejects the plur. לְרַעֲיָךְ (ver. 28) because the address following is directed to one person. Neither of these emendations was necessary. The usage of the language permits exceptions, notwithstanding the usus tyrannus, and the plur. לְרַעֲיָךְ may be interpreted distributively: to thy fellows, it may be this one or that one. Hitzig also regards לְרַעֲיָךְ as a singular; but the mas. of רַעֲיָה, the ground-form of which is certainly ra'j, is רַעְיָה, or shorter, רַעַי. לְרַעֲיָךְ אָשׁוּב does not mean: forth! go home again! but: go, and come again. אָשׁוּב, to come again, to return to something, to seek it once more.<sup>2</sup> The ו of וְיָשׁ אֶתְּתֶךָ is, as 29*b*, the conditional: quum sit penes te, sc. quod ei des. "To-morrow shall I give" is less a promise than a delay and putting off, because it is difficult for him to alienate himself from him who makes the request. This

<sup>2</sup> Thus also (Arab.) raj' is used in Thaalebi's Confidential Companion, p. 24, line 3, of Flügel's ed. Admission was prevented to one Haschmid, then angry he sought it once more; he was again rejected, then he sought it not again (Arab. fm yraj'), but says, etc. Flügel has misunderstood the passage. Fleischer explains raj', with reference to Prov. iii. 28, by revenir à la charge.

holding fast by one's own is unamiable selfishness; this putting off in the fulfilment of one's duty is a sin of omission—οὐ γὰρ οἶδας, as the LXX. adds, τί τέξεται ἡ ἐπιούσα.

Ver. 29. A second illustration of neighbourly love is harmlessness :

Devise not evil against thy neighbour,
While he dwelleth securely by thee.

The verb חָרַץ, χαράσσειν, signifies to cut into, and is used of the faber ferrarius as well as of the tignarius (Isaiah, p. 463), who with a cutting instrument (חָרַץ, Gen. iv. 22) works with metal or wood, and from his profession is called חָרַץ. But the word means as commonly to plough, i.e. to cut with the plough, and חָרַץ is used also of a ploughman, and, without any addition to it, it always has this meaning. It is then a question whether the metaphorical phrase חָרַץ רָעָה signifies to fabricate evil, cf. dolorum faber, mendacia procudere, ψευδῶν καὶ ἀπατῶν τέκτων, and the Homeric κακὰ φρεσὶ βυσσοδομεύειν (Fleischer and most others), or to plough evil (Rashi, Ewald, etc.). The Targ., Syriac, and Jerome translate חָרַץ, without deciding the point, by moliri; but the LXX. and Græcus Venet. by τεκταίνειν. The correctness of these renderings is not supported by Ezek. xxi. 36, where חָרַץ מְשַׁחֵת are not such as fabricate destruction, but smiths who cause destruction; also מְחָרֵץ, 1 Sam. xxiii. 9, proves nothing, and probably does not at all appertain to חָרַץ incidere (Keil), but to חָרַץ silere, in the sense of dolose moliri. On the one hand, it is to be observed from Job iv. 8, Hos. x. 13, cf. Ps. cxxix. 3, that the meaning arare malum might connect itself with חָרַץ רָעָה; and the proverb of Sirach vii. 12, μη ἀροτρία ψεύδους ἐπ' ἀδελφῷ σου, places this beyond a doubt. Therefore in this phrase, if one keeps before him a clear perception of the figure, at one time the idea of fabricating, at another that of ploughing, is presented before us. The usage of the language in the case before us is more in favour of the latter than of the former. Whether אִשָּׁב אִתּוֹ means to dwell together with, or as Böttcher, to sit together with, after Ps. i. 1, xxvi. 4 f., need not be a matter of dispute. It means in general a continued being together, whether as sitting, Job ii. 13, or as dwelling, Judg. xvii. 11.<sup>1</sup> To take advantage of the regardlessness of him who imparts to us his confidence is unamiable. Love is doubly owing to him who resigns himself to it because he believes in it.

Ver. 30. A third illustration of the same principle is peaceableness :

Contend not with a man without a cause,
When he has inflicted no evil upon thee.

Instead of תָּרִיב, or as the Keri has amended it תָּרִיב, the abbreviated form תָּרִיב or תָּרִיב would be more correct after אֵל; רִיב or רִיב (from רָב, to be compact) means to fall upon one another, to come to hand-blows, to contend. Contending and quarrelling with a man, whoever he may be, without sufficient reason, ought to be abandoned; but there exists no such reason if he has done me no harm which I have to reproach him with. אֵל with the accus. or dat. of the person signifies to bring evil upon any one, malum inferre, or also referre (Schultens), for אֵל (cogn. אָמַר) signifies to execute, to complete, accomplish,—both of the initiative and of the requital, both of the anticipative and of the recompensing action; here in the former of these senses.

Vers. 31, 32. These exhortations to neighbourly love in the form of warning against whatever is opposed to it, are followed by the warning against fellowship with the loveless :

- 31 Be not envious toward the man of violence,
And have no pleasure in all his ways.
32 For an abhorrence to Jahve is the perverse,
But with the upright is His secret.

The conceptions of jealousy and envy lie in קָנָא (derived by Schultens from קָנָא, Arab. kanā, intensus rubere) inseparable from each other. The LXX., which for תִּקְנָא reads תִּקְנָא (κατήσθη), brings the envy into 31b, as if the words here were וְאֵל־תִּתְחַרְרָה, as in Ps. xxxvii. 1, 7 (there the LXX. has μη παραζήλου, here μηδὲ ζηλώσης). There is no reason for correcting our text in accordance with this (substituting תִּתְחַרְרָה for תִּתְחַרְרָה as Hitzig does), because בְּכָל־דְּרָכָיו would be too vague an expression for the object of the envy, while אֵל־תִּתְחַרְרָה altogether agrees with it; and the contrary remark, that בְּכָל־בְּחַר is fundamentally no בְּחַר, fails, since (1) בָּחַר frequently expresses pleasure in anything without the idea of choice, and (2) "have not pleasure in all his ways" is in the Hebrew style equivalent to "in any one of his ways;" Ewald, § 323b. He who does "violence to the law" (Zeph. iii. 4) becomes thereby, according to the common course of the world, a person who is feared, whose authority, power, and resources are increased, but one must not therefore envy him, nor on any side take pleasure in his conduct, which in all respects is to be reprobated; for the  $\text{נָלִי}$ , inflexus, tortuosus (vid. ii. 15), who swerves from the right way and goes in a crooked false way, is an object of Jahve's abhorrence, while, on the contrary, the just, who with a right mind walks in the right way, is Jahve's  $\text{סוֹר}$ —an echo of Ps. xxv. 14.  $\text{סוֹר}$  (R.  $\text{סר}$ , to be firm, compressed) means properly the being pressed together, or sitting together (cf. the Arab. wisâd, wisâdt, a cushion, divan, corresponding in form to the Hebr.  $\text{יְסוֹר}$ ) for the purpose of private communication and conversation ( $\text{הַיְסוֹר}$ ), and then partly the confidential intercourse, as here (cf. Job xxix. 4), partly the private communication, the secret (Amos iii. 7). LXX., ἐν δὲ δικαίους [οὐ] συνεδριάζει. Those who are out of the way, who prefer to the simplicity of right-doing all manner of crooked ways, are contrary to God, and He may have nothing to do with them; but the right-minded He makes partakers of His most intimate intercourse, He deals with them as His friends.

Ver. 33. The prosperity of the godless, far from being worthy of envy, has as its reverse side the curse:

The curse of Jahve is in the house of the godless,
And the dwelling of the just He blesseth.

$\text{מְאַרָה}$  (a curse), like  $\text{מַסְלָה}$  (a highway, from  $\text{סָלַל}$ ), is formed from  $\text{אַרָר}$  (cf. Arab. harr, detestari, abhorrere, a word-imitation of an interjection used in disagreeable experiences). The curse is not merely a deprivation of external goods which render life happy, and the blessing is not merely the fulness of external possessions; the central-point of the curse lies in continuous disquiet of conscience, and that of the blessing in the happy consciousness that God is with us, in soul-rest and peace which is certain of the grace and goodness of God. The poetic  $\text{נִיָּה}$  (from  $\text{נָה}$  = Arab. nowy, tetendit aliquo) signifies the place of settlement, and may be a word borrowed from a nomad life, since it denotes specially the pasture-ground; cf. xxiv. 15 (Fleischer). While the curse of God rests in the house of the wicked (vid. Köhler on Zech. v. 4), He blesses, on the contrary, the dwelling-place of the righteous. The LXX. and Jerome read  $\text{יְבִרָה}$ , but  $\text{יְבִרָה}$  is more agreeable, since God continues to be the subject.

Ver. 34. His relation to men is determined by their relation to Him.

As for the scorers, He scorneth them,
But to the lowly He giveth grace.

Most interpreters render the verse thus: "If the scorner He (even He, in return) scorneth, so He (on the other hand) giveth grace to the lowly." For the sequence of the words in the consequence, in which the precedence of the verb is usual, e.g. Lev. xii. 5, we are referred to xxiii. 18, cf. xxiv. 14; but why had the poet placed the two facts in the relation of condition and consequence? The one fact is not the consequence but the reverse of the other, and accordingly they are opposed to each other in coordinated passages, Ps. xviii. 26 f. The Vav in such antitheses has generally the meaning of "and on the other hand," e.g. Job viii. 20, while the LXX., Targ., Syriac, and Jerome altogether pass over the  $\text{בַּב}$  as if it did not exist. Ziegler translates: "Truly! the scorner He scorneth;" but an affirmative  $\text{בַּב}$  does not exist, the asseveration after the manner of an oath is negative. Bertheau's expedient would be more acceptable, by which he makes the whole of ver. 34 the protasis to ver. 35; but if this were intended, another subject would not enter into ver. 35. Thus 34*a* and 34*b* are two independent parallel passages;  $\text{בַּב לַלְוִיִּם}$  is the protasis: if as regards the scorers, i.e. if His conduct is directed to the scorers, so He scorneth. The  $\text{ל}$  denotes relation, and in this elliptical usage is like the  $\text{ל}$  of superscription, e.g. Jer. xxiii. 9.  $\text{הוּא}$  is the emphatic αὐτός: He on the contrary, and in a decisive way (Ewald, § 314*ab*). Instead of  $\text{לַלְוִיִּם}$  there might have been used  $\text{לְלֹוִיִּם}$  (for  $\text{לַלְוִיִּם}$ , where it occurs as a governing word, has the accusative, xix. 28, Ps. cxix. 51), but we do not miss the object: if it relates to scorers (thus also Löwenstein translates), so it is He in return who scorneth. The LXX. renders it: κύριος ὑπερηφάνους ἀντιτάσεται, ταπεινοῖς δὲ δίδωσι χάρις; cf. Jas. iv. 6, 1 Pet. v. 5.  $\text{הוּא}$  is used as a name of God (Deutsch. Morgenl. Zeitschr. xvi. 400), on which account it is rendered like  $\text{יהוה}$  by κύριος. A ὑπερήφανος (appearing above others, i.e. overbearing) is the  $\text{לָוִי}$ , according to the definition xxi. 24. The expression of the talio is generalized in ἀντιτάσεται (resists them). For  $\text{עניי}$  the Kerī has  $\text{עַנְיָ$ :  $\text{עַנְיָ}$  (from  $\text{עָנָה}$ , the ground-form  $\text{עָנָה}$ , Arab. 'anaw) is the lowly (ταπεινός), or he who bends himself, i.e. the gentle and humble, the patient, and the passive  $\text{עָנָה}$ , he who is bowed down, the suffering; but the limits of the conception are moveable, since in  $\text{עָנָה}$  is presupposed the possession of fruit-virtues gained in the school of affliction.

Ver. 35. This group of the proverbs of wisdom now suitably closes with the fundamental contrast between the wise and fools :

The wise shall inherit honour,
But fools carry away shame.

If we take וּבְשִׁלְיָם as the object, then we can scarcely interpret the clause : shame sweeps fools away (Umbreit, Zöckler, Bertheau), for הָרִים [Hiph. of רָם] signifies (Isa. lvii. 14, Ezek. xxi. 31) “to raise up anything high and far,” not “to sweep away.” Preferable is the rendering : τοὺς δ' ἄφρονας ἰψοῖ ἀτύλα (Græc. Venet., and similarly Jerome), i.e. only to it do they owe their celebrity as warning examples (Ewald), to which Oetinger compares “whose glory is in their shame,” Phil. iii. 19;<sup>1</sup> but קָלָן is the contrary of קָבוֹד (glory, Hab. ii. 16), and therefore is as much an object conception as is the latter, 35a. If it is the object, then if we take מְרִים from מָר after the form of לָן, Neh. xiii. 21 = מְמָרִים (Hos. iv. 7), it might be rendered : Yet fools exchange shame (Löwenstein). But מָר, like the Arab. marr, transire, means properly to pass over or to wander over ; it is intransitive, and only in Hiph. signifies actively to exchange. מְרִים thus will be the participle of הָרִים ; the plur. taken distributively (fools = whoever is only always a fool) is connected with the singular of the predicate. This change in the number is here, however, more difficult than at iii. 18, and in other places, where the plur. of the part. permits the resolution into a relative clause with quicumque, and more difficult than at xxviii. 1, where the sing. of the predicate is introduced by attraction ; wherefore מְרִים may be an error in transcribing for מְרִימִים or מְרִימֵי (Böttcher). J. H. Michaelis (after the Targ. and Syr.) has properly rendered the clause : “stulti tollunt ignominiam tanquam portionem suam,” adding “quæ derivato nomine תְּרוּמָה dicitur.” הָרִים signifies, in the language of the sacrificial worship and of worship generally, to lift off from anything the best portion, the legitimate portion due to God and the priesthood (vid. at iii. 9) ; for which reason Rashi glosses מְרִים by מַפְרִישׁ לוֹ, and Ralbag by לוֹ מַנְבִּיחַ לוֹ. See xiv. 29. Honour is that which the wise inherit, it falls to them unsought as a possession, but fools receive shame as the offal (viz. of their foolish conduct). The fut. and part. are significantly interchanged. The life of the wise ends in glory, but fools inherit shame; the fruit of their conduct is shame and evermore shame.

SEVENTH INTRODUCTORY MASHAL DISCOURSE, IV.-V. 6.

RECOLLECTIONS OF HIS FATHER'S HOUSE.

The means are not yet exhausted by which the teacher of wisdom seeks to procure acceptance for his admonitions and warnings, and to give them emphasis. He has introduced the importance of his person in order that he might gain the heart of the disciple, and has presented as speaker, instead of himself, the revered person of Wisdom herself, who seeks to win, by means of warnings and promises, the souls of men.

Chap. iv. 1-4. He now confirms and explains the command to duty which he has placed at the beginning of the whole (i. 8). This he does by his own example, for he relates from the history of his own youth, to the circle of disciples by whom he sees himself surrounded, what good doctrine his parents had taught him regarding the way of life :

- 1 Hear, ye sons, the instruction of a father,
And attend that ye may gain understanding ;
- 2 For I give to you good doctrine,
Forsake not my direction !
- 3 For I was a son to my father,
A tender and only (son) in the sight of my mother.
- 4 And he instructed me, and said to me :
" Let thine heart hold fast my words :
Observe my commandments and live ! "

That בָּנִים in the address comes here into the place of בְּנִי, hitherto used, externally denotes that בְּנִי in the progress of these discourses finds another application: the poet himself is so addressed by his father. Intentionally he does not say אֲבֹתֵיכֶם (cf. i. 8): he does not mean the father of each individual among those addressed, but himself, who is a father in his relation to them as his disciples; and as he manifests towards them fatherly love, so also he can lay claim to paternal authority over them. לְדַעַת is rightly vocalized, not לְדַעַתָּה. The words do not give the object of attention, but the design, the aim. The combination of ideas in דַּעַת בְּיָנֶה (cf. i. 2), which appears to us singular, loses its strangeness when we remember that רעה means, according to its etymon, deposition or reception into the conscience and life. Regarding לקח, apprehension, reception, lesson = doctrine, vid. i. 5. נחת is the perf., which denotes as fixed and finished what is just now being done, Gesenius, § 126, 4. עזב is here synonym of נטש, i. 8, and the contrary of שמר, xxviii. 4. The relative factum in the perfect, designating the circumstances under which the event happened, regularly precedes the chief factum ויחי; see under Gen. i. 2 f. Superficially understood, the expression 3a would be a platitude; the author means that the natural legal relation was also confirming itself as a moral one. It was a relation of many-sided love, according to 3a: he was esteemed of his mother—לפני, used of the reflex in the judgment, Gen. x. 9, and of loving care, Gen. xvii. 18, means this—as a tender child, and therefore tenderly to be protected (אך as Gen. xxxiii. 13), and as an only child, whether he were so in reality, or was only loved as if he were so. יחי? (Aq., Sym., Theod., μονογενής) may with reference to number also mean unice dilectus (LXX. ἀγαπώμενος); cf. Gen. xxii. 2, יחיד? (where the LXX. translate τὸν ἀγαπητόν, without therefore having ידי? before them). לפני is maintained by all the versions; לבני is not a variant.<sup>1</sup> The instruction of the father begins with the jussive, which is pointed<sup>2</sup> יתמך to distinguish it from יתמך on account of the δ. The LXX. has incorrectly ἐρειδέτω, as if the word were ימך; Symmachus has correctly κατεχέτω. The imper. וחי is, as vii. 2, Gen. xx. 7, more than ותחי; the teacher seeks, along with the means, at the same time their object: Observe my commandments, and so become a partaker of life! The Syriac, however, adds ותרתי באישון עיניך [and my instruction as the apple of thine eye], a clause borrowed from vii. 2.

Vers. 5, 6. The exhortation of the father now specializes itself:

5 Get wisdom, get understanding;

Forget not and turn not from the words of my mouth.

<sup>1</sup> In some editions לבני is noted as Keri to לפני, but erroneously and contrary to the express evidence of the Masora, which affirms that there are two passages in which we ought to read not לפני, but לבני, viz. Ps. lxxx. 3 and Prov. iv. 3.

<sup>2</sup> The writing of יתמך with the grave Metheg (Gaja) and Kamets-Chatuph (δ) is that of Ben Asher; on the other hand, יתמך with Cholem (δ) and the permanent Metheg is that of Ben Naphtali; vid. Michlol 21a (under the verbal form 25), § 30.

- 6 Forsake her not, so shall she preserve thee;
Love her, so shall she keep thee.

Wisdom and understanding are (5a) thought of as objects of merchandise (cf. xxiii. 23, .iii. 14), like the one pearl of great price, Matt. xiii. 46, and the words of fatherly instruction (5b), accordingly, as offering this precious possession, or helping to the acquisition of it. One cannot indeed say correctly אֶל-תִּשְׁכַּח מֵאֲמֵרַיִךְ, but אֶל-תִּשְׁכַּח מִשְׁמֵר אֲמֵרַיִךְ (Ps. cii. 5); and in this sense אֶל-תִּשְׁכַּח goes before, or also the accus. object, which in אֶל-תִּשְׁכַּח the author has in his mind, may, since he continues with אֶל-תִּתֵּן, now not any longer find expression as such. That the אֲמֵרַיִךְ are the means of acquiring wisdom is shown in ver. 6, where this continues to be the primary idea. The verse, consisting of only four words, ought to be divided by Mugrash;<sup>1</sup> the Vav (ו) in both halves of the verse introduces the apodosis imperativi (cf. e.g. iii. 9 f., and the apodosis prohibitivi, iii. 21 f.). The actual representation of wisdom, ver. 5, becomes in ver. 6 personal.

Vers. 7-9. Referring to ver. 5, the father further explains that wisdom begins with the striving after it, and that this striving is itself its fundamental beginning:

- 7 The beginning of wisdom is "Get wisdom,"
And with [um, at the price of] all thou hast gotten get understanding.
8 Esteem her, so shall she lift thee up;
She will bring thee honour if thou dost embrace her.
9 She will put on thine head a graceful garland,
She will bestow upon thee a glorious diadem.

In the motto of the book, i. 7, the author would say that the fear of Jahve is that from which all wisdom takes its origin. יִרְאַת יְהוָה (i. 7) is the subject, and as such it stands foremost. Here he means to say what the beginning of wisdom consists in. רִאשִׁית חֲכָמָה is the subject, and stands forth as such. The predicate may also be read קְנֵה-חֲכָמָה (= קְנֹת), after xvi. 16. The beginning of wisdom is (consists in) the getting of wisdom; but the imperative קְנֵה, which also Aq., Sym., Theod. (καταλαβει), Jerome, Syr., Targ. express (the LXX. leaves ver. 7 untranslated), is supported by 7b. Hitzig, after Mercier, De Dieu, and Döderlein, translates the verse

<sup>1</sup> According to correct readings in codd. and older editions, וְחִשְׁמְךָ has also indeed Rebia Mugrash, and אֶהְבֵּנָה, Mercha (with Zinnorith); vid. Torath Emeth, p. 47, § 6; Accentuationssystem, xviii. § 1, 2; and regarding the Zinnorith, see Liber Psalmorum Hebraicus by S. Baer, p. xii.

thus: "the highest thing is wisdom; get wisdom," which Zöckler approves of; but the reasons which determine him to this rendering are subtleties: if the author had wished himself to be so understood, he ought at least to have written the words רָאִישׁוֹ הַחִכְמָה. But רָאִישׁוֹ הַחִכְמָה is a genitive of relation, as is to be expected from the relativity of the idea רָאִישׁוֹ, and his intention is to say that the beginning of wisdom consists in the proposition כִּינֵה הַחִכְמָה (cf. the similar formula, Eccles. xii. 13); this proposition is truly the lapis philosophorum, it contains all that is necessary in order to becoming wise. Therefore the Greek σοφία called itself modestly φιλοσοφία; for ἀρχὴ αὐτῆς the Book of Wisdom has, vi. 18, ἡ ἀληθεστάτη παιδείας ἐπιθυμία. In 7b the proposition is expressed which contains the specificum helping to wisdom. The אֶ denotes price: give all for wisdom (Matt. xiii. 46, 44); no price is too high, no sacrifice too great for it.

Ver. 8. The meaning of the ἀπ. γεγρ. סִלְסַל is determined by רוּמַם in the parallel clause; סִלְסַל signifies to raise, exalt, as a way or dam by heaping up; the Pilpel, here tropical: to value or estimate highly. Böttcher interprets well: hold it high in price, raise it (as a purchaser) always higher, make offer for it upon offer. The LXX. (approved by Bertheau), περιχαράκωσον αὐτήν, circumvallate it, i.e. surround it with a wall (סִלְלָה)—a strange and here unsuitable figure. Hold it high, says the author, and so it will reward<sup>1</sup> thee with a high place, and (with chiasmic transposition of the performance and the consequence) she will honour<sup>2</sup> thee if (ἐάν) thou lovingly embracest her. קַיַּם is used of embracing in the pressure of tender love, as in the Canticles ii. 6, viii. 3; the Piel is related to the Kal as amplexari to amplecti. Wisdom exalts her admirers, honours her lovers, and makes a man's appearance pleasant, causing him to be revered when he approaches. Regarding לְיִיתִיחֵן, vid. i. 9. מִן, to deliver up (Gen. xiv. 20), to give up (Hos. xi. 8), is connected in the free poetic manner with two accusatives, instead of with an accus. and dat. LXX. has ὑπερασπισῶν, but one does not defend himself (as with a shield) by a wreath or crown.

<sup>2</sup> We read תְּכַבְּדֶךָ, not תְּכַבְּדֶךָ (Hahn) or תְּכַבְּדֶךָ (Löwenstein); the tone lies on the penult., and the tone-syllable has the point Tere, as in וַיִּבְרָךְ, Deut. xxxii. 7; vid. Michlol 66b.

Vers. 10-12. There is no reason for the supposition that the warning which his father gave to the poet now passes over into warnings given by the poet himself (Hitzig); the admonition of the father thus far refers only in general to the endeavour after wisdom, and we are led to expect that the good doctrines which the father communicates to the son as a viaticum will be further expanded, and become more and more specific when they take a new departure.

- 10 Hearken, my son, and receive my sayings,
So shall the years of life be increased to thee.
11 In the way of wisdom have I taught thee,
Guided thee in the paths of rectitude.
12 When thou goest, thy step shall not be straitened;
And if thou runnest, thou shalt not stumble.

Regarding קָח (of לָקַח) of appropriating reception and taking up in succum et sanguinem, vid. i. 3; regarding שָׁנוֹת חַיִּים, years not merely of the duration of life, but of the enjoyment of life, iii. 2; regarding מַעְגָּל (מַעְגָּלָה), path (track), ii. 9; regarding the פֶּן of הוֹרָה, of the department and subject of instruction, Ps. xxv. 8. The perfects, ver. 11, are different from נִתְחַי, 2a; they refer to rules of life given at an earlier period, which are summarily repeated in this address. The way of wisdom is that which leads to wisdom (Job xxviii. 23); the paths of rectitude, such as trace out the way which is in accordance with the rule of the good and the right. If the youth holds to this direction, he will not go on in darkness or uncertainty with anxious footsteps; and if in youthful fervour he flies along his course, he will not stumble on any unforeseen obstacle and fall. צָר is as a metaplastic fut. to צָרַר or צָרַר, to be narrow, to straiten, formed as if from צָרַר. The Targ. after Aruch,<sup>1</sup> לֹא תִשְׁנַק אֶרְחֹךְ, thou shalt not need to bind together (constringere) or to hedge up thy way.

Vers. 13-17. The exhortations attracting by means of promises, now become warnings fitted to alarm:

- 13 Hold fast to instruction, let her not go;
Keep her, for she is thy life.
14 Into the path of the wicked enter not,
And walk not in the way of the evil.

<sup>1</sup> [R. Nathan ben Jechiel, A.D. 1106, who is usually styled by the Jewish writers בעל ערוך, Auctor Aruch, author of a Talmudical Lexicon.]

- 15 Avoid it, enter not into it;
Turn from it and pass away.
- 16 For they cannot sleep unless they do evil,
And they are deprived of sleep unless they bring others to ruin.
- 17 For they eat the bread of wickedness,
And they drink the wine of violence.

Elsewhere מוֹסֵר means also self-discipline, or moral religious education, i. 3; here discipline, i.e. parental educative counsel. תָּרַף is the segolated fut. apoc. Hiph. (indic. תִּרְפֶּה) from tarp, cf. the imper. Hiph. תִּרְפֵּה from harp. נִצְרָה is the imper. Kal (not Piel, as Aben Ezra thinks) with Dagesh dirimens; cf. the verbal substantive נִצְרָה, Ps. cxli. 3, with similar Dagesh, after the form יִקְרָה, Gen. xlix. 10. מוֹסֵר (elsewhere always masc.) is here used in the fem. as the synonym of the name of wisdom: keep her (instruction), for she is thy life,<sup>1</sup> i.e. the life of thy life. In ver. 14 the goddess (vid. on the root-idea of רָשַׁע under Ps. i. 1) and the habitually wicked, i.e. the vicious, stand in parallelism; בּוֹא and אֵשֶׁר are related as entering and going on, ingressus and progressus. The verb אֵשֶׁר signifies, like יָשַׁר, to be straight, even, fortunate, whence אֵשֶׁר = Arab. yusár, happiness, and to step straight out, ix. 6, of which meanings אֵשֶׁר is partly the intensive, as here, partly the causative, xxiii. 19 (elsewhere causative of the meaning, to be happy, Gen. xxx. 13). The meaning progredi is not mediated by a supplementary יָעַרְוּ; the derivative אֵשֶׁר (אֵשֶׁר), a step, shows that it is derived immediately from the root-idea of a movement in a straight line. Still less justifiable is the rendering by Schultens, ne vestigia imprimas in via malorum; for the Arab. áththr is denom. of ithr, אֵתֵר, the primitive verb roots of which, athr, אֵתֵר = אֵשֶׁר, are lost.

Ver. 15. On פָּרַעְהוּ, avoid it (the way), (opp. אָחַז, Job xvii. 9; תָּמַד, Ps. xvii. 5), see under i. 25. שָׁמָּה, elsewhere (as the Arab. shatt, to be without measure, insolent) used in malam partem, has here its fundamental meaning, to go aside. מִעֲלָיו (expressed in French by de dessus, in Ital. by di sopra) denotes: so that thou comest not to stand on it. עָבַר means in both cases transire, but the second instance, "to go beyond (farther)" (cf. 2 Sam. xv. 22, and under Hab. i. 11), coincides with "to escape, evadere."

Ver. 16. In the reason here given the perf. may stand in the conditional clauses as well as in Virgil's Et si non aliqua nocuisses, mortuus esses; but the fut., as in Eccles. v. 11, denotes that they (the רָעִים and the רָשָׁעִים) cannot sleep, and are deprived of their sleep, unless they are continually doing evil and bringing others into misery; the interruption of this course of conduct, which has become to them like a second nature, would be as the interruption of their diet, which makes them ill. For the Kal יִבְשֹׁלִי, which here must have the meaning of the person sinning (cf. ver. 19), and would be feeble if used of the confirmed transgressors, the Keri rightly substitutes the Hiphil יִבְשִׁילִי, which occurs also 2 Chron. xxv. 8, there without an object, in the meaning to cause to fall, as the contrast of עָרַץ (to help).

Ver. 17. The second בִּי introduces the reason of their bodily welfare being conditioned by evil-doing. If the poet meant: they live on bread which consists in wickedness, i.e. on wickedness as their bread, then in the parallel sentence he should have used the word סֶמֶךְ; the genitives are meant of the means of acquisition: they live on unrighteous gain, on bread and wine which they procure by wickedness and by all manner of violence or injustice. On the etymon of סֶמֶךְ (Arab. *hama*s, durum, asperum, vehementem esse), vid. Schultens; the plur. סֶמֶכִים belongs to a more recent epoch (vid. under 2 Sam. xxii. 49 and Ps. xviii. 49). The change in the tense represents the idea that they having eaten such bread, set forth such wine, and therewith wash it down.

Vers. 18, 19. The two ways that lie for his choice before the youth, are distinguished from one another as light is from darkness:

- 18 And the path of the just is like the brightness of the morning light,
Which shines more and more till the perfect day.
19 The way of the wicked is deep darkness,
They know not at what they stumble.

The Hebr. style is wont to conceal in its Vav (ו) diverse kinds of logical relations, but the Vav of 18a may suitably stand before 19a, where the discontinuance of this contrast of the two ways is unsuitable. The displacing of a Vav from its right position is not indeed without example (see under Ps. xvi. 3); but since ver. 19 joins itself more easily than ver. 18 to ver. 17 without missing a particle, thus it is more probable that the two verses are to be transposed, than that the ו of וְיָשִׁילִי (ver. 17) is to be prefixed to וְיָרַץ (ver. 18). Sinning, says ver. 16; has become to the godless as a second nature, so that they cannot sleep without it; they must continually be sinning, adds ver. 17, for thus and not otherwise do they gain for themselves their daily bread. With reference to this fearful self-perversion to which wickedness has become a necessity and a condition of life, the poet further says that the way of the godless is כְּצִלְעֵי טֶמֶל,<sup>1</sup> as deep darkness, as the entire absence of light: it cannot be otherwise than that they fall, but they do not at all know whereat they fall, for they do not at all know wickedness as such, and have no apprehension of the punishment which from an inward necessity it brings along with it; on the contrary, the path of the just is in constantly increasing light—the light of knowledge, and the light of true happiness which is given<sup>2</sup> in and with knowledge. On צֶמֶח vid. under Isa. ii. 22; it is מִכְשֵׁל, σκάνδαλον, that is meant, stumbling against which (cf. Lev. xxvi. 37) they stumble to their fall. נֶגַה,<sup>3</sup> used elsewhere than in the Bible, means the morning star (Venus), (Sirach l. 4, Syr.); when used in the Bible it means the early dawn, the light of the rising sun, the morning light, 2 Sam. xxiii. 4, Isa. lxii. 1, which announces itself in the morning twilight, Dan. vi. 20. The light of this morning sunshine is הוֹלֵךְ וְאוֹר, going and shining, i.e. becoming ever brighter. In the connection of הוֹלֵךְ וְאוֹר it might be a question whether  $\text{מִוֹר}$  is regarded as gerundive (Gen. viii. 3, 5), or as participle (2 Sam. xvi. 5, Jer. xli. 6), or as a participial adjective (Gen. xxvi. 13, Judg. iv. 24); in the connection of  $\text{הִלְוֵהוּ וְאִוֵר}$ , on the contrary, it is unquestionably the gerundive: the partic. denoting the progress joins itself either with the partic., Jon. i. 11, or with the participial adjective, 2 Sam. iii. 1, 2 Chron. xvii. 12, or with another adjective formation, 2 Sam. xv. 12, Esth. ix. 4 (where  $\text{וְנִרְוֶה}$  after  $\text{וְנִרְוֶה}$  of other places appears to be intended as an adjective, not after 2 Sam. v. 10 as gerundive). Thus  $\text{וְאִוֵר}$ , as also  $\text{וְנִבֹּח}$ , 1 Sam. ii. 26, will be participial after the form  $\text{עָשָׂה}$ , being ashamed (Ges. § 72, 1); cf.  $\text{בֹּחַ}$ , Zech. x. 5,  $\text{קֹחַ}$ , 2 Kings xvi. 7. “ $\text{נִבְּחֵן הַיּוֹם}$ ” quite corresponds to the Greek  $\tau\acute{o}$   $\sigma\tau\alpha\theta\eta\rho\acute{o}\nu$   $\tau\eta\varsigma$   $\acute{\eta}\mu\acute{\epsilon}\rho\alpha\varsigma$ ,  $\acute{\eta}$   $\sigma\tau\alpha\theta\eta\rho\acute{\alpha}$   $\mu\epsilon\sigma\sigma\eta\mu\beta\epsilon\rho\iota\alpha$  (as one also says  $\tau\acute{o}$   $\sigma\tau\alpha\theta\eta\rho\acute{o}\nu$   $\tau\eta\varsigma$   $\nu\alpha\kappa\tau\acute{o}\varsigma$ ), and to the Arabic  $\text{تامة الظهر}$  and  $\text{تامة النهار}$ . The figure is probably derived from the balance (cf. Lucan’s Pharsalia, lib. 9: quum cardine summo Stat librata dies): before and after midday the tongue on the balance of the day bends to the left and to the right, but at the point of midday it stands directly in the midst” (Fleischer). It is the midday time that is meant, when the clearness of day has reached its fullest intensity,—the point between increasing and decreasing, when, as we are wont to say, the sun stands in the zenith (= Arab. samt, the point of support, i.e. the vertex). Besides Mark iv. 28, there is no biblical passage which presents like these two a figure of gradual development. The progress of blissful knowledge is compared to that of the clearness of the day till it reaches its midday height, having reached to which it becomes a knowing of all in God, xxviii. 5, 1 John ii. 20.

<sup>2</sup> Hitzig inverts the order of vers. 18 and 19, and connects the כִּי of 16a immediately with ver. 19 (for the way of the wicked . . .). He moreover regards vers. 16, 17 as an interpolation, and explains ver. 16 as a gloss transforming the text of ver. 19. "That the wicked commit wickedness," says Hitzig, "is indeed certain (1 Sam. xxiv. 14), and the warning of ver. 15 ought not to derive its motive from their energy in sinning." But the warning against the way of the wicked is founded not on their energy in sinning, but on their bondage to sin: their sleep, their food and drink—their life both when they sleep and when they wake—is conditioned by sin and is penetrated by sin. This foundation of the warning furnishes what is needed, and is in nothing open to objection. And that in vers. 16 and 19 לֹא יֵרְעוּ and לֹא יִשְׁלֹו, לֹא יִשְׁלֹו and נִנְוָה, וְיִשְׁלֹו and יִבְשְׁלוּ seem to be alike, does not prove that ver. 16 originated as a parallel text from ver. 19—in the one verse as in the other the thoughts are original.

<sup>3</sup> Böttcher, under 2 Sam. xxiii. 4, explains נֶגַה of the brightness striking against, conquering (cf. נָגַה, נָגַה) the clouds; but ferire or percutere lies nearer (cf. נָגַע, Ezek. xvii. 10, נָכַה, Ps. cxxi. 6, and the Arab. darb, used of strong sensible impressions), as Silius, iv. 329, says of the light: percussit lumine campos.

Vers. 20-22. The paternal admonition now takes a new departure:

- 20 My son, attend unto my words,
Incline thine ear to my sayings.
21 Let them not depart from thine eyes;
Keep them in the midst of thine heart.
22 For they are life to all who get possession of them,
And health to their whole body.

Regarding the Hiph.  $\text{הִלִּיז}$  (for  $\text{הִלִּיז}$ ), ver. 21, formed after the Chaldee manner like  $\text{הִלִּיז}$ ,  $\text{הִפִּיחַ}$ ,  $\text{הִפִּיג}$ , vid. Gesenius, § 72, 9;—Ewald, § 114, c, gives to it the meaning of “to mock,” for he interchanges it with  $\text{לָקַח}$ , instead of the meaning to take away, efficere ut recedat (cf. under ii. 15). This supposed causative meaning it has also here: may they = may one (vid. under ii. 22) not remove them from thine eyes; the object is (ver. 20) the words of the paternal admonition. Hitzig, indeed, observes that "the accusative is not supplied;" but with greater right it is to be remarked that  $\text{לָקַח}$  (fut. Hiph. of  $\text{לָקַח}$ ) and  $\text{לָקַחְתָּ}$  (fut. Kal of id.) are not one and the same, and the less so as  $\text{לָקַח}$  is not, like  $\text{לָקַח}$ , intrinsically transitive. Here and there  $\text{לָקַח}$  occurs, but the masoretical and grammatical authorities (e.g. Kimchi) demand  $\text{לָקַחְתָּ}$ . The plur.  $\text{לָקַחְתֶּם}$  is continued, 22*b*, in the sing., for that which is said refers to each one of the many (iii. 18, 28, 35).  $\text{מָצָא}$  is fundamentally an active conception, like our "finden," to find; it means to attain, to produce, to procure, etc.  $\text{מָצָא}$  means, according as the  $\text{ו}$  is understood of the "that = ut" of the action or of the "what" of its performance, either health or the means of health; here, like  $\text{רָפְאוּת}$ , iii. 8, not with the underlying conception of sickness, but of the fluctuations connected with the bodily life of man, which make needful not only a continual strengthening of it, but also its being again and again restored. Nothing preserves soul and body in a healthier state than when we always keep before our eyes and carry in our hearts the good doctrines; they give to us true guidance on the way of life: "Godliness has the promise of this life, and of that which is to come." 1 Tim. iv. 8.

Vers. 23–27. After this general preface the exhortation now becomes special:

- 23 Above all other things that are to be guarded, keep thy heart,
For out from it life has its issues.
- 24 Put away from thee perverseness of mouth,
And waywardness of lips put far from thee.
- 25 Thine eyes should look straight forward,
And thine eyelids look straight to the end before thee.
- 26 Make even the path of thy feet,
And let all thy ways be correct.
- 27 Turn not aside to the right and to the left;
Remove thy foot from evil.

Although  $\text{שָׁמַר}$  in itself and in this connection may mean the object to be watchfully avoided (cavendi) (vid. under ii. 20*b*): thus the usage of the language lying before us applies it, yet only as denoting the place of watching or the object observandi; so that it is not to be thus explained, with Raschi and others: before all from which one has to protect himself (ab omni re cavenda), guard thine heart; but: before all that one has to guard (præ omni re custodienda), guard it as the most precious of possessions committed to thy trust. The heart, which according to its etymon denotes that which is substantial (Kernhafte) in man (cf. Arab. lubb, the kernel of the nut or almond), comes here into view not as the physical, but as the intellectual, and specially the ethical centrum.

Ver. 24. The תוצאות are the point of a thing, e.g. of a boundary, from which it goes forth, and the linear course proceeding from thence. If thus the author says that the תוצאות הימים go out from the heart,<sup>1</sup> he therewith implies that the life has not only its fountain in the heart, but also that the direction which it takes is determined by the heart. Physically considered, the heart is the receptacle for the blood, in which the soul lives and rules; the pitcher at the blood-fountain which draws it and pours it forth; the chief vessel of the physically self-subsisting blood-life from which it goes forth, and into which it disembogues (Syst. der bib. Psychol. p. 232). What is said of the heart in the lower sense of corporeal vitality, is true in the higher sense of the intellectual soul-life. The Scripture names the heart also as the intellectual soul-centre of man, in its concrete, central unity, its dynamic activity, and its ethical determination on all sides. All the radiations of corporeal and of soul life concentrate there, and again unfold themselves from thence; all that is implied in the Hellenic and Hellenistic words νοῦς, λόγος, συνελευθισις, θυμός, lies in the word καρδία; and all whereby בשר (the body) and נפש (the spirit, anima) are affected comes in לב into the light of consciousness (Id. p. 251). The heart is the instrument of the thinking, willing, perceiving life of the spirit; it is the seat of the knowledge of self, of the knowledge of God, of the knowledge of our relation to God, and also of the law of God impressed on our moral nature; it is the workshop of our individual spiritual and ethical form of life brought about by self-activity,—the life in its higher and in its lower sense goes out from it, and receives from it the impulse of the direction which it takes; and how earnestly, therefore, must we feel ourselves admonished, how sacredly bound to preserve the heart in purity (Ps. lxxiii. 1), so that from this spring of life may go forth not mere seeming life and a caricature of life, but a true life well-pleasing to God! How we have to carry into execution this careful guarding of the heart, is shown in ver. 24 and the golden rules which follow. Mouth and lips are meant (ver. 24) as instruments of speech, and not of its utterance, but of the speech going forth from them. תִּשְׁעַת, distorsio, refers to the mouth (vi. 12), when what it speaks is disfiguring and deforming, thus falsehood as the contrast of truth and love (ii. 12); and to the lips תִּלְוֶהָ, when that which they speak turns aside from the true and the right to side-ways and by-ways. Since the Kametz of such abstracta, as well of verbs ו'ע like רָטַת, Ezek. xxxii. 5, as of verbs ה'ל like לָוַת, Isa. xlv. 13, לָוַת, Isa. xxviii. 18, is elsewhere treated as unalterable, there lies in this לָוַת either an inconsistency of punctuation, or it is presupposed that the form לָוַת was vocalized like לָוַת = לָוַת, Num. xxi. 29.

Ver. 25. Another rule commends gathering together (concentration) in opposition to dissipation. It is also even externally regarded worthy of consideration, as Ben-Sira, ix. 5, expresses it: μη περιβλέπου ἐν ῥύμαις πόλεως — purposeless, curious staring about operates upon the soul, always decentralizing and easily defiling it. But the rule does not exhaust itself in this meaning with reference to external self-discipline; it counsels also straightforward, unswerving directness toward a fixed goal (and what else can this be in such a connection than that which wisdom places before man?), without the turning aside of the eye toward that which is profitless and forbidden, and in this inward sense it falls in with the demand for a single, not squinting eye, Matt. vi. 22, where Bengel explains ἀπλοῦς by simplex et bonus, intentus in cælum, in Deum, unice. נִכַּח (R. נָךְ) means properly fixing, or holding fast with the look, and נָגַד (as the Arab. najad, to be clear, to be in sight, shows) the rising up which makes the object stand conspicuous before the eyes; both denote here that which lies straight before us, and presents itself to the eye looking straight out. The naming of the עַפְעָפִים (from עָפַעַף, to flutter, to move tremblingly), which belongs not to the seeing apparatus of the eye but to its protection, is introduced by the poetical parallelism; for the eyelids, including in this word the twinkling, in their movement follow the direction of the seeing eye. On the form יִשְׁרֵי (fut. Hiph. of יָשַׁר, to be straight), defective according to the Masora, with the Jod audible, cf. Hos. vii. 12, 1 Chron. xii. 2, and under

Gen. viii. 17; the softened form הַיָּשׁוּר does not occur, we find only הוֹשֵׁר or הַיָּשׁוּר.

Ver. 26. The understanding of this rule is dependent on the right interpretation of פָּלַט, which means neither "weigh off" (Ewald) nor "measure off" (Hitzig, Zöckler). פָּלַט has once, Ps. lviii. 3, the meaning to weigh out, as the denom. of פָּלַט, a level, a steel-yard;<sup>1</sup> everywhere else it means to make even, to make level, to open a road: vid. under Isa. xxvi. 7, xl. 12. The admonition thus refers not to the careful consideration which measures the way leading to the goal which one wishes to reach, but to the preparation of the way by the removal of that which prevents unhindered progress and makes the way insecure. The same meaning appears if פָּלַט, of cognate meaning with תָּכַן, denoted first to level, and then to make straight with the level (Fleischer). We must remove all that can become a moral hindrance or a dangerous obstacle in our life-course, in order that we may make right steps with our feet, as the LXX. (Heb. xii. 13) translate. 26*b* is only another expression for this thought. הָקֵן דְּרָכָיו (2 Chron. xxvii. 6) means to give a direction to his way; a right way, which keeps in and facilitates the keeping in the straight direction, is accordingly called נָכוֹן דְּרָכָה; and "let all thy ways be right" (cf. Ps. cxix. 5, LXX. κατευθυνθησων) will thus mean: see to it that all the ways which thou goest lead straight to the end.

Ver. 27. In closest connection with the preceding, 27*a* cautions against by-ways and indirect courses, and 27*b* continues it in the briefest moral expression, which is here הָסֵר רִגְלֶךָ מִרְעַע instead of סוּר מִרְעַע, iii. 7, for the figure is derived from the way. The LXX. has other four lines after this verse (27), which we have endeavoured to retranslate into the Hebrew (Intro. p. 47). They are by no means genuine; for while in 27*a* right and left are equivalent to by-ways, here the right and left side are distinguished as that of truth and its contrary; and while there [in LXX.] the ὁρθὰς τροχὰς ποιεῖν is required of man, here it is promised as the operation of God, which is no contradiction, but in this similarity of expression betrays poverty of style. Hitzig disputes also the genuineness of the Hebrew ver. 27. But it continues explanatorily ver. 26, and is related to it, yet not as a gloss, and in the general relation of 26 and 27a there comes a word, certainly not unwelcome, such as 27b, which impresses the moral stamp on these thoughts.

That with ver. 27 the admonition of his father, which the poet, placing himself back into the period of his youth, reproduces, is not yet concluded, the resumption of the address  $\text{בְּנֵי}$ , v. 1, makes evident; while on the other hand the address  $\text{בְּנֵי}$  in v. 7 shows that at that point there is advance made from the recollections of his father's house to conclusions therefrom, for the circle of young men by whom the poet conceives himself to be surrounded. That in v. 7 ff. a subject of the warning with which the seventh address closes is retained and further prosecuted, does not in the connection of all these addresses contradict the opinion that with v. 7 a new address begins. But the opinion that the warning against adultery does not agree (Zöckler) with the designation  $\text{בֶּן}$ , iv. 3, given to him to whom it is addressed, is refuted by 1 Chron. xxii. 5, 2 Chron. xiii. 7.

Chap. v. 1-6. Here a fourth rule of life follows the three already given, iv. 24, 25, 26-27 :

- 1 My son, attend unto my wisdom,
And incline thine ear to my prudence,
- 2 To observe discretion,
And that thy lips preserve knowledge.
- 3 For the lips of the adulteress distil honey,
And smoother than oil is her mouth ;
- 4 But her end is bitter like wormwood,
Sharper than a two-edged sword.
- 5 Her feet go down to death,
Her steps cleave to Hades.
- 6 She is far removed from entering the way of life,
Her steps wander without her observing it.

Wisdom and understanding increase with the age of those who earnestly seek after them. It is the father of the youth who here requests a willing ear to his wisdom of life, gained in the way of many years' experience and observation. In ver. 2 the inf. of the object is continued in the finitum, as in ii. 2, 8.  $\text{מִצְוָה}$  (vid. on its etymon under i. 4) are plans, projects, designs, for the most part in a bad sense, intrigues and artifices (vid. xxiv. 8), but also used of well-considered resolutions toward what is good, and hence of the purposes of God, Jer. xxiii. 20. This noble sense of the word  $\text{מִצְוָה}$ , with its plur., is peculiar to the introductory portion (i.-ix.)

of the Book of Proverbs. The plur. means here and at viii. 12 (placing itself with הַכְּמוֹת and הַתְּבִינּוֹת, vid. p. 68) the reflection and deliberation which is the presupposition of well-considered action, and שָׁמֵר is thus not otherwise than at xix. 8, and everywhere so meant, where it has that which is obligatory as its object: the youth is summoned to careful observation and persevering exemplification of the quidquid agas, prudenter agas et respice finem. In 2*b* the Rebia Mugrash forbids the genitive connection of the two words וְהִיעֵת שְׂפָתֶיךָ; we translate: et ut scientiam labia tua tueantur. Lips which preserve knowledge are such as permit nothing to escape from them (Ps. xvii. 3*b*) which proceeds not from the knowledge of God, and in Him of that which is good and right, and aims at the working out of this knowledge; vid. Köhler on Mal. ii. 7. שְׂפָתֶיךָ (from שָׂפָה, Arab. shafat, edge, lip, properly that against which one rubs, and that which rubs itself) is fem., but the usage of the language presents the word in two genders (cf. 3*a* with xxvi. 23). Regarding the pausal וְיִצְרֵי for וְצִרֵי, vid. under iii. 1, ii. 11. The lips which distil the honey of enticement stand opposite to the lips which distil knowledge; the object of the admonition is to furnish a protection against the honey-lips.

Ver. 3. וְרֵיהּ denotes the wife who belongs to another, or who does not belong to him to whom she gives herself or who goes after her (vid. ii. 16). She appears here as the betrayer of youth. The poet paints the love and amiableness which she feigns with colours from the Canticles, iv. 11, cf. v. 16. נֶפֶת denotes the honey flowing of itself from the combs (צִנּוּפִים), thus the purest and sweetest; its root-word is not נָפַף, which means to shake, vibrate, and only mediately (when the object is a fluid) to scatter, sprinkle, but, as Schultens has observed, a verb נָפַת = Arab. nafat, to bubble, to spring up, nafath, to blow, to spit out, to pour out. Parchon places the word rightly under נֶפֶת (while Kimchi places it under נָפַף after the form בִּשְׁפַת), and explains it by חֵלֶת דְּבַשׁ הַיְצֵאִים מִן הַכוּוּרָה (the honey which flows from the cells before they are broken (the so-called virgin honey)). The mouth, הֵן = Arab. hink (from הִנָּה, Arab. hanak, imbuere, e.g., after the manner of Beduins, the mouth of the newly-born infant with date-honey), comes into view here, as at viii. 7, etc., as the instrument of speech: smoother than oil (cf. Ps. lv. 22), it shows itself when it gives forth amiable, gentle, impressive words (ii. 16, vi. 24); also our "schmeicheln" (= to flatter, caress) is equivalent to to make smooth and fair; in the language of weavers it means to smooth the warp.

Vers. 4, 5. In verse 4 the reverse of the sweet and smooth external is placed opposite to the attraction of the seducer, by whose influence the inconsiderate permits himself to be carried away: her end, i.e. the last that is experienced of her, the final consequence of intercourse with her (cf. xxiii. 32), is bitter as wormwood, sharp as a two-edged sword. The O. T. language regards bitterness and poison as related both in meaning and in reality; the word לַעֲנָה (Aq. ἀψιθιον = wormwood) means in Arab. the curse. חָרֵב בַּיּוֹת is translated by Jerome after the LXX., gladius biceps; but בַּיּוֹת means double-edged, and חָרֵב שְׁנֵי בַּיּוֹת (Judg. iii. 16) means a double-edged sword. Here the plur. will thus poetically strengthen the meaning, like ξίφος πολύστομον, that which devours, as if it had three or four edges (Fl.). The end in which the disguised seduction terminates is bitter as the bitterest, and cutting as that which cuts the most: self-condemnation and a feeling of divine anger, anguish of heart, and destructive judgment. The feet of the adulteress go downward to death. In Hebr. this descendentes ad mortem is expressed by the genitive of connection; מָוֶת is the genitive, as in יוֹרְדֵי בּוֹר, i. 12; elsewhere the author uses יוֹרְדוֹת אֵל (vii. 27, ii. 18). Death, מָוֶת (so named from the stretching of the corpse after the stiffness of death), denotes the condition of departure from this side as a punishment, with which is associated the idea of divine wrath. In שְׁאוֹל (sinking, abyss, from שָׁאָל, R. שָׁא, χαλάν, vid. under Isa. v. 14), lie the ideas of the grave as a place of corruption, and of the under-world as the place of incorporeal shadow-life. Her steps hold fast to Hades is equivalent to, they strive after Hades and go straight to it; similar to this is the Arab. expression, hdhâ âldrb yâkhdh âly âblbd: this way leads straight forward to the town (Fl.).

Ver. 6. If we try to connect the clause beginning with מִן with 5b as its principal sentence: she goes straight to the abyss, so that by no means does she ever tread the way of life (thus e.g. Schultens), or better, with 6b: never more to walk in the way of life, her paths fluctuate hither and thither (as Gr. Venet. and Kamphausen in Bunsen's Bibelwerk, after Bertheau and Ewald, translate); then in the former case more than in the latter the difference of the subject opposes itself, and in the latter, in addition, the לֹא תֵרַע, only disturbing in this negative clause. Also by the arrangement of the words, 6a appears as an independent thought. But with Jewish expositors (Rashi, Aben-Ezra, Rabbag, Malbim, etc.) to interpret וְהַיָּדְוָה, after the Talmud (b. Mo'ed katan 9a) and Midrash, as an address is impracticable; the warning: do not weigh the path of life, affords no meaning suitable to this connection—for we must, with Cartwright and J. H. Michaelis, regard 6a as the antecedent to 6b: ne forte semitam vitæ ad sequendum eligas, te per varios deceptionum mæandros abripit ut non noveris, ubi locorum sis; but then the continuation of the address is to be expected in 6b. No, the subject to וְהַיָּדְוָה is the adulteress, and וְהַיָּדְוָה is an intensified וְהַיָּדְוָה. Thus the LXX., Jerome, Syr., Targ., Luther, Geier, Nolde, and among Jewish interpreters Heidenheim, who first broke with the tradition sanctioned by the Talmud and the Midrash, for he interpreted 6a as a negative clause spoken in the tone of a question. But וְהַיָּדְוָה is not suitable for a question, but for a call. Accordingly, Böttcher explains: viam vitæ ne illa complanare studeat! (וְהַיָּדְוָה in the meaning complanando operam dare). But the adulteress as such, and the striving to come to the way of life, stand in contradiction: an effort to return must be meant, which, because the power of sin over her is too great, fails; but the words do not denote that, they affirm the direct contrary, viz. that it does not happen to the adulteress ever to walk in the way of life. As in the warning the independent וְהַיָּדְוָה may be equivalent to cave ne (Job xxxii. 13), so also in the declaration it may be equivalent to absit ut, for וְהַיָּדְוָה (from וְהַיָּדְוָה, after the forms וְהַיָּדְוָה = Arab. banj, וְהַיָּדְוָה = Arab. 'asj) means turning away, removal. Thus: Far from taking the course of the way of life (which has life as its goal and reward)—for וְהַיָּדְוָה, to open, to open a road (Ps. lxxviii. 50), has here the meaning of the open road itself—much rather do her steps wilfully stagger (Jer. xiv. 10) hither and thither, they go without order and without aim, at one time hither, at another time thither, without her observing it; i.e. without her being concerned at this, that she thereby runs into the danger of falling headlong into the yawning abyss. The unconsciousness which the clause וְהַיָּדְוָה expresses, has as its object not the falling (Ps. xxxv. 8), of which there is here nothing directly said, but just this staggering, vacillation, the danger of which she does not watch against. וְהַיָּדְוָה has Mercha under the ו with Zinnorith preceding; it is Milra [an oxytone] (Michlol 111b); the punctuation varies in the accentuation of the form without evident reason:

Olsh. § 233, p. 285. The old Jewish interpreters (and recently also Malbim) here, as also at ii. 16, by the זָרָה [strange woman] understand heresy (מִינָתָה), or the philosophy that is hostile to revelation; the ancient Christian interpreters understood by it folly (Origen), or sensuality (Procopius), or heresy (Olympiodorus), or false doctrine (Polychronios). The LXX., which translates, ver. 5, רַגְלִיהָ by τῆς ἀφροσύνης οἱ πόδες, looks toward this allegorical interpretation. But this is unnecessary, and it is proved to be false from v. 15-20, where the זָרָה is contrasted with the married wife.

EIGHTH INTRODUCTORY MASHAL DISCOURSE, V. 7-23.

WARNING AGAINST ADULTERY AND COMMENDATION OF MARRIAGE.

With v. 1-6, which like iv. 20 commences it once more, the seventh discourse is brought to a conclusion. The address בְּנֵי is three times repeated in similar connections, iv. 10, 20, v. 1. There is no reason for breaking off the fatherly admonition (introduced with the words, "And he said to me," iv. 4), which was addressed to the author in the period of his youth, earlier than here, where the author again resumes the שְׁמַע בְּנִים with which he had begun (iv. 1) this seventh narrative address. That after the father has ceased speaking he does not express himself in a rounded manner, may be taken as a sign that toward the end he had become more and more unmindful of the rôle of the reporter, if this זָרָה בְּנִים following, with which he realizes for his circle of hearers the admonition which had been in part addressed to himself, does not prove the contrary.

Vers. 7-11. The eighth discourse springs out of the conclusion of the seventh, and connects itself by its reflective מַעֲלִיָּה so closely with it that it appears as its continuation; but the new beginning and its contents included in it, referring only to social life, secures its relative independence. The poet derives the warning against intercourse with the adulteress from the preceding discourse, and grounds it on the destructive consequences.

7 And now, ye sons, hearken unto me,
And depart not from the words of my mouth.

- 8 Hold thy path far from her neighbourhood,
And come not to the door of her house !
- 9 That thou mayest not give the freshness of thy youth to another,
Nor thy years to the cruel one ;
- 10 That strangers may not sate themselves with thy possessions,
And the fruit of thy toils come into the house of a stranger,
- 11 And thou groanest at the end,
When thy flesh and thy body are consumed.

Neither here nor in the further stages of this discourse is there any reference to the criminal punishment inflicted on the adulterer, which, according to Lev. xx. 10, consisted in death, according to Ezek. xvi. 40, cf. John viii. 5, in stoning, and according to a later traditional law, in strangulation (פְּנִיָּה). Ewald finds in ver. 14 a play on this punishment of adultery prescribed by law, and reads from ver. 9 f. that the adulterer who is caught by the injured husband was reduced to the state of a slave, and was usually deprived of his manhood. But that any one should find pleasure in making the destroyer of his wife his slave is a far-fetched idea, and neither the law nor the history of Israel contains any evidence for this punishment by slavery or the mutilation of the adulterer, for which Ewald refers to Grimm's Deutsche Rechtsaltertümer. The figure which is here sketched by the poet is very different. He who goes into the net of the wanton woman loses his health and his goods. She stands not alone, but has her party with her, who wholly plunder the simpleton who goes into her trap. Nowhere is there any reference to the husband of the adulteress. The poet does not at all think on a married woman. And the word chosen directs our attention rather to a foreigner than to an Israelitish woman, although the author may look upon harlotry as such as heathenish rather than Israelitish, and designate it accordingly. The party of those who make prostitutes of themselves consists of their relations and their older favourites, the companions of their gain, who being in league with her exhaust the life-strength and the resources of the befooled youth (Fl.). This discourse begins with פְּנִיָּה, for it is connected by this concluding application (cf. vii. 24) with the preceding.

Vers. 8, 9. In verse 8, one must think on such as make a gain of their impurity. מַעַל, Schultens remarks, with reference to Ezek. xxiii. 18, crebrum in rescisso omni commercio: פָּ denotes the departure, and לְּ the nearness, from which one must remove himself to a distance. Regarding הוֹר (ver. 9), which primarily, like our Pracht (bracht from brechen = to break) [pomp, magnificence], appears to mean fulness of sound, and then fulness of splendour, see under Job xxxix. 20; here there is a reference to the freshness or the bloom of youth, as well as the years, against the sacrifice of which the warning is addressed—in a pregnant sense they are the fairest years, the years of youthful fulness of strength. Along with אֲחֵרִים the singulare-tantum אֲכֹרִי (vid. Jer. l. 42) has a collective sense; regarding the root-meaning, vid. under Isa. xiii. 9. It is the adj. relat. of אֲכֹרִי after the form אֲכֹנֵב, which is formed not from אָכַר, but from an unknown verb אָכַר. The ancients referred it to death and the devil; but the אֲכֹרִי belongs to the covetous society, which impels ever anew to sin, which is their profit, him who has once fallen into it, and thus brings bodily ruin upon him: they are the people who stand far aloof from this their sacrifice, and among them are barbarous, rude, inexorably cruel monsters (Unmenschen) (Græcus Venetus, τῶ ἀπανθρώπων), who rest not till their victim is laid prostrate on the ground and ruined both bodily and financially.

Ver. 10. This other side of the ruin ver. 10 presents as an image of terror. For הוֹר refers to the person in his stately appearance, but בֵּית to his possessions in money and goods; for this word, as well as in the strikingly similar passage Hos. vii. 9, is used as the synonym of הָיִל (Gen. xxxiv. 29, etc.), in the sense of ability, estate. This meaning is probably mediated by means of a metonymy, as Gen. iv. 12, Job xxxi. 39, where the idea of the capability of producing is passed over into that of the produce conformable to it; so here the idea of work-power passes over into that of the gain resulting therefrom. וְעֵצְבֶיךָ (and thy toils) is not, like בָּהֶרָה, the accusative governed by יִשְׁבְּעֵי; the carrying over of this verb disturbs the parallelism, and the statement in the passage besides does not accord therewith, which, interpreted as a virtual predicate, presents 10b as an independent prohibitive clause: neve sint labores tui in domo peregrini, not peregrina; at least נִכְרִי according to the usage of the language is always personal, so that בֵּית נִכְרִי (cf. Lam. v. 2), like מַלְבוּשׁ נִכְרִי, Zeph. i. 8, is to be explained after עֵר נִכְרִי, Judg. xix. 12. עֵצֵב (from עָצַב, Arab. 'asab, to bind fast, to tie together, then to make effort, ποιῆν, laborare) is difficult work (x. 22), and that which is obtained by it; Fleischer compares the Ital. i miei sudori, and the French mes sueurs.

Ver. 11. The fut. יִשְׁבְּעֵי and the יִהְיֶי needed to complete 10b are continued in ver. 11 in the consec. perf. הָנָה, elsewhere of the hollow roaring of the sea, Isa. v. 30, the growling of the lion, xxviii. 15, here, as also Ezek. xxiv. 23, of the hollow groaning of men; a word which echoes the natural sound, like הָנָה, הָנָה. The LXX., with the versions derived from it, has καὶ μεταμεληθήσῃ, i.e. נִחַמְתָּ (the Niph. נִחַם, to experience the sorrow of repentance, also an echo-word which imitates the sound of deep breathing)—a happy quid pro quo, as if one interchanged the Arab. naham, fremere, anhelare, and nadam, pœnitere. That wherein the end consists to which the deluded youth is brought, and the sorrowful sound of despair extorted from him, is stated in 11*b*: his flesh is consumed away, for sensuality and vexation have worked together to undermine his health. The author here connects together two synonyms to strengthen the conception, as if one said: All thy tears and thy weeping help thee nothing (Fl.); he loves this heaping together of synonyms, as we have shown at p. 33. When the blood-relation of any one is called שָׂאֵר בְּשָׂרִי, Lev. xviii. 6, xxv. 49, these two synonyms show themselves in subordination, as here in close relation. שָׂאֵר appears to be closely connected with שָׂרִירִים, muscles and sinews, and with שֵׁר, the umbilical cord, and thus to denote the flesh with respect to its muscular nature adhering to the bones (Mic. iii. 2), as שָׂרָב denotes it with respect to its tangible outside clothed with skin (vid. under Isaiah, p. 418).

Vers. 12-14. The poet now tells those whom he warns to hear how the voluptuary, looking back on his life-course, passes sentence against himself.

- 12 And thou sayest, "Why have I then hated correction,
And my heart despised instruction!
13 And I have not listened to the voice of my teachers,
Nor lent mine ear to my instructors?
14 I had almost fallen into every vice
In the midst of the assembly and the congregation!"

The question 12*a* (here more an exclamation than a question) is the combination of two: How has it become possible for me? How could it ever come to it that . . . Thus also one says in Arab.: Kyf f'alat hadhâ (Fl.). The regimen of הָאֵל in 12*b* is becoming faint, and in 13*b* has disappeared. The Kal יָאֵץ (as i. 30, xv. 5) signifies to despise; the Piel intensively, to contemn and reject (R. נָץ, pungere).

Ver. 13. אֶצְעָב signifies to cleave to anything in hearing, as בִּרְאָהּ בִּ is to do so in seeing; שָׁמַע לְ yet more closely corresponds with the classic ἐπακούειν, obedire, e.g. Ps. lxxxi. 9; שָׁמַע בְּקוֹל is the usual phrase for "hearken!"

Ver. 14. בְּמֵעַט with the perf. following is equivalent to: it wanted but a little that this or that should happen, e.g. Gen. xxvi. 10. It is now for the most part thus explained: it wanted but a little, and led astray by that wicked companionship I would have been drawn away into crime, for which I would then have been subjected to open punishment (Fl.). Ewald understands רָע directly of punishment in its extreme form, stoning; and Hitzig explains בְּלִרְעָ by "the totality of evil," in so far as the disgraceful death of the criminal comprehends in it all other evils that are less. But רָע בְּכָל־רָע means, either, into every evil, misfortune, or into every wickedness; and since רָע, in contradistinction to לֵב (Hitzig compares Ezek. xxxvi. 5), is a conception of a species, then the meaning is equivalent to in omni genere mali. The reference to the death-punishment of the adulteress is excluded thereby, though it cannot be denied that it might be thought of at the same time, if he who too late comes to consider his ways were distinctly designated in the preceding statements as an adulterer. But it is on the whole a question whether בְּכָל־רָע is meant of the evil which follows sin as its consequence. The usage of the language permits this, cf. 2 Sam. xvi. 8, Ex. v. 19, 1 Chron. vii. 23, Ps. x. 6, but not less the reference to that which is morally bad, cf. Ex. xxxii. 22 (where Keil rightly compares with 1 John v. 19); and הִיָּיתִי (for which in the first case one expected נִפְלֵיתִי, I fell into, vid. xiii. 17, xvii. 20, xxviii. 14) is even more favourable to the latter reference. Also בְּתוֹךְ קָהָל תֵּעָרָה (cf. on the heaping together of synonyms under 11b), this paraphrase of the palam ac publice, with its בְּתוֹךְ (cf. Ps. cxi. 1, 2 Chron. xx. 14), looks rather to a heightening of the moral self-accusation. He found himself in all wickedness, living and moving therein in the midst of the congregation, and thereby giving offence to it, for he took part in the external worship and in the practices of the congregation, branding himself thereby as a hypocrite. That by the one name the congregation is meant in its civil aspect, and by the other in its ecclesiastical aspect, is not to be supposed: in the congregation of the people of the revealed law, the political and the religious sides are not so distinguished. It is called without distinction קָהָל and עֵרָה (from יָעַר). Rather we would say that קָהָל is the whole ecclesia, and עֵרָה the whole of its representatives; but also the great general council bears sometimes the one name (Ex. xii. 3, cf. 21) and sometimes the other (Deut. xxxi. 30, cf. 28) —the placing of them together serves thus only to strengthen the conception.

Vers. 15-17. The commendation of true conjugal love in the form of an invitation to a participation in it, is now presented along with the warning against non-conjugal intercourse, heightened by a reference to its evil consequences.

- 15 Drink water from thine own cistern,
And flowing streams from thine own fountain.
16 Shall thy streams flow abroad,
The water-brooks in the streets!
17 Let them belong to thyself alone,
And not to strangers with thee.

One drinks water to quench his thirst; here drinking is a figure of the satisfaction of conjugal love, of which Paul says, 1 Cor. vii. 9, κρείσσόν ἐστι γαμήσαι ἢ πυροῦσθαι, and this comes into view here, in conformity with the prevailing character of the O. T., only as a created inborn natural impulse, without reference to the poisoning of it by sin, which also within the sphere of married life makes government, moderation, and restraint a duty. Warning against this degeneracy of the natural impulse to the πάθος ἐπιθυμίας authorized within divinely prescribed limits, the apostle calls the wife of any one τὸ ἐαυτοῦ σκεῦος (cf. 1 Pet. iii. 7). So here the wife, who is his by covenant (ii. 17), is called "cistern" (בּוֹר)<sup>1</sup> and "fountain" (בַּיָּר) of the husband to whom she is married. The figure corresponds to the sexual nature of the wife, the expression for which is נִקְבָּה; but Isa. li. 1 holds to the natural side of the figure, for according to it the wife is a pit, and the children are brought out of it into the light of day. Aben-Ezra on Lev. xi. 36 rightly distinguishes between בּוֹר and בַּיָּר: the former catches the rain, the latter wells out from within. In the former, as Rashi in Erubin ii. 4 remarks, there are מים מכוננים, in the latter מים חיים. The post-biblical Hebrew observes this distinction less closely (vid. Kimchi's Book of Roots), but the biblical throughout; so far the Kerî, Jer. vi. 7, rightly changes בּוֹר into the form בַּיָּר, corresponding to the Arab. byar. Therefore בּוֹר is the cistern, for the making of which קָצַב, Jer. ii. 13, and בַּיָּר the well, for the formation of which

חפר, Gen. xxi. 30, and ברה, xxvi. 25, are the respective words usually employed (vid. Malbim, Sifra 117*b*). The poet shows that he also is aware of this distinction, for he calls the water which one drinks from the בור by the name מים, but on the other hand that out of the באר by the name נזלים, running waters, fluenta; by this we are at once reminded of Cant. iv. 15, cf. 12. The בור offers only stagnant water (according to the Sohar, the בור has no water of its own, but only that which is received into it), although coming down into it from above; but the באר has living water, which wells up out of its interior (מתוך, 15*b*, intentionally for the mere מן), and is fresh as the streams from Lebanon (נל, properly labi, to run down, cf. אול, placide ire, and generally ire; زال, loco cedere, desinere; ל, IV., to cause to glide back, deglutire, of the gourmand).

What a valuable possession a well of water is for nomads the history of the patriarchs makes evident, and a cistern is one of the most valuable possessions belonging to every well-furnished house. The figure of the cistern is here surpassed by that of the fountain, but both refer to the seeking and finding satisfaction (cf. the opposite passage, xxiii. 27) with the wife, and that, as the expressive possessive suffixes denote, with his legitimate wife.

Ver. 16. Here we meet with two other synonyms standing in a similar relation of progression. As עין denotes the fountain as to its point of outflow, so מעין (n. loci) means water flowing above on the surface, which in its course increases and divides itself into several courses; such a brook is called, with reference to the water dividing itself from the point of outflow, or to the way in which it divides, פלג (from פלג, Job xxxviii. 25), Arab. falaj (as also the Ethiop.) or falj, which is explained by nahar saghayr (Fl.).<sup>1</sup> We cannot in this double figure think of any reference to the generative power in the sperma; similar figures are the waters of Judah, Isa. xlvi. 1, and the waters of Israel flowing forth as if from a bucket, Num. xxiv. 7, where ורעו is the parallel word to מים, cf. also the proper name מואב (from מו = מוי from מו, diffluere), aqua h.e. semen patris, and שיל, Deut. xxviii. 30, = Arab. sajal (whence sajl = יל, situla), which is set aside by the Keri. Many interpreters have by חַנּוּן and בְּרִחּוּבוֹת been here led into the error of pressing into the text the exhortation not to waste the creative power in sinful lust. The LXX. translates יִפְצוּ by ὑπερεκχέσθω; but Origen, and also Clemens Alexandrinus, used the phrase μὴ ὑπερεκχέσθω, which is found in the Complut., Ald., and several codd., and is regarded by Lagarde, as also Cappellus, as original: the three Göttingen theologians (Ewald, Bertheau, and Elster) accordingly make the emendation אֵל־יִפְצוּ. But that μὴ of the LXX. was not added till a later period; the original expression, which the Syro-Hexapl. authorizes, was ὑπερεκχέσθω without μὴ, as also in the version of Aquila, διασκορπιζέσθωσαν without μὴ (vid. Field). The Hebrew text also does not need אֵל. Clericus, and recently Hitzig, Zöckler, Kamphausen, avoid this remedy, for they understand this verse interrogatively—an expedient which is for the most part and also here unavailing; for why should not the author have written יִפְצוּ אֵם? Schultens rightly remarks: nec negationi nec interrogationi ullus hic locus, for (with Fleischer and von Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, ii. 2, 402) he regards ver. 16 as a conclusion: tunc exundabunt; so that he strengthens the summons of ver. 15 by the promise of numerous descendants from unviolated marriage. But to be so understood, the author ought to have written יִפְצוּ. So, according to the text, יִפְצוּ as jussive continues the imper. שָׁחַ (15a), and the full meaning according to the connection is this: that within the marriage relation the generative power shall act freely and unrestrained. חַן and בְּרִחּוּבוֹת denote (i. 20) the space free from houses, and the ways and places which lead towards and stretch between them; חַן (from חָן, Arab. khass, to split, seorsim ponere) is a very relative conception, according as one thinks of that which is without as the contrast of the house, the city, or the country. Here חַן is the contrast of the person, and thus that which is anywhere without it, whereto the exercise of its manly power shall extend. The two figurative expressions are the description of the libero flumine, and the contrast, that restriction of self which the marriage relation, according to 1 Cor. vii. 3-5, condemns.

Ver. 17. That such matters as these are thought of, is manifest from this verse. As זֶרַע comprehends with the cause (sperma) the effect (posterity), so, in ver. 16, with the effusio roboris virilis is connected the idea of the beginnings of life. For the subjects of ver. 17 are the effusiones seminis named in ver. 16. These in their effects (ver. 17) may belong to thee alone, viz. to thee alone (לְבַרְדֶּךָ, properly in thy separateness) within thy married relation, not, as thou hast fellowship with other women, to different family circles, Aben-Ezra rightly regards as the subject, for he glosses thus: יהוה ירֵךְ שהם הבנים הכשרים, and Immanuel well explains יתחסו לך. The child born out of wedlock belongs not to the father alone, he knows not to whom it belongs; its father must for the sake of his honour deny it before the world. Thus, as Grotius remarks: ibi sere ubi prolem metas. In וַאֲמַן the יהוה is continued. It is not thus used adverbially for לָא, as in the old classic Arabic lyas for l (Fl.), but it carries in it the force of a verb, so that יהיו, according to rule, in the sense of ולא יהיו = ולא, continues it.

Vers. 18-20. With ver 18 is introduced anew the praise of conjugal love. These three verses, 18-21, have the same course of thought as 15-17.

- 18 Let thy fountain be blessed,
And rejoice in the wife of thy youth.
19 The lovely hind and the graceful gazelle—
May her bosom always charm thee;
In her love mayest thou delight thyself evermore.
20 But why wilt thou be fascinated with a stranger,
And embrace the bosom of a foreign woman?

Like בור and באר, בָּאָר, מְקוֹר is also a figure of the wife; the root-word is קָר, from קָר, כָּר, the meanings of which, to dig and make round, come together in the primary conception of the round digging out or boring out, not קָר = קָרַר, the Hiph. of which means (Jer. vi. 7) to well out cold (water). It is the fountain of the birth that is meant (cf. מְקוֹר of the female עֵרְוָה, e.g., Lev. xx. 18), not the procreation (LXX., ἡ σὴ φλέψ, viz. φλέψ γονίμη); the blessing wished for by him is the blessing of children, which בָּרַךְ so much the more distinctly denotes if בָּרַךְ, Arab. barak, means to spread out, and בָּרַךְ thus to cause a spreading out. The בָּר, 18b, explains itself from the idea of drawing (water), given with the figure of a fountain; the word בָּאֵשֶׁת found in certain codices is, on the contrary, prosaic (Fl.). Whilst שָׂמַח is found elsewhere (Eccles. ii. 20, 2 Chron. xx. 27) as meaning almost the same as שָׂמַח; the former means rejoicing from some place, the latter in something. In the genitive connection, "wife of thy youth" (cf. ii. 17), both of these significations lie: thy youthful wife, and she who was chosen by thee in thy youth, according as we refer the suffix to the whole idea or only to the second member of the chain of words.

Ver. 19. The subject, 19*a*, set forth as a theme courts love for her who is to be loved, for she presents herself as lovely. אֵילִת is the female of the stag, which may derive its name אֵיל from the weapon-power of its horns, and יַעֲלָה (from עָל, Arab. w'al, to climb), that of the wild-goat (עֵל); and thus properly, not the gazelle, which is called צִבִי on account of its elegance, but the chamois. These animals are commonly used in Semitic poetry as figures of female beauty on account of the delicate beauty of their limbs and their sprightly black eyes. אֶהְבֵּימִי signifies always sensual love, and is interchanged in this erotic meaning (vii. 18) with הִדְדִּים. In 19*b* the predicate follows the subject. The Græc. Venet. translates as if the word were רוּחַ, and the Syr. as if it were רִבִּיחַ, but Aquila rightly translates τίτθοι αὐτῆς. As τίτθος is derived (vid. Curtius, Griech. Etymologie, Nr. 307) from dhâ, to suck (causative, with anu, to put to sucking), so רִד, שָׂר, תָּר, Arab. thady (commonly in dual thadjein), from שָׂרָה, Arab. thdy, rigare, after which also the verb יִרְוֶה is chosen: she may plentifully give thee to drink; figuratively equivalent to, refresh or (what the Aram. רִנִּי precisely means) fascinate<sup>1</sup> thee, satisfy thee with love. רִדִּים also is an erotic word, which besides in this place is found only in Ezekiel (xxiii. 3, 8, 21). The LXX. obliterates the strong sensual colouring of this line. In 19*c* it changes תִּשְׁנָה into תִּשְׁנָה, πολλοστος ἔση, perhaps also because the former appeared to be too sensual. Moses ha-Darshan

(in Rashi) proposes to explain it after the Arab. ساجى, to cover, to cast over, to come over anything (III. = עָסַק, to employ oneself with something): engage thyself with her love, i.e. be always devoted to her in love. And Immanuel himself, the author of a Hebrew Divan expatiating with unparalleled freedom in erotic representations, remarks, while he rightly understands תִּשְׁנָה of the fascination of love: קורא התמדת חשקו אפילו באשורו שגנה, he calls the husband's continual caressing of the wife an error. But this moral side-glance lies here at a distance from the poet. He speaks here of a morally permissible love-ecstasy, or rather, since תִּמִּיד excludes that which is extraordinary, of an intensity of love connected with the feeling of superabundant happiness. שָׁנָה properly signifies to err from the way, therefore figuratively, with ב of a matter, like

delivare ea, to be wholly captivated by her, so that one is no longer in his own power, can no longer restrain himself—the usual word for the intoxication of love and of wine, xx. 1 (Fl.).

Ver. 20. The answer to the Why? in this verse is: no reasonable cause,—only beastly sensuality, only flagitious blindness can mislead thee. The ב of בְּזוּרָה is, as 19*b* and Isa. xxviii. 7, that of the object through which one is betrayed into intoxication. חָסַק (thus, according to the Masora, four times in the O. T. for חָסַק) properly means an incision or deepening, as حَجَّرَ (from حَجْر, cohibere), the front of the body, the part between the arms or the female breasts, thus the bosom, Isa. xl. 11 (with the swelling part of the clothing, sinus vestis, which the Arabs call jayb), and the lap; חָסַק (as iv. 8), to embrace, corresponds here more closely with the former of these meanings; also elsewhere the wife of any one is called אִשְׁתּוֹ חִיקוֹ or הִשְׁכַּבְתָּ בְּחִיקוֹ, as she who rests on his breast. The ancients, also J. H. Michaelis, interpret vers. 15–20 allegorically, but without thereby removing sensual traces from the elevated N. T. consciousness of pollution, striving against all that is fleshly; for the castum cum Sapientia conjugium would still be always represented under the figure of husband and wife dwelling together. Besides, though זוּרָה might be, as the contrast of חֲכָמָה, the personified lust of the world and of the flesh, yet 19*a* is certainly not the חֲכָמָה, but a woman composed of flesh and blood. Thus the poet means the married life, not in a figurative sense, but in its reality—he designedly describes it thus attractively and purely, because it bears in itself the preservative against promiscuous fleshly lust.

Vers. 21–23. That the intercourse of the sexes out of the married relationship is the commencement of the ruin of a fool is now proved.

- 21 For the ways of every one are before the eyes of Jahve,
And all his paths He marketh out.
22 His own sins lay hold of him, the evil-doer,
And in the bands of his sins is he held fast.
23 He dies for the want of correction,
And in the fulness of his folly he staggers to ruin.

It is unnecessary to interpret נִכְחַת as an adverbial accusative: straight before Jahve's eyes; it may be the nominative of the predicate: the ways of man (for אִישׁ is here an individual, whether man or woman) are an object (properly, fixing) of the eyes of Jahve. With this the thought would suitably connect itself : et omnes orbitas ejus ad amussim examinat ; but פִּלַּס, as the denom. of פָּלַס, Ps. lviii. 3, is not connected with all the places where the verb is united with the obj. of the way, and Ps. lxxviii. 50 shows that it has there the meaning to break through, to open a way (from פָּל, to split, cf. Talmudic פִּלְפִּל, opened, accessible, from פָּלַשׁ, פָּלַשׁ, perforare, fodiendo viam, aditum sibi aperire). The opening of the way is here not, as at Isa. xxvi. 7, conceived of as the setting aside of the hindrances in the way of him who walks, but generally as making walking in the way possible : man can take no step in any direction without God ; and that not only does not exempt him from moral responsibility, but the consciousness of this is rather for the first time rightly quickened by the consciousness of being encompassed on every side by the knowledge and the power of God. The dissuasion of ver. 20 is thus in ver. 21 grounded in the fact, that man at every stage and step of his journey is observed and encompassed by God : it is impossible for him to escape from the knowledge of God or from dependence on Him. Thus opening all the paths of man, He has also appointed to the way of sin the punishment with which it corrects itself : "his sins lay hold of him, the evil-doer." The suffix יָ- does not refer to שָׁנָא of ver. 21, where every one without exception and without distinction is meant, but it relates to the obj. following, the evil-doer, namely, as the explanatory permutative annexed to the "him" according to the scheme, Ex. ii. 6 ; the permutative is distinguished from the apposition by this, that the latter is a forethought explanation which heightens the understanding of the subject, while the former is an explanation afterwards brought in which guards against a misunderstanding. The same construction, xiv. 13b, belonging to the syntaxis ornata in the old Hebrew, has become common in the Aramaic and in the modern Hebrew. Instead of יִלְכְּדוּהוּ (ver. 22), the poet uses poetically יִלְכְּדוּנִי ; the interposed ן may belong to the emphatic ground-form יִלְכְּדוּן, but is epenthetic if one compares forms such as קָבְנוּ (R. קָב), Num. xxiii. 13 (cf. p. 73). The הַפְּאוּתוּ governed by הִבְלִי (laquei (הִבְלִי, tormina), is either gen. exeg. : bands which consist in his sin, or gen. subj. : bands which his sin unites, or better, gen. possess. : bands which his sin brings with it. By these bands he will be held fast, and so will die : he (הוא referring to the person described) will die in insubordination (Symm. δ') ἀπαιδεύσταν), or better, since אָן and רַב are placed in contrast: in want of correction. With the שָׁנָה (ver. 23*b*), repeated purposely from ver. 20, there is connected the idea of the overthrow which is certain to overtake the infatuated man. In ver. 20 the sense of moral error began already to connect itself with this verb. אָלָה is the right name of unrestrained lust of the flesh. אָלָה is connected with אָל, the belly; אָל, Arab. āl, to draw together, to condense, to thicken (Isaiah, p. 424). Dummheit (stupidity) and the Old-Norse dumba, darkness, are in their roots related to each other. Also in the Semitic the words for blackness and darkness are derived from roots meaning condensation. אָל is the mind made thick, darkened, and become like crude matter.

NINTH INTRODUCTORY MASHAL DISCOURSE, VI. 1-5.

WARNING AGAINST INCONSIDERATE SURETYSHIP.

The author does not return to the subject of chastity till the twelfth discourse, vi. 20 ff. Between the eighth and the twelfth three other groups of moral proverbs are introduced, which are neither connected with one another nor with the eight discourses which precede them. Must we therefore, with Hitzig and Kamphausen, hold vi. 1-5, 6-11, 12-19, to be an interpolation here introduced from some other place? We find here the fondness for synonyms and words similar in sound peculiar to the author of the introduction, vi. 2, 3, 5, and meet with the same interchange of words, vi. 4, cf. iv. 25, and figurative expressions, vi. 18, cf. iii. 29 (חרשׁ), word-formations, vi. 10 (חֶבֶק), cf. iii. 8 (שָׁקִי), ideas, vi. 12, cf. iv. 28 (עֲקֻשׁוֹת פֶּה), vi. 14, cf. ii. 12, 14 (חֶפְכֹּת), and constructions, vi. 12 (הוֹלֵךְ עֲקֻשׁוֹת פֶּה), cf. ii. 7 (הִלְכֵי חָם); like delineations of character, vi. 18*b*, cf. i. 16, and threatenings, vi. 15, cf. i. 26 f., iii. 25—as many marks of identity of the authorship as could be expected. And what had moved the interpolators to introduce the three groups of proverbs, vi. 1-5, 6-11, 12-19, just here? In vain does Hitzig seek to extract from chap. v. certain words and ideas common to it with chap. vi. which shall make it clear that the groups of proverbs in question are here an interpolation; the points of contrast are not prominent. If now the poet has already in iii.

1-18, but still more in iii. 27 ff., connected together all manner of rules of life without any close or visible connection, it is not strange if at vi. 1, where besides the בני denotes the new section, he breaks off to a new subject out of the fulness of his matter; and the connection wanting between vi. 1 and v. 23, as well as between iii. 27 and iii. 26, does not therefore warrant critical suspicion.

Vers. 1-5. The author warns against suretyship; or rather, he advises that if one has made himself surety, he should as quickly as possible withdraw from the snare.

- 1 My son, if thou hast become surety for thy neighbour,
Hast given thy hand for another :
- 2 Thou art entangled in the words of thy mouth,
Ensnared in the words of thy mouth.
- 3 Do this then, my son, and free thyself—
For thou hast come under the power of thy neighbour—
Go, instantly entreat and importune thy neighbour.
- 4 Give no sleep to thine eyes,
And no slumber to thine eyelids ;
- 5 Tear thyself free like a gazelle from his hand,
And as a bird from the hand of the fowler.

The chief question here is, whether לְ after עָרַב introduces him for whom or with whom one becomes surety. Elsewhere עָרַב (R. רַב, whence also אָרַב, nectere, to twist close and compact) with the accusative of the person means to become surety for any one, to represent him as a surety, xi. 15, xx. 16 (xxvii. 13), Gen. xliv. 9, xlv. 33 (as with the accusative of the matter, to pledge anything, to deposit it as a pledge, Jer. xxx. 21, Neh. v. 3, = שִׂים, Arab. wadʿa, Job xvii. 3); and to become surety with any one is expressed, xvii. 18, by לְפָנַי עָרַב. The phrase לְ עָרַב is not elsewhere met with, and is thus questionable. If we look to ver. 3, the רָעָה (רָעָה) mentioned there cannot possibly be the creditor with whom one has become surety, for so impetuous and urgent an application to him would be both purposeless and unbecoming. But if he is meant for whom one has become surety, then certainly לְרָעָה is also to be understood of the same person, and לְ is thus dat. commodi; similar to this is the Targumic עָרַבְתָּא עַל, suretyship for any one, xvii. 18, xxii. 26. But is the וְ, 1b, distinguished from רָעָה, the stranger with whom one has become surety? The parallels xi. 15, xx. 16, where וְ denotes the person whom one represents, show that in both lines one and the same person is meant; וְ is in the Proverbs equivalent to אָחֵר, each different from the person in the discourse, v. 17, xxvii. 2,—thus, like רֵעַךְ, denotes not the friend, but generally him to whom one stands in any kind of relation, even a very external one, in a word, the fellow-creatures or neighbours, xxiv. 28 (cf. the Arab. sahbk and karynk, which are used as vaguely and superficially). It is further a question, whether we have to explain 1b: if thou hast given thine hand to another, or for another. Here also we are without evidence from the usage of the language; for the phrase כָּפַתְךָ, or merely כָּפַתְךָ, appears to be used of striking the hand in suretyship where it elsewhere occurs without any further addition, xvii. 18, xxii. 26, xi. 15; however, Job xvii. 3, נִתְקַע לִי, appears the same: to strike into the hand of any one, i.e. to give to him the hand-stroke. From this passage Hitzig concludes that the surety gave the hand-stroke, without doubt in the presence of witnesses, first of all of the creditor, to the debtor, as a sign that he stood for him. But this idea is unnatural, and the “without doubt” melts into air. He on whose hand the stroke falls is always the person to whom one gives suretyship, and confirms it by the hand-stroke. Job also, l.c., means to say: who else but Thou, O Lord, could give to me a pledge, viz. of my innocence? If now the וְ, ver. 1b, is, as we have shown, not the creditor,<sup>1</sup> but the debtor, then is the לְ the dat. commodi, as 1a, and the two lines perfectly correspond. כָּפַתְךָ properly means to drive, to strike with a resounding noise, cogn. with the Arab. wak'a, which may be regarded as its intrans. (Fl.); then particularly to strike the hand or with the hand. He to whom this hand-pledge is given for another remains here undesignated. A new question arises, whether in ver. 6, where נִקְשָׁה (illaqueari) and נִלְכְּדָה (comprehendi) follow each other as Isa. viii. 15, cf. Jer. l. 24, the hypothetical antecedent is continued or not. We agree with Schultens, Ziegler, and Fleischer against the continuance of the אָם. The repetition of the בְּאִמְרֵי פִיךָ (cf. ii. 14) serves rightly to strengthen the representation of the thought: thou, thou thyself and no other, hast then ensnared thyself in the net; but this strengthening of the expression would greatly lose in force by placing ver. 2 in the antecedent, while if ver. 2 is regarded as the conclusion, and thus as the principal proposition, it appears in its full strength.

Ver. 3. The new commencement needs no particle denoting a conclusion; the וְאִם, making the summons emphatic (cf. 2 Kings x. 10, frequently in interrogative clauses), connects it closely enough. וְאִם, neut., refers to what follows. The ו before הַנִּצֵּל is explanatory, as we say in familiar language: Be so good as tell me, or do me the favour to come with me; while no Frenchman would say, Faites-moi le (ce) plaisir et venez avec moi (Fl.).<sup>1</sup> The clause וְאִם בָּיָדְךָ<sup>2</sup> is not to be translated: in case thou art fallen into the hand of thy neighbour; for this is represented (vers. 1, 2) as having already in fact happened. On two sides the surety is no longer sui juris: the creditor has him in his hand; for if the debtor does not pay, he holds the surety, and in this way many an honourable man has lost house and goods, Sirach xxix. 18, cf. viii. 13;—and the debtor has him, the surety, in his hand; for the performance which is due, for which the suretyship avails, depends on his conscientiousness. The latter is here meant: thou hast made thy freedom and thy possessions dependent on the will of thy neighbour for whom thou art the surety. The clause introduced with כִּי gives the reason for the call to set himself free (הַנִּצֵּל from נָצַל, R. צַל, שַׁל, to draw out or off); it is a parenthetical sentence. The meaning of הַתְּרַפָּם is certain. The verb רָפַס (רָפַסְתָּ, רָפַסְתִּי) signifies to stamp on, calcere, conculcare; the Kamûs<sup>3</sup> explains rafas by rakad balarjal. The Hithpa. might, it is true, mean to conduct oneself in a trampling manner, to tread roughly, as הִתְרַפֵּי, and the medial Niph. נִפְּסָה, to conduct oneself speaking (in an impassioned manner); but Ps. lxxviii. 31 and the analogy of הִתְרַפֵּסְתָּ favour the meaning to throw oneself in a stamping manner, i.e. violently, to the ground, to trample upon oneself,—i.e. let oneself be trampled upon, to place oneself in the attitude of most earnest humble prayer. Thus the Græc. Venet.

πατήθητι, Rashi ("humble thyself like to the threshold which is trampled and trode upon"), Aben-Ezra, Immanuel ("humble thyself under the soles of his feet"); so Cocceius, J. H. Michaelis, and others: conculcandum te præbe. יִרְחַב is more controverted. The Talmudic-Midrash explanation (b. Joma, 87a; Bathra, 173b, and elsewhere): take with thee in great numbers thy friends (יִרְחַב = יְהַרְבֵּה), is discredited by this, that it has along with it the explanation of הוֹרַפְסָם by (יֵד) הַיָּד פָּס (יד), solve palmam (manus), i.e. pay what thou canst. Also with the meaning to rule (Parchon, Immanuel), which יִרְחַב besides has not, nothing is to be done. The right meaning of יִרְחַב is to rush upon one boisterously, Isa. iii. 5. יִרְחַב means in general to be violently excited (Arab. rahiba, to be afraid), and thus to meet one, here with the accusative: assail impetuously thy neighbour (viz. that he fulfil his engagement). Accordingly, with a choice of words more or less suitable, the LXX. translates by παρόξυνε, Symm., Theodotion by παρόρημσον, the Græc. Venet. by ἐνίστασσο, the Syr. (which the Targumist copies) by גִּיר (solicita), and Kimchi glosses by: lay an arrest upon him with pacifying words. The Talmud explains רָעִיךָ as plur.;<sup>1</sup> but the plur., which was permissible in iii. 28, is here wholly inadmissible: it is thus the plena scriptio for רָעִיךָ with the retaining of the third radical of the ground-form of the root-word (רָעַי = רָעִי), or with י as mater lectionis, to distinguish the pausal-form from that which is without the pause; cf. xxiv. 34. LXX., Syr., Jerome, etc., rightly translate it in the sing. The immediateness lying in רָעִיךָ (cf. ἔπαυε, Matt. v. 24) is now expressed as a duty, ver. 4 f. One must not sleep and slumber (an expression quite like Ps. cxxxii. 4), not give himself quietness and rest, till the other has released him from his bail by the performance of that for which he is surety. One must set himself free as a gazelle or as a bird, being caught, seeks to disentangle itself by calling forth all its strength and art.

Ver. 5. The naked יָרֵד is not to be translated "immediately;" for in this sense the word is rabbinical, not biblical. The versions (with exception of Jerome and the Græc. Venet.) translate as if the word were כַּפֵּה [out of the snare]. Bertheau prefers this reading, and Böttcher holds צִיָּר [a hunter] to have fallen out after כִּיר. It is not a parallelism with reservation; for a bird-catcher is not at the same time a gazelle-hunter. The author, if he has so written, has conceived of מִיד, as at 1 Kings xx. 42, as absolute, and connected it with הִנָּצַל: tear thyself free like the gazelle from the hand into which thou hast fallen (Hitzig); according to which, the section should be accentuated thus: הִנָּצַל כַּצְבִי מִיָּד. הַנָּצַל, Arab. מִצְבִי, Arab. zaby, is the gazelle (Arab. ghazâl), so called from its elegance; צַפּוּר, the bird, from its whistling (צַפַּר, Arab. şafar, R. שָׁפַר, cf. Arab. şaffârat, the whistling of a bird), Arab. safar, whistler (with prosthesis, 'aşafwar, warbler, Psalm. p. 794). The bird-catcher is called יִקְוֵשׁ (from קָשׁ, after the form יִבְלֵל, cog. קָשׁ, Isa. xxix. 21, שָׁקַט, R. קָשׁ), after the form פְּגוּרָה (fem. פְּגוּרָה, or יִקְוֵשׁ; one would think that the Kametz, after the form kâtwol (vid. under Isa. i. 17), must here be fixed, but in Jer. v. 26 the word is vocalized יִקְוֵשִׁי.

TENTH INTRODUCTORY MASHAL DISCOURSE, VI. 6-11.

CALL TO THE SLUGGARD TO AWAKE.

Altera parænesis (remarks J. H. Michaelis) ad debitorem potius directa, sicut prima ad fidejussorem. But this connection is a subtle invention. These brief proverbial discourses, each of which forms a completed whole, have scarcely been a priori destined for this introduction to the Salomonic Book of Proverbs edited by the author; but he places them in it; and that he so arranges them that this section regarding sluggards follows that regarding sureties, may have been occasioned by accidental points of contact of the one with the other (cf. לֵךְ, 6a, with 3b; שְׁנוּת . . . תְּנַגְמוֹת, ver. 10, with ver. 4), which may also further determine the course in which the proverbs follow each other.

Vers. 6-8. As Elihu (Job xxxv. 11) says that God has set the beasts as our teachers, so he sends the sluggard to the school of the ant (Ameise), so named (in Germ.) from its industry (Emsigkeit):

- 6 Go to the ant, sluggard;
 Consider her ways, and be wise!
 7 She that hath no judge,
 Director, and ruler:
 8 She prepareth in summer her food,
 Has gathered in harvest her store.

The Dechî written mostly under the  $\text{לָּהּ}$  separates the inseparable. The thought, Go to the ant, sluggard! permits no other distinction than in the vocative; but the Dechî of  $\text{לָּהּ אֶל־נִמְלֵה}$  is changed into Munach<sup>1</sup> on account of the nature of the Athnach-word, which consists of only two syllables without the counter-tone. The ant has for its Hebrew-Arabic name  $\text{נִמְלֵה}$ , from the R. נ (Isaiah, p. 687), which is first used of the sound, which expresses the idea of the low, dull, secret,—thus of its active and yet unperceived motion; its Aramaic name in the Peshîto,  $\text{ܢܡܠܗ}$ , and in the Targ.  $\text{ܨܘܡܨܘܡܐ}$  (also Arab. sumsum, simsim, of little red ants), designates it after its quick activity, its busy running hither and thither (vid. Fleischer in Levy's Chald. Wörterb. ii. 578). She is a model of unwearied and well-planned labour. From the plur.  $\text{יְרֻכִּיּוֹת}$  it is to be concluded that the author observed their art in gathering in and laying up in store, carrying burdens, building their houses, and the like (vid. the passages in the Talmud and Midrash in the Hamburg Real-Encyclopädie für Bibel und Talmud, 1868, p. 83 f.). To the ant the sluggard ( $\text{עֲצִיל}$ , Aram. and Arab.  $\text{عطل}$ , with the fundamental idea of weight and dulness) is sent, to learn from her to be ashamed, and to be taught wisdom.

Ver. 7. This relative clause describes the subject of ver. 8 more fully: it is like a clause with  $\text{כִּי נִמְלֵה}$ , quamquam.<sup>2</sup> The community of ants exhibits a peculiar class of workers; but it is not, like that of bees, composed of grades terminating in the queen-bee as the head. The three offices here named represent the highest judiciary, police, and executive powers; for  $\text{קָצִין}$  (from  $\text{קָצָה}$ , to distinguish, with the ending in, vid. Jesurun, p. 215 s.) is the judge;  $\text{שֹׁטֵר}$  (from  $\text{שָׁטַר}$ , Arab. satr, to draw lines, to write) is the overseer (in war the director, controller), or, as Saalschütz indicates the province of the schotrim both in cities and in the camp, the office of police;  $\text{מִשְׁל}$  (vid. Isaiah, p. 691), the governors of the whole state organism subordinated to the schoftim and the schotrim. The Syr., and the Targ. slavishly following it, translate  $\text{קָצִין}$  by  $\text{חֲצִירָא}$  (harvest), for they interchange this word with  $\text{קָצִיר}$ .

Ver. 8. In this verse the change of the time cannot be occasioned by this, that  $\text{קָצִין}$  and  $\text{קָצִיר}$  are distinguished as the earlier and the later period of the year; for קָדֵף (= Arab. kayt, from kât, to be glowing hot, cf. Arab. kglyyt of the glow of the mid-day heat) is the late summer, when the heat rises to the highest degree; but the son of the Shunammite succumbed to the sun-stroke in the time of harvest (2 Kings iv. 18 f.). Löwenstein judiciously remarks that קָדֵף refers to immediate want, קָדֵף־לָמָּח to that which is future; or, better, the former shows them engaged in persevering industry during the summer glow, the latter as at the end of the harvest, and engaged in the bringing home of the winter stores. The words of the procuring of food in summer are again used by Agur, Prov. xxx. 25; and the Aramaic fable of the ant and the grasshopper,<sup>1</sup> which is also found among those of Æsop and of Syntipas, serves as an illustration of this whole verse. The LXX. has, after the "Go to the ant," a proverb of five lines, ἡ πορεύθητι πρὸς τὴν μέλισσαν. Hitzig regards it as of Greek origin; and certainly, as Lagarde has shown, it contains idiomatic Greek expressions which would not occur to a translator from the Hebrew. In any case, however, it is an interpolation which disfigures the Hebrew text by overlading it.

Vers. 9-11. After the poet has admonished the sluggard to take the ant as an example, he seeks also to rouse him out of his sleepiness and indolence:

- 9 How long, O sluggard, wilt thou lie?
When wilt thou rise up from thy sleep?
10 "A little sleep, a little slumber,
A little folding of the hands to rest!"
11 So comes like a strong robber thy poverty,
And thy want as an armed man.

Vers. 9, 10. The awakening cry, ver. 9, is not of the kind that Paul could have it in his mind, Eph. v. 14. לָמָּח has, as the vocative, Pasek after it, and is, on account of the Pasek, in correct editions accentuated not with Munach, but Mercha. The words, ver. 10, are not an ironical call (sleep only yet a little while, but in truth a long while), but per mimesin the reply of the sluggard with which he turns away the unwelcome disturber. The plurals with מְעַד sound like self-delusion: yet a little, but a sufficient! To fold the hands, i.e. to cross them over the breast, or put them into the bosom, denotes also, Eccles. iv. 5, the idler. פְּרַחֵן, complicatio

(cf. in Livy, compressis quod aiunt manibus sidere; and Lucan, ii. 292, compressas tenuisse manus), is formed like שָׁקַיִם, iii. 8, and the inf. שָׁכַב like חָסַר, x. 21, and שָׁפַל, xvi. 19. The perf. consec. connects itself with the words heard from the mouth of the sluggard, which are as a hypothetical antecedent thereto: if thou so sayest, and always again sayest, then this is the consequence, that suddenly and inevitably poverty and want come upon thee. That מְהֵלֵךְ denotes the grassator, i.e. vagabond (Arab. dawwar, one who wanders much about), or the robber or foe (like the Arab. 'aduww, properly transgressor finium), is not justified by the usage of the language; הֹלֵךְ signifies, 2 Sam. xii. 4, the traveller, and מְהֵלֵךְ is one who rides quickly forward, not directly a κακὸς ὁδοιπόρος (LXX.).

Ver. 11. The point of comparison, 11*a*, is the unforeseen, as in quick march or assault (Böttcher), and 11*b* the hostile and irretrievable surprise; for a man in armour, as Hitzig remarks, brings no good in his armour: he assails the opponent, and he who is without defence yields to him without the possibility of withstanding him. The LXX. translate מִן כְּאִישׁ מִן by ὥσπερ ἀγαθὸς δρομεύς (cf. δρομεύς = מְנִירָאָה, Job vii. 6, LXX., Aq.), for what reason we know not. After ver. 11 they interpose two other lines: "but if thou art assiduous, thy harvest will come to thee as a fountain, but want will go away ὥσπερ κακὸς δρομεύς." Also this "bad runner" we must let go; for Lagarde's retranslation, מַחְסֵר כְּחֵשׁ בְּאִישׁ נָמַן, no one can understand. The four lines, vers. 10, 11, are repeated in the appendix of Words of the Wise, xxiv. 33 f.; and if this appendix originated in the time of Hezekiah, they may have been taken therefrom by the poet, the editor of the older Book of Proverbs. Instead of כְּמְהֵלֵךְ, כְּמְהֵלֵךְ is there used (so comes forward thy poverty, i.e. again and again, but certainly moving forward); and instead of מַחְסֵר, מַחְסֵרִיךְ is written, as also here, ver. 6, for מִשְׁנֵתְךָ is found the variant מִשְׁנֵתִיךְ with Jod as mater lectionis of the pausal Segol.

ELEVENTH INTRODUCTORY MASHAL DISCOURSE, VI. 12-19.

WARNING AGAINST DECEIT AND MALICE.

There follows now a third brief series of instructions, which run to a conclusion with a deterring prospect similar to the foregoing.

- 12 A worthless man, a wicked man,
Is he who practiseth falsehood with his mouth ;
13 Who winketh with his eyes, scrapeth with his foot,
Pointeth with his fingers.
14 Malice is in his heart,
He deviseth evil at all times,
He spreadeth strife.
15 Therefore suddenly his destruction shall come,
Suddenly shall he be destroyed, and there is no remedy.

It is a question, what is the subject and what the predicate in ver. 12. Thus much is clear, that upon him who is here described according to his deceitful conduct the sentence of condemnation shall fall. He who is so described is thus subject, and אָרָם בְּלִיעֵל is without doubt predicate. But does the complex subject begin with אִישׁ אָן? Thus e.g. Hitzig: "A worthless man is the wicked man who . . ." But the interchange of אָרָם and אִישׁ אָן is a sign of parallel relation; and if 12b belonged attributively to אִישׁ אָן, then since אִישׁ אָן הָאָן is not used, it ought at least to have been continued by הָהָאָן. The general moral categories, 12a, are thus predicates, as was indeed besides probable; the copious division of the subject demands also in point of style a more developed predicate. xvi. 27 is simpler in plan, and also logically different. There the expression is, as is usual, אִישׁ בְּלִיעֵל. Since אָרָם אָן is not possible, the author uses instead בְּלִיעֵל. This word, composed of בְּלִי and עֵל (from יַעַל, תַּעַל, to be useful, to be good for), so fully serves as one word, that it even takes the article, 1 Sam. xxv. 25. It denotes worthlessness, generally in a chain of words in the genitive, but also the worthless, Job xxxiv. 18; and it is to be so taken here, for אָרָם does not form a constructivus, and never governs a genitive. בְּלִיעֵל is thus a virtual adjective (as nequam in homo nequam); the connection is like that of אָרָם רָשָׁע, xi. 7, and elsewhere, although more appositional than this pure attributive. Synonymous with בְּלִיעֵל is אָן (from an, to breathe), wickedness, i.e. want of all moral character. Thus worthless and wicked is he who practises deceit with his mouth (cf. iv. 24), i.e. who makes language the means of untruthfulness and uncharitableness. עֲקָשִׁית פֶּה is meant in a moral sense, but without excluding that distortion of the mouth which belongs to the mimicry of the malicious. It is the accus. of the object; for הָלָךְ is also bound in a moral sense with the accusative of that which one practises, i.e. dealing with, exercises himself in, ii. 7, xxviii. 18, Isa. xxxiii. 15.

Ver. 13. קִרַּץ בְּעֵינָיו is translated according to the sense: who winks (nictat) with his eyes; but that is not the proper meaning of the word, for קִרַּץ is used not only of the eyes, x. 10 (cf. xvi. 30, qui oculos morsicat or connivet), Ps. xxxv. 19, but also of the lips, xvi. 30. Thus Löwenstein's explanation: who opens up the eyes, is incorrect. The verb קִרַּץ unites in it the meanings of قَرَصَ, to pinch off with a sharp implement, and قَرَضَ, with a blunt instrument (Arab. mikrad, pincers). It means to pince, to nip, as Arab. kars, pincer,—e.g. kars balskyn alarsasat, he cuts off with the knife the leaden seal,—hence frequently, to nip together the eyes, provincially: to wink (“zwickern,” frequent. of “zwicken,” to nip) with the eyes—the action of the deceiver, who thereby gives the sign to others that they help or at least do not hinder him from bantering and mocking, belying and deceiving a third person (Fl.); cf. Ali's proverb, “O God, pardon to us the culpable winking with the eye (ramzat),” and Fleischer's notes thereon, the Proverbs of Ali, p. 100 f.

That the words which follow, מוֹלֵל בְּרַגְלָיו, are meant of discourse, i.e. the giving of signs, with the feet, and, so to say, significant oratio pedestris (LXX., Aben-Ezra, Bertheau, Hitzig, and others), is very improbable, since the usage of language has set apart the Piel מוֹלֵל for the meaning loqui, and מוֹלֵל admits another suitable signification, for מוֹלֵל means in Talmudic fricare, confricare,—e.g. הַמוֹלֵל מְלִילוֹת, he who grinds the parched ears of corn (b. Beza 12*b*; Ma'seroth, iv. 5),—after which Syr., Targ., הָבִים (stamping), Aq. ῥαβῶν, Symm. προστριβῶν, Jerome, (qui terit pede, and Rashi מַשְׁפֵּסָה (grinding, scratching); it means one who scrapes with his feet, draws them backwards and forwards on the ground in order thereby to give a sign to others; also the Arab. مَلَّ, levem et agilem esse, which as the synonym of اسرع is connected with فَي of the way, signifies properly to move the feet quickly hither and thither (Fl.).<sup>1</sup> מָרָה

<sup>1</sup> The root-idea of the Arab. mall is inquietness of motion; the Arab. noun mallt signifies the glow with its flickering light and burning: glowing ashes, inner agitation, external haste; Arab. malil (مَلِيل) is the feverish patient, but also one quickly hastening away, and generally an impatient or hasty person (vid. Wetstein in Baudissin in his Job. Tischendorfianus, vii. 6). The grinding appears here, in accordance with its primary signification (projicere, sc. brachium or digitum = monstrare), connected with בָּאַצְבְּעָתוֹ; another expression for this scornful, malicious δακτυλοδεικνεῖν is שָׁלַח אֶצְבֵּעַ, Isa. lviii. 9.

Ver. 14. In this verse is continued the description of the subject, only once returning to the particip. The clauses are arranged independently, but logically according to the complex conception of the subject. תְּהַפְכוֹת are just the knaveries, i.e. the malicious wickedness which comes to light in word and deportment as עקשנות פה. Regarding the double figure of the smithy and of agriculture underlying חָרַשׁ, machinari, vid. at iii. 29, and regarding the omission of the הוּא to חָרַשׁ, at Ps. vii. 10 The phrase שִׁלְחָ מְדִינִים (as ver. 19, xvi. 28), to let loose disputes, so that they break forth, reminds us rather of the unfettering of the winds by Æolus than of the casting in of the apple of discord. Instead of מְדִינִים the Keri has מְדִינִים; on the other hand, מְדִינִים remains uncorrected vi. 19, x. 12. The form מְדִינִים occurs once, xviii. 18, and its constr. מְדִינֵי once, xix. 13. Everywhere else the text has מְדוּנִים, for which the Keri has מְדִינִים, xviii. 19, xxi. 9, 19, xxiii. 29, xxv. 24, xxvi. 21, xxvii. 15. The forms מְדִינִין and מְדִינִין are also recognised: the former stands alone without any analogous example; the latter is compared at least with מְצַד, Arab. masād (Psalmen, p. 163, 3). Probably these two forms are warranted by Gen. xxv. 2, cf. xxxvii. 28, 36, where מְדִינִין and מְדִינִין occur as the names of two sons of Abraham by Keturah. But the national name מְדִינִים is no reason for the seven times laying aside of the regular form מְדוּנִים, i.e. מְדוּנִים, which is the plur. of מְדוּן after the forms מְאֹרִים, מְעֹרִים, although מְדוּנִים, after the forms מְבֹרָשִׁים, מְצֹקִים, is also found.

Ver. 15. With the 14th verse the description terminates. A worthless and a wicked person is he who does such things. The point lies in the characteristic out of which the conclusion is drawn: therefore his ruin will suddenly come upon him, etc. Regarding אֵיךְ, the root-meaning of which is illustrated by Amos ii. 13, vid. at i. 26. פְּתָא is an old accus. of an absol. פְּתָא, of the same meaning as פְּתַע, used as an adverbial accus., both originating in the root-idea of splitting, opening, breaking out and breaking forth. "Shall be is made by means of a quick movement hither and thither; and so also is speaking, for the instrument of speech, particularly the tongue, is set in motion. Only the meaning præcidere, circumcidere, does not connect itself with that root-idea: מָל in this signification appears to be a nüance of מָר, stringere.

broken to pieces" (as a brittle potter's vessel, Ps. ii. 9, Isa. xxx. 14, Jer. xxix. 11) is a frequent figure for the destruction (שָׁבַר) of an army (cf. Arab. ānksar āljysh), of a city or a state, a man. אִין continues the שָׁבַר as xxix. 1: there shall be as it were no means of recovery for his shattered members (Fl.). Without the Vav this אִין מִרְפָּא would be a clause conceived of accusatively, and thus adverbially: without any healing.

Vers. 16–19. What now follows is not a separate section (Hitzig), but the corroborative continuation of that which precedes. The last word (מְרִיב, strife) before the threatening of punishment, 14*b*, is also here the last. The thought that no vice is a greater abomination to God than the (in fact satanical) striving to set men at variance who love one another, clothes itself in the form of the numerical proverb which we have already considered, pp. 12, 13. From that place we transfer the translation of this example of a Midda:—

- 16 There are six things which Jahve hateth,
And seven are an abhorrence to His soul:
17 Haughty eyes, a lying tongue,
And hands that shed innocent blood;
18 An heart that deviseth the thoughts of evil,
Feet that hastily run to wickedness,
19 One that uttereth lies as a false witness,
And he who soweth strife between brethren.

The sense is not, that the six things are hateful to God, and the seventh an abomination to Him besides (Löwenstein); the Midda-form in Amos i. 3–ii. 6, and in the proverb in Job v. 19, shows that the seven are to be numbered separately, and the seventh is the non plus ultra of all that is hated by God. We are not to translate: sex hæcce odit, for הַמָּה הֵנָּה (הֵם, הֵן) points backwards and hitherwards, but not, as אֵלֶיהָ, forwards to that immediately following; in that case the words would be שֵׁשׁ אֵלֶה, or more correctly שֵׁשׁ הָאֵלֶה. But also Hitzig's explanation, "These six things (viz. vers. 12–15) Jahve hateth," is impossible; for (which is also against that hæcce) the substantive pronoun הַמָּה הֵנָּה (הַמָּה, הֵנָּה) is never, like the Chald. הַמָּה (הַמָּה), employed as an accus. in the sense of אֵתְהֶם, אֵתָּהּ, it is always (except where it is the virtual gen. connected with a preposition) only the nom., whether of the subject or of the predicate; and where it is the nom. of the predicate, as Deut. xx. 15, Isa. li. 19, substantival clauses precede in which הֵנָּה (הַמָּה) represents the substantive verb, or, more correctly, in which the logical copula resulting from the connection of the clause itself remains unexpressed. Accordingly, 'שָׁנָה ה' is a relative clause, and is therefore so accentuated here, as at xxx. 15 and elsewhere: sex (sunt) ea quæ Deus odit, et septem (sunt) abominatio animæ ejus. Regarding the statement that the soul of God hates anything, vid. at Isa. i. 14. תועבות, an error in the writing occasioned by the numeral (vid. xxvi. 25), is properly corrected by the Keri; the poet had certainly the singular in view, as iii. 32, xi. 1, when he wrote תועבת. The first three characteristics are related to each other as mental, verbal, actual, denoted by the members of the body by means of which these characteristics come to light. The virtues are taken all together as a body (organism), and meekness is its head. Therefore there stands above all, as the sin of sins, the mentis elatæ tumor, which expresses itself in elatum (grande) supercilium: עֲיִינִים רְמוּזִים, the feature of the רָם, haughty (cf. Ps. xviii. 28 with 2 Sam. xxii. 28), is the opposite of the feature of the נָשָׂה עֵינַיִם, Job xxii. 29; עֵץ is in the O. T. almost always (vid. Cant. iv. 9) fem., and adjectives of course form no dual. The second of these characteristics is the lying tongue, and the third the murderous hands. דָּם דִּמְיָנִי is innocent blood as distinguished from דָּם הַדִּמְיָנִי, the blood of the innocent, Deut. xix. 13.<sup>1</sup>

Ver. 18. The fourth characteristic is a deceitful heart. On הַיָּשׁ, vid. ver. 14, iii. 29, and on נֶאֱמַר, ver. 12. The fifth: feet running with haste to evil; לָרָעָה as לָרָע in Isa. lix. 7, echoing the distich i. 16, as here, 17*b* and 18*b*. The connection טָהַר לָרֹץ, propere cucurrit (contrast לְאֶחָד), is equivalent to טָהַר.

Ver. 19. The sixth: "A speaker of lies, a tongue of falsehood," is hateful to God. It is one subject which is thus doubly characterized. כְּזָבִים are fictions, and שֶׁקֶר is the disfiguring (deformatio) of the actual facts. They are purposely placed together in this connection. The derivations of these synonyms are obscure; Fürst gives to the former the root-idea of spinning (properly knotting together), and to the latter that of painting. כְּזָבִים is introduced to support שקר.<sup>1</sup> It would also be verbally permissible to interpret עַד שֶׁקֶר in the sense of עֲדוּת שֶׁקֶר, like xxv. 18, as in apposition to כּוֹזְבִים; but in the nearest parallel, xiv. 15, the idea is personal, for it is said of the עַד שֶׁקֶר that he breathes out lies. In that place there can be no doubt that the clause is a verbal one, and יָפִיחַ finitum, viz. Hiph. of פָּיַח. This Hiph. signifies elsewhere also sufflare, xx. 8, afflare, Ps. x. 5, Ezek. xxi. 36, perflare, Cant. iv. 16, anhelare (desiderare), Ps. xii. 6, Hab. ii. 3, but with כּוֹזְבִים, efflare, a synonym to דָּבַר, as הִבִּיעַ and הִטִּיף, which has (cf. xii. 17) no secondary meaning in use, but is mostly connected with כּוֹזְבִים, not without reference to the fact that that which is false is without reality and is nothing more than רוח חמה. הַבֵּל. But what kind of a form is יָפִיחַ, where it is not, as xiv. 5, the predicate of a verbal clause, but in connection with כּוֹזְבִים, as here and at xiv. 25, xix. 5, 9 (once with אֲמוֹנָה, xii. 17), is the subject of a substantival clause? That which lies nearest is to regard it as a noun formed from the fut. Hiph. Such formations we indeed meet only among proper names, such as יָקִים, יָכִין, יָאִיר; however, at least the one n. appell. יָרִיב (an adversary) is found, which may be formed from the Hiph. as well as from the Kal. But should not the constr. of יָפִיחַ after the form בֵּי יָרִיב? One does not escape from this consideration by deriving יָפִיחַ, after the forms יָנִיעַ, יָחִיל, יָדִיר, יָשִׁישׁ, and the like, from a secondary verb יָפַח, the existence of which is confirmed by Jer. iv. 31, and from which also יָפַח, Ps. xxvii. 12, appears to be derived, although it may be reduced also, after the form יָרַב (with יָרִיב), to הִפִּיחַ. But in this case also one expects as a connecting form יָפִיחַ like יָרִיד, as in reality יָפַח from יָפַח (cf. שָׁמַח, אָבַל, from שָׁמַח, אָבַל). Shall it now be assumed that the Kametz is treated as fixed? This were contrary to rule, since it is not naturally long. Thus the connection is not that of the genitive. But if יָפִיחַ were a substantive formed with the preformative of the second modus like יִלְקִיט [1 Sam. xvii. 40], or were it a participial intensive form of active signification such as נָבִיא, then the verbal force remaining in it is opposed to the usage of the language. There remains nothing further, therefore, than to regard יָפִיחַ as an attributive put in the place of a noun: one who breathes out; and there is a homogeneous example of this, for in any other way we cannot explain יוֹסִיף, Eccles. i. 18. In 19b the numeral proverb reaches its point. The chief of all that God hates is he who takes a fiendish delight in setting at variance men who stand nearly related. Thus this brief proverbial discourse rounds itself off, coming back again to 14*b* as a refrain.

TWELFTH INTRODUCTORY MASHAL DISCOURSE, VI. 20 ff.

WARNING AGAINST ADULTERY, BY REFERENCE TO ITS FEARFUL CONSEQUENCES.

After these three smaller sections, the teacher of wisdom returns here to the theme of the eighth: Warning against sins of the flesh, whose power and prevalence among men is so immeasurably great, that their terrible consequences cannot sufficiently be held up before them, particularly before youth.

- 20 Keep, my son, the commandment of thy father,
And reject not the instruction of thy mother.
21 Bind them to thy heart evermore,
Fasten them about thy neck.

The suff. -em refers to the good doctrine (cf. vii. 3) pointed out by מִצְוָה and תּוֹרָה; the masc. stands, as is usual (e.g. i. 16, v. 2), instead of the fem. Regarding the figure, reminding us of the Tefillin and of Amuletes for perpetual representation, vid. under iii. 3. Similarly of persons, Cant. viii. 6. The verb עָיַר (only here and Job xxxi. 36) signifies to bend, particularly to bend aside (Arab. 'ind, bending off, going aside; accus. as adv., aside, apud), and to bend up, to wind about, circumplicare.

Ver. 22. The representation of the good doctrine is now personified, and becomes identified with it.

- When thou walkest, it will guide thee;
When thou liest down, it will keep watch over thee;
And when thou wakest, it will talk with thee.

The subject is the doctrine of wisdom, with which the representation of wisdom herself is identified. The futures are not expressive of a wish or of an admonition, but of a promise; the form of the third clause shows this. Thus, and in the same succession as in the schema Deut. vi. 7, cf. xi. 19, are the three circumstances of the outward life distinguished: going, lying down, and rising up. The punctuation בְּהִתְהַלֵּכְךָ, found here and there, is Ben-Naphtali's variant; Ben-Asher and also the Textus rec. reject the Metheg in this case, vid. Baer's Metheg-Setzung, § 28. The verb נָחָה, with its Hiph. in a strengthened Kal-signification, is more frequently found in the Psalms than in the Proverbs; the Arab. نَحَى shows that it properly signifies to direct (dirigere), to give direction, to move in a definite direction. שָׁמַר with עַל, to take into protection, we had already ii. 11; this author has favourite forms of expression, in the repetition of which he takes delight. With lying down, sleeping is associated. וְהִקְיִצְוֹת is, as Ps. cxxxix. 18, the hypoth. perf., according to Ewald, § 357a: et ut expergefactus es, illa te compellabit. Bertheau incorrectly: she will make thee thoughtful. But apart from the fact that there is no evidence of the existence of this Hiph. in the language of the Bible, the personification demands a clearer figure. שִׁירָה (שִׁירָה) signifies mental speech and audible speech (Gen. xxiv. 63, poet., in the Talmudic<sup>1</sup> a common word); with ב, speaking concerning something (fabulari de), Ps. lxxix. 13; with the accus., that which is said of a thing, Ps. cxlv. 5, or the address, briefly for לְ שִׁירָה, Job xii. 8 (as מִן לְ with accus. iv. 9 = לְ מִן): when thou art awake, wisdom will forthwith enter into conversation with thee, and fill thy thoughts with right matter, and give to thy hands the right direction and consecration.

Ver. 23. Since in הָיִיתָ the idea of wisdom and of wholesome doctrine lie in one another, the author can proceed with proof:

For a lamp is the commandment, and instruction a light (Jerome, et lex lux);

And a way of life, disciplinary reproofs.

That תּוֹרָה has here not the positive, specifically Israelitish sense, but the generalized sense of instruction in conformity with truth regarding the will of God and the duty of man, vid. p. 42. This instruction mediated by man, but of divine origin, is אֵר, light, which enlightens the man who submits to it; and the commandment, מִצְוָה, which directs men in every case to do what is right, and forbids that which is wrong (including the prohibition Lev. iv. 2), is נֵר, a lamp which, kindled at that light, enlightens all the darkness of ignorance with reference to human conduct and its consequences.

<sup>1</sup> The conjecture thrown out by Wetstein, that (Arab.) shykh is equivalent to מְשִׁיחַ (מְשִׁיחַ), speaker, is untenable, since the verb shakh, to be old, a so-called munsarif, i.e. conjugated throughout, is used in all forms, and thus is certainly the root of shykh.

אור and נר are related to each other as general and particular, primary and derivative. Löwenstein accentuates incorrectly וְתוֹרָה אֹר instead of וְתוֹרָה אֹר (as the Cod. 1294 and the 3 Erfurt Codd.); vid. on the retrogression of the tone, not existing here, under iii. 15. The gen. כּוֹסֵר denotes the object or character of the admonition: not disciplinary in the external sense of the word, but rather moral, having in view discipline in the sense of education, i.e. moral edification and elevation. Such corrections are בְּרִדָּה תַיִם, the way to true life, direction how to obtain it.

Ver. 24. The section thus closes :

To keep thee from the vile woman,
From the flattery of the strange tongue.

Regarding the genitive connection רַע אִשָּׁת, a woman of a wicked character, vid. under ii. 14; and regarding the adjectival connection לְשׁוֹן נְכַרִּיהָ, under ver. 17; the strange tongue is the tongue (לְשׁוֹן) of the strange (foreign) woman (vid. p. 81), alluring with smooth words (ii. 16). Ewald, Bertheau: from her of a smooth tongue, the stranger, as Symm., Theod., ἀπὸ λειογλώσσου ξένης; but חֲלִיקַת is a substantive (Gen. xxvii. 16), and as a fem. adjunct. form is without an example. Rather חֲלִיקַת לְשׁוֹן is to be regarded as the first member and נְכַרִּיהָ as the second of the st. constr., for the former constitutes one idea, and לְשׁוֹן on this account remains unabbreviated; cf. Ps. lxxviii. 22, Isa. xxviii. 1; but (1) this syntactical phenomenon is yet problematical, vid. Friedr. Philippi, Wesen und Ursprung des St. Constr. p. 17; and (2) the supposition of such an anomaly is here unnecessary.

The proœmium of these twelve proverbial discourses is now at an end. Wisdom herself begins striking the note of the Decalogue :

- 25 Long not for her beauty in thy heart,
And let her not catch thee with her eyelids;
26 Because for a harlot one cometh down to a piece of bread,
And a man's wife lieth in wait for a precious soul.

The warning 25a is in the spirit of the "thou shalt not covet," Ex. xx. 17, and the ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ αὐτοῦ, Matt. v. 28, of the Preacher on the Mount. The Talmudic proverb עבירה קשו מעבירה הרהורי (Joma 29a) means only that the imagination of the sinful act exhausts the body even more than the act itself. The warning, "let her not catch thee with her eyelids," refers to her (the adulteress's) coquettish ogling and amorous winking. In the reason added, beginning with  $\text{כִּי בָעַר}$  (thus it is to be punctuated), there is the appositional connection  $\text{אֲשֶׁה זֹנֶה}$ , Gesen. § 113; the idea of  $\text{זֹנֶה}$  goes over into 26b. “ $\text{בֶּכֶר לֶחֶם}$  [=  $\text{בִּרְבֵּר}$ , R. בר, to round, vid. at Gen. xlix. 5], properly a circle of bread, is a small round piece of bread, such as is still baked in Italy (pagnotta) and in the East (Arab. kurs), here an expression for the smallest piece” (Fl.).  $\text{עָרַר}$  (constr. of  $\text{בָּעַר}$ ), as Job ii. 4, Isa. xxxii. 14, is used in the sense of ὑπέρ, pro, and with  $\text{עַר}$  there is connected the idea of the coming down to this low point. Ewald, Bertheau explain after the LXX., τιμὴ γὰρ πόρνῆς ὄση καὶ ἐνὸς ἄρτου, γυνὴ δὲ ἀνδρῶν τιμὰς ψυχὰς ἀρκεύει. But nothing is said here of price (reward); the parallelism is synonymous, not antithetic: he is doubly threatened with loss who enters upon such a course. The adulterer squanders his means (xxix. 3) to impoverishment (vid. the mention of a loaf of bread in the description of poverty 1 Sam. ii. 36), and a man’s wife (but at the same time seeking converse with another) makes a prey of a precious soul; for whoever consents to adulterous converse with her, loses not perhaps his means, but certainly freedom, purity, dignity of soul, yea, his own person.  $\text{צַד}$  comprehends—as  $\text{צִידוֹן}$ , fisher’s town [Zidon], Arab. sydd, hunter and fisher, show—all kinds of hunting, but in Hebr. is used only of the hunting of wild beasts. The root-meaning (cf.  $\text{צִידָה}$ ) is to spy, to seize.

Vers. 27–29. The moral necessity of ruinous consequences which the sin of adultery draws after it, is illustrated by examples of natural cause and effect necessarily connected :

- 27 Can one take fire in his bosom
And his clothes not be burned?
28 Or can any one walk over burning coals
And his feet not be burned?
29 So he that goeth to his neighbour’s wife,
No one remains unpunished that toucheth her.

We would say: Can any one, without being, etc.; the former is the Semitic “extended (paratactic)<sup>1</sup> construction.” The first  $\text{אֲשֶׁה}$  has the conjunctive Shalsheleth.  $\text{חָתַר}$  signifies to seize and draw forth a brand or coal with the fire-tongs or shovel ( $\text{מַחְתָּה}$ , the instrument for this); cf. Arab. khât, according to Lane, “he seized or snatched away a thing;” the form  $\text{יִחַתֶּה}$  is Kal, as  $\text{יִחַתֶּה}$  (vid. Köhler, De Tetragrammate, 1867, p. 10).  $\text{יִחַתֶּה}$  (properly indentation) is here not the lap, but, as Isa. xl. 11, the bosom.

Ver. 28. A second example of destructive consequences naturally following a certain course is introduced with  $\text{מִנִּי}$  of the double question.  $\text{מִנִּי}$  (from  $\text{חַתֶּה}$ , after the form  $\text{מִנִּי}$ , but for which  $\text{מִנִּי}$  is used) is the regular modification of gahhalim (Ges. § 27, 2). The fem.  $\text{מִנִּי}$  is followed here (cf. on the other hand i. 16) by the rhythmically full-sounding form  $\text{תִּבְרַחֲנָה}$  (retaining the distinction of gender), from  $\text{בָּרַח}$ , Arab. kuḡy, to burn so that a brand-mark ( $\text{כִּי}$ , Isa. iii. 24, cauterium) remains.

Ver. 29. The instruction contained in these examples here follows:  $\tau\delta\ \epsilon\iota\varsigma\ \pi\upsilon\rho\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \epsilon\iota\varsigma\ \gamma\upsilon\nu\alpha\iota\kappa\alpha\ \epsilon\mu\pi\epsilon\sigma\epsilon\iota\nu\ \iota\sigma\omicron\nu\ \upsilon\pi\acute{\alpha}\rho\chi\epsilon\iota$  (Pythagoras in Maximi Eclog. c. 39).  $\text{לֹא\ יָבֹא}$  is here, as the second in Ps. li. 1, a euphemism, and  $\text{בָּנִי}$ , to come in contact with, means, as  $\text{לֹא\ יָבֹא}$ , to touch, Gen. xx. 6. He who goes in to his neighbour's wife shall not do so with impunity ( $\text{לֹא\ יָבֹא}$ ). Since both expressions denote fleshly nearness and contact, so it is evident he is not guiltless.

Vers. 30, 31. The thief and the adulterer are now placed in comparison with one another, in such a way that adultery is supposed to be a yet greater crime.

- 30 One does not treat the thief scornfully if he steals
To satisfy his craving when he is hungry ;
31 Being seized, he may restore sevenfold,
Give up the whole wealth of his house.

For the most part 30a is explained: even when this is the case, one does not pass it over in the thief as a bagatelle. Ewald remarks:  $\text{לֹא\ יָבֹא}$  stands here in its nearest signification of overlooking, whence first follows that of contemning. But this “nearest” signification is devised wholly in favour of this passage;—the interpretation, “they do not thus let the thief pass,” is set aside by Cant. viii. 1, 7; for by 31b, cf. Cant. viii. 7b, and 34a, cf. Cant. viii. 6a, it is proved that from ver. 30 on, reminiscences from the Canticles, which belong to the literature of the Chokma, find their way into the Mashal language of the author. Hitzig's correct supposition, that  $\text{לֹא\ יָבֹא}$  always signifies positive contemning, does not necessitate the interrogative interpretation: “Does not one despise the thief if . . . ?” Thus to be understood, the author ought to have written  $\text{כִּי\ אֵף}$  or  $\text{כִּי\ גַם}$ . Michaelis rightly: furtum licet merito pro infami in republica habetur, tamen si cum adulterio comparatur, minus probrosum est. Regarding עָנָן in the sense of appetite, and even throat and stomach, vid. Psychologie, p. 204. A second is, that the thief, if he is seized (but we regard אֲשׁוּרֵי not as the hypoth. perf., but as the part. deprehensus), may make compensation for his crime. The fut. אֲשׁוּרֵי thus to be understood as the potential lies near from this, that a sevenfold compensation of the thing stolen is unheard of in the Israelitish law; it knows only of a twofold, fourfold, fivefold restoration, Ex. xxi. 37, xxii. 1-3, 8 (cf. Saalschütz, Mos. Recht, p. 554 ff.). This excess over that which the law rendered necessary leads into the region of free-will: he (the thief, by which we are now only to think of him whom bitter necessity has made such) may make compensation sevenfold, i.e. superabundantly; he may give up the whole possessions (vid. on פֶּה at i. 13) of his house, so as not merely to satisfy the law, but to appease him against whom he has done wrong, and again to gain for himself an honoured name. What is said in vers. 30 and 31 is perfectly just. One does not condemn a man who is a thief through poverty, he is pitied; while the adulterer goes to ruin under all circumstances of contempt and scorn. And: theft may be made good, and that abundantly; but adultery and its consequences are irreparable.

Vers. 32, 33. Here there is a contrast stated to ver. 30:

- 32 He who commits adultery (adulterans mulierem) is beside himself,
A self-destroyer—who does this.
33 He gains stripes and disgrace,
And his reproach is never quenched.

הִנָּן, which primarily seems to mean excedere, to indulge in excess, is, as also in the Decalogue, cf. Lev. xx. 10, transitive: ὁ μοιχεύων γυναῖκα. Regarding being mad (herzlos = heartless) = amens (excors, vecors), vid. Psychologie, p. 254. אִשְׁתֵּי נַפְשׁוֹ is he who goes to ruin with wilful perversity. A self-murderer—i.e. he intends to ruin his position and his prosperity in life—who does it, viz. this, that he touches the wife of another. It is the worst and most inextinguishable dishonouring of oneself. Singularly Behaji: who annihilates it (his soul), with reference to Deut. xxi. 12, Eccles. iv. 17, where עֵשָׂה would be equivalent to אֲשַׁר, καταργεῖν, which is untrue and impossible.<sup>1</sup> נַעַר refers to the corporal punishment inflicted on the adulterer by the husband (Deut. xvii. 8, xxi. 5); Hitzig, who rejects ver. 32, refers it to the stripes which were given to the thief according to the law, but these would be called מַכּוֹת (מַכּוֹת). The punctuation נָגַע וְקָלַן is to be exchanged for נָגַע וְקָלַן (Löwenstein and other good editors). נָגַע has a more active signification than our "finden" (to find): consequitur, τυγχάνει.

Vers. 34, 35. One who has been stolen from is to be appeased, but not the injured husband.

34 For jealousy is the fury of a husband,
And he spareth not in the day of vengeance.

35 He regardeth not any ransom,
And is not contented though thou offerest to him gifts ever so great.

The connection marks קִנְיָהּ as the subject; for it respects carnal intercourse with another's wife. Jealousy is not usually חֵמָה, the glow of anger (from חָם, as שָׁנָה from שָׁן), but חֵמַת־נָבֵר (constr. as חֵמַת), the glow of a man's anger, who with the putting forth of all his manly strength will seek satisfaction to his wounded honour. נָבֵר, here significant for אִשׁ, with the fundamental idea of strength, firmness; cf. Arab. jabr, to make fast, to put right again something broken in pieces, particularly a broken vessel, hence Algebra, properly the operation by which an incomplete magnitude is completed (Fl.). The following וְלֹא־יְהַפֵּל (with the orthophonic Dagesh, as ver. 25 יְהַפֵּד, and with Makkeph) is connected with נָבֵר, with definite reference to the man whom the faithless guest has made a cuckold. When the day comes in which the adultery brought to light demands and admits of vengeance, then, wounded in his right and in his honour, he knows no mercy; he pays no regard to any atonement or recompense by which the adulterer seeks to appease him and induce him not to inflict the punishment that is due: he does not consent, even though thou makest ever so great the gift whereby thou thinkest to gain him. The phrase נִשְׂא פָּנִים, πρόσωπον λαμβάνειν, signifies elsewhere to receive the countenance, i.e. the appearance and the impression of a man, i.e. to let it impress one favourably; here it is used of the כִּפּוּר, i.e. the means by which covering, i.e. non-punishment, pardon of the crime, impunity of the guilty, is obtained. Regarding אָבָה, to consent to, vid. at i. 10. שָׁחַד, Aram. שָׁחַד, is a gift, particularly bribery. That the language may again finally assume the form of an address, it beautifully rounds itself off.

THIRTEENTH INTRODUCTORY MASHAL DISCOURSE, VII.

WARNING AGAINST ADULTERY BY THE REPRESENTATION OF ITS ABHORRENT AND DETESTABLE NATURE AS SEEN IN AN EXAMPLE.

The fearful desolation which adultery, and in general the sin of uncleanness, occasions in the life of the individual who is guilty of it, as well as in society, does not suffer the author of this discourse, directed to youth, to abandon his theme, which he has already treated of under different aspects. He takes up his warning once more, strengthens it by an example he himself had witnessed of one who fell a sacrifice to this sin, and gives it a very impressive conclusion, ver. 24 ff.

The introduction first counsels in general to a true appreciation of these well-considered life-rules of wisdom.

- 1 My son, keep my words,
And treasure up my commandments with thee.
- 2 Keep my commandments, and thou shalt live;
And my instruction as the apple of thine eye.
- 3 Wind them about thy fingers,
Write them on the tablet of thy heart.

The LXX. has after ver. 1 another distich; but it here disturbs the connection. Regarding  $\text{עֲצֵי}$ , vid. at ii. 1;  $\text{אֶתֶּר}$  refers, as there, to the sphere of one's own character, and that subjectively. Regarding the imper.  $\text{וְחַיִּיהָ}$ , which must here be translated according to its sense as a conclusion, because it comes in between the objects governed by  $\text{שִׁבְרֵי}$ , vid. at iv. 4. There  $\text{וְחַיִּיהָ}$  is punctuated with Silluk; here, according to Kimchi (Michlol 125a), with Segol-Athnach,  $\text{וְחַיִּיהָ}$ , as in the Cod. Erfurt. 2 and 3, and in the editions of Athias and Clodius, so that the word belongs to the class  $\text{פְּתוּחַ בְּאֶתְנַחַם}$  (with short instead of long vowel by the pausal accent): no reason for this is to be perceived, especially as (iv. 4) the Tsere ( $\text{e}$  from  $\text{aj}$ ) which is characteristic of the imper. remains unchanged. Regarding  $\text{אִישׁוֹן הָעַיִן}$ , Arab. insân el-'ain, the little man of the eye, i.e. the apple of the eye, named from the miniature portrait of him who looks into it being reflected from it, vid. at Ps. xvii. 8; the ending ôn is here diminutive, like Syr. achuno, little brother, bruno, little son, and the like. On ver. 3, vid. at vi. 21, iii. 3. The  $\text{תְּפִלִּין שֶׁל יָד}$ were wound seven times round the left arm and seven times round the middle finger. The writing on the table of the heart may be regarded as referring to Deut. vi. 9 (the Mezuzoth).<sup>1</sup>

Vers. 4, 5. The subject-matter of this earnest warning are the admonitions of the teacher of wisdom, and through him of Wisdom herself, who in contrast to the world and its lust is the worthiest object of love, and deserves to be loved with the purest, sincerest love:

- 4 Say to wisdom: "Thou art my sister!"
And call understanding "Friend;"
5 That they may keep thee from the strange woman,
From the stranger who useth smooth words.

The childlike, sisterly, and friendly relationship serves also to picture forth and designate the intimate confidential relationship to natures and things which are not flesh and blood. If in Arabic the poor is called the brother of poverty, the trustworthy the brother of trustworthiness, and abu, um (אב, אִמ), achu, ucht, are used in manifold ways as the expression for the interchangeable relation between two ideas; so (as also, notwithstanding Ewald, § 273*b*, in many Hebr. proper names) that has there become national, which here, as at Job xvii. 14, xxx. 29, mediated by the connection of the thoughts, only first appears as a poetic venture. The figurative words of ver. 4 not merely lead us to think of wisdom as a personal existence of a higher order, but by this representation it is itself brought so near, that אִשָּׁת easily substitutes itself, ii. 3, in the place of אִשָּׁת. אִשָּׁת of Solomon's address to the bride brought home is in its connection compared with Book of Wisdom viii. 2. While the óth of חֵן by no means arises from abstr. úth, but achóth is derived from achajath, אַחַיָּת (as Ruth ii. 1, cf. אַחַיָּת, iii. 2), here by Mugrash אַחַיָּת, properly means acquaintance, and then the person known, but not in the superficial sense in which this word and the Arab. ma'arafat are used (e.g. in the Arabic phrase quoted by Fleischer, kunna ašhaab šarna m'arafat—nous étions amis, nous en sommes plus que de simples connaissances), but in the sense of familiar, confidential alliance. The inf. אִשָּׁתְךָ does not need for its explanation some intermediate thought to be introduced: quod eo conducet tibi ut (Mich.), but connects itself immediately as the purpose: bind wisdom to thyself and thyself to wisdom thus closely that thou mayest therewith guard thyself. As for the rest, vid. ii. 16; this verse repeats itself here with the variation of one word.

How necessary it is for the youth to guard himself by the help of wisdom against the enticements of the wanton woman, the author now shows by a reference to his own observation.

6 For through the window of my house,
From behind the lattice I looked out;

7 Then saw I among the simple ones, Discerned among the young people, a youth devoid of understanding.

וַיִּרְאֶה refers indeed to the immediately following clause, yet it actually opens up the whole following exemplification. The connection with ver. 5 would be closer if instead of the extended Semitic construction it were said: nam quum . . . prospicerem vidi, etc. חַלֹּץ (from חָלַץ, to bore through) is properly a place where the wall is bored through. נֶשֶׁת (from נָשַׁת = Arab. shaniba, to be agreeable, cool, fresh) is the window-lattice or lattice-window, i.e. lattice for drawing down and raising up, which keeps off the rays of the sun. אָרַחֵם signifies primarily to make oneself long in order to see, to stretch up or out the neck and the head, καρδοκεῖν, Arab. atall, atal'a, and tatall'a of things, imminere, to overtop, to project, to jut in; cf. Arab. askaf of the ostrich, long and bent, with respect to the neck stretching it up, sakaf, abstr. crooked length. And בָּעֵר is thus used, as in Arab. duna, but not b'ad, is used: so placed, that one in relation to the other obstructs the avenue to another person or thing: "I looked forth from behind the lattice-window, i.e. with respect to the persons or things in the room, standing before the lattice-window, and thus looking out into the open air" (Fleischer). That it was far in the night, as we learn at ver. 9, does not contradict this looking out; for apart from the moon, and especially the lighting of the streets, there were star-lit nights, and to see what the narrator saw there was no night of Egyptian darkness. But because it was night 6a is not to be translated: I looked about among those devoid of experience (thus e.g. Löwenstein); but he saw among these, observed among the youths, who thus late amused themselves without, a young man whose want of understanding was manifest from what further happened. Bertheau: that I might see, is syntactically impossible. The meaning of אָרַחֵם is not determined by the

אֲבִינָה following, but conversely אֲבִינָה stands under the operation of ׀ (= אֲבִינָה, Neh. xiii. 7), characterizing the historic aorist. Regarding פְּתִי, vid. at i. 4. פְּתִי is the masc. of בְּנוֹת, Arab. benât in the meaning maiden. פְּתִי has in correct texts, according to the rules of the accents, the ׀ raphatum.<sup>1</sup>

Now follows, whither he saw the young fop [Laffen] then go in the darkness.

- 8 Going up and down the street near her corner,
 And he walked along the way to her house,
 9 In the twilight, when the day declined,
 In the midst of the night and deep darkness.

We may interpret לֵבַר as appos.: juvenem amentem, ambulantem, or as the predicate accus.: vidi juvenem . . . ambulantem; for that one may so express himself in Hebrew (cf. e.g. Isa. vi. 1, Dan. viii. 7), Hitzig unwarrantably denies. The passing over of the part. into the finite, 8*b*, is like ii. 14, 17, and that of the inf. i. 27, ii. 8. שֹׁק, Arab. suk (dimin. suweika, to separate, from sikkat, street, alley), still means, as in former times, a broad street, a principal street, as well as an open place, a market-place where business is transacted, or according to its etymon: where cattle are driven for sale. On the street he went backwards and forwards, yet so that he kept near to her corner (i.e. of the woman whom he waited for), i.e. he never withdrew himself far from the corner of her house, and always again returned to it. The corner is named, because from that place he could always cast a look over the front of the house to see whether she whom he waited for showed herself. Regarding פְּתִי for פְּתִי, vid. at Ps. xxvii. 5: a primary form פִּת has never been in use; פְּתִי, Zech. xiv. 10, is plur. of פְּתִי. אֲצֵל (from אֲצֵל, Arab. wasl, to bind) is, as a substantive, the side (as the place where one thing connects itself with another), and thus as a preposition it means (like juxta jungere) beside, Ital. allato. וְרַף is the object. accus., for thus are construed verbs eundi (e.g. Hab. iii. 12, Num. xxx. 17, cf. xxi. 22).

Ver. 9. The designations of time give the impression of progress to a climax; for Hitzig unwarrantably denies that נֶשֶׁף means the twilight; the Talmud, Berachoth 3*b*, correctly distinguishes חַרְי two twilights, the evening and the morning twilight. But the idea is not limited to this narrow sense, and does not need this, since the root-word  $\text{לָשָׁף}$  (vid. at Isa. xl. 24) permits the extension of the idea to the whole of the cool half (evening and night) of the entire day; cf. the parallel of the adulterer who veils himself by the darkness of the night and by a mask on his countenance, Job xxiv. 15 with Jer. xiii. 16. However, the first group of synonyms,  $\text{בַּעֲרֵב יוֹם בְּנֹשֶׁף בְּעֵרְבֵי יוֹם}$  (with the Cod. Frankf. 1294, to be thus punctuated), as against the second, appears to denote an earlier period of the second half of the day; for if one reads, with Hitzig,  $\text{בַּעֲרֵב יוֹם}$  (after Judg. xix. 9), the meaning remains the same as with  $\text{בַּעֲרֵב יוֹם}$ , viz. advesperascente die (Jerome), for  $\text{עֲרַב}$  = Arab. gharab, means to go away, and particularly to go under, of the sun, and thus to become evening. He saw the youth in the twilight, as the day had declined (κέκλικεν, Luke xxiv. 29), going backwards and forwards; and when the darkness of night had reached its middle, or its highest point, he was still in his lurking-place.  $\text{אֵיֶשֶׁן לַיְלָה}$ , apple of the eye of the night, is, like the Pers. dili sheb, heart of the night, the poetic designation of the middle of the night. Gusset incorrectly: crepusculum in quo sicut in oculi pupilla est nigredo sublustris et quasi mistura lucis ac tenebrarum.  $\text{אֵיֶשֶׁן}$  is, as elsewhere  $\text{לֵב}$ , particularly the middle; the application to the night was specially suitable, since the apple of the eye is the black part in the white of the eye (Hitzig). It is to be translated according to the accus., in pupilla noctis et caligine (not caliginis); and this was probably the meaning of the poet, for a  $\text{כ}$  is obviously to be supplied to  $\text{אֵיֶשֶׁן}$ .

Finally, the young man devoid of understanding sees his waiting rewarded: like meets like.

- 10 And, lo, a woman coming to meet him,
In the attire of an harlot and of subtle heart.
11 Boisterous is she, and ungovernable;
Her feet have no rest in her own house.
12 At one time before her door, at another in the street,
And again at every corner she places herself on the watch.

“Ver. 12 (Hitzig) expresses what is wont to be, instead of a single event, ver. 11, viz. the custom of a street harlot. But she who is spoken of is not such an one; lurking is not applicable to her (cf. Job xxxi. 9), and, ver. 11, it is not meant that she is thus inclined.” But Hitzig’s rendering of ver. 11, “she was boisterous . . . in her house her feet had no rest,” is inaccurate, since neither  $\text{אֵיֶשֶׁן}$  nor  $\text{שָׁכַן}$  is used. Thus in vers. 11 and 12 the poet gives a characteristic of the woman, introduced by וְהִנֵּה into the frame of his picture, which goes beyond that which then presented itself to his eyes. We must with ver. 12 reject also ver. 11; and even that would not be a radical improvement, since that characteristic lying behind the evident, that which was then evident begins with וַיִּצְרָת לֵב (and subtle in heart). We must thus suppose that the woman was not unknown to the observer here describing her. He describes her first as she then appeared. וְשִׁית Hitzig regards as equivalent to וְשִׁיחַ, similitude (from שָׁח), and why? Because וְשִׁית does not mean "to lay against," but "to place." But Ex. xxxiii. 4 shows the contrary, and justifies the meaning attire, which the word also has in Ps. lxxiii. 6. Meiri less suitably compares 2 Kings ix. 30, but rightly explains תָּקַן (dressing, ornament), and remarks that וְשִׁית elliptical is equivalent to בְּשִׂית. It is not the nominative (Bertheau), but the accusative, as תְּבִיחַ, Ps. cxliv. 12, Ewald, § 279*d*. How Hitzig reaches the translation of וַיִּצְרָת לֵב by "and an arrow in her heart" (et saucia corde<sup>1</sup>), one can only understand by reading his commentary. The usage of the language, iv. 23, he remarks, among other things, would stamp her as a virtuous person. As if a phrase like לֵב צָר could be used both sensu bono and sensu malo! One can guard his heart when he protects it carefully against moral danger, or also when he purposely conceals that which is in it. The part. צָרִי signifies, Isa. i. 8, besieged (blockaded), Ezek. xvi. 12, protected, guarded, and Isa. xlvi. 6, lxv. 4, concealed, hidden. Ewald, § 187*b*, refers these three significations in the two passages in Isaiah and in the passage before us to צָרִי, Niph. צָרִי (as צָרִי); but (1) one would then more surely take צָרִי (cf. צָרִי, נִמּוּל) as the verbal stem; (2) one reaches the idea of the concealed (the hidden) easier from that of the preserved than from that of the confined. As one says in Lat. homo occultus, tectus, abstrusus, in the sense of κρυφίσιμος, so it is said of that woman וַיִּצְרָת לֵב, not so much in the sense of retenta cor, h.e. quæ quod in corde haberet non pandebat, Fr. retenue (Cocc.), as in the sense of custodita cor, quæ intentionem cordis mentemque suam callide novit premere (Mich.): she is of a hidden mind, of a concealed nature; for she feigns fidelity to her husband and flatters her paramours as her only beloved, while in truth she loves none, and each of them is to her only a means to an end, viz. to the indulgence of her worldly sensual desire. For, as the author further describes her, she is הַמְיָה (fem. of הַמָּה = הַמִּי, as i. 21, Isa. xxii. 2), tumultuosa, externally as internally impetuous, because full of intermingling lust and deceit (opp. ἡσύχως, 1 Pet. iii. 4, 1 Tim. ii. 11), and סָרְרָה, self-willed, not minding the law of duty, of discretion, or of modesty (from סָרַר, Arab. sharr, pervicacem, malum esse). She is the very opposite of the noiseless activity and the gentle modesty of a true house-wife, rude, stubborn, and also vagrant like a beast in its season (Hos. iv. 14): in domo ipsius residere nequeunt pedes ejus; thus not οἰκουρός or οἰκουργός (Tit. ii. 5), far removed from the genuine woman-like εἶσω ἡσυχον μένειν δόμων<sup>1</sup>—a radt, as they call such a one in Arab. (Wünsche on Hos. xii. 1), or as she is called in Aram. נַפְקַת בְּרָא.

Ver. 12. This verse shows how she conducts herself when she wanders abroad. It is no common street-walker who is designated (no “Husterin,” Arab. kahbt, after which also the female demon-name (Arab.) se’alá is explained), but that licentious married wife, who, no better than such a strumpet when she wanders abroad, hunts after lovers. The alternating פָּעַם (properly a stroke) Fleischer compares with the Arab. synonyms, marrt, a going over, karrt, a going back, una volta, una fiata, une fois (Orelli, Synon. der Zeit und Ewigkeit, p. 51). Regarding חָרַץ, vid. at v. 16: it is the free space without, before the house-door, or also before the gate of the city; the parallelism speaks here and at i. 20 more in favour of the former signification.

Ver. 13. After this digression the poet returns to the subject, and further describes the event as observed by himself.

And she laid hold on him and kissed him;
Put on a bold brow and said to him.

The verb נָשַׁק is here, after its primary signification, connected with the dat.: osculum fixit ei. Thus also Gen. xxvii. 26 is construed, and the Dagesh in לוֹ is, as there, Dag. forte conj., after the law for which the national grammarians have coined the technical name אָחִי מֵרַחֵק (veniens e longinquo, “coming out of the distance,” i.e. the attraction of a word following by one accented on the penult.). The penult.-accenting of נָשַׁקָה is the consequence of the retrogression of the accent (נִסְתָּה אָחִיר), which here, where the word from the first had the penult. only with Metheg, and thus with half-a tone, brings with it the dageshing of the לוֹ following, as the original penultima-accenting of וְהִזְיִקָהּ does of the בו which follows it, for the reading בֹּ by Löwenstein is contrary to the laws of punctuation of the Textus receptus under consideration here.<sup>1</sup> As בו and לו have received the doubling Dagesh, so on the other hand, according to Ewald, § 193*b*, it has disappeared from הִזְיִקָה (written with Raphe according to Kimchi, Michlol 145*a*). And as נִשְׁקָה has the tone thrown back, so the proper pausal וְהִזְיִקָהּ is accented on the ult., but without attracting the לו following by dageshing, which is the case only when the first of the two words terminates in the sound of ā (āh). הִזְיִן פִּינִי is said of one who shows firmness or hardness of countenance (Arab. slabt alwajh), i.e. one who shows shamelessness, or, as we say, an iron forehead (Fl.).

She laid hold on him and kissed him, both of which actions were shameless, and then, assuming the passivity and modesty befitting the woman, and disregarding morality and the law, she said to the youth :

- 14 "To bring peace-offerings was binding upon me,
To-day have I redeemed my vows.
15 Therefore am I come out to meet thee,
To seek thy face, and have found thee."

We have translated שְׁלָמִים וְזָבַח "peace-offerings," proceeding on the principle that שָׁלַם (sing. only Amos v. 22, and on the Phœnician altar at Marseilles) denotes contracting friendship with one (from שָׁלַם, to hold friendly relationship), and then the gifts having this in view; for the idea of this kind of offering is the attestation and confirmation of communion with God. But in view of the derivatives שְׁלָמְנִים and שְׁלָמִים, it is perhaps more appropriate to combine שָׁלַם with שָׁלַם, to discharge perfectly, and to translate it thank-payment-offering, or with v. Hofmann, a due-offering, where not directly thank-offering; for the proper eucharistic offering, which is the expression of thanks on a particular occasion, is removed from the species of the Shelamim by the addition of the words עֲלֵת־תּוֹרָה (Lev. vii. 12–25). The characteristic of the Shelamim is the division of the flesh of the sacrifice between Jahve and His priests on the one side, and the person (or persons) bringing it on the other side: only one part of the flesh of the sacrifice was Jahve's, consumed by fire (Lev. iii. 16); the priests received one part; those who brought the offering received back another part as it were from the altar of God, that they might eat it with holy joy along with their household. So here the adulteress says that there was binding upon her, in consequence of a vow she had taken, the duty of presenting peace-offerings, or offerings that were due; to-day (she reckons the day in the sense of the dies civilis from night to night) she has performed her duties, and the נָרַר שְׁלֵמִי have yielded much to her that she might therewith regale him, her true lover; for with עַל־פָּנָיו she means to say that even the prospect of the gay festival which she can prepare for him moved her thus to meet him. This address of the woman affords us a glimpse into the history of the customs of those times. The Shelamim meals degenerated in the same manner as our Kirmen.<sup>1</sup> Secularization lies doubly near to merrymaking when the law sanctions this, and it can conceal itself behind the mask of piety. Regarding שָׁחַר, a more exact word for שִׁבְעָשׁוּ, vid. at i. 28. To seek the countenance of one is equivalent to to seek his person, himself, but yet not without reference to the wished-for look [aspectus] of the person.

Thus she found him, and described to him the enjoyment which awaited him in eating and drinking, then in the pleasures of love.

- 16 " My bed have I spread with cushions,
 Variegated coverlets, Egyptian linen;
 17 I have sprinkled my couch
 With myrrh, aloes, and cinnamon.
 18 Come then, we will intoxicate ourselves with love till the morning,
 And will satisfy ourselves in love."

The noun עָרֵשׁ, from עָרַשׁ, = Arab. 'arash, ædificare, fabricari, signifies generally the wooden frame; thus not so much the bed within as the erected bed-place (cf. Arab. 'arsh, throne, and 'arysh, harbour). This bedstead she had richly and beautifully cushioned, that it might be soft and agreeable. רָבַר, from רָבַ, signifies to lay on or apply closely, thus either vincire (whence the name of the necklace, Gen. xli. 42) or sternere (different from רָפַר, Job xvii. 13, which acquires the meaning sternere from the root-meaning to raise up from under, sublevare), whence מְרִבָּרִים, cushions, pillows, stragulæ. Böttcher punctuates מְרִבָּרִים incorrectly; the ב remains aspirated, and the connection of the syllables is looser than in מְרִבָּה, Ewald, § 88d. The הַמְּבֹרָה beginning the second half-verse is in no case an adjective to מְרִבָּרִים, in every case only appos., probably an independent conception; not derived from חֲטָה (cogn. חֲטָה), to hew wood (whence Arab. ḥatab, fire-wood), according to which Kimchi, and with him the Græc. Venet. (περιξυστρούς), understands it of the carefully polished bed-poles or bed-boards, but from חֲטָה = Arab. khateba, to be streaked, of diverse colours (vid. under Ps. cxliv. 12), whence the Syriac machtabto, a figured (striped, checkered) garment. Hitzig finds the idea of coloured or variegated here unsuitable, but without justice; for the pleasantness of a bed is augmented not only by its softness, but also by the impression which its costliness makes on the eye. The following חֲטָה מְצִירָה stands in an appositional relation to חֲטָה, as when one says in Arabic taub-un dībāg'-un, a garment brocade = of brocade. חֲטָה (after the Syr. for חֲטָה, as חֲטָה) signifies in the Targum the cord (e.g. Jer. xxxviii. 6), like the Arab. tunub, Syr. (e.g. Isa. liv. 2) túnob; the root is ט, not in the sense of to bind, to wind (Dietr.), but in the sense of to stretch; the thread or cord is named from the extension in regard to length, and חֲטָה is thus thread-work, whether in weaving or spinning.<sup>1</sup> The fame of Egyptian manufactures is still expressed in the Spanish aclabtea, fine linen cloth, which is equivalent to the modern Arabic el-kobtije (kibtije); they had there particularly also an intimate acquaintance with the dye stuffs found in the plants and fossils of the country (Klemm's Culturgeschichte, v. 308-310).

Vers. 17, 18. These verses remind us of expressions in the Canticles. There, at iv. 14, are found the three names for spicery as here, and one sees that חֲטָה מְצִירָה are not to be connected genitively: there are three things, accented as in the title-verse i. 3. The myrrh, חֲטָה (Balsamodendron myrrha), belongs, like the frankincense, to the species of the Amyris, which is an exotic in Palestine not less than with us; the aromatic quality in them does not arise from the flowers or leaves, so that Cant. i. 13 leads us to think of a bunch of myrrh, but from the resin oozing through the bark (Gummi myrrhæ or merely myrrha), consisting of bright glossy red or golden-yellow grains more or less transparent. חֲטָה מְצִירָה (used by Balaam, Num. xxiv. 6) is the Semitic Old-Indian name of the aloë, agaru or aguru; the aromatic quality is in the wood of the Aquilaria agallocha, especially its root (agallochum or lignum aloes) dried in the earth,—in more modern use and commerce the inspissated juice of its leaves. קַנְמֹן is κιννάμωμον (like כַּר, a Semitic word<sup>1</sup> that had come to the Greeks through the Phœnicians), the cinnamon, i.e. the inner rind of the Laurus cinnamomum. The myrrh is native to Arabia; the aloë, as its name denotes, is Indian; the cinnamon in like manner came through Indian travellers from the east coast of Africa and Ceylon (Taprobane). All these three spices are drugs, i.e. are dry apothecaries' wares; but we are not on that account to conclude that she perfumed (Hitzig) her bed with spices, viz. burnt in a censer, an operation which, according to Cant. iii. 6, would rather be designated קַטְרֵרְתִי. The verb נָחַ (only here as Kal) signifies to lift oneself up (vid. under Ps. xlviii. 13), and transitively to raise and swing hither and thither (= תְּנִיחֵהוּ); here with a double accusative, to besprinkle anything out of a vessel moved hither and thither. According to this sense, we must think of the three aromas as essences in the state of solution; cf. Ex. xxx. 22–33, Esth. ii. 12. Hitzig's question, "Who would sprinkle bed-sheets with perfumed and thus impure water?" betrays little knowledge of the means by which even at the present day clean linen is made fragrant. The expression רָחַץ רֹדִים sounds like שָׁכַר רֹדִים, Cant. v. 1, although there רֹדִים is probably the voc., and not, as here, the accus.; רָחַץ is the Kal of רָחַץ, v. 19, and signifies to drink something copiously in full draughts. The verbal form עָלַץ for עָלַץ is found besides only in Job xx. 18, xxxix. 13; the Hithpa. signifies to enjoy oneself greatly, perhaps (since the Hithpa. is sometimes used reciprocally, vid. under Gen. ii. 25) with the idea of reciprocity (Targ. חָדַר לְחָדַר). We read bo'habim with Chateph-Kametz after Ben-Asher (vid. Kimchi's Lex.); the punctuation בְּאַהֲבִים is that of Ben-Naphtali.

The adulteress now deprives the youth of all fear; the circumstances under which her invitation is given are as favourable as possible.

19 " For the man is not at home,
He has gone on a long journey.

<sup>1</sup> Myrrh has its name כַּר from the bitterness of its taste, and קַנְמֹן appears to be a secondary formation from קַנְה, whence קַנְה, reed; cf. the names of the cinnamon, cannella, Fr. cannelle. Cinnamum (κιννάμωμον) is only a shorter form for cinnamomum. Pliny, Hist. Nat. xii. 19 (42), uses both forms indiscriminately.

- 20 He has taken the purse with him ;
He will not return home till the day of the full moon."

It is true that the article stands in  $\text{וְאִישׁ}$ , Arab. alm'ar-fat, i.e. serves to define the word : the man, to whom here κατ' ἑξοχῆν and alone reference can be made, viz. the husband of the adulteress (Fl.) ; but on the other side it is characteristic that she does not say  $\text{אִישִׁי}$  (as e.g. Gen. xxix. 32), but ignores the relation of love and duty in which she is placed to him, and speaks of him as one standing at a distance from her (Aben-Ezra). Erroneously Vogel reads  $\text{בְּבֵית}$  after the Targ. instead of  $\text{בְּבֵיתוֹ}$ . We say in Hebr.  $\text{אֵינוּ בְּבֵיתוֹ}$ , il n'est pas chez soi, as we say  $\text{לָקַח בְּיָדוֹ}$ , il a pris avec soi (cf. Jer. xxxviii. 10).  $\text{מְרֻחָק}$  Hitzig seeks to connect with the verb, which, after Isa. xvii. 13, xxii. 3, is possible ; for the Hebr.  $\text{מְרֻחָק}$  ( $\text{מִמְרֻחָק}$ ), far off, has frequently the meaning from afar, for the measure of length is determined not from the point of departure outward, but from the end, as e.g. Homer, Il. ii. 456 : ἔκαθεν δέ τε φαίνεται ἀνγῆ, from afar the gleam is seen, i.e. shines hither from the distance. Similarly we say in French, il vient du côté du nord, he comes from the north, as well as il va du côté du nord, he goes northwards. But as we do not say : he has gone on a journey far off, but : on a distant journey, so here  $\text{מְרֻחָק}$  is virtually an adj. (vid. under Isa. v. 26) equivalent to  $\text{רְחוֹקָה}$  (Num. ix. 10) : a journey which is distant = such as from it he has a long way back. Michaelis has well remarked here : ut timorem ei penitus adimat, veluti per gradus incedit. He has undertaken a journey to a remote point, but yet more : he has taken money with him, has thus business to detain him ; and still further : he has even determined the distant time of his return.  $\text{צִרְוֹרֵה־כֶּסֶף}$  (thus to be written after Ben-Asher, vid. Baer's Torath Emeth, p. 41) is the purse (from  $\text{צָרַר}$ , to bind together), not one of many, but that which is his own. The terminus precedes 20b to emphasize the lateness ; vid. on  $\text{כָּסָא}$  under Ps. lxxxi. 4. Græc. Venet. τῆ ἡμέρᾳ τοῦ καιροῦ, after Kimchi and others, who derive  $\text{כָּסָא}$  (כסא) from the root  $\text{כָּס}$ , to reckon, and regard it as denoting only a definite time. But the two passages require a special idea ; and the Syr. késo, which in 1 Kings xii. 32, 2 Chron. vii. 10, designates the time from the 15th day of the month, shows that the word denotes not, according to the Talmud, the new moon (or the new year's day), when the moon's disk begins to cover itself, i.e. to fill ( $\text{יִתְכַסֶּה}$ ), but the full moon, when it is covered, i.e. filled ; so that thus the time of the night-scene here described is not that of the last quarter of the moon (Ewald), in which it rises at midnight, but that of the new moon (Hitzig), when the night is without moonlight. Since the derivation of the word from כָּסָה (כַּסָּה), to cover, gives the satisfactory idea of the covering or filling of the moon's disk, we do not seek after any other; Dietrich fixes on the root-idea of roundness, and Hitzig of vision (כָּסָה = כַּסָּה, שָׁכַח; vid., on the contrary, under Ps. cxliii. 9). The ל is that of time at which, in which, about which, anything is done; it is more indefinite than אָ would be. He will not return for some fourteen days.

The result:—

- 21 She beguiled him by the fulness of her talking,
By the smoothness of her lips she drew him away.

Here is a climax. First she brought him to yield, overcoming the resistance of his mind to the last point (cf. 1 Kings xi. 3); then drove him, or, as we say, hurried him wholly away, viz. from the right path or conduct (cf. Deut. xiii. 6, 11). With הִפְתִּיחוּ (= הִפְתְּחוּ) as the chief factum, the past imperf. is interchanged, 21b. Regarding לָקַח, see above, p. 56. Here is the rhetoric of sin (Zöckler); and perhaps the לָקַח of 20a has suggested this antiphrastic לָקַח to the author (Hitzig), as חָלַק (the inverted לָקַח, formed like שָׁפַל, which is the abstr. of שָׁפַל as that is of חָלַק) and תְּהִיחֲוֶנּוּ are reciprocally conditioned, for the idea of the slippery (Ps. lxxiii. 18) connects itself with חָלַק.

What followed:—

- 22 So he goes after her at once
As an ox which goeth to the slaughter-house,
And as one bereft of reason to the restraint of fetters,
23 As a bird hastens to the net,
Without knowing that his life is at stake—
Till the arrow pierces his liver.

The part. הִלִּיךְ (thus to be accentuated according to the rule in Baer's Torath Emeth, p. 25, with Mercha to the tone-syllable and Mahpach to the preceding open syllable) preserves the idea of the fool's going after her. מִתְחַלֵּם (suddenly) fixes the point, when he all at once resolves to betake himself to the rendezvous in the house of the adulteress, now a κεκρωθεις, as the LXX. translates, i.e., as we say, a simpleton who has gone on the lime-twig. He follows her as an ox goes to the slaughter-house, unconscious that he is going thither to be slaughtered; the LXX. ungrammatically destroying the attributive clause: ὡςπερ δὲ βοῦς ἐπὶ σφαγῆν ἄγεται. The difficulties in וּבְעֶבֶם (thus punctuated, after Kimchi, with a double Segol, and not וּבְעָבִים, as is frequently the case) multiply, and it is not to be reconciled with the traditional text. The ox appears to require another beast as a side-piece; and accordingly the LXX., Syr., and Targ. find in עֶבֶם a dog (to which from אֵיל they also pick out אֵיל, a stag), Jerome a lamb (et quasi agnus בְּבֶשֶׁת), Rashi a venomous serpent (perhaps after ἔχιδνα?), Löwenstein and Malbim a rattlesnake (נָחָשׁ מְעִילָה after עֶבֶם); but all this is mere conjecture. Symmachus' σκυρτῶν (ἐπὶ δεσμῶν ἄφρων) is without support, and, like the favourite rendering of Schelling, et sicut saliens in vinculum cervus (אֵיל), is unsuitable on account of the unsemitic position of the words. The noun עֶבֶם, plur. עֶבְסִים, signifies, Isa. iii. 18, an anklet as a female ornament (whence ver. 16 the denom. עֶבַס, to make a tinkling of the anklets). In itself the word only means the fetter, compes, from עָבַם, Arab. 'akas, 'akashi, contrahere, constringere (vid. Fleischer under Isa. lix. 5); and that it can also be used of any kind of means of checking free movement, the Arab. 'ikās, as the name of a cord with which the camel is made fast by the head and forefeet, shows. With this signification the interpretation is: et velut pedicā (= וּבְעֶבֶם) implicatus ad castigationem stulti, he follows her as if (bound) with a fetter to the punishment of the fool, i.e. of himself (Michaelis, Fleischer, and others). Otherwise Luther, who first translated "in a fetter," but afterwards (supplying לָ, not דָ): "and as if to fetters, where one corrects fools." But the ellipsis is harsh, and the parallelism leads us to expect a living being in the place of עֶבֶם. Now since, according to Gesenius, עֶבֶם, fetter, can be equivalent to a fettered one neither at Isa. xvii. 5, xxi. 17, nor Prov. xxiii. 28 (according to which עֶבֶם must at least have an active personal signification), we transpose the nouns of the clause and write וּבְאֵיל אֶלְמִסֵּר עֶבֶם, he follows her as a fool (Psychol. p. 292) to correction (restraint) with fetters; or if אֵיל is to be understood not so much physically as morally, and refers to self-destroying conduct (Ps. cvii. 7): as a madman, i.e. a criminal, to chains. The one figure denotes the fate into which he rushes, like a beast devoid of reason, as the loss of life; and the other denotes the fate to which he permits himself to be led by that woman, like a criminal by the officer, as the loss of freedom and of honour.

Ver. 23. The confusion into which the text has fallen is continued in this verse. For the figure of the deadly arrow connects itself neither with that of the ox which goes to the slaughter-house, nor with that of the madman who is put in chains: the former is not killed by being shot; and with the latter, the object is to render him harmless, not to put him to death. The LXX. therefore converts לוי אױל into לױא, a stag, and connects the shooting with an arrow with this: ἡ ὡς ἔλαφος τοξέυματι πεπληγῶς εἰς τὸ ἦπαρ. But we need no encroachment on the text itself, only a correct placing of its members. The three thoughts, ver. 23, reach a right conclusion and issue, if with אֶל־פֶּחַי צִפּוֹר כְּבָרָה (here Merchamahpach) a new departure is begun with a comparison: he follows her with eager desires, like as a bird hastens to the snare (vid. regarding פֶּחַ, a snare, and שְׂרָפָה, a noose, under Isa. viii. 15). What then follows is a continuation of 22a. The subject is again the youth, whose way is compared to that of an ox going to the slaughter, of a culprit in chains, and of a fool; and he knows not (non novit, as iv. 19, ix. 18, and according to the sense, non curat, iii. 6, v. 6) that it is done at the risk of his life (שֶׁבֶט־חַיִּים as 1 Kings ii. 23, Num. xvii. 3), that his life is the price with which this kind of love is bought (נֶחֱמָה, neut., as not merely Eccles. ii. 1 and the like, but also e.g. Lev. x. 3, Esth. ix 1)—that does not concern him till (עַד = עַד אִשֶּׁר or עַד כִּי) the arrow breaks or pierces through (פָּקַע as Job. xvi. 13) his liver, i.e. till he receives the death-wound, from which, if not immediately, yet at length he certainly dies. Elsewhere the part of the body struck with a deadly wound is called the reins or loins (Job, etc.), or the gall-bladder (Job xx. 25); here the liver, which is called כְּבֵד, Arab. kebid, perhaps as the organ in which sorrowful and painful affections make themselves felt (cf. Æschylus, Agam. 801: δῆγμα λύπης ἐφ' ἦπαρ προσκνεῖται), especially the latter, because the passion of sensual love, according to the idea of the ancients, reflected itself in the liver. He who is love-sick has jecur ulcerosum (Horace, Od. i. 25. 15); he is diseased in his liver (Psychol. p. 268). But the arrow is not here the arrow of love which makes love-sick, but the arrow of death, which slays him who is ensnared in sinful love. The befooled youth continues the disreputable relation into which he has entered till it terminates in adultery and in lingering disease upon his body, remorse in his soul, and dishonour to his name, speedily ending in inevitable ruin both spiritually and temporally.

Vers. 24, 25. With וְעַתָּה, as at v. 7, the author now brings his narrative to a close, adding the exhortation deduced from it:

- 24 And now, ye children, give ear unto me,
And observe the words of my mouth!
25 Let not thine heart incline to her ways,
And stray not in her paths.

The verb שָׁטָה (whence jēst, like jēt, iv. 15, with long ē from i) the author uses also of departure from a wicked way (iv. 15); but here, where the portraiture of a faithless wife (a סוֹטָה) is presented, the word used in the law of jealousy, Num. v., for the trespass of an אִשָּׁה אֲשֶׁר אֵינָהּ is specially appropriate. שָׁטָה is interchanged with פָּעָה (cf. Gen. xxi. 14): wander not on her paths, which would be the consequence of straying on them. Theodotion: καὶ μὴ πλανηθῆς ἐν ἀτραποῖς αὐτῆς, with καὶ, as also Syr., Targ., and Jerome. The Masora reckons this verse to the 25 which have לָא at the beginning and וְאֵל at the middle of each clause (vid. Baer in the Luth. Zeitschrift, 1865, p. 587); the text of Norzi has therefore correctly וְאֵל, which is found also in good MSS. (e.g. the Erfurt, 2 and 3).

Vers. 26, 27. The admonition, having its motive in that which goes before, is now founded on the emphatic finale:

- 26 For many are the slain whom she hath caused to fall,
And many are her slain.
27 A multiplicity of ways to hell is her house,
Going down to the chambers of death.

The translation "for many slain has she laid low" (Syr., Targ., Jerome, Luther) is also syntactically possible; for רַבִּים can be placed before its substantive after the manner of the demonstratives and numerals (e.g. Neh. ix. 28, cf. אָחַד, Cant. iv. 9), and the accentuation which requires two servants (the usual two Munachs) to the Athnach appears indeed thus to construe it. It is otherwise if רַבִּים here meant magni (thus e.g. Ralbag, and recently Bertheau), and not multi; but רַבִּים and עַצְמִים stand elsewhere in connection with each other in the signification many and numerous, Ps. xxxv. 18, Joel ii. 2, Mic. iv. 3. "Her slain" are those slain by her; the part. pass. is connected with the genitive of the actor, e.g. ix. 18; cf. (Arab.) katyl almhabbt, of one whom love kills (Fl.). With ver. 27 cf. ii. 18, ix. 18. In 27a, בֵּיתָהּ is not equivalent to בֵּיתָהּ after viii. 2, also not elliptical and equivalent to דַּרְכֵי בֵּיתָהּ; the former is unnecessary, the latter is in no case established by Ps.

xlv. 7, Ezra x. 13, nor by Deut. viii. 15, 2 Kings xxiii. 17 (see, on the other hand, Philippi's Status Constructus, pp. 87-93). Rightly Hitzig has: her house forms a multiplicity of ways to hell, in so far as adultery leads by a diversity of ways to hell. Similarly the subject and the predicate vary in number, xvi. 25, Ps. cx. 3, Job xxvi. 13, Dan. ix. 23, and frequently. If one is once in her house, he may go in this or in that way, but surely his path is to destruction: it consists of many steps to hell, such as lead down (רִדָּה, fem. Isa. xxxvii. 34, masc. Isa. xxx. 21) to the extreme depths of death (cf. Job ix. 9, "chambers of the south" = its remotest regions veiling themselves in the invisible); for הָרָרָה (Arab. khiddr) is the part of the tent or the house removed farthest back, and the most private (Fl.). These חֲרִירֵי שְׂאוֹל, cf. עֲמָקֵי שְׂאוֹל, ix. 18, approach to the conception of גִּיהֶנֶם, which is afterwards distinguished from שְׂאוֹל.

FOURTEENTH INTRODUCTORY MASHAL DISCOURSE, VIII.

A DISCOURSE OF WISDOM CONCERNING HER EXCELLENCE AND HER GIFTS.

The author has now almost exhausted the ethical material; for in this introduction to the Solomonic Book of Proverbs he works it into a memorial for youth, so that it is time to think of concluding the circle by bending back the end to the beginning. For as in the beginning, i. 20 ff., so also here in the end, he introduces Wisdom herself as speaking. There, her own testimony is delivered in contrast to the alluring voice of the deceiver; here, the daughter of Heaven in the highways inviting to come to her, is the contrast to the adulteress lurking in the streets, who is indeed not a personification, but a woman of flesh and blood, but yet at the same time as the incarnate ἀπάτη of worldly lust. He places opposite to her Wisdom, whose person is indeed not so sensibly perceptible, but who is nevertheless as real, coming near to men in a human way, and seeking to win them by her gifts.

- 1 Doth not Wisdom discourse,
And Understanding cause her voice to be heard?
- 2 On the top of the high places in the way,
In the midst of the way, she has placed herself.

8 By the side of the gates, at the exit of the city,
At the entrance to the doors, she calleth aloud.

As הַגֵּת points to that which is matter of fact, so הִלֵּל calls to a consideration of it (cf. xiv. 22); the question before the reader is doubly justified with reference to i. 20 ff. With תְּבוּנָה, חֲכָמָה are interchanged, as e.g. ii. 1-6; such names of wisdom are related to its principal name almost as אֱלֹהִים, עֲלִיּוֹן, and the like, to יְהוָה. In describing the scene, the author, as usual, heaps up synonyms which touch one another without coming together.

Ver. 2. By מְרִמִּים Hitzig understands the summit of a mountain, and therefore regards this verse as an interpolation; but the "high places" are to be understood of the high-lying parts of the city. There, on the way which leads up and down, she takes her stand.

עָלִי = עָלִי, old and poetic for עַל, signifies here "hard by, close to," properly, so that something stands forward over the edge of a thing, or, as it were, passes over its borders (Fl.). The גֵּית, Hitzig, as Bertheau, with LXX., Targ., Jerome, interpret prepositionally as a strengthening of בֵּין (in the midst); but where it once, Ezek. i. 27, occurs in this sense, it is fully written לְ גֵית. Here it is the accus. loci of the substantive; "house of the ascent" (Syr. bêth urchotho) is the place where several ways meet, the uniting point, as אֵם הַדֶּרֶךְ (Ezek. xxi. 26), the point of departure, exit; the former the cross-way, as the latter the separating way. Thus Immanuel: the place of the frequented streets; Meiri: the place of the ramification (more correctly, the concentration) of the ways. נִצְבָּה signifies more than רָקָה (she raises herself) and עָמְדָה (she goes thither); it means that she plants herself there.

Ver. 3. In this verse Bertheau finds, not inappropriately, the designations of place: on this side, on that side, and within the gate. לְיָד, at the hand, is equivalent to at the side, as Ps. cxl. 6. לְפִי, of the town, is the same as לְפֶתַח, ix. 14, of the house: at the mouth, i.e. at the entrance of the city, thus where they go out and in. There are several of these ways for leaving and entering a city, and on this account מְבוֹא פְתוּחִים are connected: generally where one goes out and in through one of the gates (doors). מְבוֹא, fully represented by the French avenue, the space or way which leads to anything (Fl.). There she raises her voice, which sounds out far and wide; vid. concerning תִּרְנָה (Græc. Venet. incorrectly, after Rashi, ἀλαλάξουσι), at i. 20.

Now begins the discourse. The exordium summons general attention to it with the emphasis of its absolute truth :

- 4 " To you, ye men, is my discourse addresscd,
And my call is to the children of men !
- 5 Apprehend, O ye simple ones, what wisdom is;
And, ye fools, what understanding is.
- 6 Hear, for I will speak princely things,
And the opening of my lips is upright.
- 7 For my mouth uttereth truth,
And a wicked thing is an abomination to my lips.
- 8 The utterances of my mouth are in rectitude,
There is nothing crooked or perverse in them.
- 9 To the men of understanding they are all to the point,
And plain to those who have attained knowledge."

Hitzig rejects this section, 4-12, as he does several others in viii. and ix., as spurious. But if this preamble, which reminds us of Elihu, is not according to every one's taste, yet in respect of the circle of conception and thought, as well as of the varying development of certain fundamental thoughts, it is altogether after the manner of the poet. The terminology is one that is strange to us; the translation of it is therefore difficult; that which is given above strives at least not to be so bad as to bring discredit on the poet. The tautology and flatness of ver. 4 disappears when one understands  $\text{אֲנִי אֶרְאֶה}$  and  $\text{בְּנֵי אָדָם}$  like the Attic ἄνδρες and ἄνθρωποι; vid. under Isa. ii. 9, liii. 3 (where  $\text{אֲנִי אֶרְאֶה}$ , as here and Ps. cxli. 4, is equivalent to  $\text{בְּנֵי אָדָם}$ , Ps. xlix. 3, iv. 3). Wisdom turns herself with her discourses to high and low, to persons of standing and to the proletariat. The verbal clause 4a interchanges with a noun clause 4b, as frequently a preposition with its noun (e.g. ver. 8a) completes the whole predicate of a semistich (Fl.).

Ver. 5. Regarding  $\text{אֲרָמָה}$ , calliditas, in a good sense, vid. at i. 4; regarding  $\text{פְּתָאִים}$ , those who are easily susceptible of good or bad, according to the influence that is brought to bear upon them, vid. also i. 4; and regarding  $\text{בְּסִילִים}$ , the intellectually heavy, dull persons in whom the flesh burdens the mind, vid. at i. 22.  $\text{בֶּלֶב}$  is parallel with  $\text{עֲרֻמָּה}$ , for the heart (according to its Semitic etymon, that which remains fast, like a kernel, the central-point) is used for the understanding of which it is the seat (Psychol. p. 249), or heartedness = intelligence (cf.  $\text{חֶסֶד לֵב}$ , vi. 32 = ἄνους or ἄλογος). We take  $\text{עֲרֻמָּה}$  and  $\text{לֵב}$  as objective, as we have translated: that which is in both, and in which they consist. Thus  $\text{הִבִּינִי}$ , which is a favourite word with this author, has both times the simple transitive meaning of the gain of understanding into the nature and worth of both; and we neither need to interpret the second הָבִינִי in the double transitive meaning, "to bring to understanding," nor, with Hitzig, to change it into יְהַבִּינִי [direct, i.e. applicate].

Ver. 6. That to which Wisdom invites, her discourse makes practicable, for she speaks of נְיִירִים. Hitzig interprets this word by conspicua, manifest truths, which the Græc. Venet. understands to be ἐναντία, after Kimchi's interpretation: truths which one makes an aim and object (נָגַד) on account of their worth. Fürst, however, says that נָגַד, from נָגַד, Arab. najad, means to be elevated, exalted, and thereby visible (whence also הִנְיִד, to bring to light, to bring forward); and that by נְיִירִים, as the plur. of this נָגַד, is to be understood princeps in the sense of principalia, or præstantia (LXX. σεμνά; Theodot. ἡγεμονικά; Jerome, de rebus magnis) (cf. νόμος βασιλικός of the law of love, which surpasses the other laws, as kings do their subjects), which is supported by the similar expression, xxii. 20. But that we do not need to interpret נְיִירִים as abstr., like מִישָׁרִים, and as the acc. adverb.: in noble ways, because in that case it ought to be נִירֹתָ (Berth.), is shown by xxii. 20, and also xvi. 13; cf. on this neuter use of the masc., Ewald, § 172a. "The opening of my lips (i.e. this, that they open themselves, not: that which they disclose, lay open) is upright" is to be regarded as metonymia antecedentis pro consequ.: that which I announce is . . .; or also as a poetic attribution, which attributes to a subject that which is produced by it (cf. iii. 17b): my discourse bearing itself right, brings to light (Fl.). xxiii. 16, cf. 31, is parallel both in the words and the subject; מִישָׁרִים, that which is in accordance with fact and with rectitude, uprightness (vid. at i. 3), is a word common to the introduction (i.-ix.), and to the first appendix to the first series of Solomonian Proverbs (xxii. 17-xxiv. 22), with the Canticles. In Cant. v. 16 also, as here (cf. v. 3, Job vi. 30), the word palate [Gaumen] is used as the organ of speech.

Ver. 7. הִנְיִד continues the reason (begun in ver. 6) for the Hearken! (cf. i. 15-17, iv. 16 f.); so that this second reason is co-ordinated with the first (Fl.). Regarding אָמְתָה, vid. at iii. 3; הִנְיִד, here of the palate (cf. Ps. xxxvii. 30), as in xv. 28 of the heart, has not hitherto occurred. It signifies quiet inward meditation, as well as also (but only poetically) discourses going forth from it (vid. at Ps. i. 2). The contrary of truth, i.e. moral truth, is רָשָׁע, wickedness in words and principles,—a segolate, which retains its Segol also in pausa, with the single exception of Eccles. iii. 16.

Vers. 8, 9. The ך of קִצְרֹת is that of the close connection of a quality with an action or matter, which forms with a substantive adverbia as well as virtual adjectiva, as here: cum rectitudine (conjuncta i. e. vera) sunt omnia dicta oris mei (Fl.); it is the ך of the distinctive attribute (Hitzig), certainly related to the ך essentia (iii. 26, according to which Schultens and Bertheau explain), which is connected with the abstract conception (e.g. Ps. xxxiii. 4), but also admits the article designating the gender (vid. at Ps. xxix. 4). The opposite of קִצְרֹת (here in the sense of veracitas, which it means in Arab.) is נִפְתָּל עָשָׂה, dolosum ac perversum. עָשָׂה (cf. Gesen. § 84, 9) is that which is violently bent and twisted, i.e. estranged from the truth, which is, so to speak, parodied or caricatured. Related to it in meaning, but proceeding from a somewhat different idea, is נִפְתָּל. נִפְתָּל, used primarily of threads, cords, ropes, and the like, means to twist them, to twine them over and into one another, whence פְּתִיל, a line or string made of several intertwisted threads (cf. نَتِيلَة, a wick of a candle or lamp); Niph., to be twisted, specifically luctari, of the twisting of the limbs, and figuratively to bend and twist oneself, like the crafty (versutus) liars and deceivers, of words and thoughts which do not directly go forth, but by the crafty twistings of truth and rectitude, opp. יָשָׁר נָכוֹן (Fl.). There is nothing of deception or error in the utterances of wisdom; much rather they are all יָשָׁרִים, straight out from her (cf. Isa. lvii. 2), going directly out, and without circumlocution directed to the right end for the intelligent, the knowing (cf. Neh. x. 29); and יָשָׁרִים, straight or even, giving no occasion to stumble, removing the danger of erring for those who have obtained knowledge, i.e. of good and evil, and thus the ability of distinguishing between them (Gesen. § 134, 1),—briefly, for those who know how to estimate them.

Her self-commendation is continued in the resumed address :

- 10 "Receive my instruction, and not silver,
And knowledge rather than choice gold!
- 11 For wisdom is better than corals,
And all precious jewels do not equal her.
- 12 I, Wisdom, inhabit prudence,
And the knowledge of right counsels is attainable by me."

Instead of  $\text{לֹא-כֶסֶף}$  influenced by  $\text{קָחוּ}$ , is  $\text{וְאֵל-כֶסֶף}$  with  $\text{תִּקְחוּ}$  to be supplied; besides, with most Codd. and older editions, we are to accentuate  $\text{קָחוּ כֶסֶף}$  with the erasure of the Makkeph. "Such negations and prohibitions," Fleischer remarks, "are to be understood comparatively: instead of acquiring silver, rather acquire wisdom. Similar is the old Arabic  $\text{النَّارُ، وَالْعَارُ}$ , the fire, and not the disgrace! Also among the modern Arabic proverbs collected by Burckhardt, many have this form, e.g. No. 34, alhajamat balafas wala alhajaj alanas, Better to let oneself be cut with the axe than to beg for the favour of another" 10b is to be translated, with Jerome, Kimchi, and others: and knowledge is more precious than fine gold ( $\text{נִבְחָר}$ , neut.: auro pretiosius); and in view of xvi. 16, this construction appears to be intended. But Fleischer has quite correctly affirmed that this assertatory clause is unsuitably placed as a parallel clause over against the preceding imperative clause, and, what is yet more important, that then ver. 11 would repeat idem per idem in a tautological manner. We therefore, after the Aramaic and Greek translators, take  $\text{כֶסֶף נִבְחָר}$  together here as well as at ver. 19, inasmuch as we carry forward the  $\text{קָחוּ}$ : et scientiam præ auro lectissimo, which is also according to the accentuation. Equally pregnant is the  $\text{נ$  in  $\text{מְחַרְרֵי}$  of the passage iii. 14, 15, which is here varied.

Ver. 12 follows ver. 11 = iii. 15 as a justification of this estimating of wisdom above all else in worth. Regarding  $\text{גַּיָּא}$  with Gaja, vid. the rule which the accentuation of this word in the three so-called metrical books follows in Merx' Archiv, 1868, p. 203 (cf. Baer's Torath Emeth, p. 40). We translate: ego sapientia incolo sollertiam, for the verb  $\text{שָׁבַן}$  is construed with the accusative of the object, ii. 21, x. 30, Ps. xxxvii. 3 (cf.  $\text{נִיר}$ , Ps. v. 5), as well as with  $\text{ב}$ , Gen. xxvi. 2, Ps. lxxix. 37. Wisdom inhabits prudence, has settled down, as it were, and taken up her residence in it, is at home in its whole sphere, and rules it. Bertheau not unsuitably compares  $\text{οἰκῶν}$  with  $\text{μόνος ἔχων}$ , 1 Tim. vi. 16. Regarding  $\text{מְבֹמֹת}$ , vid. i. 4, v. 2. It denotes well-considered, carefully thought out designs, plans, conclusions, and  $\text{יְעִת}$  is here the knowledge that is so potent. This intellectual power is nothing beyond wisdom, it is in her possession on every occasion; she strives after it not in vain, her knowledge is defined according to her wish. Wisdom describes herself here personally with regard to that which she bestows on men who receive her.

Far remote is the idea that 13a is dependent on אָצַק (I acquire) (Löwenstein, Bertheau). With this verse begins a new series of thoughts raising themselves on the basis of the fundamental clause 13a. Wisdom says what she hates, and why she hates it:

13 "The fear of Jahve is to hate evil;
Pride and arrogance, and an evil way
And a deceitful mouth, do I hate."

If the fear of God is the beginning of wisdom (ix. 10, i. 7), then wisdom, personally considered, stands before all else that is to be said of her in a relation of homage or reverence toward God corresponding to the fear of God on the part of man; and if, as the premiss 13a shows, the fear of God has as its reverse side the hatred of evil, then there arises what Wisdom says in שְׂנֵאתִי (I hate) of herself. Instead of the n. actionis שְׂנֵאתָ (hatred), formed in the same way with יִרְאתָ, which, admitting the article, becomes a substantive, the author uses, in order that he might designate the predicate as such (Hitzig), rather the n. actionis שְׂנֵאתָ, which is indeed also a noun, but is not used substantively; שְׂנֵאתָ as שְׂנֵאתָ, Jer. xxix. 10. קָרָאתָ, Judg. viii. 1, is equivalent to שְׂנֵאתָ like יִבֶשֶׁת, the becoming dry, יָבֵלָה, the being able; cf. (Arab.) shanat, hating, malât, well-being, karât, reading (Fl.). The evil which Wisdom hates is now particularized as, vi. 16-19, the evil which Jahve hates. The virtue of all virtues is humility; therefore Wisdom hates, above all, self-exaltation in all its forms. The paronomasia גִּבְוָה וְנִפְאוֹן (pride and haughtiness) expresses the idea in the whole of its contents and compass (cf. Isa. xv. 6, iii. 1, and above at i. 27). גִּבְוָה (from נִפְאוֹן, the nominal form), that which is lofty = pride, stands with נִפְאוֹן, as Job iv. 10, גִּבְוָה, that which is high = arrogance. There follows the viam mali, representing the sins of walk, i.e. of conduct, and os fullax (vid. at ii. 12), the sins of the mouth. Hitzig rightly rejects the interpunctuation רָע, and prefers רָע. In consequence of this Declâ (Tiphcha init.), וְיָפִי תְהַפְּכֵם have in Codd. and good editions the servants Asla and Illuj (vid. Baer's Torath Emeth, p. 11); Aben-Ezra and Moses Kimchi consider the Asla erroneously as disjunctive, and explain וְיָפִי by et os = axioma meum, but Asla is conjunctive, and has after it the ׀ raphatum.

After Wisdom has said what she hates, and thus what she is not, she now says what she is, has, and promises:

- 14 " Mine is counsel and promotion ;
 I am understanding, mine is strength.
 15 By me kings reign,
 And rulers govern justly.
 16 By me princes rule, and nobles—
 All judges of the earth."

Whoever gives anything must himself possess it; in this sense Wisdom claims for herself counsel, promotion (in the sense of offering and containing that which is essentially and truly good; vid. concerning תּוֹשֵׁבָה, ii. 7), and energy (vid. Eccles. vii. 19). But she does not merely possess בְּיָנָה; this is much rather her peculiar nature, and is one with her. That ver. 14 is formed after Job xii. 13, 16 (Hitzig) is possible, without there following thence any argument against its genuineness. And if ver. 15 f., and Isa. xxxii. 1, x. 1, stand in intentional reciprocal relation, then the priority is on the side of the author of the Proverbs. The connection gives to the laconic expression its intended comprehensiveness. It is not meant that Wisdom has the highest places in the state to give, but that she makes men capable of holding and discharging the duties of these.

Ver. 15*b*. Here we are led to think of legislation, but the usage of the language determines for the Po. חָקַק only the significations of commanding, decreeing, or judging; צֶדֶק is the object. accus., the opposite of חֲקֵי רָעָה (decrees of unrighteousness), Isa. x. 1. רָזָן is a poetic word, from רָזָן = Arab. razuna, to be heavy, weighty, then to be firm, incapable of being shaken, figuratively of majestic repose, dignity (cf. טָרַח and דְּבֹרָה) in the whole external habitus, in speech and action such as befits one invested with power (Fl.).

Ver. 16*a*. We may not explain the second clause of this verse: et ad ingenua impelluntur quicumque terræ imperant, for נְרִיב is adj. without such a verbal sense. But besides, נְרִיבִים is not pred., for which it is not adapted, because, with the obscuring of its ethical signification (from נְרִיב, to impel inwardly, viz. to noble conduct, particularly to liberality), it also denotes those who are noble only with reference to birth, and not to disposition (Isa. xxxii. 8). Thus נְרִיבִים is a fourth synonym for the highly exalted, and כָּל-שֹׁפְטֵי אֶרֶץ is the summary placing together of all kinds of dignity; for שֹׁפֵט unites in itself references to government, administration of justice, and rule. כָּל is used, and not וְכָל—a so-called asyndeton summativum.

Instead of אָרָן (LXX.) there is found also the word יָדָק (Syr., Targ., Jerome, Græc. Venet., adopted by Norzi after Codd. and Neapol. 1487). But this word, if not derived from the conclusion of the preceding verse, is not needed by the text, and gives a summary which does not accord with that which is summed up (נְרִיבִים, שְׂרִיִם, רוֹנִים, מְלָכִים); besides, the Scripture elsewhere calls God Himself שׂוֹפֵט צְדָק (Ps. ix. 5; Jer. xi. 20). The Masoretic reading<sup>1</sup> of most of the editions, which is also found in the Cod. Hillel (אִסְפֵּר הַלֵּל), merits the preference.

The discourse of Wisdom makes a fresh departure, as at ver. 13: she tells how, to those who love her, she repays this love:

- 17 " I love them that love me,
And they that seek me early find me.
18 Riches and honour are with me,
Durable riches and righteousness.
19 Better is my fruit than pure and fine gold,
And my revenue (better) than choice silver.
20 In the way of righteousness do I walk,
In the midst of the paths of justice.
21 To give an inheritance to them that love me
And I fill their treasures."

The Chethib אֶהְבֵּיהָ (ego hos qui eam amant redamo), Gesenius, Lehrgeb. § 196, 5, regards as a possible synallage (eam = me), but one would rather think that it ought to be read אֶהְבֵּי ה' (= יהוה). The ancients all have the reading אֶהְבֵּי אֶהֱבֵי (= אֶהֱבֵב, with the change of the éç into è, and the compression of the radical א; cf. אֶמְרֵי אֶמְרֵי, i. 10) is the form of the fut. Kal, which is inflected אֶהֱבֵבֵי, i. 22. Regarding אֶהְבֵּי (the Græc. Venet. well: οἱ ὀρθοπίστους μοι), vid. i. 28, where the same epithet. fut. form is found.

Ver. 18. In this verse part of iii. 16 is repeated, after which אִתִּי is meant of possession (mecum and penes me). Regarding הוֹן, vid. i. 13; instead of the adjective יָקָר there, we have here עֲתָק. The verb עֲתָק signifies promoveri, to move forwards, whence are derived the meanings old (cf. ætas provecata, advanced age), venerable for age, and noble, free (cf. עֲתִיק, Isa. xxviii. 9, and Arab. 'atyk, manu-

<sup>1</sup> If the Masoretes had read שׂוֹפֵט צְדָק, then would they have added the remark לֵית ("it does not further occur"), and inserted the expression in their Register of Expressions, which occurs but once, Masora finalis, p. 62.

missus), unbound, the bold. Used of clothing, עָרֵךְ (Isa. xxiii. 18) expresses the idea of venerable for age. קָנָה used of possessions and goods, like the Arab. 'álak, denotes such goods as increase during long possession as an inheritance from father to son, and remain firm, and are not for the first time gained, but only need to be inherited, opes perennes et firmæ (Schultens, Gesenius' Thesaur., Fleischer), although it may be also explained (which is, however, less probable with the form קָנָה) of the idea of the venerable from opes superbæ (Jerome), splendid opulence. יָצַק is here also a good which is distributed, but properly the distributing goodness itself, as the Arab. sadakat, influenced by the later use of the Hebrew צָדָקָה (δικαιοσύνη = ἐλεημοσύνη), denotes all that which God of His goodness causes to flow to men, or which men bestow upon men (Fl.). Righteousness is partly a recompensative goodness, which rewards, according to the law of requital, like with like; partly communicative, which, according to the law of love without merit, and even in opposition to it, bestows all that is good, and above all, itself; but giving itself to man, it assimilates him to itself (vid. Ps. xxiv. 7), so that he becomes צַדִּיק, and is regarded as such before God and men, ver. 19.

The fruit and product of wisdom (the former a figure taken from the trees, iii. 18; the latter from the sowing of seed, iii. 9) is the gain and profit which it yields. With חֶרֶץ, viii. 10, iii. 14, מֶזַּק is here named as the place of fine gold, briefly for מַצֵּיץ, solid gold, gold separated from the place of ore which contains it, or generally separated gold, from פָּזַץ, violently to separate metals from base mixtures; Targ. רִהַבָּא אֹבְרִיזִין, gold which has stood the fire-test, obrussa, of the crucible, Greek ἔβρυζον, Pers. ebriz, Arab. ibriz. In the last clause of this verse, as also in 10b, נִבְחַר is to be interpreted as pred. to תִּבְחַתִּי, but the balance of the meaning demands as a side-piece to the מַחְרֵץ וּמָצוּץ (19a) something more than the mere כֶּסֶף. In 20f. the reciprocal love is placed as the answer of love under the point of view of the requiting righteousness. But recompensative and communicative righteousness are here combined, where therefore the subject is the requital of worthy pure love and loving conduct, like with like. Such love requires reciprocal love, not merely cordial love, but that which expresses itself outwardly.

Vers. 20, 21. In this sense, Wisdom says that she acts strictly according to justice and rectitude, and adds (21) wherein this her conduct manifests itself. The Piel הָקִיָּה expresses firm, constant action; and בָּתוֹךְ means that she turns from this line of conduct on no side. לְהִנְחִיל is distinguished from בְּהִנְחִיל, as ut possidendam tribuam from possidendam tribuendo; the former denotes the direction of the activity, the latter its nature and manner; both combine if we translate ita ut . . .<sup>1</sup> Regarding the origin of שֵׁי, vid. at ii. 7; it denotes the being founded, thus substantia, and appears here, like the word in mediæval Latin and Romanic (Ital. sustanza, Span. substancia), and like οὐσία and ὑπαρξις (τὰ ὑπαρχοντα) in classic Greek, to denote possessions and goods. But since this use of the word does not elsewhere occur (therefore Hitzig explains שֵׁי = לֵי שֵׁי, I have it [= presto est]), and here, where Wisdom speaks, שֵׁי connects itself in thought with תְּשִׁיבָה, it will at least denote real possession (as we also are wont to call not every kind of property, but only landed property, real possession), such possession as has real worth, and that not according to commercial exchange and price, but according to sound judgment, which applies a higher than the common worldly standard of worth. The Pasek between אֶחָדִי and שֵׁי is designed to separate the two Jods from each other, and has, as a consequence, for לְהִנְחִיל אֶחָדִי the accentuation with Tarcha and Mercha (vid. Accentssystem, vi. § 4; cf. Torath Emeth, p. 17, § 3). The carrying forward of the inf. with the finite, 21b, is as i. 27, ii. 2, and quite usual.

Ver. 22. Wisdom takes now a new departure, in establishing her right to be heard, and to be obeyed and loved by men. As the Divine King in Ps. ii. opposes to His adversaries the self-testimony: "I will speak concerning a decree! Jahve said unto me: Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten Thee;" so Wisdom here unfolds her divine patent of nobility: she originates with God before all creatures, and is the object of God's love and joy, as she also has the object of her love and joy on God's earth, and especially among the sons of men:

"Jahve brought me forth as the beginning of His way,
As the foremost of His works from of old."

The old translators render קָנִי (with Kametz by Dechi; vid. under Ps. cxviii. 5) partly by verbs of creating (LXX. ἔκτισε, Syr.

<sup>1</sup> Biesenthal combines the etymologically obscure הִנְחִיל with נָחַל: to make to flow into, so that נָחַל denotes inheritance in contradistinction to acquisition; while נְחִלָּה, in contradistinction to יְרֵשָׁה, denotes the inheritance rather of many than of the individual.

Targ. חֵכְמָה), partly by verbs of acquiring (Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotus, Venet. ἐκτήσατο; Jerome, possedit); Wisdom appears also as created, certainly not without reference to this passage, Sir. i. 4, πρωτέρα πάντων ἐκτίσται σοφία; i. 9, αὐτὸς ἐκτίσεν αὐτήν; xxiv. 8, ὁ κτίσας με. In the christological controversy this word gained a dogmatic signification, for they proceeded generally on the identity of σοφία ὑποστατική (sapientia substantialis) with the hypostasis of the Son of God. The Arians used the ἐκτίσέ με as a proof of their doctrine of the filius non genitus, sed factus, i.e. of His existence before the world began indeed, but yet not from eternity, but originating in time; while, on the contrary, the orthodox preferred the translation ἐκτήσατο, and understood it of the co-eternal existence of the Son with the Father, and agreed with the ἐκτίσε of the LXX. by referring it not to the actual existence, but to the position, place of the Son (Athanasius: Deus me creavit regem or caput operum suorum; Cyrill.: non condidit secundum substantiam, sed constituit me totius universi principium et fundamentum). But (1) Wisdom is not God, but is God's; she has personal existence in the Logos of the N. T., but is not herself the Logos; she is the world-idea, which, once projected, is objective to God, not as a dead form, but as a living spiritual image; she is the archetype of the world, which, originating from God, stands before God, the world of the idea which forms the medium between the Godhead and the world of actual existence, the communicated spiritual power in the origination and the completion of the world as God designed it to be. This wisdom the poet here personifies; he does not speak of the personal Logos, but the further progress of the revelation points to her actual personification in the Logos. And (2) since to her the poet attributes an existence preceding the creation of the world, he thereby declares her to be eternal, for to be before the world is to be before time. For if he places her at the head of the creatures, as the first of them, so therewith he does not seek to make her a creature of this world having its commencement in time; he connects her origination with the origination of the creature only on this account, because that à priori refers and tends to the latter; the power which was before heaven and earth were, and which operated at the creation of the earth and of the heavens, cannot certainly fall under the category of the creatures around and above us. Therefore (3) the translation with ἐκτίσεν has nothing against it, but it is different from the κτίσις of the heavens and the earth, and the poet has intentionally written not בְּרָאֲנִי, but קָנִי. Certainly קָנָה, Arab. kāna, like all the words used of creating, refers to one root-idea: that of forging (vid. under Gen. iv. 22), as בָּרָא does to that of cutting (vid. under Gen. i. 1); but the mark of a commencement in time does not affix itself to קָנָה in the same way as it does to בָּרָא, which always expresses the divine production of that which has not hitherto existed. קָנָה comprehends in it the meanings to create, and to create something for oneself, to prepare, parare (e.g. Ps. cxxxix. 13), and to prepare something for oneself, comparare, as κτίζειν and κτᾶσθαι, both from kshi, to build, the former expressed by struere, and the latter by sibi struere. In the קָנִי, then, there are the ideas, both that God produced wisdom, and that He made Himself to possess it; not certainly, however, as a man makes himself to possess wisdom from without, iv. 7. But the idea of the bringing forth is here the nearest demanded by the connection. For רִאשִׁית יְרֵבוֹ is not equivalent to בְּרָאשִׁית יְרֵבוֹ (Syr., Targ., Luther), as Jerome also reads: Ita enim scriptum est: ADONAI CANANI BRESITH DERCHO (Ep. cxl. ad Cyprian.); but it is, as Job xl. 19 shows, the second accusative of the object (LXX., Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion). But if God made wisdom as the beginning of His way, i.e. of His creative efficiency (cf. Rev. iii. 14 and Col. i. 15), the making is not to be thought of as acquiring, but as a bringing forth, revealing this creative efficiency of God, having it in view; and this is also confirmed by the חוֹלְלִי (genita sum; cf. Gen. iv. 1, קִינִי, genui) following. Accordingly, קָרָם טְפִיעָלִי (foremost of His works) has to be regarded as a parallel second object. accusative. All the old translators interpret קָרָם as a preposition [before], but the usage of the language before us does not recognise it as such; this would be an Aramaism, for קָרָם, Dan. vii. 7, frequently קָרָם (Syr., Targ.), is so used. But as קָרָם signifies previous existence in space, and then in time (vid. Orelli, Zeit und Ewigkeit, p. 76), so it may be used of the object in which the previous existence appears, thus (after Sir. i. 4): πρωτέραν τῶν ἔργων αὐτοῦ (Hitzig).

Ver. 23. A designation of the When? expressed first by כִּי (Isa. xlviii. 8, cf. xl. 21), is further unfolded:

“From everlasting was I set up,

From the beginning, from the foundations of the earth.”

That נִסְכָּחִי cannot be translated: I was anointed = consecrated, vid. at Ps. ii. 6. But the translation also: I was woven = wrought (Hitzig, Ewald, and previously one of the Greeks, ἐδιάσθη), does not commend itself, for בְּרִי (Ps. cxxxix. 15), used of the embryo, lies far from the metaphorical sense in which בְּרִי = Arab. nasaj, texere, would here be translated of the origin of a person, and even of such a spiritual being as Wisdom; בְּרִי, as the LXX. reads (ἐθεμελιώσε με), is not once used of such. Rightly Aquila, κατεστάθη; Symmachus, προκεχειρισμαι; Jerome, ordinata sum. Literally, but unintelligibly, the Gr. Venet. κέχυμαι, according to which (cf. Sir. i. 10) Böttcher: I was poured forth = formed, but himself acknowledging that this figure is not suitable to personification; nor is it at all likely that the author applied the word, used in this sense of idols, to the origin of Wisdom. The fact is, that בְּרִי, used as seldom of the anointing or consecration of kings as בְּרִי, passes over, like יָצַק (הַצִּיב), צִיב, (בְּצִיב, a pillar), and יָצַב (הַצִּיב), from the meaning of pouring out to that of placing and appointing; the mediating idea appears to be that of the pouring forth of the metal, since בְּרִי, Dan. xi. 8, like בְּרִי, signifies a molten image. The Jewish interpreters quite correctly remark, in comparing it with the princely name בְּרִי [cf. Ps. lxxxiii. 12] (although without etymological insight), that a placing in princely dignity is meant. Of the three synonyms of eternitas a parte ante, בְּרִי points backwards into the infinite distance, בְּרִי into the beginning of the world, בְּרִי not into the times which precede the origin of the earth, but into the oldest times of its gradual arising; this בְּרִי it is impossible to render, in conformity with the Hebr. use of language: it is an extensive plur. of time, Böttcher, § 697. The בְּרִי repeated does not mean that the origin and greatness of Wisdom are contemporaneous with the foundation of the world; but that when the world was founded, she was already an actual existence.

This her existence before the world began is now set forth in yet more explicit statements:

- 24 " When there were as yet no floods was I brought forth,
When as yet there were no fountains which abounded with water;
- 25 For before the mountains were settled,
Before the hills was I brought forth,
- 26 While as yet He had not made land and plains,
And the sum of the dust of the earth."

The description is poetical, and affords some room for imagination. By בְּרִי are not intended the unrestrained primeval waters, but, as also iii. 20, the inner waters, treasures of the earth; and consequently by מַעְיָנוֹת, not the fountains of the sea on this earth (Ewald, after Job xxxviii. 16), but the springs or places of springs (for מַעְיָן is n. loci to מַעַן, a well as an eye of the earth; vid. Gen. xvi. 7), by means of which the internal waters of the earth communicate themselves to the earth above (cf. Gen. vii. 11 with xlix. 25). נִכְבְּדֵי מַיִם (abounding with water) is a descriptive epitheton to מַעְיָנוֹת, which, notwithstanding its fem. plur., is construed as masc. (cf. v. 16). The Masora does not distinguish the thrice-occurring נִכְבְּדֵי according to its form as written (Isa. xxiii. 8, 9). The form נִכְבְּדֵי (which, like מְהֵיִם, would demand Metheg) is to be rejected; it is everywhere to be written נִכְבְּדֵי (Ewald, § 214*b*) with Pathach, with Dagesh following; vid. Kimchi, Michlol 61*b*. Kimchi adds the gloss מעיני מים רבים, which the Gr. Venet., in accordance with the meaning of נִכְבְּדֵי elsewhere, renders by πηγαῖς δεδοξασμένων ὑδάτων (as also Böttcher: the most honoured = the most lordly); but Meiri, Immanuel, and others rightly judge that the adjective is here to be understood after Gen. xiii. 2, Job xiv. 21 (but in this latter passage כִּבְר does not mean "to be numerous"): loaded = endowed in rich measure.

Ver. 25. Instead of בְּאֵין, in (yet) non-existence (24), we have here פָּרָם, a subst. which signifies cutting off from that which already exists (vid. at Gen. ii. 5), and then as a particle nondum or antequam, with אֲ always antequam, and in ver. 26 עַד-לֹא, so long not yet (this also originally a substantive from עָרָה, in the sense of progress). With הִתְבַּעַע (were settled) (as Job xxxviii. 6, from נִבְעַע, to impress into or upon anything, imprimere, infigere) the question is asked: wherein? Not indeed: in the depths of the earth, but as the Caraites Ahron b. Joseph answers, אֵל קֶרֶקַע הַיָּם, in the bottom of the sea; for out of the waters they rise up, Ps. civ. 8 (cf. at Gen. i. 9).

Ver. 26. אֶרֶץ וְחַצְוֹת is either, connecting the whole with its part: terra cum campis, or אֶרֶץ gains by this connection the meaning of land covered with buildings, while חַצְוֹת the expanse of unoccupied land, or the free field outside the towns and villages (cf. בַּר, Arab. barrytt) (Fl.), vid. Job v. 10, xviii. 17 (where we have translated "in the steppe far and wide"); and regarding the fundamental idea, vid. above at v. 16. Synonymous with אֶרֶץ, as contrast to חַצְוֹת, is תְּבֵל, which like יָבֵל (produce, wealth) comes from בָּל, and thus denotes the earth as fruit-bearing (as אֲדָמָה properly denotes the humus as the covering of earth). Accordingly, with Ewald, we may understand by ראש עפרות, "the heaps of the many clods of the fertile arable land lying as if scattered on the plains." Hitzig also translates: "the first clods of the earth." We do not deny that עפרות may mean clods of earth, i.e. pieces of earth gathered together, as Job xxviii. 6, עפרת זהב, gold ore, i.e. pieces of earth or ore containing gold. But for clods of earth the Heb. language has the nouns רֶגֶב and מְגִרְפָּה; and if we read together עפרות, plur. of the collective עפר (dust as a mass), which comes as from a n. unitatis עפרה, and ראש, which, among its meanings in poetry as well as in prose, has also that of the sum, i.e. the chief amount or the total amount (cf. the Arab. rās ālmāl, the capital, τὸ κεφάλαιον), then the two words in their mutual relation yield the sense of the sum of the several parts of the dust, as of the atoms of dust (Cocceius; Schultens, summam pulverum orbis habitabilis); and Fleischer rightly remarks that other interpretations, as ab initio pulveris orbis, præcipua quæque orbis terrarum, caput orbis terrarum (i.e. according to Rashi, the first man; according to Umbreit, man generally), leave the choice of the plur. עפרות unintelligible. Before these creatures originated, Wisdom was, as she herself says, and emphatically repeats, already born; חוללה is the passive of the Pilel חלל, which means to whirl, to twist oneself, to bring forth with sorrow (Aquila, Theodotion, ὠδινήθη; Græc. Venet. 24a, πέπλασμαι, 25b, ὠδίημαι), then but poet. generally to beget, to bring forth (xxv. 23, xxvi. 10).

Ver. 27. But not only did her existence precede the laying of the foundation of the world; she was also actively taking part in the creative work:

"When He prepared the heavens, I was there,

When He measured out a circle for the mirror of the multitude of waters."

Again a sentence clothed with two designations of time. The adv. of place ׀ is used, chiefly poetically, for ׀, eo tempore (Arab. thumm, in contradistinction to thamm, eo loco); but here it has the signification of place, which includes that of time: Wisdom was there when God created the world, and had then already long before that come into existence, like as the servant of Jahve, Isa. xlvi. 16, with just such a ׀, says that He is there from the time that the history of nations received a new direction, beginning with Cyrus. חֲזַק signifies to give a firm position or a definite direction. Thus Job xxviii. 27 of Wisdom, whom the Creator places before Himself as a pattern (ideal); here, as Jer. x. 12, Ps.

lxv. 7, of the setting up, restoring throughout the whole world. In the parallel member,  $\text{וַיִּגַּן}$ , corresponding to  $\text{מִצְדָּף}$ , appears necessarily to designate the circle or the vault of the heavens (Job xxii. 14), which, according to the idea of the Hebrews, as in Homer, rests as a half-globe on the outermost ends of the disc of the earth surrounded with water, and thus lies on the waters. Vid. Hupfeld under Ps. xxiv. 2. This idea of the ocean girdling the earth is introduced into the O. T. without its being sanctioned by it. The LXX. (καὶ ὅτε ἀφώριξε τὸν ἑαυτοῦ θρόνον ἐπ' ἀνέμων) appears to understand  $\text{וַיִּגַּן$  of the waters above; but  $\text{וַיִּגַּן}$  never has this meaning,  $\text{מִצְדָּף}$  (Job ix. 8, xxxvi. 30) might rather be interpreted of the ocean of the heavens. The passage in accordance with which this before us is to be expounded is Job xxvi. 10: He has set a limit for the surface of the waters, i.e. describing over them a circle setting bounds to their region. So here, with the exchange of the functions of the two words: when He marked out a circle over the surface of the multitude of waters, viz. to appoint a fixed region ( $\text{וַיִּצְדֹּף$ , Gen. i. 10) for them, i.e. the seas, fountains, rivers, in which the waters under the heavens spread over the earth.  $\text{וַיִּצְדֹּף}$  signifies incidere, figere, to prescribe, to measure off, to consign, and directly to mark out, which is done by means of firm impressions of the graver's tools. But here this verb is without the Dagesh, to distinguish between the infinitive and the substantive  $\text{מִצְדָּף}$  (his statute or limit); for correct texts have  $\text{מִצְדָּף}$  (Michlol 147a); and although a monosyllable follows, yet there is no throwing back of the tone, after the rule that words terminating in o in this case maintain their ultima accentuation (e.g.  $\text{לֹא מִשְׁשָׁן}$ , Num. xxiv. 28). Fleischer also finally decides for the explanation: quum delinearet circulum super abyssu, when He marked out the region of the sea as with the circle.

In 28, 29, these two features of the figure of the creation of the world return (the beginning of the firmament, and the embankment of the under waters); hence we see that the discourse here makes a fresh start with a new theme:

- 28 " When He made firm the ether above,
 When He restrained the fountains of the waters;
 29 When He set to the sea its bounds,
 That the waters should not pass their limits;
 When He settled the pillars of the earth;
 30 Then was I with Him as director of the work,
 And was delighted day by day,
 Rejoicing always before Him,

81 Rejoicing in His earth,
And having my delight in the children of men."

We have, with Symmachus, translated שִׁחֲקִים (from שָׁחַק, Arab. shak, to grind, to make thin) by aiθépa, for so the fine transparent strata of air above the hanging clouds are called—a poetic name of the firmament רָקִיעַ. The making firm מָצַח is not to be understood locally, but internally of the spreading out of the firmament over the earth settled for continuance (an expression such as Ps. lxxviii. 23). In 28*b* the Masora notices the plur. עִינוֹת instead of עֵינוֹת with לֵית as unicum (cf. Michlol 191*a*); the transition of the sound is as in מִלֵּית from galajta. The inf. עוֹחַ appears on the first look to require a transitive signification, as the LXX. and the Targ., the Græc. Venet. and Luther (da er festiget die Brünnen der tieffen = when He makes firm the fountains of the deep) have rendered it. Elster accordingly believes that this signification must be maintained, because צ here introduces creative activity, and in itself is probably the transitive use of עוֹחַ, as the Arab. 'azz shows: when He set His נַי against the עֵינִים מֵיִם (Isa. xliii. 16). But the absence of the subject is in favour of the opinion that here, as everywhere else, it is intransitive; only we may not, with Hitzig, translate: when the fountains of the flood raged wildly; but, since 28*b*, if not a creative efficiency, must yet express a creative work, either as Ewald, with reference to מַעַז, fortress: when they became firm, or better as Fleischer, with reference to מֵיִם עֵינִים: when they broke forth with power, with strong fulness. Whether the suff. of חָקִי, 29*a*, refers back to the sea or to Jahve, is decided after the parallel פִּי. If this word is equivalent to its coast (cf. Ps. civ. 9), then both suffixes refer to the sea; but the coast of the sea, or of a river, is called שֹׁפָה, not פִּי, which only means ostium (mouth), not ora. Also Isa. xix. 7 will require to be translated: by the mouth of the Nile; and that פִּי, Ps. cxxxiii. 2, may denote the under edge, arises from this, that a coat has a mouth above as well as below, i.e. is open. Thus both suff. are to be referred to God, and פִּי is to be determined after Job xxiii. 12. The clause beginning with וּמֵיִם corresponds in periodizing discourse to a clause with ut, Ewald, § 338. מְחַקֵּי is the same form, only written plene, as ver. 27, מְחַקֵּי = מְחַקֵּי = מְחַקֵּי.<sup>1</sup>

Ver. 30. In this sentence, subordinating to itself these designations of time, the principal question is as to the meaning of חֲסִידָה. Hofmann's interpretation (Schriftbew. i. 97) "continually" (inf. absol. in an adverbial sense) is a judicious idea, and חֲסִידָה, to endure, remains indeed in חֲסִידָה (stability); but in this sense, which חֲסִידָה represents, it is not otherwise used. Also חֲסִידָה (believing, trusting) of the Targ. (Græc. Venet. πιστός, as if the word used were חֲסִידָה) is linguistically inadmissible; the Hebr. חֲסִידָה corresponds to the Aram. haimēn. One of these two only is possible: חֲסִידָה means either opifex or alumnus. The meaning alumnus (Aquila, τιθηνομένη; Meiri and Malbim, למך בחיך חסיד, ἐν τῷ κόλπῳ τοῦ Θεοῦ) would derive the word from חֲסִידָה, to support, make firm, take care of; the form ought to have a passive sense (Symm. Theod. ἐστηρικμένη), as חֲסִידָה, twined, pressed, strong, great, and be pointed חֲסִידָה (with a moveable a, different from the form חֲסִידָה, בגור חסיד, Isa. i. 17); and חֲסִידָה, in the meaning nursing, foster-child, favourite (Schultens, Euchel, Elster, and others, also Rashi and Kimchi, who all find in חֲסִידָה the meaning of education, בחיך), would place itself with חֲסִידָה, fostered, Lam. iv. 5, חֲסִידָה, fosterer, חֲסִידָה, foster-mother. This is the meaning of the word according to the connection, for Wisdom appears further on as the child of God; as such she had her joy before Him; and particularly God's earth, where she rejoiced with the sons of men, was the scene of her mirth. But on this very account, because this is further said, we also lose nothing if חֲסִידָה should be interpreted otherwise. And it is otherwise to be interpreted, for Wisdom is, in consequence of קנני (viii. 22), and חֲסִידָה, which is twice used (viii. 24, 25), God's own child; but the designation חֲסִידָה would make Him to be the חֲסִידָה of Wisdom; and the child which an חֲסִידָה bears, Num. xi. 12, and fosters, Esth. ii. 7, is not his own. Hence it follows that חֲסִידָה in this signification would be an ἄπαξ λεγόμενον; on the other hand, it really occurs elsewhere, Jer. lii. 15 (vid. Hitzig l.c.), in the sense of opifex. This sense, which recommends itself to Ewald, Hitzig, Bertheau, and Zöckler, lies also at the foundation of the ἀρμόζουσα of the LXX., חֲסִידָה of the Syr., the cuncta componens of Jerome, and the designation of Wisdom as ἡ τῶν πάντων τεχνίτις of the Book of Wisdom vii. 21. The workmaster is called חֲסִידָה, for which, Cant. vii. 2, חֲסִידָה, or rather חֲסִידָה (ommân), Aram. and Mishn. חֲסִידָה; not, perhaps, as he whom one entrusts with something in whom one confides or may confide in a work (vid. Fleischer, loc.), but from חֲסִידָה, to be firm, as one who is strong in his art, as perhaps also the right hand, which has the name אִמָּן as being the artifex among the members. The word occurs also as an adjective in the sense of "experienced, skilful," and does not form a fem. according to the use of the word in this case before us, only because handicraft (אִמָּנִית) belongs to men, and not to women; also in the Greek, δημιουργός, in the sense of τὰ δημόσια (eis τὸ δημόσιον) ἐργαζόμενος, has no fem.; and in Lat., artifex is used as a substantive (e.g. in Pliny: artifex omnium natura), like an adj. of double gender. It is thus altogether according to rule that we read אִמָּן and not אִמָּנָה (after the form בְּנוּיָהּ); also we would make a mistake if we translated the word by the German "Werkmeisterin" [work-mistress, directress] (Hitzig), for it is intended to be said that she took up the place of a workmaster with Him, whereby chiefly the artistic performances of a אִמָּן [artificer] are thought of. This self-designation of Wisdom is here very suitable; for after she has said that she was brought forth by God before the world was, and that she was present when it was created, this אִמָּן now answers the question as to what God had in view when He gave to Wisdom her separate existence, and in what capacity she assisted in the creation of the world: it was she who transferred the creative thoughts originally existing in the creative will of God, and set in motion by His creative order, from their ideal into their real effectiveness, and, as it were, artistically carried out the delineations of the several creatures; she was the mediating cause, the demiurgic power which the divine creative activity made use of, as is said, iii. 19, "Jahve has by Wisdom founded the earth," and as the Jerusalem Targ. Gen. i. 1, in connection with Prov. viii. 22, translates: בְּחִיבָמָא בְּרָא יְיָ יְהִי שְׂמִיָּא יְהִי אֲרַעָא.

But—this is now the question—does the further unfolding of the thoughts here agree with this interpretation of אִמָּן? That we may not misunderstand what follows, we must first of all represent to ourselves, that if אִמָּן meant the foster-child, Wisdom could not yet, in what follows, be thought of as a little child (Num. xi. 12), for that would be an idea without any meaning; to rejoice [spielen = play] is certainly quite in accordance with youth, as 2 Sam. ii. 14 shows (where שִׁחַק לַמָּנִי is said of the sportive combat of youthful warriors before the captain), not exclusively little children. So, then, we must guard against interpreting שְׂשֻׁעִים, with the LXX. and Syr., in the sense of שְׂשֻׁעִי,—an interpretation which the

Targ., Jerome, the Græc. Venet., and Luther have happily avoided; for mention is not made here of what Wisdom is for Jahve, but of what she is in herself. The expression is to be judged after Ps. cix. 4 (cf. Gen. xii. 2), where Hitzig rightly translates, "I am wholly prayer;" but Böttcher, in a way characteristic of his mode of interpretation, prefers, "I am ointment" (vid. Neus Aehrenlese, No. 1222). The delight is meant which this mediating participation in God's creating work imparted to her—joy in the work in which she was engaged. The plural עֲשֵׂהָ is to be understood here, not after Jer. xxxi. 20, but after Isa. xi. 8, Ps. cxix. 70, where its root-word, the Pilpel עֲשֵׂהָ (proceeding from the primary meaning of caressing, demulcere), signifies intransitively: to have his delight somewhere or in anything, to delight oneself,—a synonym to the idea of play (cf. Aram. עֲשֵׂהָ, Eihpe. to play, Eihpa. to chatter); for play is in contrast to work, an occupation which has enjoyment in view. But the work, i.e. the occupation, which aims to do something useful, can also become a play if it costs no strenuous effort, or if the effort which it costs passes wholly into the background in presence of the pleasure which it yields. Thus Wisdom daily, i.e. during the whole course of creation, went forth in pure delight; and the activity with which she translated into fact the creative thoughts was a joyful noise in the sight of God, whose commands she obeyed with childlike devotion; cf. 2 Sam. vi. 21, where David calls his dancing and leaping before the ark of the covenant a עֲשֵׂהָ. But by preference, her delight was in the world, which is illustrated from the Persian Minokhired, which personifies Wisdom, and, among other things, says of her: "The creation of the earth, and its mingling with water, the springing up and the growth of the trees, all the different colours, the odour, the taste, and that which is pleasing in everything—all that is chiefly the endowment and the performance of Wisdom."<sup>1</sup> She also there says that she was before all celestial and earthly beings, the first with Ormuzd, and that all that is celestial and earthly arose and also remains in existence by her. But the earth was the dearest object of her delight in the whole world; to help in establishing it (iii. 19) was her joyful occupation; to fashion it, and to provide it with the multiplicity of existences designed for it, was the most pleasant part of her creative activity. For the earth is the abode of man, and the heart-pleasure of Wisdom was with (עֲשֵׂהָ, prep.)

the children of men; with them she found her high enjoyment, these were her peculiar and dearest sphere of activity.

Ver. 31. Since the statements of Wisdom, as to her participation in the creation of the world, are at this point brought to a close, in this verse there is set forth the intimate relation into which she thus entered to the earth and to mankind, and which she has continued to sustain to the present day. She turned her love to the earth for the sake of man, and to man not merely as a corporeal, but especially as a spiritual being, to whom she can disclose her heart, and whom, if he receives her, she can bring back to God (Book of Wisdom vii. 27). There are not here express references to Gen. i. or ii. In יום יום (day for day, as Gen. xxxix. 10, cf. Esth. ii. 4, יום יום) we have not to think of the six days of creation. But inasmuch as the whole description goes down to בְּנֵי אָדָם as its central-point, it denotes that creation came to its close and its goal in man. The connection of תִּבְלֵ אֶרֶץ is as Job xxxvii. 12, where אֶרֶץ for אֶרֶץ is wholly, as לְלֵאָה, חֲרִיֶּסָה, and the like, an original accusative.

Ver. 32. After that Wisdom has shown in vers. 22–31 how worthy her fellowship is of being an object of desire from her mediating place between God and the world, she begins with this verse (as vii. 24, v. 7) the hortatory (paränetische) concluding part of her discourse:

“And now, ye sons, hearken unto me,
And salvation to those who keep my ways!”

The LXX. omits ver. 33, and obviates the disturbing element of וַאֲשֶׁרִי, 32*b*, arising from its ׀, by a transposition of the stichs. But this וַאֲשֶׁרִי is the same as the καὶ μακάριος, Matt. xi. 6; the organic connection lies hid, as Schleiermacher (Hermeneutik, p. 73) well expresses it, in the mere sequence; the clause containing the proof is connected by ׀ with that for which proof is to be assigned, instead of subordinating itself to it with כִּי. Such an exclamatory clause has already been met with in iii. 13; there אָדָם follows as the governed genitive, here a complete sentence (instead of the usual participial construction, שְׁמַרְי דְרַבִּי) forms this genitive, Gesen. § 123, 3, Anm. 1.

The summons 32*a*, and its reason 32*b*, are repeated in these verses which follow:

33 “Hear instruction, and be wise,
And withdraw not.

- 34 Blessed is the man who hears me,
 Watching daily at my gates,
 Waiting at the posts of my doors!
 35 For whosoever findeth me has found life,
 And has obtained favour from Jahve;
 36 And whosoever misseth me doeth wrong to himself;
 All they who hate me love death."

The imper. וְיַחֲכֹמוּ, 33a (et sapite), is to be judged after iv. 4, וְיָחִי, cf. the Chethib, xiii. 20; one sees this from the words וְאֵלֵּי הַפְּרָעִי וְאֵלֵּי הַתְּרָף which follow, to which, after xv. 32, as at iv. 13, to וְאֵלֵּי הַתְּרָף is to be placed as object: and throw not to the winds (ne missam faciatis; vid. regarding פָּרַע at i. 25), viz. instruction (disciplinam).

Ver. 34. The אֲשֶׁר־ here following שָׁמַעַי is related to it as assigning a motive, like the וְאֲשֶׁר־ (ver. 32b) following שָׁמַעַי; according to the Masora, we have to write אֲשֶׁר־ with Mercha, and on the first syllable Gaja (vid. Baer's Torath Emeth, pp. 26, 29; cf. under Ps. i. 1). לְשָׁקֵר signifies to watch, not in the sense of ad vigilandum, but vigilando, as Isa. v. 22, xxx. 1; Ewald, § 380d. In contradistinction to וְיָעִיר and וְיִקְיִץ, which denote watching as the consequence of wakefulness or an interruption of sleep, לְשָׁקֵר signifies watching as a condition, and that as one which a person willingly maintains (Psychol. p. 275), the intentional watching (cf. Arab. shakidha, to fix penetrating eyes upon anything), with עַל of the place and object and אֵימָה (Jer. v. 6; cf. וְיָעִיר עַל, Job viii. 6). The plurals וְלִתְּוֹת (fores, as חֲמוֹת, Jer. i. 18, mœnia) and פְּתָחַיִם are amplifying plurals of extension, suggesting the idea of a palace or temple; מְנוּחֹת (postes portæ, in quibus cardines ejus moventur, from נוּחַ, to move hither and thither) is intended to indicate that he to whom the discourse refers holds himself in closest nearness to the entrance, that he might not miss the moment when it is opened, or when she who dwells there presents herself to view. "The figure is derived from the service of a court: Wisdom is honoured by her disciples, as a queen or high patroness; cf. Samachschari's Golden Necklaces, Pr. 35: Blessed is the man who knocks only at God's door, and who departs not a nail's breadth from God's threshold" (Fl.).

Ver. 35. This verse gives the reason for pronouncing those happy who honour Wisdom. The Chethib is בִּי מַצָּאִי מַצָּאִי חַיִּים, but the passing over into the sing. 35b is harsh and objectionable; the Keri rightly regards the second מַצָּאִי as a mistaken repetition of the first, and substitutes בִּי מַצָּאִי מַצָּאִי חַיִּים, with which the וְחִטָּא (ver.

36a) of the antithesis agrees. Regarding אָפֶּיִן, for which, less accurately, אָפֶּיִן (only with the Dechi without Metheg) is generally written, vid. Accentuationssystem, vii. § 2. פִּיֵּי, to get out = reach, exchanged with אָפֶּיִן, iii. 13 (vid. there); according to its etymon, it is connected with פָּ, of him from or by whom one has reached anything; here, as xii. 2, xviii. 22, God's favour, favorem a Jova impetravit.

Ver. 36. אָפֶּיִן may, it is true, mean "my sinning one = he who sins against me (אָפֶּיִן)," as אָפֶּיִן is frequently equivalent to אָפֶּיִן; but the contrast of אָפֶּיִן places it beyond a doubt that אָפֶּיִן stands here in its oldest signification: to miss something after which one runs (xix. 2), seeks (Job v. 24), at which one shoots (Hiph. Judg. xx. 16), etc., id non attingere quod petitur, Arab. âkhta, to miss, opposite to âsab, to hit (Fl.). Just because it is the idea of missing, which, ethically applied, passes over into that of sin and guilt (of fault, mistake, false step, "Fehls, Fehlers, Fehltritts"), אָפֶּיִן can stand not only with the accusative of the subject in regard to which one errs, Lev. v. 16, but also with the accusative of the subject which one forfeits, i.e. misses and loses, xx. 2, cf. Hab. ii. 10; so that not only אָפֶּיִן, xv. 32 (animam suam nihili facit), but also אָפֶּיִן, xx. 2 (animam suam pessumdat), is synonymous with אָפֶּיִן (animæ suæ h. e. sibi ipsi injuriam facit). Whoever misses Wisdom by taking some other way than that which leads to her, acts suicidally: all they who wilfully hate (Piel) wisdom love death, for wisdom is the tree of life, iii. 18; wisdom and life are one, 35a, as the Incarnate Wisdom saith, John viii. 51, "If a man keep my sayings, he shall never see death." In the Logos, Wisdom has her self-existence; in Him she has her personification, her justification, and her truth.

FIFTEENTH INTRODUCTORY MASHAL DISCOURSE, IX.

A DOUBLE INVITATION: THAT OF WISDOM, AND THAT OF HER RIVAL, FOLLY.

The preceding discourse pronounces those happy who, having taken their stand at the portal of Wisdom, wait for her appearance and her invitation. There is thus a house of Wisdom as there is a house of God, Ps. lxxxiv. 11; and if now the discourse is of a house of Wisdom, and of an invitation to a banquet therein (like that in the parable, Matt. xxii., of the invitation to the marriage feast of the king's son), it is not given without preparation :

- 1 Wisdom hath builded for herself an house,
Hewn out her seven pillars;
- 2 Hath slaughtered her beasts, mingled her wine;
Hath also spread her table;
- 3 Hath sent out her maidens; she waiteth
On the highest points of the city.

Regarding חִכְמוֹת, vid. at i. 20. It is a plur. excellentiæ, which is a variety of the plur. extensivus. Because it is the expression of a plural unity, it stands connected (as for the most part also אֱלֹהִים, Deus) with the sing. of the predicate. The perfects enumerate all that Wisdom has done to prepare for her invitation. If we had a parable before us, the perf. would have run into the historical וַיִּשְׁלַח; but it is, as the חִכְמוֹת shows, an allegorical picture of the arrangement and carrying out of a present reality. Instead of בָּנְתָהּ לָהּ בַּיִת, there is בָּנְתָהּ בֵּיתָהּ, for the house is already in its origin represented as hers, and 1b is to be translated: she has hewn out her seven pillars (Hitzig); more correctly: her pillars, viz. seven (after the scheme רָעָה רָעָה, Gen. xxxvii. 2); but the construction is closer. שָׁבְעָה is, altogether like Ex. xxv. 37, the accusative of the second object, or of the predicate after the species of verba, with the idea: to make something, turn into something, which take to themselves a double accusative, Gesen. § 139, 2: excidit columnas suas ita ut septem essent. Since the figure is allegorical, we may not dispense with the interpretation of the number seven by the remark, "No emphasis lies in the number" (Bertheau). First, we must contemplate architecturally the house with seven pillars: "They are," as Hitzig rightly remarks, "the pillars of the מַטְרֵיָן (porch) [vid. Bachmann under Judg. iii. 23, and Wetstein under Ps. cxliv. 12, where חָצַב is used of the cutting out and hewing of wood, as חָצַב of the cutting out and hewing of stone] in the inner court, which bore up the gallery of the first (and second) floors: four of these in the corners and three in the middle of three sides; through the midst of these the way led into the court of the house-floor [the area]." But we cannot agree with Hitzig in maintaining that, with the seven pillars of viii. and ix., the author looks back to the first seven chapters (Arab. ûlwab, gates) of this book; we think otherwise of the component members of this Introduction to the Book of Proverbs; and to call the sections of a book "gates, שַׁעֲרִים," is a late Arabico-Jewish custom, of which there is found no trace whatever in the O. T. To regard them also, with Heidenheim (cf. Dante's Prose Writings, translated by Streckfuss, p. 77), as representing the seven liberal arts (שֶׁבַע חִכְמוֹת) is impracticable; for this division of the artes liberales into seven, consisting of the Trivium (Grammar, Rhetoric, and Dialectics) and Quadrivium (Music, Arithmetic, Geometry, and Astronomy), is not to be looked for within the old Israelitish territory, and besides, these were the sciences of this world which were so divided; but wisdom, to which the discourse here refers, is wholly a religious-moral subject. The Midrash thinks of the seven heavens (שֶׁבַע רִקִּיעִים), or the seven climates or parts of the earth (שֶׁבַע אֲרָצוֹת), as represented by them; but both references require artificial combinations, and have, as also the reference to the seven church-eras (Vitringa and Chr. Ben. Michaelis), this against them, that they are rendered probable neither from these introductory proverbial discourses, nor generally from the O. T. writings. The patristic and middle-age reference to the seven sacraments of the church passes sentence against itself; but the old interpretation is on the right path, when it suggests that the seven pillars are the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost. The sevenfoldness of the manifestation of the Spirit, already brought near by the seven lamps of the sacred candelabra (the מְנוֹרָה), is established by Isa. xi. 2 (vid. l.c.); and that Wisdom is the possessor and dispenser of the Spirit she herself testifies, i. 23. Her Spirit is the "Spirit of wisdom;" but at the same time, since, born of God, she is mediatrix between God and the world, also the "Spirit of Jahve." He is the "spirit of understanding," the "spirit of counsel," and the "spirit of might" (Isa. xi. 2); for she says, viii. 14, "Counsel is mine, and reflection; I am understanding, I have strength." He is also the "spirit of knowledge," and the "spirit of the fear of the Lord" (Isa. xi. 2); for fear and the knowledge of Jahve are, according to ix. 14, the beginning of wisdom, and essentially wisdom itself.

Ver. 2. If thus the house of Wisdom is the place of her fellowship with those who honour her, the system of arrangements made by her, so as to disclose and communicate to her disciples the fulness of her strength and her gifts, then it is appropriate to understand by the seven pillars the seven virtues of her nature communicating themselves (apocalyptically expressed, the ἐπὶ πνεύματα), which bear up and adorn the dwelling which she establishes among men. Flesh and wine are figures of the nourishment for the mind and the heart which is found with wisdom, and, without asking what the flesh and the wine specially mean, are figures of the manifold enjoyment which makes at once strong and happy. The segolate n. verbale בָּבֶט, which vii. 22 denoted the slaughtering or the being slaughtered, signifies here, in the concrete sense, the slaughtered ox; Michaelis rightly remarks that בָּבֶט, in contradistinction to זָבַח, is the usual word for mactatio extrasacrificialis. Regarding וַיִּשְׂכּוּ, vid. under Isa. v. 22; it is not meant of the mingling of wine with sweet scents and spices, but with water (warm or cold), and signifies simply to make the wine palatable (as κεραυνύναι, temperare); the LXX. ἐκέρασεν εἰς κρατήρα, κρατήρ is the name of the vessel in which the mixing takes place; they drank not ἄκρατον, but κεκερασμένον ἄκρατον, Rev. xiv. 10. The frequently occurring phrase וַיַּעַרְבֵהוּ signifies to prepare the table (from וַיַּעַרְבֵהוּ, properly the unrolled and outspread leather cover), viz. by the placing out of the dishes (vid. regarding וַיַּעַרְבֵהוּ, under Gen. xxii. 9).

Ver. 3. The verb וַיִּקְרָא, when a feast is spoken of, means to invite; וַיִּקְרָא, ver. 18 (cf. 1 Sam. ix. 13, etc.), are the guests. וַיַּעַרְבֵהוּ the LXX. translates τοὺς ἐαυτῆς δούλους, but certainly here the disciples are meant who already are in the service of Wisdom; but that those who are invited to Wisdom are thought of as feminine, arises from the tasteful execution of the picture. The invitation goes forth to be known to all far and wide, so that in her servants Wisdom takes her stand in the high places of the city. Instead of וַיִּקְרָא, viii. 2, i. 21, there is used here the expression וַיִּשְׂכּוּ. We must distinguish the Semitic וַיִּשְׂכּוּ (= ganf), wings, from וַיִּשְׂכּוּ = בָּנָה, to cover, and וַיִּשְׂכּוּ (= gaff or ganf), the bark, which is derived either from וַיִּשְׂכּוּ or וַיִּשְׂכּוּ, جفف, convexus, incurvus et extrinsecus gibber fuit, hence originally any surface bent outwards or become crooked (cf. the roots cap, caf, קָב כָּה גָב, etc.), here the summit of a height (Fl.); thus not super alis (after the analogy of πτερύγιον, after Suidas = ἀκρωτήριον), but super dorsis (as in Lat. we say dorsum montis, and also vix).

Now follows the street-sermon of Wisdom inviting to her banquet:

- 4 "Who is simple? let him come hither!"
 Whoso wanteth understanding, to him she saith:
 5 "Come, eat of my bread,
 And drink of the wine which I have mingled!
 6 Cease, ye simple, and live,
 And walk straight on in the way of understanding."

The question מִי פְּתִי (thus with Munach, not with Makkeph, it is to be written here and at ver. 16; vid. Baer's Torath Emeth, p. 40), quis est imperitus, is, as Ps. xxv. 12, only a more animated expression for quisquis est. The retiring into the background of the נְעֻרוֹת (servants), and the immediate appearance of Wisdom herself, together with the interruption, as was to be expected, of her connected discourses by the לֹא אֶמְרָה לְךָ, are signs that the pure execution of the allegorical representation is here at an end. Hitzig seeks, by the rejection of vers. 4, 5, 7-10, to bring in a logical sequence; but these interpolations which he cuts out are yet far more inconceivable than the proverbial discourses in the mouth of Wisdom, abandoning the figure of a banquet, which besides are wholly in the spirit of the author of this book. That Folly invites to her, ver. 16, in the same words as are used by Wisdom, ver. 4, is not strange; both address themselves to the simple (vid. on פְּתִי at i. 4) and those devoid of understanding (as the youth, vii. 7), and seek to bring to their side those who are accessible to evil as to good, and do not fully distinguish between them, which the emulating devertat huc of both imports. The fourth verse points partly backwards, and partly forwards; 4a has its introduction in the תְּקַרְא of ver. 3; on the contrary, 4b is itself the introduction of what follows. The setting forth of the nom. absolutus הַמְּרִילֵב is conditioned by the form of 4a; the מִי (cf. 4a) is continued (in 4b) without its needing to be supplied: excors (= si quis est excors) dicit ei (not dixit, because syntactically subordinating itself to the תְּקַרְא). It is a nominal clause, whose virtual predicate (the devoid of understanding is thus and thus addressed by her) is in ver. 16.

Ver. 5. The plur. of the address shows that the simple (inexperienced) and the devoid of understanding are regarded as essentially one and the same class of men. The בְּ after לְהִיטֵב and שְׂחָתָהּ proceeds neither from the idea of eating into (hewing into) anything, nor from the eating with anything, i.e. inasmuch as one makes use of it, nor of pampering oneself with anything (as בְּ רָאָה בְּ); Michaelis at last makes a right decision (cf. Lev. xxii. 11, Judg.

xiii. 16, Job xxi. 25, and particularly  $\text{בְּחֶלֶב וּבְחַיִּים}$ , Ps. cxli. 4): communicationem et participationem in re fruenda denotat; the LXX.  $\phi\acute{\alpha}\gamma\epsilon\tau\epsilon\ \tau\acute{\omega}\nu\ \epsilon\mu\acute{\omega}\nu\ \acute{\alpha}\rho\tau\omega\nu$ . The attributive  $\text{מִסְכָּחֵי מִסְכָּחֵי}$  stands with backward reference briefly for  $\text{מִסְכָּחֵי יִי}$ . That Wisdom, ver. 2, offers flesh and wine, but here presents bread and wine, is no contradiction, which would lead us, with Hitzig, critically to reject vers. 4 and 5 as spurious;  $\text{חֶלֶב}$  is the most common, all-comprehensive name for nourishment. Bertheau suitably compares Jahve's invitation, Isa lv. 1, and that of Jesus, John vi. 35.

Ver. 6. That  $\text{פְּתָאִים}$  is a plur. with abstract signification (according to which the four Greek and the two Aramæan translations render it; the Græc. Venet., however, renders  $\tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma\ \nu\eta\pi\acute{\iota}\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$ ) is improbable; the author forms the abstr. ver. 13 otherwise, and the expression here would be doubtful. For  $\text{פְּתָאִים}$  is here to be rendered as the object-accus.: leave the simple, i.e. forsake this class of men (Ahron b. Joseph; Umbreit, Zöckler); or also, which we prefer (since it is always a singular thought that the "simple" should leave the "simple"), as the vocative, and so that  $\text{עֲזַבְנִי}$  means not absolutely "leave off" (Hitzig), but so that the object to be thought of is to be taken from  $\text{פְּתָאִים}$ : give up, leave off, viz. the simple (Immanuel and others; on the contrary, Rashi, Meiri, and others, as Ewald, Bertheau, decide in favour of  $\text{פְּתָאִים}$  as n. abstr.). Regarding  $\text{וַיִּחְיוּ}$ , for et vivetis, vid. iv. 4. The LXX., paraphrasing:  $\acute{\iota}\nu\alpha\ \epsilon\acute{\iota}\varsigma\ \tau\acute{\omicron}\nu\ \alpha\iota\omega\nu\alpha\ \beta\alpha\sigma\iota\lambda\epsilon\upsilon\sigma\eta\tau\epsilon$ .  $\text{וַיִּשְׁרֵי}$  is related to  $\text{וַיִּשְׁרֵר}$  ( $\text{וַיִּשְׁרֵר}$ ) as  $\text{וַיִּרְרֵ$  to  $\text{וַיִּרְרֵ$ ; the Piel, not in its intrans. (vid. iv. 14) but in its trans. sense (Isa. i. 17, iii. 12, etc.), shows that the idea of going straight out and forwards connects itself therewith. The peculiarity of the  $\text{פְּתִי}$  is just the absence of character.

In what now follows the discourse of Wisdom is continued; wherefore she directs her invitation to the simple, i.e. those who have not yet decided, and are perhaps susceptible of that which is better:

- 7 "He who correcteth a scorner draweth upon himself insult;
And he who communicateth instruction to a scorner, it is a dishonour to him.
- 8 Instruct not a scorner, lest he hate thee;
Give instruction to the wise, so he will love thee.
- 9 Give to the wise, and he becomes yet wiser;
Give knowledge to the upright, and he gains in knowledge."

Zöckler thinks that herewith the reason for the summons to the "simple" to forsake the fellowship of men of their own sort, is assigned (he explains 6a as Ahron b. Joseph : הפרדו מן הפתאים); but his remark that, under the term "simple," mockers and wicked persons are comprehended as belonging to the same category, confounds two sharply distinguished classes of men. לֵץ is the freethinker who mocks at religion and virtue (vid. i. 22), and רָשָׁע the godless who shuns restraint by God and gives himself up to the unbridled impulse to evil. The course of thought in ver. 7 and onwards shows why Wisdom, turning from the wise, who already are hers, directs herself only to the simple, and those who are devoid of understanding: she must pass over the לֵץ and רָשָׁע, because she can there hope for no receptivity for her invitation; she would, contrary to Matt. vii. 6, "give that which is holy to the dogs, and cast her pearls before swine." יָסַר, παιδεύειν (with the prevailing idea of the bitter lesson of reproof and punishment), and הוֹכִיחַ, ἐλέγχειν, are interchangeable conceptions, Ps. xciv. 10; the לֵץ is here exponent of the object (to bring an accusation against any one), as ver. 8, xv. 12 (otherwise as Isa. ii. 4, xi. 4, where it is the dat. commodi: to bring unrighteousness to light, in favour of the injured). לֵץ יָסַר is pointed with Mahpach of the penultima, and thus with the tone thrown back. The Pasek, placed in some editions between the two words, is masoretically inaccurate. He who reads the moral to the mocker brings disgrace to himself; the incorrigible replies to the goodwill with insult. Similar to the לֵקַח here, is מְרִים tollit = reportat, iii. 35, iv. 27. In 7b מומו is by no means the object governed by ומוכיח; and he who shows to the godless his fault (Meiri, Arama, Löwenstein: מומו = על-מומו, and thus also the Græc. Venet. μῶμον ἐαυτοῦ, scil. λαμβάνει); plainly מומו is parallel with קלן. But מומו does not also subordinate itself to לֵקַח as to the object. parallel קלן: maculam sibimet scil. acquirit; for, to be so understood, the author ought at least to have written מומו. Much rather מומו is here, as at Deut. xxxii. 5, appos., thus pred. (Hitzig), without needing anything to be supplied: his blot it is, viz. this proceeding, which is equivalent to מומו הוא לֵיה (Targ.), opprobrio ipsi est. Zöckler not incorrectly compares Ps. cxv. 7 and Eccles. v. 16, but the expression (macula ejus = ipsi) lies here less remote from our form of expression. In other words: Whoever correcteth the mockers has only to expect hatred (אל-תוכח) with the tone thrown back, according to rule; cf., on the contrary, Judg. xviii. 25), but on the other hand, love from the wise.

Ver. 8. The ו in וַיִּיבֶרֶךְ is that of consequence (apodosis imperativi): so he will love thee (as also Ewald now translates), not: that he may love thee (Syr., Targ.), for the author speaks here only of the consequence, not of something else, as an object kept in view. The exhortation influences the mocker less than nothing, so much the more it bears fruit with the wise. Thus the proverb is confirmed habenti dabitur, Matt. xiii. 12, xxv. 29.

Ver. 9. If anything is to be supplied to תָּן, it is לָקַח (iv. 2); but תָּן, tradere, παραδιδόναι, is of itself correlat. of לָקַח, accipere (post-bibl. קָבַל), παραλαμβάνειν, e.g. Gal. i. 9. לָקַח = to communicate knowledge, רָעַת, follows the analogy of לָקַח, to impart instruction, תּוֹכַחַת. Regarding the jussive form וַיִּוְסַף in the apod. imper., vid. Gesen. § 128, 2. Observe in this verse the interchange of חָכְמָה and חָכְמָה! Wisdom is not merely an intellectual power, it is a moral quality; in this is founded her receptivity of instruction, her embracing of every opportunity for self-improvement. She is humble; for, without self-will and self-sufficiency, she makes God's will her highest and absolutely binding rule (iii. 7).

These words naturally follow:

10 "The beginning of wisdom is the fear of Jahve,
And the knowledge of the Holy One is understanding."

This is the highest principle of the Chokma, which stands (i. 7) as a motto at the beginning of the Book of Proverbs. The LXX. translate רֵאשִׁית there (i. 7), and תְּחִלָּתָהּ here, by ἀρχή. Gusset distinguishes the two synonyms as pars optima and primus actus; but the former denotes the fear of God as that which stands in the uppermost place, to which all that Wisdom accomplishes subordinates itself; the latter as that which begins wisdom, that which it proposes to itself in its course. With יְהוָה is interchanged, ii. 5, אֱלֹהִים, as here קְדוֹשִׁים, as the internally multiplicative plur. (Dietrich, Abhandlungen, pp. 12, 45), as xxx. 3, Josh. xxiv. 9, Hos. xii. 1, of God, the "Holy, holy, holy" (Isa. vi. 3), i.e. Him who is absolutely Holy. Michaelis inaccurately, following the ancients, who understood not this non-numerical plur.: cognitio quæ sanctos facit et sanctis propria est. The רָעַת, parallel with רֵאשִׁית, is meant of lively practical operative knowledge, which subordinates itself to this All-holy God as the normative but unapproachable pattern.

Ver. 11. The singular reason for this proverb of Wisdom is now given:

“ For by me will thy days become many,
And the years of thy life will be increased.”

Incorrectly Hitzig: “ and years of life will increase to thee ;” הוֹסִיף is always and everywhere (e.g. also Job xxxviii. 11) transitive. In the similar passage, iii. 2, יוֹסִיפוּ had as its subject the doctrine of Wisdom ; here חכמה and בינה it is not practicable to interpret as subj., since 11 $\alpha$  Wisdom is the subject discoursing—the expression follows the scheme, dicunt eos = dicuntur, as e.g. Job vii. 3 ; Gesen. § 137—a concealing of the operative cause, which lies near, where, as ii. 22, the discourse is of severe judgment, thus: they (viz. the heavenly Powers) will grant to thee years of life (חַיִּים in a pregnant sense, as iii. 2) in rich measure, so that constantly one span comes after another. But in what connection of consequence does this stand with the contents of the proverb, ver. 10 ? The ancients say that the clause with כִּי refers back to ver. 5 f. The vers. 7–10 (according also to Fl.) are, as it were, parenthetic. Hitzig rejects these verses as an interpolation, but the connection of ver. 11 with 5 f. retains also something that is unsuitable: “ steps forward on the way of knowledge, for by me shall thy days become many ;” and if, as Hitzig supposes, ver. 12 is undoubtedly genuine, whose connection with ver. 11 is in no way obvious, then also will the difficulty of the connection of vers. 7–10 with the preceding and the succeeding be no decisive mark of the want of genuineness of this course of thought. We have seen how the progress of ver. 6 to 7 is mediated: the invitation of Wisdom goes forth to the receptive, with the exclusion of the irrecoverable. And ver. 11 is related to ver. 10, as the proof of the cause from the effect. It is the fear of God with which Wisdom begins, the knowledge of God in which above all it consists, for by it is fulfilled the promise of life which is given to the fear of God, x. 27, xiv. 27, xix. 23, cf. Deut. iv. 40, and to humility, which is bound up with it, x. 17.

Ver. 12. This wisdom, resting on the fear of God, is itself a blessing to the wise :

“ If thou art wise, thou art wise for thyself ;
And if thou mockest, thou alone shalt bear it.”

The LXX., with the Syr., mangle the thought of 12 $\alpha$ , for they translate: if thou art wise for thyself, so also thou wilt be wise for thy neighbour. The dat. commodi חֵן means that it is for the personal advantage of the wise to be wise. The contrast expressed by Job xxii. 2 f.: not profitable to God, but to thyself (Hitzig), is scarcely intended, although, so far as the accentuation is antithetic, it is the nearest. The perf. לֹא יִצְלַח is the hypothetical; Gesen. § 126, 1. To bear anything, viz. anything sinful (חַטָּא or פֶּשַׁע), is equivalent to, to atone for it, Job xxxiv. 2, cf. Num. ix. 13, Ezek. xxiii. 35. Also 12*b* is a contrast scarcely aimed at. Wisdom is its own profit to man; libertinism is its own disgrace. Man decides, whenever he prefers to be wise, or to be a mocker of religion and of virtue, regarding his own weal and woe. With this nota bene the discourse of Wisdom closes.

The poet now brings before us another figure, for he personifies Folly working in opposition to Wisdom, and gives her a feminine name, as the contrast to Wisdom required, and thereby to indicate that the seduction, as the 13th proverbial discourse (chap. vii.) has shown, appears especially in the form of degraded womanhood:

- 13 The woman Folly [Frau Thorheit] conducts herself boisterously, Wantonness, and not knowing anything at all;
14 And hath seated herself at the door of her house,
On a seat high up in the city,
15 To call to those who walk in the way,
Who go straight on their path.

The connection of אִשָּׁת בְּסִילֹת is genitival, and the genitive is not, as in אִשָּׁת רַע, vi. 24, specifying, but appositional, as in בַּת-צִיּוֹן (vid. under Isa. i. 8). הוֹמֵיָהּ [boisterous] is pred., as vii. 11: her object is sensual, and therefore her appearance excites passionately, overcoming the resistance of the mind by boisterousness. In 13*b* it is further said who and how she is. פְּתִיית she is called as wantonness personified. This abstract פְּתִיית, derived from פָּתַי, must be vocalized as אֲכִזְרִיית; Hitzig thinks it is written with a on account of the following u sound, but this formation always ends in ijjûth, not ajjûth. But as from חָזָה as well חָזִין = חָזִיוֹן as חָזוֹן is formed, so from פָּתַח as well פָּתַחַת like חָזִית, or פָּתַחַת like לֹוֹת, as רַעֲוִת, as פְּתִיית (instead of which פְּתִיית is preferred) can be formed; Kimchi rightly (Michlol 181*a*) presents the word under the form פְּעֻלֹת. With וַיִּבֶל (xiv. 7) poetic, and stronger than לֹא, the designation of the subject is continued; the words וַיִּבֶל-יִרְעָה פֹה (thus with Mercha and without Makkeph following, יִרְעָה is to be written, after Codd. and old editions) have the value of an adjective: and not knowing anything at all (כֹּה = לֹא, as Num. xxiii. 3, Job xiii. 13, and here in the negative clause, as in prose כֹּה), i.e. devoid of all knowledge. The Targ. translates explanatorily: not recognising טובות, the good; and the LXX. substitutes: she knows not shame, which, according to Hitzig, supposes the word תלפיה, approved of by him; but כלמה means always pudefactio, not pudor. To know no כלמה would be equivalent to, to let no shaming from without influence one; for shamelessness the poet would have made use of the expression ובל-יירעה בנשח. In וישבה the declaration regarding the subject beginning with הנחיה is continued: Folly also has a house in which works of folly are carried on, and has set herself down by the door (לפי as לפתח, viii. 3) of this house; she sits there על-כסא. Most interpreters here think on a throne (LXX. ἐπι δέλφου, used especially of the sella curulis); and Zöckler, as Umbreit, Hitzig, and others, connecting genitiv. therewith מרי קרה, changes in 14b the scene, for he removes the "high throne of the city" from the door of the house to some place elsewhere. But the sitting is in contrast to the standing and going on the part of Wisdom on the streets preaching (Evagrius well renders: in molli ignavaque sella); and if כסא and house-door are named along with each other, the former is a seat before the latter, and the accentuation rightly separates by Mugrash כסא from מרי קרה. "According to the accents and the meaning, מרי קרה is the acc. loci: on the high places of the city, as viii. 2 f." (Fl.) They are the high points of the city, to which, as Wisdom, ver. 3, viii. 2, so also Folly, her rival (wherefore Eccles. x. 6 does not appertain to this place), invites followers to herself. She sits before her door to call לעברי דרה (with Munach, as in Cod. 1294 and old editions, without the Makkeph), those who go along the way (genitive connection with the supposition of the accusative construction, transire viam, as ii. 7), to call (invite) המישרים (to be pointed with ר raphatum and Gaja going before, according to Ben-Asher's rule; vid. Methesetz. § 20), those who make straight their path, i.e. who go straight on, directly before them (cf Isa. lvii. 2). The participial construction (the schemes amans Dei and amans Deum), as well as that of the verb קרא (first with the dat. and then with the accus.), interchange.

The woman, who in her own person serves as a sign to her house, addresses those who pass by in their innocence (לחמים, 2 Sam. xv. 11):

- 16 "Whoso is simple, let him turn in hither!"
 And if any one is devoid of understanding, she saith to him:

17 "Stolen waters taste sweet,
And the bread of secrecy is pleasant."

בְּחָיִי (folly, simplicity) has a side accessible to good and its contrary: Wisdom is connected with the one side, and Folly with the other. And as the חסר-לב offers a vacuum to Wisdom which may perhaps be filled with the right contents, so is this vacuum welcome to Folly, because it meets there no resistance. In this sense, ver. 16 is like ver. 4 (excepting the addition of a connecting and of a concluding ו: et si quis excors, tum dicit ei); the word is the same in both, but the meaning, according to the two speakers, is different. That to which they both invite is the pleasure of her fellowship, under the symbol of eating and drinking; in the one case it is intellectual and spiritual enjoyment, in the other sensual. That Wisdom offers (ix. 5) bread and wine, and Folly water and bread, has its reason in this, that the particular pleasure to which the latter invites is of a sensual kind; for to drink water out of his own or out of another fountain is (iii. 15–20) the symbol of intercourse in married life, or of intercourse between the unmarried, particularly of adulterous intercourse. מַיִם זָנוּבִים (correct texts have it thus, without the Makkeph) is sexual intercourse which is stolen from him who has a right thereto, thus carnal intercourse with אִשָּׁה אִישׁ; and לֶחֶם סְתוּרִים fleshly lust, which, because it is contrary to the law, must seek (cf. furtum, secret love intrigue) concealment (סְתוּרִים, extensive plur., as מְעַטְמִים; Böttcher, § 694). Just such pleasure, after which one wipes his mouth as if he had done nothing (xxx. 20), is for men who are without wisdom sweet (מֶחֶק, Job xx. 12) and pleasant; the prohibition of it gives to such pleasure attraction, and the secrecy adds seasoning; and just such enjoyments the בסִּילוֹת, personified carnality, offers. But woe to him who, befooled, enters her house!

He goes within:

18 And he knows not that the dead are there;
In the depths of Hades, her guests.

How near to one another the house of the adulteress and Hades are, so that a man passes through the one into the other, is already stated in ii. 18, vii. 28. Here, in the concluding words of the introduction to the Book of Proverbs, addressed to youth, and for the most part containing warnings against sinful pleasures, these two further declarations are advanced: the company assembled in the house of lewdness consists of רְפָאִים, i.e. (cf. p. 83) the old, worn-out, who are only in appearance living, who have gone down to the seeming life of the shadowy existence of the kingdom of the dead; her (כסילוח) invited ones (cf. vii. 26, her slaughtered ones) are in the depths of Hades (not in the valleys, as Umbreit, Löwenstein, and Ewald translate, but in the depths, Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, ἐπὶ τοῖς βαθέσι; for עֲמָקֵי is not only plur. to עֲמָק, but also per metaplasmum to עֲמָק, xxv. 3, as אֲמָרֵי to אָמַר), thus in שָׂאֵל תְּחַתִּית (Deut. xxxii. 22); they have forsaken the fellowship of the life and of the love of God, and have sunk into the deepest destruction. The house of infamy into which Folly allures does not only lead to hell, it is hell itself; and they who permit themselves to be thus befooled are like wandering corpses, and already on this side of death are in the realm of wrath and of the curse.<sup>1</sup>

FIRST COLLECTION OF SOLOMONIC PROVERBS, X.—XXII. 16.

The superscription, מִשְׁלֵי שְׁלֹמֹה, here shows that now we have reached that which the title of the book, i. 1-6, presented to view. Here we have the commencement of that collection of Solomonic Proverbs which under this title forms, together with the introduction, i. 7-ix., the Older Book of Proverbs. The introduction is disproportionately long. It is the manner of the editor to extend himself in length and breadth; and besides, an educational zeal in behalf of youth, and his aim, which was without doubt to put them on their guard against certain prevailing moral evils of his time, make him thus persuasive; and if he detains his readers so long from the proper Solomonic Proverbs, yet this might be excused from the circumstance, that though his introduction does not strictly consist of Proverbs of Solomon, yet it consists of proverbs after the manner of Solomon, i.e. of proverbs which, as to their contents and form, take their structure from the pattern of those of Solomonic authorship.

In this introduction, i.-ix., there are larger sections of interconnected thoughts having one common aim. Even in vi. 1-19 there are manifestly three proverbial discourses distinguished from one another, shorter indeed, yet containing one fundamental thought.

<sup>1</sup> The LXX. has considerable additions introduced after ver. 18, as also after ver. 12, of which we shall elsewhere speak.

Such proverbs as are primarily designed to form one completed little whole of themselves, are not here to be met with. On the contrary, the Solomonic collection which now follows consists of pure distichs, for the most part antithetical, but at the same time going over all the forms of the technical proverb, as we have already shown; vid. p. 16. Accordingly the exposition must from this point onward renounce reproduced combinations of thought. The succession of proverbs here is nevertheless not one that is purely accidental or without thought; it is more than a happy accident when three of the same character stand together; the collector has connected together proverb with proverb according to certain common characteristics (Bertheau). And yet more than that: the mass separates itself into groups, not merely succeeding one another, but because a certain connection of ideas connects together a number of proverbs, in such a way that the succession is broken, and a new point of departure is arrived at (Hitzig). There is no comprehensive plan, such as Oetinger in his summary view of its contents supposes; the progressive unfolding follows no systematic scheme, but continuously wells forth. But that the editor, whom we take also to be the arranger of the contents of the book, did not throw them together by good chance, but in placing them together was guided by certain reasons, the very first proverb here shows, for it is chosen in conformity with the design of this book, which is specially dedicated to youth:

1 A wise son maketh glad his father;
A foolish son is his mother's grief.

One sees here quite distinctly (cf. Hos. xiii. 13) that  $\text{בָּן עָבֵד}$  (from  $\text{בָּן עָבֵד}$ , properly to be thick, stout, solid, as  $\text{πυκνός} = \text{σοφός}$ ) is primarily a practical and ethical conception. Similar proverbs are found further on, but consisting of synonymous parallel members, in which either the father both times represents the parents, as xvii. 21, xxiii. 24, or father and mother are separated, each being named in different members, as xvii. 25, xxiii. 25, and particularly xv. 20, where  $20a = 1a$  of the above proverb. It is incorrect to say, with Hitzig, that this contrast draws the division after it: the division lies nearer in the synonymous distichs, and is there less liable to be misunderstood than in the antithetic. Thus, from this proverb before us, it might be concluded that grief on account of a befooled son going astray in bypaths, and not coming to the right way, falls principally on the mother, as (Sir. iii. 9) is often the case in unfortunate marriages. The idea of the parents is in this way only separated, and the two members stand in suppletive interchangeable relationship.  $\text{חֶלֶק}$  is the middle of the clause, and is the usual form in connection;  $\text{חֶלֶק}$  is the pausal form.  $\text{הַחֶלֶק}$ , from  $\text{חָקַק}$  (חָק), has pass. ú, as  $\text{חָקַקְתָּ}$ , act. ó. "The expression of the pred. 1b is like iii. 17, viii. 6, x. 14 f.; cf. e.g. Arab. álastaksa furkat, oversharpener is dividing, i.e. effects it [inquiries become or lead to separation] (cf. our proverb, Allzuscharf macht schartig = too much sharpening makes full of notches); Burckhardt, Sprachw. Nr. 337" (Fl.).

Ver. 2. There follows now a series of proverbs which place possessions and goods under a moral-religious point of view:

Treasures of wickedness bring no profit;
But righteousness delivers from death.

The LXX. and Aquila translate ἀνόμους (ἀσεβείς).  $\text{לֹא יוֹצֵל$  (to profit) with the accus. is possible, Isa. lvii. 12, but  $\text{לֹא יוֹצֵל$  one does not use by itself; it requires a genitive designating it more closely. But also  $\text{לֹא יוֹצֵל$  of the Targ., παρὰ νόμων of Symmachus, fails; for the question still remains, to whom? Rightly Syr., Jerome, Theodotion, and the Quinta: ἀσεβείας, cf. iv. 17, Mic. iv. 10; Luke xvi. 9, μαμωνᾶς τῆς ἀδικίας. Treasures to which wickedness cleaves profit not, viz. him who has collected them through wickedness. On the contrary, righteousness saves from death (2b = xi. 4b, where the parallelism makes it clear that death as a judgment is meant). In Deut. xxiv. 13 it had been already said that compassionate love is "righteousness before the Lord," the cardinal virtue of the righteousness of life. Faith (Hab. ii. 4) is its soul, and love its life. Therefore δικαιοσύνη and ἐλεημοσύνη are interchangeable ideas; and it ought not to be an objection against the Apocrypha that it repeats the above proverb, ἐλεημοσύνη ἐκ θανάτου ῥύεται, Tob. iv. 10, xii. 9, Sir. iii. 30, xxix. 12, for Dan. iv. 24 also says the very same thing, and the thought is biblical, in so far as the giving of alms is understood to be not a dead work, but (Ps. cxii. 9) the life-activity of one who fears God, and of a mind believing in Him and resting in His word.

Ver. 3. Another proverb, the members of which stand in chiasmic relation to those of the preceding:

Jahve does not suffer the soul of the righteous to hunger;
But the craving of the godless He disappointeth.

The thought is the same as xiii. 25. There, as also at vi. 30, the soul is spoken of as the faculty of desire, and that after nourishment, for the lowest form of the life of the soul is the impulse to self-preservation. The parallel  $\text{הָיָה}$ , in which LXX. and Ar. erroneously find the meaning of  $\text{הָיָה}$ , life, the Syr. Targ. the meaning of  $\text{הוּן}$ , possession, means the desire, without however being related to  $\text{הָיָה}$  (Berth.); it is the Arab. hawan, from  $\text{הָוָה}$ , Arab. haway, which, from the fundamental meaning çalweu, liare, to gape, yawn, signifies not only unrestrained driving along, and crashing overthrow (cf. xi. 6, xix. 13), but also the breaking forth, ferri in aliquid, whence  $\text{הָוָה}$ , Arab. hawan, violent desire, in Hebr. generally (here and Ps. lii. 9, Mic. vii. 3) of desire without limits and without restraint (cf. the plur. áhawá, arbitrary actions, caprices); the meanings deduced from this important verbal stem (of which also  $\text{הָוָה}$   $\text{הָיָה}$ , accidere, and then esse, at least after the Arabic conception of speech, is an offshoot) are given by Fleischer under Job xxxvii. 6, and after Fleischer by Ethé, Schlafgemach der Phantasie, ii. p. 6f. The verb  $\text{הָוָה}$  signifies to push in the most manifold shades, here to push forth, repellere, as 2 Kings iv. 27 (cf. Arab. hadhaf, to push off = to discharge); the fut. is invariably  $\text{יָהוּה}$  like  $\text{יָהוּה}$ . God gives satisfaction to the soul of the righteous, viz. in granting blessings. The desire of the wicked He does not suffer to be accomplished; it may appear for a long time as if that which was aimed at was realized, but in the end God pushes it back, so that it remains at a distance, because contrary to Him. Instead of  $\text{וְהוּת רָשָׁעִים}$ , some editions (Plantin 1566, Bragadin 1615) have  $\text{וְהוּת בְּנֵי־רָשָׁעִים}$ , but, in opposition to all decided testimony, only through a mistaken reference to xi. 6.

Ver. 4. There follow two proverbs which say how one man fails and another succeeds:

He becomes poor who bears a sluggish hand;
But the hand of the diligent maketh rich.

These three proverbs, xix. 15, xii. 24, 27, are similar. From the last two it is seen that  $\text{רָמִיָּה}$  is a subst., as also from Ps. cxx. 2 f. ( $\text{לָשׁוֹן רָמִיָּה}$ , from a crafty tongue) that it is an adject., and from Lev. xiv. 15 f. (where  $\text{פָּה}$  is fem.) that it may be at the same time an adject. here also. The masc. is  $\text{רָמִי}$ , like  $\text{מָרִי}$  to  $\text{מָרָה}$ , but neither of these occur; "the fundamental idea is that of throwing oneself down lazily, when one with unbent muscles holds himself no longer erect and stretched, Arab. taramy" (Fl.). The translation: deceitful balances (Löwenstein after Rashi), is contrary to biblical usage, which knows nothing of כף in this Mishnic meaning. But if כף is here regarded as fem., then it cannot be the subject (Jerome, egestatem operata est manus remissa), since we read עֲשֶׂהָ, not עֲשֶׂה. But רָאֵשׁ also is not suitable as the subject (LXX., Syr., Targ.), for poverty is called רֵישׁ, רֵישׁ, רֵישׁ; on the contrary, רֵשׁ, plur. רֵשִׁים or רֵאשִׁים, is used adjectively. Since now the adject. רֵשׁ, 1 Sam. xii. 14, is also written רֵאשׁ, it may be translated: Poor is he who . . . (Bertheau); but we much rather expect the statement of that which happens to such an one, thus: Poor will he be . . . רֵאשׁ, 3 præt. = רֵשׁ, Ps. xxxiv. 11, with the same (grammatically incorrect) full writing as קָאֵם, Hos. x. 14. In the conception of the subject, כְּפָרְמִיָּה, after Jer. xlviii. 10, is interpreted as the accus. of the manner (Berth.: whoever works with sluggish hand); but since עֲשֶׂה רְמִיָּה (in another sense indeed: to practise cunning) is a common phrase, Ps. lii. 4, ci. 7, so also will כְּפָרְמִיָּה be regarded as the object: qui agit manum remissam, whoever carries or moves such a hand (Hitzig). In 4b working is placed opposite to bearing: the diligent hand makes rich, ditat or divitias parit; but not for itself (Gesen. and others: becomes rich), but for him who bears it. The diligent man is called הָרִיץ, from הָרַץ, to sharpen, for, as in ἀξύς, acer, sharpness is transferred to energy; the form is the same as תְּקִיָּה, smooth (for the ā is unchangeable, because recompensative), a kindred form to קָטוּל like הָמוּץ, and Arab. fā'ûl as fashawsh, a boaster, wind-bag, either of active (as תְּנִיָּה) or (as חֲרוּץ, חֲלוּץ, עֲבוּר, עֲבוּר) of passive signification.

Ver. 5. There is now added a proverb which, thus standing at the beginning of the collection, and connecting itself with ver. 1, stamps on it the character of a book for youth:

He that gathereth in summer is a wise son ;
 But he that is sunk in sleep in the time of harvest is a son that causeth shame.

Von Hofmann (Schriftb. ii. 2. 403) rightly interprets בֶּן מְשֻׁבֵּל and בֶּן מְבִישׁ, with Cocceius and others, as the subject, and not with Hitzig as predicate, for in nominal clauses the rule is to place the predicate before the subject; and since an accurate expression of the inverted relation would both times require הוּא referring to the subject, so we here abide by the usual syntax: he that gathers in summer time is . . . Also the relation of the members of the sentence, xix. 26, is a parallel from which it is evident that the misguided son is called מְבִישׁ as causing shame, although in הַבֵּישׁ the idea to put to shame (=to act so that others are ashamed) and to act shamefully (disgracefully), as in השכיל the ideas to have insight and to act intelligently, lie into one another (cf. xiv. 35); the root-meaning of השכיל is determined after שָׁכַל, which from שָׁכַל, complicare, designates the intellect as the faculty of intellectual configuration. בֹּאֵשׁ, properly disturbari, proceeds from a similar conception as the Lat. confundi (pudore). קָצִיר and קָיִץ fall together, for קָיִץ (from קָרַן = טָל, to be glowing hot) is just the time of the קָצִיר; vid. under Gen. viii. 22. To the activity of a thoughtful ingathering, אָנַר, for a future store (vid. vi. 7), stands opposed deep sleep, i.e. the state of one sunk in idleness. נָרַם means, as Schultens has already shown, sonno penitus obrui, omni sensu obstructo et oppilato quasi, from נָרַם, to fill, to shut up, to conclude; the derivation (which has been adopted since Gesenius) from the Arab. word having the same sound, نَام, stridere, to shrill, to rattle (but not stertere, to snore), lies remote in the Niph., and also contradicts the usage of the word, according to which it designates a state in which all free activity is bound, and all reference to the external world is interrupted; cf. תְּרַדְדָה, xix. 15, of dulness, apathy, somnolency in the train of slothfulness. The LXX. has here one distich more than the Hebr. text.

Ver. 6. There now follow two proverbs regarding the blessings and the curses which come to men, and which flow forth from them. Here, however, as throughout, we take each proverb by itself, that it might not appear as if we had a tetrastich before us. The first of these two antithetic distichs is:

Blessings (come) on the head of the just;
But violence covereth the mouth of the godless.

Blessings are, without being distinguished, bestowed as well as prayed for from above. Regarding the undistinguished uses of לְרִאשׁוֹ (of a recompense of reward), בְּרִאשׁוֹ (of penal recompense), and עַל־רִאשׁוֹ (especially of punishment), vid. under Gen. xlix. 26. If we understand, with Ewald, Bertheau, Elster, Zöckler, and others, the two lines after ver. 11, xix. 28, cf. x. 18: the mouth of the wicked covers (hides under a mask) violence, inasmuch as he speaks words of blessing while thoughts of malediction lurk behind them (Ps. lxii. 5), then we renounce the sharpness of the contrast. On the contrary, it is preserved if we interpret נִפְיָא as object: the violence that has gone out from it covereth the mouth of the wicked, i.e. it falls back upon his foul mouth; or as Fleischer (and Oetinger almost the same) paraphrases it: the deeds of violence that have gone forth from them are given back to them in curses and maledictions, so that going back they stop, as it were, their mouth, they bring them to silence; for it is unnecessary to take פִּי synecdochically for פְּנֵי (cf. e.g. Ps. lxi. 8), since in בְּרָכוֹת 6a are perhaps chiefly meant blessings of thankful acknowledgment on the part of men, and the giving prominence to the mouth of the wicked from which nothing good proceeds is well accounted for. The parallels do not hinder us thus to explain, since parts of proverbs repeating themselves in the Book of Proverbs often show a change of the meaning (vid. p. 24 f.). Hitzig's conjecture, יִכְפֶּה (better יִכְפֶּה), is unnecessary; for elsewhere we read, as here, that חֲמָס (violence), jure talionis, covers, יִכְפֶּה, the wicked, Hab. ii. 17, or that he, using "violence," therewith covers the whole of his external appearance, i.e. gives to it the brauded impress of the unrighteousness he has done (vid. Köhler under Mal. ii. 16).

Ver. 7. Thus, as ver. 6 says how it goes with the righteous and the wicked in this life, so this verse tells how it fares with them after death:

The memory of the righteous remains in blessings,
And the name of the godless rots.

The tradition regarding the writing of זָכַר with five (זָכַר) or six points (זָכַר) is doubtful (vid. Heidenheim in his ed. of the Pentateuch, Meôr Enajim, under Ex. xvii. 14); the Cod. 1294 and old printed copies have here זָכַר. Instead of לְבָרָכָה, לְבָרָה might be used; the phrase הָיָה לְבָרָכָה (opp. הָיָה לְקָלָה, often used by Jeremiah), subordinate to the substantival clause, paraphrases the passive, for it expresses a growing to something, and thus the entrance into a state of endurance. The remembrance of the righteous endures after his death, for he is thought of with thankfulness (זִ"ג = זָכַר, זָכַר צִדִּיק לְבָרָה, the usual appendix to the name of an honoured, beloved man who has died), because his works, rich in blessing, continue; the name of the godless, on the contrary, far from continuing fresh and green (Ps. lxii. 17) after his departure, becomes corrupt (רָקַב, from רָק, to be or to become thin, to dissolve in fine parts, tabescere), like a worm-eaten decayed tree (Isa. xl. 20). The Talmud explains it thus, Joma 38b: foulness comes over their name, so that we call no one after their name. Also the idea suggests itself, that his name becomes corrupt, as it were, with his bones; the Mishna, at least Ohaloth ii. 1, uses רָקִיב of the dust of corruption.

Ver. 8. There follows now a series of proverbs in which reference to sins of the mouth and their contrary prevails:

He that is wise in heart receives precepts;

But he that is of a foolish mouth comes to ruin.

אִיכָמֶלֶב, wise-hearted, is one whose heart is חָכֵם, xxiii. 15; in a word, a נִבְיָן, a person of understanding or judgment, xvi. 21. Such an one does not make his own knowledge the ne plus ultra, nor does he make his own will the noli me tangere; but he takes commands, i.e. instructions directing or prohibiting, to which he willingly subordinates himself as the outflow of a higher knowledge and will, and by which he sets bounds and limits to himself. But a fool of the lips, i.e. a braggart blunderer, one pleasing himself with vain talk (xiv. 23), falls prostrate, for he thinks that he knows all things better, and will take no pattern; but while he boasts himself from on high, suddenly all at once—for he offends against the fundamental principle of common life and of morality—he comes to lie low down on the ground. The Syr. and Targ. translate יִלְבָּט by, he is caught (Bertheau, ensnared); Aquila, Vulgate, Luther, δαρήσεται, he is slain; Symmachus, βασανισθήσεται; but all without any support in the usage of the language known to us. Theodotion, φυρήσεται, he is confounded, is not tenable; Joseph Kimchi, who after David Kimchi, under Hos. iv. 14, appeals in support of this meaning (אֶשְׁתַּבֵּשׁ, similarly Parchon: יתבלבל) to the Arabic, seems to think on iltibās, confusion. The demonstrable meanings of the verb לָבַט are the following: 1. To occasion trouble. Thus Mechilta, under Ex. xvii. 14, לָבַטוּ, one has imposed upon him trouble; Sifri, under Num. xi. 1, נִתְלַבְּטוּ, we are tired, according to which Rashi: he fatigues himself, but which fits neither to the subj. nor to the contrast, which is to be supposed. The same may be said of the meaning of the Syr. ḏabab, to drive on, to press, which without doubt accords with the former meaning of the word in the language of the Midrash. 2. In Arab. labat (R. lab, vid. Wünsche's Hos. p. 172), to throw any one down to the earth, so that he falls with his whole body his whole length; the passive נִלְבָּט, to be thus thrown down by another, or to throw oneself thus down, figuratively of one who falls hoplessly into evil and destruction (Fl.). The Arabic verb is also used of the springing run of the animal ridden on. (to gallop), and of the being lame (to hop), according to which in the Lex. the explanations, he hurries, or he wavers hither and thither, are offered by Kimchi (Græc. Venet. πλανηθήσεται). But the former of these explanations, corrui (= in calamitatem ruit), placed much nearer by the Arabic, is confirmed by the LXX. ὑποσκελισθήσεται, and by the Berēshith rabba, c. 52, where לבט is used in the sense to be ruined (= נכשל). Hitzig changes the passive into the active: "he throws the offered לָקַח scornfully to the ground," but the contrast does not require this. The wanton, arrogant boasting lies already in the designation of the subj. אָוִיל שֹׁפְתִים; and the sequel involves, as a consequence, the contrasted consequence of ready reception of the limitations and guidance of his own will by a higher.

Ver. 9. The form of this verse is like the eighth, word for word:

He that walketh in innocence walketh securely;
But he that goeth in secret ways is known.

The full form of בָּתוֹם does not, as Hitzig supposes, stand in causal connection with the Dechi, for the consonant text lying before us is at least 500 years older than the accentuation. For הִלֵּךְ תָּם at ii. 7, there is here הִלֵּךְ בָּתוֹם = הִלֵּךְ בְּדַרְכֵי תוֹם; so מְעַקֵּשׁ דְּרָכָיו denotes, after ii. 15, such an one אֲשֶׁר דְּרָכָיו עֲקָשִׁים. Expressed in the language of the N. T., תוֹם is the property of the ἀπλούς or ἀκέραιος, for the fundamental idea of fulness is here referred to full submission, full integrity. Such an one goes בָּטח (Aquila, ἀμερμύνης), for there is nothing designedly concealed by him, of which he has reason to fear that it will come to the light; whoever, on the contrary, makes his ways crooked, i.e. turns into crooked ways, is perceived, or, as we might also explain it (vid. under Gen. iv. 15): if one (qui = si quis) makes his ways crooked, then it is known—nothing, however, stands opposed to the reference of הָיָא to the person: he is finally known, i.e. unmasked (LXX. Jerome, γνωσθήσεται, manifestus fiet). Usually it is explained: he is knowing, clever, with the remark that נָדַע is here the passive of הוֹדִיעַ (Gesen., Ewald, Hitzig); Hiph. to give to feel; Niph. to become to feel, properly to be made to know (Luth.: made wise); but the passive of the Hiph. is the Hoph. Such a Niph. in which the causative (not simply transitive) signification of the Hiph. would be applied passively is without example (vid. Ewald, § 133a); the meaning of Jer. xxxi. 19 also is: after I have become known, i.e. been made manifest, uncovered, drawn into the light.

Ver. 10. This verse contains another proverb, similarly formed, parallel with the half of ver. 8 :

He that winketh with the eye causeth trouble ;
And a foolish mouth comes to ruin.

Regarding the winking or nipping, i.e. the repeated nipping of the eyes (cf. nictare, frequent. of nicere), as the conduct of the malicious or malignant, which aims at the derision or injury of him to whom it refers, vid. under vi. 13 ; there ףף was connected with ך of the means of the action ; here, as Ps. xxxv. 19, cf. Prov. xvi. 30, it is connected with the object accus. He who so does produces trouble (heart-sorrow, xv. 13), whether it be that he who is the butt of this mockery marks it, or that he is the victim of secretly concerted injury ; ףף is not here used impersonally, as xiii. 10, but as xxix. 15, cf. Lev. xix. 28, xxiv. 20, in the sense of the cause. 10*b* forms a striking contrast to 10*a*, according to the text of the LXX. : ὁ δὲ ἐλέγχων μετὰ παρρησίας εἰρηνοποιεῖ. The Targ., however, abides, contrary to the Syr., by the Hebrew text, which certainly is older than this its correction, which Ewald and Lagarde unsuccessfully attempt to translate into Hebrew. The foolish mouth, here understood in conformity with 10*a*, is one who talks at random, without examination and deliberation, and thus suddenly stumbles and falls over, so that he comes to lie on the ground, to his own disgrace and injury.

Ver. 11. Another proverb, similar to the half of ver. 6 :

A fountain of life is the mouth of the righteous ;
But the mouth of the godless hideth violence.

If we understand 11*b* wholly as 6*b* : os improborum obteget violentia, then the meaning of 11*a* would be, that that which the righteous speaks tends to his own welfare (Fl.). But since the words spoken are the means of communication and of intercourse, one has to think of the water as welling up in one, and flowing forth to another ; and the meaning of 11*b* has to accommodate itself to the preceding half proverb, whereby it cannot be mistaken that םף (violence), which was 6*b* subj., bears here, by the contrast, the stamp of the obj. ; for the possibility of manifold windings and turnings is a characteristic of the Mashal. In the Psalms and Prophets it is God who is called םף ףף, Ps. xxxvi. 10, Jer. ii. 13, xvii. 13 ; the proverbial poetry plants the figure on ethical ground, and understands by it a living power, from which wholesome effects accrue to its possessor, xiv. 27, and go forth from him to others, xiii. 14. Thus the mouth of the righteous is here called a fountain of life, because that which he speaks, and as he speaks it, is morally strengthening, intellectually elevating, and inwardly quickening in its effect on the hearers; while, on the contrary, the mouth of the godless covereth wrong (violentiam), i.e. conceals with deceitful words the intention, directed not to that which is best, but to the disadvantage and ruin of his neighbours; so that words which in the one case bring to light a ground of life and of love, and make it effectual, in the other case serve for a covering to an immoral, malevolent background.

Ver. 12. Another proverb of the different effects of hatred and of love:

Hate stirreth up strife,
And love covereth all transgressions.

Regarding מְרִיבִים, for which the Keri elsewhere substitutes מְרַיִיבִים, vid. under vi. 14. Hatred of one's neighbour, which is of itself an evil, has further this bad effect, that it calls forth hatred, and thus stirreth up strife, feuds, factions, for it incites man against man (cf. עָרַר, Job iii. 8); on the contrary, love covers not merely little errors, but also greater sins of every kind (כָּל־פְּשָׁעִים), viz. by pardoning them, concealing them, excusing them, if possible, with mitigating circumstances, or restraining them before they are executed. All this lies in the covering. James, however, gives it, v. 20, another rendering: love covers them, viz. from the eyes of a holy God; for it forgives them to the erring brother, and turns him from the error of his way. The LXX. improperly translate πάντας δὲ τοὺς μὴ φιλονεικοῦντας κελόπτει φιλία; but Peter (1 Pet. iv. 8) as well as James, but none of the Greek versions: ἡ ἀγάπη καλύπτει πλήθος ἁμαρτιῶν. The Romish Church makes use of this passage as a proof for the introduction of the fides formata, viz. caritate, in justification, which is condemned in the Apology of the Augsburg Confession; and, indeed, the multitudo peccatorum is not meant of the sins of him who cherishes love, but of the sins of the neighbour. Sin stirs up hatred in men in their relation to one another; but love covers the already existing sins, and smooths the disturbances occasioned by them.

Ver. 13. There follow now two other proverbs on the use and abuse of speech:

On the lips of the man of understanding wisdom is found;
And the rod for the back of the fool.

With Löwenstein, Hitzig, and others, it is inadmissible to regard לִשְׁנֵי as second subject to מִצֵּיט. The mouth itself, or the word of the mouth, may be called a rod, viz. a rod of correction (Isa. xi. 4); but that wisdom and such a rod are found on the lips of the wise would be a combination and a figure in bad taste. Thus 13b is a clause by itself, as Luther renders it: "but a rod belongs to the fool's back;" and this will express a contrast to 13a, that while wisdom is to be sought for on the lips of the man of understanding (cf. Mal. ii. 7), a man devoid of understanding, on the contrary, gives himself to such hollow and corrupt talk, that in order to educate him to something better, if possible, the rod must be applied to his back; for, according to the Talmudic proverb: that which a wise man gains by a hint, a fool only obtains by a club. The rod is called מִצֵּיט, from צֵיט, to be smooth, to go straight down (as the hair of the head); and the back נֶי, from נָי, to be rounded, i.e. concave or convex.

Ver. 14 Wise men store up knowledge;

But the mouth of the fool is threatening destruction.

Ewald, Bertheau, Hitzig, Oetinger: "The mouth of the fool blunders out, and is as the sudden falling in of a house which one cannot escape from." But since מִצֵּיט is a favourite Mishle-word to denote the effect and issue of that which is dangerous and destructive, so the sense is perhaps further to be extended: the mouth of the fool is for himself (xiii. 3) and others a near, i.e. an always threatening and unexpectedly occurring calamity; unexpectedly, because suddenly he blunders out with his inconsiderate shame-bringing talk, so that such a fool's mouth is to every one a præsens periculum. As to צֵיט, it is worthy of remark that in the Beduin, ضغن, fut. i, signifies to be still, to be thoughtful, to be absorbed in oneself (vid. Wetstein on Job, p. 281). According to Codd. and editions, in this correct, יִפֵּי is to be written instead of יִפֵּי אֵייל; vid. the law concerning the Makkeph in the three poetical books, Baer's Torath Emeth, p. 40.

A pair of proverbs regarding possession and gain.

Ver. 15. Regarding possession:

The rich man's wealth is his strong city;

The destruction of the poor is their poverty.

The first line=xviii. 11. One may render the idea according to that which is internal, and according to that which is external; and the proverb remains in both cases true. As נָי may mean, of itself alone, power, as means of protection, or a bulwark (Ps. viii. 3), or the consciousness of power, high feeling, pride (Judg. v. 21); so קִרְיָתוֹ עִזּוֹ may be rendered as an object of self-confidence, and מִתְחַתָּהוּ, on the contrary, as an object of terror (Jer. xlviii. 39): the rich man, to whom his estate (vid. on הוֹן, p. 63) affords a sure reserve and an abundant source of help, can appear confident and go forth energetically; on the contrary, the poor man is timid and bashful, and is easily dejected and discouraged. Thus e.g. Oetinger and Hitzig. But the objective interpretation is allowable, and lies also much nearer: the rich man stands thus independent, changes and adversities cannot so easily overthrow him, he is also raised above many hazards and temptations; on the contrary, the poor man is overthrown by little misfortunes, and his despairing endeavours to save himself, when they fail, ruin him completely, and perhaps make him at the same time a moral outlaw. It is quite an experienced fact which this proverb expresses, but one from which the double doctrine is easily derived: (1) That it is not only advised, but also commanded, that man make the firm establishing of his external life-position the aim of his endeavour; (2) That one ought to treat with forbearance the humble man; and if he always sinks deeper and deeper, one ought not to judge him with unmerciful harshness and in proud self-exaltation.

Ver. 16. Regarding gain:

The gain of the righteous tendeth to life;
The income of the godless to sin.

Intentionally, that which the righteous receives is called פְּעֻלָּתוֹ (as Lev. xix. 13), as a reward of his labour; that which the godless receives is called חֲבוּתָאָהוּ, as income which does not need to be the reward of labour, and especially of his own immediate labour. And with לְחַיִּים לְחַטָּאת, runs parallel, from the supposition that sin carries the germ of death in itself. The reward of his labour serves to the righteous to establish his life, i.e. to make sure his life-position, and to elevate his life-happiness. On the contrary, the income of the godless serves only to ruin his life; for, made thereby full and confident, he adds sin to sin, whose wages is death. Hitzig translates: for expiation, i.e. to lose it again as atonement for past sins; but if חַיִּים and חַטָּאת are contrasted with each other, then חַטָּאת is death-bringing sin (viii. 35 f.).

The group of proverbs now following bring again to view the good and bad effects of human speech. The seventeenth verse introduces the transition :

Ver. 17 There is a way to life when one gives heed to correction ;
And whoever disregards instruction runs into error.

Instead of אָרַח הַיָּם (v. 6), there is here אָרַח לְחַיִּים ; and then this proverb falls into rank with ver. 16, which contains the same word לְחַיִּים. The accentuation denotes אָרַח as subst. ; for אָרַח [way, road] = אָרַח [a wayfarer, part. of אָרַח] would, as שָׁמַע, Lev. xi. 7, נָטַע, Ps. xciv. 9, have the tone on the ultima. It is necessary neither to change the tone, nor, with Ewald, to interpret אָרַח as abstr. pro concreto, like הִלָּךְ, for the expression “wanderer to life” has no support in the Mishle. Michaelis has given the right interpretation: via ad vitam est si quis custodiat disciplinam. The syntactical contents, however, are different, as e.g. 1 Sam. ii. 13, where the participle has the force of a hypothetical clause ; for the expression : “a way to life is he who observes correction,” is equivalent to : he is on the way to life who . . . ; a variety of the manner of expression : “the porch was twenty cubits,” 2 Chron. iii. 4, particularly adapted to the figurative language of proverbial poetry, as if the poet said : See there one observant of correction—that (viz. the שָׁמַר [שָׁמַר, to watch] representing itself in this שָׁמַר) is the way to life. מוֹסֵר and מוֹכֵחַת are related to each other as παιδεία and ἐλεγχος ; עָזַב [עָזַב, to leave, forsake] is equivalent to בָּלַתִּי שָׁמַר מִתְעָה. בָּלַתִּי שָׁמַר would be unsuitable as a contrast in the causative sense : who guides wrong, according to which Bertheau understands 17a, that only he who observes correction can guide others to life. We expect to hear what injuries he who thinks to raise himself above all reproach brings on himself. Hitzig, in his Commentary (1858), for this reason places the Hithpa. מִתְעָה (rather write מִתְעָה) in the place of the Hiph. ; but in the Comm. on Jeremiah (1866), xlii. 20, he rightly remarks : “To err, not as an involuntary condition, but as an arbitrary proceeding, is suitably expressed by the Hiph.” In like manner הִנִּיחַ (to touch), הִרְחִיק (to go to a distance), denote the active conduct of a being endowed with reason ; Ewald, § 122, c. Jewish interpreters gloss מִתְעָה by supplying נִשְׁטוּ ; but it signifies only as inwardly transitive, to accomplish the action of the תְּעוֹת.

Ver. 18 He that hideth hatred is a mouth of falsehood ;
And he that spreadeth slander is a fool.

The LXX., καλύπτουσω ἔχθραν χεῖλα δίκαια, which Ewald prefers, and which has given occasion to Hitzig to make a remarkable conjecture ("He who conceals hatred, close lips," which no one understands without Hitzig's comment. to this his conjecture). But (1) to hide hatred (cf. ver. 11, xxvi. 24) is something altogether different from to cover sin (ver. 12, xvii. 9), or generally to keep anything secret with discretion (x. 13); and (2) that δικαία is a corrupt reading for ἄδικα (as Grabe supposes, and Symmachus translates) or δόλια (as Lagarde supposes, and indeed is found in Codd.). Michaelis well remarks: odium tectum est dolosi, manifesta sycophantia stultorum. Whoever conceals hateful feelings behind his words is שֵׁפֶטֶר הַחֵץ, a mouth of falsehood (cf. the mouth of the fool, ver. 14); one does not need to supply שֵׁפֶטֶר, but much rather has hence to conclude that a false man is simply so named, as is proved by Ps. cxx. 3. There is a second moral judgment, 18b: he who spreadeth slander (שֵׁפֶטֶר, according to the Masoretic writing: he who divulges it, the correlate to הביא, to bring to, Gen. xxxvii. 2) is a Thor [fool, stupid, dull], כִּסִּיל (not a Narr [fool, godless person], אִוִּיל); for such slandering can generally bring no advantage; it injures the reputation of him to whom the רִבְיָה, i.e. the secret report, the slander, refers; it sows discord, has incalculable consequences, and finally brings guilt on the tale-bearer himself.

Ver. 19 In a multitude of words transgression is not wanting;
But he who restrains his lips shows wisdom.

We do not, with Bertheau, understand 19a: by many words a transgression does not cease to be what it is; the contrast 19b requires a more general condemnation of the multitude of words, and לֹא יִתְּרֹם not only means to cease from doing (to leave off), and to cease from being (to take away), but also not at all to do (to intermit, Ezek. iii. 11; Zech. xi. 12), and not at all to be (to fail, to be absent), thus: ubi verborum est abundantia non deest peccatum (Fl.). Michaelis suitably compares πολυλογία πολλά σφάλματα ἔχει by Stobäus, and כל המרבה דברים מביא חטא in the tractate Aboth i. 17, wherewith Rashi explains the proverb. פֶּשַׁע is not here, as elsewhere, e.g. Ps. xix. 14, with special reference to the sin of falling away from favour, apostasy, but, like the post-biblical עֲבָרָה, generally with reference to every kind of violation (פֶּשַׁע = فسق dirumpere) of moral restraint; here, as Jansen remarks, peccatum sive mendacii, sive detractiois, sive alterius indiscretæ læsionis, sive vanitatis, sive denique verbi otiosi. In 19*b* it is more appropriate to regard לִשְׂפָתַי as the present of the internal transitive (intelligenter agit) than to interpret it in the attributive sense (intelligens).

Ver. 20 Choice silver is the tongue of the righteous ;
But the heart of the godless is little worth.

Choice silver is, as viii. 19, cf. 10, pure, freed from all base mixtures. Like it, pure and noble, is whatever the righteous speaks; the heart, i.e. the manner of thought and feeling, of the godless is, on the contrary, like little instar nihili, i.e. of little or no worth, Arab. yasway kályla (Fl.). LXX.: the heart of the godless ἐκλελεψει, i.e. יטעט, at first arrogant and full of lofty plans, it becomes always the more dejected, discouraged, empty. But 20*a* leads us to expect some designation of its worth. The Targ. (according to which the Peshito is to be corrected; vid. Levy's Wörterbuch, ii. 26): the heart of the godless is מִחֲתָה (from חָתָה), refuse, dross. The other Greek versions accord with the text before us.

Ver. 21 The lips of the righteous edify many ;
But fools die through want of understanding.

The LXX. translate 21*a*: the lips of the righteous ἐπίσταται ὑψηλά, which would at least require ידעו רבות רעה. רעה is, like the post-bibl. פִּרְנִים (vid. the Hebr. Römerbrief, p. 97), another figure for the N. T. οἰκοδομεῖν: to afford spiritual nourishment and strengthening, to which Fleischer compares the ecclesiastical expressions: pastor, ovile ecclesiae, les ouailles; רעה means leader, Jer. x. 21, as well as teacher, Eccles. xii. 11, for it contains partly the prevailing idea of leading, partly of feeding. רעה stands for פִּרְעִינָה, as ver. 32, v. 2. In 21*b*, Bertheau incorrectly explains, as Euchel and Michaelis: stulti complures per dementem unum moriuntur; the fool has truly enough in his own folly, and needs not to be first drawn by others into destruction. חֵסֶר is not here the connective form of חָסַר (Jewish interpreters: for that reason, that he is such an one), nor of חָסַר (Hitzig, Zöckler), which denotes, as a concluded idea, penuria, but like רָחַב, xxi. 4, שָׁבַב, vi. 10, and שָׁפַל, xvi. 19, infin.: they die by want of understanding (cf. v. 23); this amentia is the cause of their death, for it leads fools to meet destruction without their observing it (Hos. iv. 6).

Three proverbs which say that good comes from above, and is as a second nature to the man of understanding:

Ver. 22 Jahve's blessing—it maketh rich ;
 And labour addeth nothing thereto

Like 24a, הֵיאָ limits the predicate to this and no other subject: "all depends on God's blessing." Here is the first half of the ora et labora. The proverb is a compendium of Ps. cxxvii. 1, 2. 22b is to be understood, according to ver. 2 of this Solomonic psalm, not that God adds to His blessing no sorrow, much rather with the possession grants at the same time a joyful, peaceful mind (LXX., Targ., Syriac, Jerome, Aben-Ezra, Michaelis, and others), which would require the word עֲלִיָּה; but that trouble, labour, i.e. strenuous self-endeavours, add not (anything) to it, i.e. that it does not associate itself with the blessing (which, as the Jewish interpreters rightly remark, is, according to its nature, תּוֹסֵפֶת, as the curse is חֲסֵרֶת) as the causa efficiens, or if we supply quidquam, as the complement to עִמָּה [along with it]: nothing is added thereto, which goes along with that which the blessing of God grants, and completes it. Thus correctly Rashi, Luther, Ziegler, Ewald, Hitzig, Zöckler. The now current accentuation, וְלֹא יוֹסֵף עֲצֵב עִמָּה, is incorrect. Older editions, as Venice 1525, 1615, Basel 1618, have וְלֹא יוֹסֵף עֲצֵב עִמָּה, the transformation of וְלֹא יוֹסֵף עֲצֵב. Besides, עֲצֵב has double Segol (vid. Kimchi's Lex.), and יוֹסֵף is written, according to the Masora, in the first syllable plene, in the last defective.

Ver. 23 Like sport to a fool is the commission of a crime ;
 And wisdom to a man of understanding.

Otherwise Löwenstein : to a fool the carrying out of a plan is as sport ; to the man of understanding, on the contrary, as wisdom. וְיָפֶה, from וְיָמַם, to press together, mentally to think, as Job xvii. 11, and according to Gesenius, also Prov. xxi. 27, xxiv. 9. But וְיָפֶה has the prevailing signification of an outrage against morality, a sin of unchastity ; and especially the phrase וְיָפֶה וְעָשָׂה is in Judg. xx. 6 and in Ezekiel not otherwise used, so that all the old interpreters render it here by patrare scelus; only the Targum has the equivocal עֲבַד עֲבִידָתָא; the Syriac, however, حَبَّ حَسَبًا. Sinful conduct appears to the fool, who places himself above the solemnity of the moral law, as sport ; and wisdom, on the contrary, (appears as sport) to a man of understanding. We would not venture on this accaptation of בְּשִׂחוֹת if עֲשֵׂה were not attributed, viii. 30 f., to wisdom itself. This alternate relationship recommends itself by the indetermination of וְיָפֶה, which is not favourable to the interpretation :

sed sapientiam colit vir intelligens, or as Jerome has it: sapientia autem est viro prudentia. The subjects of the antithesis chiasmically combine within the verse: חכמה, in contrast to wicked conduct, is acting in accordance with moral principles. This to the man of understanding is as easy as sporting, just as to the fool is shameless sinning; for he follows in this an inner impulse, it brings to him joy, it is the element in which he feels himself satisfied.

Ver. 24 That of which the godless is afraid cometh upon him,
And what the righteous desires is granted to him.

The formation of the clause 24a is like the similar proverb, xi. 27b; the subject-idea has there its expression in the genitival annexum, of which Gen. ix. 6b furnishes the first example; in this passage before us it stands at the beginning, and is, as in ver. 22, emphatically repeated with אָהֵר. מִנְעוּרָה, properly the turning oneself away, hence shrinking back in terror; here, as Isa. lxvi. 4, of the object of fear, parallel to תִּשְׁאָלָה, wishing, of the object of the wish. In 24b Ewald renders אָהֵר as adj. from אָהֵר (whence אָהֵר), after the form אָהֵר, and translates: yet to the righteous desire is always green. But whether אָהֵר is probably formed from אָהֵר, and not from אָהֵר, is a question in xii. 12, but not here, where wishing and giving (fulfilling) are naturally correlata. Hitzig corrects אָהֵר, and certainly the supplying of 'ה is as little appropriate here as at xiii. 21. Also a "one gives" is scarcely intended (according to which the Targ., Syr., and Jerome translate passively), in which case the Jewish interpreters are wont to explain אָהֵר, scil. הִנְחֵם; for if the poet thought of אָהֵר with a personal subject, why did he not rescue it from the dimness of such vague generality? Thus, then, אָהֵר is, with Böttcher, to be interpreted as impersonal, like xiii. 10, Job xxxvii. 10, and perhaps also Gen. xxxviii. 28 (Ewald, § 295a): what the righteous wish, that there is, i.e. it becomes actual, is fulfilled. In this we have not directly and exclusively to think of the destiny at which the godless are afraid (Heb. x. 27), and toward which the desire of the righteous goes forth; but the clause has also truth which is realized in this world: just that which they greatly fear, e.g. sickness, bankruptcy, the loss of reputation, comes upon the godless; on the contrary, that which the righteous wish realizes itself, because their wish, in its intention, and kind, and content, stands in harmony with the order of the moral world.

There now follows a series of proverbs, broken by only one dissimilar proverb, on the immoveable continuance of the righteous:

Ver. 25 When the storm sweeps past, it is no more with the wicked ;
But the righteous is a building firm for ever.

How ver. 25 is connected with ver. 24 is shown in the Book of Wisdom v. 15 (the hope of the wicked like chaff which the wind pursues). The Aram., Jerome, and Græc. Venet. interpret כ of comparison, so that the destruction of the godless is compared in suddenness and rapidity to the rushing past of a storm ; but then הִנֵּה ought to have been used instead of סָפָה ; and instead of רָשָׁע אֲנִי with the ו apodosis, a disturbing element in such a comparison, would have been used רָשָׁע אֲנִי, or at least אֲנִי רָשָׁע. The thought is no other than that of Job xxi. 18: the storm, which is called סָפָה, from סָפַח, to rush forth, is meant, as sweeping forth, and כ the temporal, as Ex. xi. 4 (LXX. παραπορευομένης καταγλιδος), with ו apod. following, like e.g., after a similar member of a temporal sentence, Isa. x. 25. סָפָה is a figure of God-decreed calamities, as war and pestilence, under which the godless sink, while the righteous endure them ; cf. with 25a, i. 27, Isa. xxviii. 18 ; and with 25b, iii. 25, Hab. ii. 4, Ps. xci. "An everlasting foundation," since אֲנִי is understood as looking forwards, not as at Isa. lviii. 12, backwards, is a foundation capable of being shaken by nothing, and synecdoch. generally a building. The proverb reminds us of the close of the Sermon on the Mount, and finds the final confirmation of its truth in this, that the death of the godless is a penal thrusting of them away, but the death of the righteous a lifting them up to their home. The righteous also often enough perish in times of war and of pestilence ; but the proverb, as it is interpreted, verifies itself, even although not so as the poet, viewing it from his narrow O. T. standpoint, understood it ; for the righteous, let him die when and how he may, is preserved, while the godless perishes.

Ver. 26. This proverb stands out of connection with the series :

As vinegar to the teeth, and as smoke to the eyes,
So is the sluggard to them who give him a commission.

A parabolic proverb (vid. p. 9), priamel-like in its formation (p. 13). Here and there אֲנִי is found with Mugrash, but in correct texts it has Rebîa-magnum ; the verse is divided into two by Athnach, whose subordinate distributive is (Accentssystem, xi. § 1) Rebîa-magnum. Smoke makes itself disagreeably perceptible to the sense of smell, and particularly to the eyes, which it causes to smart so that they overflow with tears ; wherefore Virgil speaks of it as amarus, and Horace lacrimosus. חָמֵץ (from חָמַץ, to be sour, harsh) signifies properly that which is sour, as acetum, ὄξος; here, after the LXX. δμφαξ, the unripe grapes, but which are called בִּטָּר (בִּטָּרָה) (vid. under Job xv. 33), by which the Syr., here following the LXX., translates, and which also in the Talmud, Demaï i. 1, is named חֶצֶן, after a doubtful meaning (vid. Aruch, and on the other side Rashi), thus: vinegar, which the word commonly means, and which also accords with the object of the comparison, especially if one thinks of the sharp vinegar-wine of the south, which has an effect on the teeth denoted by the Hebr. verb יהה, as the effect of smoke is by כהה (Fl.). The plur. לְשֹׁלְהֵי is that of the category, like xxii. 21, xxv. 13; the parallel אֲרֵנִי of the latter passage does not at least make it necessary to regard it, like this, as a plur. excellentiæ (Bertheau, Hitzig, Ewald). They who send a sluggard, i.e. who make him their agent, do it to their own sorrow; his slothfulness is for them, and for that which they have in view, of dull, i.e. slow and restrained, of biting, i.e. sensibly injurious operation.

From this point the proverbs fall into the series connecting themselves with ver. 25:

Ver. 27 The fear of Jahve multiplies the days of life;
But the years of the godless are shortened.

This parable, like ver. 25, also corresponds with the O. T. standpoint, having in view the present life. The present-life history confirms it, for vice destroys body and soul; and the fear of God, which makes men contented and satisfied in God, is truly the right principle of longevity. But otherwise also the pious often enough die early, for God carries them away כּפּוּנֵי הָרַעָה [from the face of the evil], Isa. lvii. 1 f.; or if they are martyrs for the truth (Ps. xlv. 23, cf. lx. 6), the verification of the above proverb in such cases moves forward (Wisd. iv. 7 ff.) into eternity, in which the life of the pious continues for ever, while that of the godless loses itself with his death in the state of everlasting death. ix. 11, cf. iii. 2, resembles 27a. Instead of תִּקְצְרֶנָּה, תִּקְצְרֶנָּה was to be expected; but the flexion does not distinguish the transitive קָצַר (Arab. kaṣara) and intransitive קָצַר (Arab. kaṣura) as it ought.

Ver. 28 The expectation of the righteous is gladness,
And the hope of the godless comes to nothing.

תּוֹחֶלֶת as well as תִּקְוָה proceed on the fundamental idea of a strained earnest looking back upon something, the same fundamental idea which in another view gives the meaning of strength (חֵיל, Arab. ḥayl; kuwwat, kawiyiy, cf. בְּרִיל, Arab. jdl, plectere, and בְּרִיל, strong and strength). The substantival clause 28a denotes nothing more than : it is gladness (cf. iii. 17, all their steps are gladness), but which is equivalent to, it is that in its issue, in gaudium desinit. Hitzig's remark that תחלת is the chief idea for hope and fear, is not confirmed by the usage of the language; it always signifies joyful, not anxious, expectation; cf. the interchange of the same two synonyms xiii. 7, and תַּיִת, Ps. cxii. 10, instead of תַּיִת (here and Job viii. 13). While the expectation of the one terminates in the joy of the fulfilment, the hope of the other (אבר, R. בר, to separate) perishes, i.e. comes to nothing.

Ver. 29 Jahve's way is a bulwark to the righteous;
But ruin to those that do evil.

Of the two meanings which קָעוּ (קָעוּ) has : a stronghold from קָעוּ, and asylum (= Arab. m'adz) from קָעוּ, the contrast here demands the former. 'הַ קָעוּ' and 'הַ קָעוּ', understood objectively, are the two O. T. names of true religion. It means, then, the way which the God of revelation directs men to walk in (Ps. cxliii. 8), the way of His precepts, Ps. cxix. 27, His way of salvation, Ps. lxxvii. 3 (4); in the N. T. ἡ ὁδὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ, Matt. xxii. 16, Acts xviii. 25 f.; cf. ἡ ὁδὸς simply, Acts ix. 2, xxiv. 14. This way of Jahve is a fortress, bulwark, defence for innocence, or more precisely, a disposition wholly, i.e. unreservedly and without concealment, directed toward God and that which is good. All the old interpreters, also Luther, but not the Græc. Venet., translate as if the expression were לְתָם; but the punctuation has preferred the abstr. pro concreto, perhaps because the personal תָּם nowhere else occurs with any such prefix; on the contrary, תָּם is frequently connected with ב, ב, ל. לתם דרך, integro viæ (vitæ), are by no means to be connected in one conception (Ziegler, Umbr., Elster), for then the poet ought to have written מָעוּ יִהְיֶה לְתָם-דֶּרֶךְ. 29b cannot be intepreted as a thought by itself : and ruin (vid. regarding מַחֲרָה, ruina, and subjectively con-sternatio, ver. 16) comes to those who do evil; but the thought, much more comprehensive, that religion, which is for the righteous a strong protection and safe retreat, will be an overthrow to those who delight only in wickedness (vid. on אָז, p. 143), is confirmed by the similarly formed distich, xxi. 15. Also almost all the Jewish interpreters, from Rashi to Malbim, find here expressed the operation of the divine revelation set over against the conduct of men,—essentially the same as when the Tora or the Chokma present to men for their choice life and death; or the gospel of salvation, according to 2 Cor. ii. 15, is to one the savour of life unto life, to another the savour of death unto death.

Ver. 30 The righteous is never moved ;
But the godless abide not in the land.

Love of home is an impulse and emotion natural to man ; but to no people was fatherland so greatly delighted in, to none was exile and banishment from fatherland so dreadful a thought, as it was to the people of Israel. Expatriation is the worst of all evils with which the prophets threatened individuals and the people, Amos vii. 17, cf. Isa. xxii. 17 f. ; and the history of Israel in their exile, which was a punishment of their national apostasy, confirms this proverb and explains its form ; cf. ii. 21 f., Ps. xxxvii. 29. לֹא is, like ix. 13, the emphatic No of the more elevated style ; נִסְוֹת, the opposite of נִבְטָן, xii. 3 ; and שָׁרְפוֹ signifies to dwell, both inchoative : to come to dwell, and consecutive : to continue to dwell (e.g. Isa. lvii. 15, of God who inhabiteth eternity). In general, the proverb means that the righteous fearlessly maintains the position he takes ; while, on the contrary, all they who have no hold on God lose also their outward position. But often enough this saying is fulfilled in this, that they, in order that they may escape disgrace, became wanderers and fugitives, and are compelled to conceal themselves among strangers.

Ver. 31. For the third time the favourite theme already handled in three appendixes is taken up :

The mouth of the righteous bringeth forth wisdom,
And the tongue of falsehood shall be rooted up.

Regarding the biblical comparison of thoughts with branches, and of words with flowers and fruits, vid. my Psychol. p. 181 ; and regarding the root נָבַ (with its weaker אָב), to swell up and to spring up (to well, grow, etc.), vid. what is said in the Comm. on Genesis on נִבְיָא, and in Isaiah on אָב. We use the word נִבַּ of that which sprouts or grows, and נִבְבּ of that which causes that something sprout ; but also נִבַּ may, after the manner of verbs of being full (iii. 10), of flowing (Gesen. § 138, 1, Anm. 2), take the object accus. of that from which anything sprouts (xxiv. 31), or which sprouting, it raises up and brings forth (cf. Isa. lvii. 19). The mouth of the righteous sprouts, brings forth (in Ps. xxxvii. 30, without a figure, יִדְבָּרָה, i.e. utters) wisdom, which in all relations knows how to find out that which is truly good, and suitable for the end intended, and happily to unriddle difficult complications.

The conception of wisdom, in itself practical (from חכם, to be thick = solid, firm), here gains such contents by the contrast: the tongue—whose character and fruit is falsehood, which has its delight in intentional perversions of fact, and thus increaseth complications (vid. regarding תְּהַפְּכוֹת, ii. 12)—is rooted up, whence it follows as regards the mouth of the righteous, that it continues for ever with that its wholesome fruit.

Ver. 32 The lips of the righteous know what is acceptable;
But the mouth of the godless is mere falsehood.

Hitzig, instead of לִפְתָּי, reads לִפְתָּי; the ἀποστάζει [they distil or send forth] of the LXX. does not favour this, for it is probably only a corruption of ἐπίσταται, which is found in several MSS. The Græc. Venet., which translates ποιμανούσι, makes use of a MS. which it sometimes misreads. The text does not stand in need of any emendations, but rather of a corrected relation between the clauses, for the relation of 31a with 32b, and of 32a with 31b, strongly commends itself (Hitzig); in that case the explanation lies near: the lips of the righteous find what is acceptable, viz. to God. But this thought in the Mashal language is otherwise expressed (xii. 2 and paral.); and also 32a and 32b fit each other as contrasts, if by לִפְתָּי, as xi. 27, xiv. 9, is to be understood that which is acceptable in its widest generality, equally then in relation to God and man. It is a question whether ידען means that they have knowledge of it (as one e.g. says ידע סֵפֶר, to understand writing, i.e. the reading of it), or that they think thereupon (cf. xxvii. 23). Fundamentally the two ideas, according to the Hebrew conception of the words, lie in each other; for the central conception, perceiving, is biblically equivalent to a delighted searching into or going towards the object. Thus: the lips of the righteous think of that which is acceptable (לִפְתָּי, cogn. to חן, gracefulness; χάρις, Col. iv. 6); while the mouth of the godless is mere falsehood, which God (the wisdom of God) hates, and from which discord on all sides arises. We might transfer ידען to 32b; but this line, interpreted as a clause by itself, is stronger and more pointed (Fl.)

The next three proverbs treat of honesty, discretion, and innocence or dove-like simplicity:

xi. 1 Deceitful balances are an abomination to Jahve;
But a full weight is His delight.

The very same proverb, with slightly varied expression, is found in xx. 23; and other such like proverbs, in condemnation of false and in approbation of true balances, are found, xx. 10, xvi. 11; similar predicates, but connected with other subjects, are found at xii. 22, xv. 8. "An abomination to Jahve" is an expression we have already twice met with in the introduction, iii. 32, vi. 16, cf. viii. 7; תועבה is, like תועה, a participial noun, in which the active conception of abhorring is transferred to the action accomplished. רצון is in post-biblical Hebr. the designation of the arbitrium and the voluntas; but here רצונו signifies not that which God wishes, but that which He delights in having. "מְרִמָּה" (here for the first time in Proverbs), from רָמָה, the Piel of which means (xxvi. 19) aliquem dolo et fraude petere. אָבֶן, like the Pers. sanak, sanakh, Arab. šajat, a stone for weight; and finally, without any reference to its root signification, like Zech. v. 8, אבן העופרת, a leaden weight, as when we say: a horseshoe of gold, a chess-man of ivory."

Ver. 2. Now follows the Solomonic "Pride goeth before a fall."

There cometh arrogance, so also cometh shame;
But with the humble is wisdom.

Interpreted according to the Hebr.: if the former has come, so immediately also comes the latter. The general truth as to the causal connection of the two is conceived of historically; the fact, confirmed by many events, is represented in the form of a single occurrence as a warning example; the preterites are like the Greek aoristi gnomici (vid. p. 32); and the perf., with the fut. consec. following, is the expression of the immediate and almost simultaneous consequence (vid. at Hab. iii. 10): has haughtiness (וָרָם after the form וָלָץ, from וָרַץ, to boil, to run over) appeared, then immediately also disgrace appeared, in which the arrogant behaviour is overwhelmed. The harmony of the sound of the Hebr. וָרָם and וָלָץ cannot be reproduced in German [nor in English]; Hitzig and Ewald try to do so, but such a quid pro quo as "Kommt Unglimpf kommt an ihn Schimpf" [there comes arrogance, there comes to him disgrace] is not a translation, but a distortion of the text. If, now, the antithesis says that with the humble is wisdom, wisdom is meant which avoids such disgrace as arrogance draws along with it; for the וָנִיץ thinks not more highly of himself than he ought to think (R. ץ, subsidiere, demitti, Deutsch. Morgenl. Zeitsch. xxv. 185).

Ver. 3 The integrity of the upright guideth them;

But the perverseness of the ungodly destroyeth them.

To the upright, יֵשְׁרִים, who keep the line of rectitude without turning aside therefrom into devious paths (Ps. cxv. 4 f.), stand opposed (as at ii. 21 f.) the ungodly (faithless),  $\text{בְּנֵי אֱדֹמִים}$ , who conceal (from  $\text{בָּנֵי}$ , to cover, whence  $\text{בָּנֵי} = \text{בְּנֵי}$ ) malicious thoughts and plans. And the contrast of  $\text{יִשְׁרָאֵל}$ , integrity = unreserved loving submission, is  $\text{הֶלֶב}$ , a word peculiar to the Solomonic Mashal, with its verb  $\text{הִלְבֵּן}$  (vid. p. 32). Hitzig explains it by the Arab. salaf, to step out, to tread over; and Ewald by lafat, to turn, to turn about ("treacherous, false step"), both of which are improbable. Schulzens compares salaf in the meaning to smear (R.  $\text{הָלַב}$ ,  $\text{בָּלַב}$ , ἀλείφειν; cf. regarding such secondary formations with sh preceding, Hupfeld on Ps. v. 7), and translates here, lubricitas. But this rendering is scarcely admissible. It has against it lexical tradition (Menahem:  $\text{מַוָּחָב}$ , wavering; Parchon:  $\text{הִיָּב}$ , falsifying; Kimchi:  $\text{מַוָּחָב}$ , misrepresentation, according to which the Græc. Venet. σκολιότης), as well as the methodical comparison of the words. The Syriac has not this verbal stem, but the Targum has  $\text{הִלְבֵּן}$  in the meaning to distort, to turn the wrong way (σκολιῶν, στρεβλοῦν), Prov. x. 10, and Esth. vi. 10, where, in the second Targum,  $\text{הִלְבֵּן מִפִּי}$  means "his mouth was crooked." With justice, therefore, Gesenius in his Thesaurus has decided in favour of the fundamental idea pervertere, from which also the Peshito and Saadia proceed; for in Ex. xxiii. 8 they translate (Syr.) mhapék (it, the gift of bribery, perverts) and (Arab.) tazyf (=  $\text{הִלְבֵּן}$ , it falsifies). Fl. also, who at xv. 4 remarks, " $\text{הִלְבֵּן}$ , from  $\text{הִלְבֵּן}$ , to stir up, to turn over, so that the lowermost becomes the uppermost," gives the preference to this primary idea, in view of the Arab. salaf, invertere terram conserendi causa. It is moreover confirmed by salaf, præcedere, which is pervertere modified to prævertere. But how does  $\text{הִלְבֵּן}$  mean perversio (Theod. ἵποσκελισμός), in the sense of the overthrow prepared for thy neighbour? The parallels demand the sense of a condition peculiar to the word and conduct of the godless (treacherous), xxii. 12 (cf. Ex. xxiii. 8), xix. 3, thus perversitas, perversity; but this as contrary to truth and rectitude (opp.  $\text{יִשְׁרָאֵל}$ ), "perverseness," as we have translated it, for we understand by it want of rectitude (dishonesty) and untruthfulness. While the sincerity of the upright conducts them, and, so to say, forms their salvus conductus, which guards them against the danger of erring and of hostile assault, the perverseness of the treacherous destroys them; for the disfiguring of truth avenges itself against them, and they experience the reverse of the proverb, “das Ehrlich währt am längsten” (honesty endures the longest). The Chethib דָּשָׁר (דָּשָׁרִים) is an error of transcription; the Keri has the proper correction, דָּשָׁרִים = דָּשָׁרִים, Jer. v. 6. Regarding שָׁרַף (whence שָׁרַף), which, from its root-signification of making close and fast, denotes violence and destruction, vid. under Gen. xvii.

Three proverbs in praise of צְדָקָה:

Ver. 4 Possessions are of no profit in the day of wrath;
But righteousness delivereth from death.

That which is new here, is only that possessions and goods (vid. regarding חָן, p. 63) are destitute of all value in the day of the μελλουσα ὀργή; for יּוֹם עֲבָרָה, the day of wrath breaking through the limits (of long-suffering), has the same meaning as in the prophets; and such prophetic words as Isa. x. 3, Zeph. i. 18, and, almost in the same words, Ezek. vii. 19, are altogether similar to this proverb. The LXX., which translates ἐν ἡμέρᾳ ἐπαγωγῆς, harmonizes in expression with Sir. v. 8, cf. ii. 2. Theodotion translates יָמֵי, xxvii. 10, by ἐπαγωγῆ (providence, fate).

Ver. 5 The righteousness of the blameless smootheneth his way,
And by his own wickedness doth the wicked fall.

With the תְּמִים (cf. i. 12), formed after the passive, more than with תָּם, is connected the idea of the perfected, but more in the negative sense of moral spotlessness than of moral perfection. The rectitude of a man who seeks to keep his conscience and his character pure, maketh smooth (שָׁרַף, as iii. 6, not of the straightness of the line, but of the surface, evenness) his life's path, so that he can pursue his aim without stumbling and hindrance, and swerving from the direct way; while, on the contrary, the godless comes to ruin by his godlessness—that by which he seeks to forward his interests, and to make a way for himself, becomes his destruction.

Ver. 6 The rectitude of the upright saveth them,
And in their own covetousness are the faithless taken.

The integrity of those who go straight forward and straight through, without permitting themselves to turn aside on crooked ways, delivers them from the snares which are laid for them, the dangers they encounter; while, on the contrary, the faithless, though they mask their intentions ever so cunningly, are ensnared in their passionate covetousness: the mask is removed, they are convicted, and are caught and lost. Regarding תְּהִיב, abyss, overthrow, also stumbling against anything = covetousness, vid. at x. 3, and under Ps. v. 10. The form of the expression 6b follows the scheme, “in the image of God created He man," Gen. ix. 6. The subject is to be taken from the genitive, as is marked by the accentuation, for it gives Mugrash to the וְיִבְרָתָהּ, as if it were the principal form, for וְיִבְרָתָהּ.

Three proverbs regarding destruction and salvation :

Ver. 7 When a godless man dies, his hope cometh to nought,
And the expectation of those who stand in fulness of strength is destroyed.

We have already remarked in the Introduction that אָמֵן is a favourite word of the Chokma, and the terminological distinction of different classes and properties of men (vid. pp. 40, 42); we read, vi. 12, אָמֵן בְּלִיעַל, and here, as also Job xx. 29, xxvii. 13, אָמֵן רָשָׁע, cf. xxi. 29, אָמֵן רָשָׁע, but generally only אָמֵן is used. A godless man, to whom earthly possessions and pleasure and honour are the highest good, and to whom no means are too base, in order that he may appease this his threefold passion, rocks himself in unbounded and measureless hopes; but with his death, his hope, i.e. all that he hoped for, comes to nought. The LXX. translate τελευτήσαντος ἀνδρὸς δικαίου οὐκ ἔλλυται ἔλπις, which is the converse of that which is here said, 7a: the hope of the righteous expects its fulfilment beyond the grave. The LXX. further translate, τὸ δὲ καύχημα (ἡλπίς) τῶν ἀσεβῶν ἔλλυται; but the distich in the Hebr. text is not an antithetic one, and whether אָמֵן may signify the wicked (thus also the Syr., Targ., Venet., and Luther), if we regard it as a brachyology for אָמֵן רָשָׁע, or as the plur. of an adj. אָמֵן, after the form אָמֵן (Elazar b. Jacob in Kimchi), or wickedness (Zöckler, with Hitzig, "the wicked expectation"), is very questionable. Yet more improbable is Malbim's (with Rashi's) rendering of this אָמֵן, after Gen. xlix. 3, Ps. lxxviii. 51, and the Targ. on Job xviii. 12, of the children of the deceased; children gignuntur ex robore virili, but are not themselves the robur virile. But while אָמֵן is nowhere the plur. of אָמֵן in its ethical signification, it certainly means in Ps. lxxviii. 51, as the plur. of אָמֵן, manly strength, and in Isa. xl. 26, 29 the fulness of strength generally, and once, in Hos. ix. 4, as plur. of אָמֵן in its physical signification, derived from its root-meaning anhelitus (Gen. xxxv. 18, cf. Hab. iii. 7), deep sorrow (a heightening of the אָמֵן, Deut. xxvi. 14). This latter signification has also been adopted: Jerome, expectatio sollicitorum; Bertheau, "the expectation of the sorrowing;" Ewald, "continuance of sorrow;" but the meaning of this in this connection is so obscure, that one must question the translators what its import is. Therefore we adhere to the other rendering, "fulness of strength," and interpret אֹנִים as the opposite of אִין אֹנִים, Isa. xl. 29, for it signifies, per metonymiam abstracti pro concr., those who are full of strength; and we gain the meaning that there is a sudden end to the expectation of those who are in full strength, and build their prospects thereon. The two synonymous lines complete themselves, in so far as אֹנִים gains by רשע אדם the associated idea of self-confidence, and the second strengthens the thought of the first by the transition of the expression from the fut. to the preterite (Fl.). ותחלה has, for the most part in recent impressions, the Mugrash; the correct accentuation, according to codices and old impressions, is ותחלה אֹנִים (vid. Baer's Torath Emeth, p. 10, § 4).

Ver. 8 The righteous is delivered from trouble,
And the godless comes in his stead.

The succession of the tenses gives the same meaning as when, periodizing, we say: while the one is delivered, the other, on the contrary, falls before the same danger. נִחַלץ (vid. under Isa. lviii. 11) followed by the historical tense, the expression of the principal fact, is the perfect. The statement here made clothes itself after the manner of a parable in the form of history. It is true there are not wanting experiences of an opposite kind (from that here stated), because divine justice manifests itself in this world only as a prelude, but not perfectly and finally; but the poet considers this, that as a rule destruction falls upon the godless, which the righteous with the help of God escapes; and this he realizes as a moral motive. In itself תִּחַתֵּי may also have only the meaning of the exchange of places, but the LXX. translate ἀντ' αὐτοῦ, and thus in the sense of representation the proverb appears to be understood in connection with xxi. 18 (cf. the prophetic-historical application, Isa. xliii. 4). The idea of atonement has, however, no application here, for the essence of atonement consists in the offering up of an innocent one in the room of the guilty, and its force lies in the offering up of self; the meaning is only, that if the divinely-ordained linking together of cause and effect in the realms of nature and of history brings with it evil, this brings to the godless destruction, while it opens the way of deliverance for the righteous, so that the godless becomes for the righteous the לִפְרָר, or, as we might say in a figure of similar import, the lightning conductor.

Ver. 9 The wicked with his mouth prepareth destruction for his neighbour;
But by knowledge the righteous are delivered from it.

The LXX. translate, ἐν στόματι ἀσεβῶν παγίς (πῆ?) πολιταῖς, αἰσθησις δὲ δικαίοις εὐδοξία (צִלָּה). There is no reason for changing (with Hitzig and Ewald) the text, which in the form in which it is here translated was before all other translators (Aq., Symmachus, Theodotion, Syr., Targ., Jerome). The accentuation, which separates the two instrumental statements by greater disjunctives from that which follows, is correct. The "three" Greek versions [viz. of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus] translate ἡγῆ by ὑποκριτής, which it means in the modern idiom; but in the ancient Hebr. it signifies, him who is resolved upon evil, as in Arab. hanyf, him who is resolved upon that which is right: he who turns aside to evil enters on a path far removed from that which is right. In אֲשֶׁר־יִתֵּן one is reminded (without any etymological reason) of אֲשֶׁר (pit), and so in אֲשֶׁר־יִתֵּן of אֲשֶׁר־יִתֵּן (Ps. cvii. 20) or a similar word; but אֲשֶׁר־יִתֵּן contains the reference, in this connection not easy to be mistaken, to the hostile purposes of the wicked masked by the words of the mouth, which are seen through by the righteous by virtue of knowledge which makes them acquainted with men. This penetrating look is their means of deliverance.

Three proverbs follow relating to the nature of city and national life, and between them two against mockery and backbiting:

Ver. 10 In the prosperity of the righteous the city rejoiceth;
And if the wicked come to ruin, there is jubilation.

The אֲשֶׁר־יִתֵּן denotes the ground but not the object, as elsewhere, but the cause of the rejoicing, like the אֲשֶׁר, 10b, and in the similar proverb, xxix. 2, cf. xxviii. 12. If it goes well with the righteous, the city has cause for joy, because it is for the advantage of the community; and if the wicked (godless) come to an end, then there is jubilation (substantival clause for אֲשֶׁר־יִתֵּן), for although they are honoured in their lifetime, yet men breathe freer when the city is delivered from the tyranny and oppression which they exercised, and from the evil example which they gave. Such proverbs, in which the city (civitas) represents the state, the πόλις the πολιτεία, may, as Ewald thinks, be of earlier date than the days of an Asa or Jehoshaphat; for "from the days of Moses and Joshua to the days of David and Solomon, Israel was a great nation, divided indeed into many branches and sections, but bound together by covenant, whose life did not at all revolve around one great city alone." We value such critical judgments according to great historical points of view, but confess not to understand why קְרִיָה must just be the chief city and may not be any city, and how on the whole a language which had not as yet framed the conception of the state (post-bibl. פְּרִיָה), when it would describe the community individually and as a whole, could speak otherwise than of city and people.

Ver. 11 By the blessing of the upright a city is exalted,
But by the mouth of the godless it is broken down.

This verse is related, in the way of confirming it, to ver. 10. The LXX., which omits ver. 4, here omits 10b and 11a, and combines 10a and 11b into one proverb (vid. Lagarde). The meaning is clear: "by the benedictions and pious prayers of the upright a city rises always to a higher eminence and prosperity; while, on the contrary, the deceitful, arrogant, blasphemous talk of the godless brings ruin to it" (Fl.). The nearest contrast to "by the blessing of the upright" would be "by the cursing of the wicked," but not in the sense of the poet, who means to say that the city raises itself by the blessing of the upright, and on the contrary, when godless men are exalted, then by their words (whose blessing is no better than their curse) it comes to ruin. קָרָה (= קְרִיָה) occurs only four times in Proverbs, and in Job xxix. 7.

Ver. 12. There now follow two proverbs which refer to the intercourse of private life.

He who mocketh his neighbour is devoid of understanding;
But the intelligent man remaineth silent.

xiv. 21 is a proverb similarly beginning with בְּזוֹ לְרֵעֵהוּ; xiii. 13 is another beginning with בְּזוֹ לְרֵעֵב. From this one sees that בָּזָהּ (cf. בָּזָהּ, Isa. xxxvii. 22) does not mean a speaking contemptuously in one's presence; as also from vi. 30, that contemptuous treatment, which expresses itself not in mockery but in insult, is thus named; so that we do not possess a German [nor an English] expression which completely covers it. Whoever in a derisive or insulting manner, whether it be publicly or privately, degrades his neighbour, is unwise (חָסֵדָה as pred., like vi. 32); an intelligent man, on the contrary, keeps silent, keeps his judgment to himself, abstains from arrogant criticisms, for he knows that he is not infallible, that he is not acquainted with the heart, and he pos-esses too much self-knowledge to raise himself above his neighbour as a judge, and thinks that contemptuous rejection, unamiable, reckless condemnation, does no good, but on the contrary does evil on all sides.

Ver. 13 He who goeth about tattling revealeth secrets;

But he who is of a faithful spirit concealeth a matter.

The tattler is called רָכִיל (intensive form of רָכַל), from his going hither and thither. אֲנִישׁ רָכִיל, Ezek. xxii. 9, are men given to tattling, backbiters; הוֹלֵךְ רָכִיל (cf. Lev. xix. 16), one of the tattlers or backbiters goes, a divulger of the matter, a tell-tale. It is of such an one that the proverb speaks, that he reveals the secret (סוד, properly the being close together for the purpose of private intercourse, then that intercourse itself, vid. at Ps. xxv. 14); one has thus to be on his guard against confiding in him. On the contrary, נֹאמַר רִיחָא, firmus (fidus) spiritus, properly one who is established, or reflexively one who proves himself firm and true (vid. at Gen. xv. 6), conceals a matter, keeps it back from the knowledge and power of another. Zöckler rightly concludes, in opposition to Hitzig, from the parallelism that the הוֹלֵךְ רָכִיל is subject; the arrangement going before also shows that this is the "ground-word" (Ewald); in xx. 19a the relation is reversed: the revealer of secrets is rightly named (cf. Sir. xxvii. 16, ὁ ἀποκαλύπτων μυστήρια, κ.τ.λ.).

Ver. 14 Where there is no direction a people fall;

But where there is no want of counsellors there is safety.

Regarding תְּהָבֵלוֹת, vid. at i. 5. There it means rules of self-government; here, rules for the government of the people, or, since the pluralet. denotes a multiplicity in unity, circumspect κυβέρνησις. With 14b, xxiv. 6b (where direction in war, as here in peace, is spoken of, and the meaning of the word specializes itself accordingly) agrees; cf. also xv. 22b. Hitzig criticises the proverb, remarking, "we who have the longest resorted to many counsellors, as a consequence of the superabundance have learned to say, 'Too many cooks spoil the broth,' and, 'He who asks long, errs.'" But the truth of the clause 14b is in modern times more fully illustrated in the region of ecclesiastical and political affairs; and in general it is found to be true that it is better with a people when they are governed according to the laws and conclusions which have resulted from the careful deliberation of many competent and authorized men, than when their fate is entrusted unconditionally to one or to a few. The proverb, it must be acknowledged, refers not to counsellors such as in Isa. iii. 3, but as in Isa. i. 26.

Ver. 15. There follow now two proverbs regarding kindness which brings injury and which brings honour :

It fares ill, nothing but ill, with one who is surety for another ;
But he who hateth suretyship remaineth in quietness.

More closely to the original : It goes ill with him ; for the proverb is composed as if the writer had before his eyes a definite person, whom one assails when he for whom he became security has not kept within the limits of the performance that was due. Regarding עֲרַב with the accus. of the person : to represent one as a surety for him, and נָרַח as denoting the other (the stranger), vid. at vi. 1. The meaning of רַע יֵרֵעַ is seen from xx. 16a. יֵרֵעַ is, like xiii. 20, the fut. Niph. of רָעַע, or of רָעַע = רָעַע, after the forms יֵפֹל, יֵעֹר (Olsh. § 265e). The added רַע has, like עָרַיָה, Hab. iii. 9, the same function as the inf. absol. (intensivus) ; but as the infin. form רַע could only be inf. constr. after the form רָעַע, Jer. v. 26, the infinitive absol. must be רָעַע : thus רַע is an accus., or what is the same, an adverbial adj. : he is badly treated (maltreated) in a bad way, for one holds him to his words and, when he cannot or will not accomplish that which is due in the room of him for whom he is bail, arrests him. He, on the contrary, who hates הוֹקֵעִים has good rest. The persons of such as become surety by striking the hands cannot be meant, but perhaps people thus becoming surety by a hand-stroke,—such sureties, and thus such suretyship, he cannot suffer ; רָעַע approaches an abstract [“striking hands,” instead of “those who strike hands”] in connection with this שֵׁנָה, expressing only a strong impossibility, as הִבְלִיָה, Zech. ii. 7, 14, means uniting together in the sense of combination.

Ver. 16 A gracious woman retaineth honour,
And strong men retain riches.

The LXX. had אִשְׁת׃ חַיִּיל (not אִשְׁת׃ חַיִּיל) in view : γυνή εὐχάριστος ἐγγείρει ἀνδρὶ δόξαν,—this ἀνδρὶ is an interpolation inserted for the sake of the added line, θρόνος δὲ ἀτιμίας γυνή μισοῦσα δίκαια. The proverb thus expanded is on both sides true : an amiable woman (gratiosa) brings honour to her husband, gives him relief, while one who hates the right (that which is good, gentle) is a disgraceful vessel (opp. כְּבֹד, Isa. xxii. 23), which disfigures the household, makes the family unloved, and lowers it. But the commencing line, by which 16*b* is raised to an independent distich, is so much the more imperfect: πλούτου ἀκατηροὶ ἐνδεεῖς γίνονται; for that the negligent (idle) bring it not to riches, is, as they are wont in Swabia to call such truisms, a Binsenwahrheit. But it is important that the translation of 16*b*, οἱ δὲ ἀνδρῶλοι ἐρείδονται πλούτῳ (the Syr. has “knowledge” for riches), presupposes the phrase וְיָרֵתִים (cf. x. 4, LXX.), and along with it this, that יִתְמַנּוּ is so rendered as if the words were יִתְמַנּוּ בְעֵשֶׂר, is to be regarded as unhistorical. If we now take the one proverb as it is found in the Hebr. text, then the repetition of the חַמֵּךְ in the two lines excites a prejudice in favour of it. The meaning of this otherwise difficult חַמֵּךְ is missed by Löwenstein and Zöckler: a gracious woman retaineth honour (Symm. ἀνθέξεται δόξης); for (1) חַמֵּךְ חַיִל would better agree with this predicate, and (2) it is evident from xxix. 23 that חַמֵּךְ כְּבוֹד is not to be understood in the sense of firmiter tenere, but in the inchoative sense of consequi honorem, whence also the ἐγείπει ἀνδρῶ of the LXX. It is true that xxxi. 30 states that “grace (!!) is nothing,” and that all depends on the fear of God; but here the poet thinks on “grace” along with the fear of God, or he thinks on them as not separated from each other; and since it is doubly true, which is moreover besides this true, that a wife of gracious outward appearance and demeanour obtains honour, her company is sought, she finds her way into the best society, they praise her attractive, pleasant appearance, and that the husband also of such a wife participates to some extent in this honour. Experience also confirms it, that the עֲרִיצִים, strong men, obtain riches (cf. Isa. xlix 25); and this statement regarding the עֲרִיצִים fits better as a contrast to 16*a*, as a like statement regarding the חַרְוִתִים, diligent, for the עֲרִיץ (from עָרַץ, to place in terror, Ps. x. 18), whose power consists in terrorism or violence, is the most direct contrast of a wife, this σκαῖος ἀσθενέστερον, who by heart-winning attraction makes yet better conquests: she thereby obtains a higher good, viz. honour, while the former gains only riches, for “a name” (viz. a good one) “is better than great riches,” xxii. 1. If we read חַרְוִתִים, this thoughtful contrast is lost.

Three proverbs regarding benevolence:

Ver. 17 The benevolent man doeth good to his own soul,

And the violent man brings trouble on his own flesh.

Many interpreters reverse the relation of subject and predicate

(Targ. only in 17*b*, after the phrase רַמְבוּר, for which the Syr. has only (רַמְבוּר): qui sibi ipsi benefacit, is quidem erga alios quoque benignus præsumentur, quum caritas ordinata a se ipsa incipiat; qui vero carnem suam male habet, est crudelis erga alios (Michaelis). But this cannot be established; for certainly it occurs that whoever does good to himself does good also to others, and that whoever is hard against himself also judges and treats others harshly; but in by far the greatest number of cases the fact is this, that he who does not deny anything to himself is in relation to others an egoist, and this is not a "benevolent man;" and, on the contrary, that he who denies to himself lawful enjoyments is in relation to others capable of self-denial and self-sacrifice, and thus is the contrast of a "violent man." The word of Sirach, xiv. 5, ὁ ποιητὸς ἑαυτοῦ τίνα ἀγαθὸς ἔσται, to which Bertheau appeals, alludes to the niggard, and it is true indeed that this עֵבֶר שְׂאִיר, but not every עֵבֶר שְׂאִיר, is a niggard. Thus the "benevolent man" and the "violent man" will be the two subject conceptions, and as it is said of the benevolent (הַקָּרֵן as e.g. Hos. vi. 6, of a more restricted sense, as Isa. lvii. 1) that he does good (בְּיָדָיו, viz. טוֹב, xxxi. 12), so of the violent (unmerciful) אֲכַרְרֵי as xii. 20, Jer. vi. 23, l. 42) that he brings evil on his own flesh (LXX. αὐτοῦ σῶμα); for שְׂאִיר as a parallel word to נִשְׂחָשׁוּ (cf. p. 195) signifies not blood-relations (Symm., Jerome, Luther, and Grotius), but it has here, as at Mic. iii. 2, its nearest signification, from which it then comes to signify those who are of our flesh and blood. But for that reason the meaning of the poet cannot be that given by Elster: "he who exercises benevolence toward others creates within himself a determination which penetrates his whole being with generous and fruitful warmth, as on the other hand the feeling of hatred deprives the heart of him who cherishes it of the true fountain of life." If this were meant, then soul and spirit, not soul and flesh, would stand in parallelism. The weal and woe refers thus to the divine retribution which requites the conduct of a man toward his neighbours, according to its character, with reward or punishment (Hitzig, Zöckler).

Ver. 18. Man consists of body and soul. In regard to both, benevolence brings its reward, and hatred its punishment.

The godless acquires deceptive gain;

But he that soweth righteousness, a true reward.

Jerome makes 18*b* an independent clause, for he translates it as if the word were written וְלִזְרָע; the Syr. and Targ. also, as if לְכָרוּ אֲמָתוֹ (his fidelity is his reward). But according to the text as it stands, עֲלֶה extends its regimen to both parts of the verse; to make is here equivalent to, to work out, to acquire, περιποιεῖσθαι, as Gen. xxxi. 1, Jer. xvii. 11, etc. The labour of the godless has selfishness as its motive, and what he acquires by his labour is therefore "delusive gain,"—it is no blessing, it profits him not (x. 2), and it brings him no advantage (x. 16). He, on the contrary, acquires truth, i.e. a truly profitable and enduring reward, who sows right-doing, or better: good-doing, by which we also, as the biblical moral in צְדָקָה, think principally of well-doing, unselfish activity and self-sacrificing love. Hos. x. 12 speaks of sowing which has only צְדָקָה as the norm; and how צְדָקָה is understood is seen from the parallel use of חֶסֶד [piety]. The "true reward" is just the harvest by which the sowing of the good seed of noble benevolent actions is rewarded.

Ver. 19 Genuine righteousness reaches to life,

And he who pursues evil does it to his death.

The LXX. translate ὁ δὲ δίκαιος, and the Syrian follows this unwarrantable quid pro quo; the Bible uses the phrase בְּעוֹלָה and the like, but not בְּצְדָקָה. The Græc. Venet. (translating ὁ δὲ) deprives the distich of its supposed independence. The Targ. renders נָ with the following ו as correlates, sic . . . uti; but נ in comparative proverbs stands naturally in the second, and not in the first place (vid. p. 10). Without doubt נ is here a noun. It appears to have a personal sense, according to the parallel וְיִמְרִירָהּ, on which account Elster explains it: he who is firm, steadfast in righteousness, and Zöckler: he who holds fast to righteousness; but נ cannot mean "holding fast," nor does מְבֹרָךְ;—"fast" does not at all agree with the meaning of the word, it means upright, and in the ethical sense genuine; thus Ewald better: "he who is of genuine righteousness," but "genuine in (of) righteousness" is a tautological connection of ideas. Therefore we must regard נ as a substantival neuter, but neither the rectum of Cocceius nor the firmum of Schultens furnishes a naturally expressed suitable thought. Or is נָ a substantive in the sense of 2 Kings vii. 31? The word denotes the pedestal, the pillar, the standing-place; but what can the basis refer to here (Euchel)? Rather read "aim" (Oetinger) or "direction" (Löwenstein); but נ does not take its meaning from the Hiph. הִכִּין. One might almost assume that the Chokma-language makes יָשָׁר, taliter, a substantive, and has begun to use it in the sense of qualitas (like the post-bibl. אֲיִכּוּת), so that it is to be explained: the quality of righteousness tendeth to life. But must we lose ourselves in conjectures or in modifications of the text (Hitzig, יָשָׁר, as a banner), in order to gain a meaning from the word, which already has a meaning? We say יָשָׁר יָדְבַר to speak right (Num. xxvii. 7), and עָשׂוֹת יָשָׁר to do right (Eccles. viii. 10); in both cases יָשָׁר means standing = consisting, steadfast, right, recte. The contrast is לֹא-יָשָׁר, 2 Kings vii. 9, which is also once used as a substantive, Isa. xvi. 6: the unrighteousness of his words. So here יָשָׁר is used as a substantive connected in the genitive, but not so that it denotes the right holding, retaining of righteousness, but its right quality,—אֲמִתּוּת—שֶׁל-צְדָקָה, as Rashi explains it, i.e., as we understand it: genuineness, or genuine showing of righteousness, which is not mere appearance without reality. That בְּיָמֵי denotes such people as seek to appear not otherwise than what they truly are, is in favour of this interpretation. Such genuine righteousness as follows the impulse of the heart, and out of the fulness of the heart does good, has life as its result (xix. 23), an inwardly happy and externally a prosperous life; on the other hand, he who wilfully pursues evil, and finds in it satisfaction, brings death upon himself: he does it to his death, or if we make (which is also possible) הַיָּדְבָר the subject: it tends to his death. Thus in other words: Love is life; hatred destroys life.

The following proverbs are especially directed, as connected with this יָשָׁר, against the contradiction of the external appearance and of the masked internal nature.

Ver. 20 An abomination to Jahve are the crookedly dishonest of heart,
And they who are of honest walk are His delight.

We read, ii. 15, viii. 8, עֲקֻשׁ (the form of the transgressions); but here, where the “crookedness” is transferred to the heart, we require another word, which renders the idea of falseness, the contrary of directness, lying in it, without any mixture of the fundamental conception flexuosus or tortuosus. הַיָּשָׁרִים are not only those whose walk is externally without offence and blameless, but, in conformity with the contrast, those whose manner of conduct proceeds from a disposition that is pure, free from deception and concealment. Jerome, et voluntas ejus in iis qui simpliciter ambulant. But the word is not בְּתָמִימִי; they [the upright] are themselves His רצון (xi. 1) [delight]: He regards them, and only them, with satisfaction.

Ver. 21 Assuredly [the hand to it] the wicked remaineth not unpunished,
But the seed of the righteous is delivered.

The LXX. render here, as xvi. 5, where the לִי יָד repeats itself, χειρι χειρας ἐμβάλων ἀδικως, which is not to be understood, as Evagrius supposes, of one that can be bribed, but only of a violent person; the Syr. and Targ. have the same reference; but the subject is certainly עָר, and a governing word, as נָשָׂא (2 Sam. xx. 21), is wanting, to say nothing of the fact that the phrase "one hand against the other" would require the words to be יָד בְּיָד. Jerome and the Græc. Venet., without our being able, however, to see their meaning. The translation of the other Greek versions is not given. The Jewish interpreters offer nothing that is worthy, as e.g. Immanuel and Meîri explain it by "immediately," which in the modern Hebr. would require מִיָּד, and besides is not here suitable. The Midrash connects with 21a the earnest warning that he who sins with the one hand and with the other does good, is nevertheless not free from punishment. Schultens has an explanation to give to the words which is worthy of examination: hand to hand, i.e. after the manner of an inheritance per posteros (Ex. xx. 5), resting his opinion on this, that Arab. yad (cf. יָד, Isa. lvi. 5) is used among other significations in that of authorizing an inheritance. Gesenius follows him, but only urging the idea of the sequence of time (cf. Pers. dest bedest, hand to hand = continuing after one another), and interprets יָד בְּיָד as Fleischer does: ab ætate in ætatem non (i.e. nullo unquam tempore futuro) erit impunis scelestus, sed posteri justorum salvi erunt. According to Böttcher, "hand to hand" is equivalent to from one hand to another, and this corresponds to the thought expressed in Plutarch's de sera numinis vindicta: if not immediately, yet at last. We may refer in vindication of this to the fact that, as the Arab. lexicographers say, yad, used of the course of time, means the extension (madd) of time, and then a period of time. But for the idea expressed by nunquam, or neutiquam, or tandem aliquando, the language supplied to the poet a multitude of forms, and we do not see why he should have selected just this expression with its primary meaning alternatim not properly agreeing with the connection. Therefore we prefer with Ewald to regard לִי יָד as a formula of confirmation derived from the common speech of the people: hand to hand (ף as in לְיָדַי, Job xvii. 3), i.e. the hand for it [I pledge it, guarantee it] (Bertheau, Hitzig, Elster, Zöckler). But if 21a assures by the pledge of the hand, and as it were lays a wager to it, that the wicked shall not go unpunished, then the genitive in יָרַע צְדִיקִים is not that of dependence by origin, but, as Isa. lxv. 23, i. 4, the genitive of apposition, for יָרַע here, as דָּוָר, Ps. xxiv. 6, cxii. 2, denotes a oneness of like origin and of like kind, but with a preponderance of the latter. נִמְלָט is the 3d pret., which by the preceding fut. retains the reference to the future: the merited punishment comes on the wicked, but the generation of the righteous escapes the judgment. פָּע has the ך dagheshed (Michlol 63b) according to the rule of the רִחִיק, according to which the consonant first sounded after a word terminating in an accented a or el is doubled, which is here, as at xv. 1, done with the ך.

Ver. 22 A golden ring in a swine's snout,—
A fair woman and without delicacy.

This is the first instance of an emblematical proverb in which the first and second lines are related to each other as figure and its import, vid. p. 9. The LXX. translates rhythmically, but by its ὠσπερ . . . οὐτως it destroys the character of this picture-book proverbial form. The nose-ring, נֶזֶם, generally attached to the right nostril and hanging down over the mouth (vid. Lane's Manners, etc.) is a female ornament that has been in use since the time of the patriarchs (Gen. xxiv. 47). If one supposes such a ring in a swine's snout, then in such a thing he has the emblem of a wife in whom beauty and the want of culture are placed together in direct contrast. טַעַם is taste carried over into the intellectual region, the capability of forming a judgment, Job xii. 20, and particularly the capability of discovering that which is right and adapted to the end in view, 1 Sam. xxv. 33 (of Abigail), here in accordance with the figure of a beast with which the ideas of uncleanness, shamelessness, and rudeness are associated, a mind for the noble, the fine, the fitting, that which in the higher and at the same time intellectual and ethical sense we call tact (fine feeling); פְּרִת (alienata) denotes the want of this capacity, not without the accompanying idea of self-guilt.

Ver. 23 The desire of the righteous is nothing but good,
The expectation of the godless is presumption.

This is usually explained with Fleischer: If the righteous wish for anything, their wish reaches to no other than a fortunate issue; but if the godless hope for anything, then there is to them in the end as their portion, not the good they hoped for, but wrath (x. 28, cf. xi. 4). However, that עֲבָרָה is at once to be understood thus, as in יוֹם עֲבָרָה, and that the phrase is to be rendered: the hope of the godless is God's wrath, is doubtful. But עֲבָרָה denotes also want of moderation, and particularly in the form of presumption, xxi. 24, Isa. xvi. 6; and thus we gain the thought that the desire of the righteous is directed only to that which is good, and thus to an object that is attainable because well-pleasing to God, while on the contrary the hope of the godless consists only in the suggestions of their presumption, and thus is vain self-deceit. The punctuation תְּאוֹת צְדִיקִים is contrary to rule; correct texts have תְּאוֹת צְדִיקִים, for Declî stands before Athnach only if the Athnach-word has two syllables (Torath Emeth, p. 43; Accentssystem, xviii. § 4).

Three proverbs regarding giving which is not loss but gain.

Ver. 24 There is one who giveth bounteously, and he increaseth still more; And (there is) one who withholdeth what is due, only to his loss.

The first of the proverbs with שׁ (there is), which are peculiar to the first collection (vid. p. 32). The meaning is, that the possessions of the liberal giver do not decrease but increase, and that, on the contrary, the possessions of the niggardly do not increase but decrease. מִפֶּיֶר is not to be understood after Ps. cxii. 9. Instead of עוֹר וְנוֹסֵף the three Erfurt codd. have וְנוֹסֵף (with retrogression of the tone?), which Hitzig approves of; but the traditional phrase which refers (et qui augetur insuper) עוֹר וְנוֹסֵף not to the possession of him who scattereth, but to himself, is finer in the expression: In the characteristic of the other, מִיֶּשֶׁר is commonly interpreted comparatively: plus æquo (Cocceius) or justo (Schelling). But מִן אַחֲרֵי הַשֵּׁנָה is to be regarded as governed by it, and יֶשֶׁר denotes not competence, riches, as Arab. yusr (Bertheau, Zöckler), also not upright-ness = beneficence (Midrash, מִן הַצְדִּיקָה), but duty, upright-ness, as Job xxxiii. 23, where it denotes that which is advantageous to man, as here that which befits him: he who holds back, namely himself, from that which is due to himself, and thus should permit to himself, such an one profits nothing at all by this ἀφειδία (17b, Col. ii. 23), but it tends only to loss to him, only to the lessening of that which he possesses. We shall meet with this (לְמַחְסוֹר) אִתְּךָ לְמַחְסוֹר xiv. 23, and frequently again—it is a common Maschal formula (cf. καὶ τόσῳ μᾶλλον ὑστερεῖται, Sir. xi. 11). The cause of the strange phenomenon that the liberal gains and the niggardly loses is not here expressed, but the following proverb gives the explanation of it:

Ver. 25 A liberal soul [soul of blessing] is made fat,
And he that watereth others is also watered.

A synonymous distich (vid. p. 7). A soul of blessing is one from whom blessings go out to others, who is even a blessing to all with whom he comes into fellowship; בְּרַכָּה denotes also particularly the gifts of love, 1 Sam. xxv. 27, בְּרַחַד denotes, if the Arab. is right, which derives it from the fundamental idea "to spread out:" to cause to increase and prosper by means of word and deed. The blessing which goes out from such a soul comes back again to itself: חֲרִשָּׁן (as xiii. 4, xxviii. 25), it is made fat, gains thereby sap and strength in fulness; the Pual refers to the ordinance of God; xxii. 9 is kindred in meaning to this anima benefica pinguescit. In 25b יִרְאָה is the Aramaic form of writing, but without the Aramaic vocalization (cf. i. 10 יִרְאָה, Isa. xxi. 12 יִרְאָה). Perhaps the א makes it noticeable that here a different word from יִרְיָה, morning rain, is used; however, Symm. translates πρωϊνός, and the Græc. Venet. (Kimchi following it) ύερός. As a rule, we do not derive יִרְאָה from יִרְיָה, of which it would be the Hophal (= יִרְיָה, as חֲרִשָּׁן, Lev. iv. 23, = חֲרִשָּׁן) (Ewald, § 131 f.); for the idea conspergitur, which the Ho. of the Hiph. יִרְיָה, Hos. vi. 3, expresses, is, as correlate to בְּרַכָּה, as a parallel word to חֲרִשָּׁן, one not of equal force. Jerome was guided by correct feeling, for he translates: et qui inebriat ipse quoque inebriabitur. The stem-word is certainly יִרְיָה, whether it is with Hitzig to be punctuated יִרְאָה = יִרְיָה, or with Fleischer we are to regard יִרְאָה as derived per metathesin from יִרְיָה, as for Arab. ârây (to cause to see) is used<sup>1</sup> the vulgar Arab. ârway (in the Syr. Arab.) and âwray (in the Egypt. Arab.). We prefer the latter, for the passing of יִרְיָה (from יִרְיָה) into יִרְאָה is according to rule, vid. at xxiii. 21.

Ver. 26 Whoso withholdeth corn, him the people curse;
But blessing is on the head of him that selleth it.

This proverb is directed against the corn-usurer, whose covetousness and deceitful conduct is described Amos viii. 4-8. But whilst it is there said that they cannot wait till the burdensome interruption of their usurious conduct on account of the sacred days come to an end, the figure here is of a different aspect of their character: they hold back their stores of corn in the times of scarcity, for they speculate on receiving yet higher prices for it. בָּר (from בָּרַר, to purify, to be pure) is thrashed grain, cf. Arab. burr, wheat, and nakky of the cleaning of the grain by the separation from it of the tares, etc. (Fl.); the word has Kametz, according to the Masora, as always in pause and in the history of Joseph. מְנַעַע has Munach on the syllable preceding the last, on which the tone is thrown back, and Metheg with the Tsere as the sign of a pause, as i. 10 בָּצַע (vid. p. 67). מִשְׁבִּיר, qui annonam vendit, is denom. of שָׁבַר, properly that which is crushed, therefore grain (Fl.). לְאֻמִּים, which we would understand in the Proph. of nations, are here, as at xxiv. 24, the individuals of the people. The בְּרָכָה which falls on the head of the charitable is the thanks of his fellow-citizens, along with all good wishes.

That self-sacrificing endeavour after the good of others finds its reward in the thought encircling the following proverbs.

Ver. 27 He that striveth after good, seeketh that which is pleasing;
And he that searcheth after evil, it shall find him.

Here we have together three synonyms of seeking: בָּקַשׁ (R. בַּק, findere), which has the general meaning querere, from the root-idea of penetrating and pressing forwards; דָּרַשׁ (R. דַּר, terere), which from the root-idea of trying (proving) corresponds to the Lat. studere; and שָׁחַר (whence here שָׁחַר instead of מִשְׁחַר, as דָּבַר instead of מִדְּבַר), which means mane, and thus sedulo querere (vid. at i. 28). From 27b, where by רָעָה is meant evil which one prepares for another, there arises for טוֹב the idea of good thoughts and actions with reference to others. He who applies himself to such, seeks therewith that which is pleasing, i.e. that which pleases or does good to others. If that which is pleasing to God were meant, then this would have been said (cf. xii. 2); the idea here is similar to x. 32, and the word בָּקַשׁ is used, and not יִמְצָא, because reference is not made to a fact in the moral government of the world, but a description is given of one who is zealously intent upon good, and thus of a noble man. Such an one always asks himself (cf. Matt. vii. 12): what will, in the given case, be well-pleasing to the neighbour, what will tend to his true satisfaction? Regarding the punctuation here, שָׁחַר, vid. at ver. 26. The subject to תְּבוֹאֵנֶנּוּ, which, x. 24, stands as the fundamental idea, here follows from the governed רָעַר, which may be the gen. (Ps. xxxviii. 13) as well as the accus.

Ver. 28 He that trusteth in his riches shall fall,

And the righteous shall flourish like the green leaf.

יָפֹאֵל (plene after the Masora) as well as the figure וְנִצְלָה (cf. for the punctuation וְנִצְלָה, x. 26) are singular, but are understood if one observes that in 28*a* a withered tree, and in 28*b* a tree with leaves ever green, hovers before the imagination of the poet (cf. Ps. i. 3, Jer. xvii. 8). The proud rich man, who on the ground of his riches appears to himself to be free from danger, goes on to his ruin (יָפֹאֵל as xi. 5, and frequently in the Book of Proverbs), while on the contrary the righteous continues to flourish like the leaf—they thus resemble the trees which perennially continue to flourish anew. Regarding עָלָה as originally collective (Symm. θάλλος), vid. at Isa. i. 30, and regarding פָּרַח (R. פָּר, to break), here of the continual breaking forth of fresh-growing leaf-buds, vid. at Isa. xi. 1. The apostolic word names this continual growth the metamorphosis of believers, 2 Cor. ii. 18. The LXX. has read וְנִצְלָה (approved by Hitzig): and he who raiseth up the righteous.

Ver. 29 He that troubleth his own household shall inherit the wind,

And a fool becomes servant to the wise in heart.

Jerome well translates: qui conturbat domum suam, for עָרַר closely corresponds to the Lat. turbare; but with what reference is the troubling or disturbing here meant? The Syr. translates 29*a* doubly, and refers it once to deceit, and the second time to the contrary of avarice; the LXX., by ὁ μὴ συμπεριφερόμενος τῷ ἑαυτοῦ ὄλεθρῳ, understands one who acts towards his own not unsociably, or without affability, and thus not tyrannically. But עָרַר xi. 17, is he who does not grudge to his own body that which is necessary; עָרַר יִשְׂרָאֵל is applied to Elijah, 1 Kings xviii. 17, on account of whose prayer there was a want of rain; and at xv. 27 it is the covetous who is spoken of as עָרַר בֵּיתוֹ. The proverb has, accordingly, in the man who “troubles his own house” (Luth.), a niggard and sordid person (Hitzig) in view, one who does not give to his own, particularly to his own servants, a sufficiency of food and of necessary recreation. Far from raising himself by his household arrangements, he shall only inherit wind (יָנַחַל, not as the Syr. translates, יָנַחַל, in the general signification to inherit, to obtain, as iii. 35, xxviii. 10, etc.), i.e. he goes always farther and farther back (for he deprives his servants of all pleasure and love for their work in seeking the prosperity of his house), till in the end the reality of his possession dissolves into nothing. Such conduct is not only loveless, but also foolish; and a foolish person (vid. regarding לַיָּסֵף at i. 7) has no influence as the master of a house, and generally is unable to maintain his independence: "and the servant is a fool to him who is wise of heart." Thus the LXX. (cf. also the LXX. of x. 5), Syr., Targ., Jerome, Græc. Venet., Luth. construe the sentence. The explanation, et servus stulti cordato (sc. addicitur), i.e. even the domestics of the covetous fool are at last partakers in the wise beneficence (Fl.), places 29b in an unnecessary connection with 29a, omits the verb, which is here scarcely superfluous, and is not demanded by the accentuation (cf. e.g. xix. 22b).

Ver. 30 The fruit of the righteous is a tree of life,
And the wise man winneth souls.

The LXX. translate, ἐκ καρποῦ δικαιοσύνης φέται δένδρον ζωῆς; Hitzig takes thence the word פִּרְיָ; but this translation discredits itself by the unnatural reversal of the relation of fruit and tree. The fruit of the righteous is here not the good which his conduct brings to him, as Isa. iii. 10, Jer. xxxii. 19, but his activity itself proceeding from an internal impulse. This fruit is a tree of life. We need to supplement פִּרְיָ [fruit] as little here as תַּרְיָן [a traveller] at x. 17; for the meaning of the proverb is, that the fruit of the righteous, i.e. his external influence, itself is a tree of life (vid. p. 32), namely for others, since his words and actions exert a quickening, refreshing, happy influence upon them. By this means the wise (righteousness and wisdom come together according to the saying of the Chokma, i. 7a) becomes a winner of souls (חָקַל as vi. 25, but taken in bonam partem), or, as expressed in the N. T. (Matt. iv. 19), a fisher of men, for he gains them not only for himself, but also for the service of wisdom and righteousness.

Ver. 31 Lo, the righteous findeth on earth his reward;
How much more the godless and the sinner!

The particles הֲאֵלֶּם signify properly, interrogatively: Shall it yet be said that . . .; it corresponds to the German "geschweige denn" [nedum] (Fl.). הֲ is already in bibl. Hebr. in the way of becoming a conditional particle; it opens, as here, the antecedent of a gratio a minori ad majus introduced by כִּי הֲאֵלֶּם, Job xv. 15 f., xxv. 5 f., cf. הֲ (הֲנֵה) with הֲאֵלֶּם following, Gen. xlv. 8, 2 Sam. xii. 18. xiii. 13 presents itself as the nearest parallel to הֲאֵלֶּם, where it means, to be rewarded. It is a vocabulum anceps, and denotes full requital, i.e., according to the reference, either righteous reward or righteous punishment. If 30a is understood of reward, and 30b of punishment, then the force of the argument in the conclusion consists in this, that the righteous can put forth no claim to a recompense, because his well-doing is never so perfect as not to be mingled with sin (Eccles. vii. 20; Ps. cxliii. 2); while, on the contrary, the repression of the wicked, who, as  $\text{עָרַף}$  as to his intention, and  $\text{אָחַז$  as to his conduct, actually denies his dependence on God, is demanded by divine holiness. But the conclusion is not stringent, since in the relation of God to the righteous His dispensation of grace and faithfulness to promises also come into view, and thus in both cases  $\text{בְּשֵׁי$  appears to require the same interpretation: if the righteous does not remain unrevengeed, so much more shall not the godless and the sinner remain . . ., or how much less shall the godless and the sinner remain so. Thus the Græc. Venet.,  $\Theta\epsilon\omega\ \delta\ \delta\acute{\iota}\kappa\alpha\iota\omicron\varsigma\ \acute{\epsilon}\nu\ \tau\eta\ \gamma\eta\ \acute{\alpha}\pi\omicron\tau\iota\theta\eta\sigma\epsilon\tau\alpha\iota$ ; thus also Luther, and among the moderns Löwenstein and Elster. Of the proverb so understood the LXX. version,  $\epsilon\iota\ \delta\ \mu\acute{\epsilon}\nu\ \delta\acute{\iota}\kappa\alpha\iota\omicron\varsigma\ \mu\acute{\omicron}\lambda\iota\varsigma\ (\mu\acute{\omicron}\lambda\omicron\gamma\iota\varsigma)\ \sigma\acute{\omega}\zeta\epsilon\tau\alpha\iota,\ \delta\ \acute{\alpha}\sigma\epsilon\beta\eta\varsigma\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \acute{\alpha}\mu\alpha\rho\tau\alpha\lambda\omicron\varsigma\ \pi\omicron\upsilon\ \phi\alpha\upsilon\epsilon\iota\tau\alpha\iota$  (cf. 1 Pet. iv. 18); may be a free translation, for in the  $\text{עָרַף}$  there certainly lies, according to the sense, a  $\text{עָרַף}\ \text{עָרַף}$ . Also  $\text{עָרַף}$  has the principal tone, not  $\text{עָרַב}$ . The thought: even on this side (on earth), lies beyond the sphere of the O. T. consciousness. The earth is here the world of man.

Three proverbs on knowledge, the favour of God, firmness and the means thereto.

xii. 1 He loveth correction who loveth knowledge,

And he hateth instruction who is without reason.

It is difficult in such cases to say which is the relation of the ideas that is intended. The sequence of words which lies nearest in the Semitic substantival clause is that in which the predicate is placed first; but the subject may, if it is to be made prominent, stand at the head of the sentence. Here, 1b, the placing of the subject in advance recommends itself: one who hates instruction is devoid of reason. But since we have no reason in 1a to invert the order of the words as they lie together, we take the conceptions placed first in both cases as the predicates. Thus: he who loves knowledge shows and proves that he does so by this, that he willingly puts himself in the place of a learner; and devoid of reason is he who with aversion rejects reproof, which is designed to guard him from future mistakes and false steps. Regarding the punctuation אָהָב גָּעַת (with Mercha on the ante-penult. and the העמדה-sign on the penult.), vid. at xi. 26 f., i. 19. In 1*b* the Munach in תוכחה is transformed from Mugrash (Accentsystem, xviii. § 2), as in xv. 10*b*. בָּעֵר (cf. xxx. 2) is a being who is stupid as the brute cattle (בָּעֵר, from בָּעַר, to graze, cattle of all kinds; Arab. b'ayr, the beast κατ' ἐξ, i.e. the camel); as a homo brutus is compared to a בְּהֵמָה (Ps. xlix. 21, lxxiii. 22), and is called Arab. behymt, from bahym, "shut up" (spec. dabb, a bear; thur, an ox; hamâr, an ass) (Fl.).

Ver. 2 A good man obtaineth favour with Jahve,

But the man of wicked devices He condemns.

He who is an אִישׁ מְסֻמָּת (xiv. 17, cf. Ps. xxxvii. 7) is defined in xxiv. 8 (cf. p. 39): he is a man of devices (vid. regarding the etymon, p. 56), namely, that are wicked, one who contrives evil against his neighbour. The meaning of the subject-conception מֵטוֹב is defined according to this, although in itself also it is clear, for טוֹב, used of God (e.g. Ps. lxxiii. 1, lxxxvi. 5) and of men (xiii. 22, xiv. 14), denotes the good (bonus) in the sense of the benevolent (benignus); the Scripture truths, that God is love, that love is the essence of goodness and is the fulfilling of the law, are so conformed to reason, that they stamp themselves as immediate component parts of the human consciousness. A מֵטוֹב is thus a man who acts according to the ruling motive of self-sacrificing love; such an one obtains (vid. on יָפִיץ, educit = adipiscitur, at iii. 13) the favour of God, He is and shows Himself kind to him, while on the contrary He condemns the wicked intriguer. Hitzig translates: the former of intrigues is punishable (as the Syr.: is condemned; Targ.: his contrivance is shattered to pieces); but to become a רָשָׁע = reus הַרְשָׁע does not denote, but either to practise רָשָׁע, Job xxxiv. 12, or to set forth as רָשָׁע = to condemn, Isa. l. 9. Taken in the former signification (Jerome, impie agit), a declaration is made which is not needed, since the moral badness already lies in the reference of the subject: thus יִרְשָׁע will be used also of Jahve. In proof that the poet did not need to say וְאִתְרִאשׁוּ, Zöckler rightly points to x. 6, Job xxii. 29.

Ver. 3 A man does not stand by wickedness,

But the root of the righteous remains unmoved.

In רָשָׁע there lies the idea of want of inward stay (vid. at Ps. i. 1); in a manner of thought and of conduct which has no stay in God and His law, there can be expected no external endurance, no solidity.

The righteous, on the contrary, have their root in God; nothing can tear them from the ground in which they are rooted, they are as trees which no storm outroots. The very same thought is clothed in other words in x. 25, and another statement regarding the root of the righteous is found at xii. 12.

We now place together vers. 4–12. One proverb concerning the house-wife forms the beginning of this group, and four regarding the management of the house and business form the conclusion.

Ver. 4 A good [brave] wife is the crown of her husband,
But as rottenness in his bones is one that causeth shame.

As xi. 16 says of אִשָּׁה חַיִּל, the pleasant wife (חַיִּל = χαρίς), that she obtaineth honour, so this proverb of אִשָּׁה חַיִּל, the good wife (חַיִּל = ἀρετή, virtus), that she raises her husband to higher honour: she is for his self-consciousness στέφανος καυχήσεως (1 Thess. ii. 19), and is also to him such a crown of honour before the world (cf. xxxi. 23). On the contrary, a מְבִיטָה, conducting herself shamefully (cf. regarding the double meaning of this Mishle word, which only here occurs in the fem., at x. 5), is to her husband instar cariei in ossibus. רֶקֶב (רֶקֶב, x. 7) denotes both the caries and the worm-hole (cf. Job xli. 19, עֵץ רֶקֶב, worm-eaten wood). Like as the caries slowly but continuously increases, till at last the part of the body which the bone bears and the whole life of the man falls to ruin; so an unhappy marriage gnaws at the marrow of life, it destroys the happiness of life, disturbs the pursuit, undermines the life of the husband.

Ver. 5 The thoughts of the righteous are justice,
The counsels of the godless are deceit.

They are so, that is, in their contents and their aim. To the righteous are ascribed מִחֻשָּׁבוֹת, namely, simple and clear; to the godless, חֲבִלּוֹת, carefully thought out, prudently thought through schemes and measures (regarding the word and the idea, vid. p. 57), but on that very account not simple, because with a tendency; for the righteous have an objective rule, namely, that which is right in the sight of God and of men, but the godless have only a selfish purpose, which they seek to attain by deceiving, and at the cost of, their neighbour.

Ver. 6 The word of the godless is to lie in wait for the blood of others,
But the mouth of the upright delivereth them.

Our editions have דְּבַר־רְשָׁעִים, but the right sequence of the accents (in Cod. 1294 and elsewhere) is דְּבַר־רְשָׁעִים; the logical relation in this transformation, which is only rhythmically conditioned, remains the same. The vocalization wavers between אָרַב, which would be imper., and אָרַב, which is infin., like אָמַר, xxv. 7, עָנִשׁ, xxi. 11, אָכַל, Gen. iii. 11. However one punctuates it, the infin. is intended in any case, in which the expression always remains sketchy enough: the words of the godless are lying in wait for blood, i.e. they are calculated to bring others to this, into the danger of their lives, e.g. before the tribunal by false charges and false witness. דָּם is the accus. of the object; for instead of אָרַב לְדָם (i. 11), to lurk for blood, a shorter expression, אָרַב דָּם, is used (Ewald, § 282*a*). The suffix of יָצִילִים<sup>1</sup> might appear, after xi. 6*a*, to refer back to the יֹשְׁרִים; but the thought that their mouth saves the upright, that they thus know to speak themselves out of the danger, is by far less appropriate (vid., on the contrary, ברַעַת, xi. 9) than the thought that the mouth of the upright delivereth from danger those whose lives are threatened by the godless, as is rightly explained by Ewald, Bertheau, Elster. The personal subject or object is in the Mashal style often to be evolved from the connection, e.g. xiv. 26, xix. 23.

Ver. 7 The godless are overturned and are no more,
But the house of the righteous stands.

Bertheau and Zöckler explain: The wicked turn about, then are they no more; i.e. as we say: it is over with them "in the turning of a hand." The noun in the inf. absol. may certainly be the subject, like xvii. 12, as well as the object (Ewald, § 328*c*), and הִפָּךְ may be used of the turning about of oneself, Ps. lxxviii. 9, 2 Kings v. 26, 2 Chron. ix. 12. That explanation also may claim for itself that הִפָּךְ nowhere occurs with a personal object, if we except one questionable passage, Isa. i. 7. But here the interpretation of the רְשָׁעִים as the object lies near the contrast of בֵּית, and moreover the interpretation of the הִפָּךְ, not in the sense of στρέφειν (LXX.), but of καταστρέφειν (Syr., Targ., Jerome, Græc. Venet., Luther), lies near the contrast of יַעֲבֹר. The inf. absol. thus leaves the power from which the catastrophe proceeds indefinite, as the pass. יִהְיֶה פָּנָיו would also leave it, and the act designedly presented in a vague manner to connect with the certain consequences therewith, as xxv. 4 f., as if to say: there comes only from some quarter an unparalleled overthrow which overwhelms the godless; thus no rising up again is to be thought on, it is all over with them; while, on the contrary, the house of the righteous withstands the storm which sweeps away the godless.

Ver. 8 According to the measure of his intelligence is a man praised,
And whoever is of a perverse mind is despised.

Everywhere in the Mishle שָׂכַל has no other meaning than intellectus (vid. p. 87). The praise which is given to a man measures itself לְפִי שָׂכָלוֹ (punctuate לְפִי שָׂכָלוֹ, according to Torath Emeth, p. 41, Accentssystem, xx. § 1), i.e. according to the measure (so פִּי is used in the oldest form of the language) of his intelligence, or as we may also say, of his culture; for in these proverbs, which make the fear of God the highest principle, שָׂכַל means also understanding of moral excellence, not merely the intellectual superiority of natural gifts. הֶלֶל is here a relative conception of manifold gradations, but it does not mean renown in general, but good renown. Parallel with שָׂכָלוֹ, לֵב refers to the understanding (voûs); the rendering of Löwenstein, "who is of false heart," is defective. נִעְוָה (synon. of נִפְתָּל and עֲקָשׁ, but nowhere else interchanging with it) means here a vero et recto detortus et aversus (Fl.). Such a man who has not a good understanding, nor any certain rule of judgment, falls under contempt (Græc. Venet. τῶ ὀντωτῆ εἰς μυσσαγμόν, after the false reading of יהוה instead of יהיה), i.e. he defames himself by his crooked judgment of men, of things and their relations, and is in this account in no position rightly to make use of them.

Ver. 9 Better is he who is lowly and has a servant,

Than he that makes himself mighty and is without bread.

This proverb, like xv. 17, commends the middle rank of life with its quiet excellences. נִקְלָה (like 1 Sam. xviii. 23), from קָלָה, cognate with קָלַל, Syr. 'kly, to despise, properly levi pendere, levem habere (whence קָלִי, scorn, disgrace), here of a man who lives in a humble position and does not seek to raise himself up. Many of the ancients (LXX., Symmachus, Jerome, Syr., Rashi, Luther, Schultens) explain לוֹ יַעֲבֹד by, and is a servant to himself, serves himself; but in that case the words would have been יַעֲבֹד לְנַפְשׁוֹ (Syr. (דְּמִשְׁמִישׁ נַפְשֵׁהּ)), or rather יַעֲבֹד הוּא. יַעֲבֹד לוֹ would be more appropriate, as thus pointed by Ziegler, Ewald, and Hitzig. But if one adheres to the traditional reading, and interprets this, as it must be interpreted: et cui servus (Targ., Græc. Venet.), then that supplies a better contrast to תַּסְרֵר־לָהֶם, for “the first necessity of an oriental in only moderate circumstances is a slave, just as was the case with the Greeks and Romans” (Fl.). A man of lowly rank, who is, however, not so poor that he cannot support a slave, is better than one who boasts himself and is yet a beggar (2 Sam. iii. 29). The Hithpa. often expresses a striving to be, or to wish to appear to be, what the adj. corresponding to the verb states, e.g. הִתְעַשָּׂר, הִתְנַהֵל; like the Greek middles, εἶσεσθαι, ἀξεσθαι, cf. הִתְחַבֵּם and σοφλιξεσθαι. So here, where with Fleischer we have translated: who makes himself mighty, for כָּבַד, gravem esse, is etymologically also the contrast of קָלָה. The proverb, Sirach x. 26: κρείσσων ἐργαζόμενος καὶ περισσεύων ἐν πάσῃ, ἢ δοξαζόμενος καὶ ἀπορῶν ἄρτων (according to the text of Fritzsche), is a half remodelling, half translation of this before us.

Ver. 10 The righteous knows how his cattle feel,

And the compassion of the godless is cruel.

The explanation: the righteous taketh care for the life of his beast (Fl.), fails, for 10a is to be taken with Ex. xxiii. 9; נֶפֶשׁ signifies also the state of one's soul, the frame of mind, the state of feeling; but יָדַע has, as in the related proverb, xxvii. 23, the meaning of careful cognizance or investigation, in conformity with which one acts. If the Torá includes in the law of the Sabbath (Ex. xx. 10, xxiii. 12) useful beasts and cattle, which are here especially meant, and secures to them the reward of their labour (Deut. xxv. 4); if it forbids the mutilation, and generally the giving of unnecessary pain, to beasts; if it enjoins those who take a bird's nest to let the dam escape (Deut. xxii. 6 f.),—these are the prefigurations of that בהמה נפש בהמה, and as the God of the Torá thus appears at the close of the Book of Jonah, this wonderful apology (defensio) of the all-embracing compassion, the God also of the world-history in this sympathy for the beasts of the earth as the type of the righteous.

In 10b most interpreters find an oxymoron: the compassion of the godless is compassionless, the direct opposite of compassion; i.e. he possesses either altogether no compassion, or he shows such as in its principle, its expression, and in its effects is the opposite of what it ought to be (Fl.). Bertheau believes that in the sing. of the predicate אֲכַרֵּי he is justified in translating: the compassion of the wicked is a tyranny. And as one may speak of a loveless love, i.e. of a love which in its principle is nothing else than selfishness, so also of a compassionless compassion, such as consists only in gesture and speech, without truth of feeling and of active results. But how such a compassionless compassion toward the cattle, and one which is really cruel, is possible, it may be difficult to show. Hitzig's conjecture, חַסְדֵי, sprang from this thought: the most merciful among sinners are cruel—the sinner is as such not חַסְדֵי. The LXX. is right in the rendering, τὰ δὲ σπλάγγνα τῶν ἀσεβῶν ἀνελεήμονα. The noun חַסְדֵי means here not compassion, but, as in Gen. xliii. 30 (LXX. ἔντερα or ἔγκατα) and 1 Kings iii. 26 (LXX. μήτρα), has the meaning the bowels (properly tender parts, cf. Arab. rakhuma, to be soft, tender, with rhm), and thus the interior of the body, in which deep emotions, and especially strong sympathy, are wont to be reflected (cf. Hos. x. 8). The singular of the predicate אֲכֹרֵי arises here from the unity of the subject-conception: the inwards, as Jer. i. 12, from the reference of the expression to each individual of the many.

Ver. 11 He that tilleth his own ground is satisfied with bread,

And he that followeth after vain pursuits is devoid of understanding.

Yet more complete is the antithetic parallelism in the doublette, xxviii. 19 (cf. also Sir. xx. 27a). The proverb recommends the cultivation of the field as the surest means of supporting oneself honestly and abundantly, in contrast to the grasping after vain, i.e. unrighteous means of subsistence, windy speculations, and the like (Fl.). רִיקִים are here not persons (Bertheau), but things without solidity and value (LXX. μάταια; Aquila, Theodotion, κενά), and, in conformity with the contrast, not real business. Elsewhere also the mas. plur. discharges the function of a neut. noun of multitude, vid. יְיָיִים, principalia, viii. 6, and יָרִים, Ps. xix. 14—one of the many examples of the imperfect use of the gender in Hebr.; the speaker has in רִיקִים, vana et inania, not אֲנָשִׁים (Judg. ix. 4), but רְבִירִים (Deut. xxxii. 47) in view. The LXX. erroneously at xxviii. 19, and Symmachus and Jerome at both places understand רִיקִים of slothfulness.

Ver. 12 The godless lusteth after the spoil of evil-doers;

But the root of the righteous shoots forth.

This translation is at the same time an explanation, and agrees with Fleischer's "the godless strives by unrighteous gain like the wicked (iv. 14) to enrich himself, namely, as must be understood from the antithetic members of the parallelism, in vain, without thereby making progress and gaining anything certain. The preterite, as

xi. 2, 8, etc., places the general true proposition as a separate historic principle derived from experience. In 12*b* יִתֵּן stands elliptically or pregnantly: edet, scil. quod radix edere solet, sobolem stirpis, ramorum, etc., as in the Arab. natan and ánatan are specially used without an obj. of the spontaneousness of an odour." מְצוֹד (from צוֹד, to spy, to hunt) is elsewhere the instrument of the hunt (a net), here the object and end of it. If the words had been מְצוֹדֵי רַעִים, then we would explain after מְלֵאכֵי רַעִים, Ps. lxxviii. 49 (vid. comm. on), and אֲשַׁת רַע, vi. 24; but in the difference of number, רַעִים will not be the qualitative but the subjective personal genitive: capturam qualem mali captant. Ewald, who understands רַעִים, 11*b*, of good-for-nothing-fellows, interprets רַעִים here, on the contrary, as neuter (§ 172*b*): the desire of the wicked is an evil net, i.e. wherein he catches all manner of evil for himself. The LXX. has here two proverbs, in which מְצוֹד occurs in the plur. and in the sense of ὄχρωμάτα; 12*b* of the Hebr. text is rendered: αἱ δὲ ῥίζαι τῶν εὐσεβῶν ἐν ὄχρωμάσιν, which Schleusner explains immota erunt. The Hebr. text can gain nothing from this variation. That the LXX. read וְשֵׁשׁ צְרִיקִים אֵיתָן is not probable, since they nowhere thus translate אֵיתָן. But Reiske and Ziegler have, like Ewald and Hitzig, combined יִתֵּן of this proverb with יִתֵּן from אֵיתָן (Arab. wátin), firmum, perennem esse. Hitzig translates the distich, after emending the text of 12*a* by the help of the LXX. and the Arab.: the refuge of the wicked is crumbling clay, but the root of the righteous endures (יִתֵּן from יִתֵּן). Böttcher also reads חֲמַר instead of חֲמַר, and translates (vid. p. 192, l. 11): the refuge of the wicked is miry clay, but the root of the righteous holdeth fast (יִתֵּן = Arab. wátin). But this derivation of a verb יִתֵּן is not necessary. The Græc. Venet. rightly, ῥίζα δὲ δικαίων δώσει. The obj. is self-evident. Rashi reads מִה שֶׁהוּא רֵאוּ לִיתֵן הוּא חֲמַר. So also Schulzens. The root giveth, is equivalent to, it is productive in bringing forth that which lies in its nature. That the root of the righteous endures (Targ. נִתְקַיֵּם) is otherwise expressed, xii. 3.

Proverbs regarding injurious and beneficial words, wise hearing and prudent silence.

Ver. 13 In the transgression of the lips there lies a dangerous snare;
The righteous escapeth from trouble.

The consecutive modus (יִצְאָה) is here of greater weight than e.g. at xi. 8, where the connection follows without it (יִבְנֶה) from the idea of the change of place. The translation: but the righteous . . . restores מַצִּי (מַצִּי), and ignores the syllogistic relation of the members of the proverb, which shows itself here (cf. the contrary, xi. 9) to a certain degree by מַצִּי. Ewald displaces this relation, for he paraphrases: "any one may easily come into great danger by means of inconsiderate words; yet it is to be hoped that the righteous may escape, for he will guard himself against evil from the beginning." He is right here in interpreting צָרָה and מִקְשׁ רָע as the designation of danger into which one is betrayed by the transgressions of his lips, but "inconsiderate words" are less than מִשְׁעַ שְׁפָתַיִם. One must not be misled into connecting with שָׁעַ the idea of missing, or a false step, from the circumstance that שָׁעַ means a step; both verbs have, it is true, the common R. שָׁעַ with the fundamental idea of placing apart or separating, but שָׁעַ has nothing to do with שָׁעַ (step = placing apart of the legs), but denotes (as Arab. fusuwk fisk, from the primary meaning diruptio, direntio) a sinning, breaking through and breaking off the relation to God (cf. e.g. xxviii. 24), or even the restraints of morality (x. 19). Such a sinning, which fastens itself to, and runs even among the righteous, would not be called שָׁעַ, but rather מַצִּי (xx. 9). According to this the proverb will mean that sinful words bring into extreme danger every one who indulges in them—a danger which he can with difficulty escape; and that thus the righteous, who guards himself against sinful words, escapes from the distress (cf. with the expression, Eccles. vii. 18) into which one is thereby betrayed. רָע is the descriptive and expressive epithet to מִקְשׁ (cf. Eccles. ix. 12): a bad false trap, a malicious snare, for מִקְשׁ is the snare which closes together and catches the bird by the feet. This proverb is repeated at xxix. 6, peculiarly remodelled. The LXX. has after ver. 13 another distich:

He who is of mild countenance findeth mercy;
He who is litigious oppresses souls.

(מַצִּי, or rather, more in accordance with the Hebrew original: oppresses himself, מַצִּי.)

Ver. 14 From the fruit which the mouth of the man bringeth forth is he satisfied with good,

And what the hands of the man accomplish returns back to him.

The proverb finds its final verification in the last judgment (cf. Matt. xii. 37), but it is also illustrated in the present life. If the mouth of a man bringeth forth fruit,—namely, the fruit of wholesome doctrine, of right guidance, of comforting exhortation, of peace-bringing consolation for others,—this fruit is also to his own advantage, he richly enjoys the good which flows out of his own mouth, the blessing he bestows is also a blessing for himself. The same also is the case with the actions of a man. That which is done, or the service which is rendered by his hands, comes back to him as a reward or as a punishment. כִּמְלֵךְ signifies primarily accomplishment, execution, and is a twofold, double-sided conception: a rendering of good or evil, and merit on the side of men (whether merited reward or merited punishment), as well as recompense, requital on the side of God. The first line is repeated, somewhat altered, at xiii. 2, xviii. 20. The whole proverb is prophetically echoed in Isa. iii. 10 f. The Keri יְשִׁיב has Jahve as the subject, or rather the subject remains undefined, and “one requites him” is equivalent to: it is requited to him. The Chethib seems to us more expressive; but this use of the active with the undefined subject, instead of the passive, is certainly as much in the Mishle style (cf. xiii. 21) as the development of the subject of the clause from a foregoing genitive.

Ver. 15 The way of the fool is right in his own eyes,
But the wise listeneth to counsel.

Other proverbs, like xvi. 2, say that generally the judgment of a man regarding his character does not go beyond a narrow subjectivity; but there are objective criteria according to which a man can prove whether the way in which he walks is right; but the fool knows no other standard than his own opinion, and however clearly and truly one may warn him that the way which he has chosen is the wrong way and leads to a false end, yet he obstinately persists;<sup>1</sup> while a wise man is not so wise in his own eyes (iii. 7) as not to be willing to listen to well-meant counsel, because, however careful he may be regarding his conduct, yet he does not regard his own judgment so unerring as not to be inclined ever anew to try it and let it stand the test. Ewald has falsely construed: yet whoever hears counsel is wise. In consequence of the contrast, אֵייל and הַכֶּם are the subject ideas, and with לְעֵצָה is brought forward that which is in contrast to the self-complacency of the fool, the conduct of the wise man.

Ver. 16. The relations of the subject and the predicate are the same as in the preceding verse.

The fool makes known his vexation on the same day [at once],
On the contrary, the prudent man hideth the offence.

Very frequently in these proverbs the first line is only defined by the adducing of the second, or the second holds itself in the light of the first. A post-bibl. proverb says that a man is known by three things: by his כוֹס (his behaviour in drinking), his כִּס (his conduct in money transactions), and his כַּעַס (his conduct under deep inward excitement). So here: he is a fool who, if some injury is done to him, immediately shows his vexation in a passionate manner; while, on the contrary, the prudent man maintains silence as to the dishonour that is done to him, and represses his displeasure, so as not to increase his vexation to his own injury. Passionless retaliation may in certain cases be a duty of self-preservation, and may appear to be necessary for the protection of truth, but passionate self-defence is always of evil, whether the injury which is inflicted be justifiable or unjustifiable. Regarding צָרוּם, callidus, vid. p. 56; Schultens' comparison of the Greek γεγυμνασμένος is only a conceit in want of better knowledge. Regarding כָּסֶה (only here and at ver. 23) with חִכְמָה, as שָׁחַר (only xi. 27) with מִשְׁחַר, vid. Ewald, § 170a. בְּיוֹם signifies on the self-same day = without delay, immediately, and is well translated by the LXX. αὐθήμερον. With another object, 16b is repeated in 23a.

Most of the remaining parables of this section refer to the right use and the abuse of the tongue.

Ver. 17 He that breathes the love of truth, utters that which is right;
But a lying tongue, deceit.

This verse is similar in meaning to xiv. 5 (where 5b = vi. 19a); the second line of the distich = xiv. 25b. Everywhere else יִפְיֵה stand together, only here יִפְיֵה is joined to אֱמֻנָה; vid. regarding this יִפְיֵה forming an attributive clause, and then employed as an adjective, but with distinct verbal force, at vi. 19. Viewed superficially, the proverb appears tautological; it is not so, however, but places in causal connection the internal character of men and their utterances: whoever breathes אֱמֻנָה, truth or conscientiousness (the property of the אֱמֵן, vid. at Ps. xii. 2), i.e. lets the voice of this be heard in his utterances, such an one speaks צְדָקָה, i.e. uprightness, integrity, that which is correct, right (Isa. xlv. 19, cf. xli. 26), in relation to truth in general, and to the present case in particular;

but he who עָדָה שְׁקָרִים, i.e. he who, against better knowledge and the consciousness of untruth, confirms by his testimony (from עָדָה, revertere, to say again and again), therewith gives utterance to his impure character, his wicked intention, proceeding from delight in doing evil or from self-interest, and diverted towards the injury of his neighbour. As אִמּוֹנָה and מְרֵמָה correspond as statements of the contents of the utterances, so צָדֵק and שְׁקָרִים as statements of their motive and aim. מְרֵמָה is obj. accus. of the יָבִיד (from הִבִּיד, to bring to light, cf. נִגְיָד, visibility) to be supplied, not the pred. nom. dolorum structor, as Fleischer poetically finds.

Ver. 18 There is that babbleth like the thrusts of a sword,
But the tongue of the wise is healing.

The second (cf. xi. 24) of the proverbs beginning with יָשׁ. The verb בִּטָּה (בִּטָּא), peculiar to the Hebr., which in the modern Hebr. generally means "to speak out" (בִּטָּא in the grammar: the pronunciation) (according to which the LXX., Syr., and Targ. translate it by אָמַר), means in biblical Hebr., especially with reference to the binding of oneself by an oath (Lev. v. 4), and to solemn protestations (Num. xxx. 7, 9, according to which Jerome, promittit): to utter incautiously in words, to speak without thought and at random, referred erroneously by Gesenius to the R. בַּט, to be hollow, probably a word imitative of the sound, like the Greek βατταρλῆειν, to stammer, and βαττολογεῖν, to babble, which the lexicographers refer to a talkative person of the name of Βάττος, as our "salbadern" [=to talk foolishly] owes its origin to one Jenaer Bader on the Saal. Theod. and the Græc. Venet. give the false reading בוֹטָה (πεποιθώς). בִּטָּה קָרוֹת חָרֵב stands loco accusativi, the בִּי being regarded as a noun: (effutiens verba) quæ sunt instar confossionum gladii (Fl.). We also call such a man, who bridles his loquacity neither by reflection nor moderates it by indulgent reference to his fellow-men, a Schwertmaul (sword-mouth) or a Schandmaul (a mouth of shame = slanderer), and say that he has a tongue like a sword. But on the other hand, the tongue of the wise, which is in itself pure gentleness and a comfort to others, since, far from wounding, rather, by means of comforting, supporting, directing exhortation, exercises a soothing and calming influence. Regarding רָפָא, whence מְרַפֵּא, Dietrich in Gesenius' Lex. is right. The root-meaning of the verb רָפָא (cognate רָפָה, to be loose, Hiph. to let go, Hithpa. xviii. 9, to show oneself slothful) is, as the Arab. kindred word rafâ, rafa, raf, rawf (ráf) shows, that of stilling, softening, soothing, whence arises the meaning of healing (for which the Arab. has tabb and 'alkh); the meaning to repair, to mend, which the Arab. rafâ and rafa have, does not stand in a prior relation to to heal, as might appear from Job xiii. 4, but is a specializing of the general idea of reficere lying in mitigare, just as the patcher is called ἀκέστρια = ἡπήτρια,<sup>1</sup> from ἀκέομαι, which means equally to still and to heal. Since thus in רפא the meanings of mitigating and of healing are involved, it is plain that כּוּרפא, as it means healing (the remedy) and at the same time (cf. θεραπεία, Rev. xxii. 2) the preservation of health, iv. 22, vi. 15, xvi. 24, xxix. 1, so also may mean mildness (here and xv. 4), tranquillity (xiv. 30; Eccles. x. 4, calm patience in contrast to violent passion), and refreshing (xiii. 17). Oetinger and Hitzig translate here "medicine;" our translation, "healing (the means of healing)," is not essentially different from it.

Ver. 19 The lip of truth endures for ever,

But the lying tongue only while I wink with the eye.

None of the old translators understood the phrase וְעַד־אֲרִינְעָה; the Venet. also, which follows Kimchi's first explanation, is incorrect: ἕως ῥήξεως, till I split (shatter) it (the tongue). Abulwalid is nearer the correct rendering when he takes אֲרִינְעָה as a noun = רִנֵּעַ with He parag. Ahron b. Joseph is better in rendering the phrase by: until I make a רנע, and quite correct if רנע (from רִנֵּעַ = Arab. rafj, which is used of the swinging of the balance) is taken in the sense of a twinkling of the eye (Schultens: vibramen); cf. Orelli's Die hebr. Synonyme der Zeit und Ewigkeit, p. 27 f., where the synonyms for a twinkling of the eye, a moment, are placed together. עַר (properly progress) has in this phrase the meaning, while, so long as, and the cohortative signifies, in contradistinction to אֲרִינְעָה, which may also denote an unwilling movement of the eyelids, a movement proceeding from a free determination, serving for the measurement of a short space of time, Ewald, § 228a. אֲרִינְעָה, Jer. xlix. 19, l. 44, where Ewald takes אֲרִינְעָה כִּי (when I . . .) in the same sense as אֲדִי־אֲרִינְעָה here, which is more appropriate than the explanation of Hitzig, who regards כִּי as opening the principal clause, and attaches to הֲרִינְעָה the quite too pregnant signification "to need (for an action) only a moment." The lip of truth, i.e. the lip which speaketh truth, endures for ever

(for truth, אֱמֶת = אֲמִנָה, is just the enduring); but the tongue of falsehood is only for a moment, or a wink of the eye, for it is soon convicted, and with disgrace brings to silence; for a post-bibl. Aram. proverb says: קִישָׁטָא קָאִי שְׁקָרָא לֹא קָאִי, the truth endures, the lie endures not (Schabbath 104a), and a Hebrew proverb: הַשְּׁקֵר אֵין לוֹ רַגְלַיִם, the lie has no feet (on which it can stand).<sup>1</sup>

Ver. 20 Deceit is in the heart of him who deviseth evil,
But those who devise peace cause joy.

Regarding the figure of forging, fabricating (LXX., Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, τετραλειν), or of ploughing, which underlies the phrase חָרַשׁ רָע, moliri malum, vid. at iii. 29. That deceit is in the heart of him who deviseth evil (בְּלִבְחֻרְשֵׁי רָע), as is correctly punctuated e.g. by Norzi) appears to be a platitude, for the חָרַשׁ רָע is as such directed against a neighbour. But in the first place, 20a in itself says that the evil which a man hatches against another always issues in a fraudulent, malicious deception of the same; and in the second place, it says, when taken in connection with 20b, where שְׂמֵחָה is the parallel word to מְרִמָּה, that with the deception he always at the same time prepares for him sorrow. The contrast to חֻרְשֵׁי רָע is יוֹעֲצֵי שְׁלוֹם, and thus denotes not those who give counsel to contending parties to conclude peace, but such as devise peace, viz. in reference to the neighbour, for יָעַץ means not merely to impart counsel, but also mentally to devise, to resolve upon, to decree, 2 Chron. xxv. 16, Isa. xxxii. 7 f.; cf. יָעַץ עַל, Jer. xlix. 30. Hitzig and Zöckler give שְׁלוֹם the general idea of welfare (that which is salutary), and interpret the שְׂמֵחָה as the inner joy of the good conscience. Certainly שְׁלוֹם (R. שָׁל, extrahere, in the sense of deliverance from trouble) means not only peace as to the external relationship of men with each other, but also both internal and external welfare. Thus it is here meant of external welfare; Hitzig rightly compares Jer. xxix. 11 with Nahum i. 11 to the contrast between שְׁלוֹם and רָע. But as מְרִמָּה is not self-deception, but the deception of another, so also שְׂמֵחָה is not the joy of those who devise the device in their hearts for the deception of others, but the joy they procure for others. Thoughts of peace for one's neighbour are always thoughts of procuring joy for him, as thoughts of evil are thoughts of deceit, and thus of procuring sorrow for him. Thus וְלִיּוֹעֲצֵי is an abbreviated expression for וְלִבְלֵב יוֹעֲצֵי.

<sup>1</sup>  Vid. Duke's Rabbin. Blumenlese (1844), p. 231.

Ver. 21 No evil befalls the righteous,
But the godless are full of evil.

Hitzig translates אָנִי "sorrow," and Zöckler "injury;" but the word signifies evil as ethical wickedness, and although it may be used of any misfortune in general (as in אֲנִי בְּיָמַי, opp. בְּיָמַי); thus it denotes especially such sorrow as is the harvest and product of sin, xxii. 8, Job iv. 8, Isa. lix. 4, or such as brings after it punishment, Hab. iii. 7, Jer. iv. 15. That it is also here thus meant the contrast makes evident. The godless are full of evil, for the moral evil which is their life-element brings out of itself all kinds of evil; on the contrary, no kind of evil, such as sin brings forth and produces, falls upon the righteous. God, as giving form to human fortune (Ex. xxi. 13), remains in the background (cf. Ps. xci. 10 with v. 1 f.); vid. regarding אָנִי, the weaker power of עָנָה, to go against, to meet, to march against, Fleischer, Levy's Chald. Wörtbuch, 572.

Ver. 22 Lying lips are an abhorrence to Jahve,
And they that deal truly are His delight.

The frame of the distich is like xi. 1, 20. אֲמֹנִים is probity as the harmony between the words and the inward thoughts. The LXX., which translates ὁ δὲ ποιῶν πίστει, had in view עֲשֵׂה אֲמֹנִים (עֲשֵׂה אֲמֹנִים, cf. Isa. xxvi. 2); the text of all other translations agrees with that commonly received.

Ver. 23 A prudent man conceals knowledge,
And a heart-fool proclaims imbecility.

In 23a ver. 16b is repeated, only a little changed; also 16a corresponds with 23a, for, as is there said, the fool knows not how to keep his anger to himself, as here, that a heart-fool (cf. the lying mouth, 22a) proclaims (trumpets forth), or as xiii. 16 says, displays folly without referring to himself the si tacuisses. To this forward charalatan blustering, which intends to preach wisdom and yet proclaims in the world mere folly, i.e. nonsense and imbecility, and thereby makes itself troublesome, and only to be laughed at and despised, stands in contrast the relation of the אָדָם עָרִים, homo callidus, who possesses knowledge, but keeps it to himself without bringing it forth till an occasion presents itself for setting it forth at the right place, at the right time, and to the right man. The right motive also regulates such silence as well as modesty. But this proverb places it under the point of view of prudence.

We take verses 24–28 together as a group. In these verses the subject is the means of rising (in the world), and the two ways, the one of which leads to error, and the other to life.

Ver. 24 The hand of the diligent attains to dominion,
But slothfulness will become tributary.

In x. 4 רָמְיָהּ was adj., but to יָד standing beside it; here it is to be regarded as adj. to יָד (sluggish hand) supplied from 24a, but may be equally regarded as a subst. (slothfulness) (vid. at ver. 27). Regarding חָרִיץ, vid. p. 211. מַס signifies tribute and service, i.e. tributary service rendered to a master. In xi. 29b עָבַד stands for it. It is still the experience of to-day, as it was of Solomon's time, that slothfulness (indolence) brings down to a state of servitude, if not even deeper, but that vigorous activity raises to dominion or to the position of a master, i.e. to independence, wealth, respect, and power.

Ver. 25 Trouble in the heart of a man boweth it down,
And a friendly word maketh it glad.

The twofold anomaly that רָאָה is construed as masc. and יָב as fem. renders the text doubtful, but the LXX., Syr., Targum, which introduce another subject, φοβερός λόγος (יָב רָבֵר מְרִאָּיָה ?), do not improve it; Theodotion's is preferable, who translates μέριμνα ἐν καρδίᾳ ἀνδρὸς κατίσχει αὐτόν, and thus reads יִשְׁחָנֵּה. But the rhyme is thereby lost. As כָּבוֹד, Gen. xlix. 6, so also may יָב be used as fem., for one thereby thinks on נֶפֶשׁ; the plur. לְבוֹת (לְבָבוֹת), according to which in Ezek. xvi. 30 we find the sing. לְבָה, may also conform to this. And יִשְׁחָנֵּה as pred. to רָאָה follows the scheme ii. 10b, perhaps not without attractional co-operation after the scheme קָשָׁה נִבְרִים חֲתִים, 1 Sam. ii. 4. הִשְׁחָה, from שָׁחָה, occurs only here; but הִשְׁחָה, from שָׁחָה, occurs only twice. הִשְׁחָה מִבֶּן מִבֶּן designates in the book of Joshua and in Kings (1 Kings viii. 56) the divine promise; here it is of the same meaning as 1 Kings xii. 7: an appeasing word. Who has not in himself had this experience, how such a word of friendly encouragement from a sympathizing heart cheers the sorrowful soul, and, if only for a time, changes its sorrow into the joy of confidence and of hope!

Ver. 26 The righteous looketh after his pastures,
But the way of the godless leadeth them into error.

In 26a no acceptable meaning is to be gained from the traditional mode of vocalization. Most of the ancients translate יָתֵר as part. to יָתֵר, as it occurs in post-bib. Hebr., e.g. חֲבֵה יָתֵרָה, prevailing, altogether peculiar love. Thus the Targum, מִבֶּן מִבֶּן; Venet.

πεπερίττευται (after Kimchi); on the other hand, Aquila, active: περισεύων τὸν πλησίον (making the neighbour rich), which the meaning of the Kal as well as the form יָתַר oppose; Luther, "The righteous man is better than his neighbour," according to which Fleischer also explains, "Probably יָתַר from יָתַר, πλεονάζειν, has the meaning of πλεον ἔχων, πλεονεκτῶν, he gains more honour, respect, riches, etc., than the other, viz. the unrighteous." Yet more satisfactory Ahron b. Joseph: not the nobility and the name, but this, that he is righteous, raises a man above others. In this sense we would approve of the præstantior altero justus, if only the two parts of the proverb were not by such a rendering wholly isolated from one another. Thus יָתַר is to be treated as the fut. of יָתַר. The Syr. understands it of right counsel; and in like manner Schultens explains it, with Cocceius, of intelligent, skilful guidance, and the moderns (e.g. Gesenius) for the most part of guidance generally. Ewald rather seeks (because the proverb-style avoids the placing of a fut. verb at the commencement of the proverb [but cf. xvii. 10]) to interpret יָתַר as a noun in the sense of director, but his justification of the fixed a is unfounded. And generally this sense of the word is exposed to many objections. The verb יָתַר signifies, after its root, to go about, "to make to go about," but is, however, not equivalent to, to lead (whence Böttcher too ingeniously derives יָתַר = יָאִתַר from אָתַר = אָשַׁר); and whence this strange word, since the Book of Proverbs is so rich in synonyms of leading and guiding! The Hiph. יָתַר signifies to send to spy, Judg. i. 23, and in this sense the poet ought to have said יָתַר לְרֵעֵיוֹ: the righteous spies out (the way) for his neighbour, he serves him, as the Targum-Talmud would say, as יָתַר. Thus connected with the obj. accus. the explanation would certainly be: the righteous searches out his neighbour (Löwenstein), he has intercourse with men, according to the maxim, "Trau schau wem." But why not יָרַעֵיוֹ, but יָרַעֵיוֹ, which occurs only once, xix. 7, in the Mishle, and then for an evident reason? Therefore, with Döderlein, Dathe, J. D. Michaelis, Ziegler, and Hitzig, we prefer to read יָרַעֵיוֹ; it is at least not necessary, with Hitzig, to change יָתַר into יָתַר, since the Hiphil may have the force of the intens. of the Kal, but יָתַר without the jussive signification is a poetic licence יָתַר. That יָתַר can quite well be used of the exploring of the pasture, the deriv. יָתַר, Job xxxix. 18, shows. Thus altered, 26a falls into an appropriately contrasted relation to 26b. The way of the godless leads them into error; the course of life to which they have given themselves up has such a power over them that they cannot set themselves free from it, and it leads the enslaved into destruction: the righteous, on the contrary, is free with respect to the way which he takes and the place where he stays; his view (regard) is directed to his true advancement, and he looketh after his pasture, i.e. examines and discovers, where for him right pasture, i.e. the advancement of his outer and inner life, is to be found. With מְעֵדָה there is a combination of the thought of this verse with the following, whose catch-word is צִירוֹ, his prey.

Ver. 27 The slothful pursues not his prey;

But a precious possession of a man is diligence.

The LXX., Syr., Targ., and Jerome render יִחַרְרֵךְ in the sense of obtaining or catching, but the verbal stem חרך nowhere has this meaning. When Fleischer remarks, חַרְרֵךְ, ἄπ. λεγ., probably like לָכַךְ, properly to entangle in a noose, a net, he supports his opinion by reference to חַרְכִּים, which signifies lattice-windows, properly, woven or knitted like a net. But חַרְרֵךְ, whence this חַרְכִּים, appears to be equivalent to the Arab. khark, fissura, so that the plur. gives the idea of a manifoldly divided (lattice-like, trellis-formed) window. The Jewish lexicographers (Menahem, Abulwalid, Parchon, also Juda b. Koreish) all aim at that which is in accord with the meaning of the Aram. חַרְרֵךְ, to singe, to roast (= Arab. hark): the slothful roasteth not his prey, whether (as Fürst presents it) because he is too lazy to hunt for it (Berth.), or because when he has it he prepares it not for enjoyment (Ewald). But to roast is צָלָה, not דָּרַךְ, which is used only of singeing, e.g. the hair, and roasting, e.g. ears of corn, but not of the roasting of flesh, for which reason Joseph Kimchi (vid. Kimchi's Lex.) understands צִירוֹ of wild fowls, and יַחַרְרֵךְ of the singeing of the tips of the wings, so that they cannot fly away, according to which the Venet. translates οὐ μὲν εἶ . . . ἢ θήρα αὐτοῦ. Thus the Arab. must often help to a right interpretation of the ἄπ. λεγ. Schultens is right: Verbum harak, חַרְרֵךְ, apud Arabes est movere, ciere, excitare, κινεῖν generatim, et speciatim excitare prædam e cubili, κινεῖν τὴν θήραν. The Lat. agitare, used of the frightening up and driving forth of wild beasts, corresponds with the idea here, as e.g. used by Ovid, Metam. x. 538, of Diana:

Aut pronos lepores aut celsum in cornua cervum

Aut agitat damas.

Thus יַחַרְרֵךְ together with צִירוֹ gains the meaning of hunting, and generally of catching the prey. רַמְיָהּ is here incarnate slothfulness, and thus without ellipse equivalent to איש רמיה. That in the contrasted clause חרוץ does not mean ἀποτόμως, decreed (Löwenstein), nor gold (Targ., Jerome, Venet.), nor that which is excellent (Syr.), is manifest from this contrast as well as from x. 4, xii. 24. The clause has from its sequence of words something striking about it. The LXX. placed the words in a different order: κτῆμα δὲ τίμιον ἀνθρώπου καθαρὸς (חרוץ in the sense of Arab. khālas). But besides this transposition, two others have been tried: הן אדם חרוץ יקר, the possession of an industrious man is precious, and הן יקר אדם חרוץ, a precious possession is that (supply הן) of an industrious man. But the traditional arrangement of the words gives a better meaning than these modifications. It is not, however, to be explained, with Ewald and Bertheau: a precious treasure of a man is one who is industrious, for why should the industrious man be thought of as a worker for another and not for himself? Another explanation advanced by Kimchi: a valuable possession to men is industry, has the twofold advantage that it is according to the existing sequence of the words, and presents a more intelligible thought. But can חרוץ have the meaning of תְּרִיצוּת (the being industrious)? Hitzig reads חָרוֹץ, to make haste (to be industrious). This is unnecessary, for we have here a case similar to x. 17, where שׁוֹכֵר is to be expected: a precious possession of a man is it that, or when, he is industrious, חָרוֹץ briefly for חָרוֹצוֹ. The accentuation fluctuates between וְהוֹן אָדָם יָקָר (so e.g. Cod. 1294), according to which the Targum translates, and וְהוֹן אָדָם יָקָר, which, according to our explanation, is to be preferred.

Ver. 28 In the path of righteousness is life,
And the way of its path is immortality.

All the old versions to the Venet. give אֵל instead of אֵלֵי, and are therefore under the necessity of extracting from וְדַרְכָּהּ נְתִיבָהּ a meaning corresponding to this, εἰς θάνατον, in which they are followed by Hitzig: "a devious way leadeth to death." But נְתִיבָהּ (נְתִיבָה) signifies step, and generally way and street (vid. at i. 15), not "devious way," which is expressed, Judg. v. 6, by אַרְחוֹת עַקְלָלוֹת אֵל, by אַרְחוֹת עַקְלָלוֹת אֵל is anywhere punctuated thus in the sense of אֵל is previously improbable, because the Babylonian system of punctuation distinguishes the negative אֵל with a short Pathach, and the prepositional אֵל (Arab. ilā) with a short Chirek, from each other

(vid. Pinsker, Einkl. p. xxii. f.); the punctuation 2 Sam. xiii. 16, Jer. li. 3, gives no support to the opinion that here לֹא is vocalized thus in the sense of לֹא־יָמוּת, and it is not to be thus corrected. Nothing is more natural than that the Chokma in its constant contrast between life and death makes a beginning of expressing the idea of the ἀθανασία (vid. p. 42), which Aquila erroneously read from the אֱלֹהֵי-מֵוֹת, Ps. xlviii. 15. It has been objected that for the formation of such negative substantives and noun-adjectives לֹא (e.g. לֹא-יָמוּת, לֹא-עָמָד) and not לֹא is used; but that לֹא also may be in close connection with a noun, 2 Sam. i. 13 shows. There אֱלֹהֵי-מָוֶת is equivalent to אֱלֹהֵי יְהִי מָוֶת, according to which it may also be explained in the passage before us, with Luther and all the older interpreters, who accepted לֹא in its negative signification: and on (the אֱלֹהֵי governing) the way . . . is no death. The negative לֹא frequently stands as an intensifying of the objective לָמָוֶת; but why should the Chokma, which has already shown itself bold in the coining of new words, not apply itself to the formation of the idea of immortality?: the idol name אֱלֹהֵי-מָוֶת is the result of a much greater linguistic boldness. It is certain that לֹא is here not equivalent to לֹא־יָמוּת; the Masora is therefore right in affirming that נְחִיבָהּ is written with He raphatum pro map-

picato (vid. Kimchi, Michlol 31a, and in the Lex.), cf. 1 Sam. xx. 20, vid. Böttcher, § 418. Thus: the way of their step is immortality, or much rather, since נְחִיבָהּ is not a fixed idea, but also denotes the going to a distance (i.e. the journey), the behaviour, the proceeding, the walk, etc.: the walking (the stepping over and passing through) of their way is immortality. Rich in synonyms of the way, the Hebrew style delights in connecting them with picturesque expressions; but נְחִיבָהּ always means the way in general, which divides into אֲרָחוֹת or נְחִיבוֹת (Job vi. 18, Jer. xviii. 5), and consists of such (Isa. iii. 16). The distich is synonymous: on the path of righteousness (accentuate צְדִיקָה בְּאֶרֶץ) is life meeting him who walks in it, and giving itself to him as a possession, and the walking in its path is immortality (cf. iii. 17, x. 28); so that to go in it and to be immortal, i.e. to be delivered from death, to be exalted above it, is one and the same thing. If we compare with this, xiv. 32b, it is obvious that the Chokma begins (vid. Psychol. p. 410) to break through the limits of this present life, and to announce a life beyond the reach of death.

The proverb xii. 28 is so sublime, so weighty, that it manifestly forms a period and conclusion. This is confirmed from the following proverb, which begins like x. 1 (cf. 5), and anew stamps the collection as intended for youth :

xiii. 1 A wise son is his father's correction ;
But a scorner listens not to rebuke.

The LXX., which the Syr. follows, translate Τὸς πανουργὸς ὑπήκοος πατρὶ, whence it is not to be concluded with Lagarde that they read נוֹסֵר in the sense of a Ni. tolerativum; they correctly understood the text according to the Jewish rule of interpretation, "that which is wanting is to be supplied from the context." The Targ. had already supplied שָׁמַע from 1*b*, and is herein followed by Hitzig, as also by Glassius in the Philologia sacra. But such an ellipse is in the Hebr. style without an example, and would be comprehensible only in passionate, hasty discourse, but in a language in which the representation filius sapiens disciplinam patris audit numbers among the anomalies is not in general possible, and has not even its parallel in Tacitus, Ann. xiii. 56: deesse nobis terra, in qua vivamus—in qua moriemur, non potest, because here the primary idea, which the one expression confirms, the other denies, and besides no particle, such as the ? of this passage before us, stands between them. Böttcher therefore maintains the falling out of the verb, and writes יָבִין before יָבִין; but one says not בִּין מוֹסֵר, but שָׁמַע מוֹסֵר, i. 8, iv. 1, xix. 27. Should not the clause, as it thus stands, give a sense complete in itself? But מוֹסֵר can hardly, with Schultens and Ewald, be taken as part. Hoph. of יָסַר: one brought up by his father, for the usage of the language knows מוֹסֵר only as part. Hoph. of סָרַר. Thus, as Jerome and the Venet. translate: a wise son is the correction of his father, i.e. the product of the same, as also Fleischer explains, "Attribution of the cause, the ground, as elsewhere of the effect." But we call that which one has trained (vegetable or animal) his Zucht (= παιδελα in the sense of παιδευμα). To the wise son (x. 1) who is indebted to the מוֹסֵר אָב (iv. 1), stands opposed the לֵץ (vid. i. 22), the mocker at religion and virtue, who has no ear for יְעָרָה, strong and stern words which awaken in him a wholesome fear (cf. xvii. 10, Jude 23: ἐν φόβῳ).

Ver. 2 From the fruit of the mouth of a man he himself enjoys good ;
But the delight of the godless is violence.

2*a* = xii. 14*a*, where יִשְׂבַּע for יֵאָכֵל. A man with a fruit-bringing mouth, himself enjoys also the blessing of his fruit-producing speech; his food (cf. βρωμα, John iv. 34) is the good action in words, which in themselves are deeds, and are followed by deeds; this good action affords enjoyment not merely to others, but also to himself. Ewald and Bertheau attract לֹאֲכֹל to 2*b*; so also does Fleischer: "the violence which the בְּנֵי־יִם wish to do to others turns back upon themselves; they must eat it also, i.e. bear its evil consequences." The thought would then be like x. 6: os improborum obteget violentia, and "to eat violence" is parallel to "to drink (xxvi. 6) violence (injury)." But wherefore then the naming of the soul, of which elsewhere it is said that it hungers or satiates itself, but never simply (but cf. Luke xii. 19) that it eats? On the contrary, שָׂבַע means also appetitus, xxiii. 2, and particularly wicked desire, Ps. xxvii. 12; here, as Ps. xxxv. 25, the object of this desire (Psychol. p. 202). Regarding בְּנֵי־יִם, vid. above, p. 85. There are such as do injury in a cunning deceitful manner to their neighbour to their own advantage. While the former (the righteous) distributes to his neighbour from the inner impulse without having such a result in view, yet according to God's direction he derives enjoyment himself therefrom: the desire of the latter goes to מִצְרָה, ἀδικία, and thus to the enjoyment of good unrighteously and violently seized.

Ver. 3 He that guardeth his mouth keepeth his soul;

He that openeth wide his lips, to him it is destruction.

3*a* is extended in xxi. 23 to a distich. Mouth and soul stand in closest interchangeable relation, for speech is the most immediate and continuous expression of the soul; thus whoever guards his mouth keeps his soul (the Venet., with excellent rendering of the synonym, ὁ τηρῶν τὸ στόμα ἑαυτοῦ φυλάσσει τὴν ψυχὴν ἑαυτοῦ), for he watches that no sinful vain thoughts rise up in his soul and come forth in words, and because he thus keeps his soul, i.e. himself, safe from the destructive consequences of the sins of the tongue. On the contrary, he who opens wide his lips, i.e. cannot hold his mouth (LXX. ὁ δὲ προσηύχης χεῖλεσιν), but expresses unexamined and unconsidered whatever comes into his mind and gives delight, he is destruction to himself (supply מִצְרָה), or to him it is destruction (supply מִצְרָה); both interpretations are possible, the parallelism brings nearer the former, and the parallel xviii. 7 brings nearer the latter. פָּשַׁע means to spread (Schultens: diducere cum ruptura vel ad rupturam usque), here the lips, Pih. Ezek. xvi. 25, the legs, Arab. fashkh, farshkh; vid. regarding the R. שָׂבַע, to extend, to spread out, Fleischer in the supplements to the A. L. Z. 1843, col. 116. Regarding the Mishle word מְחַתֵּחַ, vid. under x. 14.

Ver. 4. The three proverbs (1-3) which refer to hearing and speaking are now followed by a fourth which, like vers. 2 and 3, speaks of the נַפְשׁוֹ.

The soul of the sluggard desires, yet has not;
But the soul of the industrious is richly satisfied.

The view that the o in נַפְשׁוֹ עַל is the cholem compaginis, Böttcher, § 835, meets with the right answer that this would be the only example of a vocal casus in the whole of gnomic poetry; but when on his own part (Neue Aehrenlese, § 1305) he regards נַפְשׁוֹ as the accus. of the nearer definition (= בְּנַפְשׁוֹ), he proceeds inadvertently on the view that the first word of the proverb is מְחַתֵּחַ, while we read מְחַתֵּחַ, and נַפְשׁוֹ is thus the nom. of the subject. נַפְשׁוֹ עַל means "his (the sluggard's) soul" (for עַל occurs as explanatory permutative briefly for נַפְשׁוֹ עַל), as פְּרִיָּהּ פְּעֵיפֵיהָ means "its branches (i.e. of the fruitful tree)," Isa. xvii. 6. One might, it is true, add הַ to the following word here, as at xiv. 13; but the similar expression appertaining to the syntax ornata occurs also 2 Sam. xxii. 33, Ps. lxxi. 7, and elsewhere, where this is impracticable. Meiri appropriately compares the scheme Ex. ii. 6, she saw him, viz. the boy. With reference to the מְחַתֵּחַ here violently (cf. xxviii. 1) introduced, Böttcher rightly remarks, that it is an adverb altogether like necquidquam, xiv. 6, xx. 4, Ps. lxxviii. 21, etc., thus: appetit necquidquam anima ejus, scilicet pigri. 4*b* shows the meaning of the desire that has not, for there מְחַתֵּחַ occurs, a favourite strong Mishle word (xi. 25, xxviii. 25, etc.) for abundant satisfaction (the LXX. here, as at xxviii. 25, ἐν ἐπιμελείᾳ, sc. ἔσονται, instead of which, Montfaucon supposed πιμελείᾳ, which is, however, a word not authenticated). The slothful wishes and dreams of prosperity and abundance (cf. xxi. 25 f., a parallel which the Syr. has here in view), but his desire remains unsatisfied, since the object is not gained but only lost by doing nothing; the industrious gain, and that richly, what the slothful wishes for, but in vain.

Ver. 5. Two proverbs of the character of the righteous and of the effect of righteousness:

A deceitful thing the righteous hateth;
But the godless disgraceth and putteth to shame.

With דְּבַר in the sphere of an intelligible generality (as here of falsehood, or Ps. xli. 9 of worthlessness) a concrete event is in view, as with דִּבְרֵי in the following plur. a general fact is separated into its individual instances and circumstances (vid. at Ps. lxxv. 4); for דבר means not only the word in which the soul reveals itself, but also any fact in which an inner principle or a general fact or a whole comes forth to view. The righteous hateth all that bears in it the character of a falsehood (punctuate דִּבְרֵי־שָׁקֶר with Gaja, cf. xii. 19), but the godless . . . Should we now, with Bertheau, Hitzig, and others, translate “acteth basely and shamefully”? It is true that both *Hiph.*s may be regarded as transitive, but this expression gives no right contrast to 5a, and is pointless. We have seen at x. 5 that הִכִּישׁ, like הִשְׁבִּיל, has also a causative signification: to put to shame, i.e. bring shame upon others, and that xix. 26, where מִכִּישׁ וּמְחַפֵּיר are connected, this causative signification lies nearer than the intrinsically transitive. Thus it will also here be meant, that while the righteous hateth all that is false or that is tainted by falsehood, the godless on the contrary loves to disgrace and to put to shame. But it is a question whether יִבְאִישׁ is to be derived from בָּאֵשׁ = בּוֹאֵשׁ, and thus is of the same meaning as יִכִּישׁ; הִבְאִישׁ, Isa. xxx. 5, which there signifies pudefactum esse, is pointed הִבְאִישׁ, and is thus derived from a יִבֵּשׁ = בּוֹאֵשׁ, vid. 2 Sam. xix. 6. But הִבְאִישׁ occurs also as Hiph. of בָּאֵשׁ, and means transitively to make of an evil savour, Gen. xxxiv. 30, cf. Ex. v. 21, as well as intransitively to come into evil savour, 1 Sam. xxvii. 12. In this sense of putidum faciens, bringing into evil savour, יִבְאִישׁ occurs here as at xix. 26, suitably along with יִחַפֵּיר; xix. 26 is the putidum facere by evil report (slander), into which the foolish son brings his parents, here by his own evil report, thus to be thought of as brought about by means of slander. The old translators here fall into error; Luther renders both *Hiph.*s reflexively; only the Venet. (after Kimchi) is right: ὀξώσει (from an ὀξοῦν as trans. to ὀξείν) καὶ ἀτιμώσει, he makes to be of ill odour and dishonours.

Ver. 6 Righteousness protecteth an upright walk,

And godlessness bringeth sinners to destruction.

The double thought is closely like that of xi. 5, but is peculiarly and almost enigmatically expressed. As there, צִדְקָה and רְשָׁעִים are meant of a twofold inner relation to God, which consists of a ruling influence over man's conduct and a determination of his walk. But instead of naming the persons of the רְשָׁעִים and הַצְּדִיקִים as the objects of this influence, the proverb uses the abstract expression, but with personal reference, הַמְּדַרְרֵה and הַמְּחַפֵּיר, and designates in two words the connection of this twofold character with the principles of their conduct. What is meant by  $\text{הַיָּזִיר}$  and  $\text{הִסְלִיף}$  proceeds from the contrasted relationship of the two (cf. xxii. 12).  $\text{נָצַר}$  signifies observare, which is not suitable here, but also tueri ( $\text{τηρῆιν}$ ), to which  $\text{הִסְלִיף}$  (vid. at xi. 3, and in Gesen. Thesaurus), not so much in the sense of "to turn upside down," pervertere (as xi. 3, Ex. xxiii. 8), as in the sense of "to overthrow," evertere (as e.g. xxi. 12), forms a fitting contrast. He who walks forth with an unfeigned and untroubled pure mind stands under the shield and the protection of righteousness (cf. with this προσωποῖα Ps. xxv. 21), from which such a walk proceeds, and at the same time under the protection of God, to whom righteousness appertains, is well-pleasing; but he who in his conduct permits himself to be determined by sin, godlessness (cf. Zech. v. 8) from which such a love for sin springs forth, brings to destruction; in other words: God, from whom the  $\text{רָשָׁע}$ , those of a perverse disposition, tear themselves away, makes the sin their snare by virtue of the inner connection established by Him between the  $\text{רָשָׁע}$  and the destruction (Isa. ix. 17). In the LXX. this 6th verse was originally wanting; the translation in the version of Aquila, in the Complut. and elsewhere, which the Syr. follows, falsely makes  $\text{הַמַּטָּה}$  the subj.: τοὺς δὲ ἀσεβεῖς φαύλους ποιεῖ ἀμαρτία.

Ver. 7. Two proverbs of riches and poverty:—

There is one who maketh himself rich and hath nothing;
There is another who representeth himself poor amid great riches.

A sentence which includes in itself the judgment which xii. 9 expresses. To the Hithpa.  $\text{הִתְכַבֵּר}$  (to make oneself of importance) there are associated here two others, in the meaning to make oneself something, without anything after it, thus to place oneself so or so, Ewald, § 124a. To the clauses with  $\text{י}$  there is supplied a self-intelligible  $\text{לו}$ .

Ver. 8 A ransom for a man's life are his riches;
But the poor heareth no threatening.

Bertheau falls into error when he understands  $\text{וְנִעַרָה}$  of warning; the contrast points to threatening with the loss of life. The wealth of the rich before the judgment is not here to be thought of; for apart from this, that the Torá only in a single case permits, or rather ordains (Ex. xxi. 29 f.), ransom from the punishment of death, and declares it in all other cases inadmissible, Num. xxxv. 31 f. (one might indeed think of an administration of justice not strictly in accordance with the Mosaic law, or altogether accessible to bribery), 8*b* does not accord therewith, since the poor in such cases would fare ill, because one would lay hold on his person. But one may think e.g. on waylayers as those introduced as speaking i. 11–14. The poor has no room to fear that such will threateningly point their swords against his breast, for there is nothing to be got from him: he has nothing, one sees it in him and he is known as such. But the rich is a valuable prize for them, and he has to congratulate himself if he is permitted to escape with his life. Also in the times of war and commotion it may be seen that riches endanger the life of their possessor, and that in fortunate cases they are given as a ransom for his life, while his poverty places the poor man in safety. To לֹא שָׁמַע Hitzig fittingly compares Job iii. 18, xxxix. 7: he does not hear, he has no need to hear. Michaelis, Umbreit, Löwenstein (who calls to remembrance the state of things under despotic governments, especially in the East) also explain 8*b* correctly; and Fleischer remarks: pauper minas hostiles non audit, i.e. non minatur ei hostis. Ewald's syntactic refinement: "Yet he became poor who never heard an accusation," presents a thought not in harmony with 8*a*.

The three following proverbs in vers. 9–11 have at least this in common, that the two concluding words of each correspond with one another almost rhythmically.

Ver. 9 The light of the righteous burneth joyously,
And the lamp of the godless goeth out.

The second line = xxiv. 20*b*, cf. xx. 20. In the Book of Job xviii. 5 f., אֹר רְשָׁעִים יִדְעַךְ and יָרוּ עֲלֶיךָ יִדְעַךְ (cf. xxi. 17) stand together, and there is spoken of (xxix. 3) a divine יָר as well as a divine אֹר which enlightens the righteous; however, one must say that the poet, as he, vi. 3, deliberately calls the Torá אֹר, and the commandment, as derived from it and separated, נֵר, so also here designedly calls the righteous אֹר, viz. אֹר הַיּוֹם (iv. 18, cf. 2 Pet. i. 19), and the godless נֵר, viz. נֵר דְלוֹק,—the former imparts the sunny daylight, the latter the light of tapers set in darkness. The authentic punctuation is אֹר־צִרִיקִים, Ben-Naphtali's is אֹר צ' without Makkeph. To יִשְׂמַח Hitzig compares the "laughing tongue of the taper" of Meidāni, iii. 475; Kimchi also the "laughing, i.e. amply measured span, כַּמְפָּה שׁוֹהֵק," of the Talmud; for the light laughs when it brightly shines, and increases rather than decreases; in Arab. samūha has in it the idea of joy directly related to that of liberality. The

LXX. translates מַבְטֵחַ incorrectly by διαπαντός, and has a distich following ver. 9, the first line of which is ψυχὰὶ δόλαι (הַיָּדָיִם שֶׁנֶּשְׁנָה?) πλανῶνται ἐν ἁμαρτίαις, and the second line is from Ps. xxxvii. 21b.

Ver. 10 Nothing comes by pride but contention ;

But wisdom is with those who receive counsel.

The restrictive רַק (only) does not, according to the sense, belong to הַיָּדָיִם (by pride), but to הַיָּדָיִם, vid. under Ps. xxxii. 6 and Job ii. 10. Of הַיָּדָיִם = there is, vid. under x. 24. Bertheau's "one causes" is not exact, for "one" [man] is the most general personal subject, but הַיָּדָיִם is in such cases to be regarded as impersonal: by pride is always a something which causes nothing but quarrel and strife, for the root of pride is egoism. Line second is a variant to xi. 2b. Bescheidenheit (modesty) is in our old [German] language exactly equivalent to Klugheit (prudence). But here the וְנָתַתְּ are more exactly designated as permitting themselves to be advised; the elsewhere reciprocal וְנָתַתְּ has here once a tolerative signification, although the reciprocal is also allowable: with such as reciprocally advise themselves, and thus without positiveness supplement each his own knowledge by means of that of another. Most interpreters regard 10b as a substantival clause, but why should not הַיָּדָיִם be carried forward? With such as permit themselves to be advised, or are not too proud to sustain with others the relation of giving and receiving, there is wisdom, since instead of hatred comes wisdom—the peaceful fruit resulting from an interchange of views.

Ver. 11 Wealth by means of fraud always becomes less ;

But he that increaseth it by labour gains always more.

We punctuate הַיָּדָיִם הַיָּדָיִם (with Makkeph, as in Ven. 1521, Antw. 1582, Frank.-on-the-Oder 1595, Gen. 1618, Leyden 1662), not הַיָּדָיִם הַיָּדָיִם (as other editions, and e.g. also Löwenstein); for the meaning is not that the wealth becomes less by הַיָּדָיִם (Targ., but not the Syr.), or that it is less than הַיָּדָיִם (Umbreit), but הַיָּדָיִם הַיָּדָיִם is one idea: wealth proceeding from הַיָּדָיִם; but הַיָּדָיִם, properly a breath (Theod. ἀπὸ ἀτμοῦ or ἀτμῶδος), then appearance without reality (Aquila, ἀπὸ ματαιότητος), covers itself here by that which we call swindle, i.e. by morally unrestrained fraudulent and deceitful speculation in contrast to solid and real gain. The translations: ἐπισπουδαζομένη μετὰ ἀνομίας (LXX.), ὑπερσπουδαζομένη (Symmachus, Quinta<sup>1</sup>),

festinata (Jerome), do not necessarily suppose the phrase מְהֵרָה = מְהֵרָה, xx. 21 Keri, for wealth which comes מהבל is obtained in a windy (unsubstantial) manner and as if by storm, of which the proverb holds good: “so gewonnen so zerronnen” (= quickly come, quickly go). מְהֵרָה needs neither to be changed into that unhebraic מְהֵרָה (Hitzig) nor into the cognate מְהֵרָה (Ewald), but yet inferior to מהבל in the content of its idea. The contrast of one who by fraud and deception quickly arrives at wealth is one who brings it together in his hand, ἐπὶ χειρός (Venet.), i.e. always as often as he can bear it in his hand and bring it forth (Ewald, Bertheau, Elster, and Lagarde), or according to the measure of the hand, κατὰ χεῖρα (which means “according to external ability”), so that על, which is applied to the formation of adverbs, e.g. Ps. xxxi. 24 (Hitzig),—by both explanations על-יך has the meaning of “gradually,”—is used as in the post-bib. Hebr. על יך על יך = מעט מעט, e.g. Schabbath 156a (vid. Aruch under על) (distinguish from ב-יך = with thought, intentionally, Berachoth 52b). There is scarcely a word having more significations than יך. Connected with על, it means at one time side or place, at another mediation or direction; that which is characteristic here is the omission of the pronoun (על-יך, על-יך). The LXX. translates יך על יך with the unrestrained freedom which it allows to itself by μετ' εὐσεβείας, and has following πληθυνθήσεται another line, δίκαιος οὐκ εἶπαι καὶ κίχρῶ (from Ps. xxxvii. 26).

The figures of paradise in vers. 12 and 14 require us to take along with them the intermediate verse (13).

Ver. 12 Deferred waiting maketh the heart sick,
And a tree of life is a wish accomplished.

Singularly the LXX. Κρείσσων ἐναρχόμενος βουθῶν καρδία, followed by the Syr. (which the Targ. transcribes<sup>1</sup>): Better is he who begins to help than he who remains in hesitating expectation, by which תחלת is doubled, and is derived once from תחיל, to wait, and the second time from תחל, to begin. If the LXX., with its imitators, deteriorates to such a degree proverbs so clear, beautiful, and inviolable, what may one expect from it in the case of those not easily understood! מְשֹׁךְ signifies also, Isa. xviii. 2, to be widely extended (cf. Arab. meshak), here in the sense of time, as מְשֹׁךְ, to prolong, Isa. xiii. 22, and post-bib. מְשֹׁךְ מְשֹׁךְ, the course of time.

Regarding  $\text{תְּחַלֵּה}$ , vid. at x. 28, where as xi. 27  $\text{תְּחַלֵּה}$ , here  $\text{תְּחַלֵּה}$ , as also Ps. lxxviii. 29 of the object of the wish, and with  $\text{בָּרוּךְ}$  in the sense of being fulfilled (cf. Josh. xxi. 43), as there with  $\text{הִבִּיא}$  in the sense of accomplishing or performing. Extended waiting makes the heart sick, causes heart-woe ( $\text{מִחֻלָּה}$ , part. fem. Hiph. of  $\text{חָלָה}$ , to be slack, feeble, sick; R.  $\text{ל}$ , to loosen, to make loose); on the contrary, a wish that has been fulfilled is a tree of life (cf. p. 32), of a quickening and strengthening influence, like that tree of paradise which was destined to renew and extend the life of man.

Ver. 18 Whoever despiseth the word is in bonds to it,
And he that feareth the commandment is rewarded.

The word is thought of as ordering, and thus in the sense of the commandment, e.g. 1 Sam. xvii. 19, Dan. ix. 23, 25. That which is here said is always true where the will of a man has subordinated itself to the authoritative will of a superior, but principally the proverb has in view the word of God, the  $\text{מִצְוָה}$  κατ' ἐξ. as the expression of the divine will, which (vi. 3) appears as the secondary, with the  $\text{תּוֹרָה}$ , the general record of the divine will. Regarding  $\text{בָּרוּךְ}$  of contemptuous, spiteful opposition, vid. at vi. 30, cf. xi. 12. Joël (vid. p. 136, note) records the prevailing tradition, for he translates: "Whoever despises advice rushes into destruction; whoever holds the commandment in honour is perfect." But that  $\text{שָׁלוֹם}$  is to be understood neither of perfection nor of peace (LXX. and Jerome), but means compensabitur (here not in the sense of punishment, but of reward), we know from xi. 31. The translation also of  $\text{לֹא יִהְיֶה לּוֹ}$  by "he rushes into destruction" (LXX. καταφθαρήσεται, which the Syr.-Hexap. repeats; Luther, "he destroys himself;" the Venet. οὐχ ἔσται οἱ, periet sibi) fails, for one does not see what should have determined the poet to choose just this word, and, instead of the ambiguous dat. ethicus, not rather to say  $\text{יִהְיֶה לּוֹ נֶפֶשׁוֹ}$ . So also this  $\text{יִהְיֶה לּוֹ}$  is not with Gesenius to be connected with  $\text{הָבַל}$  = Arab. khabl, corrumpere, but with  $\text{הָבַל}$  = Arab. habl, ligare, obligare. Whoever places himself contemptuously against a word which binds him to obedience will nevertheless not be free from that word, but is under pledge until he redeem the pledge by the performance of the obedience refused, or till that higher will enforce payment of the debt withheld by visiting with punishment. Jerome came near the right interpretation: ipse se in futurum obligat; Abulwalid refers to Ex. xxii. 25; and Parchon, Rashi, and others paraphrase:  $\text{כִּשְׁבּוֹ תִּמְשָׁכְנִי עָלַי}$

he is confiscated as by mortgage. Schultens has, with the correct reference of the ל not to the contemner, but to the word, well established and illustrated this explanation: he is pledged by the word, Arab. marhwan (rahyn), viz. pigneratus pœnæ (Livius, xxix. 36). Ewald translates correctly: he is pledged to it; and Hitzig gives the right explanation: "A חֲבִילָה [a pledge, cf. xx. 16] is handed over to the offended law with the חֲבִילָה [the bad conduct] by the despiser himself, which lapses when he has exhausted the forbearance, so that the punishment is inflicted." The LXX. has another proverb following ver. 13 regarding υἱὸς δόλιος and οἰκέτης σοφός; the Syr. has adopted it; Jerome has here the proverb of the animæ dolosæ (vid. at ver. 9).

Ver. 14 The doctrine of the wise man is a fountain of life,
To escape the snares of death.

An integral distich, vid. p. 8 of the Introduction. Essentially like 14a, x. 11 says, "a fountain of life is the mouth of the righteous." The figure of the fountain of life with the teleological 'וּן לְסוּר (the ל of the end and consequence of the action) is repeated xiv. 27. The common non-biblical figure of the laquei mortis leads also to the idea of death as יָקִיץ [a fowler], Ps. xci. 3. If it is not here a mere formula for the dangers of death (Hitzig), then the proverb is designed to state that the life which springs from the doctrine of the wise man as from a fountain of health, for the disciple who will receive it, communicates to him knowledge and strength, to know where the snares of destruction lie, and to hasten with vigorous steps away when they threaten to entangle him.

Four proverbs follow, whose connection appears to have been occasioned by the sound of their words (ברע . . . ברעה, כל . . . שכל) (ריש . . . רשע).

Ver. 15 Fine prudence produceth favour;
But the way of the malicious is uncultivated.

Regarding שִׁכְלָה טוֹב (thus to be punctuated, without Makkeph with Munach, after Codd. and old editions), vid. p. 84; for the most part it corresponds with that which in a deep ethical sense we call fine culture. Regarding יָמִין, vid. at x. 10: it is not used here, as there, impersonally, but has a personal subject: he brings forth, causes. Fine culture, which shows men how to take the right side and in all circumstances to strike the right key, exercises a kindly heart-winning influence, not merely, as would be expressed by יִמְצֵא הוּן, to the benefit of its possessor, but, as is expressed יתן הן, such as removes generally a partition wall and brings men closer to one another. The אֵיתָן [perennis], touching it both for the eye and the ear, forms the contrast to יתן הן. This word, an elative formation from יתן = יתן, denotes that which stretches itself far, and that with reference to time: that which remains the same during the course of time. "That which does not change in time, continuing the same, according to its nature, strong, firm, and thus אֵיתָן becomes the designation of the enduring and the solid, whose quality remains always the same." Thus Orelli, Die hebr. Synonyme der Zeit u. Ewigkeit, 1871. But that in the passage before us it denotes the way of the בגדים as "endlessly going forward," the explanation of Orelli, after Böttcher (Collectanea, p. 135), is withdrawn by the latter in the new Aehrenlese (where he reads אֵיתָן, "constant strife"). And נחל אֵיתָן (Deut. xxi. 4) does not mean "a brook, the existence of which is not dependent on the weather and the season of the year," at least not in accordance with the traditional meaning which is given Sota ix. 5 (cf. the Gemara), but a stony valley; for the Mishna says: אֵיתָן כמשמעו קשה, i.e. אֵיתָן is here, according to its verbal meaning, equivalent to קשה (hard). We are of the opinion that here, in the midst of the discussion of the law of the עולה ערושה (the ritual for the atonement of a murder perpetrated by an unknown hand), the same meaning of the אֵיתָן is certified which is to be adopted in the passage before us. Maimuni<sup>1</sup> (in Sota and Hilchoth Rozeach ix. 2) indeed, with the Mishna and Gemara, thinks the meaning of a "strong rushing wâdy" to be compatible; but קשה is a word which more naturally denotes the property of the ground than of a river, and the description, Deut. xxi. 4: in a נחל אֵיתָן, in which there is no tillage and sowing, demands for נחל here the idea of the valley, and not primarily that of the valley-brook. According to this tradition, the Targum places a תִּקְיָא in the Peshito translation of 15b, and the Venet. translates, after Kimchi, ὄδδς δὲ ἀνταρτών (of ἀνταρτής from ἀνταίρειν) ἰσχυρά. The fundamental idea of remaining like itself, continuing, passes over into the idea of the firm, the hard, so that אֵיתָן is a word that interchanges with סלע, Num. xxiv. 21, and serves as a figurative designation of the rocky mountains, Jer. xlix. 19, and the rocky framework of the earth, Mic. vi. 2. Thus the meaning of hardness (πετρῶδες, Matt. xiii. 5) connects itself with the word, and at the same time, according to Deut. xxi. 4, of the uncultivable and the uncultivated. The way of the בני־רים, the treacherous (vid. p. 84), i.e. the manner in which they transact with men, is stiff, as hard as stone, and repulsive; they follow selfish views, never placing themselves in sympathy with the condition of their neighbour; they are without the tenderness which is connected with fine culture; they remain destitute of feeling in things which, as we say, would soften a stone. It is unnecessary to give a catalogue of the different meanings of this אִי־ן, such as vorago (Jerome), a standing bog (Umbreit), an ever trodden way (Bertheau), etc.; Schultens offers, as frequently, the relatively best: at via perfidorum pertinacissime tensum; but תִּן does not mean to strain, but to extend. The LXX. has between 15a and 15b the interpolation: τὸ δὲ γυῶναι νόμον διαβολὰς ἐστὶν ἀγαθῆς.

Ver. 16 Every prudent man acteth with understanding;
But a fool spreadeth abroad folly.

Hitzig reads, with the Syr. (but not the Targ.) and Jerome, לָל (omnia agit), but contrary to the Hebr. syntax. The לָל is not feeble and useless, but means that he always acts בְּדַעַת, mit Bedacht [with judgment] (opp. בְּקִלִּי דַעַת, inconsulto, Deut. iv. 42, xix. 4), while on the contrary the fool displays folly. xii. 23 and xv. 2 serve to explain both members of the verse. Bedächtigkeit [judgment] is just knowledge directed to a definite practical end, a clear thought concentrated on a definite point. יִקְרָא, he calls out, and יִפְּץ, he sputters out, are parallels to יִפְרֹשׂ. Fleischer: פִּרְשׂ, expandit (opp. Arab. tawy, intra animum colibuit), as a cloth or paper folded or rolled together, cf. Schiller's<sup>1</sup>—

“ He spreads out brightly and splendidly
The enveloped life.”

There lies in the word something derisive: as the merchant unrolls and spreads out his wares in order to commend them, so the fool does with his foolery, which he had enveloped, i.e. had the greatest interest to keep concealed within himself—he is puffed up therewith.

Ver. 17 A godless messenger falls into trouble;
But a faithful messenger is a cordial.

The traditional text, which the translations also give (except Jerome, nuntius impius, and leaving out of view the LXX., which makes of ver. 17 a history of a foolhardy king and a wise messenger). has not מְלַאֲךָ, but מְלַאֲךָ; the Masora places the word along with מְלַאֲךָ, Gen. xlviii. 16. And יָפֵל is likewise testified to by all translators; they all read it as Kal, as the traditional text punctuates it; Luther alone departs from this and translates the Hiph.: "a godless messenger bringeth misfortune." Indeed, this conj. יָפֵל presses itself forward; and even though one read יָפֵל, the sense intended by virtue of the parallelism could be no other than that a godless messenger, because no blessing rests on his godlessness, stumbles into disaster, and draws him who gave the commission along with him. The connection מְלַאֲךָ רָשָׁע is like אָרַם רָשָׁע, xi. 7 (cf. the fem. of this adj., Ezek. iii. 18). Instead of בָּרָע is בָּרָעָה, xvii. 20, xxviii. 14, parallels (cf. also xi. 5) which the punctuators may have had in view in giving the preference to Kal. With מְלַאֲךָ, from לָאֲךָ, R. לָךְ, to make to go = to send, is interchanged צִיר, from צָוֵר, to turn, whence to journey (cf. Arab. sar, to become, to be, as the vulg. "to be to Dresden = to journey" is used). The connection צִיר נְאֻמִּים (cf. the more simple צִיר נְאֻמָּן, xxv. 13) is like xiv. 15, עַד אֲמוּנִים; the pluralet. means faithfulness in the full extent of the idea. Regarding מְרַפֵּא, the means of healing, here of strength, refreshment, vid. iv. 22, xii. 18.

<sup>1</sup> [“ Er breitet es heiter und glänzend aus, Das zusammengewickelte Leben.”]

Ver. 18 Poverty and shame (to him) who rejecteth correction;
But he who regardeth reproof is honoured.

We are neither to supply אִישׁ before רִישׁ וְקֶלֶן (or more correctly, abstr. pro concr., as רִמְיָה, xii. 27), nor לְ before פֹּרַע, as Gesenius (Lehrgeb. § 227a) does; nor has the part. פֹּרַע the value of a hypothetical clause like xviii. 13, Job xli. 18, although it may certainly be changed into such without destroying the meaning (Ewald, Hitzig); but "poverty and shame is he who is without correction," is equivalent to, poverty and shame is the conclusion or lot of him who is without correction; it is left to the hearer to find out the reference of the predicate to the subject in the sense of the quality, the consequence, or the lot (cf. e.g. x. 17, xiii. 1, xiv. 35).<sup>1</sup> Regarding פֹּרַע, vid. p. 73. The Latin expression corresponding is: qui detrectat disciplinam. He who rejects the admonition and correction of his parents, his pastor, or his friend, and refuses every counsel to duty as a burdensome moralizing, such an one must at last gather wisdom by means of injury if he is at all wise : he grows poorer in consequence of missing the right rule of life, and has in addition thereto to be subject to disgrace through his own fault. On the contrary, to him who has the disgrace to deserve reproof, but who willingly receives it, and gives it effect, the disgrace becomes an honour, for not to reject reproof shows self-knowledge, humility, and good-will; and these properties in the judgment of others bring men to honour, and have the effect of raising them in their position in life and in their calling.

Two pairs of proverbs regarding fools and wise men, ranged together by catchwords.

Ver. 19 Quickened desire is sweet to the soul,

And it is an abomination to fools to avoid evil.

A synthetic distich (vid. p. 8), the first line of which, viewed by itself, is only a feebler expression of that which is said in 12b, for תאוה נהיה is essentially of the same meaning as תאוה באה, not the desire that has just arisen and is not yet appeased (Ümbreit, Hitzig, Zöckler), which when expressed by a part. of the same verb would be הוה (= אֲשֶׁר הִיְתָה), but the desire that is appeased (Jerome, Luther, also Venet. ἐφθεσις γενομένη, i.e. after Kimchi: in the fulfilling of past desire; on the contrary, the Syr., Targ. render the phrase נאוה of becoming desire). The Niph. נהיה denotes not the passing into a state of being, but the being carried out into historical reality, e.g. Ezek. xxi. 12, xxxix. 8, where it is connected with באה; it is always the expression of the completed fact to which there is a looking back, e.g. Judg. xx. 3; and this sense of the Niph. stands so fast, that it even means to be done, finished (brought to an end), to be out, to be done with anything, e.g. Dan. ii. 1.<sup>1</sup> The sentence, that fulfilled desire does good to the soul, appears commonplace (Hitzig); but it is comprehensive enough on the ground of Heb. xi. to cheer even a dying person, and conceals the ethically significant truth that the blessedness of vision is measured by the degree of the longing of faith. But the application of the clause in its pairing with 19*b* acquires another aspect. On this account, because the desire of the soul is pleasant in its fulfilment, fools abhor the renouncing of evil, for their desire is directed to that which is morally worthless and blameworthy, and the endeavour, which they closely and constantly adhere to, is to reach the attainment of this desire. This subordinate proposition of the conclusion is unexpressed. The pairing of the two lines of the proverb may have been occasioned by the resemblance in sound of תּוֹעֵבָה and תַּיִתּוּהוּ. תַּיִתּוּהוּ is n. actionis, like xvi. 17, cf. 6. Besides, it is to be observed that the proverb speaks of fools and not of the godless. Folly is that which causes that men do not break free from evil, for it is the deceit of sinful lust which binds them fast thereto.

<sup>1</sup> We have said, p. 215, that a Niph. in which the peculiar causative meaning of the Hiph. would be rendered passively is without example; we must here with נהיה add, that the Niph. of intransitive verbs denotes the entrance into the condition expressed by the Kal, and may certainly be regarded, according to our way of thinking, as passive of the Hiphil (Ges. § 51, 2). But the old language shows no הוה to which נהיה (Arab. ainhaway, in Mutenebbi) stood as passive; in the Arab. also the seventh form, rightly regarded, is always formed from the first, vid. Fleischer's Beiträge, u.s.w., in the Sitzungs-Bericht. d. Sächs. Gesellschaft d. Wiss. 1863, p. 172 f.

Ver. 20 Whoever goes with wise men, becomes wise ;

And whoever has intercourse with fools, becomes base.

Regarding the significance of this proverb in the history of the religion and worship of Israel, vid. p. 39. We have translated 20*a* after the Keri; the translation according to the Chethib is: "go with wise men and become wise" (cf. viii. 33), not הִלֵּיךְ, for the connection of the (meant imperatively) infin. absol. with an imper. (meant conclusively) is not tenable; but הִלֵּיךְ is an imper. form established by הִלֵּכִי, Jer. li. 50 (cf. לָבַת = הִלֵּיךְ, Num. xxii. 14), and appears to have been used with such shades of conception as here of intercourse and companionship for לָךְ. Regarding יָרִיעַ, vid. at xi. 15; there it meant malo afficietur, here it means malus (pejor) fiet. The Venet. (contrary to Kimchi, who explains by frangetur) rightly has κακωθήσεται. There is here a play upon words; רָעָה means to tend (a flock), also in general to be considerate about anything (xv. 14, Isa. xlv. 20), to take care of anything with the accusative of the person (xxviii. 7, xxix. 3), to hold intercourse with any one: he who by preference seeks the society of fools, himself becomes such (Jerome, similis efficietur), or rather, as יָרִיעַ expresses, he comes always morally lower down. "A wicked companion leads his associate into hell."

Ver. 21 Evil pursueth sinners,

And the righteous is repaid with good.

To תִּרְדָּה of the punishment which follows after sinners at their heels, cf. Nah. i. 8. Greek art gives wings to Nemesis in this sense. To translate 21*b*, with Löwenstein, "The pious, the good rewards them," is untenable, for טוֹב, the good (e.g. xi. 27), never appears personified, only טוֹב, goodness, Ps. xxiii. 6, according to which the LXX. τοὺς δὲ δικαίους καταλήψεται (ישי) ἀγαθά. Still less is טוב meant personally, as the Venet. τὰ δὲ δίκαια ἀποδώσει χρηστός, which probably means: righteous conduct will a good one, viz. God, reward. טוב is an attribute of God, but never the name of God. So the verb עָלַם, after the manner of verbs of educating and leading (עבר, עשה, גמל), is connected with a double accusative. The Syr., Targum, and Jerome translate passively, and so also do we; for while we must think of God in the retribuet, yet the proverb does not name Him any more than at xii. 14, cf. x. 24; it is designedly constructed, placing Him in the background, with vague generality: the righteous will one, will they, reward with good—this expression, with the most general personal subject, almost coincides with one altogether passive.

Ver. 22 The good man leaveth behind him for his children's children,
And the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just.

As a commencing word, טוב signifies in the Mishle for the most part bonum (præ); but here, as at xii. 2, cf. xxii. 9, xiv. 4, it signifies bonus. As the expression that God is טוב (Ps. xxv. 8, etc.) of the O. T. is equivalent to the N. T. that He is ἀγάπη, so that man who in his relation to others is determined by unselfish love is טוב for the good man [der Gültige], i.e. the man who is willing to communicate all good is truly good, because the essence of צדקה, righteousness of life, is love. Such an one suffers no loss by his liberality, but, according to the law, xi. 25, by which a dispenser of blessings is at the same time also a recipient of blessings, he has only gain, so that he makes his children's children to inherit, i.e. leaves behind him an inheritance extending even to his grandchildren (vid. regarding הַנְחִיל, p. 182; here trans. as containing its object in itself, as at Deut. xxxii. 8: to make to inherit, to place in possession of an inheritance). The sinner, on the contrary (חַוֵּטִים sing. to חַוֵּט, ἀμαρτωλοί), loses his wealth, it is already destined to pass over to the righteous who is worthy of it, and makes use (cf. Job xxvii. 17) of that which he possesses in accordance with the will and appointment of God—a revelation of justice appertaining to time, the exceptions to which the old limited doctrine of requital takes no notice of. כֹּחַ, strength, then like our "Vermögen" (cf. opes, facultates), that by means of which one is placed in circumstances to accomplish much (Fl.); cf. regarding the fundamental idea contorquere, compingere, p. 226, also regarding צַפַּן, properly condensare, then condere, p. 61.

Connected with ver. 22 there now follow two proverbs regarding sustenance, with one intervening regarding education.

Ver. 23 The poor man's fresh land gives food in abundance,
And many are destroyed by iniquity.

The Targ. and Theodotion (μέγας) translate רב, but the Masora has רב with short Kametz, as xx. 6, Eccles. i. 8 (cf. Kimchi under רב). The rendering: multitudo cibi est ager pauperum, makes the produce the property of the field (= frugum fertilis). ניר is the new field (novale or novalis, viz. ager), from ניר, to make arable, fruitful; properly to raise up, viz. by grubbing and freeing of stones (סגל). But why, asks Hitzig, just the new field? As if no answer could be given to this question, he changes ניר into נב, and finds in 23a the description of a rentier, "a great man who consumes the income of his capital." But how much more intelligible is the new field of the poor man than these capitals (ראשים) with their per cents (ניב)! A new field represents to us severe labour, and as belonging to a poor man, a moderate field, of which it is here said, that notwithstanding its freshly broken up fallow, it yet yields a rich produce, viz. by virtue of the divine blessing, for the proverb supposes the ora et labora. Regarding ראשים = ראש, vid. at x. 4. Jerome's translation, patrum (properly, heads), follows a false Jewish tradition. In the antithesis, 23b, one is tempted to interpret שׁ in the sense of viii. 21 [substance, wealth], as Schultens, opulentia ipsa raditur quum non est moderamen, and Euchel: that which is essentially good, badly managed, goes to ruin. But שׁ and שׁ at the beginning of a proverb, or of a line of a proverb, in every case means est qui. That a wealthy person is meant, the contrast shows. נספה, which denotes anything taken away or gathered up, has the same meaning here as at 1 Sam. xxvii. 1: est qui (Fl. quod, but the parallel does not demand this) abripitur, i.e. quasi turbine auferatur et perdatur; the word reminds us of סופה, whirlwind, but in itself it means only something smooth and altogether carried off. The א is here as at Gen. xix. 15; elsewhere אֵלָּא מִשְׁפָּט means with injustice (properly, not-right), xvi. 8, Jer. xxii. 13, Ezek. xxii. 29; here it is not the א of the means, but of the mediate cause. While the (industrious and God-fearing) poor man is richly nourished from the piece of ground which he cultivates, many a one who has incomparably more than he comes by his unrighteousness down to a state of beggary, or even lower: he is not only in poverty, but along with this his honour, his freedom, and the very life of his person perish.

Ver. 24 He that spareth his rod hateth his son,
And he who loveth him visits him early with correction.

The pædagogic rule of God, iii. 12, avails also for men, xxiii. 13 f., xxix. 15. The rod represents here the means of punishment, the patria potestas. He who spareth or avoideth this, and who does this even from love, has yet no true right love for his son; he who loveth him correcteth him early. With ἐπιμελῶς παιδεύει of the LXX. (cf. Sir. xxx. 1, ἐνδεδλεχῆσει μάστιγας) the thought is in general indicated, but the expression is not explained. Many erroneously regard the suffix of שָׁחַר as referring to the object immediately following (de Dieu, Ewald, Bertheau, Zöckler); Hitzig, on the contrary, rightly remarks, that in this case we should expect the words to be, after v. 22 (cf. Ex. ii. 6), אֶת־הַפֶּיֶסֶר. He himself, without any necessity, takes שָׁחַר in the sense of the Arab. shkar, compescere. Hofmann (Schriftbew. ii. 2. 402) is right in saying that “שָׁחַר is connected with a double accusative as elsewhere קָרַם occurs; and the meaning is, that one ought much more to anticipate correction than restrain it where it is necessary.” שָׁחַר means to go out early to anything (vid. p. 73), according to which a Greek rendering is ὀρθρίζει (Venet. ὀρθριεῖ) αὐτῷ παιδεύει: maturat ei castigationem = mature eum castigat (Fl.). שָׁחַר does not denote the early morning of the day (as Rashi, לבקריום), but the morning of life (as Euchel, בשחר ימי). “The earlier the fruit, the better the training.” A father who truly wishes well to his son keeps him betimes under strict discipline, to give him while he is yet capable of being influenced the right direction, and to allow no errors to root themselves in him; but he who is indulgent toward his child when he ought to be strict, acts as if he really wished his ruin.

Ver. 25 The righteous has to eat to the satisfying of his soul;
But the body of the godless must suffer want.

Jerome translates תָּחַסר freely by insaturabilis (he has want = has never enough), but in that case we would have expected תָּחַסַר תָּחַסֵר; also in 25a עָרַשׁבַע would have been used. We have thus before us no commendation of temperance and moderation in contrast to gluttony, but a statement regarding the diversity of fortune of the righteous and the godless—another way of clothing the idea of x. 3. עָרַשׁבַע is a segolate form, thus an infin. formation, formally different from the similar עָרַבַע, iii. 10. Regarding בִּטֵן, vid. Psychol. p. 265 f.; it is a nobler word than “Bauch” [belly], for it denotes not the external arch, but, like κοιλία (R. בט, concauus), the inner body, here like xviii. 20, as that which receives the nourishment and changes it in succum et sanguinem. That God richly nourishes the righteous, and on the contrary brings the godless to want and misery, is indeed a rule with many exceptions, but understood in the light of the N. T., it has deep inward everlasting truth.

Chap. xiv. The division of chapters here corresponds to a new commencement made in ver. 1. This proverb reminds us of the allegorical conclusion of the Introduction, and appears, since it is older, to have suggested it (vid. p. 34). The three proverbs 1-3 form a beautiful trifolium: wise management, God-fearing conduct, and wise silence, with their threefold contraries.

Ver. 1 The wisdom of the woman buildeth her house,
And folly teareth it down with its own hands.

Were it חכמות נשים, after. Judg. v. 29, cf. Isa. xix. 11, then the meaning would be: the wise among women, each of them buildeth her house. But why then not just חכמה חכמה, as 2 Sam. xiv. 2, cf. Ex. xxxv. 25? The Syr., Targum, and Jerome write sapiens mulier. And if the whole class must be spoken of, why again immediately the individualizing in בנתה? The LXX. obliterates that by its ἐκδοδόμησαν. And does not אלהת [folly] in the contrasted proverb (1b) lead us to conclude on a similar abstract in 1a? The translators conceal this, for they translate אלהת personally. Thus also the Venet. and Luther; אלהת is, says Kimchi, an adj. like ערה, cæca. But the linguistic usage does not point אלהת with אלהת to אלהת. It is true that a fem. of אלהת does not occur; there is, however, also no place in which אלהת may certainly present itself as such. Thus also חכמות must be an abstr.; we have shown at i. 20 how חכמות, as neut. plur., might have an abstr. meaning. But since it is not to be perceived why the poet should express himself so singularly, the punctuation חכמות is to be understood as proceeding from a false supposition, and is to be read חכמות, as at ix. 1 (especially since this passage rests on the one before us). Fleischer says: "to build the house is figuratively equivalent to, to regulate well the affairs of a house, and to keep them in a good condition; the contrary, to tear down the house, is the same contrast as the Arab. 'amârat âllyt and kharab allyt. Thus e.g. in Burckhardt's Sprüche. 217, harrt sabrt bythâ 'amârat, a good woman (ein braves Weib) has patience (with her husband), and thereby she builds up her house (at the same time an example of the use of the preterite in like general sentences for individualizing); also No. 430 of the same work: 'amârat âlbyť wla kharâbt, it is becoming to build the house, not to destroy it; cf. in the Thousand and One Nights, where a woman who had compelled her husband to separate from her says: ána âlty 'amalt hadhá barwhy wâkhrnt byty bnfsy. Burckhardt there makes the remark: 'amârat âlbyť denotes the family placed in good circumstances—father, mother, and children all living together happily and peacefully." This conditional relation of the wife to the house expresses itself in her being named as house-wife (cf. Househre [= honour of a house] used by Luther, Ps. lxxviii. 13), to which the Talmudic זְבִיחַי (= uxor mea) answers; the wife is noted for this, and hence is called עֵיקַר הַבַּיִת, the root and foundation of the house; vid. Buxtorf's Lex. col. 301. In truth, the oneness of the house is more dependent on the mother than on the father. A wise mother can, if her husband be dead or neglectful of his duty, always keep the house together; but if the house-wife has neither understanding nor good-will for her calling, then the best will of the house-father cannot hinder the dissolution of the house, prudence and patience only conceal and mitigate the process of dissolution—folly, viz. of the house-wife, always becomes more and more, according to the degree in which this is a caricature of her calling, the ruin of the house.

Ver. 2 He walketh in his uprightness who feareth Jahve,
And perverse in his ways is he that despiseth Him.

That which syntactically lies nearest is also that which is intended; the ideas standing in the first place are the predicates. Wherein it shows itself, and whereby it is recognised, that a man fears God, or stands in a relation to Him of indifference instead of one of fear and reverence, shall be declared: the former walketh in his uprightness, i.e. so far as the consciousness of duty which animates him prescribes; the latter in his conduct follows no higher rule than his own lust, which drives him sometimes hither and sometimes thither. הוֹלֵךְ בְּיִשְׁרָאֵל (cf. יִשְׂרָאֵל הוֹלֵךְ, Mic. ii. 7) is of kindred meaning with הוֹלֵךְ בְּתוֹמָם, xxviii. 6 (הוֹלֵךְ בְּתוֹמִים, x. 9), and הוֹלֵךְ בְּחָזֶק, Isa. lvii. 2. The connection of לֹא הִרְבֵּי follows the scheme of 2 Kings xviii. 37, and not 2 Sam. xv. 32, Ewald, § 288c. If the second word, which particularizes the idea of the first, has the reflexive suff. as here, then the accusative connection, or, as ii. 15, the prepositional, is more usual than the genitive. Regarding לֹא, flectere, inclinare (a word common to the author of i.-ix.), vid. at ii. 15. With בְּחִוְהוּ, cf. 1 Sam. ii. 30; the suffix without doubt refers to God, for חוּהוּ is the word that stands in parallel contrast to 'יָרָא ה'.

Ver. 3 In the mouth of the fool is a switch of pride;

But the lips of the wise preserve them.

The noun חִטָּר (Aram. חִטְרָא, Arab. khitr), which besides here occurs only at Isa. xi. 1, meaning properly a brandishing (from חִטַּר = Arab. khatr, to brandish, to move up and down or hither and thither, whence álkhittár, the brandisher, poet. the spear), concretely, the young elastic twig, the switch, i.e. the slender flexible shoot. Luther translates, "fools speak tyrannically," which is the briefer rendering of his earlier translation, "in the mouth of the fool is the sceptre of pride;" but although the Targum uses חוּטְרָא of the king's sceptre and also of the prince's staff, yet here for this the usual Hebr. שֵׁבֶט were to be expected. In view of Isa. xi. 1, the nearest idea is, that pride which has its roots in the heart of the fool, grows up to his mouth. But yet it is not thus explained why the representation of this proceeding from within stops with חִטָּר (cf. xi. 30). The βακτηρία ὑβρεως (LXX., and similarly the other Greek versions) is either meant as the rod of correction of his own pride (as e.g. Abulwalid, and, among the moderns, Bertheau and Zöckler) or as chastisement for others (Syr., Targum: the staff of reviling). Hitzig is in favour of the former idea, and thinks himself warranted in translating: a rod for his back; but while נִיָּה is found for נִאָּוֶה, we do not (cf. under Job xli. 7: a pride are the, etc.) find נִאָּוֶה for גוֹה, the body, or גַּי, the back. But in general it is to be assumed, that if the poet had meant חִטָּר as the means of correction, he would have written נִאָּוֶהוּ. Rightly Fleischer: "The tongue is often compared to a staff, a sword, etc., in so far as their effects are ascribed to it; we have here the figure which in Rev. i. 16 passes over into plastic reality." Self-exaltation (R. נָא, to strive to be above) to the delusion of greatness is characteristic of the fool, the אֵיִל [godless], not the כְּסִיל [stupid, dull]—Hitzig altogether confounds these two conceptions. With such self-exaltation, in which the mind, morally if not pathologically diseased, says, like Nineveh and Babylon in the prophets, I am alone, and there is no one with me, there is always united the scourge of pride and of disgrace; and the meaning of 36 may now be that the lips of the wise protect those who are exposed to this injury (Ewald), or that they protect the wise themselves against such assaults (thus most interpreters).

But this reference of the eos to others lies much more remote than at xii. 6; and that the protection of the wise against injury inflicted on them by words is due to their own lips is unsatisfactory, as in this case, instead of Bewahrung [custodia], we would rather expect Vertheidigung [defensio], Dämpfung [damping, extinguishing], Niederduckung [stooping down, accommodating oneself to circumstances]. But also it cannot be meant that the lips of the wise preserve them from the pride of fools, for the thought that the mouth preserves the wise from the sins of the mouth is without meaning and truth (cf. the contrary, xiii. 3). Therefore Arama interprets the verb as jussive: the lips = words of the wise mayest thou keep, i.e. take to heart. And the Venet. translates: χείλη δὲ σοφῶν φυλάξεις αὐτά, which perhaps means: the lips of the wise mayest thou consider, and that not as a prayer, which is foreign to the gnome, but as an address to the hearer, which e.g. xx. 19 shows to be admissible. But although in a certain degree of similar contents, yet 3*a* and 3*b* clash. Therefore it appears to us more probable that the subject of 3*b* is the חכמה contained in חכמים; in vi. 22 wisdom is also the subject to השמר עליך without its being named. Thus: while hurtful pride grows up to the throat of the fool, that, viz. wisdom, keeps the lips of the wise, so that no word of self-reflection, especially none that can wound a neighbour, escapes from them. The form הַשְׁמַרְתָּ is much more peculiar than שָׁמַרְתָּ, Ex. xviii. 26, and תִּשְׁמְרֵנִי, Ruth ii. 8, for the latter are obscured forms of שָׁמַרְתָּ and תִּשְׁמְרֵנִי, while on the contrary the former arises from הַשְׁמַרְתָּ.<sup>1</sup> If, according to the usual interpretation, we make שָׁמַרְתָּ the subject, then the construction follows the rule, Gesen. § 146, 2. The LXX. transfers it into Greek: χείλη δὲ σοφῶν φυλάσσει αὐτούς. The probable conjecture, that הַשְׁמַרְתָּ is an error in transcription for הַשְׁמַרְתָּ אֹתָם = הַשְׁמַרְתָּ אֹתָם (this is found also in Luzzatto's Gramm. § 776; and Hitzig adduces as other examples of such transpositions of the ו Jer. ii. 25, xvii. 23, Job xxvi. 12, and Josh ii. 4, ותצפנו for ותצפנו), we do not acknowledge, because it makes the lips the subject with an exclusiveness the justification of which is doubtful to us.

<sup>1</sup> Vid. regarding these forms with δ instead of the simple Sheva, Kimchi, Michlol 20*ab*. He also remarks that these three forms with ú are all Milra; this is the case also in a remarkable manner with שָׁמַרְתָּ, vid. Michlol 21*b*; Livjath Chen ii. 9; and particularly Hei'enheim, in his edition of the Pentateuch entitled Meór Enajim, under Ex. xviii. 26.

Ver. 4. The switch and the preserving, ver. 3, may have given occasion to the collector, amid the store of proverbs before him, now to present the agricultural figure :

Without oxen the crib is empty ;

But rich increase is by the strength of the plough-ox.

This is a commendation of the breeding of cattle, but standing here certainly not merely as useful knowledge, but as an admonition to the treatment in a careful, gentle manner, and with thankful recompense of the ox (xii. 10), which God has subjected to man to help him in his labour, and more generally, in so far as one seeks to gain an object, to the considerate adoption of the right means for gaining it. אֲלָפִים (from אָלַף, to cling to) are the cattle giving themselves willingly to the service of men (poet. equivalent to בְּקָרִים). שׁוֹר (חֹר, Arab. thwr), Ved. sthúras, is the Aryan-Semitic name of the plough-ox. The noun אֲבוּס (= אָבוּס like אָטָן, אָטָן) denotes the fodder-trough, from אָבַס, to feed, and thus perhaps as to its root-meaning related to φάτνη (πάτνη), and may thus also designate the receptacle for grain where the corn for the provender or feeding of the cattle is preserved—מִאֲבוּס, Jer. i. 26, at least has this wider signification of the granary ; but there exists no reason to depart here from the nearest signification of the word : if a husbandman is not thoughtful about the care and support of the cattle by which he is assisted in his labour, then the crib is empty—he has nothing to heap up ; he needs not only fodder, but has also nothing. בָּר (in pause בֶּר), clean (synon. נָקִי, cf. at xi. 26), corresponds with our baar [bare] = bloss [nudus]. Its derivation is obscure. The בֶּר, 4b, is that of the mediating cause : by the strength of the plough-ox there is a fulness of grain gathered into the barn (תְּבוּאוֹת, from בָּא, to gather in, anything gathered in). רֶבֶר is the inverted בֶּר. Striking if also accidental is the frequency of the א and ב in ver. 4. This is continued in ver. 5, where the collector gives two proverbs, the first of which commences with a word beginning with א, and the second with one beginning with ב :

Ver. 5 A faithful witness does not speak untruth ;

But a lying witness breathes out falsehoods.

The right vocalization and sequence of the accents is בִּקֵּשׁ לֵץ חֲכָמָה (ק with Tsere and the servile Mahpach, חֲכָמָה with Munach, because the following Athnach-word has not two syllables before the tone). As in 5a עַד אֲמוֹנִים, so in 5b עַד שֹׁקֵר is the subject. Different is the relation of subject and predicate in the second line of the parallel proverbs, ver. 25, xix. 5. With 5a cf. צִיר אַמוּנִים, xiii. 17; and regarding יָפִיחַ (one who breathes out), vid. at vi. 19, xii. 17.

Ver. 6 In vain the scorner seeketh wisdom;

But to the man of understanding knowledge is easy.

The general sentence is concrete, composed in the common historical form. Regarding נִסְיָא, nequidquam, vid. at xiii. 4. The participle נִסְיָא is here neut. for נִסְיָאָה, something which makes itself easy or light. The frivolous man, to whom truth is not a matter of conscience, and who recognises no authority, not even the Supreme, never reaches to truth notwithstanding all his searching, it remains veiled to him and far remote; but to the man of understanding, who knows that the fear of God and not estrangement from God leads to truth, knowledge is an easy matter—he enters on the right way to this end, he brings the right receptivity, brings to bear on it the clear eye, and there is fulfilled to him the saying, “To him that hath it is given.”

Three proverbs regarding fools:

Ver. 7 Go from the presence of a foolish man,

And surely thou hast not known lips of knowledge;

i.e. surely hast not brought into experience that he possesses lips which express experimental knowledge, or: surely thou must confess on reflection that no prudent word has come forth from his mouth. If 7b were intended to assign a motive, then the expression would be כִּי בִלְיָדָע or וּבִלְיָדָע (Isa. xlv. 9), according to which Aquila and Theodotion translate, καὶ οὐ μὴ γινώσκῃς. נִגְנָר is the sphere of vision, and מִנְגֵּנָר denotes either away from the sphere of vision, as e.g. Isa. i. 16, or, inasmuch as מָן is used as in מַעַל, and the like: at a certain distance from the sphere of vision, but so that one keeps the object in sight, Gen. xxi. 16. לְנִגְנָר denotes, as the inverted expression Deut. xxviii. 66 shows, over against any one, so that he has the object visibly before him, and מִנְגֵּנָר לְ, Judg. xx. 34, from the neighbourhood of a place where one has it in view. So also here: go away from the vis-à-vis (vis = visûs) of the foolish man, if thou hast to do with such an one; whence, 7b, follows what he who has gone away must on looking back say to himself. בֹּל (with the pret. as e.g. Isa. xxxiii. 23) expresses a negative with emphasis. Nolde and others, also Fleischer, interpret 7b relatively: et in quo non cognoveris labia scientiæ. If וּבִלְיָדָע were the expression used, then it would be explained after ix. 13, for the idea of the foolish man is extended: and of such an one as absolutely knows not how to speak anything prudent. But in יָבִל־יִדְעָה the relative clause intended must be indicated by the added בּוֹ: and of such an one in whom . . . Besides, in this case יָבִל (vid. Ps. xxxv. 15) would have been nearer than יָבִל. The LXX. has modified this proverb, and yet has brought out nothing that is correct; not only the Syr., but also Hitzig follows it, when he translates, "The foolish man hath everything before him, but lips of knowledge are a receptacle of knowledge" (יָבִלִי דַעַת). It racks one's brains to find out the meaning of the first part here, and, as Böttcher rightly says, who can be satisfied with the "lips of knowledge" as the "receptacle of knowledge"?

Ver. 8 The wisdom of the prudent is to observe his way,
And the folly of fools is deceit.

The nearest idea is that of self-deceit, according to which the LXX., Syr., and Jerome render the word error ("Irrsal"). But מְרִמָּה is nowhere else used of self-deception, and moreover is not the suitable word for such an idea, since the conception of the dolus malus is constantly associated with it. Thus the contrast will be this: the wisdom of the prudent shows itself in this, that he considers his conduct (יְהַרְרֵם as vii. 7, cf. Ps. v. 2), i.e. regulates it carefully, examining and considering (xiii. 16) it according to right and duty; and that on the contrary the folly of fools shows itself in this, that they aim at the malevolent deception of their neighbour, and try all kinds of secret ways for the gaining of this end. The former is wisdom, because from the good only good comes; the latter is folly or madness, because deception, however long it may sneak in darkness, yet at last comes to light, and recoils in its destructive effects upon him from whom it proceeds.

Ver. 9 The sacrificial offering of fools mocketh;
But between upright men there is good understanding.

We may not give to the Hiph. יִלְלִי any meaning which it nowhere has, as, to excuse (Kimchi), or to come to an agreement by mediation (Schultens). So we may not make אֵיילִים the subject (Targ., Symmachus, Jerome, Luther, "fools make sport with sin"), for one is persuaded that אֵיילִים is equivalent to כָּל אֶחָד מִן הָאֵיילִים (Immanuel, Meiri, and others), which would be more admissible if we had מֵלִיץ (vid. iii. 35), or if יִלְיָן did not immediately follow (vid. xxviii. 1). Aquila and Theodotion rightly interpret the relation of the component parts of the sentence: ἄφρονος γλευνάζει πλημμύλεια; and this translation of שִׁפְטָם also is correct if we take πλημμύλεια in the sense of a θυσία περι πλημμελείας (Sir. vii. 31), in which the Judæo-Hellenic actually uses it (vid. Schleusner's Lex.). The idea of sacrificial offering is that of expiation: it is a penitential work, it falls under the prevailing point of view of an ecclesiastical punishment, a satisfactio in a church-disciplinary sense; the forgiveness of sins is conditioned by this, (1) that the sinner either abundantly makes good by restitution the injury inflicted on another, or in some other way bears temporal punishment for it, and (2) that he willingly presents the sacrifices of rams or of sheep, the value of which the priest has to determine in its relation to the offence (by a tax-scale from 2 shekels upwards). The Torâ gives accurately the offences which are thus to be atoned for. Here, with reference to 9b, there particularly comes into view the offence against property (Lev. v. 20 ff.) and against female honour (Lev. xix. 20–22). Fools fall from one offence into another, which they have to atone for by the presentation of sacrificial offerings; the sacrificial offering mocketh them (לִי with accus.-object, as xix. 28, Ps. cxix. 51), for it equally derides them on account of the self-inflicted loss, and on account of the efforts with which they must make good the effects of their frivolity and madness; while on the contrary, among men of upright character, רֵצוֹן, a relation of mutual favour, prevails, which does not permit that the one give to the other an indemnity, and apply the Asham- [אֲשָׁם = trespass-offering] Torâ. Symmachus rightly: καὶ ἀνάμεσον εὐθέων εὐδοκία. But the LXX. confuses this proverb also. Hitzig, with the Syr., follows it and translates:

The tents of the foolish are in punishment overthrown [verfüllt];

The house of the upright is well-pleasing [wolgefällt].

Is not this extravagant [ungereimt = not rhymed] in spite of the rhyme? These אהלי [tents] extracted from אוילים, and this בית [house] formed out of בֵּין, are nothing but an aimless and tasteless flourish.

Four proverbs of joy and sorrow in the present and the future:

Ver. 10 The heart knoweth the trouble of its soul,

And no stranger can intermeddle with its joy.

The accentuation לֵב יָדַע seems to point out יָדַע as an adjective (Löwenstein: a feeling heart), after 1 Kings iii. 9, or genit. (of a feeling heart); but Cod. 1294 and the Jemen Cod., and others, as well as the editions of Jablonsky and Michaelis, have לֵב with Rebia, so that this is by itself to be taken as the subject (cf. the accentuation xv. 5a and under at 16a). מַרְתָּ has the ך with Dagesh, and consequently the short Kametz (Michlol 63*b*), like  $\text{מִשְׁפָּט}$  iii. 8, cf.  $\text{מִרְתָּה}$ , Judg. vi. 28, and on the contrary  $\text{מִרְתָּה}$ , Ezek. xvi. 4; it is the fem. of mōr = morr, from  $\text{מָרַר}$ , adstringere, amarum esse. Regarding  $\text{לֵב}$ , in contradistinction to  $\text{נֶפֶשׁ}$ , vid. Psychol. p. 251. "All that is meant by the Hellenic and Hellenistic νοῦς, λόγος, συνείδησις, θυμός, is comprehended in καρδία, and all by which the  $\text{בֶּשֶׂר}$  and  $\text{נֶפֶשׁ}$  are affected comes in  $\text{לֵב}$  into the light of consciousness."

The first half of the proverb is clear: the heart, and only it, i.e. the man in the centre of his individuality, knows what brings bitterness to his soul, i.e. what troubles him in the sphere of his natural life and of the nearest life-circle surrounding him. It thus treats of life experiences which are of too complex a nature to be capable of being fully represented to others, and, as we are wont to say, of so delicate a nature that we shrink from uncovering them and making them known to others, and which on this account must be kept shut up in our own hearts, because no man is so near to us, or has so fully gained our confidence, that we have the desire and the courage to pour out our hearts to him from their very depths. Yet the saying, "Every one knows where the shoe pinches him" (1 Kings viii. 38), stands nearer to this proverb; here this expression receives a psychological, yet a sharper and a deeper expression, for the knowledge of that which grieves the soul is attributed to the heart, in which, as the innermost of the soul-corporeal life, it reflects itself and becomes the matter-of-fact of the reflex consciousness in which it must shut itself up, but also for the most part without external expression. If we now interpret  $\text{לֹא יִתְעַרֵב}$  as prohibitive, then this would stand (with this exception, that in this case  $\text{לֹא}$  instead of  $\text{לֵב}$  is to be expected) in opposition, certainly not intended, to the exhortation, Rom. xii. 15, "Rejoice with them that do rejoice," and to the saying, "Distributed joy is doubled joy, distributed sorrow is half sorrow;" and an admonition to leave man alone with his joy, instead of urging him to distribute it, does not run parallel with 10*a*. Therefore we interpret the fut. as potentialis. As there is a soul-sorrow of the man whose experience is merely a matter of the heart, so there is also a soul-joy with which no other (vid. regarding  $\text{וְיָ}$ , p. 135, and cf. here particularly Job xix. 27) intermeddleth ( $\text{אֵין הַתְּעַרֵב$  like Ps. cvi. 35), in which no other can intermeddle, because his experience, as e.g. of blessed spiritual affection or of benevolent feeling, is purely of a personal nature, and admits of no participation (cf. on ἐκρυψε, Matt. xiii. 44), and thus of no communication to others. Elster well observes: "By this thought, that the innermost feelings of a man are never fully imparted to another man, never perfectly cover themselves with the feelings of another, yea, cannot at all be fully understood by another, the worth and the significance of each separate human personality is made conspicuous, not one of which is the example of a species, but each has its own peculiarity, which no one of countless individuals possesses. At the same time the proverb has the significance, that it shows the impossibility of a perfect fellowship among men, because one never wholly understands another. Thereby it is indicated that no human fellowship can give true salvation, but only the fellowship with God, whose love and wisdom are capable of shining through the most secret sanctuary of human personality." Thus also Dächsel (but he interprets 10b admonitorily): "Each man is a little world in himself, which God only fully sees through and understands. His sorrow appertaining to his innermost life, and his joy, another is never able fully to transfer to himself. Yea, the most sorrowful of all experiences, the most inward of all joys, we possess altogether alone, without any to participate with us."

Ver. 11 The house of the wicked is overthrown;
But the tent of the upright flourishes.

In the cogn. proverb, xii. 7, line 2 begins with בְּיֵסֶד, but here the apparently firmly-founded house is assigned to the godless, and on the contrary the tent, easily destroyed, and not set up under the delusion of lasting for ever, is assigned to the righteous. While the former is swept away without leaving a trace behind (Isa. xiv. 23), the latter has blossoms and shoots (הַפְּרִיָּה) as inwardly transitive, like Job xiv. 9, Ps. xcii. 14); the household of such remains not only preserved in the same state, but in a prosperous, happy manner it goes forward and upward.

Ver. 12 There is a way that seemeth right to one,
But the end thereof are the ways of death.

This is literally repeated in xvi. 25. The rightness is present only as a phantom, for it arises wholly from a terrible self-deception; the man judges falsely and goes astray when, without regard to God and His word, he follows only his own opinions. It is the way of estrangement from God, of fleshly security; the way of vice, in which the blinded thinks to spend his life, to set himself to fulfil his purposes; but the end thereof (אֲחֵרֵיהֶם with neut.

fem.: the end of this intention, that in which it issues) are the ways of death. He who thus deceives himself regarding his course of life, sees himself at last arrived at a point from which every way which now further remains to him leads only down to death. The self-delusion of one ends in death by the sentence of the judge, that of another in self-murder; of one in loathsome disease, of another in a slow decay under the agony of conscience, or in sorrow over a henceforth dishonoured and distracted life.

Ver. 18 Even in the midst of laughter the heart experiences sadness;
And to it, joy, the end is sorrow.

Every human heart carries the feeling of disquiet and of separation from its true home, and of the nothingness, the transitoriness of all that is earthly; and in addition to this, there is many a secret sorrow in every one which grows out of his own corporeal and spiritual life, and from his relation to other men; and this sorrow, which is from infancy onward the lot of the human heart, and which more and more deepens and diversifies itself in the course of life, makes itself perceptible even in the midst of laughter, in spite of the mirth and merriment, without being able to be suppressed or expelled from the soul, returning always the more intensely, the more violently we may have for a time kept it under and sunk it in unconsciousness. Euchel cites here the words of the poet, according to which 13a is literally true:

“No, man is not made for joy;
Why weep his eyes when in heart he laughs?”<sup>1</sup>

From the fact that sorrow is the fundamental condition of humanity, and forms the background of laughter, it follows, 13b, that in general it is not good for man to give himself up to joy, viz. sensual (worldly), for to it, joy, the end (the issue) is sorrow. That is true also of the final end, which according to that saying, μακάριοι οἱ κλαίοντες νῦν ὅτι γελᾶτε, changes laughter into weeping, and weeping into laughter. The correction אֲחֵרֵית הַשְׂמֵחָה (Hitzig) presses upon the Mishle style an article in such cases rejected, and removes a form of expression of the Hebr. syntaxis ornata, which here, as at Isa. xvii. 6, is easily obviated, but which is warranted by a multitude of other examples, vid. at xiii. 4 (also v. 22), and cf. Philippi's Status Const. p. 14 f., who regards the second word, as here אֲחֵרֵית, after the Arab., as accus. But in cases like אֲחֵרֵית

Darum weint sein Aug' wenn er herzlich lacht.”

שָׁקַר, although not in cases such as Ezra ii. 62, the accus. rendering is tenable, and the Arab. does not at all demand it.<sup>1</sup> In the old Hebr. this solutio of the st. constr. belongs to the elegances of the language; it is the precursor of the vulgar post-bibl. אֲחִירָתָהּ שְׁלֵשֶׁת־שָׁמָּה. That the Hebr. may also retain a gen. where more or fewer parts of a sentence intervene between it and its governing word, is shown by such examples as Isa. xlvi. 9, xlix. 7, lxi. 7.<sup>2</sup>

There follows a series of proverbs which treat of the wicked and the good, and of the relation between the foolish and the wise :

Ver. 14 He that is of a perverse heart is satisfied with his own ways ;
And a good man from himself.

We first determine the subject conception. טוֹב לֵב (one turning aside τῆς καρδίας or τῆν καρδίαν) is one whose heart is perverted, נָטוּב, turned away, viz. from God, Ps. xlv. 19. The Book of Proverbs contains besides of this verb only the name of dross (recedanea) derived from it; טוּב, separated, drawn away, is such a half passive as טוּר, Isa. xlix. 21, שׁוּב, Mic. ii. 8, etc. (Olsh. § 245a). Regarding טוֹב לֵב, vid. at xii. 2, cf. xiii. 22: a man is so called whose manner of thought and of action has as its impulse and motive self-sacrificing love. When it is said of the former that he is satisfied with his own ways, viz. those which with heart turned away from God he enters upon, the meaning is not that they give him peace or bring satisfaction to him (Löwenstein), but we see from i. 31, xviii. 20, that this is meant recompensatively: he gets, enjoys the reward of his wandering in estrangement from God. It is now without doubt seen that 14b expresses that wherein the benevolent man finds his reward. We will therefore not explain (after iv. 15, cf. Num. xvi. 26, 2 Sam. xix. 10) : the good man turns himself away from him, or the good man stands over him (as Jerome, Venet., after Eccles. v. 7);—this rendering gives no contrast, or at least a halting one. The  $\text{פ}$  of  $\text{מַעְלֵי}$  must be parallel with that of  $\text{מִדְּרָכָיו}$ . From the LXX., ἀπὸ δὲ τῶν διανοημάτων αὐτοῦ, the Syr. rightly: from the fruit (religiousness) of his soul; the Targ.: from his fruit. Buxtorf, against Cappellus, has already perceived that here no other phrase but the explanation of  $\text{מַעְלֵי}$  by ex eo quod penes se est lies at the foundation. We could, after vii. 14, also explain: from that which he perceives as his obligation (duty); yet that other explanation lies proportionally nearer, but yet not so that we refer the suffix to the blackslider of 14a: in it (his fate) the good man is satisfied, for this contrast also halts, the thought is not in the spirit of the Book of Proverbs (for xxix. 16b does not justify it); and in how totally different a connection of thought  $\text{מַעְלֵי}$  is used in the Book of Proverbs, is shown by xxiv. 17b; but generally the Scripture does not use  $\text{שָׁבַע}$  of such satisfaction, it has, as in 14a, also in 14b, the recompensative sense, according to the fundamental principle,  $\delta \epsilon \lambda \nu \sigma \pi \epsilon \lambda \rho \eta \alpha \nu \theta \rho \omega \pi \omicron \varsigma \tau \omicron \upsilon \tau \omicron \kappa \alpha \iota \theta \epsilon \rho \lambda \epsilon \iota$  (Gal. vi. 7). The suffix refers back to the subject, as we say:  $\text{רִחֵי עָלַי רַחֵם עָלַי}$  (Psychol. p. 152). But considerations of an opposite kind also suggest themselves. Everywhere else  $\text{מַעַל}$  refers not to that which a man has within himself, but that which he carries without; and also that  $\text{מַעְלֵי}$  can be used in the sense of  $\text{מִשְׁעָלָיו}$ , no evidence can be adduced: it must be admitted to be possible, since the writer of the Chronicles (2 Chron. i. 4) ventures to use  $\text{בְּהִכִּין מַעְלֵי}$ . Is  $\text{מַעְלֵי}$  thus used substantively: by his leaves (Aben Ezra and others)? If one compares xi. 28 with Ps. i. 3, this explanation is not absurd; but why then did not the poet rather use  $\text{מַפְרֵי}$ ? We come finally to the result, that  $\text{מַעְלֵי}$ , although it admits a connected interpretation, is an error of transcription. But the correction is not  $\text{יַמְעָלָיו}$  (Elster) nor  $\text{יַמְעַלְלָיו}$  (Cappellus), for  $\text{עָלִים}$  and  $\text{עַלְלִים}$ , deeds, are words which do not exist; nor is it  $\text{יַמְפְעָלָיו}$  (Bertheau) nor  $\text{יַמְנַעָלָיו}$  (Ewald), but  $\text{יַמְמַעָלָיו}$  (which Cappellus regarded, but erroneously, as the LXX. phrase); for (1) throughout almost the whole O. T., from Judg. ii. 19 to Zech. i. 18,  $\text{דְּרָכִים}$  and  $\text{מַעַלְלִים}$  are interchangeable words, and indeed almost an inseparable pair, cf. particularly Jer. xvii. 10; and (2) when Isaiah (iii. 10) says,  $\text{אִמְרוּ צְדִיק כִּי־טוֹב פִּרְיֵי מַעַלְלֵיהֶם יֹאכְלוּ}$ , this almost sounds like a prophetic paraphrase of the second line of the proverb, which besides by this emendation gains a more rhythmical sound and a more suitable compass.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Regarding the supplying (ibdāl) of a foregoing genitive or accus. pronoun of the third person by a definite or indefinite following, in the same case as the substantive, Samachschari speaks in the Mufassal, p. 94 ss., where, as examples, are found: raicituhu Zeidan, I have seen him, the Zeid; marartu bihi Zeidin, I have gone over with him, the Zeid; saraftu wugáhahá awwalihá, in the flight I smote the heads of the same, their front rank. Vid. regarding this anticipation of the definite idea by an indefinite, with explanations of it, Fleischer's Maḳḳari, Additions et Corrections, p. xl. col. 2, and Dieterici's Mutanabbi, p. 341, l. 13.

Ver. 15 The simple believeth every word ;
But the prudent takes heed to his step.

We do not translate, "every thing," for "word" and faith are correlates, Ps. cvi. 24, and פְּתִי is the non-self-dependent who lets himself be easily persuaded by the talk of another (vid. p. 56) : he believes every word without proving it, whether it is well-meant, whether it is true, whether it is salutary and useful, so that he is thus, without having any firm principle, and without any judgment of his own, driven about hither and thither ; the prudent, on the other hand, considers and marks his step, that he may not take a false step or go astray, he proves his way (8a), he takes no step without thought and consideration (רָבַח or רָבַחָ with ל, to consider or reflect upon anything, Ps. lxxiii. 17, cf. xxxiii. 15)—he makes sure steps with his feet (Heb. xii. 13), without permitting himself to waver and sway by every wind of doctrine (Eph. iv. 14).

Ver. 16 The wise feareth and departeth from evil ;
But the fool loseth his wits and is regardless.

Our editions have יִרְאָה with Munach, as if יִרְאָה הָכֵם were a substantive with its adjective ; but Cod. 1294 has הָכֵם with Rebia, and thus it must be : הָכֵם is the subject, and what follows is its complex predicate. Most interpreters translate 16b : the fool is over-confident (Zöckler), or the fool rushes on (Hitzig), as also Luther : but a fool rushes wildly through, i.e. in a daring, presumptuous manner. But הִתְעַבֵּר denotes everywhere nothing else than to fall into extreme anger, to become heated beyond measure, xxvi. 17 (cf. xx. 2), Deut. iii. 26, etc. Thus 16a and 16b are fully contrasted. What is said of the wise will be judged after Job i. 1, cf. Ps. xxxiv. 15, xxxvii. 27 : the wise man has fear, viz. fear of God, or rather, since הוֹאֵלֵהִים is not directly to be supplied, that careful, thoughtful, self-mistrusting reserve which flows from the reverential awe of God ; the fool, on the contrary, can neither rule nor bridle his affections, and without any just occasion falls into passionate excitement. But on the other side he is self-confident, regardless, secure ; while the wise man avoids the evil, i.e. carefully goes out of its way, and in N. T. phraseology "works out his own salvation with fear and trembling."

<sup>1</sup> As here an ל too few is written, so at Isa. xxxii. 1 (וְלִשְׂרִים) and Ps. lxxiv. 14 (לְצִיִּים) one too many.

Ver. 17. This verse, as if explanatory of מַחֲעַבֵּר, connects itself with this interpretation of the contrasts, corresponding to the general usus loquendi, and particularly to the Mishle style.

One who is quick to anger worketh folly,
And a man of intrigues is hated.

Ewald finds here no right contrast. He understands אִישׁ מְזַמָּה in a good sense, and accordingly corrects the text, substituting for אִישׁ מְזַמָּה, אִישׁ מְשַׁמָּה (אִישׁ מְשַׁמָּה), for he translates: but the man of consideration bears (properly smooths, viz. his soul). On the other hand it is also to be remarked, that אִישׁ מְזַמָּה, when it occurs, is not to be understood necessarily in a good sense, since מְזַמָּה is used just like מְזַמָּה, at one time in a good and at another in a bad sense, and that we willingly miss the "most complete sense" thus arising, since the proverb, as it stands in the Masoretic text, is good Hebrew, and needs only to be rightly understood to let nothing be missed in completeness. The contrast, as Ewald seeks here to represent it (also Hitzig, who proposes אִישׁ מְשַׁמָּה: the man of consideration remains quiet; Syr. ramys, circumspect), we have in ver. 29, where the μακρόθυμος stands over against the ὄξύθυμος (הָאִישׁ or הָאִישׁ) of the breathing of anger through the nose, cf. Theocritus, i. 18: καὶ οἱ ἀεὶ δριμεία χολὰ ποτὶ ῥινὶ κάθηται). Here the contrast is different: to the man who is quick to anger, who suddenly gives expression to his anger and displeasure, stands opposed the man of intrigues, who contrives secret vengeance against those with whom he is angry. Such a deceitful man, who contrives evil with calculating forethought and executes it in cold blood (cf. Ps. xxxvii. 7), is hated; while on the contrary the noisy lets himself rush forward to inconsiderate, mad actions, but is not hated on that account; but if in his folly he injures or disgraces himself, or is derided, or if he even does injury to the body and the life of another, and afterwards with terror sees the evil done in its true light, then he is an object of compassion. Theodotion rightly: (ἀνήρ δὲ διαβουλίων μισηθήσεται, and Jerome: vir versutus odiosus est (not the Venet. ἀνήρ βδελυγμῶν, for this signification has only הָאִישׁ, and that in the sing.); on the contrary, the LXX., Syr., Targum, and Symmachus incorrectly understand אִישׁ מְזַמָּה in bonam partem.

Ver. 18 The simple have obtained folly as an inheritance;
But the prudent put on knowledge as a crown.

As a parallel word to יִבְתִּירֵי, נְחִלֵי (after the Masora defective), also in the sense of Arab. ākthar, multiplicare, abundare (from Arab.

kathura, to be much, perhaps<sup>1</sup> properly comprehensive, encompassing), would be appropriate, but it is a word properly Arabic. On the other hand, inappropriate is the meaning of the Heb.-Aram. בָּתַר, to wait (properly waiting to surround, to go round any one, cf. manere aliquem or aliquod), according to which Aquila, ἀναμενουσιν, and Jerome, expectabunt. Also הִכְתִּיר, to encompass in the sense of to embrace (LXX. κρατήσουσιν), does not suffice, since in the relation to נָחַל one expects an idea surpassing this. Certainly there is a heightening of the idea in this, that the Hiph. in contradistinction to נָחַל would denote an object of desire spontaneously sought for. But far stronger and more pointed is the heightening of the idea when we take יִכְתֹּר as the denom. of כִּתָּר (Gr. κίταρις, κίδαρις, Babyl. כוד, codur, cf. כִּדור, a rounding, sphaera). Thus Theodotion, στεφθήσονται. The Venet. better actively, ἐστεφάντο (after Kimchi: ישימו הרעת ככתר על ראשם), the Targ., Jerome, Luther (but not the Syr., which translates נָחַל by “to inherit,” but יִכְתֹּר by μεριούνται, which the LXX. has for נָחַל). The bibl. language has also (Ps. cxlii. 8) הַכְתִּיר in the denom. signification of to place a crown, and that on oneself; the non-bibl. has כִּכְתִּיר (like the bibl. מַעֲטִייר) in the sense of distributor of crowns,<sup>2</sup> and is fond of the metaphor הרעת כתר, crown of knowledge. With those not self-dependent (vid. regarding the plur. form of פְּתִי, p. 56), who are swayed by the first influence, the issue is, without their willing it, that they become habitual fools: folly is their possession, i.e. their property. The prudent, on the contrary, as ver. 15 designates them, have thoughtfully to ponder their step to gain knowledge as a crown (cf. הַעֲשִׂיר, to gain riches, הַפְרִיחַ, 116, to gain flowers, Gesen. § 53, 2). Knowledge is to them not merely an inheritance, but a possession won, and as such remains with them a high and as it were a kingly ornament.

Ver. 19 The wicked must bow before the good,

And the godless stand at the doors of the righteous.

The good, viz. that which is truly good, which has love as its principle, always at last holds the supremacy. The good men who manifest love to men which flows from love to God, come finally forward, so that the wicked, who for a long time played the part of lords, bow themselves willingly or unwillingly before them, and often enough it comes about that godless men fall down from their prosperity and their places of honour so low, that they post themselves at the entrance of the stately dwelling of the righteous (xiii. 22), waiting for his going out and in, or seeking an occasion of presenting to him a supplication, or also as expecting gifts to be bestowed (Ps. xxxvii. 25). The poor man Lazarus πρὸς τὸν πύλωνα of the rich man, Luke xvi. 20, shows, indeed, that this is not always the case on this side of the grave. קָנַף has, according to the Masora (cf. Kimchi's Wörterbuch under קנף), the ultima accented; the accentuation of the form קָנַף wavers between the ult. and the penult. Olsh. p. 482 f., cf. Gesen. 68, Ann. 10. The substantival clause 19*b* is easily changed into a verbal clause: they come (Syr.), appear, stand (incorrectly the Targ.: they are judged in the gates of the righteous).

<sup>1</sup> According to rule the Hebr. ש becomes in Arab. ش, as in Aram. ת; but kithar might be from ktar, an old verb rarely found, which derivata with the idea of encircling (wall) and of rounding (bunch) point to.

Three proverbs on the hatred of men :

Ver. 20 The poor is hated even by his neighbour ;
But of those who love the rich there are many.

This is the old history daily repeating itself. Among all people is the saying and the complaint :

*Donec eris felix multos numerabis amicos,
Tempora si fuerint nubilia solus eris.*<sup>1</sup>

The Book of Proverbs also speaks of this lamentable phenomenon. It is a part of the dark side of human nature, and one should take notice of it, so that when it goes well with him, he may not regard his many friends as all genuine, and when he becomes poor, he may not be surprised by the dissolution of earlier friendship, but may value so much the higher exceptions to the rule. The connection of the passive with יָ of the subject (cf. xiii. 13), as in the Greek with the dative, is pure Semitic; sometimes it stands with יָ, but in the sense of ἀπό, Cant. iii. 10, before the influence of the West led to its being used in the sense of ἐπὶ (Ges. § 143, 2); שָׂנְאָה, is hated (Cod. 1294 : שָׂנְאָה), connects with the hatred which is directed against the poor also the indifference which makes him without sympathy, for one feels himself troubled by him and ashamed.

Ver. 21 Whoever despiseth his neighbour committeth sin ;
But whoever hath compassion on the suffering—blessings on him !
One should regard every human being, especially such as God has placed near to him, as a being having the same origin, as created in the image of God, and of the same lofty destination, and should consider himself as under obligation to love him. He who despiseth his neighbour (write מֵהֶגֶץ with Metheg, and vid. regarding the constr. with dat. object. vi. 30, cf. xi. 12, xiii. 13) sins in this respect, that he raises himself proudly and unwarrantably above him; that the honour and love he shows to him he measures not by the rule of duty and of necessity, but according to that which is pleasing to himself; and in that he refuses to him that which according to the ordinance of God he owes him. In ver. 21b the Chetháb עֲנִיִּים and the Kerí עֲנָוִים (vid. at Ps. ix. 13) interchange in an inexplicable way; עֲנָוִים is the bowed down (cf. Arab. ma'nuww, particularly of the prisoner, from 'ana, fut. ya'nuw, to bow, bend), עֲנִי (Arab. 'anin, with the art. ál'niy, from the intrans. 'aniya, to be bowed down) the patient bearer who in the school of suffering has learned humility and meekness. One does not see why the Kerí here exchanges that passive idea for this ethical one, especially since, in proving himself to be מְחַוֵּן (compassionate) (for which elsewhere the part. Kal חוֹנֵן, xiv. 31, xix. 17, xxviii. 8), one must be determined only by the needy condition of his neighbour, and not by his (the neighbour's) moral worthiness, the want of which ought to make him twofold more an object of our compassion. All the old translators, from the LXX. to the Venet. and Luther, on this account adopt the Chetháb.

Ver. 22. The proverb terminating (ver. 21) with אֲשֶׁרֵי (cf. xvi. 20) is now followed by one not less singularly formed, commencing with הֵלֵא (cf. viii. 1).

Will they not go astray who devise evil,
And are not mercy and truth to those who devise good?

The part. Hithp. חֹרֵשׁ signifies both the plougher and the artisan; but on this account to read with Hitzig both times חֹרֵשׁ, i.e. machinatores, is nothing less than advisable, since there is connected with this metaphorical חֹרֵשׁ, as we have shown at iii. 29, not only the idea of fabricating, but also that of ploughing. Just so little is there any reason for changing with Hitzig, against all old translators, יִתֵּעַ into יִרַע: will it not go ill with them . . .; the fut. יִתַּע (cf. Isa. lxiii. 17) is not to be touched; the perf. חָע (e.g. Ps. lviii. 4) would denote that those who contrive evil are in the way of error, the fut. on the contrary that they will fall into error (cf. xii. 26 with Job xii. 24). But if הֵלֵא יִתַּע is the expression of the result which shall certainly come to such, then 22*b* stands as a contrast adapted thereto: and are not, on the contrary, mercy and truth those who contrive that which is good, i.e. (for that which befalls them, as xiii. 18*a*, cf. xiv. 35*b*, is made their attribute) are they not an object of mercy and truth, viz. on the part of God and of men, for the effort which proceeds from love and is directed to the showing forth of good is rewarded by this, that God and men are merciful to such and maintain truth to them, stand in truth to them; for הָסֵר וְאִמְתָּ is to be understood here, as at iii. 3, neither of God nor of men exclusively, but of both together: the wicked who contrive evil lose themselves on the way to destruction, but grace and truth are the lot of those who aim at what is good, guarded and guided by which, they reach by a blessed way a glorious end.

There now follows a considerable series of proverbs (vers. 23–31) which, with a single exception (ver. 24), have all this in common, that one or two key-words in them begin with ט.

Ver. 23 In all labour there is gain,
But idle talk leadeth only to loss.

Here the key-words are טוֹתֵר and טְחִסּוֹר (parallel xxi. 5, cf. with xi. 24), which begin with ט. עֲצָב is labour, and that earnest and unwearied, as at x. 22. If one toils on honestly, then there always results from it something which stands forth above the endeavour as its result and product, vid. at Job xxx. 11, where it is shown how יָתֵר, from the primary meaning to be stretched out long, acquires the meaning of that which hangs over, shoots over, copiousness, and gain. By the word of the lips, on the contrary, i.e. purposeless and inoperative talk (דְּבַר עִפְתִּים) as Isa. xxxvi. 5, cf. Job xi. 2), nothing is gained, but on the contrary there is only loss, for by it one only robs both himself and others of time, and wastes strength, which might have been turned to better purpose, to say nothing of the injury that is thereby done to his soul; perhaps also he morally injures, or at least discomposes and wearies others.

Ver. 24 It is a crown to the wise when they are rich;
But the folly of fools remains folly.

From xii. 4, 31, xvii. 6, we see that עֲטֶרֶת הַחֲכָמִים is the predicate. Thus it is the riches of the wise of which it is said that they are a crown or an ornament to them. More than this is said, if with Hitzig we read, after the LXX., עֲרִיטָם, their prudence, instead of עֲטֶרֶת. For then the meaning would be, that the wise need no other crown than that which they have in their prudence. But yet far more appropriately "riches" are called the crown of a wise man when they come to his wisdom; for it is truly thus that riches, when they are possessed along with wisdom, contribute not a little to heighten its influence and power, and not merely because they adorn in their appearance like a crown, or, as we say, surround as with a golden frame, but because they afford a variety of means and occasions for self-manifestation which are denied to the poor. By this interpretation of 24a, 24b comes out also into the light, without our requiring to correct the first אֱלֵלָה, or to render it in an unusual sense. The LXX. and Syr. translate the first אֱלֵלָה by διατριβή (by a circumlocution), the Targ. by gloria, fame—we know not how they reach this. Schultens in his Com. renders: crassa opulentia elumbium crassities, but in his Animadversiones he combines the first אֱלֵלָה with the Arab. awwale, precedence, which Gesen. approves of. But although the meaning to be thick (properly coalescere) appertains to the verbal stem אָל as well as the meaning to be before (Arab. āl, āwila, wāl), yet the Hebr. אֱלֵלָה always and everywhere means only folly,<sup>1</sup> from the fundamental idea crassities (thickness). Hitzig's אֱלֵלָה (which denotes the consequence with which the fool invests himself) we do not accept, because this word is Hitzig's own invention. Rather לֵיִת is to be expected: the crown with which fools adorn themselves is folly. But the sentence: the folly of fools is (and remains) folly (Symmachus, Jerome, Venet., Luther), needs the emendation as little as xvi. 22b, for, interpreted in connection with 24a, it denotes that while wisdom is adorned and raised up by riches, folly on the other hand remains, even when connected with riches, always the same, without being either thereby veiled or removed,—on the contrary, the fool, when he is rich, exhibits his follies always more and more. C. B. Michaelis compares Lucian's simia est simia etiamsi aurea gestet insignia.

Vcr. 25 A witness of truth delivereth souls;

But he who breathes out lies is nothing but deception.

When men, in consequence of false suspicions or of false accusations, fall into danger of their lives (דִּינֵי נַפְשׁוֹת) is the designation in the later language of the law of a criminal process), then a tongue which, pressed by conscientiousness and not deterred by cowardice, will utter the truth, saves them. But a false tongue, which as such (vid. 5*b*) is a יִפְחֵ כֹזְבִים (after the Masora at this place יִפְחֵ defective), i.e. is one who breathes out lies (vid. regarding יִפְחֵ at vi. 19), is mere deception (LXX., without reading כְּרָמָה [as Hitzig does]: δόλιος). In xii. 17 כְּרָמָה is to be interpreted as the object. accus. of יָנִיד carried forward, but here to carry forward כְּרָמָה (Arama, Löwenstein) is impracticable—for to deliver deceit = the deceiver is not expressed in the Hebr.—מַרְמָה is, as possibly also xii. 16 (LXX. δόλιος), without אֵשׁ or יָר being supplied, the pred. of the substantival clause: such an one is deception (in bad Latin, dolositas), for he who utters forth lies against better knowledge must have a malevolent, deceitful purpose.

Ver. 26 In the fear of Jahve lies a strong ground of confidence,
And the children of such an one have a refuge.

The so-called essentia stands here, as at Ps. lxxviii. 5, lv. 19, Isa. xxvi. 4, before the subject idea; the clause: in the fear of God exists, i.e. it is and proves itself, as a strong ground of confidence, does not mean that the fear of God is something in which one can rely (Hitzig), but that it has (xxii. 19, Jer. xvii. 7, and here) an inheritance which is enduring, unwavering, and not disappointing in God, who is the object of fear; for it is not faith, nor anything else subjective, which is the rock that bears us, but this Rock is the object which faith lays hold of (cf. Isa. xxviii. 16). Is now the לִבְנֵי to be referred, with Ewald and Zöckler, to ה' ? It is possible, as we have discussed at Gen. vi. 1 f.; but in view of parallels such as xx. 7, it is not probable. He who fears God entails in the Abrahamic way (Gen. xviii. 19) the fear of God on his children, and in this precious paternal inheritance they have a מְחֻסָּה (not מְחַסָּה, and therefore to be written with Masoretic exactness מְחֻסָּה), a fortress or place of protection, a refuge in every time of need (cf. Ps. lxxi. 5–7). Accordingly, לִבְנֵי refers back to the ה' יָרָא, to be understood from ה' בִּירֵאתָ (LXX., Luther, and all the Jewish interpreters), which we find not so doubtful as to regard on this account the explanation after Ps. lxxiii. 15, cf. Deut. xiv. 1, as necessary, although we grant that such an introduction of the N. T. generalization and deepening of the idea of sonship is to be expected from the Chokma.

Ver. 27 The fear of Jahve is a fountain of life,
To escape the snares of death.

There springs up a life which makes him who carries in himself (cf. John iv. 14, ἐν αὐτῷ) this welling life, penetrating and strong of will to escape the snares (write after the Masora כַּפְּקִישׁ defective) which death lays, and which bring to an end in death—a repetition of xiii. 4 with changed subject.

Ver. 28 In the multitude of the people lies the king's honour ;
And when the population diminishes, it is the downfall of his glory.

The honour or the ornament (vid. regarding הָרָר, tumere, ampliari, the root-word of הָרָר and הִרְרָה at Isa. lxiii. 1) of a king consists in this, that he rules over a great people, and that they increase and prosper; on the other hand, it is the ruin of princely greatness when the people decline in number and in wealth. Regarding כַּהֲרָה, vid. at x. 14. כַּהֲרָה signifies prepositionally “with-out” (properly, by non-existence), e.g. xxvi. 20, or adverbially “groundless” (properly, for nothing), Isa. lii. 4; here it is to be understood after its contrast בְּרִבָּה: in the non-existence, but which is here equivalent to in the ruin (cf. כַּהֲרָה, the form of which in conjunction is כַּהֲרָה, Gen. xlvii. 15), lies the misfortune, decay, ruin of the principedom. The LXX. ἐν δὲ ἐκλείψει λαοῦ συντριβὴ δυνάστου. Certainly רָזַן (from רָז, Arab. razuna, to be powerful) is to be interpreted personally, whether it be after the form בְּנוֹד with a fixed, or after the form יִקְוֶה with a changeable Kametz; but it may also be an abstract like שְׁלוֹם (= Arab. selâm), and this we prefer, because in the personal signification רָזַן, viii. 15, xxxi. 4, is used. We have not here to think of רָזַן (from רָזַה), consumption (the Venet. against Kimchi, πεντας); the choice of the word also is not determined by an intended amphibology (Hitzig), for this would be meaningless.

Ver. 29 He that is slow to anger is rich in understanding ;
But he that is easily excited carries off folly.

אִישׁ אֲרָא (constr. of אֲרָא) is he who puts off anger long, viz. the outbreak of anger, הִתְאַרְרָה, xix. 11, i.e. lets it not come in, but shuts it out long (μακρόθυμος = βραδὺς εἰς ὀργήν, Jas. i. 19); and קָצַר רִיר, he who in his spirit and temper, viz. as regards anger (for רִיר denotes also the breathing out and snorting, Isa. xxv. 4, xxxiii. 11), is short, i.e. (since shortness of time is meant) is rash and suddenly (cf. quick to anger, præceps in iram, 17a) breaks out with it, not δολοφύνητος (but here ὀξύθυμος), as the LXX. translate 17a. The former, who knows how to control his affections, shows himself herein as "great in understanding" (cf. 2 Sam. xxiii. 20), or as a "man of great understanding" (Lat. multus prudentiâ); the contrary is he who suffers himself to be impelled by his affections into hasty, inconsiderate action, which is here expressed more actively by מְרִים אֵלָהּ. Does this mean that he bears folly to the view (Luther, Umbreit, Bertheau, Elster, and others)? But for that idea the Mishle style has other expressions, xii. 23, xiii. 16, xv. 2, cf. xiv. 17. Or does it mean that he makes folly high, i.e. shows himself highly foolish (LXX., Syr., Targum, Fleischer, and others)? But that would be expressed rather by הִנְדִּיל or הִרְבֵּה. Or is it he heightens folly (Löwenstein, Hitzig)? But the remark that the angry ebullition is itself a gradual heightening of the foolish nature of such an one is not suitable, for the choleric man, who lets the evenness of his disposition be interrupted by a breaking forth of anger, is by no means also in himself a fool. Rashi is right when he says, מַפְרִיֶשֶׁה לְחֵלְקוֹ, i.e. (to which also Fleischer gives the preference) aufert pro portione sua stultitiam. The only appropriate parallel according to which it is to be explained, is iii. 35. But not as Ewald: he lifts up folly, which lies as it were before his feet on his life's path; but: he takes off folly, in the sense of Lev. vi. 8, i.e. he carries off folly, receives a portion of folly; for as to others, so also to himself, when he returns to calm blood, that which he did in his rage must appear as folly and madness.

Vcr. 30 A quiet heart is the life of the body,
But covetousness is rottenness in the bones.

Heart, soul, flesh, is the O. T. trichotomy, Ps. lxxxiv. 3, xvi. 9; the heart is the innermost region of the life, where all the rays of the bodily and the soul-life concentrate, and whence they again unfold themselves. The state of the heart, i.e. of the central, spiritual, soul-inwardness of the man, exerts therefore on all sides a constraining influence on the bodily life, in the relation to the heart the surrounding life. Regarding לֵב מְרִיבָה, vid. at xii. 18, p. 262. Thus is styled the quiet heart, which in its symmetrical harmony is like a calm and clear water-mirror, neither interrupted by the affections, nor broken through or secretly stirred by passion. By the close connection in which the corporeal life of man stands to the moral-religious determination of his intellectual and mediately his soul-life—this threefold life is as that of one personality, essentially one—the body has in such quiet of spirit the best means of preserving the life which furthers the well-being, and co-operates to the calming of all its disquietude; on the contrary, passion, whether it rage or move itself in stillness, is like the disease in the bones (xii. 4), which works onward till it breaks asunder the framework of the body, and with it the life of the body. The plur. בְּשָׂרִים occurs only here; Böttcher, § 695, says that it denotes the whole body; but בְּשָׂר also does not denote the half, בְּשָׂרִים is the surrogate of an abstr.: the body, i.e. the bodily life in the totality of its functions, and in the entire manifoldness of its relations. Ewald translates bodies, but בָּשָׂר signifies not the body, but its material, the animated matter; rather cf. the Arab. ābshār, “corporeal, human nature,” but which (leaving out of view that this plur. belongs to a later period of the language) has the parallelism against it. Regarding קִנְיָאָה (jealousy, zeal, envy, anger) Schul- tens is right: affectus inflammans æstuque indignationis fervidus. from קָנָה, Arab. kandā, to be high red.

Ver. 31 He who oppresseth the poor reproacheth his Maker;
And whosoever is merciful to the poor, it is an honour to him.

Line first is repeated in xvii. 5a somewhat varied, and the relation of the idea in 31b is as xix. 17a, according to which וּמִכְבָּדוֹ is the predicate and הוֹיָנוּ אֲבֵינוּ the subject (Symmachus, Targ., Jerome, Venet., Luther), not the reverse (Syr.); הוֹיָנוּ is thus not the 3 per. Po. (LXX.), but the part. Kal (for which 21b has the part. Po. מְחִינֵנוּ). The predicates חָרַף עֵשָׂיו (vid. regarding the perf. Gesen. § 126, 3) and וּמִכְבָּרוֹ follow one another after the scheme of the Chiasmus. עֵשָׂיו has Munach on the first syllable, on which the tone is thrown back, and on the second the עמרה sign (vid. Torah Emeth, p. 21), as e.g. פּוֹטֵר, xvii. 14, and אֶהָב, xvii. 19. The showing of forbearance and kindness to the poor arising from a common relation to one Creator, and from respect towards a personality bearing the image of God, is a conception quite in the spirit of the Chokma, which, as in the Jalve religion it becomes the universal religion, so in the national law it becomes the human (vid. p. 41). Thus also Job xxxi. 15, cf. iii. 9 of the Epistle of James, which in many respects has its roots in the Book of Proverbs. Matt. xxv. 40 is a New Testament side-piece to 31b.

Ver. 32. This verse also contains a key-word beginning with מ, but pairs acrostically with the proverb following:

When misfortune befalls him, the godless is overthrown;
But the righteous remains hopeful in his death.

When the subject is רָעָה connected with אֵשֶׁר (the godless), then it may be understood of evil thought and action (Eccles. vii. 15) as well as of the experience of evil (e.g. xiii. 21). The LXX. (and also the Syr., Targ., Jerome, and Venet.) prefers the former, but for the sake of producing an exact parallelism changes בְּמוֹתָו [in his death] into בְּחַיָּתָו [in his uprightness], reversing also the relation of the subject and the predicate: ὁ δὲ πεπορθὸς τῇ ἑαυτοῦ ὀσιότητι (the Syr.: in this, that he has no sin; Targ.: when he dies) δίκαιος. But no Scripture word commends in so contradictory a manner self-righteousness, for the verb חָסָה never denotes self-confidence, and with the exception of two passages (Judg. ix. 15, Isa. xxx. 2), where it is connected with בְּצִלָּהּ, is everywhere the exclusive (vid. Ps. cxviii. 8 f.) designation of confidence resting itself in God, even without the 'ה, as here and at Ps. xvii. 7. The parallelism leads us to translate ברַעוּתוֹ, not on account of his wickedness, but with Luther, in conformity with בְּמִשְׁחָתוֹ, in his misfortune, i.e. if it befall him. Thus Jeremiah (xxiii. 12) says of the sins of his people: בְּאֶפְלָה יִדְחוּ, in the deep darkness they are driven on (Niph. of דָּחָה = רָחַח), and xxiv. 16 contains an exactly parallel thought: the godless stumble ברַעוּתוֹ, into calamity. Ewald incorrectly: in his calamity the wicked is overthrown—for what purpose then the pronoun? The verb דָּחָה frequently means, without any addition, “to stumble over heaps,” e.g. Ps. xxxv. 5, xxxvi. 13. The godless in his calamity is overthrown, or he fears in the evils which befall him the intimations of the final ruin; on the contrary, the righteous in his death, even in the midst of extremity, is comforted, viz. in God in whom he confides. Thus understood, Hitzig thinks that the proverb is not suitable for a time in which, as yet, men had not faith in immortality and in the resurrection. Yet though there was no such revelation then, still the pious in death put their confidence in Jahve, the God of life and of salvation—for in Jahve<sup>1</sup> there was for ancient Israel the beginning, middle, and end of the work of salvation—and believing that they were going home to Him, committing their spirit into His hands (Ps. xxxi. 6), they fell asleep, though without any explicit knowledge, yet not without the hope of eternal life. Job also knew that (xxvii. 8 ff.) between the death of those estranged from God and of those who feared God there was not only an external, but a deep essential distinction; and now the Chokma opens up a glimpse into the eternity heavenwards, xv. 24, and has formed, xii. 28, the expressive and distinctive word אֶל־מֵתָה, for immortality, which breaks like a ray from the morning sun through the night of the Sheol.

Ver. 33 Wisdom rests in the heart of the man of understanding ;
But in the heart of fools it maketh itself known.

Most interpreters know not what to make of the second line here. The LXX. (and after it the Syr.), and as it appears, also Aquila and Theodotion, insert ού ; the Targ. improves the Peshito, for it inserts אֵילָת (so that xii. 23, xiii. 16, and xv. 2 are related). And Abulwalid explains : in the heart of fools it is lost ; Euchel : it reels about ; but these are imaginary interpretations resting on a misunderstanding of the passages, in which יָדַע means to come to feel, and הוֹדִיעַ to give to feel (to punish, correct). Kimchi rightly adheres to the one ascertained meaning of the words, according to which the Venet. μέσον δὲ ἀφρόνων γνωσθήσεται. So also the translation of Jerome : et indoctos quosque (quoque) erudiet, is formed, for he understands the "and is manifest among fools" (Luther) not merely, as C. B. Michaelis, after the saying : opposita juxta se posita magis elucescunt, but of a becoming manifest, which is salutary to these. Certainly בְּקִרְבֵּן can mean among = in the circle of, xv. 31 ; but if, as here and e.g. Jer. xxxi. 31, בְּקִרְבֵּן is interchanged with בְּלֵב, and if חֲכָמָה בְּקִרְבֵּן is the subject spoken of, as 1 Kings iii. 28, then בְּקִרְבֵּן does not mean among (in the midst of), but in the heart of the fool. According to this, the Talmud rightly, by comparison with the current proverb (Mezîa 85b) : אַחֲתִירָא בְּלִינָא קִישׁ קִישׁ קִירָא, a stater in a flaggon cries Kish, Kish, i.e. makes much clatter. In the heart of the understanding wisdom rests, i.e. remains silent and still, for the understanding feels himself personally happy in its possession, endeavours always the more to deepen it, and lets it operate within ; on the contrary, wisdom in the heart of the fools makes itself manifest : they are not able to keep to themselves the wisdom which they imagine they possess, or the portion of wisdom which is in reality theirs ; but they think, as it is said in Persius : Scire tuum nihil est nisi scire hoc te sciat alter. They discredit and waste their little portion of wisdom (instead of thinking on its increase) by obtrusive ostentatious babbling.

Two proverbs follow regarding the state and its ruler :

Ver. 34 Righteousness exalteth a nation,
And sin is a disgrace to the people.

The Hebr. language is richer in synonyms of "the people" than the German. גוי (formed like the non-bibl. מים, water, and גוי, corporeality, from גוה, to extend itself from within outward; cf. ix. 3, גוי, x. 13, גוי) is, according to the usus loq., like natio the people, as a mass swollen up from a common origin, and עמ, 28a (from עמם, to bind), the people as a confederation held together by a common law; אומם (from אמם, to unite, bind together) is the mass (multitude) of the people, and is interchanged sometimes with גוי, Gen. xxv. 23, and sometimes with עמ, ver. 28. In this proverb, אומם stands indeed intentionally in the plur., but not גוי, with the plur. of which אומם, the idea of the non-Israelitish nations, too easily connects itself. The proverb means all nations without distinction, even Israel (cf. under Isa. i. 4) not excluded. History everywhere confirms the principle, that not the numerical, nor the warlike, nor the political, nor yet the intellectual and the so-called civilized greatness, is the true greatness of a nation, and determines the condition of its future as one of progress; but this is its true greatness, that in its private, public, and international life, צדקה, i.e. conduct directed by the will of God, according to the norm of moral rectitude, rules and prevails. Righteousness, good manners, and piety are the things which secure to a nation a place of honour, while, on the contrary, חטא, sin, viz. prevailing, and more favoured and fostered than contended against in the consciousness of the moral problem of the state, is a disgrace to the people, i.e. it lowers them before God, and also before men who do not judge superficially or perversely, and also actually brings them down. רם, to raise up, is to be understood after Isa. i. 2, cf. xxiii. 4, and is to be punctuated חרם, with Munach of the penult., and the העמדה-sign with the Tsere of the last syllable. Ben-Naphtali punctuates thus: חרם. In 34b all the artifices of interpretation (from Nachmani to Schultens) are to be rejected, which interpret חסד as the Venet. (ἔλεος δὲ λαῶν ἀμαρτία) in its predominant Hebrew signification. It has here, as at Lev. xx. 17 (but not Job vi. 14), the signification of the Syr. chesdho, opprobrium; the Targ. חסדא, or more frequently חסדא, as among Jewish interpreters, is recognised by Chanan'el and Rashbam. That this חסד is not foreign to the Mishle style, is seen from the fact that חסד, xxv. 10, is used in the sense of the Syr. chasam, invidere, obtrectare, shows that these verbal stems are formed from the R. חס, stringere, to strike. Already it is in some measure perceived how  $\text{חָסַר}$ , Syr. chasadh, Arab. hasada, may acquire the meaning of violent love, and by the mediation of the jealousy which is connected with violent love, the signification of grudging, and thus of reproach and of envy; yet this is more manifest if one thinks of the root-signification stringere, in the meaning of loving, as referred to the subject, in the meanings of disgrace and envy, as from the subject directed to others. Ewald (§ 51c) compares  $\text{חָסַל}$  and  $\text{חָסַר}$ , Ethiop. chasra, in the sense of carpere, and on the other side  $\text{חָסַח}$  in the sense of "to join;" but  $\text{חָסַח}$  does not mean to join (vid. Ps. ii. 12), and instead of carpere, the idea more closely connected with the root is that of stringere, cf. stringere folia ex arboribus (Cæsar), and stringere (to diminish, to squander, strip) rem ingluvie (Horace, Sat. i. 2. 8). The LXX. has here read  $\text{חָסַר}$  (xxviii. 22), diminution, decay, instead of  $\text{חָסַר}$  (shame); the quid pro quo is not bad, the Syr. accepts it, and the miseros facit of Jerome, and Luther's verderben (destruction) corresponds with this phrase better than with the common traditional reading which Symmachus rightly renders by δνειδος.

Ver. 35 The king's favour is towards a prudent servant,
And his wrath visits the base.

Regarding the contrasts  $\text{מִשְׁכִּיל}$  and  $\text{מַבְיִשׁ}$ , vid. at x. 5; cf. xii. 4. The substantival clause 35a may mean: the king's favour has (possesses) . . ., as well as: it is imparted to, an intelligent servant; the arrangement of the words is more favourable to the latter rendering. In 35b the gender of the verb is determined by attraction after the pred., as is the case also at Gen. xxxi. 8, Job xv. 31, Ewald, § 317c. And "his wrath" is equivalent to is the object of it, cf. 22b, xiii. 18, and in general, p. 282. The syntactical character of the clause does not permit the supplying of  $\text{ל}$  from 35a. Luther's translation proceeds only apparently from this erroneous supposition.

Chap. xv. 1-6. We take these verses together as forming a group which begins with a proverb regarding the good and evil which flows from the tongue, and closes with a proverb regarding the treasure in which blessing is found, and that in which no blessing is found.

Ver. 1 A soft answer turneth away wrath,
And a bitter word stirreth up anger.

In the second line, the common word for anger ( $\text{אָרַף}$ , from the breathing with the nostrils, xiv. 17) is purposely placed, but in the first, that which denotes anger in the highest degree (הַמָּה from הָמָה, cogn. הַמָּה, Arab. hamiya, to glow, like שֶׁנָּה from שָׁנָה): a mild, gentle word turns away the heat of anger (excandescantiam), puts it back, cf. xxv. 15. The Dagesh in הַי follows the rule of the דחיק, i.e. of the close connection of a word terminating with the accented הַ, הַ, הַ with the following word (Michlol 63*b*). The same is the meaning of the Latin proverb:

*Franquitur ira gravis
Quando est responsio suavis.*

The וְכִבֵּר מְעַצֵּב produces the contrary effect. This expression does not mean an angry word (Ewald), for מְעַצֵּב is not to be compared with the Arab. ghadab, anger (Umbreit), but with Arab. 'adb, cutting, wounding, paining (Hitzig), so that וְכִבֵּר מְעַצֵּב is meant in the sense of Ps. lxxviii. 40: a word which causes pain (LXX. λυπηρός, Theod. πονικός), not after the meaning, a word provoking to anger (Gesenius), but certainly after its effect, for a wounding word "makes anger arise." As one says of anger עָשָׂה, "it turns itself" (e.g. Isa. ix. 11), so, on the other hand, עָלָה, "it rises up," Eccles. x. 4. The LXX. has a third line, ὀργὴ ἀπόλλυσι καὶ φρονίμους, which the Syr. forms into a distich by the repetition of xiv. 32*b*, the untenableness of which is at once seen.

Ver. 2. The πραῦτης σοφίας (Jas. iii. 13) commended in ver. 1 is here continued:

The tongue of the wise showeth great knowledge,
And the mouth of fools poureth forth folly.

As הִיטִיב נֶגַן, Isa. xxiii. 16, means to strike the harp well, and הִיטִיב לִכְתָּב, xxx. 29, to go along merrily, so הִיטִיב דַּעַת, to know in a masterly manner, and here, where the subject is the tongue, which has only an instrumental reference to knowledge: to bring to light great knowledge (cf. 7*a*). In 2*b* the LXX. translate στόμα δὲ ἀφρόνων ἀναγγέλλει κακά. From this Hitzig concludes that they read דַּעַת as 28*b*, and prefers this phrase; but they also translated in xiii. 16, xiv. 28, xxvi. 11, אִמְלָתָא by κακίαν, for they interpreted the unintelligible word by combination with עֲלִיתָא, and in xii. 23 by ἀραῖς, for they thought they had before them אִלֵּוּ (from אִלָּה).

Ver. 3 The eyes of Jahve are in every place,
Observing the evil and the good.

The connection of the dual עֵינַיִם with the plur. of the adjective, which does not admit of a dual, is like vi. 17, cf. 18. But the first line is a sentence by itself, to which the second line gives a closer determination, as showing how the eyes of God are everywhere (cf. 2 Chron. xvi. 9, after Zech. iv. 10) abroad over the whole earth, viz. beholding with penetrating look the evil and the good (הַיָּדָיִם, to hold to, to observe, cf. ἐπιβλέποντες, Sir. xxiii. 19), i.e. examining men whether they are good or evil, and keeping them closely before His eyes, so that nothing escapes him. This universal inspection, this omniscience of God, has an alarming but also a comforting side. The proverb seeks first to warn, therefore it speaks first of the evil.

Ver. 4 Gentleness of the tongue is a tree of life;

But falseness in it is a wounding to the spirit.

Regarding מַרְפָּס, vid. at xii. 18, and regarding מַלְּוָה, at xi. 3; this latter word we derive with Fleischer from מַלְּוָה, to subvert, overthrow, but not in the sense of "violence, asperitas, in as far as violent speech is like a stormy sea," but of perversity, perversitas (Venet. λοξότης), as the contrast to truthfulness, rectitude, kindness. Gentleness characterizes the tongue when all that it says to a neighbour, whether it be instruction or correction, or warning or consolation, it says in a manner without rudeness, violence, or obtrusiveness, by which it finds the easiest and surest acceptance, because he feels the goodwill, the hearty sympathy, the humility of him who is conscious of his own imperfection. Such gentleness is a tree of life, whose fruits preserve life, heal the sick, and raise up the bowed down. Accordingly, שֶׁבֶר בְּרוּחַ is to be understood of the effect which goes forth from perversity or falseness of the tongue upon others. Fleischer translates: asperitas autem in ea animum vulnerat, and remarks, "שֶׁבֶר בְּרוּחַ, abstr. pro concreto. The verb שֶׁבַר, and the n. verbale שֶׁבֶר derived from it, may, in order to render the meaning tropical, govern the prep. בְּ, as the Arab. kaser baklby, he has broken my heart (opp. Arab. jabar baklaby), cf. בפסניו, xxi. 29, vid. De Glossis Habichtianis, p. 18; yet it also occurs with the accus., Ps. lxix. 21, and the corresponding gen. שֶׁבֶר רֵיחַ, Isa. lxv. 14." In any case, the breaking (deep wounding) is not meant in regard to his own spirit, but to that of the neighbour. Rightly Luther: but a lying (tongue) makes heart-sorrow (elsewhere, a false one troubles the cheerful); Euchel: a false tongue is soul-wounding; and the translation of the year 1844: falsehood is a breach into the heart. Only for curiosity's sake are two other interpretations of 4a and 4b mentioned: the means of safety to the tongue is the tree of life, i.e. the Tōra (Erachin 15b); and: per-versity suffers destruction by a breath of wind, after the proverb, וְרוּחַ שִׁישׁ בּוֹ נִסּוֹת רַחַם רַחַם קִמְעָא שׁוֹבְרָא, a breath of wind breaks a man who is puffed up<sup>1</sup> (which Meîri presents for choice, vid. also Rashi, who understands רַחַם of the storm of judgment). The LXX. translates, in 4*b*, a different text: ὁ δὲ συντηρῶν αὐτὴν πλησθήσεται πνεύματος; but the יִשְׂבַּע הָיָה here supposed cannot mean “to be full of spirit,” but rather “to eat full of wind.” Otherwise the Syr. and Targ.: and he who eateth of his own fruit is satisfied (Heb. וְאִכַּל כִּפְרָיו יִשְׂבַּע),—an attempt to give to the phrase יִשְׂבַּע a thought correct in point of language, but one against which we do not give up the Masoretic text.

Ver. 5 A fool despiseth his father's correction;
But he that regardeth reproof is prudent.

We may with equal correctness translate: he acts prudently (after 1 Sam. xxiii. 22); and, he is prudent (after xix. 25). We prefer, with Jerome, Venet., and Luther, the latter, against the LXX., Syr., and Targ., because, without a doubt, the יָרַם is so thought of at xix. 25: the contrast is more favourable to the former. It is true that he who regardeth reproof is not only prudent, but also that he is prudent by means of observing it. With line first cf. i. 7 and i. 30, and with line second, xii. 1. Luther translates: the fool calumniates . . .; but of the meanings of abuse (properly pungere) and scorn, the second is perhaps here to be preferred.

Ver. 6 The house of the righteous is a great treasure-chamber;
But through the gain of the wicked comes trouble.

The contrast shows that הֵיכָל does not here mean force or might (LXX., Syr., Targ., Jerome, and Venet.), which generally this derivative of the verb הָקַם never means, but store, fulness of possession, prosperity (Luther: in the house of the righteous are goods enough), in this sense (cf. xxvii. 24) placing itself, not with the Arab. hasuna, to be firm, fastened (Aram. ܡܫܚܢܐ), but with Arab. khazan, to deposit, to lay up in granaries, whence our “Magazin.” הֵיכָל may indeed, like הֵיכָל, have the meaning of riches, and הֵיכָל does actually mean, in the Jewish-Aram., to possess, and the Aphel אֶחְזַק, to take into possession (κρατείνω); but the constant use of the noun הֵיכָל in the sense of store, with the kindred idea of laying up, e.g. Jer. xx. 5, and of the Niph. נִחְזַק, which means, Isa. xxiii. 18, with נִחְזַק, “to be magazined,” gives countenance to the idea that  $\text{בֵּית}$  goes back to the primary conception, recondere, and is to be distinguished from  $\text{בֵּיתִי}$ ,  $\text{בֵּיתָם}$ , and other derivatives after the fundamental conception. We may not interpret  $\text{בֵּית}$ , with Fleischer, Bertheau, and Zöckler, as accus.: in the house (cf.  $\text{בֵּית}$ , viii. 2), nor prepositionally as chez = casa; but: "the house of the righteous is a great store," equivalent to, the place of such. On the contrary, destruction comes by the gain of the wicked. It is impossible that  $\text{נִעְבְּרָה}$  can have the house as the subject (Löwenstein), for  $\text{בֵּית}$  is everywhere mas. Therefore Abulwald, followed by Kimchi and the Venet. (δλεθρος), interprets  $\text{נִעְבְּרָה}$  as subst., after the form of the Mishnic  $\text{נִבְרַחַת}$ , a pool, cf.  $\text{נִחְרָצָה}$ , peremptorily decided, decreed; and if we do not extinguish the  $\text{ב}$  of  $\text{יִבְתְּבוֹאֵת}$  (the LXX. according to the second translation of this doubly-translated distich, Syr., and Targ.), there remains then nothing further than to regard  $\text{נִעְבְּרָה}$  either as subst. neut. overturned = overthrow (cf. such part. nouns as  $\text{בּוֹסְרָה}$ ,  $\text{בּוֹעֲרָה}$ , but particularly  $\text{נִסְבָּה}$ , 2 Chron. x. 15), or as impers. neut. pass.: it is overthrown = there is an overthrow, like  $\text{נִשְׁעָרָה}$ , Ps. l. 3: it is stormed = a storm rages. The gain of the wicked has overthrow as its consequence, for the greed of gain, which does not shrink from unrighteous, deceitful gain, destroys his house,  $\text{עֵבֶר בֵּיתוֹ}$ , ver. 27 (vid. regarding  $\text{עֵבֶר}$ , xi. 29). Far from enriching the house, such gain is the cause of nothing but ruin. The LXX., in its first version of this distich, reads, in  $\text{בְּרִבּוֹת צֶדֶק}$  (ἐν πλεοναζούσῃ δικαιοσύνῃ), and in  $\text{בְּדֵבֶר נִעְבְּרָה}$  (יִבְתְּבוֹאֵת רִשְׁעֵהּ) (and together with the fruit the godless is rooted out, ὁλόρριζοὶ ἐκ γῆς ἀπολούνται); for, as Lagarde has observed, it confounds  $\text{עֵבֶר}$  with  $\text{עָקַר}$  (to root, privativ: to root up).

Vers. 7–17. A second series which begins with a proverb of the power of human speech, and closes with proverbs of the advantages and disadvantages of wealth.

Ver. 7 The lips of the wise spread knowledge;

But the direction is wanting to the heart of fools.

It is impossible that  $\text{לֵאמֹנִים}$  can be a second object. accus. dependent on  $\text{יִזְרִי$  (dispersunt, not  $\text{יִצְרִי}$ , xx. 28; φυλάσσουνσι, as Symmachus translates): but the heart of fools is unrighteous (error or falsehood) (Hitzig after Isa. xvi. 6); for then why were the lips of the wise and the heart of the fools mentioned?  $\text{לֵאמֹנִים}$  also does not mean οὐχ οὕτως (an old Greek anonymous translation, Jerome, Targ., Venet., Luther): the heart of the fool is quite different from the heart of the wise man, which spreads abroad knowledge (Zückler), for it is not heart and heart, but lip and heart, that are placed opposite to each other. Better the LXX. οὐκ ἀσφαλῆς, and yet better the Syr. lo kinîn (not right, sure). We have seen, at xi. 19, that פ as a participial adj. means standing = being, continuing, or also standing erect = right, i.e. rightly directed, or having the right direction; פָּוֹרְתָהּ means there conducting oneself rightly, and thus genuine rectitude. What, after 7a, is more appropriate than to say of the heart of the fool, that it wants the receptivity for knowledge which the lips of the wise scatter abroad? The heart of the fool is not right, it has not the right direction, is crooked and perverse, has no mind for wisdom; and that which proceeds from the wise, therefore, finds with him neither estimation nor acceptance.

Ver. 8 The sacrifice of the godless is an abhorrence to Jahve;
But the prayer of the upright is His delight.

Although the same is true of the prayer of the godless that is here said of their sacrifice, and of the sacrifice of the righteous that is here said of their prayer (vid. xxviii. 9, and cf. Ps. iv. 6 with Ps. xxvii. 6), yet it is not by accident that here (line first = xxi. 27) the sacrifice is ascribed to the godless and the prayer to the upright. The sacrifice, as a material and legally-required performance, is much more related to dead works than prayer freely completing itself in the word, the most direct expression of the personality, which, although not commanded by the law, because natural to men, as such is yet the soul of all sacrifices; and the Chokma, like the Psalms and Prophets, in view of the ceremonial service which had become formal and dead in the opus operatum, is to such a degree penetrated by the knowledge of the incongruity of the offering up of animals and of plants, with the object in view, that a proverb like "the sacrifice of the righteous is pleasing to God" never anywhere occurs; and if it did occur without being expressly and unavoidably referred to the legal sacrifice, it would have to be understood rather after Ps. li. 18 f. than Ps. li. 20 f., rather after 1 Sam. xv. 22 than after Ps. lxvi. 13-15. זָבַח, which, when it is distinguished from עֹלָה, means (cf. vii. 14) the sacrifice only in part coming to the altar, for the most part applied to a sacrificial feast, is here the common name for the bloody, and, per synecdochen, generally the legally-appointed sacrifice, consisting in external offering. The לְרִצֵּן, Lev. i. 3, used in the Tôra of sacrifices, is here, as at Ps. xix. 15, transferred to prayer. The fundamental idea of the proverb is, that sacrifices well-pleasing to God, prayers acceptable to God (that are heard, xv. 29), depend on the relations in which the heart and life of the man stand to God.

Ver. 9. Another proverb with the key-word תועבת :

An abomination to Jahve is the way of the godless ;
But He loveth him who searcheth after righteousness.

The manner and rule of life is called the way. מִרְדֵּי is the heightening of יָרָה, xxi. 21, and can be used independently in bonam, as well as in malam partem (xi. 19, cf. xiii. 21). Regarding the form מִרְדֵּי, vid. Fleischer in Deutsch. Morgenl. Zeitsch. xv. 382.

Ver. 10 Sharp correction is for him who forsaketh the way ;
Whoever hateth instruction shall die.

The way, thus absolute, is the God-pleasing right way (ii. 13), the forsaking of which is visited with the punishment of death, because it is that which leadeth unto life (x. 17). And that which comes upon them who leave it is called מוֹפֵרֶת רַע, castigatio dura, as much as to say that whoever does not welcome instruction, whoever rejects it, must at last receive it against his will in the form of peremptory punishment. The sharp correction (cf. Isa. xxviii. 28, 19*b*) is just the death under which he falls who accepts of no instruction (v. 23), temporal death, but that as a token of wrath which it is not for the righteous (xiv. 32).

Ver. 11 The underworld [Sheol] and the abyss are before Jahve ;
But how much more the hearts of the children of men !

A syllogism, a minori ad majus, with מִי הָאֵל (LXX. πῶς οὐχὶ καὶ, Venet. μάλλον οὖν), like xii. 32.<sup>1</sup> מִבְּדֵי has a meaning analogous to that of τάρταρος (cf. ταρταροῦν, 2 Pet. ii. 4, to throw down into the τάρταρος), which denotes the lowest region of Hades (תַּחְתִּיתִּי אֵשׁ or תַּחְתִּיתִּי 'ש'), and also in general, Hades. If מְבֹרָן and מוֹת are connected, Job xxxvii. 22, and if מְבֹרָן is the parallel word to קֶבֶר, Ps. lxxxviii. 12, or also to שְׁאוֹל, as in the passage similar to this proverb, Job xxvi. 6 (cf. xxxviii. 17) : " Sheol is naked before <sup>1</sup> In Rabbin. this concluding form is called קַל וְחָמֵר (light and heavy over against one another), and דִּין (judgment, viz. from premisses, thus conclusion), κατ' εἶς. Instead of the biblical מִי הָאֵל, the latter form of the language has כָּל־שֶׁבֶן (all speaks for it that it is so), עַל־אֲחַת כְּפֹה וְכַפֹּה (so much the more), אֵינוֹ דִּין, or also חֲמֵר קַל (a minori ad majus = quanto magis); vid. the Hebr. Römerbrief, p. 14.

Him, and Abaddon has no covering;" since אַבְדֹן is the general name of the underworld, including the grave, i.e. the inner place of the earth which receives the body of the dead, as the kingdom of the dead, lying deeper, does the soul. But where, as here and at xxvii. 10, אַבְדֹן and אַבְדֹן stand together, they are related to each other, as ἄδης and τάρταρος or ἄβυσσος, Rev. ix. 11 : אַבְדֹן is the lowest hell, the place of deepest descent, of uttermost destruction. The conclusion which is drawn in the proverb proceeds from the supposition that in the region of creation there is nothing more separated, and by a wide distance, from God, than the depth, and especially the undermost depth, of the realm of the dead. If now God has this region in its whole compass wide open before Him, if it is visible and thoroughly cognisable by Him (וַיֵּרָא, acc. adv. : in conspectu, from וַיֵּרָא, eminere, conspicuum esse),—for He is also present in the underworld, Ps. cxxxix. 8,—then much more will the hearts of the children of men be open, the inward thoughts of men living and acting on the earth being known already from their expressions. Man sees through man, and also himself, never perfectly; but the Lord can try the heart and prove the reins, Jer. xvii. 10. What that means this proverb gives us to understand, for it places over against the hearts of men nothing less than the depths of the underworld in eternity.

Ver. 12 The scorner liketh not that one reprove him,
To wise men he will not go.

The inf. absol., abruptly denoting the action, may take the place of the object, as here (cf. Job ix. 18, Isa. xlii. 24), as well as of the subject (xxv. 27, Job vi. 25). Thus הוֹכִיחַ is (ix. 7) construed with the dat. obj. Regarding the probable conclusion which presents itself from passages such as xv. 12 and xiii. 20, as to the study of wisdom in Israel, vid. p. 39. Instead of אָל, we read, xiii. 20 (cf. xxii. 24), אֶת־; for לָכַת אֶת־ means to have intercourse with one, to go a journey with one (Mal. ii. 6, cf. Gen. v. 24, but not 2 Sam. xv. 22, where we are to translate with Keil), according to which the LXX. has here μετὰ δὲ σοφῶν οὐχ ὁμιλήσει. The mocker of religion and of virtue shuns the circle of the wise, for he loves not to have his treatment of that which is holy reprov'd, nor to be convicted of his sin against truth; he prefers the society where his frivolity finds approbation and a response.

Ver. 13 A joyful heart maketh the countenance cheerful;
But in sorrow of the heart the spirit is broken.

The expression of the countenance, as well as the spiritual habitus of a man, is conditioned by the state of the heart. A joyful heart maketh the countenance טוב, which means friendly, but here happy-looking = cheerful (for טוב is the most general designation of that which makes an impression which is pleasant to the senses or to the mind); on the contrary, with sorrow of heart (עצבת, constr. of עצבת, x. 10, as חפצאת = חפצאת, from חפצאה) there is connected a stricken, broken, downcast heart; the spiritual functions of the man are paralyzed; self-confidence, without which energetic action is impossible, is shattered; he appears discouraged, whereby רוח is thought of as the power of self-consciousness and of self-determination, but לב, as our "Gemüt" [animus], as the oneness of thinking and willing, and thus as the seat of determination, which decides the intellectual-corporeal life-expression of the man, or without being able to be wholly restrained, communicates itself to them. The ב of יבצעבת is, as xv. 16 f., xvi. 8, xvii. 1, meant in the force of being together or along with, so that רוח נבאה do not need to be taken separate from each other as subject and predicate: the sense of the noun-clause is in the ב, as e.g. also vii. 23 (it is about his life, i.e. it concerns his life). Elsewhere the crushed spirit, like the broken heart, is equivalent to the heart despairing in itself and prepared for grace. The heart with a more clouded mien may be well, for sorrow has in it a healing power (Eccles. vii. 3). But here the matter is the general psychological truth, that the corporeal and spiritual life of man has its regulator in the heart, and that the condition of the heart leaves its stamp on the appearance and on the activity of the man. The translation of the רוח נבאה by "oppressed breath" (Umbreit, Hitzig) is impossible; the breath cannot be spoken of as broken.

Ver. 14 The heart of the understanding seeketh after knowledge,
And the mouth of fools practiseth folly.

Luther interprets רעה as metaphor. for to govern, but with such ethical conceptions it is metaphor. for to be urgently circumspect about anything (vid. xiii. 20), like Arab. ra'y and r'áyt, intentional, careful, concern about anything. No right translation can be made of the Chethib פני, which Schultens, Hitzig, Ewald, and Zücker prefer; the predicate can go before the פני, after the Semitic rule in the fem. of the sing., 2 Sam. x. 9, cf. Job xvi. 16,

Chethib, but cannot follow in the masc. of the sing.; besides, the operations of his look and aspect are ascribed to his face, but not spiritual functions as here, much more to the mouth, i.e. to the spirit speaking through it. The heart is within a man, and the mouth without; and while the former gives and takes, the latter is always only giving out. In xviii. 15, where a synonymous distich is formed from the antithetic distich, the ear, as hearing, is mentioned along with the heart as appropriating.  $\text{בָּן}$  is not an adj., but is gen., like  $\text{צַדִּיק}$ , 28a (opp.  $\text{וַיִּשׁ}$ ). חכם, xvi. 23. The φιλοσοφία of the understanding is placed over against the μωρολογία of the fools. The LXX. translates καρδία ὀρθή ζητεῖ αἰσθησιον (cf. xiv. 10, καρδία ἀνδρὸς αἰσθητικῆς); it uses this word after the Hellenistic usus loq. for  $\text{מַעֲמָד}$ , of experimental knowledge.

Ver. 15 All the days of the afflicted are evil;

But he who is of a joyful heart hath a perpetual feast.

Regarding  $\text{עָלִי}$  (the afflicted), vid. 21b. They are so called on whom a misfortune, or several of them, press externally or internally. If such an one is surrounded by ever so many blessings, yet is his life day by day a sad one, because with each new day the feeling of his woe which oppresses him renews itself; whoever, on the contrary, is of joyful heart (gen. connection as xi. 13, xii. 8), such an one (his life) is always a feast, a banquet (not  $\text{מִשְׁתֵּה$ , as it may be also pointed, but  $\text{מִשְׁתֵּה}$  and  $\text{תַּמְדִּיר}$  thus adv., for it is never adj.; the post-bib. usage is  $\text{עוֹלוֹת תַּמְדִּיר}$  for  $\text{תַּמְדִּיר}$ ). Hitzig (and also Zöckler) renders 15b: And (the days) of one who is of a joyful heart are . . . Others supply  $\text{לֵי}$  (cf. xxvii. 7b), but our rendering does not need that. We have here again an example of that attribution (Arab. ismād) in which that which is attributed (musnad) is a condition (hal) of a logical subject (the musnad ilēhi), and thus he who speaks has this, not in itself, but in the sense of the condition; the inwardly cheerful is feasts evermore, i.e. the condition of such an one is like a continual festival. The true and real happiness of a man is thus defined, not by external things, but by the state of the heart, in which, in spite of the apparently prosperous condition, a secret sorrow may gnaw, and which, in spite of an externally sorrowful state, may be at peace, and be joyfully confident in God.

Ver. 16 Better is little with the fear of Jahve,

Than great store and trouble therewith.

The  $\text{ב}$  in both cases the LXX. rightly renders by μετά. How מְהִימָה (elsewhere of wild, confused disorder, extreme discord) is meant of store and treasure, Ps. xxxix. 7 shows: it is restless, covetous care and trouble, as the contrast of the quietness and contentment proceeding from the fear of God, the noisy, wild, stormy running and hunting about of the slave of mammon. Theodotion translates the word here, as Aquila and Symmachus elsewhere, by words which correspond (φαγέδαινα = φάγαινα or ἀχορτασία) with the Syr. עֵנְוֹתָא, greed or insatiability.

Ver. 17 Better a dish of cabbage, and love with it,
Than a fatted ox together with hatred.

With בו is here interchanged עִשׂ, which, used both of things and of persons, means to be there along with something. Both have the Dag. forte conj., cf. to the contrary, Deut. xxx. 20, Mic. i. 11, Deut. xi. 22; the punctuation varies, if the first of the two words is a n. actionis ending in הַ. The dish (portion) is called אֲרָחָה, which the LXX. and other Greek versions render by ξενισμός, entertainment, and thus understand it of that which is set before a guest, perhaps rightly so, for the Arab. árrakh (to date, to determine), to which it is compared by Gesenius and Dietrich, is equivalent to warrh, a denom. of the name of the moon. Love and hatred are, according to circumstances, the disposition of the host, or of the participant, the spirit of the family:

*Cum dat oluscula mensa minuscula pace quietâ,
Ne pete grandia lautaque prandia lite repleta.*

Two proverbs of two different classes of men, each second line of which terminates with a catchword having a similar sound (וּאֵרָח, וּאֵרָח).

Ver. 18 A passionate man stirreth up strife,
And one who is slow to anger allayeth contention.

xxviii. 25a and xxix. 22a are variations of the first line of this proverb. The Pih. גָּרָה occurs only these three times in the phrase גָּרָה מְדוּן, R. גַּר, to grind, thus to strike, to irritate, cogn. to (but of a different root from) the verb עוֹרֵר, to excite, x. 12, and קִרְרָר, to set on fire, xxvi. 21, cf. שָׂלַח, vi. 14. Regarding הַמָּה, vid. xv. 1; we call such a man a "hot-head;" but the biblical conception nowhere (except in the Book of Daniel) places the head in connection with spiritual-psychical events (Psychologie, p. 254). Regarding אָרָה אֵפִים, vid. xiv. 29; the LXX. (which contains a translation of this proverb, and after it of a variation) translates μακρόθυμος δὲ καὶ τὴν μέλλουσαν καταπραύνει, i.e. (as the Syr. render it) he suppresses the strife in its origin, so that it does not break out. But both are true: that he who is slow to anger, who does not thus easily permit himself to become angry, allayeth the strife which one enters into with him, or into which he is drawn, and that he prevents the strife, for he places over against provoking, injurious conduct, patient gentleness (מִרְפָּא, Eccles. x. 4).

Ver. 19 The way of the slothful is as hedged with thorns;
But the path of the righteous is paved.

Hitzig misses the contrast between עָצֵל (slothful) and יֵשָׁרִים (upright), and instead of the slothful reads עֲרִירָן, the tyrannical. But is then the slothful יֵשָׁר? The contrast is indeed not that of contradiction, but the slothful is one who does not act uprightly, a man who fails to fulfil the duty of labour common to man, and of his own special calling. The way of such an one is כַּמְשַׁבֵּחַ חֲרִיק, like a fencing with thorns (from חֲרִיק, R. חר, to be pointed, sharp, distinguished from Arab. hadk, to surround, and in the meaning to fix with the look, denom. of khadakt, the apple of the eye), so that he goes not forwards, and sees hindrances and difficulties everywhere, which frighten him back, excusing his shunning his work, his remissness of will, and his doing nothing; on the contrary, the path of those who wait truly and honestly on their calling, and prosecute their aim, is raised up like a skilfully made street, so that unhindered and quickly they go forward (סִלְיָהוּ, R. סל, aggerare, cf. Jer. xviii. 15 with Isa. xlix. 11, and iv. 8, סִלְסֵל, which was still in use in the common language of Palestine in the second cent., Rosch haschana, 26b).

This collection of Solomonic proverbs began, x. 1, with a proverb having reference to the observance of the fourth commandment,<sup>1</sup> and a second chief section, xiii. 1, began in the same way. Here a proverb of the same kind designates the beginning of a third chief section. That the editor was aware of this is shown by the homogeneity of the proverbs, xv. 19, xii. 28, which form the conclusion of the first and second sections. We place together first in this new section, vers. 20-23, in which (with the exception of ver. 25) the יֵשָׁמַח [maketh glad] of the first (x. 1) is continued.

Ver. 20 A wise son maketh a glad father,
And a fool of a man despiseth his mother.

Line first = x. 1. The gen. connection of כְּסִיל אָדָם (here and at xxi. 20) is not superlative [the most foolish of men], but like פְּרָא אָדָם, Gen. xvi. 12; the latter: a man of the wild ass kind; the former: a man of the fool kind, who is the exemplar of such a sort among men. Piety acting in willing subordination is wisdom, and the contrary exceeding folly.

Ver. 21 Folly is joy to him that is devoid of understanding;
But a man of understanding goeth straight forward.

Regarding חֶסֶד-לֵב, vid. at vi. 32 (cf. libib, which in the Samaritan means "dearly beloved," in Syr. "courageous," in Arab. and Aethiop. cordatus); אִישׁ חֲבִיבָה, x. 23, and יָצַר, with the accus. of the way, here of the going, iii. 6 (but not xi. 5, where the going itself is not the subject). In consequence of the contrast, the meaning of 21a is different from that of x. 23, according to which sin is to the fool as the sport of a child. Here אֵלֶּיָהּ is folly and buffoonery, drawing aside in every kind of way from the direct path of that which is good, and especially from the path of one's duty. This gives joy to the fool; he is thereby drawn away from the earnest and faithful performance of the duties of his calling, and thus wastes time and strength; while, on the contrary, a man of understanding, who perceives and rejects the vanity and unworthiness of such trifling and such nonsense, keeps the straight direction of his going, i.e. without being drawn aside or kept back, goes straight forward, i.e. true to duty, prosecutes the end of his calling. לֵבָת is accus., like xxx. 29, Mic. vi. 8.

Ver. 22 A breaking of plans where no counsel is;
But where many counsellors are they come to pass.

On the other side it is also true according to the proverbs, "so viel Köpfe so viel Sinne" [quot homines, tot sententiæ], and "viel Rath ist Unrath" [ne quid nimis], and the like. But it cannot become a rule of morals not to accept of counsel that we may not go astray; on the contrary, it is and remains a rule of morals: not stubbornly to follow one's own heart (head), and not obstinately to carry out one's own will, and not in the darkness of wisdom to regard one's own plans as unimproveable, and not needing to be examined; but to listen to the counsel of intelligent and honest friends, and, especially where weighty matters are in hand, not affecting one's own person, but the common good, not to listen merely to one counsellor, but to many. Not merely the organism of the modern state, but also of old the Mosaic arrangement of the Israelitish community, with its representative organization, its courts and councils, rested on the acknowledged justice and importance of the saying uttered in xi. 14, and here generalized. הִפֵּר, infin. abs. Hiph. of פָּרַר, to break, with the accus. following, stands here, like הִפֵּסוּ, xii. 7, instead of the finite: the thoughts come to a fracture (failure), irrita fiunt consilia. סֹר (= יִסֹּד, cf. נִסֵּר, Ps. ii. 2) means properly the being brought close together for the purpose of secret communication and counsel (cf. Arab. sāwada, to press close together = to walk with one privately). The LXX.: their plans are unexecuted, οἱ μὴ τιμῶντες συνέδρια, literally Symmachus, διασκεδάζονται λογισμοὶ μὴ ὄντος συμβουλίου. תִּקְוָה has, after Jer. iv. 14, li. 29, מִתְּשֻׁבוֹת as subject. The LXX. (besides perverting בָּרַב [by a multitude] into בָּלָב [ἐν καρδίαις]), the Syr., and Targ. introduce עֲצָה (xix. 21) as subject.

Ver. 23 A man has joy by the right answer of his mouth;

And a word in its season, how fair is it!

If we translate מַעֲנֶה only by "answer," then 23a sounds as a praise of self-complaisance; but it is used of true correspondence (xxix. 19), of fit reply (Job xxxii. 3, 5), of appropriate answer (cf. 28a, xvi. 1). It has happened to one in his reply to hit the nail on its head, and he has joy from that (שָׂמַח אַחֲרַי שְׂמִתָּה בִּי after בָּ, e.g. xxiii. 24), and with right; for the reply does not always succeed. A reply like this, which, according to circumstances, stops the mouth or bringeth a kiss (xxiv. 26), is a fortunate throw, is a gift from above. The synonymous parallel line measures that which is appropriate, not to that which is to be answered, but from a general point of view as to its seasonableness; עֵת (= עֵתָה from עָרַ) is here "the ethically right, becoming time, determined by the laws of wisdom (moral)" (vid. Orelli, Synonyma der Zeit u. Ewigkeit, p. 48), cf. עַל-אִפְּנֵי (translated by Luther "in its time"), xxv. 11. With מִדֵּי-טוֹב, cf. xvi. 16; both ideas lie in it: that such a word is in itself well-conditioned and successful, and also that it is welcome, agreeable, and of beneficial influence.

Four proverbs of fundamentally different doctrines:

Ver. 24 The man of understanding goeth upwards on a way of life,

To depart from hell beneath.

The way of life is one, v. 6, Ps. xvi. 11 (where, notwithstanding the want of the article, the idea is logically determined), although in itself forming a plurality of אֲדָוָה, ii. 19. "A way of life," in the translation, is equivalent to a way which is a way of life.

לְמַעַלָּה, upwards (as Eccles. iii. 21, where, in the doubtful question whether the spirit of a man at his death goes upwards, there yet lies the knowledge of the alternative), belongs, as the parallel מִשְׁאוֹל מִמָּוֶה shows, to אֲרוֹחַ חַיִּים as virtual adj.: a way of life which leads upwards. And the לְ of לְמַעַלָּה is that of possession, but not as of quiet possession (such belongs to him), but as personal activity, as in לֵךְ, he has a journey = he makes a journey, finds himself on a journey, 1 Kings xviii. 27; for לְמַעַן is not merely, as לְמַדָּה, xiii. 14, xiv. 27, the expression of the end and consequence, but of the subjective object, i.e. the intention, and thus supposes an activity corresponding to this intention. The O. T. reveals heaven, i.e. the state of the revelation of God in glory, yet not as the abode of saved men; the way of the dying leads, according to the O. T. representation, downwards into Sheôl; but the translations of Enoch and Elijah are facts which, establishing the possibility of an exception, break through the dark monotony of that representation, and, as among the Greeks the mysteries encouraged ἠδυστέρας ἐλπίδας, so in Israel the Chokma appears pointing the possessor of wisdom upwards, and begins to shed light on the darkness of Sheôl by the new great thoughts of a life of immortality, thus of a ζωὴ αἰώνιος (xii. 28) (Psychologie, p. 407 ff.), now for the first time becoming prominent, but only as a foreboding and an enigma. The idea of the Sheôl opens the way for a change: the gathering place of all the living on this side begins to be the place of punishment for the godless (vii. 27, ix. 18); the way leading upwards, eis τὴν ζωὴν, and that leading downwards, eis τὴν ἀπώλειαν (Matt. vii. 13 f.), come into direct contrast.

Ver. 25 The house of the proud Jahve rooteth out,
And He establisheth the landmark of the widow.

The power unnamed in יִסְרָאֵל, ii. 22 (cf. xiv. 11a), is here named יְהוָה (thus to be pointed with Mercha and Pasek following). יְהוָה is the abbreviated fut. form which the elevated style, e.g. Deut. xxxii. 8, uses also as indic.,—a syntactical circumstance which renders Hitzig's correction יְהוָה superfluous. It is the border of the land-possession of the widows, removed by the יְהוָה (LXX. ὕβριστῶν), that is here meant. The possession of land in Israel was secured by severe punishment inflicted on him who removed the "landmark" (Deut. xix. 14, xxvii. 17), and the Chokma (xxii. 28; Job xxiv. 2) as well as the prophets (e.g. Hos. v. 10) inculcate the inviolability of the borders of the possession, as the guardian of which Jahve here Himself appears.

Ver 26 An abomination to Jahve are evil thoughts;
But gracious words are to Him pure.

Not personally (Luther: the plans of the wicked) but neutrally is  $\text{רע}$  here meant as at ii. 14, and in  $\text{אִשְׁתֵּי רָע}$ , vi. 24 (cf. Pers. merdi niku, man of good = good man), vid. Friedr. Philippi's Status Constr. p. 121. Thoughts which are of a bad kind and of a bad tendency, particularly (what the parallel member brings near) of a bad disposition and design against others, are an abomination to God; but, on the contrary, pure, viz. in His eyes, which cannot look upon iniquity (Hab. i. 13), are the  $\text{אֲמֵרֵי-נֶעֱם}$ , words of compassion and of friendship toward men, which are (after 26a) the expression of such thoughts, thus sincere, benevolent words, the influence of which on the soul and body of him to whom they refer is described, xvi. 24. The Syr., Targ., Symmachus, Theodotion, and the Venet. recognise in  $\text{יְסֻדוֹתֵימָם}$  the pred., while, on the contrary, the LXX., Jerome, and Luther (who finally decided for the translation, "but the pure speak comfortably") regard it as subject. But that would be an attribution which exceeds the measure of possibility, and for which  $\text{אֲמֵרֵי}$  or  $\text{דְּבָרַי}$  must be used; also the parallelism requires that  $\text{יְסֻדוֹתֵימָם}$  correspond with  $\text{חֻמְבַּת ה'}$ . Hence also the reference of  $\text{וְטַהֲרֵימָם}$  to the judgment of God, which is determined after the motive of pure untainted law; that which proceeds from such, that and that only, is pure, pure in His sight, and thus also pure in itself.

Ver. 27 Whoever does service to [servit] avarice troubleth his own house;
But he that hateth gifts shall live.

Regarding  $\text{בָּצַע בָּצַע}$ , vid. at i. 19, and regarding  $\text{עֵבֶר בֵּיתוֹ}$ , xi. 29, where it is subject, but here object.; xxviii. 16b is a variation of 27b.  $\text{מִתְנַחֵת}$  are here gifts in the sense of Eccles. vii. 7, which pervert judgment, and cause respect of persons. The LXX. from this point mingles together a series of proverbs with those of the following chapter.

Two proverbs regarding the righteous and the wicked:

Ver. 28 The heart of the righteous considereth how to answer right,
And the mouth of the godless poureth forth evil.

Instead of  $\text{לְעֵנֹת}$ , the LXX. (Syr. and Targ.) imagines  $\text{אֲמוֹנֹת}$ ,  $\text{πίστεως}$ ; Jerome translates, but falsely, obedientiam (from  $\text{עָנָה}$ , to bend oneself); Meiri thinks on  $\text{לְעֵנָה}$ , wormwood, for the heart of the righteous revolves in itself the misery and the vanity of this present life; Hitzig corrects this verse as he does the three preceding: the heart of the righteous thinks on עֲנֹתָ, a plur. of verb עָנָה, which, except in this correction, does not exist. The proverb, as it stands, is, in fineness of expression and sharpness of the contrast, raised above such manglings. Instead of the righteous, the wise might be named, and instead of the godless, fools (cf. 2*b*); but the poet places the proverb here under the point of view of duty to neighbours. It is the characteristic of the righteous that he does not give the reins to his tongue; but as Luther has translated: the heart of the righteous considers [tichtet from dictare, frequently to speak, here carefully to think over] what is to be answered, or rather, since מִה־לְעֹנֹת is not used, he thinks thereupon to answer rightly, for that the word עָנָה is used in this pregnant sense is seen from 23*a*. The godless, on the contrary, are just as rash with their mouth as the righteous are of a thoughtful heart: their mouth sputters forth (effulit) evil, for they do not first lay to heart the question what may be right and just in the case that has arisen.

Ver. 29 Jahve is far from the godless;
But the prayer of the righteous He heareth.

Line second is a variation of 8*b*. God is far from the godless, viz. as Polychronius remarks, non spatii intercapedine, sed sententiarum diversitate; more correctly: as to His gracious presence—הִלָּץ מֵהֵם, He has withdrawn Himself from them, Hos. x. 6, so that if they pray, their prayer reaches not to Him. The prayer of the righteous, on the contrary, He hears, He is graciously near to them, they have access to Him, He listens to their petitions; and if they are not always fulfilled according to their word, yet they are not without an answer (Ps. cxlv. 18).

Two proverbs regarding the eye and the ear:

Ver. 30 The light of the eye rejoiceth the heart,
And a good message maketh the bones fat.

Hitzig corrects also here: מִרְיָה עֵינַיִם, that which is seen with the eyes, viz. after long desire; and certainly מִרְיָה עֵינַיִם can mean not only that which the eyes see (Isa. xi. 3), but also this, that the eyes do see. But is it true what Hitzig says in justification of his correction, that מִאֹרֶר never means light, or ray, or brightness, but lamp (φωστῆρ)? It is true, indeed, that מִאֹרֶר עֵינַיִם cannot mean a cheerful sight (Luther) in an objective sense (LXX. θεωρῶν ὄφθαλμὸς καλός), as a verdant garden or a stream flowing through a landscape (Rashi), for that would be מְרֻמָּה מְאִיר עֵינַיִם, and “brightness which the eyes see” (Bertheau); the genitive connection certainly does not mean: the מְאִיר is not the light from without presenting itself to the eyes, but, like אֹר עֵינַיִם (Ps. xxxviii. 11) and similar expressions, the light of the eye itself [bright or joyous eyes]. But מְאִיר does not mean alone the body of light, but also the illumination, Ex. xxxv. 14 and elsewhere, not only that which (ὄ, τι) gives light, but also this, that (ὄ, τι) light arises and is present, so that we might translate it here as, at Ps. xc. 8, either the brightness, or that which gives light. But the clear brightness of one’s own eye cannot be meant, for then that were as much as to say that it is the effect, not that it is the cause, of a happy heart, but the brightness of the eyes of others that meet us. That this gladdens the heart of him who has a sight of it is evident, without any interchanging relation of the joy-beaming countenance, for it is indeed heart-gladdening to a man, to whom selfishness has not made the χαίρειν μετὰ χαίρόντων impossible, to see a countenance right joyful in truth. But in connection with xvi. 15, it lies nearer to think on a love-beaming countenance, a countenance on which joyful love to us mirrors itself, and which reflects itself in our heart, communicating this sense of gladness. The ancient Jewish interpreters understand מְאִיר עֵינַיִם of the enlightening of the eye of the mind, according to which Eichel translates: “clear intelligence;” but Rashi has remarked that that is not the explanation of the words, but the Midrash. That, in line second of this synonymous distich, שְׂמֵחָה מְבִינָה does not mean alloquium humanum (Fl.), nor a good report which one hears of himself, but a good message, is confirmed by xxv. 25; שְׂמֵחָה as neut. part. pass. may mean that which is heard, but the comparison of שְׂמֵחָה, שְׂבִיחָה, שְׂמֵחָה, stamps it as an abstract formation like נִדְרָה, נִדְרָה, נִדְרָה, according to which the LXX. translates it by ἀκοή (in this passage by φήμη). Regarding רִשְׁוֹן, richly to satisfy, or to refresh, a favourite expression in the Mishle, vid. at xi. 25, xiii. 4.

Ver. 31 An ear which heareth the doctrine of life
Keeps itself in the circle of the wise.

As, vi. 33, תּוֹכַחַת מוֹסֵר means instructions aiming at discipline, so here תּוֹכַחַת חַיִּים means instructions which have life as their end, i.e. as showing how one may attain unto true life; Hitzig’s חָכְמָה, for חַיִּים, is a fancy. Is now the meaning this, that the ear which willingly hears and receives such doctrine of life will come to dwell among the wise, i.e. that such an one (for  $\text{אִישׁ}$  is synecdoche partis pro persona, as Job xxix. 11) will have his residence among wise men, as being one of them, inter eos sedem firmam habebit iisque annumerabitur (Fl.)? By such a rendering, one is surprised at the harshness of the synecdoche, as well as at the circumstantiality of the expression (cf. xiii. 20,  $\text{אִישׁ}$ ). On the contrary, this corresponds with the thought that one who willingly permits to be said to him what he must do and suffer in order that he may be a partaker of life, on this account remains most gladly in the circle of the wise, and there has his appropriate place. The "passing the night" ( $\text{לַיְלָה}$ , cogn.  $\text{לַיְלָה}$ , Syr. Targ.  $\text{בַּיּוֹם}$ , Arab. bât) is also frequently elsewhere the designation of prolonged stay, e.g. Isa. i. 21.  $\text{בְּיַרְכָּב}$  is here different in signification from that it had in xiv. 23, where it meant "in the heart." In the LXX. this proverb is wanting. The other Greek translations have οὐς ἀκούον ἐλέγχους ζωῆς ἐν μέσῳ σοφῶν ἀνλισθήσεται. Similarly the Syr., Targ., Jerome, Venet., and Luther, admitting both renderings, but, since they render in the fut., bringing nearer the idea of prediction (Midrash :  $\text{זוכה לישב בְּישיבת חכמים}$ ) than of description of character.

Two proverbs with the catchword  $\text{מוֹסֵר}$  :

Ver. 32 He that refuseth correction lightly values his soul ;
But he that heareth reproof getteth understanding.

Regarding  $\text{מוֹסֵר}$   $\text{פִּירַע מוֹסֵר}$ , vid. xiii. 18, cf. i. 25, and  $\text{מוֹסֵר נַפְשׁוֹ}$ , viii. 36.  $\text{נַפְשׁוֹ}$  contains more than the later expression  $\text{עַצְמוֹ}$ , self; it is equivalent to  $\text{הַיְיּוֹ}$  (Job ix. 21), for the  $\text{נַפְשׁ}$  is the bond of union between the intellectual and the corporeal life. The despising of the soul is then the neglecting, endangering, exposing of the life; in a word, it is suicide (10*b*). xix. 8*a* is a variation derived from this distich : "He who gains understanding loves his soul," according to which the LXX. translate here ἀγαπᾷ ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ.  $\text{לֵב}$  the Midrash explains by  $\text{הַכְּמָה שְׁנוּתוֹנָה בְּלֵב}$ ; but the correct view is, that  $\text{לֵב}$  is not thought of as a formal power, but as operative and carried into effect in conformity with its destination.

Ver. 33 The fear of Jahve is a discipline to wisdom,
And before honour is humility.

We may regard  $\text{יְרֵאתָ ה'$  (the fear of Jahve) also as pred. here. The fear of Jahve is an educational maxim, and the end of education of the Chokma; but the phrase may also be the subject, and by such a rendering Luther's parallelism lies nearer: "The fear of the Lord is discipline to wisdom ;” the fear of God, viz. continually exercised and tried, is the right school of wisdom, and humility is the right way to honour. Similar is the connection מִצַּר מִשְׁכַּל הַשֵּׁבֶל, discipline binds understanding to itself as its consequence, i. 3. Line second repeats itself, xviii. 12, “Pride comes before the fall.” Luther’s “And ere one comes to honour, he must previously suffer,” renders עָנָה rather than עָנָה. But the Syr. reverses the idea: the honour of the humble goeth before him, as also one of the anonymous Greek versions: προπορεύεται δὲ ταπεινοῖς δόξα. But the δόξα comes, as the above proverb expresses it, afterwards. The way to the height lies through the depth, the depth of humility under the hand of God, and, as עָנָה expresses, of self-humiliation.

Four proverbs of God, the disposer of all things :

Chap. xvi. 1 Man’s are the counsels of the heart ;

But the answer of the tongue cometh from Jahve.

Gesen., Ewald, and Bertheau incorrectly understand 1b of hearing, i.e. of a favourable response to what the tongue wishes ; 1a speaks not of wishes, and the gen. after מַעֲנָה (answer) is, as at xv. 23, Mic iii. 7, and also here, by virtue of the parallelism, the gen. subjecti. xv. 23 leads to the right sense, according to which a good answer is joy to him to whom it refers : it does not always happen to one to find the fitting and effective expression for that which he has in his mind ; it is, as this cog. proverb expresses it, a gift from above (δοθήσεται, Matt. x. 19). But now, since מַעֲנָה neither means answering, nor yet in general an expression (Euchel) or report (Löwenstein), and the meaning of the word at 4a is not here in question, one has to think of him whom the proverb has in view as one who has to give a reason, to give information, or generally—since עָנָה, like ἀμείβεσθαι, is not confined to the interchange of words—to solve a problem, and that such an one as requires reflection. The scheme (project, premeditation) which he in his heart contrives, is here described as מַעְרִיב־לֵב, from עָרַב, to arrange, to place together, metaphorically of the reflection, i.e. the consideration analyzing and putting a matter in order. These reflections, seeking at one time in one direction, and at another in another, the solution of the question, the unfolding of the problem, are the business of men ; but the answer which finally the tongue gives, and which here, in conformity with the pregnant sense of מַעֲנָה (vid. at xv. 23, 28), will be regarded as right, appropriate, effective, thus generally the satisfying reply to the demand placed before him, is from God. It is a matter of experience which the preacher, the public speaker, the author, and every man to whom his calling or circumstances present a weighty, difficult theme, can attest. As the thoughts pursue one another in the mind, attempts are made, and again abandoned; the state of the heart is somewhat like that of chaos before the creation. But when, finally, the right thought and the right utterance for it are found, that which is found appears to us, not as if self-discovered, but as a gift; we regard it with the feeling that a higher power has influenced our thoughts and imaginings; the confession by us, ἡ ἱκανότης ἡμῶν ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ (2 Cor. iii. 5), in so far as we believe in a living God, is inevitable.

Ver. 2 Every way of a man is pure in his own eyes;

But a weigher of the spirits is Jahve.

Variations of this verse are xxi. 2, where שָׁרָא for אָרָא (according to the root-meaning: pricking in the eyes, i.e. shining clear, then: without spot, pure, vid. Fleischer in Levy's Chald. Wörterbuch, i. 424), לְבוֹת for רְחוֹת, and בְּלִדְרֵי for בְּלִדְרֵי, whereupon here without synallage (for לָא means the totality), the singular of the pred. follows, as Isa. lxiv. 10, Ezek. xxxi. 15. For the rest, cf. with 2a, xiv. 12, where, instead of the subj. בְּעֵינַי, is used לְפָנַי, and with 2b, xxiv. 12, where God is described by אֲבוֹת לְבוֹת. The verb אָבָא is a secondary formation from אָבָא (vid. Hupfeld on Ps. v. 7), like אָבָא from Arab. tyakn (to be fast, sure), the former through the medium of the reflex. אָבָא, the latter of the reflex. Arab. aitkn; אָבָא means to regulate (from regula, a rule), to measure off, to weigh, here not to bring into a condition right according to rule (Theodotion, ἐδράζων, stabiliens, Syr. Targ. אָבָא, Venet. καταρτίξει; Luther, "but the Lord maketh the heart sure"), but to measure or weigh, and therefore to estimate rightly, to know accurately (Jerome, spirituum ponderator est Dominus). The judgment of a man regarding the cause of life, which it is good for him to enter upon, lies exposed to great and subtle self-deception; but God has the measure and weight, i.e. the means of proving, so as to value the spirits according to their true moral worth; his investigation goes to the root (cf. κριτικός, Heb. iv. 12), his judgment rests on the knowledge of the true state of the matter, and excludes all deception, so that thus a man can escape the danger of delusion by no other means than by placing his way, i.e. his external and internal life, in the light of the word of God, and desiring for himself the all-penetrating test of the Searcher of hearts (Ps.

cxxxix. 23 f.), and the self-knowledge corresponding to the result of this test.

Ver. 3 Roll on Jahve thy works,
So thy thoughts shall prosper.

The proverbs vers. 1-3 are wanting in the LXX.; their absence is compensated for by three others, but only externally, not according to their worth. Instead of לָא, the Syr., Targ., and Jerome read לָא, revela, with which the לָא, Ps. xxxvii. 5, cf. lv. 23, interchanging with לָא (here and at Ps. xxii. 9), does not agree; rightly Theodotion, κύλισσον ἐπὶ κύριον, and Luther: "commend to the Lord thy works." The works are here, not those that are executed, Ex. xxiii. 16, but those to be executed, as Ps. xc. 17, where בְּיָנֶיךָ, here the active to בְּיָנֶיךָ, which at iv. 26 as jussive meant to be placed right, here with ו of the consequence in the apodosis imperativi: to be brought about, and to have continuance, or briefly: to stand (cf. xii. 3) as the contrast of disappointment or ruin. We should roll on God all matters which, as obligations, burden us, and on account of their weight and difficulty cause us great anxiety, for nothing is too heavy or too hard for Him who can overcome all difficulties and dissolve all perplexities; then will our thoughts, viz. those about the future of our duty and our life-course, be happy, nothing will remain entangled and be a failure, but will be accomplished, and the end and aim be realized.

Ver. 4 Jahve hath made everything for its contemplated end;
And also the wicked for the day of evil.

Everywhere else מַעֲנֶה means answer (Venet. πρὸς ἀπόκρισιν αὐτοῦ), which is not suitable here, especially with the absoluteness of the לָא; the Syr. and Targ. translate, obedientibus ei, which the words do not warrant; but also propter semet ipsum (Jerome, Theodotion, Luther) give to אֵל no right parallelism, and, besides, would demand לְמַעַנְי or לְמַעַנְיָהוּ. The punctuation לְמַעַנְיָהוּ, which is an anomaly (cf. בְּבִרְתָּהּ, Isa. xxiv. 2, and בְּעֵרֵי, Ezra x. 14), shows (Ewald) that here we have, not the prepositional לְמַעַן, but ל with the subst. מַעֲנֶה, which in derivation and meaning is one with the form מַעַן abbreviated from it (cf. מַעַל, מַעַר), similar in meaning to the Arab. ma'anyu, aim, intention, object, and end, and mind, from 'atay, to place opposite to oneself a matter, to make it the object of effort. Hitzig prefers לְמַעַנְיָהוּ, but why not rather לְמַעַנְיָהוּ, for the proverb is not intended to express that all that God has made serve a purpose (by which one is reminded of the arguments for the existence of God from final causes, which are often prosecuted too far), but that all is made by God for its purpose, i.e. a purpose premeditated by Him, that the world of things and of events stands under the law of a plan, which has in God its ground and its end, and that also the wickedness of free agents is comprehended in this plan, and made subordinate to it. God has not indeed made the wicked as such, but He has made the being which is capable of wickedness, and which has decided for it, viz. in view of the "day of adversity" (Eccles. vii. 14), which God will cause to come upon him, thus making His holiness manifest in the merited punishment, and thus also making wickedness the means of manifesting His glory. It is the same thought which is expressed in Ex. ix. 16 with reference to Pharaoh. A prædestinatio ad malum, and that in the supralapsarian sense, cannot be here taught, for this horrible dogma (horribile quidem decretum, fateor, says Calvin himself) makes God the author of evil, and a ruler according to His sovereign caprice, and thus destroys all pure conceptions of God. What Paul, Rom. ix., with reference to Ex. ix. 16, wishes to say is this, that it was not Pharaoh's conduct that determined the will of God, but that the will of God is always the antecedens: nothing happens to God through the obstinacy and rebellion of man which determines Him to an action not already embraced in the eternal plan, but also such an one must against his will be subservient to the display of God's glory. The apostle adds ver. 22, and shows that he recognised the factor of human self-determination, but also as one comprehended in God's plan. The free actions of men create no situation by which God would be surprised and compelled to something which was not originally intended by Himself. That is what the above proverb says: the wicked also has his place in God's order of the world. Whoever frustrates the designs of grace must serve God in this, ἐνδεύξασθαι τὴν ὀργὴν καὶ γνωρίσαι τὸ δυνατόν αὐτοῦ (Rom. ix. 22).

Here follow three proverbs of divine punishment, expiatio [Ver-sühnung] and reconciliatio [Versöhnung].

Ver. 5 An abomination to Jahve is every one who is haughty;
The hand for it [assuredly] he remains not unpunished.

Proverbs thus commencing we already had at xv. 9, 26. הַגָּבִיחַ is a metaplastic connecting form of הַגָּבִיחַ; on the contrary, הַגָּבִיחַ, 1 Sam. xvi. 7, Ps. ciii. 11, means being high, as הַגָּבִיחַ, height; the form underlying הַגָּבִיחַ is not הַגָּבִיחַ (as Gesen. and Olshausen write it), but הַגָּבִיחַ. In 5b, xi. 21a is repeated. The translators are perplexed in their rendering of לִי יָד. Fleischer: ab ætate in ætatem non (i.e. nullo unquam tempore futuro) impunis erit.

Ver. 6 By love and truth is iniquity expiated,

And through the fear of Jahve one escapes from evil—

literally, there comes (as the effect of it) the escaping of evil (סָר, n. actionis, as xiii. 19), or rather, since the evil here comes into view as to its consequences (xiv. 27, xv. 24), this, that one escapes evil. By אֱמֶת וְאֵמֶת are here meant, not the χάρις καὶ ἀλήθεια of God (Bertheau), but, like xx. 28, Isa. xxxix. 8, love and faithfulness in the relation of men to one another. The כּ is both times that of the mediating cause. Or is it said neither by what means one may attain the expiation of his sins, nor how he may attain to the escaping from evil, but much rather wherein the true reverence for Jahve, and wherein the right expiation of sin, consist? Thus von Hofmann, Schriftbew. i. 595. But the כּ of בַּחֶסֶד is not different from that of בְּזִמְתָּ, Isa. xxvii. 9. It is true that the article of justification is falsified if good works enter as causa meritoria into the act of justification, but we of the evangelical school teach that the fides quâ justificat is indeed inoperative, but not the fides quæ justificat, and we cannot expect of the O. T. that it should everywhere distinguish with Pauline precision what even James will not or cannot distinguish. As the law of sacrifice designates the victim united with the blood in the most definite manner, but sometimes also the whole transaction in the offering of sacrifice even to the priestly feast as serving לִבְיָהוּ, Lev. x. 17, so it also happens in the general region of ethics: the objective ground of reconciliation is the decree of God, to which the blood in the typical offering points, and man is a partaker of this reconciliation, when he accepts, in penitence and in faith, the offered mercy of God; but this acceptance would be a self-deception, if it meant that the blotting out of the guilt of sin could be obtained in the way of imputation without the immediate following thereupon of a blotting of it out in the way of sanctification; and therefore the Scriptures also ascribe to good works a share in the expiation of sin in a wider sense—namely, as the proofs of thankful (Luke vii. 47) and compassionate love (vid. at x. 2), as this proverb of love and truth, herein according with the words of the prophets, as Hos. vi. 6, Mic. vi. 6–8. He who is conscious of this, that he is a sinner, deeply guilty before God, who cannot stand before Him if He did not deal with him in mercy instead of justice, according to the purpose of His grace, cannot trust to this mercy if he is not zealous, in his relations to his fellow-men, to practise love and truth; and in view of the fifth petition of the Lord's Prayer, and of the parable of the unmerciful steward rightly understood, it may be said that the love which covers the sins, x. 12, of a neighbour, has, in regard to our own sins, a covering or atoning influence, for "blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy." That "love and truth" are meant of virtues practised from religious motives, 6*b* shows; for, according to this line, by the fear of Jahve one escapes evil. The fear of Jahve is subjection to the God of revelation, and a falling in with the revealed plan of salvation.

Ver. 7 If Jahve has pleasure in the ways of a man,
He reconciles even his enemies to him—

properly (for הִשְׁלִים is here the causative of the transitive, Josh. x. 1): He brings it about that they conclude peace with him. If God has pleasure in the ways of a man, i.e. in the designs which he prosecutes, and in the means which he employs, he shows, by the great consequences which flow from his endeavours, that, even as his enemies also acknowledge, God is with him (e.g. Gen. xxvi. 27 f.), so that they, vanquished in heart (e.g. 2 Sam. xix. 9 f.), abandon their hostile position, and become his friends. For if it is manifest that God makes Himself known, bestowing blessings on a man, there lies in this a power of conviction which disarms his most bitter opponents, excepting only those who have in selfishness hardened themselves.

Five proverbs of the king, together with three of righteousness in action and conduct:

Ver. 8 Better is a little with righteousness,
Than rich revenues with unrighteousness.

The cogn. proverb xv. 16 commences similarly. Of רֵב רֵב תְּבִנְיֹת, multitude or greatness of income, vid. xiv. 4: "unrighteous wealth profits not." The possessor of it is not truly happy, for sin cleaves to it, which troubles the heart (conscience), and because the enjoyment which it affords is troubled by the curses of those who are injured, and by the sighs of the oppressed. Above all other gains rises ἡ εὐσέβεια μετ' ἀνταρκείας (1 Tim. vi. 6).

Ver. 9 The heart of man deviseth his way;
But Jahve directeth his steps.

Similar to this is the German proverb: "Der Mensch denkt, Gott lenkt" [=our "man proposes, God disposes"], and the Arabic el-'abd (אֲבִד = man) judebbir wallah jukaddir; Latin, homo proponit, Deus disponit; for, as Hitzig rightly remarks, 9b means, not that God maketh his steps firm (Venet., Luther, Umbreit, Bertheau, Elster), but that He gives direction to him (Jerome, dirigere). Man deliberates here and there (אָצֵק, intens. of אָק, to calculate, reflect) how he will begin and carry on this or that; but his short-sightedness leaves much out of view which God sees; his calculation does not comprehend many contingencies which God disposes of and man cannot foresee. The result and issue are thus of God, and the best is, that in all his deliberations one should give himself up without self-confidence and arrogance to the guidance of God, that one should do his duty and leave the rest, with humility and confidence, to God.

Ver. 10 Oracular decision (belongeth) to the lips of the king;
In the judgment his mouth should not err.

The first line is a noun clause; אָצֵק, as subject, thus needs a distinctive accent, and that is here, after the rule of the sequence of accents, and manuscript authority (vid. Torah Emeth, p. 49), not Mehuppach legarme, as in our printed copies, but Dechi (אָצֵק). Jerome's translation: Divinatio in labiis regis, in judicio non errabit os ejus, and yet more Luther's: "his mouth fails not in judgment," makes it appear as if the proverb meant that the king, in his official duties, was infallible; and Hitzig (Zöckler agreeing), indeed, finds here expressed the infallibility of the theocratic king, and that as an actual testimony to be believed, not only as a mere political fiction, like the phrase, "the king can do no wrong." But while this political fiction is not strange even to the Israelitish law, according to which the king could not be brought before the judgment, that testimony is only a pure imagination. For as little as the N. T. teaches that the Pope, as the legitimate vicarius of Christ, is infallible, cum ex cathedra docet, so little does the O. T. that the theocratic king, who indeed was the legitimate vicarius Dei, was infallible in judicio ferendo. Yet Ewald maintains that the proverb teaches that the word of the king, when on the seat of justice, is an infallible oracle; but it dates from the first bright period of the strong uncorrupted kingdom in Israel. One may not forget, says Dächsel also, with von Gerlach, that these proverbs belong to the time of Solomon, before it had given to the throne sons of David who did evil before the Lord. Then it would fare ill for the truth of the proverb—the course of history would falsify it. But in fact this was never maintained in Israel. Of the idolizing flattering language in which, at the present day, rulers in the East are addressed, not a trace is found in the O. T. The kings were restrained by objective law and the recognised rights of the people. David showed, not merely to those who were about him, but also to the people at large, so many human weaknesses, that he certainly appeared by no means infallible; and Solomon distinguished himself, it is true, by rare kingly wisdom, but when he surrounded himself with the glory of an oriental potentate, and when Rehoboam began to assume the tone of a despot, there arose an unhallowed breach between the theocratic kingdom and the greatest portion of the people. The proverb, as Hitzig translates and expounds it: "a divine utterance rests on the lips of the king; in giving judgment his mouth deceives not," is both historically and dogmatically impossible. The choice of the word דִּבְרֵי (from דָּבַר, R. דָּבַר שָׁפָה, to make fast, to take an oath, to confirm by an oath, incantare, vid. at Isa. iii. 2), which does not mean prediction (Luther), but speaking the truth, shows that 10a expresses, not what falls from the lips of the king in itself, but according to the judgment of the people: the people are wont to regard the utterances of the king as oracular, as they shouted in the circus at Cæsarea of King Agrippa, designating his words as θεοῦ φωνή καὶ οὐκ ἀνθρώπων (Acts xii. 22). Hence 10b supplies an earnest warning to the king, viz. that his mouth should not offend against righteousness, nor withhold it. לֹא יִמְעַל is meant as warning (Umbreit, Bertheau), like לֹא יִמְעַל, xxii. 24, and ב in לֹא יִמְעַל is here, as always, that of the object; at least this is more probable than that לֹא stands without object, which is possible, and that ב designates the situation.

Ver. 11 The scale and balances of a right kind are Jahve's ;
His work are the weights of the bag.

Regarding מִשְׁכָּל, statera, a level or steelyard (from שָׁכַל, to make even), vid. iv. 26; מִשְׁכָּל (from שָׁכַל, to weigh), libra, is another form of the balance: the shop-balance furnished with two scales. אֲבָנִים are here the stones that serve for weights, and בֵּית, which at i. 14 properly means the money-bag, money-purse (cf. vii. 20), is here, as at Mic. vi. 11, the bag in which the merchant carries the weights. The genit. מִשְׁכָּל belongs also to מִשְׁכָּל, which, in our edition, is pointed with the disjunctive Mehuppach legarme, is rightly accented in Cod. 1294 (vid. Torah Emeth, p. 50) with the conjunctive Mehuppach. מִשְׁפָּט, as 11*b* shows, is not like מִרְמָה, the word with the principal tone; 11*a* says that the balance thus, or thus constructed, which weighs accurately and justly, is Jahve's, or His arrangement, and the object of His inspection, and 11*b*, that all the weight-stones of the bag, and generally the means of weighing and measuring, rest upon divine ordinance, that in the transaction and conduct of men honesty and certainty might rule. This is the declared will of God, the lawgiver; for among the few direct determinations of His law with reference to trade this stands prominent, that just weights and just measures shall be used, Lev. xix. 36, Deut. xxv. 13-16. The expression of the poet here frames itself after this law; yet 'ה is not exclusively the God of positive revelation, but, as agriculture in Isa. xxviii. 29, cf. Sirach vii. 15, so here the invention of normative and normal means of commercial intercourse is referred to the direction and institution of God.

Ver. 12 It is an abomination to kings to commit wickedness,
For by righteousness the throne is established.

As 10*b* uttered a warning to the king, grounded on the fact of 10*a*, so 12*a* indirectly contains a warning, which is confirmed by the fact 12*b*. It is a fact that the throne is established by righteousness (יָדוֹן as expressive of a rule, like הַיָּדוֹן, Isa. xvi. 5, as expressive of an event); on this account it is an abomination to kings immediately or mediately to commit wickedness, i.e. to place themselves in despotic self-will above the law. Such wicked conduct shall be, and ought to be, an abhorrence to them, because they know that they thereby endanger the stability of their throne. This is generally the case, but especially was it so in Israel, where the royal power was never absolutistic; where the king as well as the people were placed under God's law; where the existence of the community was based on the understood equality of right; and the word of the people, as well as the word of the prophets, was free. Another condition of the stability of the throne is, after xxv. 5, the removal of godless men from nearness to the king. Rehoboam lost the greater part of his kingdom by this, that he listened to the counsel of the young men who were hated by the people.

Ver. 13. History is full of such warning examples, and therefore this proverb continues to hold up the mirror to princes.

Well-pleasing to kings are righteous lips,
And whoever speaketh uprightly is loved.

Rightly the LXX. ἀγαπᾶ, individ. plur., instead of the plur. of genus, מְלִכִּים; on the contrary, Jerome and Luther give to the sing. the most general subject (one lives), in which case it must be distinctly said, that that preference of the king for the people who speak out the truth, and just what they think, is shared in by every one. צָרָק, as the property of the שִׁפְתָי, accords with the Arab. ṣidk, truth as the property of the lasân (the tongue or speech). יִשְׂרָיִם, from יִשָּׂר, means recta, as נְיָרִים, principalia, viii. 6, and רִיקִים, inania, xii. 11. יִשְׂרָיִם, Dan. xi. 10, neut. So neut. וַיִּשָּׂר, Ps. cxi. 8; but is rather, with Hitzig and Riehm, to be read וַיִּשָּׂר. What the proverb says cannot be meant of all kings, for even the house of David had murderers of prophets, like Manasseh and Joiakim; but in general it is nevertheless true that noble candour, united with true loyalty and pure love to the king and the people, is with kings more highly prized than mean flattery, seeking only its own advantage, and that, though this (flattery) may for a time prevail, yet, at last, fidelity to duty, and respect for truth, gain the victory.

Ver. 14 The wrath of the king is like messengers of death;
But a wise man appeaseth him.

The clause: the wrath of the king is many messengers of death, can be regarded as the attribution of the effect, but it falls under the point of view of likeness, instead of comparison: if the king is angry, it is as if a troop of messengers or angels of death went forth to visit with death him against whom the anger is kindled; the plur. serves for the strengthening of the figure: not one messenger of death, but at the same time several, the wrinkled brow, the flaming eye, the threatening voice of the king sends forth (Fleischer). But if he against whom the wrath of the king has thus broken forth is a wise man, or one near the king who knows that ὁρῆν ἄνδρὸς δικαιοσύνην Θεοῦ οὐ κατεργάζεται (Jas. i. 20), he will seek to discover the means (and not without success) to cover or to propitiate, i.e. to mitigate and appease, the king's anger. The Scripture never uses כִּפֵּר, so that God is the object (expiare Deum), because, as is shown in the Comm. zum Hebräerbrief, that were to say, contrary to the decorum divinum, that God's holiness or wrath is covered, or its energy bound, by the offering up of sacrifices or of things in which there is no inherent virtue of atonement, and which are made the means of reconciliation only by the accommodative arrangement of God. On the contrary, כַּפַּר is used here and at Gen. xxxii. 21 of covering = reconciling (propitiating) the wrath of a man.

Ver. 15 In the light on the king's countenance there is life,
And his favour is as a cloud of the latter rains.

Hitzig regards אור as the inf. (cf. iv. 18), but one says substantively אור פני, Job xxix. 24, etc., and in a similar sense מאור עינים, xv. 30; light is the condition of life, and the exhilaration of life, wherefore אור החיים, Ps. lvi. 14, Job xxxiii. 30, is equivalent to a fresh, joyous life; in the light of the king's countenance is life, means that life goes forth from the cheerful approbation of the king, which shows itself in his face, viz. in the showing of favour, which cheers the heart and beautifies the life. To speak of liberality as a shower is so common to the Semitic, that it has in Arab. the general name of nadnā, rain. 15*b* conforms itself to this. מלקוש (cf. Job xxix. 23) is the latter rain, which, falling about the spring equinox, brings to maturity the barley-harvest; on the contrary, מורה (יורה) is the early rain, which comes at the time of ploughing and sowing; the former is thus the harvest rain, and the latter the spring rain. Like a cloud which discharges the rain that mollifies the earth and refreshes the growing corn, is the king's favour. The noun עץ, thus in the st. constr., retains its Kametz. Michlol 191*b*. This proverb is the contrast to ver. 14. xx. 2 has also the anger of the king as its theme. In xix. 12 the figures of the darkness and the light stand together as parts of one proverb. The proverbs relating to the king are now at an end. Ver. 10 contains a direct warning for the king; ver. 12 an indirect warning, as a conclusion arising from 12*b* (cf. xx. 28, where יָרִי is not to be translated tueantur; the proverb has, however, the value of a nota bene). Ver. 13 in like manner presents an indirect warning, less to the king than to those who have intercourse with him (cf. xxv. 5), and vers. 14 and 15 show what power of good and evil, of wrath and of blessing, is given to a king, whence so much the greater responsibility arises to him, but, at the same time also, the duty of all to repress the lust to evil that may be in him, and to awaken and foster in him the desire for good.

Five proverbs regarding wisdom, righteousness, humility, and trust in God, forming, as it were, a succession of steps, for humility is the virtue of virtues, and trust in God the condition of all salvation. Three of these proverbs have the word טוב in common.

Ver. 16 To gain wisdom, how much better is it than gold :

And to attain understanding to be preferred to silver.

Commendation of the striving after wisdom (understanding) with which all wisdom begins, for one gains an intellectual possession not by inheritance, but by acquisition, iv. 7. A similar "parallel-comparative clause" (Fl.), with the interchange of טוב and נבחר, is xxii. 1, but yet more so is xxi. 3, where נבחר, as here, is neut. pred. (not, as at viii. 10 and elsewhere, adj.), and עשה, such an anomalous form of the inf. constr. as here קנה, Gesen. § 75, Anm. 2; in both instances it could also be regarded as the inf. absol. (cf. xxv. 27) (Lehrgebäude, § 109, Anm. 2); yet the language uses, as in the case before us, the form קלה only with the force of an abl. of the gerund, as עשו occurs Gen. xxxi. 38; the inf. of verbs ל"ה as nom. (as here), genit. (Gen. i. 20), and accus. (Ps. ci. 3), is always either קלה or קלה. The meaning is not that to gain wisdom is more valuable than gold, but that the gaining of wisdom exceeds the gaining of gold and silver, the common comparatio decurtata (cf. Job xxviii. 18). Regarding קלה, vid. at iii. 14.

Ver. 17 The path of the righteous is the avoiding of evil,

And he preserveth his soul who giveth heed to his way.

The meaning of מסלה, occurring only here in the Proverbs, is to be learned from xv. 19. The attribution denotes that wherein the way they take consists, or by which it is formed; it is one, a straight and an open way, i.e. unimpeded, leading them on, because they avoid the evil which entices them aside to the right and the left. Whoever then gives heed to his way, preserveth his soul (שמר, as xiii. 3, on the contrary xxv. 5, subj.), that it suffer not injury and fall under death, for סור טרע and סור ממוקשי מות, xiv. 27, are essentially the same. Instead of this distich, the LXX. has three distichs; the thoughts presented in the four superfluous lines are all already expressed in the one distich. Ewald and Hitzig find in this addition of the LXX. a component part of the original text.

Ver. 18 Pride goeth before destruction,

And haughtiness cometh before a fall.

The contrast is לפני כבוד ענוה, xv. 33, according to which the "haughtiness comes before a fall" in xviii. 22 is expanded into the antithetic distich. שבר means the fracture of the limbs, destruction of the person. A Latin proverb says, "Magna cadunt, inflata crepant, tumefacta premuntur."<sup>1</sup> Here being dashed in pieces and overthrown correspond. שָׁבַר means neither bursting (Hitzig) nor shipwreck (Ewald). כָּשָׁל (like בִּטְחוֹן, וְזָרוֹן, etc.), from כָּשַׁל or נִכְשַׁל, to totter, and hence, as a consequence, to come to ruin, is a ἀπαξ. λεγ. This proverb, which stands in the very centre of the Book of Proverbs, is followed by another in praise of humility.

Ver. 19 Better in humility to dwell among sufferers,
Than to divide spoil among the proud.

The form שָׁפַל is here not adj. as xxix. 23 (from שָׁפַל, like חָסַר, vi. 32, from חָסַר), but inf. (like Eccles. xii. 14, and חָסַר, defectio, x. 21). There existed here also no proper reason for changing עֲנִיִּים (Chethib) into עֲנִיִּים; Hitzig is right in saying that עֲנִי may also be taken in the sense of עָנָה [the idea "sufferer" is that which meditates], and that here the inward fact of humility and the outward of dividing spoil, stand opposed to one another. It is better to live lowly, i.e. with a mind devoid of earthly pride (Demut [humility] comes from dō with the deep e, diu, servant), among men who have experience of the vanity of earthly joys, than, intoxicated with pride, to enjoy oneself amid worldly wealth and greatness (cf. Isa. ix. 2).

Ver. 20 He that giveth heed to the word will find prosperity;
And he that trusteth in Jahve, blessed is he!

The "word" here is the word κατ' ἐξ., the divine word, for מִשְׁבָּר is the contrast of לִרְבֵּר, בְּוֹ לִרְבֵּר, xiii. 13a, cf. Neh. viii. 13. טוֹב is meant, as in xvii. 20, cf. xiii. 21, Ps. xxiii. 6; to give heed to God's word is the way to true prosperity. But at last all depends on this, that one stand in personal fellowship with God by means of faith, which here, as at xxviii. 25, xxix. 25, is designated after its specific mark as fiducia. The Mashal conclusion אֲשֶׁר־יִי אֲשֶׁר־יִי occurs, besides here, only at xiv. 21, xxix. 18.

Four proverbs of wisdom with eloquence:

Ver. 21 The wise in heart is called prudent,
And grace of the lips increaseth learning.

Elsewhere (i. 5, ix. 9) הוֹסִיף לְפִי means more than to gain learning, i.e. erudition in the ethico-practical sense, for sweetness of the lips (dulcedo orationis of Cicero) is, as to learning, without significance, but of so much the greater value for teaching; for grace of expression, and of exposition, particularly if it be not merely rhetorical, but, according to the saying pectus disertus facit, coming out of the heart, is full of mind, it imparts force to the instruction, and makes it acceptable. Whoever is wise of heart, i.e. of mind or spirit (לֵב = the N. T. νοῦς or πνεῦμα), is called, and is truly, נָבוֹן [learned, intelligent] (Fleischer compares to this the expression frequent in Isaiah, "to be named" = to be and appear to be, the Arab. du'ay lah); but there is a gift which highly increases the worth of this understanding or intelligence, for it makes it fruitful of good to others, and that is grace of the lips. On the lips (x. 13) of the intelligent wisdom is found; but the form also, and the whole manner and way in which he gives expression to this wisdom, is pleasing, proceeding from a deep and tender feeling for the suitable and the beneficial, and thus he produces effects so much the more surely, and beneficently, and richly.

Ver. 22 A fountain of life is understanding to its possessor ;
But the correction of fools is folly.

Oetinger, Bertheau, and others erroneously understand מוֹסֵר of the education which fools bestow upon others; when fools is the subject spoken of, מוֹסֵר is always the education which is bestowed on them, vii. 22, i. 7; cf v. 23, xv. 5. Also מוֹסֵר does not here mean education, disciplina, in the moral sense (Symmachus, ἐννοια; Jerome, doctrina): that which fools gain from education, from training, is folly, for מוֹסֵר is the contrast to מְקוֹר הַיַּיִם, and has thus the meaning of correction or chastisement, xv. 10, Jer. xxx. 14. And that the fruits of understanding (xii. 8, cf. שְׂכַל טוֹב, fine culture, xiii. 15) represented by מְקוֹר הַיַּיִם (vid. x. 11) will accrue to the intelligent themselves, is shown not only by the contrast, but also by the expression: Scaturigo vitæ est intellectus orãditorum eo, of those (= to those) who are endowed therewith (the LXX. well, τοῖς κακῆγημένοις). The man of understanding has in this intellectual possession a fountain of strength, a source of guidance, and a counsel which make his life secure, deepen, and adorn it; while, on the contrary, folly punishes itself by folly (cf. to the form, xiv. 24), for the fool, when he does not come to himself (Ps. cvii. 17–22), recklessly destroys his own prosperity.

Ver. 23 The heart of the wise maketh his mouth wise,
And learning mounteth up to his lips.

Regarding הַשְׂבִּיל as causative: to put into the possession of intelligence, vid. at Gen. iii. 6. Wisdom in the heart produceth intelligent discourse, and, as the parallel member expresses it, learning mounteth up to the lips, i.e. the learning which the man taketh into his lips (xxii. 18; cf. Ps. xvi. 4) to communicate it to others, for the contents of the learning, and the ability to communicate it, are measured by the wisdom of the heart of him who possesses it. One can also interpret הוסיף as extens. increasing: the heart of the wise increaseth, i.e. spreads abroad learning, but then בְּשִׁפְתָיו (Ps. cxix. 13) would have been more suitable; על־שִׁפְתָיו calls up the idea of learning as hovering on the lips, and thus brings so much nearer, for הוסיף, the meaning of the exaltation of its worth and impression.

Ver. 24 A honeycomb are pleasant words,
Sweet to the soul, and healing to the bones.

Honeycomb, i.e. honey flowing from the צֶמֶת, the comb or cell (favus), is otherwise designated, Ps. xix. 11. מְרוֹק, with מְרַפָּא (vid. p. 132), is neut. אִמְרֵי־לֵעָם are, according to xv. 26, words which love suggests, and which breathe love. Such words are sweet to the soul of the hearer, and bring strength and healing to his bones (xv. 30); for מְרַפָּא is not only that which restores soundness, but also that which preserves and advances it (cf. θεραπεία, Rev. xxii. 2).

A group of six proverbs follows, four of which begin with אִישׁ, and five relate to the utterances of the mouth.

Ver. 25 There is a way which appears as right to a man;
But the end thereof are the ways of death.

This verse = xiv. 12.

Ver. 26 The hunger of the labourer laboreth for him,
For he is urged on by his mouth.

The Syr. translates: the soul of him who inflicts woe itself suffers it, and from his mouth destruction comes to him; the Targ. brings this translation nearer the original text (בִּיפּוֹא, humiliation, instead of אֲבָרָנָא, destruction); Luther translates thus also, violently abbreviating, however. But עָמַל (from עָמַל, Arab. 'amila, to exert oneself, laborare) means, like laboriosus, labouring as well as enduring difficulty, but not, as πονών τινα, causing difficulty, or (Euchel) occupied with difficulty. And labour and the mouth stand together, denoting that man labours that the mouth may have somewhat to eat (cf. 2 Thess. iii. 10; שֵׁפֶט, however, gains in this connection the meaning of ψυχῆ ὀρεκτικῆ, and that of desire after nourishment, vid. at vi. 30, x. 3). אִמְרָא also joins itself to this circle of ideas, for it means to urge (Jerome, compulit), properly (related to  $\text{קָפַף}$ , incurvare,  $\text{כָּפַף}$   $\text{כָּפַף}$ , to constrain, necessitate), to bow down by means of a burden. The Aramæo-Arab. signification, to saddle (Schultens: clitellas imposuit ei os suum), is a secondary denom. (vid. at Job xxxiii. 7). The Venet. well renders it after Kimchi:  $\epsilon\pi\epsilon\iota$   $\kappa\upsilon\pi\tau\epsilon\iota$   $\epsilon\pi'$   $\alpha\upsilon\tau\omicron\nu$   $\tau\omicron$   $\sigma\tau\omicron\mu\alpha$   $\alpha\upsilon\tau\omicron\upsilon$ . Thus: the need of nourishment on the part of the labourer works for him (dat. commodi like Isa. xl. 20), i.e. helps him to labour, for (not: if,  $\epsilon\acute{\alpha}\nu$ , as Rashi and others) it presses upon him; his mouth, which will have something to eat, urges him. It is God who has in this way connected together working and eating. The curse in sudore vultus tui comedes panem conceals a blessing. The proverb has in view this reverse side of the blessing in the arrangement of God.

Ver. 27 A worthless man diggeth evil;

And on his lips is, as it were, scorching fire.

Regarding  $\text{בִּלְעֵל}$   $\text{אֵשׁ}$ , vid. vi. 12, and regarding  $\text{בָּרַח$ , to dig round, or to bore out, vid. at Gen. xlix. 5, l. 5; here the figure, "to dig for others a pit," xxvi. 27, Ps. vii. 16, etc.: to dig evil is equivalent to, to seek to prepare such for others.  $\text{צָרַחַת}$  Kimchi rightly explains as a form similar to  $\text{לְשׁוֹבַת}$ ; as a subst. it means, Lev. xiii. 23, the mark of fire (the healed mark of a carbuncle), here as an adj. of a fire, although not flaming ( $\text{אֵשׁ לְהִבָּה}$ ), Isa. iv. 5, etc); yet so much the hotter, and scorching everything that comes near to it (from  $\text{צָרַח}$ , to be scorched, cogn.  $\text{שָׂרַח}$ , to which also  $\text{שָׂרַף}$  is perhaps related as a stronger power, like comburere to adurere). The meaning is clear: a worthless man, i.e. a man whose disposition and conduct are the direct contrast of usefulness and piety, uses words which, like an iron glowing hot, scorches and burns; his tongue is  $\text{\phi\lambda\omicron\gamma\iota\zeta\omicron\mu\acute{\epsilon}\nu\eta}$   $\text{\upsilon\pi\omicron$   $\text{\tau\eta\varsigma}$   $\text{\gamma\acute{\epsilon}\epsilon\nu\nu\eta\varsigma}$  (Jas. iii. 6).

Ver. 28 A man of falsehood scattereth strife,

And a backbiter separateth confidential friends.

Regarding  $\text{תְּהַפְּכוֹת}$  ( $\text{מַדְבָּר}$ )  $\text{אֵישׁ}$ , vid. ii. 12, and regarding  $\text{שִׁלְחָה$   $\text{מָדוֹן}$ , vi. 14; the thought of 28b is found at vi. 19.  $\text{נִרְפָּן}$  (with † minusculum, which occurs thrice with the terminal Nun) is a Niphal formation from  $\text{רָפַן}$ , to murmur (cf.  $\text{נִזְיִר}$ , from  $\text{זָיַר}$ ), and denotes the whisperer, viz. the backbiter,  $\text{\psi\iota\theta\rho\upsilon\pi\omicron\varsigma}$ , Sir. v. 14,  $\text{\psi\iota\theta\rho\iota\sigma\tau\eta\varsigma}$ , susurro; the Arab. nyrj is abbreviated from it, a verbal stem of  $\text{נִרַן}$  (cf. Aram. noirgo, an axe, Arab. naurag, a threshing-sledge =  $\text{מֹרַג}$ ) cannot be proved. Aquila is right in translating by  $\text{\tau\omicron\upsilon\theta\rho\upsilon\sigma\tau\eta\varsigma}$ , and Theodotion by  $\text{\gamma\omicron\gamma\gamma\iota\sigma\omicron\varsigma}$ , from  $\text{רָפַן}$ , Niphal.  $\text{נִרְפָּן}$ ,  $\text{\gamma\omicron\gamma\gamma\acute{\upsilon}\zeta\epsilon\upsilon}$ . Regarding רֵעֵי אֱלֵנָּה, confidential friend, vid. p. 82; the sing., as xviii. 9, is used in view of the mutual relationship, and פִּרְיֵי פְּרִירֵי proceeds on the separation of the one, and, at the same time, of the other from it. Luther, in translating by "a slanderer makes princes disagree," is in error, for רֵעֵי אֱלֵנָּה, φύλαρχος, is not a generic word for prince.

Ver. 29 A man of violence enticeth his neighbour,
And leadeth him in a way which is not good.

Cf. Gen. iv. 8. The subject is not moral enticement, but enticement to some place or situation which facilitates to the violent man the carrying out of his violent purpose (misdemeanour, robbery, extortion, murder). מִסָּהָ (here with שֵׁנָּה at iii. 31) is the injustice of club-law, the conduct of him who puts his superior power in godless rudeness in the place of God, Hab. i. 11, cf. Job xii. 6. "A way not good" (cf. Ps. xxxvi. 5) is the contradictory contrast of the good way: one altogether evil and destructive.

Ver. 30 He who shutteth his eyes to devise falsehood;
He who biteth his lips bringeth evil to pass.

A physiognomical Caveto. The ἀπ. λεγ. הִצְעָה is connected with מִצְעָה, Isa. xxxiii. 15 (Arab. transp. ghamd), comprimere, formed from it. Regarding קָרָה of lips or eyes, vid. p. 144; the biting of the lips is the action of the deceitful, and denotes scorn, malice, knavery. The perf. denotes that he who is seen doing this has some evil as good as accomplished, for he is inwardly ready for it; Hitzig suitably compares 1 Sam. xx. 7, 33. Our editions (also Löwenstein) have בִּלְהֵ, but the Masora (vid. Mas. finalis, p. 1) numbers the word among those which terminate in א, and always writes בִּלְהֵ.

We now take together a series of proverbs, xvi. 31–xvii. 5, beginning with עֲטָרֶתָּה.

Ver. 31 A bright diadem is a hoary head,
In the way of righteousness it is found—namely, this bright diadem, this beautiful crown (iv. 8), which silver hair is to him who has it as the result of his advanced age (xx. 29), for "thou shalt rise up before the hoary head," Lev. xix. 32; and the contrast of an early death is to die in a good old age, Gen. xv. 15, etc., but a long life is on one side a self-consequence, and on another the promised reward of a course of conduct regulated by God's will, God's law, and by the rule of love to God and love to one's neighbour. From the N. T. standpoint that is also so far true, as in all the world there is no better established means of prolonging life than the avoidance of evil; but the clause corresponding to the O. T. standpoint, that evil punishes itself by a premature death, and that good is rewarded by long life, has indeed many exceptions arising from the facts of experience against it, for we see even the godless in their life of sin attaining to an advanced old age, and in view of the veiled future it appears only as a one-sided truth, so that the words, Wisd. iv. 9, "discretion is to man the right grey hairs, and an unstained life is the right old age," which is mediated by life experiences, such as Isa. lvii. 1 f., stand opposed to the above proverb as its reversed side. That old Solomonic proverb is, however, true, for it is not subverted; and, in contrast to self-destroying vice and wickedness; calling forth the judgment of God, it is and remains true, that whoever would reach an honoured old age, attains to it in the way of a righteous life and conduct.

Ver. 32 Better one slow to anger than a hero in war;

And whoever is master of his spirit, than he who taketh a city.

Regarding אָרֶזֶת אִיִּים, vid. xiv. 29, where קִצְרוּתָא was the parallel of the contrast. The comparison is true as regards persons, with reference to the performances expressed, and (since warlike courage and moral self-control may be united in one person) they are properly those in which the טוב determines the moral estimate. In Pirke Aboth iv. 1, the question, "Who is the hero?" is answered by, "he who overcomes his desire," with reference to this proverb, for that which is here said of the ruling over the passion of anger is true of all affections and passions.

"Yet he who reigns within himself, and rules
Passions, desires, and fears, is more a king;
Which every wise and virtuous man attains."<sup>1</sup>

On the other side, the comparison is suggested:

Break your head, not so sore;
Break your will—that is more.<sup>2</sup>

Ver. 33 One casts the lot into the lap;
But all its decision cometh from Jahve.

The Tóra knows only in one instance an ordeal (a judgment of God) as a right means of proof, Num. v. 12–31. The lot is nowhere ordained by it, but its use is supported by a custom running parallel with the Mosaic law; it was used not only in private life, <sup>1</sup> Milton's Paradise Regained, ii. 466–8.

Zerbrich den Willen—das ist mehr."—MATTH. CLAUDIUS.

but also in manifold ways within the domain of public justice, as well as for the detection of the guilty, Josh. vii. 14 f., 1 Sam. xiv. 40–42. So that the proverb xviii. 18 says the same thing of the lot that is said in the Epistle to the Hebrews, vi. 16, of the oath. The above proverb also explains the lot for an ordeal, for it is God who directs and orders it that it fall out thus and not otherwise. A particular sanction of the use of the lot does not lie in this, but it is only said, that where the lot is cast, all the decision that results from it is determined by God. That is in all cases true; but whether the challenging of the divine decision in such a way be right in this or that case is a question, and in no case would one, on the contrary, venture to make the person of the transgressor discoverable by lot, and let it decide regarding human life. But antiquity judged this matter differently, as e.g. the Book of Jonah (chap. i.) shows; it was a practice, animated by faith, in God's government of the world, which, if it did not observe the boundary between faith and superstition, yet stood high above the unbelief of the "Enlightenment." Like the Greek κόλπος, פִּיָּה (from פָּה, Arab. ḥak, khak, to encompass, to stretch out) means, as it is commonly taken, gremium as well as sinus, but the latter meaning is the more sure; and thus also here it is not the lap as the middle of the body, so that one ought to think on him who casts the lot as seated, but also not the lap of the garment, but, like vi. 27, cf. Isa. xl. 11, the swelling, loose, external part of the clothing covering the bosom (the breast), where the lot covered by it is thrown by means of shaking and changing, and whence it is drawn out. The construction of the passive הִטַּל (from הָטַל = Arab. tall, to throw along) with the object. accus. follows the old scheme, Gen. iv. 18, and has its reason in this, that the Semitic passive, formed by the change of vowels, has not wholly given up the governing force of the active. הִטַּל signifies here decision as by the Urim and Thummim, Num. xxvii. 21, but which was no lot-apparatus.

xvii. 1. A comparative proverb with טוֹב, pairing with xvi. 32 :

Better a dry piece of bread, and quietness therewith,
Than a house full of slain beasts with unquietness.

Similar to this in form and contents are xv. 16 f. and xvi. 8. פַּת הַרְרִיבָה is a piece of bread (פַּת, fem., as xxiii. 8) without savoury drink (Theodotion, καθ' ἑαυτόν, i.e. nothing with it), cf. Lev. vii. 10, a meat-offering without the pouring out of oil. זְבָחִים are not sacrificial gifts (Hitziḡ), but, as always, slain animals, i.e. either offerings or banquets of slain beasts; it is the old name of the שלמים (cf. Ex. xviii. 12, xxiv. 5; Prov. vii. 14), part of which only were offered on the altar, and part presented as a banquet; and זָבַח (in contradist. to מִזְבֵּחַ, ix. 2, Gen. xliii. 16) denotes generally any kind of consecrated festival in connection with the worship of God, 1 Sam. xx. 29; cf. Gen. xxxi. 54. "Festivals of hatred" are festivals with hatred. מִלֵּא is part. with object.-accus.; in general מִלֵּא forms a constructive, מִלֵּא occurs only once (Jer. vi. 11), and מִלֵּא not at all. We have already, vii. 14, remarked on the degenerating of the shelamim feasts; from this proverb it is to be concluded that the merriment and the excitement bordering on intoxication (cf. with Hitzig, 1 Sam. i. 13 and 3), such as frequently at the Kirmsen merry-makings (vid. p. 164), brought quarrels and strife, so that the poor who ate his dry bread in quiet peace could look on all this noise and tumult without envy.

Ver. 2 A prudent servant shall rule over the degenerate son ;

And he divides the inheritance among the brethren.

Regarding the contrasts of מִשְׁכִּיל and מְרִישׁ, vid. at x. 5, xiv. 35. The printed editions present בְּבֶן־מְרִישׁ in genit. connection: a son of the scandalous class, which is admissible (vid. p. 79 and p. 330); but Cod. 1294 and Cod. Jaman,<sup>1</sup> Erf. No. 2, 3, write בְּבֶן־מְרִישׁ (with Tsere and Munach), and that is perhaps right, after x. 5, xvii. 25. The futures have here also a fut. signification: they say to what it will come. Grotius remarks, with reference to this: manumissus tutor filiis relinquetur; יחלק tutorio officio. But if he is a conscientious, unselfish tutor, he will not enrich himself by property which belongs to another; and thus, though not without provision, he is yet without an inheritance. And yet the supplanting of the degenerate is brought about by this, that he loses his inheritance, and the intelligent servant steps into his place. Has one then to suppose that the master of the house makes his servant a co-heir with his own children, and at the same time names him as his executor? That were a bad anachronism. The idea of the διαθήκη was, at the time when this proverb was coined, one unknown—Israelitish antiquity knows only the intestate right of inheritance, regulated by lineal and gradual succession. Then, if one thinks of the degenerate son, that he is disowned by the father, but that the intelligent servant is not rewarded during the life of his master for his true services, and that, after the death of the master, to such a degree he possesses the esteem and confidence of the family, that he it is who divides the inheritance among the brethren, i.e. occupies the place amongst them of distributor of the inheritance, not: takes a portion of the inheritance, for  $\text{חָלַק}$  has not the double meaning of the Lat. participare; it means to divide, and may, with  $\text{אָ}$ , mean "to give a part of anything" (Job xxxix. 17); but, with the accus., nothing else than to distribute, e.g. Josh. xviii. 2, where it is to be translated: "whose inheritance had not yet been distributed (not yet given to them)." Jerome, hæreditatem dividet; and thus all translators, from the LXX. to Luther.

Ver. 3 The fining-pot for silver, and the furnace for gold;
And a trier of hearts is Jahve.

An emblematical proverb (vid. p. 9), which means that Jahve is for the heart what the smelting-pot (from  $\text{צָרַף}$ , to change, particularly to melt, to refine) is for silver, and what the smelting furnace ( $\text{בּוּר}$ , from  $\text{בּוּר}$ , R. בר, to round, Ex. xxii. 20) is for gold, that Jahve is for the heart, viz. a trier ( $\text{בַּחוּן}$ , to grind, to try by grinding, here as at Ps. vii. 10) of their nature and their contents, for which, of the proof of metals, is elsewhere (xvi. 2, xxi. 2, xxiv. 12) used the word (cf.  $\text{בַּחוּן}$ , the essay-master, Jer. vi. 7)  $\text{חֲכִינוּ}$ , weigher, or  $\text{דּוֹרֵשׁ}$ , searcher (1 Chron. xxviii. 9). Wherever the subject spoken of is God, the searcher of hearts, the plur.  $\text{לְבָבוֹת}$ , once  $\text{לְבָבוֹת}$ , is used; the form  $\text{לְבָבִים}$  occurs only in the status conjunctus with the suffix. In xxvii. 21 there follow the two figures, with which there is formed a priamel (vid. p. 13), as at xxvi. 3, another tertium comparationis.

Ver. 4 A profligate person giveth heed to perverse lips;
Falsehood listeneth to a destructive tongue.

The meaning, at all events, is, that whoever gives ear with delight to words which are morally reprobate, and aimed at the destruction of neighbours, thereby characterizes himself as a profligate. Though  $\text{מִרְעַ$  is probably not pred. but subj., yet so that what follows does not describe the  $\text{מִרְעַ$  (the profligate hearkens . . .), but stamps him who does this as a  $\text{מִרְעַ$  (a profligate, or, as we say: only a profligate . . .).  $\text{מִרְעַ$ , for  $\text{מִרְעַ$ , is warranted by Isa. ix. 16, where  $\text{מִרְעַ$  (not  $\text{מִרְעַ$ , according to which the Venet. here translates  $\text{ἀπὸ κακοῦ}$ ) is testified to not only by correct codd. and editions, but also by the Masora (cf. Michlol 116b).  $\text{הִקְשִׁיב}$  (from  $\text{קָשַׁב}$ , R. קש, to stiffen, or, as we say, to prick, viz. the ear) is generally united with  $\text{לְ}$ or אָ, but, as here and at xxix. 12, Jer. vi. 19, also with עַל. אָן, wickedness, is the absolute contrast of a pious and philanthropic mind; הָיִת, from הָיָה, not in the sense of eagerness, as x. 3, xi. 6, but of yawning depth, abyss, catastrophe (vid. at Ps. v. 10), is equivalent to entire destruction—the two genitives denote the property of the lips and the tongue (labium nequam, lingua perniciososa), on the side of that which it instrumentally aims at (cf. Ps. xxxvi. 4, lii. 4): practising mischief, destructive plans. שָׁקֵר beginning the second line is generally regarded as the subj. parallel with מַרְע, as Luther, after Jerome, “A wicked man gives heed to wicked mouths, and a false man listens willingly to scandalous tongues.” It is possible that שָׁקֵר denotes incarnate falsehood, as רַמְיָה, xii. 27, incarnate slothfulness, cf. מַרְמָה, xiv. 25, and perhaps also xii. 17; צָרָק, Ps. lviii. 2, תַּרְשִׁיבָה, Mic. vi. 9; יָצַר סַמָּוָה, Isa. xxvi. 13, etc., where, without supplying אִישׁ (אֲנִישׁ), the property stands instead of the person possessing that property. The clause, that falsehood listeneth to a deceitful tongue, means that he who listens to it characterizes himself thereby, according to the proverb, simile simili gaudet, as a liar. But only as a liar? The punctuation before us, which represents מַרְע by Dechi as subj., or also pred., takes שָׁקֵר מִיִּזֵּן as obj. with מִיִּזֵּן as its governing word, and why should not that be the view intended? The representation of the obj. is an inversion less bold than Isa. xxii. 2, viii. 22, and that עַל here should not be so closely connected with the verb of hearing, as 4a lies near by this, that עַל הַקְּשִׁיב is elsewhere found, but not עַל הַיִּזְוֵן. Jewish interpreters, taking שָׁקֵר as obj., try some other meaning of מִיִּזֵּן than auscultans; but neither וָן, to approach, nor וָן, to arm (Venet. ψεύδος ὀπλιζει), gives a meaning suitable to this place. מִיִּזֵּן is equivalent to מִיִּזְוֵן. As מִיִּזְוֵן, Job xxxii. 11, is contracted into מִיִּזֵּן, so must מִיִּזְוֵן, if the character of the part. shall be preserved, become מִיִּזֵּן, mediated by מִיִּזְוֵן.

Ver. 5 He that mocketh the poor reproacheth his Maker ;

He that rejoiceth over calamity remains not unpunished.

Line first is a variation of xiv. 31a. God is, according to xxii. 2, the creator of the poor as well as of the rich. The poor, as a man, and as poor, is the work of God, the creator and governor of all things; thus, he who mocketh the poor, mocketh Him who called him into existence, and appointed him his lowly place. But in general, compassion and pity, and not joy (שְׂמֵחָה), commonly with  $\zeta$ , of the person, e.g. Obad. ver. 12, the usual formula for ἐπιχαιρεκακία), is appropriate in the presence of misfortune ( $\tau\kappa$ , from  $\tau\alpha\tau$ , to be heavily burdened), for such joy, even if he on whom the misfortune fell were our enemy, is a peccatum mortale, Job xxxi. 29 f. There is indeed a hallowed joy at the actual revelation in history of the divine righteousness; but this would not be a hallowed joy if it were not united with deep sorrow over those who, accessible to no warning, have despised grace, and, by adding sin to sin, have provoked God's anger.

Ver. 6. With this verse this series of proverbs closes as it began :

A diadem of the old are children's children,
And the glory of children are their parents.

Children are a blessing from God (Ps. cxxvii., cxxviii.); thus, a family circle consisting of children and grandchildren (including great-grandchildren) is as a crown of glory surrounding the grey-haired patriarch; and again, children have glory and honour in their parents, for to have a man of an honoured name, or of a blessed memory, as a father, is the most effective commendation, and has for the son, even though he is unlike his father, always important and beneficial consequences. In 6*b* a fact of experience is expressed, from which has proceeded the rank of inherited nobility recognised among men—one may abnegate his social rights, but yet he himself is and remains a part of the moral order of the world. The LXX. has a distich after ver. 4 [the Vatican text places it after ver. 6]: "The whole world of wealth belongs to the faithful, but to the unfaithful not even an obolus." Lagarde supposes that ὁλος ὁ κόσμος τῶν χρημάτων is a translation of  $\text{יְהִי שְׂפָתַי יְהִי}$ , instead of  $\text{יְהִי שְׂפָתַי יְהִי}$ , 7*a*. But this ingenious conjecture does not amount to the regarding of this distich as a variation of ver. 7.

The proverbs following, 7–10, appear to be united acrostically by the succession of the letters  $\psi$  ( $\psi$ ,  $\psi$ ) and  $\eta$ .

Ver. 7 It does not become a fool to speak loftily,
How much less do lying lips a noble!

As at Isa. xxxii. 5 f.,  $\text{נָבֵל}$  and  $\text{נָדִיב}$  are placed opposite to one another; the latter is the nobly magnanimous man, the former the man who thinks foolishly and acts profligately, whom it does not become to use lofty words, who thereby makes the impression of his vulgarity so much the more repulsive (cf. Job ii. 10).  $\text{שְׂפָתַי יְהִי}$  (not  $\text{יְהִי שְׂפָתַי}$ , for the word belongs to those which retain their Pathach or Segol, in pausa) is neither elevated (soaring) (Ewald) nor diffuse (Jo. Ernst Jungius in Oetinger: lingua dicax ac sermonem ultra quam decorum verbis extendere solita), rather imperative (Bertheau), better presumptuous (Hitzig) words, properly words of superfluity, i.e. of superabundant self-consciousness and high pretension (cf. the transitive bearing of the Arab. watr with ὑβρίξειν, from ὑπέρ, Aryan upar, Job, p. 363). Rightly Meîri, שפת נאווה ושררה. It produces a disagreeable impression, when a man of vulgar mind and of rude conduct, instead of keeping himself in retirement, makes himself of importance, and weighty in a shameless, impudent manner (cf. Ps. xii. 9, where וְלִמְתָּה, vilitas, in a moral sense); but yet more repulsive is the contrast, when a man in whom one is justified in expecting nobility of mind, in accordance with his life-position and calling, degrades himself by uttering deceitful words. Regarding the אָף בִּי, concluding a minori ad majus, we have already spoken at xi. 31, xv. 11. R. Ismael, in Bereschith Rabba, at xliv. 8, reckons ten such conclusions a minori ad majus in the Scriptures, but there are just as many quanto magis. The right accentuation (e.g. in Cod. 1294) is here אָף כִּי־לִנְדִיב, transformed from אָף כִּי־לִנְדִיב, according to Accentuationssystem, xviii. 2.

Ver. 8 The gift of bribery appears a jewel to its receiver ;
Whitherso'er he turneth himself he acteth prudently.

How 8b is to be understood is shown by 1 Sam. xiv. 47, cf. Josh. i. 7; the quoque se vertit, prudenter rem agit, has accordingly in both sentences the person meant by בְּעֵינָי as subject, not the gift (Hitzig), of which אֲשֶׁר־בִּי, "it maketh prosperous," is not said, for אֲשֶׁר־בִּי means, used only of persons, prudent, and therefore successful, fortunate conduct. Such is said of him who has to give (Luther): he presses through with it whithersoever he turns. But the making of בְּעֵינָי the subj. does not accord with this: this means [gift] to one who has to give, appears to open doors and hearts, not merely as a golden key, it is truly such to him. Thus בעליו, as at iii. 27, will be meant of him to whom the present is brought, or to whom a claim thereto is given. But שָׂחָד means here not the gift of seasonable liberality (Zöckler), but, as always, the gift of bribery, i.e. a gift by which one seeks to purchase for himself (xvii. 23) preference on the part of a judge, or to mitigate the displeasure of a high lord (xxi. 14); here (for one does not let it depend merely on the faithfulness of another to his duty) it is that by which one seeks to secure an advantage to himself. The proverb expresses a fact of experience. The gift of bribery, to which, as to a well-known approved means,  $\text{רָחֵם}$  refers, appears to him who receives and accepts it (Targ.) as a stone of pleasantness, a charming, precious stone, a jewel (Juwel from joie = gaudium); it determines and impels him to apply all his understanding, in order that he may reach the goal for which it shall be his reward. What he at first regarded as difficult, yea, impossible, that he now prudently carries out, and brings to a successful conclusion, wherever he turns himself, overcoming the seemingly insurmountable hindrances; for the enticement of the gift lifts him, as with a charm, above himself, for covetousness is a characteristic feature of human nature—pecunia obediunt omnia (Eccles. x. 19, Vulg.).

Ver. 9 He covereth transgressions who seeketh after love,

And he who always brings back a matter separateth friends.

The pred. stands first in the simple clause with the order of the words not inverted. That  $\text{מַכְסֵּה מִשְׁעַר}$  is also to be interpreted here as pred. (cf. 19a) is shown by x. 12, according to which love covereth all transgressions. We write  $\text{מַכְסֵּה מִשְׁעַר}$  with Dag. forte conjunctivum of  $\text{כֹּסֵה}$  (as of  $\text{כֹּסֵה}$  in Ezek. xviii. 6), and Gaja with the Sheva, according to the Meth.-Setzung, § 37; the punctuation  $\text{מַכְסֵּה מִשְׁעַר}$  also occurs. What the expression "to seek love" here means, is to be judged, with Hitzig, after Zeph. ii. 3, 1 Cor. xiv. 1. It is in no case equivalent to seek to gain the love of another, rather to seek to preserve the love of men towards one another, but it is to be understood not after 9b, but after x. 12: he seeks to prove love who does not strike on the great bell when his neighbour has sinned however grievously against him, does not in a scandal-loving manner make much ado about it, and takes care not thereby to widen the breach between men who stand near to one another, but endeavours by a reconciling, soothing, rectifying influence, to mitigate the evil, instead of making it worse. He, on the contrary, who repeats the matter ( $\text{שָׁנָה}$  with  $\text{כֹּסֵה}$  of the obj., to come back with something, as xxvi. 11), i.e. turns always back again to the unpleasant occurrence (Theodotion, δευτερῶν ἐν λόγῳ; Symmachus, δευτερῶν λόγον, as Sir. vii. 14, xix. 7), divides friends (vid. xvi. 28), for he purposely fosters the strife, the disharmony, ill-will, and estrangement which the offence produced; while the noble man, who has love for his motive and his aim, by prudent silence contributes to bring the offence and the division which it occasioned into forgetfulness.

Ver. 10 One reproof maketh more impression on a wise man
Than if one reckoned a hundred to the fool

One of the few proverbs which begin with a future, vid. xii. 26, p. 265. It expresses what influence there is in one reproof with a wise man (מִבֵּן, viii. 9); נִעְרָה is the reproof expressed by the post-bibl. נִיפְסָה, as the lowest grade of disciplinary punishment, admonitio, connected with warning. The verbal form חָחַח is the reading of the LXX. and Syr. (συντρίβει ἀπειλή καρδίαν φρονίμου) for they read חָחַח נְעָרָה לֵב מִבֵּן, derived from חָחַח, and thus חָחַח (from Hiph. חָחַח); thus Luther: reproof alarms more the intelligent, but חָחַח with ב of the obj. is not Hebr.; on the contrary, the reading of the LXX. is in accordance with the usage of the language, and, besides, is suitable. It is, however, first to be seen whether the traditional text stands in need of this correction. As fut. Niph. חָחַח, apart from the ult. accent, to be expected, gives no meaning. Also if one derives it from חָחַח, to snatch away, to take away, it gives no appropriate thought; besides, חָחַח is construed with the object. accus., and the fut. Apoc., in itself strange here, must be pointed either חָחַח or חָחַח (after יָחַח) (Böttcher, Lehrb. ii. p. 413). Thus יָחַח, as at Job xxi. 13, Jer. xxi. 13, will be fut. Kal of יָחַח = יָחַח, Ps. xxxviii. 3 (Theodotion, Targ., Kimchi). With this derivation, also, יָחַח is to be expected; the reference in the Handwörterbuch to Gesen. Lehrgebäude, § 51, 1, Anm. 1, where, in an extremely inadequate way, the retrogression of the tone (נָסוּחַ אַחֲרָה) is spoken of, is altogether inappropriate to this place; and Böttcher's explanation of the ult. tone from an intended expressiveness is ungrammatical; but why should not יָחַח, from חָחַח, with its first syllable originating from contraction, and thus having the tone, be Milel as well as Milra, especially here, where it stands at the head of the sentence? With ב connected with it, חָחַח means: to descend into anything, to penetrate; Hitzig appropriately compares altius in pectus descendit of Sallust, Jug. 11. Jerome rightly, according to the sense: plus proficit, and the Venet. ἀνεῖ (read ὄνεῖ) ἀπειλή τῷ συνίοντι. In 10b מִבֵּן (cf. Deut. xxv. 3; 2 Cor. xi. 24) is to be supplied to מִבֵּן, not מִבֵּן (an hundred times, which may be denoted correctly by מִבֵּן as well as מִבֵּן, Eccles. viii. 12). With the wise (says a Talmudic proverb) a sign does as much as with the fool a stick does. Zehner, in his Adagia sacra (1601), cites Curtius (vii. 4): Nobilis equus umbra quoque virgæ regitur, ignavus ne calcari quidem concitari potest.

Five proverbs of dangerous men against whom one has to be on his guard :

Ver. 11 The rebellious seeketh only after evil,
And a cruel messenger is sent out against him.

It is a question what is subj. and what obj. in 11a. It lies nearest to look on מְרִי as subj., and this word (from מָרָה, stringere, to make oneself exacting against any, to oppose, ἀντιτελεω) is appropriate thereto; it occurs also at Ezek. ii. 7 as abstr. pro concreto. That it is truly subj. appears from this, that בִּקֵּשׁ רָע, to seek after evil (cf. xxix. 10; 1 Kings xx. 7, etc.), is a connection of idea much more natural than בִּקֵּשׁ מְרִי [to seek after rebellion]. Thus אֵף will be logically connected with רָע, and the reading אֵף מְרִי will be preferred to the reading אֵף־מְרִי; אֵף (corresponding to the Arab. ainnama) belongs to those particles which are placed before the clause, without referring to the immediately following part of the sentence, for they are much more regarded as affecting the whole sentence (vid. xiii. 10): the rebellious strives after nothing but only evil. Thus, as neut. obj. רָע is rendered by the Syr., Targ., Venet., and Luther; on the contrary, the older Greek translators and Jerome regard רָע as the personal subject. If now, in reference to rebellion, the discourse is of a מְלַאֲךְ אֲכֹזֵרִי, we are not, with Hitzig, to think of the demon of wild passions unfettered in the person of the rebellious, for that is a style of thought and of expression that is modern, not biblical; but the old unpoetic yet simply true remark remains: Loquendi formula inde petita quod regis aut summi magistratus minister rebelli supplicium nunciat infligitque. מְלַאֲךְ is n. officii, not naturæ. Man as a messenger, and the spiritual being as messenger, are both called מְלַאֲךְ. Therefore one may not understand מְלַאֲךְ אֲכֹזֵרִי, with the LXX., Jerome, and Luther, directly and exclusively of an angel of punishment. If one thinks of Jahve as the Person against whom the rebellion is made, then the idea of a heavenly messenger lies near, according to Ps. xxxv. 5 f., lxxviii. 49; but the proverb is so meant, that it is not the less true if an earthly king sends out against a rebellious multitude a messenger with an unlimited commission, or an officer against a single man dangerous to the state, with strict directions to arrest him at all hazards. אֲכֹזֵרִי we had already at xii. 10; the root קָשׁ חָשׁ means, to be dry, hard, without feeling. The fut. does not denote what may be done (Bertheau, Zöckler), which is contrary to the parallelism, the order of the words, and the style of the proverb, but what is done. And the relation of the clause is not, as Ewald interprets it, "scarcely does the sedition seek out evil when an inexorable messenger is sent." Although this explanation is held by Ewald as "unimprovable," yet it is incorrect, because פָּא in this sense demands, e.g. Gen. xxvii. 3, the perf. (strengthened by the infin. intensivus). The relation of the clause is, also, not such as Böttcher has interpreted it: a wicked man tries only scorn though a stern messenger is sent against him, but not because such a messenger is called אִכְזָרִי, against whom this "trying of scorn" helps nothing, so that it is not worth being spoken of; besides, חָשָׁה or חָשְׁתָּה would have been used if this relation had been intended. We have in 11a and 11b, as also e.g. at xxvi. 24, xxviii. 1, two clauses standing in internal reciprocal relation, but syntactically simply co-ordinated; the force lies in this, that a messenger who recognises no mitigating circumstances, and offers no pardon, is sent out against such an one.

Ver. 12 Meet a bear robbed of one of her whelps,
Only not a fool in his folly.

The name of the bear, as that of the cow, Job xxi. 10, Ps. cxliv. 14, preserves its masculine form, even when used in reference to sexual relationship (Ewald, § 174b); the ursa catulis orbata is proverbially a raging beast. How the abstract expression of the action פָּגַעַת [to meet], here as e.g. Ps. xvii. 5, with the subj. following, must sound as finite (occurrat, may always meet), follows from פָּגַעַת = פָּגַעַת = פָּגַעַת (non autem occurrat). פָּגַעַת has on the last syllable Mehuppach, and Zin-norith on the preceding open syllable (according to the rule, Accent-system, vi. § 5d).<sup>1</sup> בְּאַהֲלָתוֹ, in the state of his folly, i.e. when he is in a paroxysm of his anger, corresponds with the conditional noun-adjective שֶׁבִּלְפָנָיו, for folly morbidly heightened is madness (cf. Hos. xi. 7; Psychol. p. 291 f.).

Ver. 13 He that returneth evil for good,
From his house evil shall not depart.

If ingratitude appertains to the sinful manifestations of ignoble selfishness, how much more sinful still is black ingratitude, which recompenses evil for good! (לְשׂוֹיָהוּ, as 1 Sam. xxv. 21, syn. לְמַלְּ, to requite, iii. 30, xxxi. 12; שְׁלַם, to reimburse, xx. 22). Instead of תַּמִּישׁ, the Keri reads תַּמִּישׁ; but that this verb, with a middle vowel, may be 'y as well as 'y, Ps. lv. 2 shows.

<sup>1</sup> In the Torath Emeth, p. 18, the word is irregularly represented as Milel—a closed syllable with Cholem can suffer no retrogression of the tone.

Ver. 14 As one letteth out water is the beginning of a strife;
But cease thou from such strife ere it comes to showing teeth.

The meaning of this verb פָּטַר is certain: it means to break forth; and transitively, like Arab. fatr, to bring forth from a cleft, to make to break forth, to let go free (Theodotion, ἀπολύων; Jerome, dimittit; Venet. ἀφαιείς). The LXX., since it translates by ἐξουσίαν δίδωσι, thinks on the juristic signification, which occurs in the Chronicles: to make free, or to declare so; but here פּוֹטֵר מַיִם (vid. regarding the Metheg at xiv. 31, p. 311) is, as Luther translates, one who tears away the dam from the waters. And ראשית סדון is not accus. dependent on פּוֹטֵר, to be supplied (Hitzig: he unfetters water who the beginning of strife, viz. unfetters); but the part is used as at x. 17: one who unfetters the water is the beginning of strife, i.e. he is thus related to it as when one . . . This is an addition to the free use of the part. in the language of the Mishna, where one would expect the infin., e.g. בְּזוֹרֵעַ (= בְּזָרַעַ), if one sows, בְּמַזְיִיר (= בְּזָרוֹף), of wantonness. It is thus unnecessary, with Ewald, to interpret פּוֹטֵר as neut., which lets water go = a water-outbreak; פּוֹטֵר is meant personally; it represents one who breaks through a water-dam, withdraws the restraint of the water, opens a sluice, and then emblematically the proverb says: thus conditioned is the beginning of a strife. Then follows the warning to let go such strife (הִרְיִב, with the article used in the more elevated style, not without emphasis), to break from it, to separate it from oneself ere it reach a dangerous height. This is expressed by לִפְנֵי הִתְבַּלֵּעַ, a verb occurring only here and at xviii. 1, xx. 3, always in the Hithpa. The Targum (misunderstood by Gesenius after Buxtorf; vid. to the contrary, Levy, under the word צַרִי II.) translates it at xviii. 1, xx. 3, as the Syr., by “to mock,” also Aquila, who has at xx. 3, ἐξυβρισθήσεται, and the LXX. at xviii. 1, ἐπὶ νεκροῦ εἶσθαι, and Jerome, who has this in all the three passages, render the Hithpa. in this sense, passively. In this passage before us, the Targ., as Hitzig gives it, translates, “before it heats itself,” but that is an error occasioned by Buxtorf; vid. on the contrary, Levy, under the word קָרָא (κύριος); this translation, however, has a representative in Haja Gaon, who appeals for גָּלַע, to glow, to Nidda viii. 2.<sup>1</sup> Elsewhere the LXX., at xx. 3, συμπαλέσεται (where Jerome, with the amalgamation of the two significations, miscentur contumelios); Kimchi and others gloss it by הִתְעַרַב, and, according to this, the Venet. translates, πρὸ τοῦ

συναμύχθῃναι (τῶν ἔρων); Luther, "before thou art mingled therein." But all these explanations of the word: insultare, excandescere, and commisceri, are etymologically inadmissible. Bertheau's and Zöckler's "roll itself forth" is connected at least with a meaning rightly belonging to the R. גל. But the Arab. shows, that not the meaning volvere, but that of retegere is to be adopted. Aruch<sup>1</sup> for Nidda viii. 2 refers to the Arab., where a wound is designated as כּוּלָּה לְהַנְלֵעַ וְלִהְיוֹת דָּם, i.e. as breaking up, as it were, when the crust of that which is nearly healed is broken off (Maimuni glosses the word by לְהַחֲקֵף, were uncrusted), and blood again comes forth. The meaning retegere requires here, however, another distinction. The explanation mentioned there by Aruch: before the strife becomes public to thee, i.e. approaches thee, is not sufficient. The verbal stem נלע is the stronger power of גלה, and means laying bare; but here, not as there, in the Mishna of a wound covered with a crust. The Arab. jal' means to quarrel with another, properly to show him the teeth, the Poël or the tendency-stem from jal'a, to have the mouth standing open, so that one shows his teeth; and the Syr. glas, with its offshoots and derivatives, has also this meaning of ringi, opening the mouth to show, i.e. to make bare the teeth. Schultens has established this explanation of the words, and Gesenius further establishes it in the Thesaurus, according to which Fleischer also remarks, "נלע, of showing the teeth, the exposing of the teeth by the wide opening of the mouth, as happens in bitter quarrels." But הָרִיב does not agree with this. Hitzig's translation, "before the strife shows its teeth," is as modern as in ver. 11 is the passion of the unfettered demon, and Fleischer's prius vero quam exacerbetur rixa renders the Hithpa. in a sense unnecessarily generalized for xviii. 1 and xx. 3. The accentuation, which separates להחניע from הָרִיב by Rebia Mugrash, is correct. One may translate, as Schultens, antequam dentes stringantur, or, since the Hithpa. has sometimes a reciprocal signification, e.g. Gen. xlii. 1, Ps. xli. 8: ere one reciprocally shows his teeth. Hitzig unjustly takes exception to the inversion הָרִיב נָטַשׁ. Why should not the object precede, as at Hos. xii. 15, the נָטַשׁ, placed with emphasis at the end? The same inversion for a like reason occurs at Eccles. v. 6.

<sup>1</sup> [Vid. p. 109, nota.]

Ver. 15 He that acquitteth the guilty and condemneth the righteous—
An abomination to Jahve are they both.

The proverb is against the partisan judge who is open to bribery, like xxiv. 24, cf. Isa. v. 23, where, with reference to such, the announcement of punishment is emphatically made. שָׁרֵף and פְּרָצִי, in a forensic sense, are equivalent to sons (reus) and insons. בַּי (cf. the Arab. jmy'na, altogether, but particularly the Pers. ham and the Turkish dkhy standing wholly thus in the numeral) is here, as at Gen. xxvii. 45, equivalent to יְדוּיָיו, Jer. xlvi. 12 (in its unions = united). Whoever pronounces sentence of justification on the guilty, appears as if he must be judged more mildly than he who condemns the guiltless, but both the one and the other alike are an abhorrence to God.

We take vers. 16-21 together. This group begins with a proverb of the heartless, and ends with one of the perverse-hearted; and between these there are not wanting noticeable points of contact between the proverbs that follow one another.

Ver. 16 Why the ready money in the hand of the fool;
To get wisdom when he has yet no heart?

The question is made pointed by מָה, thus not: why the ready money when . . . ? Is it to obtain wisdom?—the whole is but one question, the reason of which is founded in לֵב אֵין (thus to be accented with Mugrash going before).<sup>1</sup> The fool, perhaps, even makes some endeavours, for he goes to the school of the wise, to follow out their admonitions, קִנְיֵה חֲכָמָה (iv. 5, etc.), and it costs him something (iv. 7), but all to no purpose, for he has no heart. By this it is not meant that knowledge, for which he pays his honorarium, remains, it may be, in his head, but goes not to his heart, and thus becomes an unfruitful theory; but the heart is equivalent to the understanding (vid. p. 174), in the sense in which the heart appears as the previous condition to the attainment of wisdom (xviii. 15), and as something to be gained before all (xv. 32), viz. understanding, as the fitting intellectual and practical habitus to the reception, the appropriation, and realization of wisdom, the ability rightly to comprehend the fulness of the communicated knowledge, and to adopt it as an independent possession, that which the Greek called νοῦς, as in that "golden proverb" of Democritus: πολλοὶ πολυμαθεῖς νοῦν οὐκ ἔχουσι, or as in Luke xxiv. 25, where it is said that the Lord opened τὸν νοῦν of His disciples to understand the Scriptures. In the LXX. a distich follows ver. 16, which is made up of 19*b* and 20*b*, and contains a varied translation of these two lines.

<sup>1</sup> If we write לֵב-אֵין with Makkeph, then we have to accentuate לִקְנוֹת חֲכָמָה with Tarcha Munach, because the Silluk word in this writing has not two syllables before the tone. This sequence of accents is found in the Codd. Ven. 1521, 1615, Basel 1619, while most editions have לִקְנוֹת חֲכָמָה וּלְבֵן-אֵין, which is false. But according to mss. we have לֵב without Makkeph, and that is right according to the Makkeph rules of the metrical Accentuationssystem; vid. Torah Emeth, p. 40.

Ver. 17 At all times the right friend shows himself loving;
And as a brother is he born for adversity.

Brother is more than friend, he stands to one nearer than a friend does, Ps. xxxv. 14; but the relation of a friend may deepen itself into a spiritual, moral brotherhood, xviii. 24, and there is no name of friend that sounds dearer than חֵן, 2 Sam. i. 26. 17*a* and 17*b* are, according to this, related to each other climactically. The friend meant in 17*a* is a true friend. Of no other is it said that he loves בְּכָל-עֵת, i. e. makes his love manifest; and also the article in חֵן not only here gives to the word more body, but stamps it as an ideal-word: the friend who corresponds to the idea of such an one.<sup>1</sup> The inf. of the Hiph., in the sense "to associate" (Ewald), cannot therefore be חֵן, because חֵן is not derived from חָנַן, but from חָנַן. Thus there exists no contrast between 17*a* and 17*b*, so that the love of a friend is thought of, in contradistinction to that of a brother, as without permanency (Fl.); but 17*b* means that the true friend shows himself in the time of need, and that thus the friendship becomes closer, like that between brothers. The statements do not refer to two kinds of friends; this is seen from the circumstance that חֵן has not the article, as חֵן has. It is not the subj. but pred., as אָדָם, Job xi. 12: sooner is a wild ass born or born again as a man. The meaning of חֵן there, as at Ps. lxxxvii. 5 f., borders on the notion of regenerari; here the idea is not essentially much less, for by the saying that the friend is born in the time of need, as a brother, is meant that he then for the first time shows himself as a friend, he receives the right status or baptism of such an one, and is, as it were, born into personal brotherly relationship to the sorely-tried friend. The translation comprobatur (Jerome) and erfunden [is found out] (Luther) obliterates the peculiar and

<sup>1</sup> The Arab. grammarians say that the article in this case stands, l'astfrāgh khānās ālīnas, as an exhaustive expression of all essential properties of the genus, i. e. to express the full ideal realization of the idea in that which is named thus intentional expression, for נולד is not at all a metaphor used for passing into the light—the two passages in Proverbs and in Job have not their parallel. לָצַד is not equivalent to בָּצַד (cf. Ps. ix. 10, x. 1), for the interchange of the prep. in 17*a* and 17*b* would then be without any apparent reason. But Hitzig's translation also: as a brother he is born of adversity, is impossible, for לְ after נולד and לְ always designates that for which the birth is an advantage, not that from which it proceeds. Thus לְ will be that of the purpose: for the purpose of the need,—not indeed to suffer (Job v. 7) on account of it, but to bear it in sympathy, and to help to bear it. Rightly Fleischer: frater autem ad ærumnam (sc. levandam et removendam) nascitur. The LXX. gives this sense to the ל: ἀδελφοὶ δὲ ἐν ἀνάγκαις χρησιμοὶ ἕστωσαν, τοῦτο γὰρ χάριν γεννῶνται.

Ver. 18 A man void of understanding is he who striketh hands,
Who becometh surety with his neighbour.

Cf. vi. 1–5, where the warning against suretyship is given at large, and the reasons for it are adduced. It is incorrect to translate (Gesen., Hitzig, and others) לְפָנַי רַעְיוֹ, with the LXX., Jerome, the Syr., Targ., and Luther, “for his neighbour;” to become surety for any one is לְ עַרְבֵי, vi. 1, or, with the object. accus., xi. 15, another suitable prep. is בְּעַרְבֵי; but לְפָנַי never means pro (ὐπέρ), for at 1 Sam. i. 16 it means “to the person,” and 2 Sam. iii. 31, “before Abner's corpse (bier).” רַעְיוֹ is thus here the person with whom the suretyship is entered into; he can be called the רַעְיוֹ of him who gives bail, so much the more as the reception of the bail supposes that both are well known to each other. Here also Fleischer rightly translates: apud alterum (sc. creditorem pro debitore).

Ver. 19 He loveth sin who loveth strife;
He who maketh high his doors seeketh destruction.

A synthetic distich (vid. p. 10). Böttcher finds the reason of the pairing of these two lines in the relationship between a mouth and a door (cf. Mic. vii. 5, פִּתְחֵי פִּיָּה). Hitzig goes further, and supposes that 19*b* figuratively expresses what boastfulness brings upon itself. Against Geier, Schultens, and others, who understand פִּתְחוֹ directly of the mouth, he rightly remarks that הִנְבִּיחַ פֶּה is not heard of, and that הִנְדִּיל פֶּה would be used instead. But the two lines harmonize, without this interchangeable reference of os and ostium. Zanksucht [quarrelsomeness] and Prunksucht [ostentation] are related as the symptoms of selfishness. But both bear their sentence in themselves. He who has pleasure in quarrelling has pleasure in evil, for he commits himself to the way of great sinning, and draws others along with him; and he who cannot have the door of his house high enough and splendid enough, prepares thereby for himself, against his will, the destruction of his house. An old Hebrew proverb says, בל העוסק בבנין יתמסכן, œdificandi nimis studiosus ad mendicitatem redigitur. Both parts of this verse refer to one and the same individual, for the insanum œdificandi studium goes only too often hand in hand with unjust and heartless litigation.

Ver. 20 He that is of a false heart findeth no good;

And he that goeth astray with his tongue falleth into evil.

Regarding נהפך בלשונו, vid. xi. 20. In the parallel member, עקשילב, vid. at ii. 12) with his tongue, going about concealing and falsifying the truth. The phrase ונהפך (the connecting form before a word with a prep.) is syntactically possible, but the Masora designates the word, in contradistinction to ונהפך, pointed with Pathach, Lev. xiii. 16, with לית as unicum, thus requires ונהפך, as is also found in Codd. The contrast of רעה is here טוב, also neut., as xiii. 21, cf. xvi. 20, and רע, xiii. 17.

The first three parts of the old Solomonic Book of Proverbs ((1) x. 1–xii. 28; (2) xiii. 1–xv. 19; (3) xv. 20–xvii. 20) are now followed by the fourth part. We recognise it as striking the same keynote as x. 1. In xvii. 21 it resounds once more, here commencing a part; there, x. 1, beginning the second group of proverbs. The first closes, as it begins, with a proverb of the fool.

Ver. 21 He that begetteth a fool, it is to his sorrow;

And the father of a fool hath no joy.

It is admissible to supply ילדו, developing itself from ילד, before לו לתונה (vid. regarding this passive formation, at x. 1, cf. xiv. 13), as at Isa. lxvi. 3, מעילה (Fl.: in mœrorem sibi genuit h. e. ideo videtur genuisse ut sibi mœrorem crearet); but not less admissible is it to interpret לו לתונה as a noun-clause corresponding to the ול-אישכח (thus to be written with Makkeph): it brings grief to him. According as one understands this as an expectation, or as a consequence, ילד, as at xxiii. 24, is rendered either qui gignit or qui genuit. With נבל, seldom occurring in the Book of Proverbs (only here and at ver. 7), נפסיל, occurring not unfrequently, is interchanged. Schultens rightly defines the latter etymologically:

marcidus h. e. qui ad virtutem, pietatem, vigorem omnem vitæ spiritalis medullitus emarcuit; and the former: elumbis et mollitie segnitieve fractus, the intellectually heavy and sluggish (cf. Arab. kasal, laziness; kaslân, the lazy).<sup>1</sup>

Ver. 22 A joyful heart bringeth good recovery;
And a broken spirit drieth the bones.

The heart is the centre of the individual life, and the condition and the tone of the heart communicates itself to this life, even to its outermost circumference; the spirit is the power of self-consciousness which, according as it is lifted up or broken, also lifts up or breaks down the condition of the body (Psychol. p. 199), vid. the similar contrasted phrases לֵב שָׂמֵחַ and רוּחַ נִבְּאָה, xv. 13. The ἀπ. λεγ. גָּהָה (here and there in Codd. incorrectly written גִּיָּהָה) has nothing to do with the Arab. jihat, which does not mean sight, but direction, and is formed from wjah (whence wajah, sight), like עֲרָה, congregation, from עָרָה (יער). The Syr., Targ. (perhaps also Symmachus: ἀγαθύνει ἡλικίαν; Jerome: ætatem floridam facit; Luther: makes the life lustig [cheerful]) translate it by body; but for this גָּהָה (גִּיָּהָה) is used, and that is a word of an entirely different root from גָּהָה. To what verb this refers is shown by Hos. v. 13: וְלֹא־יִנְהָה מִכַּם מְזוּר, and healed not for you her ulcerous wound. מְזוּר is the compress, i.e. the bandage closing up the ulcer, then also the ulcer-wound itself; and יִנְהָה is the contrary of עָלָה, e.g. Jer. viii. 22; it means the removing of the bandage and the healing of the wound. This is confirmed by the Syr. gho, which in like manner is construed with min, and means to be delivered from something (vid. Bernstein's Lex. Syr. to Kirsch's Chrestomathie). The Aethiop. quadriliteral gâlgêh, to hinder, to cause to cease, corresponds to the causative Syr. agahish. Accordingly גָּהָה means to be in the condition of abatement, mitigation, healing; and יִנְהָה (as synonym of בָּהָה, Neh. iii. 19, with which Parchon combines it), levamen, levatio, in the sense of bodily healing (LXX. εὐκτεῖν ποιεῖ; Venet., after Kimchi, ἀγαθύνει

<sup>1</sup> Nöldeke's assertion (Art. Orion in Schenkel's Bibel-Lexicon) that the Arab. kasal corresponds to the Hebr. בָּשָׁל proceeds from the twofold supposition, that the meaning to be lazy underlies the meaning to totter (vid. also Dietrich in Gesenius' Heb. Wörterbuch), and that the Hebr. ס must correspond with the Arab. ش. The former supposition is untenable, the latter is far removed (cf. e.g. בָּפֵא and kurst, סָפָר and sifr, מִסְכִּין and miskin). The verb בָּשָׁל, Aram. תָּקַל, is unknown in the Arab.

θεραπείαν); and הִיטִיב נְהִיָה (cf. xv. 2) denotes, to bring good improvement, to advance powerfully the recovery. Schultens compares the Arab. jahy, nitescere, disserenari, as Menahem has done נִנְתָּ, but this word is one of the few words which are explained exclusively from the Syriac (and Æthiop.). נָרַם (here and at xxv. 15) is the word interchanging with עָצַם, xv. 30, xvi. 24.

Ver. 23 Bribery from the bosom the goddess receiveth,
To pervert the ways of justice.

Regarding שָׁחַר, vid. xvii. 8. The idea of this word, as well as the clause containing the purpose, demand for the רָשָׁע a high judicial or administrative post. The bosom, חֵק (חֵיק), is, as xvi. 23, that of the clothing. From the bosom, מִחֵק, where it was kept concealed, the gift is brought forth, and is given into the bosom, בְּחֵק, xxi. 14, of him whose favour is to be obtained—an event taking place under four eyes, which purposely withdraws itself from the observation of any third person. Since this is done to give to the course of justice a direction contrary to rectitude, the giver of the bribe has not right on his side; and, under the circumstances, the favourable decision which he purchases may be at once the unrighteous sentence of a צָרִיק, accusing him, or accused by him, xviii. 5.

Ver. 24 The understanding has his attention toward wisdom;
But the eyes of a fool are on the end of the earth.

Many interpreters explain, as Eichel :

“ The understanding finds wisdom everywhere ;
The eyes of the fool seek it at the end of the world.”

Ewald refers to Deut. xxx. 11–14 as an unfolding of the same thought. But although it may be said of the fool (vid. on the contrary, xv. 14) that he seeks wisdom, only not at the right place, as at xiv. 6, of the mocker that he seeks wisdom but in vain, yet here the order of the words, as well as the expression, lead us to another thought: before the eyes of the understanding (אֵת־פְּנֵי, as Gen. xxxiii. 18, 1 Sam. ii. 11, and frequently in the phrase נִרְאָה אֵת־פְּנֵי ה', e.g. 1 Sam. i. 22) wisdom lies as his aim, his object, the end after which he strives; on the contrary, the eyes of the fool, without keeping that one necessary thing in view, wander in alia omnia, and roam about what is far off, without having any fixed object. The fool is everywhere with his thoughts, except where he ought to be. Leaving out of view that which lies nearest, he loses himself in aliena. The understanding has an ever present theme in wisdom, which arrests his attention, and on which he concentrates himself; but the fool flutters about fantastically from one thing to another, and that which is to him precisely of least importance interests him the most.

The series of proverbs, ver. 25-xviii. 2, begins and closes in the same way as the preceding, and only ver. 26 stands by itself without apparent connection.

Ver. 25. This verse begins connecting itself with ver. 21:

A grief to his father is a foolish son,
And a bitter woe for her that bare him.

The אפ. λεγ. מָרַר is formed from מָרַר (to be bitter, properly harsh), as מָרָם from מָרַם. The Syr. and Targ. change the subst. into participles; some codd. also have מִיָּמֵר (after the forms מִיָּמֵל, מִיָּמֵב, מִיָּמֵר, מִיָּמֵע), but as may be expected in 25a, מִכְּעֵים. The dat. obj. instead of the accus. may be possible; the verse immediately following furnishes a sufficient example of this.

Ver. 26 Also to inflict punishment on the righteous is not good;

This, that one overthrows the noble on account of his rectitude.

Does the נָ [also] refer to a connection from which the proverb is separated? or is it tacitly supposed that there are many kinds of worthless men in the world, and that one from among them is brought forward? or is it meant, that to lay upon the righteous a pecuniary punishment is also not good? None of all these. The proverb must have a meaning complete in itself; and if pecuniary punishment and corporeal punishment were regarded as opposed to one another, 26b would then have begun with אִי קִי (quanto magis percutere ingenuos). Here it is with נָ as at xx. 11, and as with אִי at 11a, and נָ at xiii. 10: according to the sense, it belongs not to the word next following, but to לְצַדִּיק; and עֲנִישׁ (whence inf. עֲנִישׁ, as xxi. 11, with the א in ע, cf. also אָבִיר, xi. 10, for אָבִיר) means here not specially to inflict a pecuniary fine, but generally to punish, for, as in mulctare, the meaning is generalized, elsewhere with the accus., Deut. xxii. 19, here to give to any one to undergo punishment. The ruler is the servant of God, who has to preserve rectitude, εἰς ὀργήν τῶ τὸ κακὸν πράσσοντι (Rom. xiii. 14). It is not good when he makes his power to punish to be felt by the innocent as well as by the guilty.

In 26b, instead of הַכּוֹת, the proverb is continued with לְהַכּוֹת; לֹא-טוֹב, which is to be supplied, takes the inf. alone when it precedes, and the inf. with הַכּוֹת when it follows, xviii. 5, xxviii. 21,

xxi. 9 (but cf. xxi. 19). הַכּוֹת is the usual word for punishment by scourging, Deut. xxv. 1-3, cf. 2 Cor. xi. 24, N. T. μαστιγοῦν, δέρειν, Rabb. מַכּוֹת, strokes, or מַלְקוֹת from לָקַח, varulare, to receive stripes. נְדִיבִים are here those noble in disposition. The idea of נְדִיב fluctuates between generosus in an outward and in a moral sense, wherefore עַל-יִשָּׁר, or rather עַל-יִשְׁרָאֵל, is added; for the old editions, correct MSS., and e.g. also Soncin. 1488, present עָלַי (vid. Norzi). Hitzig incorrectly explains this, "against what is due" (יִשָּׁר), as xi. 24); also Ps. xciv. 20, עַל-יְהוָה does not mean κατὰ προστάγματος (Symmachus), but ἐπὶ προστάγματι (LXX. and Theod.), on the ground of right = praetextu juris (Vatabl.). Thus עַל-יִשָּׁר means here neither against nor beyond what is due, but: on the ground of honourable conduct, making this (of course mistakenly) a lawful title to punishment; Aquila, ἐπὶ εὐθύτητι, cf. Matt. v. 10, ἔνεκεν δικαιοσύνης. Besides, for עַל after הִכָּה, the causal signification lies nearest Num. xxii. 32, cf. Isa. i. 5 (עַל-מַה, on account of anything). If the power of punishment is abused to the punishing of the righteous, yea, even to the corporeal chastisement of the noble, and their straight, i.e. conscientious, firm, open conduct, is made a crime against them, that is not good—it is perversion of the idea of justice, and an iniquity which challenges the penal rectitude of the Most High (Eccles. v. 7 [8]).

Ver. 27 He that keepeth his words to himself hath knowledge,
And the cool of temper is a man of understanding.

The first line here is a variation of x. 19b. The phrase יָדַע דַּעַת (here and at Dan. i. 4) means to possess knowledge (novisse); more frequently it is יָדַע בִּינָה, e.g. iv. 1, where יָדַע has the inchoative sense of noscere. In 27b the Kerî is יְקַרְרוּת. Jerome translates it pretiosi spiritus, the Venet. τίμιος τὸ πνεῦμα. Rashi glosses יָקַר here, as at 1 Sam. iii. 1, by מְנַע (thus to be read after codd.), retentus spiritu; most interpreters remark that the spirit here comes into view as expressing itself in words. It is scarcely correct to say that יְקַרְרוּת could designate one who is sparing in his words, but יְקַרְרוּת is, according to the fundamental conception of the verb יָקַר, gravis spiritu (Schultens), of a dignified, composed spirit; it is a quiet seriousness proceeding from high conscientiousness, and maintaining itself in self-control, which is designated by this word. But the Chethîb יְקַרְרוּת presents almost the same description of character. קָרַר from קָרַר (of the same root as יָקַר) means to be firm, unmoveable, καρτερόν εἶναι, hence to be congealed, frozen, cold (cf. frigus with rigere, rigor), figuratively to be cold-blooded, passionless, quiet, composed (Fl.); cf. post-bibl. קרת רוח (Arab. kurrat 'ain), cooling = refreshing, ἀνάψυξις (Acts iii. 20).<sup>1</sup> Whether we read יקר or קר, in any case we are not to translate rarus spiritu, which, apart from the impossibility of the expression, makes 27*b* almost a tautological repetition of the thought of 27*a*. The first line recommends bridling of the tongue, in contrast to inconsiderate and untimely talk; the second line recommends coldness, i.e. equanimity of spirit, in contrast to passionate heat.

Ver. 28 continues the same theme, the value of silence:

Even a fool, when he keeps silence, is counted wise;
When he shutteth his mouth, discreet.

The subj. as well as the pred. of the first line avail for the second. עִבְרָה, obturare, occludere, usually of closing the ear, is here transferred to the mouth. The Hiph. שִׁחַרְיִי means mutum agere (cf. Arab. khrs, mutum esse), from שָׁחַר, which, like κωφός, passes from the meaning surdus to that of mutus (Fl.). The words of Job xiii. 5, and also those of Alexander: si tacuisses sapiens mansisses, are applicable to fools. An Arab. proverb says, "silence is the covering of the stupid." In the epigrammatical hexameter, πᾶς τις ἀπαιδευτος Φρονιμώτατος ἐστι σιωπῶν, the word σιωπῶν has the very same syntactical position as these two participles.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> "He has made my eye glowing" (askhn, cf. אִשְׁחַן) is in Arab. equivalent to "he has deeply troubled me." The eye of the benevolent is bârid, and in the Semitic manner of expression, with deep psychological significance, it is said that the tears of sorrow are hot, but those of joy cold.

ABBREVIATIONS.

[THE usual abbreviations of words and phrases are adopted throughout this work, and will readily be understood by the reader. The mark of abbreviation in Hebrew words is a stroke like an acute accent after a letter, as e.g. 'תְּרִי for תְּרִימוֹת, xxix. 4; and in Hebrew sentences, 'וּגְרִ for וְגִוְרִי et complens = etc., as e.g. at xxx. 4.]

THE BOOK OF PROVERBS.

FIRST COLLECTION OF SOLOMONIC PROVERBS.—
CHAP. X.-XXII. 16. (CONTINUED.)

CHAP. xviii. 1. This series of proverbs now turns from the fool to the separatist :

The separatist seeketh after his own pleasure ;
Against all that is beneficial he showeth his teeth.

The reflexive נִפְרָד has here the same meaning as the Rabbinical פָּרַשׁ מִן־הַעֲבוּר לְעַצְמוֹ, to separate oneself from the congregation, Aboth ii. 5 ; נִפְרָד denotes a man who separates himself, for he follows his own counsel, Arab. mnfrd (mtfrrd) brāyh, or jhyś almhl (seorsum ab aliis secedens). Instead of לְתַאוּהוּ, Hitzig, after Jerome, adopts the emendation לְתַאֲנֶה, “after an occasion” (a pretext), and by נִפְרָד thinks of one pushed aside, who, thrown into opposition, seeks to avenge himself. But his translation of 1b, “against all that is fortunate he gnasheth his teeth,” shows how much the proverb is opposed to this interpretation. נִפְרָד denotes one who willingly (Judg. iv. 11), and, indeed, obstinately withdraws himself. The construction of יִבְקֹשׁ with לְ (also Job x. 6) is explained by this, that the poet, giving prominence to the object, would set it forward : a pleasure (תַּאוּהוּ, as Arab. hawan, unstable and causeless direction of the mind to something, pleasure, freak, caprice), and nothing else, he goes after who has separated himself (Fl.) ; the effort of the separatist goes out after a pleasure, i.e. the enjoyment and realization of such ; instead of seeking to conform himself to the law and ordinance of the community, he seeks to carry out a separate view, and to accomplish some darling plan : libidinem sectatur sui cerebri homo. With this 1b accords.

תוֹשִׁיָהּ (vid. at ii. 7) is concretely that which furthers and profits. Regarding הִתְנַחֵץ, vid. at xvii. 14. Thus putting his subjectivity in the room of the common weal, he shows his teeth, places himself in fanatical opposition against all that is useful and profitable in the principles and aims, the praxis of the community from which he separates himself. The figure is true to nature: the polemic of the schismatic and the sectary against the existing state of things, is for the most part measureless and hostile.

Ver. 2 The fool hath no delight in understanding;

But only that his heart may reveal itself therein.
